Teeth clenched so hard it had to hurt, she sunk her nails in the leather and repeated, helplessly: “Chuuya.”

This is Yuan, he thought. Be nice to her.

“I’ll see you,” he said, clearing his throat. “If you want me to. Or something.”

Cowardly ways were cold enough to relinquish the season in loss; Chuuya left without waiting for her answer.

---

...

---

“There you are,” Hirotsu huffed, monocle fogged up like it only was when irritation reached his temples. “Would you mind keeping Dazai from getting himself ran over?”

The Port Mafia black SUVs divided the darkening sky in two halves — pristine and rich and chasing the night itself. Not many passersby offered more than a glance to the assortment of vehicles; according to Mori, the greater syndicates became, the easier it became to be mistaken for the good guys.

And most people, he reminded himself, had no particular reactions to government cars.

Chuuya stared. “I say let him do it.”

The man wasn’t impressed. Huffing, he set to search the crowd of suited men and whispering Executives, squinting until he identified the stain of black and white abandoned on the concrete — hidden underneath one of the SUVs all the way to his chin, petulantly.

He could almost feel Kouyou’s urge to pull him by the ears, from across the parking lot — the perfect excuse to escape the duty to discuss matters with Ace and the Colonel, before the two Executives were abandoned as city guards during their absence.

“Oh, hello,” the boy greeted, once Chuuya went to stand over his peeking head, arms crossed. “I can’t believe we don’t get to leave you behind.”

“And I can’t fucking believe we don’t get to run you over,” He threw the orange he’d stolen from the Orphanage, watching it bounce off his forehead. “Come on. Stand the fuck up.”

“No.”

“Mackerel.”

“I have recently watched a documentary,” Dazai insisted — looking deeply more comfortable than someone under a car that wasn’t even entirely turned off should have been. “On car accidents. Did you know that children, elders, and people with previous injuries have a slimmer chance of surviving being run over? And again — we’re only talking about moderate speed. If Gramps only got in and drove it as fast as I know he could —”

“That’s not suicide,” Chuuya cut in.

A pitying look pulled his traits. “Dear. What about these circumstances is casual to you?”

Chuuya gritted his teeth, barely managing to scowl his expression into something more polite when Mori offered him a gracious nod. The man didn’t seem to want to bother with more than a look in Dazai’s direction; Chuuya inhaled.

“Alright,” he said. “As you wish.”

Nothing more than murmurs followed as he silently circled the car, tearing the driver’s door open. Despite all the eyes, only Hirotsu’s sigh was loud enough to be heard: “Chuuya, don’t

—“

By the time he was settled on the seat, foot on the gas and key in the ignition to make the car rumble, Dazai was already whining.

“No, no, no!” he insisted, as Hirotsu did his best to help him to his feet without touching an inch of him. Obnoxious pretense dropped from his face like a melting candle; just exaggerated enough to make Chuuya frown, squinting at the purple stains under his eyes. “It can’t be Chuuya. It can never be Chuuya, imagine how shameful that would be — a man killed by his own dog! It can’t be. Odasaku would lose all respect for me,” He turned so fast Hirotsu offered the closest thing to startlement he was capable of — a blink. “Old man. Promise me you’ll never let that happen.”

“I’m at your service,” the man said, gravely.

“Put him in a muzzle.”

“I’m almost entirely at your service.”

Dazai hummed, satisfied, reaching up to tap the man’s shoulders — needing to stand on his tiptoes to, just a bit. Then, he directed his nastiest glance to Chuuya.

Expectation weighted the air down — as if there existed the sincere, genuine expectation that they would start a massacre right there, right now. Chuuya slammed the car door behind him again, already fed up with the tension.

Quicker than blinks, polished shoes kicked his shins. Chuuya slammed his fist on a too hard skull, eliciting a yelp. Hirotsu sighed. The boy’s teeth snapped near his hand, fingers hooking around his middle; he pulled at the overly long strands, cursing out —

“Boys,” Kouyou called, eye twitching — barely loud enough to be heard. “Get in the car. You come with me.”

“That’s new,” Dazai gaped, sliding over the hood with ease. Just clamorous enough to make sure Mori would hear, as the man entered the vehicle all the others would surround, he added: “I cannot believe I’m being mercilessly kicked out of the intimate circle. Betrayal!”

Chuuya slapped his nape, pulling the back of his tie towards the door. “She is the intimate circle, you idiot.”

One of the Executive’s eyelids twitched, again. He thought he heard Hirotsu sigh, again — relief or exasperation. Kouyou kept her mouth shut, hushing them inside the back of the vehicle, tight hands around their shoulders — Chuuya’s own, at least; she hovered her fingers upon Dazai’s back, instead — and floating to the passenger seat.

“How come Boss is coming, anyway?” Chuuya asked, as the cars lined up to abandon the parking lot. Ink-black curtains devoured the night; they were too deep in the city to even imagine stars. “Isn’t his identity supposed to be a secret?”

“And a secret it shall remain,” Kouyou confirmed, slapping the ankle Dazai had tried to lay on the brake with her fan. “The Five Moons’ meetings are held in complete anonymity. You will understand what I mean, once you see it. I’m sure the demon child could tell you all about it.”

“I could,” he perked up, abandoned on his seat with little care, focused the blinding lights of his console. “I won’t, though. First meeting, I was fourteen. Such a young thing. Remember, Ane-san? Mori had me hold your arm at the airport. It was so boring. However, this one has the premises to be very interesting,” He winked in Chuuya’s direction. “Voices are the Three Moons won’t rest until their commanders are avenged, and their deaths explained.”

“Sure,” Chuuya grunted, not meeting Kouyou’s eyes in the rear view mirror. There was an unanswered text on his phone — you sure you want them to find out there? “Your enthusiasm is appreciated.”

“Hey, hey, Chuuya,” the boy insisted, feet almost brushing the head of the driver’s seat. “Did you know the Boss has doubles during these types of visits?”

From countless transport businesses with Albatross, Chuuya already knew the road to Tokyo wasn’t long — but the summer traffic did not disappoint his worst expectations. Kouyou, busy as she was studying a vibrant red dossier she’d been carrying around the whole week, barely managed to stitch two words together to ask Dazai to shut his mouth when he started being aggravating. The driver was an old man entirely too engrossed with the Chinese Opera on the radio.

It left Dazai as the only opportunity for entertainment.

Legs were thrown on his lap, shoes to his face; remarks about how much better he was at this one game, Chuuya, you can’t even begin to imagine were shoved down his ears; vivid descriptions of the bloodiest ways the Five Moons might decide to execute the guilty attackers were cheerfully offered.

Apart from the pounding of his head, he almost managed to let that insistent melody lull him. The hum of the car resembled the ghost haunting the halls of Albatross’ apartment — his piping system — and the murmurs leaving Kouyou’s mouth brought images of her endlessly soft guest bedroom.

More stars appeared the further they drove from the city. Adam had told him a joke about pollution, once — he found he couldn’t remember it anymore. He wondered if he was having fun, protecting humans with his new Eve.

Heard that, master Chuuya?, he’d told him. He hadn’t understood what he was referring to, back then. I get a partner, too.

The console landed on his lap, hitting that one specific rib that had yet to heal correctly. A oof! left his mouth, immediately shushed by the full weight of Dazai’s body crashing against his side, nudging his hands towards the incriminated weapon.

“Bet you Hirotzu’s lucky lighter that you can’t beat this level,” he declared.

Irritation spiked up, though not sharp enough to break through the slumber. “Didn’t you already lose his lucky lighter?”

“He got himself another. And I stole it again,” Dazai ignored the evident sigh Kouyou let out. “So?” He stole his hat and put it on, no care for his spluttering. “Are you going to admit you will never show a quarter of my prowess, or will you go through the severe embarrassment of being proved wrong once again?”

“This is why Mori didn’t let you in his car, fucker.”

He gasped.

The game was some duel tournament sort of deal, all colorful tassels and over dramatic lights. Dazai’s character was as feminine as usual — a red-haired princess, this time, who made a very peculiar sound whenever she managed to land a hit on the brute she was fighting against.

Unexpectedly, it rendered his bones jelly; his body slipped a bit lower down the seat with every lost round, knees pressing to the back of Kouyou’s seat. Chuuya had been running around with Rin and Kenta the whole morning. He didn’t quite know how Dazai spent the hours of the day he didn’t spend with him or the Secret Unit; either talking to the walls and to Kazuko, or skipping behind Oda Sakunosuke’s feet in tales he refused to mention around him.

Whatever it was, it had managed to tire even him out. Dazai’s cruel remarks grew weaker and quieter, until he seemed content to simply sink against his side and watch the screen liquify its light on their faces. He dropped his head on his shoulder, scurrying close enough to click the wrong buttons when Chuuya was about to win.

He could hear his heartbeat; or Arahaki could, called by the known.

“You’re so boring,” Dazai murmured, clearly on the verge of awareness, once he beat the level. The tip of his nose tickled his neck, shortly; his breath fluttered his eyelids. Just for a moment, he caught Kouyou’s complicated expression in the rearview mirror. “Bet you can’t beat the next one, though.”

The Hotel Chinzanso Tokyo was the priciest showcase Chuuya’s eyes had ever been subjected to since he’d joined the Port Mafia. His brain barely managed to take it all in, from the spotless windows to the valleys of nature surrounding it; when they dragged themselves inside — Dazai heavily gripping the back of Kouyou’s sleeve, just to annoy her — he didn’t even have the strength to gape at the chandeliers and the gold linings.

He’d freak out tomorrow, he told himself. He’d allow the street kid in him to stare another day. Today, the moment Kouyou handed him a car and threw a whining Dazai his way, he walked.

“Boys.”

Deadly precise — the touch of a surgeon — Mori's voice drained any sleep from both their shoulders.

He was smiling. White fingers intertwined white fingers; his red scarf was nowhere to be found — nothing but the organization's doctor. The moment those hands laid on their shoulders instead, Chuuya felt every scar in his body tingle.

"Reflect on what will be asked of us, tomorrow," he told them, from all his height.

He frowned, somewhat confused. "Boss."

"Most chess pieces are replaceable," Dazai commented. Somehow, he'd managed to wipe any trace of drowsiness from his voice; he wondered if Mori had ever even seen him show any signs of slumber. "Is there a good enough offer to no longer make you stand with us, Boss?"

The ex-doctor's face was filled with delight. "I don't know, Dazai. Is there?"

A hum. "Who knows. Hop-hop, Chuuya."

Too tired to linger on implications, he made his way to the elevators, barely remembering to offer a bow to the man. He felt his eyes on their back all the way to the inside.

It wasn't the sole pair.

Special Division, he tapped down the wall of their hallway, mindlessly beginning to undo the laces of his boots. Room 768, 772, and —

779, Dazai traced down his back. I know.

Do we kill them?

No. A pause. Tomorrow, maybe. Depends on if they'll bore me.

They checked the room head to toe, searching for spy bugs — removing a good number of them for Chuuya to destroy under his heel and crash in his palm. Heavy curtains were pulled over the floor-to-ceiling windows, drowning the room in merciless darkness. Someone with a sparkling sense of humor — Hirotsu, he was ready to bet — had picked a room with a bunk bed.

It made Dazai senselessly excited.

He had no time to even attempt to fight about the top bed — the boy was already under the covers of the bottom one. It hardly stopped him from hurling objects at his back as he undressed, murmuring under his breath, but Chuuya found himself too exhausted to argue.

He floated up the bunk bed. He laid down. He realized, somewhat pointlessly — recalling memories of waking up to a silhouette leaving his guest futon — that he had never willingly fallen asleep in the same room as Dazai.

He traced the fading black on his arms, more vivid near his wrists — reminded himself he wasn't bleeding. In such a heavily lemon-flavored room, he would have noticed the scent of blood immediately.

"Psst."

He closed his eyes.

Insistent: "Psst."

Quiet, still.

A well aimed kick at one of the columns shook the whole bed. Rattled, Chuuya held onto the railing. "What the fuck do you want?"

Wordlessly, a bandaged arm reached up from the edge of his own bed. The tips of his fingers tickled the wood of his makeshift roof, close enough for him to touch.

He fell silent.

"Well?" Dazai called, perfectly toneless.

"Well what," he spat back.

"I know my sleeping habits are confusing at best, but we do have a big day tomorrow, yes? I can't sleep with you breathing like that."

Chuuya wondered if hallucinations were meant to feel like this. "Breathing the fuck how."

"Like you're sure Arahaki will wreck your body apart as soon as you fall asleep," The concept seemed to bore him endlessly. He wiggled his fingers. "Come on. I would like to close my eyes and dream of beautiful suicides. Is that not what you want?"

No, he almost responded. I don't dream.

Still at loss for words, he settled back on the bed, hoping the motion would rattle the whole bunk again. His shoulder sank in the annoyingly soft mattress. He couldn't see the hand any longer — but he knew it'd be there, if he pushed his fingers down the edge of the cliff.

Corruption, Chuuya reminded himself, was not an addition. As such, there was no risk for its sole solution to become one. All No Longer Human had ever managed to do was piss the god off and scatter discomfort all over his skeleton like confetti. The silence was good. It had been a long time since he'd trusted good things.

Painstakingly slow — he lowered his wrist over the edge, gripping the reaching fingers.

An imperceptible flinch went through Dazai's arm; he wouldn't have noticed, hadn't he been touching him. Quick to erase any memory of a faux-step, the colder fingers tightened around his on, cutting his circulation off. He didn't react — it was a familiar grip, and it was a familiar heartbeat, pulsing against his fingertips.

Some things were rarer than fear, he thought. Chuuya could hear himself breathe.

How unknown, he thought. How lonely.

---

...

---

The meeting was set to last two days.

Tokyo was chosen in the fragile name of impartiality — it was rare for these kinds of encounters not to end in bloodbaths. Pushed by the Port Mafia in particular, through the years, the syndicates had agreed to keep their petty wars away from their city.

“It’s a different location each time,” Hirotsu explained. He was standing guard in front of their seats, right behind the slightly elevated one Mori and Kouyou had occupied. “Takasekai usually picks. Nevertheless, the courtroom seems — a bit on the nose, I will admit.”

A bandaged elbow nudged him. “Heard that?” Dazai whispered, dangling his head from the edge of the seat, legs kicking upside down. “We’re about to be sentenced to death. Is that not more professional than having some gangster scream burn the witch! at us?”

“Would you shut up, for once in your life?” Chuuya hissed, eyes forward, pulling at his legs. “And sit up. I’m not catching you when the blood reaches your stupid head and you pass out. In fact, I’ll show off your corpse like a white flag —“

“Boys,” Hirotsu called, as the doors opened. His frame was all but tense — but he kept his eyes on the crowd settling in the remaining three sides of the room. “Time to keep quiet.”

Procedure was peculiar. Kouyou showed her face freely to the four groups — as were the right and left hands of each syndicate in the room. Delicately painted separé had been situated in front of the seats of the leaders, enclosing them in an incomplete booth.

It gave the whole meeting an incorrect aura — something that was made for the shadows of the night; yet forcibly shoved into the light of day. As a means to an end, Chuuya tried to come up with a rational number for the ounces of blood spilled by every hand in that room.

Only the Bishop’s Staff leader was excluded by protocol — a man, he assumed, considering he hadn’t caught sight of any female figure apart from the ones in the beds. The short rows of Staff made for an uncomfortable sight, in their crimson vests and dead-face masks; he hadn’t quite managed to move his eyes away from them since they’d stepped into the room.

“What a gorgeous ceiling,” Dazai sighed, as the standing silhouette behind the Shadow Blade’s separé barked about the damages the Gentleman’s Bar had gathered. It was beautiful — frescoed in traditional paint strokes. “It’d be the perfect place to hang myself from.”

Hirotsu twitched, minimally.

Chuuya didn’t pay him any mind. Mori, strangely enough, talked very little. From his perspective, the two of them partially hidden from sight — he could see the amused curve of his mouth climb to the stars. He was content with witnessing the Shadow Blade, Takasekai, and the KK Company list off everything the attacks had cost them.

He frowned. Fingers on Dazai’s armrest, he tapped: does he know it was us?

Dazai directed him a slow, owlish blink.

“Breach of authority is something the Five Moons have quietly, but sincerely, declared a useless demonstration of bloodthirst,” Takasekai’s leader — a woman, he thought, judging from the voice — insisted. There was something in her tone that reeked of aristocracy — her every vowel was the opposite of the accent Chuuya sometimes still slipped in, when he was distracted. “We’re not a bunch of low gangs who can afford such petty conflicts. If the Port Mafia has nothing to say about such mindless attacks — which we have ruled out as our own — we can only assume we should take it as a declaration of war.”

Murmurs arose through the room. Next to him, Dazai extracted his console.

“You accuse us,” Kouyou summed up, her smile in place. A flower-patterned fan hid most of her face; her eyes were pleurably merciless. “On what basis?”

Eerily enough, the leader of the KK Company hadn’t stopped giggling under his breath once, ever since he’d strided across the courtroom with his wildly dressed subordinates in tow. Brown and gold alternated on their mantles, hems brushing the ground and hoods draped across cleanly shaved heads.

“Should we remind the Port Mafia,” the man intervened, staring her down, “That during the Nine Rings Conflict, we could have easily joined forces with such a promising enemy, and chose not to? I ask, is it really a wise decision — picking battles so soon after you almost lost a war?”

“Fucking liars,” he muttered.

Kouyou hid her mouth behind her fan. Her huff of hilarity went all but unnoticed. — Chuuya knew that was the desired effect. Knew her coy act would make some veins pulse. “If the KK Company would like to describe it as a near-loss, we surely will not take that delusion from them.”

His next, gaping inhale was evidently offended. Gladly, the Executive met each pair of eyes dripping hostility on her lap.

“We wish for clarification,” the Shadow Blade leader intervened, eventually. “We wish to come to a better pact, for the good of our city. Some conditions will be put in place, certainly —“ “Certainly,” Mori echoed.

The quiet took a different texture.

There had been a saying, when he was still in the Sheep: if you’re so lucky not to be noticed by the Port Mafia — don’t gift yourself to their eyes.

The Boss wasn’t quite an intimidating man. He resembled, Chuuya thought, someone who would stop at very few things. Contempt from organizations he barely recognized as somewhere around their scale was clearly not one of them. Accusations he did not know true —

“But if that turns out not to be a possibility,” the Blade continued, with minimal hesitation. “We will take your acts as a declaration of war, and we will respond accordingly. All four of us. Even if we were willing to forgive those three instances, our commanders were —“

“All four of you?” Uselessly, Mori curled an eyebrow. Dazai’s fingers paused on the buttons. “That’s curious. As far as my assets have informed me, the Bishop’s Staff received no threats, nor any attacks from these — mysterious forces.”

Chuuya stilled.

“Should I blame this spontaneous alliance on a common animosity?” the man continued, pensively. “Or should I blame it on the sympathization all four of you showed — and subsequently denied — to the Nine Rings?”

Takasekai insisted: “We didn’t —“

“Save your words. You have already accused us of four attacks we didn’t claim — I would like an answer for the fifth one, if the Bishop’s Staff will allow me one.”

White vests and white masks turned their attention to their direction, adorned in a greyish shoulder-to-head veil they hadn’t been sporting in their Headquarters. Gloved hands tapped aimlessly on the armrests of the leader’s seat — the only one of the bunch with a yellowish mask, closer to rusty golden than to rotten snow — as he munched over the question.

At last, with a voice much older than Chuuya had suspected, he said: “We have reasons to believe you — or whichever one of your assets hid these attacks from you —“

“Hide,” Mori echoed, amused.

Deadly calm, hands crossed at the small of his back — Hirotsu glanced back at them.

“ — might have taken something of ours.”

“Oh?” the doctor tilted his head — the very picture of innocence, for no one to see. Chuuya’s head was pounding; his fingers itched to reach for his phone — the only other nameless contact he had added, after gifting Yuan her own. “You mean one of the many girls you kidnapped, correct?”

Kouyou straightened. The rumble of murmurs grew; Chuuya realized — rather late, if Dazai's sigh meant anything — that at least some of the Five Moons had fallen victim to the Bishop's Staff stealing game.

“Our women have willingly offered themselves as members of our brotherhood,” the leader replied, blankly. “I will not discuss our faith in this heathen place. All the Port Mafia needs to know — is that no pact will come to a successful conclusion with the Bishop's Staff, should the girl not be returned to her rightful home.”

“That is certainly a marvelous threat,” Mori commented. “And I assume the other Moons are glad to insert this condition in the endless lists they will ask of us?” He didn't wait for their protests. “I am rather interested in something you said.”

His mask did not twitch. “That something being?”

“We have reasons to believe some assets who hid these attacks from you — might have taken something of ours,” he echoed. “Am I to presume you have any material names to accuse?”

Subtly — a dance so flawless Chuuya barely managed not to gape at it — Hirotsu nodded to the few Black Lizards present. Easily, they readjusted their positions, hiding him and Dazai from sight — blinding them to the expressions scattered around the room.

“Old man,” Chuuya hissed.

“Later,” the Commander whispered. His wrinkled fingers tightened around the edge of a seat; suddenly, irrevocably, Chuuya knew he knew.

He turned — a single eye was already there, waiting for his gaze. His eyebrow curled.

Protection felt — abnormal.

Scorn would have made more sense. An unsuccessful mask for the gulps and the carefulness Chuuya could feel enclose him like a water veil; a show of strength in the face of two people they believed would have killed them for sport. Men steered away from Dazai whenever his silhouette appeared from the stairs to the dungeons; eyes dropped to the ground as soon as a red glow drowned Chuuya's frame.

Fear and rage went hand in hand — scared of the unknown, they had tried to kill them. They hadn't managed to.

Assets, Dazai mouthed, endlessly amused. I told you they would need us.

“There have been talks, in the underworld,” the KK Company leader intervened, at long last.

Three séparés hid faces he could almost shape in front of his eyes, with vertiginous clarity; from the very little he managed to see through the bars of the Black Lizards' bodies, the tight lips of their subordinates told him enough.

“Two shadows,” he continued, too toneless. “Broken cameras and reports from those who caught a glimpse — that is all they could tell us. They move too fast for us to catch, and they have killed with no hesitation. Their damage has been — unprecedented. We have compared our stories, and they all point to this one direction.”

“It is our belief,” the leader of Takasekai intervened, her tone lined in salty waves of tension. “That the Port Mafia might have found two particularly reliable weapons. And that the massacres we have fallen victims to in these months are to be appointed to them.”

Kouyou’s fan had come to a graceless halt; even without her eyes on him, Chuuya felt every hair on his body stand.

“To the two shadows of the Port Mafia,” Mori echoed, seemingly uninterested. Hirotsu was a too sturdy wall; but Dazai was a mirror, and there was a tinge of danger in the callous tilt of his lips. “And do these shadows have names?”

“Do they need ones?” the Bishop’s Staff scoffed. “Do they even exist, outside of the glass cage the Port Mafia most probably keeps them in — when it doesn’t need them to sow disaster in the name of supremacy?”

Chuuya felt his mouth tremble.

“To be clear,” Mori said. The lack of his gaze on them was unnerving. “What you ask of us is to reestablish our peace. Correct?”

“Under certain conditions,” the Shadow Blade was quick to add. “We will need reassurance in your motives. Our forgiveness cannot be taken for granted — just as we will not take for granted your promises not to betray our trust again.”

“Did you not betray our trust,” The word was spat with viciousness at the center of the room, gentle enough to startle most. “When you secretly joined forces with the Nine Rings, hoping they would take care of the insurmountable obstacle on your way?”

Thick and nauseating, silence sagged the room.

“You talk of forgiveness,” the Boss drawled, all enjoyment wiped away from his face. “You talk of conditions. Need any of you to be reminded, the Five Moons were not established on our requests. It was your predecessors who longed for a solution to keep the Mafia contained.”

Takasekai rose from her seat, her silhouette frantic behind the separ  . “What is that supposed to —“

“It means that you need us to come to an agreement,” Mori concluded, easily. “The same cannot be said for us, unfortunately.”

It tickled something in the further corners of his skull; places Arahaki could not quite reach — and, as such, were technically irrelevant. He remembered kneeling, a new hat and a new home to destroy, all because of an answer to a question he’d never been smart enough to ask himself. What is a good leader? Why was I not?

Yokohama drowned in illegal organizations; they kept the city afloat with blood and deals the upper floors were too hypocritical to admit to taking. None of them were the Port Mafia; none of them clogged the whispers and the goodnight stories of the settlement with the same hunger, as if saying their name a tad too loud would trace knife collars around someone's throat.

Gloved fingers snapped the thread; Mori sighed, once again a paragon of delight. "But those are not details we should linger on, should we? We're here to discuss peace, not hierarchy," Those few words restarted lungs around the room. "It has been some long hours, has it not? I propose we take some time to reexamine our stands, and we dedicate tomorrow to facts. What do you say?"

"Under one condition," the Bishop's Staff.

"Being?"

"Bring your shadows with you, tomorrow."

Kouyou's petrified frame, Hirotsu's unbent back — all he saw amongst the whispers. Lightning quick, the old man directed a glance to Dazai's face — he, though, only had eyes for Mori.

"We will bring someone, too," the masked man assured. That coverage was more unnerving than even the separ  ; it gave the impression of a featureless face, as if discussing trades with a ghost. Chuuya wanted to punch him straight in the jaw. "It is them, the crimes against the Moons are to be chalked up to. Let them speak. Let us all decide whether conditions are appropriate. Let us come to peace, for the good of Yokohama."

Oh. Adrenaline tickled his fingers; for a glimpse, he could have sworn the black had been swallowed by his skin. Oh, it's on.

"Alright, then" Mori conceded. Ever a mirror, Dazai let out a bored sigh. "For the good of Yokohama."

---

...

---

That evening, Chuuya eavesdropped on three conversations.

The first of them was hushed, as Kouyou and Hirotsu pretended to exchange pleasantries in the dining room of the Hotel, seated in the table closest to the exit. Dazai had dropped a stolen meal on their desk, but the endless tables of buffet still filled Chuuya's mouth with drool.

The two, though, had yet to touch a piece of food.

“— in the place to demand?” Hirotsu was saying, running pensive fingers down a cigarette pack. His lighter was nowhere to be seen; Chuuya could feel it press inside his pocket. “Boss will not allow them to be punished.”

“He might have to, if he wishes to bring a treaty to the table,” the Executive replied, hands just tight enough around her cup of tea. She had been trying to catch him since the end of the meeting — Chuuya had taken advantage of old Sheep hiding methods. “What in God's name were they thinking?”

“It's Dazai and Chuuya,” the commander said, pointedly — like it meant something.

“Is starting a conflict against the Four Moon a wise decision? It will bring nothing but a useless bloodbath we will emerge victorious from,” she insisted. “The News will torment us again. There were too many losses during the Nine Rings Conflict; the Special Division is already tailing us. Dazai, especially, should know that — ”

She cut herself off; seething, she studied her tea.

“There's nothing they can do against us. They don't have enough proof, my lady.”

“But they do have something we need,” Kouyou frowned. “Without the Permit, we're left naked. An eventual conflict will require a great amount of Abilities; they will be watching. It's a sum of troubles we cannot afford,” She laid her cup down, sighing to the ceiling. Again: “What was Dazai thinking?”

“Only the fact that this whole mess was born from Dazai's machinations consoles me,” the man replied, with an exasperated tone he'd learned to associate to discussion on the two of them. “He has always walked a thousand steps in front us. There has to be something we're missing.”

“His games are nothing but a pointless search for entertainment,” Dazai, Mori had said, is barely a person. “Or suicide, if we're particularly unlucky. We are bound to suffer for it.”

Hirotsu searched her face. “It is alright of you to worry about them.”

“Them?” Kouyou laughed, disbelieving. “I trust Chuuya not to fall down that demon's traps. We will have words about this — competition or not, he's still my subordinate. He acted out against my orders. If I have any concerns — it is for his minimal disadvantages against Dazai. Surely not for our resident devil.”

“When did you start pretending to despise him?”

Webs spread through her glass exterior; beautiful, in some way — only because they were hers. She tapped one manicured nail on the edge of her cup; distant, her eyes traced lines on a canva he couldn't see.

Eventually, the woman sighed.

“He’s a child, Hirotsu,” she offered. “It’s all he will ever be, no matter how hard he fights it. He is a victim of his age, and the way he acts will shape him into someone who he is not — not yet.”

“Someone like him?”

Him?, Chuuya wondered.

Kouyou raised her up to her lips. “Someone worse, perhaps.”

Confirmation of Dazai’s supposed plan came from his second eavesdropped conversation — if it could be called such; given he doubted either the mackerel nor the Boss of the Port Mafia were stupid enough not to notice the silhouette lurching outside Boss’ room.

Still, they talked freely. He listened.

“ — not worth it,” Dazai spun his chair around, still sitting upside down, phlegmatic. “It will not last longer than two weeks. A month, if you’re lucky. They will break it, and we will too, because we will be left with no other choice — and you will have paid with your assets and blood.”

There was something peculiar on Mori’s face — an unfamiliarly pale mixture of something too resourceful to be fear and too careful to be confidence. The tilt of his vowels, perhaps — when he had pretended to know about shadows and whatnot in the meeting. “Nothing to say about your secret play?”

Caught you off guard, Chuuya thought, out of nowhere. Dazai looked too inconsequential to scare Yokohama’s most feared one — and yet.

“Not a secret play. Merely a belatedly told one.”

Amusement curled up his lips. “Another man would have you both executed for this. Do you understand the risk you put us in?”

A shrug. “You’re not another man.”

“You left me to their vulgar accusations with no knowledge that they were right,” Mori let him know. “You called the Special Division on us. Even the precinct — the state of that train station, dear. Do you truly not think there ought to be some consequences?”

Chuuya waited, gloves creaking.

“What comes next is more relevant,” Dazai offered, eventually, eyes to the ceiling. “You can have your consequences later. I’m already in my first time out since the Hospital, aren’t I?”

“Wouldn’t want to reach three time outs.”

“Wouldn’t want that.”

“You sound awfully confident in this upcoming conflict,” Mori considered, with a brand new tone. Chuuya plastered himself against the wall, hiding himself from his back-and-forth, hands crossed at the small of his back. “Where did you even gain the information?”

“From the rats in the sewers.”

He thought the man might have rolled his eyes — instead, all he did was hum. “So you have established contact.”

“Not quite,” Dazai huffed. “I do have access to some information, though. Rats and giraffes are coming to the city, and no treaty will manage to hold them back.”

“You know what they will offer.”

A pause. “I do.”

“What do you think about it?”

“I have already told you,” Dazai leaned his hands on the ground, pushing — halting the seat. “Remember? You asked me to evaluate him. I gave you the truth. If you trade him, you will be left with one roof less in the storm that is about to come. And trust me, Mori — it is a big one.”

The Boss paused. “Give me numbers.”

“Unimaginable,” Unfocused eyes settled on the door — Chuuya knew he couldn’t see him, but the weight of his gaze was hard to shrug off. “Like nothing we’ve ever seen before. It will be beautiful — close enough to touch. Who knows, maybe it will kill me, finally. Maybe I’ll find it. Maybe —”

A small group of men from the Bishop’s Staff had been left to guard the courtroom, along with mistrusting pairs from the other syndicates. Chuuya directed his evening run there to check something he already knew; the Staff was well aware of who he was, — of what he had taken — and they knew he was half of the shadows the organizations had requested to meet.

“They want the redhead,” he heard them whisper, easily camouflaged by their mask. “They refuse to tell us why him in particular, but it’s their unmovable condition.”

“He should be ours,” the other replied. He had an open beer in his free hand; he wondered if his religion allowed it. “He took Candidate 177. Even if she’s returned, he should be punished for what he dared to do.”

Chuuya tightened his fists in his pockets, hunched on the roof, peering into the circular windows. He wouldn’t have heard a thing, hadn’t it been for Arahaki — unwilling to thank the circumstances, he let him growl and scratch down his spine, as infuriated by the idea of Yuan going back there as he was. The god cared for no one and nothing — but they were one and the same, and he knew who Chuuya had devoted his life to protect.

All you are is a cage, he thought.

Perhaps it went both ways.

“The other one,” the man asked. “Do you think he’s as young? Some believe it could be the Demon Prodigy, that strategist. But why would the Port Mafia lay its faith in the hands of two brats?”

A disbelieving scoff came from his companion. “Have you even heard of what they’ve done? If you think you’ve ever seen a corpse, you’re wrong,” Unnerved, he looked around the hallway; then, lower: “They know no mercy. They don’t spare anyone — not even the children. That one leader from the KK Company, the one they talked about in the News? They laid pictures he’d secretly taken of his son around his body, and left the child on the verge of death, with a toy three inches deep in his chest.”

“The things they do — the numbers,” His grip around his rifle grew suffocating. “Did you know they’ve started telling bedtime stories about them to the children from Takasekai? All to make sure they won’t go play in the areas they haunt at night. Be careful, or the monsters of the Port Mafia will get you.”

Chuuya was quiet.

“The Demon Prodigy and the god of the Port Mafia?” the man murmured, frowning. “Tales can be exaggerated.”

“These aren’t tales,” the other hissed. “And these aren’t children. They are wraiths, if I’ve ever seen one. And if we let the Port Mafia groom them into their worst — then what will we have?”

---

...

---

As he had promised to the kid in a green jacket, when he returned to the Hotel, Chuuya let his eyes trace the glimmering luxury of the halls.

Pierced by the moonlight, paintings and ceramics mocked him gently — less of a spit in the face and more of a giggling nod. The chandeliers had been cleaned by hand. The leftovers the waiters were grabbing from empty tables were few and complex, and they probably tasted good — just not too good.

It wasn’t that Chuuya wanted to live like that — surrounded by liquified treasures and things only his eyes would use; money spent for the game of it. But managing to afford a life like that would have quietened down some needy part of him — one that knew what cockroaches and vomit tasted like; one that had grown tired of the rain seeping in through the cracks.

Kouyou's tuts tickled his ears.

"Yeah, yeah," he muttered, staring up at an entire wall of exposition wines. "I know."

He laid on his bed and studied the ceiling — still too close, still too far. He could have perforated the mattress, had he sunk a foot in the fountain of Tainted. Could have slipped down, made a hole in the floor — made another and another, until the grass tickled his back. Could have studied the stars. You need not wake me again.

Fingers knocked on the column of the bunk bed.

Caught red-handed in his most notorious crime — locking the cage three times; throwing away the key — Dazai was sooner recognized by Arahabaki than by him. His presence rumbled up and down his nape, shivers that shivers were not — raw dislike, yes, but adorned by familiarity. The god's most loathed; his only recognizable heartbeat.

"What do you want?" Chuuya sighed.

Another knock. Come down.

"Fuck no."

Some more knocking.

Was it genuinely too late, he wondered, to find Hirotsu and beg him for a new room?

Stubbornness was a personality defect they shared; as such, the conflict dragged itself through the hour, until he could only assume he would never manage to scrub the sound of his knuckles kissing the wood from his mind.

He showed off the repertoire of French words Kajii had taught him as he jumped down, quiet enough not to kill the stillness of the moonlight filtering through. The thud of his socks on the parquet; the tick of some ancient clock he had not studied from up close, uncomfortable in the sheer endlessness of that room — the rustle of sheets, where Dazai had kicked them to his feet, sweating the end of the season off.

He was curled up against the wall, as if he could just ignore him. "I will hurt you," Chuuya promised, moving around until he could lay on his side, pointedly sinking both elbows and knees into the nearest bony parts he could reach. They were so disgustingly growing, he thought, with contempt. Their limbs didn't even know where to go. Their bones didn't know where to stretch. "I will hurt you. Maim you permanently. If you don't tell me why you couldn't just let me rest, after you put us in such a shitty situation —"

Rustling of sheets and screeches of beds. His voice vanished.

Cheek sunk in his same pillow — there was a knife under there, he knew, because there was one under his own — nothing but a white shirt to interrupt lines of bandages up his arms, close enough to feel his breaths — Dazai laid his eyes on him.

Eyes.

A bundle of bandages rested in his closed fist, at easy reach. Something about the brush of too-long curls on eyelashes he wasn't familiar with was nauseating — purely because it caught him lacking on a subject he knew. Something about the necessity of his own gaze to move, to choose on what eye to focus on — something about the pale, sweat-wrinkled skin against the suburned one — was vertiginous.

He looks young, he concluded, stunned. He looked human.

Chuuya cleared his throat, settling his gaze over his shoulder. As soon as he realized what he was doing, his tongue snapped against the roof of this mouth — dragging his eyes to the other pair again. This means something, he thought, again and again, because it always did — he had been reaching forward since they'd met, willing or unwilling, no matter if it was his boot on his chest.

"That's new," he grunted, at last. "What got you in a fuckin' sperimentational mood?"

"I need something from you," Dazai said, easily. Deal after deal; more familiar than the dip of their bodies on the same mattress. "This is what you get in exchange."

It strided down his bones. Dazai wore a faded blue shirt and pathetically bright boxers; he wasn't made for this much naked skin, he thought. No tie and no coat; no hair clips either. Only braces and rationality. He looked at Chuuya's shirtless chest like he was seeing past the scars — envying. "I didn't ask for shit."

There was no tension in the line of his shoulders; nonetheless, he felt as if transactions weren't supposed to feel so utterly devastating on the mind. He hadn't asked for his vulnerability — as much as someone like him could have any. "But now you feel like you owe me something," he explained, as if it was obvious.

"Wow," he drawled. "You are an asshole."

"You can touch, if you want," the boy offered. His uncaringness grated on some delicate part of his nerves. That's your skin, he wanted to remind him — to punch it in his skull. That's your body. You're not a fucking floating brain.

"Why would I want to touch," Chuuya muttered, but couldn't help himself from studying the portion of skin a bit more closely. It was easy to miss — paper thin scars surrounded his hidden eye, spreading from that unusual epicenter like the leftover marks from lightning.

Something about the eye in itself felt weird. It was the same color as the other one, nothing like Chuuya's own, but vaguely — distracted. As if it had never seen a thing, and couldn't bother with studying the world that was now offered to it.

He squinted. "You can't see shit from that one, can you?"

Dazai wriggled his eyebrows. "Which one?"

“How did you manage to end half blind?”

“I tripped and the eye fell,” he sighed, sinking a bit deeper into the mattress. His voice was a breath; Chuuya adapted to it; matched its unwillingness to despair the silence. “And then it rolled down the street, and I made Ace chase after it. Unfortunately, it ended up in the sewer grate. Mori shoved it back in. And now here I am, with his gifts on my skin.”

Chuuya was unimpressed. “Alright. Why the bandages? The eye looks fine. ‘You insecure or something?’”

“I like my eye very much.”

“Then?”

“You sneaked out to see the guards at the courtroom, didn’t you?” Dazai asked, not waiting for an answer. “Mori has recovered from his shock quickly — he already organized his publicity agenda. Were they as terrified as he wishes for them to be?”

He huffed. “They tell bedtime stories about us, did you know?”

“Do they?”

“At Takasekai. ”

“That’s nice,” he commented. “Bedtime stories are almost like fairy tales.”

“Apparently we’re wraiths,” Chuuya traced his reflection in the empty bulb; it followed the working one seamlessly. The loss of vision had to be recent. “Monsters. Bad people who will be groomed into something even worse. Merciless killers who play pretend as adolescents.”

“How cheerful,” the Demon Prodigy whispered, unblinking. His fingers reached out; he grasped a strand of his hair, tucking it behind his ear — and then around it, again and again, tightening around the cartilage like a ribbon; until Chuuya nudged his knee with his toes.

He couldn’t quite pinpoint the last time he had shared a pillow with someone. His status in the Sheep had often granted him freedom of privilege — or as much of it as the slums could offer. He’d slept on the floor any time missions with the Flags stuck them in a room.

Childishly, he longed for a pile of books — of pillows, maybe; something to build a wall between their bodies, make sure that nothing of them would come into contact. You stay on your side, I stay on mine. He wondered if No Longer Human could work like this — radiate from his sunburned body like streams of moonlight; bring the silence long enough to sleep. You stay in my side, I’ll stay in yours.

If you’ve heard them talk too, he wanted to ask and didn’t — afraid the desperation would seep through, afraid he’d know that Chuuya couldn’t dangle his humanity to them as a proof — so Dazai would have to instead, at the cost of his play pretend brush strokes on a self-portrait. At the cost of admitting that one of them, always only one of —

“How fucking original,” Chuuya, fake god of the Port Mafia, replied.

“It’s what Mori wanted, anyway.”

He hummed. “I got that.”

“Did you?”

“You wouldn’t have risked it, otherwise. Boss is working on his own reign of terror,” Pieces added themselves to the puzzle out of his control; a mixture of want to take a walk with me, Chuuya? and gazes he wasn’t naive enough to believe the man had never noticed. “He’s convinced the two of us can create one without involving the entire syndicate. Without falling into the Prior Boss’ senseless methods.”

“Less perpetrators,” Dazai commented, rather academically; here’s point one, get to point two. “Less monsters to blame. A bloodier story on the underworld mouths — look at what the Port Mafia can do. Look at what even its kids can do,” He raised his hand again, chasing a square of light reflected by the chandelier; it ran down the lines of his palm — to that one mole on his scarred thumb. “Ane-san can be the face of the organization. He needs us to be the hands.”

Chuuya reached up with two fingers; pinched the skin between his thumb and index. Silence.

The cocoon of warmth and quiet melted his bones with every breath; he had been feeling unsettlingly tired since the last time he’d used Corruption. Eyelids fluttering, begrudgingly, he said: “Then we’ll be the damn hands.”

“It’s kind of contractual, Hatrack.”

He huffed. “For the sake of this prophetic conflict you’ve been blabbering about?”

A pause. “Spying isn’t really nice.” It didn’t seem as if the knowledge came as a surprise to him.

“What is it that you want?”

“To die,” Dazai responded, easily. “But I don’t suppose that’s what you meant.”

“You gave me this,” He trailed one finger down, tracing gun-made calluses and life-lines of intertwined skin. Arahabaki had a backhanded need to know what would bring the end; Chuuya dragged his bitten nail lower and lower, ignoring the twitch of Dazai’s arm as he brushed the sweaty bandages, sticking to his skin — his rolled up sleeve; the cliff of his shoulder; his overheated, sun burned cheek — only to land on the white lighting strikes around his eye. They were slightly elevated under his touch; roads someone had dug too deep and refilled over the brim. “For some ridiculous reason. What is it that you want from me?”

Fingers enclosed his raised wrist.

Needles and pins, he thought — except Arahabaki was nowhere to be found, and Chuuya had yet to decide whether it was something he wanted or feared. It had to be exhausting — being filled with such an endless, quiet absence. The weirdo probably enjoyed it. Shipping containers and pet snakes. And — “Trust,” Dazai said, simply.

You have it, Chuuya would have never said, you have all of it.

It felt greedy. He had bled in his hands, had bitten down his contempt and let the voices fade in the background; had ignored the stains of fault he wore with carelessness — not with pride; but not in silence either. He’d been tortured by Professor N because of him. He’d been dragged into the Mafia because of him. Shirase was in London and Yuan couldn’t look him in the eyes — he slept in an apartment littered in photographs he’d been coerced to take and would now beg to repeat.

And yet.

And yet, stupid and inevitable. He had pushed the door open to the one creature in existence who might erase him — who else but himself? — and he had tied the key around Dazai’s neck; a hangman knot for a boy who wanted to die. A piece of trust for someone who had been willing to let Yokohama burn a little longer, for the starved luxury of giving him a choice.

An evident lie — they never had one. But Chuuya wasn’t cruel enough to spit in the face of something gentle.

You have all of it. What more could I give you?

“Why me?” Chuuya muttered.

The fingers abandoned his wrist; he called his arm back. Tore his eyelids apart — detested, acutely, the nothing he was met with, shaped like an unbandaged face, like an eye staring at him.

“Who else?” Dazai said.

It filled him with something sharply unlikable, that he had learned to associate with the other boy. “Mori.”

Amazement made him blink. “What a funny thought.”

“Hirotsu, then.”

“The old man is smart enough to know his place,” was the only acknowledging he gave. “I might allow him to guard my back, on rare occasions. But I wouldn’t give him a gun to point at my forehead, unless I’d decided the time to die had come.”

Stunned, he blinked. “Hirotsu wouldn’t kill you.” The sole idea was laughable. After the petty, borderline violent trials the two of them had put the man through in the first year of their acquaintance, punished in no way, he wouldn’t bet on the man not having a soft spot of sorts for them.

Genuine skepticism painted his tone. “Ane-san would.”

“I didn’t bring her up,” he protested.

“Because you agree.”

He thought: when did you start pretending to despise him? “She’s not stupid enough to —“

“Chuuya,” His tone was final — funerary and inauguratory; the edge of the blade and whatever would be waiting underneath. Shut doors of meeting rooms; the quick hush of voices as soon as they appeared in the adults’ presence; the whispers and the glances of the organization; the bedtime stories and the names; those aren’t children. “It’s just us.”

No, he snapped. His lips didn’t move, and yet he swore — no, that’s not true.

He had much more than him — had searched for it with a hunger that was unseemingly and denied, wanting to share the shadows with anyone but the boy who had locked his every door but the one that led to them. A too powerful body — looking for anything drenched in enough adrenaline to get his hands out of his pockets.

Albatross had been breaking into his apartment long before Dazai had started breaching through his own obsession — and he had done it with a damn key. Chuuya had trusted every person who had ever lent him a genuine hand, and he had laughed more, and he had wanted them around, and he had been glad for their presence.

Albatross was dead, and his trust was a sword of Damocles.

It was a ridiculous pretense. Chuuya had plenty. Chuuya needed none of it; needed few things less than the riskier of them all. It’s just us. Surely the Port Mafia had to be crawling with shadows.

Deep down, he recalled. You and I are the same.

He sat up, as if electrified. “Fuck you.”

Acceptance — predictable, his every line called him — pulled Dazai’s face into emptiness. “How vulgar.”

“Fuck you,” he insisted. He wanted to punch something. He wanted to punch him. It was nauseating. It was draping all over him like spider webs, locking him in, locking him out. A spear breaking his chest in two, voices that he knew weren’t real. The same. The same. “Fuck you, we’re not —“

“I’m not in the habit of asking for things that are already mine,” Seemingly bored by the conversation, Dazai turned to face the wall, kicking the blanket even further. “And I’m not in the habit of gaining what I will give back.”

You have it. You have all of it.

“You’re incredibly stupid, but not impossibly so. You’ll understand.”

Energy surged to his hands — he watched them glow. He stared at his back.

“You’re free to sleep, now,” Dazai yawned; most certainly a facade. Dismissed — in any tone Mori might ever showcase. “Plan is in motion.”

“Plan?”

A pause. “One you will hate me for.”

“I already do.”

“I know,” He sneaked a look — both of his eyes pensive. “We share that, at least. Do remember that I’ll get you out nonetheless.”

Chuuya’s lips moved around nothing, for a moment. “Out of where?”

Dazai’s head fell again. “The net.”

What?, he couldn’t ask. His head was full of water. He had never been more tense.

Where had he gone wrong, he wondered, a tad hysterically. What bullet had he saved him from; what fights had he picked that he shouldn’t have; what cage had he locked himself in? Chains tasted of rust no matter the crime — he couldn’t recall when he’d made the mistake of shackling himself to someone who would sooner use the key to crack his own skull open, than to escape.

If he could be forgiven for not noticing the wall that had steadily built itself between them and the organization — how would he excuse every brick he had personally laid down?

“Leaving your back to the door?” Was all he managed to say, at last.

A snap of tongue on palate. “Leaving my blindside to you, partner,” he replied, purposefully saccharine. This means something, he insisted, through the glacial stillness in his veins. Chuuya couldn’t remember ever turning and not meeting his gaze. “You should be used to it, correct?”

---

...

---

Dazai had put sleeping pills in his dinner.

“Mange tes morts,” he growled, as he stumbled around the room to get ready, opening cracks on the floor with every step. “Fucking — shitty fish eyed motherfucker —” The ancient clock on the other side of the room was a death sentence. almost an hour late. The meeting had already started. “Motherfucking useless fucking piece of shit, shit —“

Given it was the middle of the morning, the Hall of the Hotel was filled to the brim — men and women in formal clothing snapping at their phones, and smiling receptionists answering rude questions with controlled tones. Slaloming through their bodies was easy; consequently, the woman who slammed her shoulders against his own left him speechless.

“Look where you’re going,” she told him, nose scrunched up — as if she could see past Kouyou’s tailored coat and smell the slums on his skin. A familiar look.

For good measure, he made sure to snatch her diamond bracelet off her wrist as he scoffed.

“— don’t know what to do, really,” he overheard her lament on her phone, as she walked away. “My sister put her heart on this frivolous wedding of theirs. My brother had to pay for all of it, and she still refuses to tell me about the plan —“

Chuuya stilled.

Dirty glances rained on him; expensive people enjoyed those who dared to stop the morning march as much as they enjoyed freaks who talked to themselves. “Oh, that piece of —“

The doors of the courtroom opened under a simple kick of his foot, screeching wrenchingly loud in the low murmur of conversation coming from the inside. Every eye in the room fell on him, coordinated to the likes of an orchestra — Kouyou’s blade-thin smile; the four syndicates’ skeptic eyes; Dazai’s barely contained grin from where he stood at the dead center of the room.

Right next to Takasekai, hands closed around a curled up net, was the group of armed men from the Special Division For Unusual Powers who had been tailing them for weeks.

The silence grew endless.

Chuuya clenched his teeth until he could feel a whine climb up his chest — he put his hands in his pockets and stuck his nails in his palms, deep and deeper; until the bubbling blood suffocated the sound. He thought of electricity — studied the red dots their rifles had graffitied down Chuuya’s shirt, and tasted a bile so bitter it choked him. Takasekai and the Division had their guns of him — it was nothing new. The Net, though —

He beelined to the center of the room.

“Well?” He could feel Mori’s scorching eyes pierce his back even through the separ  . He vowed to murder Dazai as soon as the formalities had been taken care of — painfully so, god forbid the fucker enjoyed it. “You assholes wanted to talk to us, didn’t you?”

Whatever was on his face made most gazes lower; once he was standing next to the other boy, twin laser targets on their chests, nobody seemed to have anything to say.

Slept well?, Chuuya tapped on the ground, as antagonistically as possible.

Dazai turned to look at him.

“It’s useless,” he sighed, obnoxiously loud, eyes on him only. A curtain of carefully masked astonishment had wrapped itself through most of the bodies facing them — an ocean gaping at two pebbles. “They’ve been staring in silence since long before you decided to curse us with your presence.”

He was looking at him a bit strangely — like something unexpected had happened, and he hadn’t yet decided how to better manipulate him into not noticing. Slept well? “What’s that supposed to — ”

“Children.”

The word came from the Shadow Blade separè. It echoed off the walls, along the throats of the Special Division’s rifles and Takasekai’s guns. Most eyes followed the trajectory set by that sound — the agents in black, though, kept their hungry eyes on Chuuya. He couldn’t keep his eyes off of them; couldn’t stop wondering how the Mafia had reacted to seeing them enter, after so carefully keeping them from Chuuya. At his back, Kouyou made a face — remembrance, he thought. Warning.

Disbelieving, the leader of the Blades concluded: “The shadows of the Port Mafia are — children?”

Released, at least, chaos erupted in the courtroom.

“You promised to bring your assets —“ one of the Executives from Takasekai barked.

The KK Company laughed their skepticism out. “Two children killed our treasurer? Two children devastated our defense lines? You —“

“— a matter of deals —“

“— want us to believe that they —“

“We have seen what they have done, the Mafia —

“— hiding them?”

“Captain Nakayama defeated hordes of enemies, and you want us to sit here and believe —“

Dazai tightened his lips, mindlessly rolling his head from one side to the other. The tune he whistled was too low to beat the frequency of the rage from the sidelines; but Chuuya was close and attuned and mad at him, so it took him less than a moment to understand.

The room began to shake.

It was invisible — the road of heavy gravity that surged under his feet, spreading across the pavement with none of its characteristic crimson glow but all of its intrusiveness; attaching itself to everything brave enough to exist. It climbed the bodies of every man of the syndicates, shackles of air strangling their wrists and necks until they had no choice but to notice; only the Special Division and the Post Mafia were left out of the embrace — and the silhouettes hiding behind their separé.

Dazai snapped his head to the side, sharply — asking for attention the way Chuuya had done countless times — and every body dropped to the ground.

A vicious fall — clefts wrecked the floor wherever elbows and knees landed, eliciting shouts from shocked mouths; napes uselessly pushed against the wet blanket of gravity, fighting just enough to keep it from slamming their faces on the concrete and cracking them open.

A cloud of smoke rose from the mess. Through its curling waves, Dazai crossed his arms, offering a curled eyebrow to the struggling audience.

“We were told you wanted to talk to us,” he repeated, pointedly, just petulant enough to mock the wet screeches of effort coming from the fallen. “What is it that you want?”

As one, with a beat of hesitant confusion, faces falling with the realization of having been fooled — half of the red dots from the Special Division’s and Takasekai’s rifles abandoned Chuuya’s chest, and settled uniquely on Dazai’s own.

[“Who’s Melos?” he frowned. The crowd of traditionally-dressed couples hadn’t stopped rotating with the music once, since the beginning of the wedding; Chuuya wondered if their feet hurt.

The Rose Hotel was certainly a good location to hide precious info on the GSS’ eastern trade, considering the high-security penthouses littering the highest floors — it didn’t much look like a recommendable location for any type of celebration, though. Everything was gray and dull and tacky; even the floor radiated a menacing aura, with its frescoes. His complaints, though, would not make the wedding infiltration any easier.

Dazai had no such understanding.

“Someone much more interesting than all these boring, boring farceurs,” he groaned, draped around one of the columns. He looked like those protesters he had caught on TV, chained to a tree and sweating their weight off in its name. Chuuya mourned the lack of restraints.

“Someone so much more entertaining, who doesn’t have to take part to some tacky wedding with a tacky slug with a tacky hat —“

“What the fuck did you just call me?”

“Listen, ‘Run, Melos’ is a great name,” the boy insisted, waving his concerns away. “Trust me on this. The perfect name for such a cruel chastisement. I can hardly imagine a worse punishment than having to pretend to be you.”

He scoffed. “You think I want anyone in this world to live their last instants convinced I’m some suicidal freak?”

“I don’t see why not,” he sighed. “Maybe I should have agreed to let you murder all these people. They’re pissing me off.”

“Well, now I’m not doing it!”

“Yes, I feared you would say that,” Another sigh. Dazai fixed his tie, abandoning his beloved column. “Come on. We need to get the slums-accent out of you, or no one is going to believe you’re me. Repeat after me —“]

“Oh,” the leader of the Bishop’s Staff said.

He was the first of the bunch to recover, seemingly untouched by the restrained circle of his men at his feet. It was fleeting — but insistent — the thought that his face would look just the same underneath that mask. “I see,” he continued. “You’re trying to make us doubt ourselves.”

“We aren’t doing anything,” Dazai replied. “We’ve merely been informed about some curious voices. A dramatic flair to all of them, certainly — but I’ve noticed they all lack details,” He tilted his head to the side. “You swear we have power. You know there’s two of us. Do you know more?”

”We do,” a Division man snarled.

The Special Division men settled their guns on Chuuya again. They had files — they knew who he wasn’t. Still — Takasekai kept their attention on Dazai.

“You’re both responsible for the kidnapping of Candidate 117, then.”

“Who cares about your pathetic whores,” the Shadow Blade leader snapped, jumping to his feet. “The Port Mafia used them to trap our representatives in the train station and get rid of them. They pushed us against each other, all for their sick entertainment. Captain Nakayama was murdered, and someone has yet to pay the price of my second in command’s life.”

“Captain Nakayama was a fool,” Takasekai intervened, waving the matter away. “They wiped an entire floor of some of the most relevant figures in the entirety of Yokohama clean. Do you have any idea of the publicity issues we’ve had to deal with? There were senators and actors in that ballroom. They’ve been tormenting us. The Media are persecuting us —“

Chuuya was reminded, abruptly, of the blue light of a TV screen — the waves of color dripping all over the floor of Albatross’ dining room. Verlaine had been dead for three days. The television had been turned on for two. We sadly interrupt the national broadcast to inform the audience of beloved actor’s premature disappearance —

“The explosion was blamed on a group of anti-capitalist protesters,” he interrupted. “What kind of messes have you been dealing with, exactly?”

“We lost half of our deals, all because the position of our treasure was leaked into the Black Market,” the KK Company snapped, cutting the woman off. All of the leaders appeared too enraged to pay any mind to the suffering bodies at their feet; Chuuya fingers’ tingled along to their moans, protesting the carefulness hiding the glow of Tainted demanded from him.

“Playing dirty to gain territory and merch routes — that’s something us syndicates know too well. But this isn’t a simple threat, no matter how intensely that three-way traitor you sent our way insisted. The Port Mafia crossed our borders and brought devastation with no ultimatum,” In the heat of the moment, one of his arms appeared from the edge of the separè; a well-dressed wrist, slender fingers. “And you two are to blame for it.”

“They acted under my jurisdiction,” Mori intervened, at last. If he hadn’t been used to that particular tilt of his voice — that featherlight amusement — he might have joined every other unrestrained shoulder in the room in stiffening. “Is that something you can pin on them alone?”

Dazai hid a snort behind a cough.

“I can pin their methods on them,” Takasekai hissed. “You might have chosen to house two devils in your cage, but I will not do you the honor of blaming you for two teenagers’ mindless, senseless violence.”

“I understand,” the ex-doctor assured. “My boys are much smarter than I am.”

“Your boys are killers.”

“And your men were innocents bystanders, who didn’t gladly murder in the name of the Nine Rings?” Chuuya intervened, blankly. “The same organization whose alliance with you’re still stubbornly denying?”

The man spluttered.

“Not a threat,” Dazai repeated, calling the room’s attention back to him. “What we did was an attack — not an ultimatum, you say. But, I assume, the presence of the Special Division, squadron 156, is meant to be one, correct?” He lowered blinking eyes to the red spots on his chest. “What guarantees me you won’t take care of your belated revenge by asking them to shoot me?”

“Your Ability would probably stop any bullet,” the Shadow Blade replied, cautiously. He frowned. “His — yours? The Gravity Manipulator was supposed to be —“

“Ah,” Dazai tilted his head to the other side, pensively. Unclenching his fists, Chuuya watched the bodies scattered around the room drop to the floor. “That. You know what? I have a theory.”

The leader of the Staff took a step forward. “That theory being?”

“You prepared a whole list of requirements the Port Mafia would supposedly oblige to, were we to agree to your treaty,” the boy explained. Blood bloomed across a music sheet — the note of interest he sometimes gained, when the possibility of close-enough-to-touch death presented itself to him.

“At least one of those requirements must have something to do with Candidate 117, as you informed us. With another series of disadvantages — weapons shortage, control over the territory, control over us,” Dazai nodded towards Chuuya. “Your initial proposition was probably rather unoriginal. Do this or we will attack. Four Moons against One would definitely prove itself to be a mild bother. But that was all, until the Special Division initiated contact with one of you.”

“It’s in their best interest that the Five Moons maintain peace,” Chuuya added, as the point the boy was trying to reach spun slower and slower in his skull. “Too many Ability users, too wide of a territory. They don’t want conflict any more than the government wants it. They must have offered you something in exchange of something else — all in the name of this treaty.”

“The Ability Business Permit.”

The boy’s voice seemed to startle even the passed out corpses on the ground. In the corner of his gaze, he saw Kouyou’s smile slip out of her face. Her gaze snapped to Mori’s silhouette; Hirotsu curled an eyebrow.

With certainty, Dazai repeated: “The Special Division will grant all Five Moons an Ability Business Permit, if we come to this treaty. Is that it?”

Inscrutable as the leaders’ faces were, only the silence came as an answer.

Laughter, eventually, didn’t appear from any of the syndicates. It came from the rows of the Division.

“The Demon Prodigy is as intuitive as we’ve heard of,” the woman commented. She had stepped forward as he spoke; her black and white attire had easily camouflaged her through her men, but the badge on her breastbone spoke of rank — and so did the confidence with which she met every eye in the room. “You got it right — down to the dots and the commas. To think the syndicates believed it would be such a shock for the Mafia.”

“Peace is not worth a Permit,” Dazai replied. Minami, Chuuya managed to read on her badge. “It’s certainly not worth five of them, and not for the organizations the Government has been trying to dismantle for decades, now. There is something else.”

“Obviously,” Minami nodded. Her dark hair brushed her shoulders; the smile she offered them was adorned by braces — a mirror to the boy’s one.

She walked, he considered, like someone who’d been shot more than once. Most of all, she walked like every man of the law Chuuya had ever met — a hint of cockiness that bordered the illicit; a confidence that he would have liked to rip off their chest with a well-aimed kick; and the smell of money clogging his airways.

“A small price to pay, all things considered. The Ability Permit would grant you the freedom you’ve been searching for almost a century now. All you have to do is sign a treaty that will keep the Mafia’s — mindless and senseless violence, if I can quote, contained. And promise to play nice with the other criminals on the playground.”

The condescension of her tone birthed more than one grimace across the room. Disrespect was the one thing most men of the underworld could agree on; even Hirotsu, he noticed, pulled at the hems of his gloves.

Dazai paid the attitude no mind. “And?”

“And?” she repeated.

“The other thing you Government guys want.”

“Oh. Yes,” She was still smiling; for some reason, it reminded Chuuya of things that had long since lost a meaning — white walls and white lights, lab coats and green lines of numbers. He had been dreading the government cars since they’d stepped a foot into his home. Not again, he had thought, nonsensically. Not again.

Her dust eyes abandoned Dazai — falling on him instead.

“We also want Ability User A5158,” Minami explained, seamlessly. “Code name should be — Nakahara Chuuya. Correct?”

Chapter End Notes

dazai: see run melos is meant to make our enemies doubt who’s the gravity manipulator between us chuuya, has had stories abt the “redhead who climbs roofs upside down” spread since he was eight: ur sure this will work dazai: no but it’d be funny posting this chapter literally two minutes before my class starts, so i have to fly!! i hope you guys enjoy, and thank you so so much for the love on the last chapter! have a wonderful day, keep yourself warm, and thank you so much for all the love <333 see you next time!

p.s. also, i have no idea if that was ever confusing, but i’m moving from an idea of the special division being unofficially aware of the users in the port mafia — but not outrightly. that would make them an illegal organization IN THE LAW, since they have no permit. so it's very much (as you'll see next chapter) a "we all know you have power but if you don't admit it we have nothing". they wouldn't have been fooled by dazai and chuuya's tricks, but some of them would have hesitated — because they're not entirely aware of dazai's ability.

WIND

Chapter Summary

“It’s quite the sum to leave behind,” the Ability user mused, scratching the dog’s ears. Intuitive like only animals knew how to be, the poor thing had been inconsolable ever since her owner had fallen ill — she’d perched her muzzle on the edge of her bed three weeks ago, and she had yet to remove it. “Atonement has no prize, I know. But if it had, would I not have reached it? Hm? My beautiful darling?”

Chapter Notes

see you at the end! :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xviii

---

Five hundred billion yen.

“It’s quite the sum to leave behind,” the Ability user mused, scratching the dog’s ears. Intuitive like only animals knew how to be, the poor thing had been inconsolable ever since her owner had fallen ill — she’d perched her muzzle on the edge of her bed three weeks ago, and she had yet to remove it. “Atonement has no prize, I know. But if it had, would I not have reached it? Hm? My beautiful darling?”

Cherished and wide, the moon peeked from the emerald curtains of the windows, reflecting on the ancient glass of a grandfather clock. 15 September, the calendar she’d plastered on the wood read — she truly disliked that old, tacky thing — the date circled with her favorite quill.

She had once vowed to fly up there, to the planets and the moon — find an unpoisoned land to share with her dog; come up with some method to live forever.

They had been the hysterics of a child. She was far too old for them. But old friends were quick to gather around a deathbed — pushed by nostalgia, pushed by hunger. No one had been allowed in the room.

It mattered very little, she knew. Five hundred billion yen would be found in no time, if the world still turned in the same rhythm as before. As for the death bed —

“Yokohama,” The dog’s eyes snapped up, enthusiastic. “No, not for a walk, darling.”

They would come from everywhere. They would smell it with ease. And for the last moments of her life — she was still a sinner.

“Maybe they’ll even do something good with it,” Hirabayashi Mitsuru mused, a voice so frail not even the dog would hear her last words. “Maybe they’ll — go to the moon with —”

She brought her knife to her darling dog’s neck. Peacefully, she inhaled the last air she would ever taste.

[— are sorry to interrupt the current broadcast to —]

Registered Interrogations.

SDUP — 156th Squadron.

Coordinator — Agent Minami Momo.

Ability...

[...saku? No, I'm not. Oh. Yes, I do know. Are they coming already? What a shame. I knew, but — Yes. Yes. Be careful, would you?

(You —)

Ane-san, I don't have ti—]

...User — A5158

Subject — 'The Arahabaki Project'

tape i.

AM: So. Let's have a talk.

(White noises).

AM: A5158, Nakahara Chuuya. Sixteen years old. You're a bit young to be sinking with the ships of crime, aren't you?

(White noises).

AM: We have had our eyes on you ever since the Sheep. You were a household name; one of our thickest files, too. What made you leave an organization you ruled?

(White noises).

AM: What, you're not going to open your mouth? After your new friends merrily threw you in our hands?

(White noises).

AM: Alright. We'll see how long it lasts.

[Registration cut short. Time: 45 minutes and 0.9 seconds. Reason: No Response from A5158]

tape iii.

[Registration cut short. Time: 59 minutes and 7 seconds. Reason: No Response from A5158]

tape vi.

AM: Attacking Agent Nekoyama wasn't very nice. He's just obeying my orders.

(White noises).

AM: If you didn't want to be touched, you could have just told us. He was trying to remove your handcuffs. You stuck him in the Infirmary.

(White noises).

AM: How did you do it, anyway? A headbutt, street style? You broke his nose. You must be stronger than you look.

(White noises).

AM: You got a nice tattoo. It must have hurt like a bitch to get it done, though. What? Surprised I saw it? Your shirt is all wet. Do you know what we call what they did to you?

(White noises).

AM: Disappointing. I believe the correct term is waterboarding. Not our preferred method, but you are revealing yourself to be — quite the shy guy.

(White noises).

(Snort).

[Registration cut short. Time: 41 minutes and 0.7 seconds. Reason: No Response from A5158]

tape viii .

[Registration cut short. Time: 50 minutes and 9 seconds. Reason: No Response from A5158]

tape xi.

[Registration —

tape xv .

AM: You're not a prisoner, you know.

(A weird cadence; statics, underneath) — [Am I not?]

AM: Oh. You're going to answer, finally?

[Haven't you spent the last week and a half with a cactus up your ass because I wouldn't say a single word? Be grateful, at least]

AM: I'm surprised you chose to collaborate.

[Nah. I'm just bored]

AM: Bored.

[Yeah. Staying silent was entertaining, as long as you were annoyed by it. But when you stay silent too — it's just boring]

AM: I appreciate your collaboration.

[Fuck your grandma and her shitty ashes]

AM: We are not your Mafia. Keeping you here for as long as we have brings us no joy.

[I don't find you a fuckin' delight either]

AM: There's an easy solution to the problem. You owe us information, legally.

(Laughter) — [You have a loose definition of the word 'legal', Agent]

AM: Do I?

[Yeah. I do wonder if your... tickling sessions were really necessary. They were shit, by the way]

AM: I'm sure they were. Teenager psychopaths tend to have a higher pain tolerance than 73% of the population. Did you know?

[I call bullshit]

AM: You don't think a kid laughing as he gets tortured would be a sign of instability?

[Don't use that word]

AM: Why not?

[Because I'm not like —]

(White noises).

[Fuck, I hate cops]

AM: I'm not a cop.

[Same shit. Your holier than thou pisses me off to no end. You know, maybe if you actually cared about the kids you spit so much bullshit about —]

(White noises).

[Anyway]

AM: No. Go on.

[You're useless. That's it. As I've been telling your groupies — I'm an employer in a stupid jewelry shop that doesn't pay half as good as you want me to tell you] — (Yawn). (Handcuffs rattling) — [Maybe if you shits offered me minimum wage, I'd be more inclined to talk]

AM: That's how you want to play it, then? You're an honest worker of the State, and we have wrongfully been keeping you here for a week.

[Yeah. You got it]

AM: Alright. Want to discuss your Ability?

[Ain't you the Special Division for Unusual Yadda Yadda? I'm the one who should be asking you. You know an organization lacking an Ability Permit can't legally own Ability Users]

AM: You and your partner pretended to each possess the other's Ability.

[Do I look like someone who'd work well in paired projects?]

AM: You don't look like someone who ever went to school.

[Fuckin' rude. Am I allowed to talk about my stuff without a lawyer, anyway? Also, whatever you swear to have seen in that alleged meeting with the Five Moon — you do know you're not allowed to use any of that information without admitting to have secretly collaborated with criminal syndicates, mmh? Wonder how the general public would feel about that. We'd have no issue spreading the story. Want to tell me more about whatever Ability show you swore you saw?]

AM: ...

(Rattle) (Commotion) — [Oh, put the guns away. What am I going to do, exactly? Use the Ability you electrocuted out of me to destroy the seat? That tickled, by the way. This shit is so uncomfortable] AM: You want the other syndicates not to know what to expect. That's a smart move, certainly. You were forced to show your faces, destroying your whole — “The Shadows of the Port Mafia” bit. You kept as much of the upper hand as you could. A smart move.

(White noises).

AM: A move that I would see no need to bring forward, if you didn't suspect the right occasion to take advantage of it was about to come.

[You think?]

AM: I think your Boss wouldn't have gifted his pupils' faces to the lions, if he had thought any of the people in that room would survive the month.

(White noises).

[My Boss]

AM: Yes.

[My Boss is a piece of shit]

AM: Yeah?

[Yeah. Makes me stay late and close the shop every night]

tape xvii.

AM: You know, when I was looking through your files, you struck me as a foreign.

[Did I?]

AM: French?

[As you know, no.]

AM: The hair, those eyes. The freckles. You don't look much Japanese at all.

[You probably know more about my origins than I do. No, that's basically for sure. Is this meant to taunt me or —]

AM: Your eyes, in particular. Were you born like that?

[Yes, I was]

AM: No, you weren't. It's Arahabaki's fault, isn't it?

[I thought you'd said you didn't know anything about Arahabaki. Didn't you want me to answer your questions?]

AM: And so I lied.

[And so you did]

AM: My grandfather had a thing against those kinds of eyes. It's called heterochromia, you know?

[I'm not stupid]

AM: He would tell me, "Momo, be careful of people with those eyes. Demons are fighting their way out, poisoning from the inside." All very dramatic.

[What a cheerful fucking story]

AM: "They're rotten," he'd tell me. "Rotten, you see?"

(White noises).

[Momo]

AM: What?

[Your name is Momo]

AM: Yes.

[Ugly name]

tape xx.

AM: Are you going to talk? Or did the punch dislocate your jaw?

[That punch couldn't even break a brat's nose. You really need to train your groupies]

AM: You know, one thing I haven't asked — what do you think about your cellmate?

[Who, that guy who never talks?]

AM: That's surprising. I didn't take you for the type to attempt to make friends here.

[Heard from the guards he's got a fucked up Ability. The 'Wound Reaper', or something?]

AM: Quite. His Ability allows him to reopen any and all wounds whoever he hits has ever received.

[Oh, you guys must be foaming at the mouth from his refusal to help you out. Nice torture toll, yeah?]

(White noises)

AM: My greatest wish would be for him to never be allowed anywhere he could use his Ability, actually.

[Of course]

AM: I'm not lying.

[What do I care? This is my interrogation, isn't it?]

AM: Talk, then.

[This Madame I know is thinking of divorcing. It would be — the fourth time, I think?]

tape xxiii.

[It's very obvious, actually]

AM: What is?

[You spend your miserable lives controlling every Ability User you can get your hands on, filing their existence away on those pretty dossiers of yours. Government or not Government, you're damn well aware of what happened to me. A Singularity that shouldn't have been given to anyone — I bet it doesn't look good on your resumes that you've lost sight of it. You don't know how I — allegedly — work] — (Snort) — [And you're pissing your pants because of it]

(White noises).

AM: Abilities are an evolutionary defect.

[Defect]

AM: Under some circumstances. They are activated when needed; if they hadn't been needed, we wouldn't have them. Need is hardly a positive situation. We have reasons to believe you might have not manifested your Gravity Manipulation either, had you been left to your — prior existence.

[Gravity Manipulation, ah? Prior existence — bet you know all about that]

AM: We're not the Government.

[You're close enough] — (Groan) (Screech of a seat) — [Fucking hell, put those guns away. You're so paranoid. I really don't know how involved the creators your Division were with the Arahabaki Project, but I wouldn't be here if you didn't know anything. I bet you noisy fucks have a whole dossier filled with information about it. The experiments... all of it]

AM: Do you want it?

[What?]

AM: The dossier. Do you want it?

[In exchange for?]

AM: Your collaboration. Analyses, tests. To verify your state, and the danger it poses to Yokohama as a whole.

(White noises).

AM: You see, commander Santoka, he believes — he believes we might help you find out how to control the surge of power inside you. Gain something from each other, both of us.

(White noises).

(Laughter).

[So that's it] — (More laughter) — [You want your fucking pet project back. You're mad I got out, and now you want me back? Oh, you motherfuc—]

(White noises).

(Punch).

(Laughter).

tape xxxvii.

AM: What's your best memory?

(White noises).

AM: Are you playing the quiet game again, or is your life that miserable?

[I need a time period]

AM: Let's say this year.

[Street racing with my friends]

AM: Illegal racing?

[Yes]

AM: Do you need to cough? You can. You do have extraordinary healing times — Arahabaki is to thank, I imagine — but getting beaten up so often can truly harm someone.

[Go ram that pen of yours up your ass]

AM: How vile. I haven't seen you so angry since the waterboarding. You truly disliked that, didn't you? Have some bad memories with water?

[I'll have some bad memories about shit when I get out of here. Lookin' at it so often gave me a terrible gag reflex]

AM: Would you like to talk about Dazai Osamu?

[Trust me when I say there is nothing I would like to talk about less]

AM: Does he know about Arahabaki?

[Who?]

AM: It can't be easy. If I were in your shoes, I don't know if I'd be able to tell anyone. They would all look at me with different eyes, wouldn't they? Maybe they would admire me. Maybe they would fear me.

[If you're the Government, shouldn't you have all the information you need on me? I might not remember much, but I sure as fuck wasn't experimented on by the Queen of England]

AM: It wasn't just Government men, you know? There was an outsider. A genius. A man with innovative ideas on how to fully develop children's Abilities.

[Lab coats are lab coats]

AM: Would you like me to tell you his name?

[No]

AM: You don't want revenge?

[Wanting to know stuff about myself caused nothing but shit over shit. Look me in the eyes, Agent. I don't care]

(White noises).

AM: Did you lose someone?

(White noises).

[There's one thing I don't get]

AM: What is it?

[Why do you even need me to agree to your stupid conditions? I've been here for a shit ton of time. You could have done all the experiments you wanted. I passed out more than once, and I know you have methods to keep even Arahabaki quiet]

(White noises).

AM: We don't.

[What?]

AM: We don't have methods.

[The fuck are you talking about?]

AM: Arahabaki protects you. Even when you're unconscious — it won't let us pinch you with half a nail. It doesn't activate its full state, but it — it wounded some of our men. Clearly, the god keeps it's guard on the body it's been given.

[Arahabaki isn't a god. And he doesn't trust anyone]

AM: Not even you?

[Least of all]

AM: And yet, he protects you. And yet, you have found a way to share his space. We need it.

(White noises).

[Oh]

AM: Oh?

[You are fucked]

tape xxxvii

AM: Would you like to discuss Black n. 12?

[I would like you to choke on your tongue and then shit it out]

AM: Do you hate him because he killed your friends, or do you hate him because he's what you might become?

[So now governmental agents are shrinks, too? How poliedric]

AM: That's a big word, for a street kid.

[I know tons of big words. I could tell you many more, if you'd like]

AM: No, I can imagine them.

(White noises).

AM: Black n. 12 was an overwhelming threat. If you let us help you, we could prevent you from following in his steps.

[I can control my homicidal urges much better than he ever did, I can assure you that]

AM: Because you have Dazai Osamu?

[He's got nothing to do with —]

AM: Case is, he does. You don't strike me as an arrogant boy, no matter the appearances. You do understand that he's the only reason why your destruction could be sealed, don't you? You do understand that you're dependent on him?

(White noises).

AM: He's a leash around your throat more than we will ever be.

[What he is, is a piece of shit]

AM: You —

[He's thrown me from helicopters, drove our car into the most toxic river I have ever had to submit my nostrils to, tried to set my hair on fire, poisoned me multiple times, attached literal knives to my seats, had me tortured, put itching dust on everything I own, stabbed me more than once — he's hired hitmen specifically to take me down, cursed me ten seconds into meeting me so that I'd never have a growth spurt, vandalized my walls, participated in a scheme that killed my friends, somehow convinced a gang of stray cats to attack me — and I could add so much more. So much weirder more]

(White noises).

[Don't you waste your time trying to put him in a worse light than any I could shine on him. Do you think I enjoy this? Do you think this is fucking ideal? He is the bane of my existence. Fate is probably not even a thing, and yet there he is — created purely to torture me in ways not even your governmental freaks could dream of. He is bound to stick his metaphorical middle fingers in my eyes even when we're in a fucking grave]

(White noises).

[And yet, he has yet to stick me in a tank and put a Singularity — not made for human bodies to withstand — inside me. Annoying as it is, it makes my decision pretty easy to take].

(White noises).

AM: And yet he let us take you.

(White noises)

AM: What if he's not there, one day?

[You're so stupid]

AM: What if he dies? Then what?

[Then he makes the world a favor]

AM: But not you. Because you don't know how to control Arahbaki. Because no one knows how.

[But letting you split me open on a metal table will give us all the answer, yeah? Making me into your shitty godly pet, just like he was for the European authorities —]

AM: Allow me to repeat myself. Black n. 12 was an overwhelming treat —

[I noticed it when he slaughtered my family]

AM: No, not for them. For the city.

[I protected the city. Don't you sit here and try to convince me I'm like him]

AM: On a purely mathematical level, you are.

[Two thousand three hundred eighty three lines of codes, ah?]

AM: What did you say?

[Don't worry about it. What do you care about the weirdo? He's dead]

AM: He is. Did you know he's the reason why the Port Mafia needs the Ability Permit?

(White noises).

AM: We've always had our eyes on you guys, but the risk Black n. 12 and you rained upon Yokohama... It's something we need to keep a close eye on. It's something that cannot be left in the hands of people who we don't know if we can trust with the Permit.

[And yet you'll give it to them. Because I'm here, and according to your monologues, the Moons will write down their treaty by the end of September. That doesn't sound much, "I'll do anything for the good of Yokohama", does it?]

AM: Protecting this city is —

[You cowards don't know anything about protecting this city]

AM: And the criminals and illegal Users wreaking havoc do?

[The Port Mafia keeps this city afloat. Don't even try to fucking deny it. It's the Mafia they call when conflicts need to be sedated. It's the Mafia stopping the low wars from touching the city itself. It's the Mafia welcoming the Users your Government would stick in a tank and prod at otherwise — all to create their own weapon and then get pissed off when it escapes.]

(White noises).

[You don't give a shit about Yokohama. You don't give a shit about Arahabaki becoming like the Guivre. You and those men you work for just want your toys back. You don't give a shit about me or any other little experiment the Government has wasted their money on, so stop pretending you need to save me from the thing you put in my skin. He's mine. End of it]

AM: Black n. —

[His name was Verlaine]

tape xxxix

AM: Doesn't it make you mad?

[Tons of stuff does]

AM: That they haven't even tried to get you back?

(White noises)

tape xlii.

AM: Flags.

(White noise).

(Chair being rattled).

[What?]

AM: That's the name of the family who you lost, correct? Pianoman's Ability was one of my first scheduling jobs. Interesting. Truly. Not that we ever managed to prove he had one.

[Get that fucking name —] — (Chair being rattled — [Out of your dirty mouth —]

AM: We should talk about them.

[Go fuck yourself!]

AM: Shall we start?

[Registration cut short. Time: 7 minutes and 9 seconds. Reason: A5158's Ability activated in its minor manifestation. Agent Minami to be transported to the Infirmary. Increase doses to —] tape li.

[Registration cut short. Time: 53 minutes and 0.1 seconds. Reason: No Response from A5158]

tape lvi.

[Registration cut short. Time: 15 minutes and 9 seconds. Reason: No Response from A5158]

tape lx.

[Registration cut short. Time: 34 minutes and 7 seconds. Reason: No Response from A5158]

tape lxiii.

AM: He was quick.

[Who?]

AM: Your Boss.

[To do what?]

AM: Give you to us.

(White noises).

[How's your broken arm?]

AM: I asked, and he said "Alright, then." You were a small price to pay.

(White noises).

AM: His right hand woman didn't move a finger either. The guards, your partner... Nothing at all. The taste of nonchalance sagged my nose.

(White noises).

AM: I know how it feels, you know? I didn't just — wound up at the Special Division. Commander Santoka took a big risk with me, after I... was kicked out of my organization. I decided to dedicate my life to something better, though.

[Is this the part where we bond over being rejects? Spare me the sob story]

AM: Mine or yours?

[What organization?]

AM: What?

[What organization threw you out?]

AM: Oh. The Bishop's Staff.

(White noises)

AM: I gave them a kid in exchange for money. They took the kid and gave me nothing. Then they... decided he wasn't fit for the role. And threw him out, too.

[Of what? The window?]

AM: Yes. Actually, yes.

(White noises)

[Sucks to be you]

AM: Sucks to be you, too.

[No, not really]

AM: You're a child who kills children. That can't be fun, can it?

[I don't—]

(White noises).

AM: A5158 —

[Call me that name again and I will make sure yours is the first skull I break]

AM: Nakahara. Will you collaborate?

[Go fuck yourself]

(White noises).

(Water).

(Groan).

[ — broadcast to announce the death of Yokohama's resident Billionaire, Hirabayashi Mitsuru, on the 15th of September — ]

Case number: 13667890

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. was [...]*

---

---

It took two weeks in the Special Division Headquarters for the so-called Wound Reaper to speak up again from his adjacent cell.

Chuuya hadn't been entirely sure about his presence, for the first few days — no complaint had ever come for his relentless pacing just one wall by, or the irrelevant, cursing-lined speeches he tended to go in specifically for the hidden camera in the corner. Then, three hours after he had been dumped onto the floor, soaked and with his teeth clenched so tight one of them had been dangling in its gum since — a half chuckle had come from the grated slot near the ceiling.

Given that he'd already been unspeakably aggravated, Chuuya hadn't even managed to keep his air in his lungs long enough to stand on his elbows. “You got a problem?”

He hadn't spoken for a long time.

Right when the coughing had started to scratch his lungs — and his pointless insults to the hidden camera to grow repetitive — a rumbling, deep voice had offered: “Don't we all?”

It was the last Chuuya had heard of him, until the scratches he had been tracing into his choker signaled the fifteenth day of his stay.

“You know, I think you got it right,” he said, at some indefinite point, sitting on the ceiling. Tainted was partly suffocated by the three different injections he was given every morning; he had kept the fact that at least three more would have been needed to render him useless to himself. “Agent Ma'am says you've yet to speak a word. That was what I was doing too,” Tainted grasped at his nails; he held onto the little left in his veins. “I should have just kept it up.”

He wasn't expecting an answer. There wasn't much to know about the Wound Reaper — not a real name; not an origin; not motivation. He only knew the Special Division wanted him.

“It wouldn't have worked.”

The surprise was enough to land him to the ground. Eyebrow raised, the bleeding gash from a fist pounding along, he questioned. “Why not?”

“They would have prodded,” the Wound Reaper said. His voice had the scratchy candor of something that wasn't much used — he couldn't have guessed his age. “And you're many things, but your veins aren't empty. They would have found a good number of reasons for you to talk.”

Chuuya wasn't quite sure if he was being insulted or. “But not for you?”

“I have killed everyone who might have ever forced me to my knees long ago.”

“That must have been a hell of a week.”

“There is a road to untouchability,” the Wound Reaper insisted, undeterred. His tone lacked any inflection; he sounded eternally tilted in question, but not particularly concerned with any answer. “And it’s paved in fear. I don’t know about you, but I assure you — these people find nothing fearsome, if it owns something to care for.”

“I don’t know if I agree,” Chuuya laid on the metal ground, hands behind his head. He sniffed the blood on his upper lip up; counted the foot-shaped condensation he had left on the ceiling. “Feels like they’re only waiting for a chance to humanize us into submission. Wasn’t it mean, the way they treated you? We would treat you better.”

“Manipulation isn’t a welcome.”

He shrugged. He raised his arms to study them — devoid of gloves and of most black lines; a surprising lack of hunger that had his stomach tightening on itself. Mistrusting. “I know. They don’t have entrance matts here.”

The sound of rustling surprised him — the man had been absolutely still for as long as he could remember. A bit closer, the Wound Reaper said: “The underground calls you a god.”

“And the upper floors call you a future collaborator,” Chuuya replied, even if there wasn’t a question mark in that declaration. “Are they both lies, or both truths?”

“Does it matter?” he commented. “I don’t think so. Or rather — I think it only matters for what it can do for both of us.”

He pulled at the buckle of the choker. “There’s an us?”

“We would both benefit by confirming the voices. Isn’t there?”

Chuuya thought about bedtime stories. The way Yuan looked at his hands. The way a broken eye had looked. Just how much blood the edges of Doc’s severed corpse had bled on the floor — how much of it had already dried, by the time Chuuya had remembered he was meant to be a bit better than everyone else.

“If they want a god,” the Wound Reaper said, with the ease of someone who had heard every single voice about him to ever grace their city. “Give it to them,” A pause. “It will only make it more of an added point onto people’s fear of me — when I do kill you.”

He scoffed.

“Or when the net does.”

A beat. His fingers stilled. “What did you say?”

The man didn’t speak again.

---

...

---

Hours later, once his body had woken him up with the same ease it carried on reports-writing days, the door of the cell — your room, Agent Minami had called it; and, could be better if you talked — opened with deadly precision.

“Up,” Guard 051 told him. “She’s waiting.”

The man’s eyes were tired, but framed by wrinkles of genuine cheerfulness. Windows were not something the underground floor of the Special Division Headquarters’s planimetry had allowed — he assumed it was the middle of the night, as it usually was during his interrogations. Among other types of torture — more straightforward ones — trying to mess up his sleeping schedule was well-acclaimed.

He was led to the communal bathrooms, where the three syringes 051 was in charge of sticking into his neck were emptied out. Showering gave him the time to get used to their effects — drowsiness, mostly, and the uncomfortable feeling of something poking at the blood in his veins.

If Chuuya had wanted to be helpful, he would have told them N’s had gone stronger at it.

Helpfulness wasn’t among his concerns.

“Move. We’re already late.”

He’d been doing good, he considered, as 051 led him to the interrogation room. Tainted was mostly in check; throughout the torture and the taunts and the endless conversations about his every supposed weak point, Chuuya was surprised he had only made the mistake of activating it twice — each resulting in an added syringe.

Arahabaki won’t let us touch you.

Selfishness could not be called so when it saved someone’s life. Unperturbed, he referred to it by no other name — a Singularity’s selfish, selfish, selfish desire to stay afloat, clinging to the dirtiest plank of wood.

He’d take it.

“So,” Minami said, switching the recorder on the table on. “Did you sleep well?”

Few things annoyed Chuuya more than discovering his first impression on someone was correct. He tended to assume the absolute worst out of everyone wearing an uniform — being proved right only resulted in a bother for himself.

Minami couldn't be older than twenty five, but she breathed like someone much older. She reminded him of the old woman who'd owned the Old World: squinting eyes and a too-relaxed smile, and a square of dark hair enclosing severe features.

She'd always known when one of them was trying to sneak a glass under her nose. She'd always looked at Chuuya with an implacable sort of gaze, a bit too attentive — as if picking him out and sorting him as different from them was the easiest thing.

“You gave me the normal handcuffs instead of the ‘national threat’ ones,” Chuuya offered, showing off his naked wrists. They'd only ever removed the shackles for the waterboarding and the nail-ripping; he couldn't see any of the tools for either, though. “Has our friendship reached that stage?”

The croaky texture of his voice caused him a grimace. He was a walking bruise with several healing concussions — most of the wounds would be gone in a few hours. In the face of her polite grin, he felt like adding his knuckles to the bundle of bones he'd broken.

“Consider it a gift. Fifteen is an important number,” Minami said, seemingly blind to his frustration. “I thought about bringing you a cake, but I wasn't sure of what flavor you might like.”

“I hate chocolate,” Chuuya informed her.

“That might just be the strangest thing you've told me throughout your stay.”

There were no Guards with her today. A pile of letters rested in her hands — laying back onto the seat, she abandoned them on the table, intertwining her fingers on her chest instead. “I have a question for you.”

He settled his legs upon the table, studying the vaguely lighting-shaped scars on his feet. “So you've told me.”

“Why did you join the Port Mafia?”

“The criminal syndicate?” Chuuya stared directly into the red circle of the recorder. “That would be a shit life. Why would I do that?”

A corner of the Agent's mouth trembled. The line between raw exasperation, sadistic anger, and begrudging appreciation had grown blurrier and blurrier the more time she was forced to spend with him — these days, he was never quite sure of whether she was about to electrocute him or laugh at one of his insults.

Through the drapes of torture — the flashes of her face he sometimes saw in the middle of his sleep, tensing his muscles for a fight; the now familiar sound of her intakes of breath before she broke a bone, snapped a nail, pushed his face into the water, talk, talk, get out of the tank before you get stuck there again, get out of the tank before he takes your — Chuuya almost thought he liked her.

“Your jewelry shop,” she conceded. “Why did you start working there?”

“I mean. Life ain’t fucking cheap.”

“You could have applied for other jobs.”

“Could I?”

She tilted her head. “The Government could have given you another life, if you had wished so. You must have known you would have been granted almost anything, if you had gone to them.”

“If I had become your lab rat, you mean.”

“It doesn’t have to be so grotesque.”

“No, I think it does,” Chuuya yawned, throwing his head back. “They took me in when I had nothing else. They welcomed me as one of their own. It’s more than any of you lab coats freaks could have ever offered.”

“So, you’re the sentimental type.”

“I grew up on the streets,” he shrugged. “I’m the, whoever throws money at your feet, type.”

A twist of fate, Lippman had called it. I have no nice metaphors to offer. You were thirsty, and we had water.

Water I was threatened to drink, Chuuya hadn’t said.

Except he was no chess piece, and he wouldn’t just keep his head low under a prodigy’s maniacal mechanizations — demonic or not.

He had joined of his own volition, anyway, hadn’t he? He had chosen to kneel in front of a doctor turned killer — the sum of all the lacks he’d had — and offer his neck. He had let the Flags mold him into someone who wanted to be with the people who he had sworn to destroy.

What else had there been?

“It would have been boring, anyway,” Chuuya added. “A waste of my potential.”

The woman hummed. “You think you have potential?”

“I know I do.”

“The leading kind?”

A buzz of sorts was enclosing the room, choking the summer heat out of it. He wondered if it had rained more in September; if the hems of Kouyou’s kimonos were kissing the puddles on the ground again. “Shop manager has a nice ring to it,” he mused.

“And yet you failed, as King of the Sheep,” Agent Minami considered, just a hint of a smile. Restricted by the handcuffs, his hands twitched. “And your so-called Flags are dead.”

The heels of his boots sank against the edge of the table. He pressed harder — fantasized, in the way of mischievous kids and evil men; melting that metal until it stuck to his soles, running them up and down that woman’s hands. Leaving a mark. Leaving a shadow. Leaving a scar no one would see.

“The Flags had another manager,” Chuuya concluded. “A smart son of a bitch. Someone who would have killed you way before you even had a chance to open the door of your car for me.”

“But you couldn’t do the same,” she said. “Your Boss ordered you to come with me.”

Fifteen days had never been longer. “Great. Now you’re getting dumber.”

“Am I?”

“You already used the insecurity tactic,” he informed her. “If you wanted to sit here and give me an identity crisis over the fact that I was thrown away like a bargaining chip, maybe you should know that you’re — about two years late.”

“It doesn’t change the facts.”

“It doesn’t change that I don’t give a fuck,” he insisted. “Have you considered that maybe I’m here because I want to be?”

Agent Minami paused.

“I did, actually,” she admitted. “But I truly feel like that would be overestimating your —” She tightened her lips. “Your potential .”

“Manipulation won’t bring you anywhere,” Chuuya stared at the ceiling. “I’m too used to that shit. Basically immune.”

“People die with worrying frequency around you, don’t they?”

There was a vent on that ceiling, too.

He had incessantly studied the one in his room, the first day — worked it until it was loose enough to be removed. He had put it back into place and closed his eyes, preparing for two weeks of hell. And then he had kept his mouth shut.

“Not that we can prove any of it,” Minami was quick to add, tracing the outlines of the letters. “But for the little we do know — you have quite the lakes of blood under your feet.”

“I bet the Governmental Secret Agent must feel quite the kinship with my soles.”

“Does it ever get slippery?”

He snorted. “What a dumb question.”

The punch could have been avoided — Chuuya felt it shatter across his nose a bit belatedly, tearing a hiss out of mouth. Back of the seat digging into his nape, he laughed at the led lights on the ceiling, disbelieving.

When his vision focused again, Minami was on her feet, tracing her bruised knuckles with one finger. Tongue-in-cheek, she met his eyes.

Judgment came with the taste of rust in his mouth: “It’s your fault they’re dead.”

Adam would despise her.

A weird thought.

He had sent him a birthday present — he recalled, pointlessly. The small package had been left at the Headquarters. Madame Tanaki hadn’t stopped giggling for the whole day, after he’d opened the Jack-in-the-Box — its puppet being a very accurate doll look-alike of Adam himself.

Chuuya had brought it with him to France. Had watched Rimbaud’s — Verlaine’s — window devour it on the night of a storm; by the time he’d stepped outside to recover it, it had been a clump of wood and mechanical parts. Nurturing toys had never been a luxury of his. It was just a box. He had kept the little Adam toy, though.

Just —

“Them,” Minami continued. “And every single innocent bystander who has and who will, end up a victim of Arahabaki’s rage.”

A tear of blood ran down his upper lip — he licked it off, just to hear his bones rumble. Eyes on the lights, he reminded her: “Arahabaki didn’t do shit.”

“A5158,” she insisted. “You are Arahabaki.”

All you are — is what I will escape.

“And?”

“And,” Minami insisted, “Maybe, if you accepted to work with us — to be explained what these horrifying experiments actually are, instead of what you remember — we could find a way to understand how you work. A way to push Arahabaki in the background. To get this curse off of you.”

Chuuya stared. “Curse.”

“They named it after him. Arahabaki is not the god of good luck and peaceful lives. I’m sure you know that.”

[“What you need to understand,” Mori said. “Is that fate is much more real than anyone would think it is.”

Light filtered in through the stained windows, draping kaleidoscopic curtains across the former doctor’s face. Chuuya didn’t as much enjoy their walks as he treasured them; as he understood that every moment spent with the Boss was one moment more the man had to keep his mask on — and one more possibility to see the cracks.

He wasn’t curious about Mori, per se. He just needed to get him on the pedestal his loyalty had decided to build for him — to watch him turn into a tool that would mold Chuuya into something more acceptable than what he’d been in the Sheep.

Second hand natural talent was fine.

“What happened to you, Chuuya — I’m not saying it was bound to happen,” the man explained. “I’m saying there’s a reason why it did. Just as there’s a reason why I’m here, with blood in my hands and a resurrected organization. The man who taught me medicine — He told me that people are much like organs. We exist to function, and we function to exist.”

Killing the prior Boss certainly couldn’t be written down as part of the man’s crimes, on a logical level. It had been the right choice — perhaps that was exactly what made it so earth shattering; so delicate on the tongues of those who still suspected, and those who needed no show to have faith.

Power thirst didn’t fit someone like Mori — thinking that he might have done it in the name of sincerely believing he was meant to, somehow, made more sense.

“There were tons of test subjects for the Arahabaki Project. Tons of variables. Tons of kids. Dazai seems rather convinced you were one of them, and not some capsule created to contain the power.”

“He’s not being serious about it,” Chuuya scoffed, hands deep in his pockets. “Have you heard his motivations? He’s just stuck on his high horse, and can’t admit that he’s as clueless to the answer as I am.”

Mori hummed. “I’m not sure I agree with that.”

He kept his eyes to the floor.

“Whichever it is,” the man insisted. “Whether you’re a body that was created to solve an issue, or a child who was taken away — we have no way of knowing. But it doesn’t change things. Whichever one it is — you were still created for Arahabaki. The two of you are — forgive the sentimentalism — made for each other.”]

“You know,” Chuuya lowered his gaze on the woman. “You would almost be funny, if you weren’t the next best thing to a cop.”

Minami curled an eyebrow.

He sighed. “I’m not cursed, Agent. Here’s a truth for you — shit happens everyday, and it happens to everyone.”

She shrugged. “Everyone?”

“Yes.”

“But you’re not everyone.”

He paused.

“The upper floors won’t tell us much about the Arahabaki Project. But this — this I know: they lost data, during your battle against Paul Verlaine,” She leaned forward. Chuuya was uninterested in intellectualism. Chuuya was uninterested in the gaping admirer who had snooped through the files of a national secret — who had stolen the test subject for herself. “They’re not convinced you’re the real deal.”

“As you said, the data was destroyed,” he echoed, blankly. “There’s no way to prove either.”

“There’s not,” she agreed. “But if the ones who made you aren’t persuaded to say yes, what gives you the right of doing so?” The led lights danced across her face; dug caves down her cheekbones, in the space between her lips. You can have him, Mori had said. For now. “Child killer, legend of the underground — vessel of something so great, they called it a god. What gives you the right to compare yourself to any other human being?”

Chuuya curled an eyebrow.

She shrugged. “You’re a good kid, Nakahara. I truly think that. The way I see it — either you’re cursed, or human experiments just generally make for terrible leaders.”

[“What you need to understand,” Dazai sighed, obnoxiously, starfishing in the middle of Albatross’ floor, “It’s that, for most people, it’s irrelevant whether fate is real or not.”

The mirrorball on the ceiling could turn into a fan, when needed; Chuuya wished he’d found out sooner. He wished it made a disturbing enough sound to muffle the other boy’s voice.

“Spying on the Boss’ private conversations is not allowed. Not even to the stuff that comes with bandages,” he reminded him, through the sweat. His mop of hair and bandages was a single point of heat on his lap; he kept pushing him off, and Dazai kept returning.

“It was your conversation, too. And you’re my dog, so I’m allowed to know everything.”

“I hope the heat melts the skin off your bones and kills you.”

“So do I,” he sighed, dreamy.

The subject was let go of; or so he thought. By the time they had torn apart most of their clothing, cursing out the unbearable march of the hottest day of the summer — by the time Chuuya’s eyes were bored enough to count the bruises up every naked inch of Dazai he could find — the boy spoke up again.

"Fate might be real," he insisted. "But you weren't chosen because of some higher design."

"You don't know that." He didn't know either; the desire to fight him about it was an unavoidable call.

"Destiny is irrelevant."

"Why?"

"Because if it weren't, men would not fear existence the way they do."

He paused. Smacked him on the forehead. "You're the suicidal freak. Not everyone is scared of life."

"No, they are," Dazai assured him. "They're afraid it might end too soon. They can't predict it. They know every day could be the last — as much as they pretend not to worry about it, it's the underlying thought staining every instant of their existence. It's all they will ever know. They can't even imagine what freedom from that dread feels like."

It was too hot for philosophy. It was the wrong person to discuss life with. It wouldn't stop Arahabaki from being where he was; he didn't want it to.

"So destiny isn't real," he concluded, "because if it was, people would know that everything is predicted, and that they have no way to stop it. And they wouldn't be afraid?"

"Precisely."

"And since you act like that, you're allowed to believe in fate."

"Quite."

"And that's all the proof you have that anyone could have been sagged with Arahabaki."

"It's all the proof I need," Dazai shrugged. "It wasn't a godly master plan. It wasn't fate. If there's a book to write, it's still being written."

"A book, or the Book?"

"That's not something you need to concern yourself with," he replied, undeterred. "You weren't a prophetic perfect fit for Arahabaki. You don't have something stored inside you — something the Singularity liked, or recognized. You're just developing a megalomaniac complex, and you want to believe you're special," It didn't seem as if he believed a word of it. "Want to know what you were, though?"

Look where it brought me, he wanted to say. Look what it took from me.

"Whatever," he grunted.

"An unlucky kid," He planted his head on his lap, stubbornly, again and again. "Don't think yourself important. You were just an unlucky kid."].

“Well,” Chuuya concluded, pulling his legs down. “The way I see it, you’re either an asshole or a governmental radicalist.”

Minami’s lips parted, overflowing with intention. Uncaring of etiquette, the metal door of the interrogation room was slammed open.

“Agent,” Emergency was dripping from every sweaty inch of the man’s face, leaving stains all over his grey suit. Knuckles turning white from his grip around the doorframe, he breathed out: “She’s dead.”

Of every emotion he had watched reach its peak upon the woman’s face — the one that drained the color from her cheeks wasn’t familiar. He didn’t understand — he found he didn’t truly need to, embraced by the suffocating tension dropping Minami’s jaw to the ground.

“Shit,” she said, passionately. “Already?”

“We just got the call. Her — her maid —“

“Agent,” She threw a look in Chuuya’s direction. “That’s enough,” She stood up, reaching for her gun. “Kid, 051 will escort you back to your room. We will continue this conversation later.”

“After the funeral?” he dared, pushing his confusion where she wouldn’t grasp it.

Astonishing, a flash of honesty set her eyes ablaze. Unrecognizable, thinner than touch, and yet —

“Nothing you need to worry about, A5—“ Physically, almost, her words shut the door on their way out. The Agent breathed. “Chuuya.”

His lips parted.

Fear, he thought. She was afraid.

Right before her colleague boldly dragged her out, Minami’s eyes glanced towards the letters she’d left on the table.

An assortment of ideas crowded his skull — the things Arahabaki had to offer through the weak layer of drugs; the pulsing of his healing wounds; the echoing sound of Guard 051’s step, closer and closer; the handcuffs dangling between his fingers; the Agent’s words — she’s dead.

Without thinking, Chuuya threw himself to the door, slamming it shut before 051 could fully enter its frame.

“Hey!” the man shouted, raining fists down the surface, shaking the metal behind his own back. “Open the fucking door —“

“Come on,” Chuuya muttered, staring at his joint wrists, pushing all his weight against the door. Flickering weakly, the familiar red glow grew in intensity with every breath he took, embracing his palms — until the slumber of the syringes was little more than a buzz in his skull. “Come on—”

He sunk his fists on the doorknob, sinking the edge of the door into the frame, and he ran to the table, grabbing the letters.

Tearing them apart took a patience he didn’t have, and a peace the Guard’s kicks against the door wouldn’t allow him. His eyes skirted down the words quicker than he could comfortably say made him understand; he threw taxes and work instructions to the ground, searching, searching —

Pausing.

A snake was scribbled across the back of a yellowish envelope, cartoonish in its features — but surprisingly well done. Its blush and overjoyed eyes were all but a faithful depiction of reality; Chuuya felt no regret in ripping it apart.

Hey, the overly perfumed paper read, in a shaky calligraphy, unfairly elegant still — unmistakable simply for existing venomously in Chuuya’s visual field. You still haven’t given me my souvenir from France.

He breathed. “Fucking finally —”

Guard 051 ripped the door from its hinges, barely waiting for it to land before stepping inside. His kick hit Chuuya right in the abdomen, landing his vaguely dizzy body against the table; air escaped his lungs in a sprint, choking him.

“You,” the Guard snarled. “Get back here.”

Chuuya waited for the man to come closer, gaping and coughing on the ground. The moment his fingers clawed at the chain of his handcuffs, he stomped a glowing-red boot on the man’s foot, relishing in the wet crunch! of bones breaking and in the scream that left his mouth.

He wrapped his arms around the Guard’s neck, caging him between his limbs and the handcuffs — with a snarl, he slammed the man’s forehead onto the table, watching his skull crumble like paper against the metal. Blood rained down his face — Chuuya pulled his hands towards himself, breaking the chain against the man’s nape until he heard a crack! .

His corpse fell on the floor.

The handcuffs quickly followed, pushed off his bruised wrists. He spat on the ground. “That’s for that shit you called bread,” he let him know, kicking the governmental badge off his chest.

Chuuya stepped over the mess, and ran out of the room without looking back.

---

The plan — was all Dazai had traced on his knuckles, pushing him to the Special Division's side of the courtroom with a dog-remark — is for you to finally disappear from my sight. Please, do enjoy your stay.

The plan, it seemed — because the words of an asshole could only mean, figure it out yourself — was to cause Chuuya an aneurysm.

“Stupid —“ he drawled, dragging one of the Guards by the neck, slamming her face on the nearest waiting-seat until it cracked. “— goddamn —“ Her body fell like a lifeless doll, tripping the man charging against him; Chuuya grasped his head between his hands, focusing the heightened gravity in the dead centers of his palms, until his skull exploded. “— fliers!”

He threw the third Guard against the wall, as the blood from the bullets he'd ricocheted back at him drooled over the Missing Dog flier pinned right there — the same one from the airport. The same one, he would bet, that Kajii had framed in his office.

“Fuck you!” he snapped, again, kicking the door next to the piece of paper open.

The Headquarters of the Special Division had been built with mazes and potential break ins in mind — if he had felt grateful enough, he would have admitted the cursed fliers-signals were doing most of the work. Windows simply weren't a thing in the building — the walls were too sturdy for destruction to be worth the trouble. It also, unfortunately, wouldn't help with what Chuuya was slowly realizing the point of that escape had to be — the less Guards he encountered and the more archivists he pushed against the wall.

By the time the glass door appeared at the end of the hallway, Chuuya knew — he had subjected himself to two weeks of sloppy torture to snoop through the archives of the Special Division.

Steadfast, he ticked off the number 453 on his mental revenge methods list — a do-later.

A group of armed men appeared from one of the side doors, opening fire with no hesitation. Chuuya jumped into the air, sticking to the ceiling as the projectiles brushed against his dust-shaded clothes. The rain froze in the air — trembling along to the gravitational energy dropping the temperature of the hallway to the floor.

“I'm done,” he informed, helpfully. The men's jaws were slack. “I'm so done with this shit.”

He didn't wait to watch them fall, sliding down with the help of the rivers of blood flogging the road — he jumped as far as his weightlessness would allow him, ignoring the emergency sirens, and threw the glass door open with a kick. Barely, he caught sight of a glasses-wearing silhouette in brown clothing — it escaped from the opposite door, leaving Chuuya alone amongst the shelves and the muffled screeches.

He debated following him. Chuuya was ready to bet most cameras of the building had been mysteriously turned off, though — and there was no way Minami wouldn't see his empty cell and understand.

He brushed the thought away, and threw himself to the bookshelves.

“What is it, what is it,” he murmured, naked fingers brushing up and down old paper, his own crimson glow illuminating them enough to read their titles. “What is it that you want me to find, Mackerel?”

Identifying relevant dossiers ended up not being as hard as he had imagined it — the endless bookshelves were organized to a slightly maniacal point; either the Special Division had never envisioned someone breaking in, or they cared very little about the help they were giving to their own thieves.

Or if they have nothing to worry about, he considered, pausing. If they're misleading.

Outside, the siren grew louder. The rumble of steps and rifles urged him to hurry up. Never ending information would have been theirs to gain from snooping around that place — answers to how most Abilities in the city worked, descriptions of international threats, progress tracement on Ability Users experimentation —

He stilled, fingers stuck on a dossier.

On the matters of A5158 —

Chuuya saw the light of shooting firearms before he actually heard the Guards break in — he threw himself behind the nearest bookshelf, papers flying from his hands; he landed with his fingertips on the ground, and pushed.

Scarlet roads sneaked underneath the furniture, cracking the pavement — reaching bodies he could only partially see. The crowd of Guards dropped, their rifles drilling deeper holes on the floor, snapping the bones of their hands from the effort — Chuuya's attention was stolen by the flier floating in over their shrieking heads.

He had printed the flier in his mind on his first day back; a quick look told him nothing about these copies was different — except for the date printed on top of the paper.

23th of April.

“Asshole,” he said, unnecessarily. Perhaps the two weeks of monologuing had gotten to him. “Asshole, why make this so overly complicated — “

He jumped to his feet; in a storm of groans and screeches, the Guards' bodies sank deeper and deeper as Chuuya jumped over their broken legs, searching for the beginning of April on the dates organizing the archive.

An unsurprising number of thin dossiers filled the bookshelves from the 23th of April to the current date — Chuuya busied himself with searching for copies of the same topic. It had to be something that had been studied starting from April, something that had ended on —

Four dossiers stared back at him from the ground — the only matching files over the number of a pair. Scribbled on their greenish covers, the titles read: On the matter of Hirabayashi Mitsuru's death, and its unavoidable consequences.

Agent Minami, he thought — her genuine terror. She's dead.

He grasped the dossiers and stuffed them under the back of his shredded shirt. It made for an awkward walk, no matter how thin the files were; nonetheless, Chuuya ran out of the room, charging through the last floors of the building.

The Entrance Hall — a non-descriptive space of greys and whites, vaguely reminiscent of the front desks rooms of the CEO companies he had sometimes been tasked to gather protection money from — was blessedly empty, illuminated by squares of led lights and the torches a small group of Guards near the door was carrying.

Chuuya felt a grin wreck his face in two — some exasperated sort of euphoria, however exhausted; exhilaration that brightened even the torture sessions in the back of his skull, sending shivers down his spine.

The night sky right outside the doors — yes. The open space. The space he needed to rage in peace.

At last, his steps called the attention of the Guards. Their torches settled on him, and he could imagine what he looked like — a teenager dripping blood and shredded clothes, gleaming red in the middle of their Hall, hands in his pockets and teeth bloodied. “Well,” he offered. “It’d be nice to have some music. For a dramatic exit, y’know?”

---

...

---

September was a balm on the burn marks summer had left all over the flesh of Yokohama — lines of trees slowly curving along to the change of the season; car windows fogging up with agonizing slowness; the low murmur of the few passersby, unwilling to dance and jump in crowds to this or that end-of-the-season festival.

Four bodies were plastered against the glass doors of the Headquarters of the Special Division for Unusual Powers.

Chuuya walked out of the only opening not in pieces, welcoming the breeze against the drying blood on his skin.

He breathed in.

His eyes found the set of urban cameras towering upon the entrance; he tapped lithe fingers on the light poles they were attached to, watching their glass shatter. An eerie silence draped itself across the empty street.

Snap.

Chuuya bolted forward, feet sticking to the nearest light pole, immediately sending out trails of Tainted down the concrete — to the six silhouettes jumping out of the alleys enclosing the building. A choir of startled screeches reached his ears — he tightened his grip, dragging the bodies closer to the pole, readying to —

He paused. “Guys?”

“Motherfucker!” Noguchi spat, uselessly attempting to drag his immobilized hands to his throat, fighting the invisible grip suffocating his lungs. “Fucking — let...”

“Shit,” Speechless, Chuuya let his hands fall. The squad dropped to the ground, coughing wetly between curses and gasps. The cracks underneath their bodies shook with every bark out of their constricted lungs. “What the fuck are you guys doing here — what the fuck, I could have killed you —”

“We noticed that,” was all Kenta managed to say, forehead plastered to the concrete. Next to him, Rin was vomiting drool, punching her chest to get the bile and the blood out. “Trust me, we — we noticed that. Oh, my God. Oh my —”

Virgil squeaked, on his knees. “We almost died there.”

“We almost died there, what the fuck —”

“Guys,” Chuuya snapped, eyes to the doors of the Headquarters. “Move.”

“What?”

“Move, not here, we have to —”

“How did you even escape —” Tsuchiya protested, dragging herself to her feet with the finesse of the elderly. “What did you even do —”

Koda was the first to catch up with the issue. He began to run, hands hooked onto Virgil’s wrist and Rin’s belt to pull them down the road, ignoring their protests. Chuuya jumped from light pole to light pole, trusting them to follow through the storm of too-distant bullets — soon enough, they left the new Guards crowding the entrance of the building behind.

Gunshots occasionally echoed from the revolvers the squad had brought along; by the time he’d guided them inside a sewer-water flooded alley, the Special Division Headquarters weren't visible nor audible.

"Shit," Rin concluded, slipping down the wall.

Chuuya leaned his back against the stony side of some fashionable building, flattening his palms to put an end to their spasms. Whatever had been inside those two weeks of syringes, it hadn't been enough to put neither Tainted nor Arahabaki to sleep, but just sufficient to leave his whole body tingling from the overuse. He sucked a breath in, counting to three.

He longed for his gloves — no matter if the skin was clear. They were probably trash in some incinerator at those HQs; he sunk his hands in his pockets, instead.

"What," Chuuya started, "Were you guys thinking, exactly?"

The squad all looked a bit worse for wear — their black uniforms were dusty and crinkled; the blue lines under their eyes deeper than usual; their shoulders just a hint too curved to be normal. Chuuya found himself the subject of a stunned scrutiny, as if the six had abruptly realized he was actually standing in front of them.

"What were we thinking?" Tsuchiya repeated, in disbelief. She stepped forward, and delivered a punch right to his shoulder. "We were thinking of getting you out of that damn place, you moron."

He blinked. "What?"

"You've been there for two weeks!" Virgil intervened, hands intertwined under his chin, wide eyes refusing to let his own go. "And no one wanted to stage a mission to recover you, so —"

"So we took it upon ourselves!" Another punch to the other shoulder; Kenta's cheeks were reddened. "A large faction of the organization was in a frenzy. You know, for someone who insists he isn't much liked — you sure had a lot of people demanding you were brought back. Well, not directly to the Boss, because you know —"

"He's fucking terrifying," Rin intervened.

"— but we went to Executive Kouyou, and she denied our requests with a clearly heavy heart. Seriously, never seen the woman that tense. Voices are she spent two weeks all but begging Boss to get you out."

"Not even an asshole like you deserves to be killed by the Ability Cops," Surprisingly enough, the scoff came from Noguchi. He was leaning on the wall furthest from the group — but Chuuya was too used to his searching-for-wounds gaze, and seeing it drip down himself gave him a whiplash. "There's been a fucking storm."

He poked at the edges until they were blunt, until the pieces slid down where they were supposed to. Chuuya still didn't understand.

"H-Hirotsu," Koda added, hands stuck between their bodies, uncertain whether to reach out or not. "The Commander himself almost tried to prepare a Black Lizards attack to get you back, but Boss stopped him. He has been ten times more irritable than u-usual. He and Kouyou have been muttering among themselves for two weeks.”

“We’ve been preparing for two weeks,” Tsuchiya seethed. “And you got out on your own? Do you even know how much time we wasted on this shit? We had to make sure we weren’t followed — we had to find a way to keep the Boss’ spies’ eyes off of us — we had to come up with a plan to remove you from one of the most well guarded Ability prisons in Yokohama —“

“Tsuchiya used her Ability to lead a pack of cats inside the Headquarters,” Virgil nodded. “They were supposed to — How did you even get out? Didn’t they drug your Ability off of you?” His eyes widened. “That’s not to say you couldn’t kill people without your Ability! It would just be more complicated, and — and the Guards —“

“I killed them,” Chuuya said. His tone tasted empty to his own ears. He was confused. He hated being confused. “The drugs never worked on me. I just killed them all and escaped.”

A bubble of silence embraced them.

With a rumbling laugh, all but humorous, Noguchi was the one to stalk forward and abruptly pin Chuuya to the wall, holding him high enough to meet his eyes. “And you stayed there for two fucking weeks, when you could have escaped any fucking time?”

Tsuchiya sighed. “Noguchi —”

“Don’t piss me off,” the man drawled. “The fucker knows what he’s done.”

“Can’t he just say he was worried about him?” Rin muttered.

Chuuya pushed him off, stepping on his foot with just a hint of Ability. “What the fuck are you guys talking about?” he snapped, as Noguchi cursed out, searching their faces. “The plan was always for me to get out. That shitty Dazai and I —“ “Dazai?” Koda stuttered.

Suspicion crawled down his spine like ice. “Yeah?” Their lost gazes were colder than any water he’d been drowned into. “There was a plan. Not that the idiot fucking explained it to me, but there was. I needed to stay with the Division long enough to make the Four Moons believe the pact was in place, and he needed me to find some documents —“

A thought thundered. Frantic, he turned to Noguchi. “Yuan. Yuan — they wanted her to —“ “Yuan’s fine,” he assured him. “We’ve been guarding her. The brat found out the idea was to give her back, and she’s been nothing more than a ball of terror. But I wouldn’t have let them take her,” He raised his chin, challenging him to think otherwise. “Fuck that. They can use grown motherfuckers as bargaining chips.”

Kenta made a face. “She’s been freaking out about you getting captured. Wanted to come with us tonight. We had to lock her in her room.”

“No, she hasn’t,” Chuuya replied, on instinct.

“Boss.”

“Can we focus on the matter at hand?” Virgil snapped his fingers. “What do you mean you and Dazai had a plan? So this was never a life or death situation?”

“Life-or-death?” He made a face. “Who the fuck do you take me for? You think I’d let one or two fuckers in a suit take me out? They stuck me on a god-awful seat and tickled the fuck out of me for two weeks. That’s the high opinion you have of me? That the Government would kill me? Of course it was a plan.”

“He didn’t tell anyone,” Rin blurted out. “He didn’t tell anyone, how were we supposed to —“

Chuuya paused. “He didn’t tell?”

“He’s been poking the metaphorical sleeping bear for two weeks now,” Virgil intervened, awkwardly. “He’s refused to listen to our proposals to get you out, laughed in the face of anyone who was worried about it —“

“He went around singing this weird jingle about hoping they would electrocute you,” Koda murmured. “Twinkle twinkle little spark?”

“Apparently,” Tsuchiya lowered her voice, somewhat pointlessly. “I mean, it’s just a voice, but — they say he made some crude comments in front of Executive Kouyou — and she tried to smack him right in the face.”

Rin huffed. “The Demon Prodigy getting slapped? They’ve been talking non-stop.”

He stared. “She what?”

Kouyou Ozaki was stuck in a fearful awe of all Dazai Osamu had ever dared to be. It was doubtful, if she even saw him as a kid any longer — an assortment of carefulness and irritation crowded her eyes whenever she laid them on him; air she couldn’t ask Golden Demon to shatter — a taunting smile she was too mindful to touch.

And yet, she allowed him to poke at her; she never touched him unless he gave a somewhat invisible permission. She had reprimanded Chuuya about putting Dazai’s life in danger when he’d first used Arahaki. She didn’t quite like him, he knew — but she held him in her hands with the same fierce protectiveness that her fingers had painted over every wall of the Port Mafia.

Swearing she had dared to touch him with a nail — accounting Boss; accounting all of it; accounting, be grateful — was too outlandish of a mental image to believe.

“He didn’t tell you,” Chuuya echoed. And yet. “The piece of shit didn’t tell anyone?”

“Would we have come to the fucking rescue if he had?” Noguchi snapped.

Silence sagged the alley.

Warmth was immediately noticeable when it stained his body — the two points of heat on his ears blurred his vision for a blink, spreading with detestable efficacy as a disgustingly vibrant fire ran up and down his skeleton. Whatever it was the squad caught on his face — in the split instants before he closed the curtains shut — it erupted in disbelieving gasps.

“Oh, my God,” Kenta groaned, hiding his face in his hands. “Oh, my God, he’s so stupid.”

Virgil shaped up the least respectful face he had ever seen his traits offer. “Boss, are you being serious?” he squeaked. “That’s — I mean, obviously — “ “Wait, what are we on?” Rin interrupted.

Koda sighed, clasping a hand on Chuuya’s shoulder. “He didn’t think we would go this far. That’s why he looks constipated.”

He shrugged his fingers off, gaping. “I don’t fucking look like — what the fuck? Who cares if the bunch of you are suicidal enough to attack the —“

“Is he blushing?” Tsuchiya blinked.

“He’s blushing,” Noguchi confirmed.

“Who’s — who’s blushing, you — I’m still your Boss, remember?” Chuuya blurted out, stalking out of the alley; ignoring the snickering that hit his shoulders on his way out. “You better shut your mouths and pay some respect — after you pulled that fucking stunt that could have — who needed you to save me, anyway, I don’t —“

---

...

---

Kouyou should have been his first stop — if not her, then Mori. Instead, dossiers under his shirt and not the faintest about his own feet, he strided to a blue-neon bathed under-bridge, and made his way down the stairs of The Alley.

“You better be here,” he called out, barely managing not to shatter the stone. “You better be here, you waste of —“

“Oh, magnificent,” a voice groaned. “You didn’t die this time either?”

By the time the leaking pipe had attempted to shower him in sewer water, a hand had closed around his wrist — almost tearing his hand off to slam him against the cold wall.

Chuuya had a knife taken from him before he could even realize it — he stuck his stolen shoe over the attacker's calf and reversed their positions, making sure to wait for the sound of bone crashing against stone. Eyes thundering, and droplets of blood landing on the blade still pressed against his throat, Chuuya snarled.

"This is fine either way," Dazai informed him, helpfully, pressing the knife harder.

Before he could crash his skull against the wall again, something sharp against his calf made him yelp — when he lowered his eyes, Kazuko was sinking her teeth in his skin, blinking.

It was quiet.

A mixture of feelings danced its lazy steps in front of Chuuya's eyes — exasperation from a lifetime of existence; tiredness from two weeks of sloppy torture; an unpleasant buzz carving roads in his skull; Agent Minami's fear and the smell of an upcoming storm. He glanced down, meeting the snake's gaze.

Hysterically, his unimpressed eyes were enough to open the beast's jaws, releasing his captive calf.

"You know," Chuuya said, utterly calm. "I'm almost happy to see you. You revolting offspring of hell."

"Great," the boy huffed. He refused to look at him — refused to be haunted by what two eyes had looked like next to each other, in the Hotel. Far too close, Dazai studied him with tactile disappointment, sporting a bruised cheek and a chocolate stain near his mouth. "Torture gives you good taste, now."

He lowered his knife.

Chuuya stepped back, allowing him to curl onto himself, coughing obnoxiously. The sound of the broken pipe suffocated the distant traffic; the falling sun and the neon lights painted the little alcove in soft shades, filling the space between them with a scrutinizing sort of silence.

Utterly exhausted, unwilling to admit only Tainted was keeping him upright — Chuuya put his finger between the boy's eyebrows.

"Your stubbornness to continue living would almost be touching, if I didn't suspect it was born out of sheer luck," Dazai mused, eventually, batting his hand off. "It does make us an amusing pair, that's for sure. Did you get what I needed?"

"Did you receive the curses I spent two weeks sending you?" Chuuya drawled, feeling dizzy from the sudden lack — given and taken. He studied his naked finger. Whatever hint of silence the syringes had tried to give him, it was nothing compared to this. "Two weeks, asshole. I thought I'd stay there for three days max."

"So you did. Did you curse me a lot?"

“I wrote your stupid name with my blood on the walls after the first nail they ripped off.”

“How romantic.”

They stared each other down. With a huff, Dazai extracted a pair of gloves from his pocket, and threw them right onto the bleeding gash Chuuya could feel on his cheek.

The dim light painted rusty shadows on days-old bandages, giving an eerie depth to the chapped lips tightening in thought. Right before he could move, Dazai reached for one of his hands — tapping the three missing nails, as if waiting for a hiss he didn’t emit.

Chuuya put the gloves on.

“If I had known the Division wasn’t half as chivalarious as I believed, I would have orchestrated for you to be sent there sooner,” Very academically — wearing the gaze that mafiosi refused to meet — he asked: “Did it hurt?”

He scoffed. “They can’t touch me.”

“Doubtful,” Studying the pull of the leather as he pulled them up, Dazai tilted his head to the side. Kazuko gathered around his feet, lethally quiet. “According to my calculations — which are slug-proof, by the way — apart from the healing side effects of chibi-induced torture, you were supposed to leave the Special Division HQs unscathed. We don’t want Mori to get mad.”

“It’s scratches,” Chuuya replied. “Get over it.”

He didn’t. “My plans don’t have scratches.”

“I think they do,” He knew the boy caught the pointed gaze he laid on his bruised cheek. Boiling underneath the skin was an old friend — anger turned his words ugly; grasped the little left of his roots and turned his accent into the Settlement’s crickets. “You’re a fucking jerk for not telling them.”

Dazai didn’t seem impressed. People couldn’t change in two weeks; Chuuya was hit by the horrifying realization that it was the longest they had been apart that whole summer. “Am I?”

“I don’t care if you decided you like pain. There was no need to turn them against you. My squad is not fit for an attack on the Headquarters.”

“They didn’t die either? Shame.”

He seethed. “Ane-san should have smacked you harder.”

“Liking pain is —” Dazai smiled, almost. It widened the bruise on his cheek. “Definitely not the issue. And you know she wouldn’t dare.”

“Maybe you’re the fucking issue.”

“Maybe I forgot. Maybe your absence is not as noticeable as you think.”

Chuuya laughed — it tasted cruel. “Maybe you’re not the prodigy you think you are.”

“Maybe I need to fix the incognita, once and for all. It’s no surprise someone of your ant scale got stuck in the machine,” He tilted his head to the other side, pensive.

Abruptly, bumping hard enough to leave his head pounding, Dazai pushed his forehead against his own — plastering the two of them against the darkest corner of The Alley.

“What the f—”

A whistle left Dazai’s mouth; quiet enough to be a breath, overwhelmingly close to his own lips. His mind connected the dots — his shoulders stiffened, fighting to keep him still against the stone. The sound of steps crowded over the curtain of water — butterfly quick, Dazai’s eyes darted to another corner of The Alley.

A bug.

The papers, the thumb on his knuckles tapped. What did the papers say?

Chuuya wasted no time pretending he hadn’t snooped all over the dossiers on his way there — he pressed his lips together, tight enough to hurt, and whistled back.

Target dead.

Dazai said, low: “I suppose we should hurry then.”

Barely, he refrained himself from pulling his head back and smashing the boy’s forehead again. “Hurry?”

Dazai dragged him away, leaning down just to tap Kazuko’s head where she’d entangled herself with her feet. In one smooth move, he extracted the gun from his back, raising it over Chuuya’s shoulder to shoot. A choked gasp came from his back — unflinching, he turned to watch three men in the Shadow Blade’s uniform drop to their feet and roll down the stairs.

The gun took out the bug on the corner of The Alley next; Dazai motioned him towards the corpse-covered stairs. “We should probably hurry, yes. They’re about to take the old man out.”

---

...

---

They weren't fast enough.

"Boys?" Madame Tanaki stuttered, as they ran through the entrance of the Headquarters. Her mouth parted the more she took them in — the blood stains and the gun Dazai had yet to let go of. "Chuuya, how did you —"

A storm had seemingly snaked through the entrance Hall, leaving dried blood on pieces of overturned furniture and weapons in the hand of the crowd sagging the room. The tell-tale smell of a conflict activated Chuuya's Ability on the tips of his fingers, pushing the glass doors open with a little too much strength, calling stunned gazes to him.

"I'll explain later. I'm fine," he assured her, eyes running, trying to decipher the funerary looks adorning the mafiosi's faces — the murmurs that had nothing to do with the wide eyes they were offering him. "Did something happen?"

"A — A delegation came for the Boss," the woman explained, pale. "His contacts from the Cabinet. The Black Lizards brought them to the office, and then Hirotsu came down muttering something about — someone dying, I think?" Her eyes grew glossy. "And — and then..."

A ring of people occupied the far end of the Hall, all enraged voices and vicious discussions. Chuuya's gaze fell on their shoes; the blood footprints they were leaving on the carpet — the glimpse of a pale, wrinkled, utterly familiar hand sneaking between the endless pairs of legs.

His feet moved on their own.

There were words leaving his mouth, and the distant echo of a wheezing breath, wet and sick. Undeterred elbows, cracks opening on the floor — the voice he could barely hear out of his lips got him through the flood of mafiosi, closely followed by Dazai's shut lips.

Everything was red, was black, was green — Tsuchiya's hair, as she leaned over the holes in Hirotsu's body, one, five, six of them, blood on her shoes, hissing under her breath whenever the man's eyelids dropped. Two of his Black Lizards were applying pressure on every point that would help stop the blood flow, uselessly. Every breath out of his mouth bloomed red on his lips — the sound of his breathing was nails on chalk.

As one, uncaring of the quiet that fell upon them — obedient as they had never accepted to be in their handler's presence — Chuuya and Dazai crouched down.

"Oh," Hirotsu said. A watery texture was draped over his eyes; they settled on them. "Chuuya. Good evening. I knew Dazai would get you out of there."

"I leave for one night, old man," Dazai pointed out. Tsuchiya was moving too quickly to understand whether it was working or not. "And you get yourself shot by pathetic Shadow Blades pretenders?"

A violent cough rattled his frame, pooling drool down the white collar of his shirt. "Ah, you — you know, Dazai. Nothing worse than any Run from the handler rounds."

The boy huffed a laugh. Moved a bit to the side; hid the man's pained face from the crowd.

Chuuya was floating.

Leftover side effects from the syringes, he considered, rationally. Leftover side effects from the torture. Leftover side effects from the last time he'd seen a corpse on the floor, and known he had lost something.

His mouth opened to vomit out the bile: "What the fuck are you doing?"

Tsuchiya announced: "It's not stopping."

"Then do something!" The Black Lizard holding his Commander's elbows snapped.

Dazai's hand sneaked forward, tapping the cracked display of Hirotsu's ancient wristwatch. It had been the next stealing target of the bet he'd lost at the Arcade — because they fought too much, Mori thought so, and Hirotsu did too, even if he never said; and fights were to be solved peacefully, so the Arcade it was. Chuuya watched him trace the webbed glass, humming to himself, distant from it all. Why don't you grab his damn hand?, and, if he touches us, we bolt and —

"He needs to be brought to the Hospital —"

"He'll die on the road there if you don't stabilize the bleeding —"

"There's only so much I can fucking do!"

Chuuya removed his shattered monocle from the ghostly pale valleys of his face. It earned him nothing at all; Hirotsu's eyes were on the chandeliers, deaf to the fight upon his body, blind to any of them. He held it tight in his fist; waited for the glass to break through naked skin.

"Don't worry, boys," Hirotsu reassured.

He had always been aggravatingly tall — Chuuya had cranked his neck to meet his eyes, because of course he would meet them; he had watched him stand and wait for an ocean of men to come at him, unflinching and unbeatable.

I'm not worried, he didn't offer. I'm not worried. I don't even trust you. I didn't even think you could die.

Wetly, the man promised: "I would never inconvenience the two of you by dying."

"I," Chuuya started.

"Then maybe," the Black Lizard growled, grabbing Tsuchiya's shirt to drag her forward. "You fucking whore should have thought about it before destroying your bitch sister's tools!"

His self control snapped. He sunk his fist in the man's face, watching him land against the wall and crack it, knuckles pulsing, head pounding.

"Be useful or be quiet," he ordered.

The man stared at him in disbelief, through the reddening fingers he had pushed up against his now broken nose. A flash of recognition petrified the anger on his lips — he crawled back against the wall, silent.

Chuuya dragged Tsuchiya's hands back on the Hirotsu's chest, climbing to his feet. Shaking with repressed energy, crimson crowding the corners of his vision in a way that he knew was visible — he stared at the mute crowd surrounding the scene. "Keep your mouths shut until he's not bleeding his guts out on the floor — let her save his shitty life in peace — or I will slaughter every single of you myself," Chuuya commanded. "Do I make myself clear?"

Tainted erupted up and down his skin, enlarging the space around Hirotsu's body with every step back the unwanted audience took. He had despised the fear in the eyes of those men for months — but there were no other echoes for him to catch, and there would never be.

If they want to tell bedtime stories about this too, he thought, at last. Fucking let them.

If they want a God, the Reaper had said.

"Either you do something actually useful," he spelled out. "Or you leave."

Endlessly slow, eyes on the floor, the crowd began to dissipate. Behind that wall of black and red, Madame Tanaki's tears landed on her desk, hands trembling in an interrupted reaching-out. Blood handprints were left on the glass doors; someone would have to clean those.

"Chuuya."

Distant; right there. Dazai's face was too close again and Hirotsu was dying at his feet. He nodded towards the door on the other end of the Hall — the only way to the dungeons.

"Mori is waiting for us," he said. If the wiped clean state of his face was meant to be something, Chuuya wasn't in the mood to search for answers. All he saw was blankness — it made him madder than either of them could afford.

He glanced at Tsuchiya; she was too busy and too bloodied to meet his gaze. Tell me, he found himself thinking, astonished, unfamiliar, never to be spoken out loud; never to be accepted. Tell me what to do.

"Go," Hirotsu said. Glossy eyes settled on him alone. He nodded. "Chuuya, it will be fine."

He raged. "Fuck you."

The man laughed — he coughed because of it, all red, down to the tips of his hair. "I'm truly glad you're back."

Three men in the Shadow Blade tunics had been shackled to the columns of the dungeons.

Bruises and cuts climbed all the way up their shaved heads, caves and wounds illuminated by the dim LED lights of the endlessly distant roof. Golden Demon paced the path that led from one prisoner to the other, majestic and patient, shining over the unevenly grainy stairs and painting faces on the cement — waiting for Kouyou to order the next hit.

The Executives — Ace's contemplative face observing a map precariously hung on the nearest wall; the Colonel's overly frustrated one muttering to himself; Kouyou's focused eyes studying the prisoners — surrounded Mori, hands behind his back and a somewhat uncharacteristic composure overflowing on his features.

His eyes found the two of them almost immediately. "Just in time," Boss offered, just shaken enough to appear touchable. His eyes darted to the stairs. "How's my Commander?"

"Tsuchiya Vet Version Mi will probably save him," Dazai replied, nonchalantly. "But he will need to go to the Hospital, and I can't predict how long the recovery will take. He is prone to heart failures, is he not? He might be asked not to strain himself."

Chuuya stared. "Heart failures?"

A stunned breath echoed.

The tip of Kouyou's blade touched the ground; Golden Demon disappeared into thin air with the same franticness that made the woman stride to him, eyes wide and hands outreaching. "Chuuya," she exhaled, clenching her palms around his cheeks, uncaring of the melodic whines coming from her abandoned targets. Her fingers tightened, dragging him closer, studying every inch of him. "How did you —"

If Chuuya had thought his ears were on fire before, he was quickly proven wrong. "I'm fine, Ane-san."

"I told him you weren't —" she started, before clenching her jaw. "I tried, little god."

He paused, throwing a look to Mori over her shoulder. His reaction to what sounded like a breach of authority never came. All the man did was allow a glimpse of amusement to fly by tired eyes.

"It's fine," Chuuya echoed, a little lost by the fervor. A bit lower: "It's fine. I'm not the one you owe loyalty to."

Astonishingly — a hint of protest dripped down the marble tassels of her chiseled face. Before she could open her mouth again, another voice spoke up.

"I told you he'd be just fine."

Dazai had made his way to the Boss; dark cloth and dark bruise on his cheek, nothing but a malevolent shadow to an overly powerful man. His eyes were on the prisoners already; still, it was clear he was talking to the Executive. "You should learn to trust me a bit more," he added, seemingly blind to the anger tightening the woman's grip around his face. "Ane-san."

She took a step forward. "You —"

“He got me out,” Chuuya was quick to stop her, begrudgingly. She snapped her head back to him. “He helped me escape. We had a plan. I had to gather information on — whatever it’s happening.”

“You had a plan,” she repeated, stone-faced.

“I would have told you, if I’d known someone,” He sent a pointed look to the other boy, “Wouldn’t bother to. Only Boss knew.”

“Indeed,” the man agreed. He grabbed the dossier Dazai offered him — squinting, Chuuya patted his own back, trying to recall when he’d stolen them from him. “You did an excellent job, Chuuya. I do hope the Division wasn’t too...” He laid glinting eyes on him. “Harsh?”

The question underlining the concern was all but screamed; ignoring the gaze the Colonel and Ace exchanged, he raised his head: “They didn’t get anything out of me,” He rubbed the lingering blood off the cut on his cheek; Dazai’s eyes zeroed right there. “We might receive some complaints about my escape. I did not exactly — hold back.”

Even without bringing up Arahabaki and his sudden protectiveness, Mori seemed to understand what he meant about the torture. He nodded, clearly satisfied; then, offered him a hand.

“Let us start, then,” he beckoned, knocking knuckles on the map of the city. “You certainly have some catching up to do.”

Chuuya bowed.

The facts were: Hirabayashi Mitsuru, ninety three years old, born and resident in Yokohama, had died of natural causes the night of September 15th — mere minutes before an Agent had broken into Chuuya’s interrogation room and dragged Minami away. The facts were: for some reason, mere hours after the woman had died, every syndicate in the city had perked up — and the Shadow Blade, in particular, had broken a treaty not yet been finalized.

“My most competent commander was an obvious target,” Mori explained, staring down the prisoners. Golden Demon had appeared again; her swords tickled the men’s chins, ineluctable eyes drinking the blood staining their shredded tunics. “They know conflict is coming. They hit our most notorious battalion — both to cripple us, and to send out a message.”

“The Black Lizards aren’t prone to accepting new commanders,” Ace frowned. “They’ll need whoever might temporarily take his place to prove their competence. And few men in the organization have the same strategic prowess as Hirotsu.”

“We can expect more attacks, starting from tonight,” The Colonel had moved to stand behind him; Chuuya was startled by his subtle motions. “They will not waste time. And with Nakahara back, and this attack — the treaty is as good as destroyed. The Moons will move.”

“The treaty was never going to happen,” Kouyou replied, snapping her fingers. Golden Demon sunk her blade into one of the Blades’ sides, ripping a shriek out of his mouth. Over the screams, she added: “The Moons knew it very well. And the Division can’t be trusted. No temporary peace is worth an Ability Permit.”

“I have reasons to believe Chuuya would have been, though,” Dazai commented. Every thread in his skull pulled, begging him to cut them off. “For some absurd, masochistic reason, they really want him.”

“We will discuss Chuuya and the Permit another day,” Mori intervened, halting their screaming match before it could start. “We need to worry about this issue, for now. The situation will escalate. It has the potential to become bigger than even the Nine Rings Conflict.”

Ace tapped away on his phone. “The Hounds and the Black Widows have engaged in a shout-out near the Ishikawachō Station,” he reported. “And — my men believe Takasekai might have started their march.”

“The Shadow Blade is planning to attack the Bishop’s Staff,” Kouyou said, kneeled in front of one of the prisoners, fingers digging deep into a wound on his chest. “They want to take back their hostages and take them out from the competition in one single hit.”

“I hardly believe the KK Company hasn’t acted yet,” the Colonel muttered. “Those bastards smell money like bloodhounds. They will surely initiate conflict with the Temple, and GSS won’t stay put. Their borders are too close.”

Chuuya was fed up. “I don’t understand.”

Dazai’s only visible — real — eye brushed the inside of his head. “How surprising.”

“I will make Golden Demon gut you,” he threatened. Dragging his eyes back to Mori, he insisted: “Why did this grandma’s death alert the entire underworld?”

“You must have heard of Hirabayashi,” Mori answered. “If not in the Sheep, then the Flags must have mentioned her at least once. She was known as the Daikokuten of the Underworld.”

Surprise tore an exclamation out of him. “That’s who died?”

The Daikokuten of the Underworld — as most men who wouldn’t risk taunting the woman’s name with their disgusting tongues, as Pianoman had put it, referred to her as — was Yokohama’s blood-richest heiress; the safe-keeper of a fortune so endless many stories had been spread across the underground, all too keep the real sum a secret.

The so called deity of fortune and wealth was the daughter of a peace treaty between two of the most prolific and vicious syndicates of the pre-war Yokohama; her first decision as a leader of that new union, had been to disband the two organizations — focusing only on the accumulation of ancient fortunes.

Her decision had both freed Yokohama from one of its biggest predators, making way for the current syndicates, and created a cult of sort around her person: the Daikokuten had sworn to never marry and never have children, spending every day of her life growing the fortune she would one day leave to the claws of the underground of her beloved city.

She said she would make a game out of it, Pianoman had explained, counting fake banknotes — never licking his fingers to do so, because that denoted unfamiliarity to richness, Chuuya, yeah? — and fighting over his next drink with Iceman. The money would go to whatever organization would be worthy enough to seize it, and to keep it. The nutcase wanted afterlife entertainment.

For all that money?, Albatross had huffed. I'll wear a maid dress and dance along with the Colonel's physarmony.

“How much?” Chuuya asked, before his brain could catch up with the information. “How much did she leave?”

Mori exhaled, curling his fingers together. “Five hundred billion yen. More or less.”

Electricity tickled the air, only partly blamed on the flickering led lights. The Colonel whistled, low and impressed, sharing a surprisingly complacent look with Kouyou. Even Ace — nevermind the distracted way his finger was tracing some bracelet carved in gemstones on his wrist — seemed impressed.

Next to Mori, Dazai tilted his head from one side to the other, shaking nonexistent water out of it. “That’s a shame. I bet Odasaku it would be at least a dozen hundred more.”

“That’s,” Chuuya searched for a term that would not reek of street-kid, and came up empty. “A fuck ton of money.”

“Most certainly,” the Boss agreed.

A new voice peeked from behind his legs. “Enough for at least five dollhouses.”

“Elise!” Dazai exclaimed, crouching down to wiggle his eyebrows in her face. “There you are. What would you say, if I told you it’s even enough for six of them?”

The girl *humpf-*ed, caressing her crimson gowns — the same shade of the blood Kouyou was still dutifully extracting from her prisoners’ insides. “Money is stupid. Asking for things you want is much easier.”

“Every syndicate in the city will start a riot to get that large of a sum,” Chuuya concluded, disbelieving. “It could be a conflict out of any proportion we’ve ever witnessed. No alliances, no clear battlefields, no anything,” Excitement mixed with concern — some of it his, some of it not, some of it undistinguished. “Was the hag out of her mind, or did she want to go out with a metaphorical boom?”

“We can only assume,” Ace shrugged. “Still, it’s not a matter of thought. We will get that money. No one but the greatest syndicate in the city should gain control over such a prize. Correct, Boss?”

For a single moment, shorter than a blink — he thought the man might say no. That he'd laugh one of his cynical croaks, shake his head, say, no, we will watch them massacre each other. He couldn't quite decide if it would be uncharacteristic or not.

"Obviously," Mori said. Stunningly — expected, nonetheless, in some corner of him — he turned his gaze to Dazai, then moved it to Chuuya himself. "Our shadows will win the prize for us."

With no preemptive explanation, Dazai cleared his throat. "Give me a day, I suppose. I'll find you her base."

"How foolish would it be, to assume she might keep the data to her fortune in her home?" Ace intervened.

"Very much so," the Colonel scoffed. "I'm willing to bet half of the syndicates are already on their way to the villa. The old woman wanted entertainment — she must have chosen an obvious place to start the race, but not that obvious."

"There's only so many locations," the boy shrugged. "Chuuya and I will retrieve the codes, and then it'll be only a matter of keeping them close. I believe it's safe to assume the conflict will be a maximal version of Capture the Flag."

Elise gasped, clapping excitedly. "Yes!"

Chuuya, who had kept silent, raised a hand. "I don't think a day will be necessary."

A petulant sigh left Dazai's mouth. Finger poking the cut on his cheek, he explained: "I'm more than flattered by your faith in my abilities, partner, but even the smartest creatures —"

"No," he cut him off, slapping his hand away. "I know where the hag left the codes."

Even Kouyou turned to stare. "What?"

"The Sheep were very interested in the prospect of earning that much money without doing anything," he answered the collective choir. "We lived off stolen goods — that fortune would have kept us afloat for years. We spent months investigating."

I spent months investigating, he corrected, in the private space of his own skull. He'd refused to sit and wait, lunging in the certainty that when the day would come, violence would have been the only thing to matter. If the other syndicates wanted to save the questions for when it would be too late, they could. The Sheep didn't have their funds; the Sheep didn't have their weapons; the Sheep didn't have territory in the upper city. The Sheep only had Chuuya.

"I even considered killing the grandma, at some point," he recalled. "But it didn't seem like a large-scale war would have been a wise move."

"How surprising," Dazai muttered. "Rationality."

An overly bright glint flashed in Mori's eyes. "This is certainly lucky. And where are the codes?"

Chuuya stepped forward, leaning his hands on the rough surface of the map. The territory of the Port Mafia had been highlighted in a thick red line, dots caging the coast by the hook of the Sankeien Garden, spreading throughout part of Yokohama Chinatown, and building its borders near their own Hospital. It was, if not the largest, among the widest sheets of land the underground held in the city.

He tapped the scarlet mark with one index. “Here is the first one,” he said. His finger slid down, tracing the less vivid line of Takasekai’s borders. “And here’s the second. The third, the fourth —” He traced invisible Xs down the map, touching every clear perimeter of the Five Moons. “And fifth. I’m pretty sure it was six codes, before the Nine Rings went to hell. But they’re five.”

“That’s cheating,” Dazai intervened. “You read that in the dossiers from the Special Division.”

“The documents confirmed it,” he insisted, with a dirty glance, before focusing on Mori again. “The Colonel is right. If she wanted the conflict to begin, she couldn’t make this the world’s greatest treasure hunt. It’s keeping the prize that will be difficult. She paid attention to whoever held the reins of the city, and she made it so that at least one part of the puzzle fell in the hands of every major syndicate.”

The Boss hummed. Tracing the dotted lines with inscrutable eyes, he admitted: “It would force all the major organizations to join the conflict.”

“It still doesn’t change the fact that we don’t know where our own code is,” Ace pointed out.

“But it shrinks the field,” Dazai replied, Squinting at the map, he added: “Actually, I think —“

It was Arahabaki, who was nothing at all, who felt it.

Side effects were side effects — among them were scars, and among scars there were marks that were more than dead skin. Spiders crawled under the most naked layer of his skin, lighting his frame up in the same shade of Elise’s cheeks; vicious, his head snapped to the boulders the prisoners were shackled to.

The Blade Kouyou had her hands deep into clenched his fist, fixing his grip on a bracelet around his wrist. A mechanical beep shattered the silence — his bloodied jacket seemed to swell, then exhale.

Chuuya’s lips parted. It was Dazai’s voice to call: “Ane —“

Snapshot flashed his mind to the point of blindness — a hand on his upper arm, his own fingers tightening around bandages, both pulling, both pushing. Mori’s voice speaking the unspeakable; the Colonel’s Ability turning the ground into liquid; the world exploding in golden.

Through the glittering white and yellows and red, and his ringing ears, he thought he heard Elise laugh; right as the dungeons blew —

[...gone? What do you mean he's gone?

(He escaped).

You allowed the Port Mafia to regain A5158 in the middle of the deadliest conflict we —

— there's water everywhere.

In his nostrils, in his eyes, in the wounds he cannot remember being inflicted, in the wounds he cannot feel any longer, in the wounds he never had. It works in flickers; the impact makes his whole body tingle and his ears pop; when they pull him back by the hair, all he sees is black.

It's the familiarity of it that startles him.

Feelings are to be shared with the god in his chest — but whether floating is a god's memory or a boy's nightmare, the pull and drag does not give him time to understand it. He recalls tubes sticking out of his throat, weightless limbs swimming in a place smaller than any contained bomb should be allowed. He doesn't fear not breathing; he fears the ease of it.

A mother's womb, he thinks. Familiar, in its simplicity, because not human —

[...what? Yuan, is that — What? Stop screaming. What is going on? Who? Yuan. Yuan?
Yuan, answer the —]

— Albatross is a weight on his legs, and a curse on his lips.

He's in his apartment, hands on his photographs — or he's on the ground in the Old World, hands stained in blood, the epicenter of devastation, the very picture of gulped down guilt. There are too many corpses, too many photos; he speaks to the ones who stubbornly cling to oxygen — just not stubbornly enough.

Sorry I broke into your place, he says, to the bubbles and the metal edge of a cage. Sorry I killed you.

Albatross is a weight on his legs, and he is angry. He is angry. He is always angry. You should try it, sometimes, Doc had told him, and he wonders, are you proud? Are you proud? Do you regret?

A picture, he thinks. A child holding a man's hand, breaking the oceanic horizon in two. A father and a son and a tank filled with poison.

There is water —

[Yes, sir. I apologize. We... We will deal with the problem. But — Have you considered my idea?

(Not yet)

Yes, sir.

(Let us hope — Sakaguchi, let us hope it doesn't get to that).

Yes, sir.]

— His phone had yet to stop buzzing.

“Are you absolutely sure you don't need a check up, sweetie?” the nurse insisted. His whole demeanor was a painful show of carefulness, anxious caves under the bluish half-busted lights. “Your concern for your sister is more than touching, but she wouldn't want you to risk an infection —“

Not my sister; traced his lips, unwilling to focus on it. Instead, Chuuya replied: “I'm not going to get anything. Are you done asking?”

Truly, he wasn't worse off than he had been after his escape — five, six hours ago? The night felt never ending; the streets were sagged with intention and lights, as if Yokohama had perceived the beginning of something even before the blood started flooding the streets.

Bruises and cuts and cuts and bruises; Chuuya would heal. A mixture of Tainted and Dazai's reflexes had saved them both from most of the consequences of the explosion — seemingly more cheerful than ever, apart from the bleeding scratches on his face and the broken veins in his only visible eye, the boy was flirting his way into information with one of the other nurses.

It was an uncomfortable sight.

Not quite because Dazai wasn't into it — the day Dazai wasn't into charming women for a purpose and for his own eyes, the sky would fall — but mostly because he seemed to be a bit too much into it, for it to be another a mere date asked to the nearest beauty. Hands tight around the plastic seat his legs were bouncing against, Chuuya tried to keep his eyes on the wall.

Devouring, Mori would have said, is easier from up close.

It was something Dazai did with ease. One more chance to find a partner for my romantic suicide, he would tell him. Chuuya wanted to go up there and punch him, repeatedly and painfully — right until he'd get the nauseating nothing out of his features.

Rows and rows of suited men standing guard at the beginning of the hallway waited, politely, for the worst to happen. A floor and a flock to each Executive, and one for the Commander; only the Colonel had been left mostly unscathed, and Mori was secretly licking his wounds in his own office.

We cannot let them know I was at the Hospital, he had said, as the Black Lizards dragged them out of the dungeons; a mess of lights and colors and voices, and Kouyou's blood on his hands. Bring Kouyou, Ace and the Colonel there.

Three down.

He had never seen Kouyou in a medical vest. He had never seen her in anything but her kimonos. Did she sleep in pajamas? Did she sleep at all?

"I mean," the nurse said, biting down a smile, as Dazai brought her hands to his lips. She had to be older than thirty. "I mean — oh, stop it — once this is over..."

His phone was still buzzing.

The idea of throwing it against the nearest wall was tempting, at least out of habit. The idea of throwing someone against it was even more so, but no nurse had yet pissed him off to that degree. He couldn't risk them to drag him into some hospital bed, anyway — rules were rules.

Another giggle drooled on the pavement.

He stood, roughly enough to make the plastic seat creak — the pair turned to look at him. In Dazai's gaze, he saw the bored impact of a thread being snapped — the unwillingness to grab and hold on.

"Mackerel," he ordered. "Can I talk to you for a second."

It wasn't a question, so, obviously, the boy pretended as such. It took him almost too long to sigh some sugar-sweet excuse to the woman and step into his direction; Chuuya was subjected to the eerie spectacle of his features readjusting themselves into something extremely more annoyed. When someone was quick, he thought, hard earned windows on a wall of a boy, you just had to be quicker.

"I'm working, Hatrack," Dazai said, pointedly, as soon as they reached the stone-faced guards. They hid themselves from sight only partly, standing right in front of a vending machine — the brightest source of light of the hallway. "In case you forgot, this is for your benefit. I couldn't care less about seeing Kouyou snore in a hideous hospital gown," A pause. "If she's still alive, that's it."

I don't want your help, he might have said, in another life. But Dazai enjoyed it. Dazai was also, at his core, pure manipulation under pretty eyelashes. Not like this.

He felt stupid, all of the sudden — a feeling Dazai always did his best to maximize.

The words out of his mouth weren't planned: "I kinda think she might own a Hospital kimono."

Moonlight breached through rain-filled clouds; genuine surprise made Dazai blink. Whatever he had expected him to say, it wasn't this — a feeling Chuuya always did his best to maximize.

He snorted. "Yes, I could see that."

Distant beeping machines and echoing murmurs from behind the walls; unable to beat the silence, they simply laid next to it. Chuuya leaned his shoulder against the glass of the vending machine; its sea-like glow painted landscaped on dirty bandages; the hum of the metal box bellowed down his spine.

"News about the old man?" he asked.

"Still sleeping," Dazai's eyes stayed set upon his shoulder, observing the guards. At least some of them were part of the Secret Squad; Chuuya didn't recognize any of them. Most had died during the attack on the HQ in the Nine Rings ' Conflict. He wondered if the boy had even bothered to learn the new ones' names. "Medically induced coma. They're worried his heart might not react positively to the recovery; one of the bullets grazed the aorta. He won't be up for at least three weeks."

"Three weeks?" he echoed. Recovery time was hardly longer than a week in the syndicate; after that, it was usually referred to as, suck it up and do your job. "Shit. And Boss?"

"Boss will have to allow it, if he doesn't want his best Commander to have a heart attack in the middle of a battle," The boy shrugged. "Ace's probably going to be up in a few hours. Most he's got is a broken leg and some damaged ego, which will immediately be healed once Mori lies to him and tells him he saved his life. As for Kouyou," he said, more tentatively. "They don't really know."

“She’s still in surgery?”

“No, she’s out,” Dazai shook his head. “But she’s not waking up,” He huffed an obnoxious laugh, clearly set on dying with his facade on. “She did have a crater in her chest. Look at it in a positive way, though. Maybe she was trying to remind you of your old home.”

If he stared hard enough — long enough; obsessively enough — at the ground, he mused, would it crack? Abilities were to be discovered. Perhaps gravity could reach the unreachable. Perhaps it could stop a heart without him needing to be blamed for it.

All was still. All was quiet. His ears were ringing. Chuuya was angry.

Chuuya was awake, and he was ready.

Soon, he promised, god or vessel, either one. No blood had been offered yet; it was just a matter of time. Soon, soon, soon.

“You’re a piece of shit,” he said, calm. “And I don’t care about fuck that leaves your mouth. We have more pressing matters than your entertainment.”

“That is almost always the case. Existence is not quite made for satisfaction, unfortunately,” Dazai sighed, temple against the glass, somehow looking as if he’d said exactly what he’d hoped he would. The nurse from before peeked around the corner; Chuuya stared at her until she left.

At last, the other dragged his eyes back to him, leaning a bit closer. “So. What do we do?”

He straightened.

Facades and hospital rooms and giggling smiles; Chuuya didn’t know anything about those incognitae. He was instinct on a barbed wire, always too tense, always unprepared to the silence. But this, no matter how insistently the roots of his denial spread — this, pushing his back against someone who he knew, for whatever reason, wouldn’t let the bullets hit him; bleeding the world out under the melody of synchronized minds; it’s just us — this, he understood.

“You’re the plan guy,” Chuuya said, mockingly. His hands hitched for a fight. “Whose face do I stomp to the curb?”

“Ah, but you beat me on the search for general areas of the codes,” Dazai bowed, removing his hat with a quick sweep. “Although, I do think I might know where the old hag left our own.”

He sent a half-glance to the guards behind his back, mostly inattentive. Lowering his voice, he insisted: “And?”

Dazai opened his mouth.

His phone buzzed.

“Oh, my —“ He fished the device out of his pocket, almost snapping it in two as he opened it; the too-bright display left him jaw-slacked. “What the hell is it?”

Several missed calls from every member of his squad littered the screen, all attached to each other and all followed by voicemails; Chuuya blinked at their names through the cracks on the screen, moving to the top of the bar to see the latest contact on the register.

His bones turned to dust.

“Oh,” Dazai said, blinking down. “What a coincidence.”

Chuuya was down the stairs before his feet could catch up with his mouth; he heard his lips shape some sort of order for the guards in the hallways. Fingers almost widening the cracks in the screen, he selected the contact, pressing the phone to his ear as he sprinted out of the Hospital.

“Come on,” he muttered, blind and deaf to every body he bumped against. “Come on, come on — Yuan? Yuan, what the fuck is going —“

“Chuuya?”

He stumbled, only for a moment — choked by the terrified stutter echoing in his ear. Accelerating again, he took the roundabout right outside the Hospital gates, jumping ten feet in the air to cling to the buildings. “I didn’t answer, there’s been —“ He cursed out, tightening his grip on the phone. The one time she actually called him — “What happened?”

Panicked breaths filled the silence, slightly metallic, slightly wet.

“Yuan,” he insisted. “Kid. Talk to me.”

“I didn’t — I didn’t know if you’d answer. They,” A sob. “They told me —“

“I’m fine. I’m fine, I promise, what’s —“

“There’s someone,” she whispered. It was barely loud enough to be considered words. “They have guns. I think they —“ A loud thump! stuck the words in her throat. Her voice was too echoey; she had to be hiding inside her closet. It took a moment for the words to register, too low and too nonsensical. “I think they killed the kids.”

34 missed call from: Koda Katsumi.

Chuuya’s feet touched the ground. Bile and blood were interchangeable pebbles stuck between his teeth; he bit down, uncaring of the glowing clefts tearing the ground apart. “Get something sharp and stay hidden. Do you hear me? You know how to fight. Don’t. Don’t —“

“Chuuya,” she repeated. Familiar, in its simplicity, because it was a call for help. Familiar, in its instinctiveness, because it was Yuan. “I think it’s — I t-think it’s the Bishop’s Staff.”

Utter clarity settled every teetering bone in his body. He flew higher and higher, uncaring of concrete and walls, uncaring of gravity, uncaring of most things. Fuck that, he thought to himself, calmly. Fuck that.

“It’s fine, Yuan,” he said. The oldest syllables to ever fill his mouth. “I’m coming.”

An assortment of words from the dozens and dozens of missed calls got stuck under his eyelids, haunting him with steadfast perseverance all the way to the Orphanage. We can’t leave, they said, the kids called us, they said, Chuuya, my brother, they said, can you go there, can you come here, Chuuya, answer your —

Fresh blood pooled down rusty metal, regrouping on the cold concrete, staining the wheels of half-destroyed vehicles busying the midnight street. Impaled on the higher spike of the entrance gates, sideways, was Sayari — eyes open and lifeless and green and settled on him.

Chuuya was eight — because that was what Shirase had decided — the first time he witnessed a massacre.

He remembered little of it — water and glass and neon lines of codes, the excruciating weight of unexplained vassalage; the feeling of everything in a space that could barely hold nothing, and then freedom, freedom, the sky and the sea and freedom.

With it came blood. The oldest story in the world — in the only world Arahabaki would ever consider his own — went like this: with it came blood, and with blood came I.

His soles stuck to the cement; blood was quick to dry, quicker to keep him still. There were corpses in the garden that led to the front door — small chests overflowing in bullet holes. Round faces he couldn’t have named, scarlet cheeks and glass eyes, viscera flooding the ground. Buckets of it; bottles of cat-piss perfume, the stench of rotting flesh and children’s toothpaste.

The door had been left ajar; polite, almost, in its lack of care. He had memorized the path to the kitchen the squad would lunge into for endless afternoons, planning and talking and preparing for a night at the Tournament, staring at the ceiling, Yuan’s footprints invisible but there. Walls smeared in red, destroyed furniture, corpses asleep on the couches, at the table, on the floor, on the counter.

The bodies face-to-the-ground on the stairs were probably the patrons. He had never met them. They were too big. They weren’t kids. They just shared rigor mortis and an early tombstone.

“Yuan?” he whispered. “Yuan?”

Harsh breathing. He knew it didn’t come from him; knew it had been a long time since death had managed to get such reactions out of him. One foot after the other, one climb over the children abandoned on the steps after the other; he walked the stairs, autopilot and just conscientious enough to keep Tainted in place.

Endless, endless blood was splattered on the old walls and the creaking wooden tiles of the floor, crimson turned black by the moonlight coming from a broken window. His boots sank in it. A grotesque stage occupied the highest floor; to complete it, a kneeled silhouette, head hung low, legs abandoned in those heathen lakes.

“Koda,” he called, in all the wrong tones. “Koda, you need to get up.”

The man’s smile stayed untouched.

He had worn a similar look each and every time Chuuya had sat next to him, waiting his panic attacks out, muffling the loud noises and the world as much as he could — bliss, of its own right and its own illogic. A distant gaze; hands spasming, abrupt and with no clear rhythm.

The only difference was the corpse on his lap, smashed skull tucked safely in the croak of his elbow — marble feet trapped in bloodied fingers’ motions. Uchiyama’s dinosaur themed pants were red before and ever more so now; whatever had been used to kill him, it had left a crater in his head, a chasm Koda had yet to stop running the tip of his index all over. He smiled at his brother.

Chuuya crouched down in front of him.

A corner of his mind was pushing, was pulling, was lighting up in whatever color the sunset took in Suribachi City, Yuan — a corner of his mind asked, and he denied. He crouched down in front of the first friend he’d made after the Flags were killed, and he called: “Koda, you need to move.”

“Shh,” the man warned him, as courteous as always. “Shh, don’t wake him up. You k-know how hard it is to g-g — put him to, to — sleep.”

“Koda,” he insisted. “Give it to me.”

A glint or confusion warmed an imperceptible flame in his eyes. “Him.”

“It,” Chuuya repeated, reaching out, stony, undeterred — the man was a soldier, and he might just listen to a general. “Koda, that’s a corpse. Give it to me.”

He hummed. He rocked Uchiyama’s body in his arms, once, twice — dangled and lulled and stared. A mixture of brains and viscera was slowly pooling into the dinosaur shirt. “That’s not v-very nice, Chuuya.”

“Koda,” Sharper than someone else might have — sterner than what Madame Tanaki would have thought polite; hard enough to snap his eyes to his face. “Give your brother’s corpse to me.”

That’s how you think about it, he didn’t tell him — he hoped he could make him understand; wordless but felt, wrong but necessary. All he had left behind in the Old World were corpses; all the Sheep were, was corpses; all Verlaine and Rimbaud were, was corpses. Few things interested a powerful thing more than the rotten state of mortality, and what Arahabaki didn’t see — Chuuya had less chances to feel. That’s how you remember them.

Koda didn’t move.

His mouth parted; Chuuya recalled drunken stories from his childhood — I hated how I talked, and so I never did; and now I talk all the time, because who cares — waited for him to talk — was unsurprised when he didn't.

Motionless was better than fired up, he reached out, and he picked up Uchiyama's body.

Wrong move.

The feeling of his back hitting the floor was unfamiliar; the hands tightening around his throat even more — the bloodshot eyes settled on him were a stranger's hysteria, blinking tears away too fast. "Give him back," Koda growled, whined, not noticing or not caring of his brother's corpse falling to the ground, "Give him back," he begged, almost stuttering too hard to be understandable, "Give him back!" he screeched, throttling him, and —

Through the haze of suffocation, Chuuya kicked him away. He watched him land against the wall, head first — crawl forward, stare at the corpse when Chuuya leaned down to pick it up, walking backwards — away from him.

"No," Koda croaked.

"Koda," he ordered. "I'm not taking him away. Alright? He's dead. We can't hurt him. You hear me? I'm just laying him here," The back of his knees hit the ratty old couch at the end of the hallway; he laid the corpse on the pillows, stealing one of the blankets on the back to hide the mess of Uchiyama's head. There weren't enough blankets in that Orphanage to cover up everyone — not Sayari, not the bodies on the stairs. "I'm just laying it there. You can come here. But he's dead. This is a corpse."

"Chuuya," Koda said, numbly, from the floor.

"This is a corpse," he repeated, sixteen and fifteen, in an Orphanage and a bar, and Doc had no legs, and Verlaine had Lippman in his car trunk. "I'm sorry, Koda. He's dead."

Hurried steps up the stairs — Noguchi's wide eyes and Virgil's choked sob, Kenta's silence, a crowd in that bloodied hallway, a speechless circle around Koda's fallen frame. Chuuya wanted to say something; Chuuya thought knowing death so closely should have made someone more adept to it. Chuuya wanted to say something.

It doesn't mean a thing.

"Stay with him," he said. And he hadn't checked yet, hadn't done anything more than stare at the Bishop Staff's symbol painted in blood on the ceiling, the same as a piece of skin he'd seen — and yet, he knew — "They took Yuan."

Noguchi cursed. It grew and grew in intensity, echoing off the walls, smudging the crimson lakes. His hands were tight around Koda's shoulders; his fish tattoo was all scrunched up.

He moved. He turned the corner. He had never been invited into Yuan's room, but he found it all the same, instinct over sense, as it went.

Scraped walls, a shaky bed, a destroyed plastic desk. Chuuya's jacket had been left on the flat pillow of her bed — a makeshift case for it; starkly bright and clean among the chaos of old clothes the patrons had put aside for her. An old blue bracelet on the nightstand; an unfinished pack of noodles on the floor.

Dazai, wearing his hat, leaning his upper body out of the window.

"How inconvenient," he commented, tapping his gun on the frame. "Those fanatics took our code," He sent him a glance. "And your traitor sister, I suppose."

Not my sister, Chuuya thought, for the second time in a never ending night. "The code was here."

It wasn't a question, but Dazai hummed his confirmation. "The Orphanage is in our territory, and it pays a monthly fee to us. Many bastards from upper names in the Mafia were abandoned here. It's a clever place to hide something all organizations would kill to have," He tilted his head to the side. "Or. Well. It is, if you're like the Daikokuten. Longing for some brats' viscera all over your idea. I see the appeal, but not the functionality. Dead children are dead children."

Chuuya clenched his fists until he tasted the leather. "Have some fucking respect."

Dazai turned around, offering him a furrowed brow. Confused, he asked: "They're just corpses."

He didn't know what scraped down his skeleton harder; being spied on, or the knowledge that Dazai had had no reason to observe his little show. "They weren't, once."

"Relative," was his reply. "They're corpses now, so who's to say they haven't always been? Corpses who breathed. Corpses who were waiting for this day," His eyes traced the invisible; rooms Chuuya had never even been allowed to receive an ajar-door to. "I wonder if they cried, right before it happened."

I don't think you lack morality, he recalled, nonsensically, having told him — an infinite time ago, knees deep in the snow of the cemetery. I think you lack the understanding of where to direct it. That's why you don't stop until someone tells you to.

At the heart of it, that was the problem — at the heart of it, Dazai made sense.

Chuuya stepped forward — brushed the visions of hanging knots and train rails out of his eye; pushed the mouth of the gun he'd stolen from Dazai's hands under his chin, tilting it up.

Look me in the eyes, Iceman had warned him. No one deserves your gaze more than the dying, and than your enemies. Longing, the thing in his gaze. The Demon Prodigy would never be distracted in front of a threat. The Demon Prodigy would only die when he thought so fit.

Longing.

Realization struck him like lightning.

“You knew this would happen.”

“I suspected it,” Dazai corrected, swiftly, no hesitation. “The codes being located near the main organizations was a rational hypothesis even before you confirmed it; the place itself mostly remained an incognita. Between here and the Under Port, I thought. But, then again —” He blinked, slow and wide. “The Bishop’s Staff had two fish to catch, and I bet the Daikokuten’s men knew. The Orphanage just made sense.”

Pulsing underneath — dragging him by the wrists, by the stitches he did not remember removing; choking him whenever the world tilted on its axis. Chuuya was always angry. Chuuya had never been more angry than he was now; and he would be angrier tomorrow, and the day after it, and the day he died for it, with it — because of it.

“We were at the Hospital,” he spelled out, tortuous and sharp between his teeth, “For hours.”

“Don’t take it personally,” Dazai said, flippantly. “If I had told you, we would have never known whether the code was here or not. We have no way of figuring out how it’s hidden — it’s much easier to have somebody else understand it, and steal it from them. You would have ran here and alerted them, killing the Staff, too,” He snapped his tongue against his palate, dragging it across the metal braces on his teeth. A child who kills children, Minami had called him.

“To have been the first to figure out where the codes were, it means they have people who know more than we do. Specifically, how to find the code. Information I will personally rip out of those masks of theirs. And, well,” He shrugged. “You’re not very good at taking prisoners. You have a thing for leaving bodies behind.”

“They’re not even here!” Chuuya snarled, uncaring of how loud his voice echoed against those grieving walls. “You didn’t gain shit. I could have told the kids to escape —”

“I didn’t know the Staff would go straight for massacre. They could have left them alone. I doubt some noisy children would have stopped them from finding the codes — but they would have been suspicious, if they hadn’t found anyone —”

“Fuck that, as if you —” Favoritism made no sense. Chuuya would have alerted them all — he couldn’t have saved a few and damned the others. And yet — “Yuan and Koda —”

“I’m sorry about his brother,” Dazai said, unconcerned and deeply sincere. “It’s a shame he got caught in the crossfire. But the codes aren’t just left around. The Daikokuten was an Ability User. This is the confirmation we needed that the Bishop’s Staff knows how to recover them.”

Chuuya stared.

At the heart of it, that was the problem — at the heart of it, Dazai made sense.

But that wasn’t the problem, he knew. It was simply the facts. The problem was Chuuya himself — and whatever meaning someone would some day give to the understanding he couldn’t help but feel for the worst person he knew. Deep down, he’d sworn, you and I are the same. Just don't kill the kids, he reminded himself. Just don't kill the kids. Just don't kill the kids.

You're a child who kills children, Agent Minami had said. That can't feel good, can it?

Chuuya pushed him off, watching him stumble. He wondered what it felt like — jumping down and not worrying about calculating the landing. He wondered if the glass shards he had stuck on him at the Gentleman's Bar had scarred; if Dazai had ever figured out that Chuuya feared wounding him beyond either of their salvations. Wondered whether even an inch of Dazai cared about his anger; if he witnessed it with the same blankness he gave to everything that did not resemble his own carcass.

I want him dead, he thought.

Not every day, but every instant. Chuuya wanted to bite his blood until he found something real — wanted him to hurt because of it, the way humans did. He had wanted him dead from the first moment he'd made him bleed. The dead did not give a shit, and Dazai existed for the Port Mafia, and the Port Mafia existed for him.

I will kill you myself, he decided, then and there, in the devastated roads of his brother's wake — in the rubbles of Suribachi City — between the Sheep's whispers about intruders on the border. No one but me.

“Go die,” Chuuya concluded. Hirotsu and Kouyou and all of them — there was no time. “And then do the one thing you're useful for.”

Hilarity pulled the sides of Dazai's face atrociously. “Being?”

He stuck his chin up. “Give me a plan.”

Something a bit more honest darkened his sole eye.

From the open door, Koda's screams floated inside, glass shards on paper — vocal chords wasted on those who would not return. That is a corpse, he reminded himself. These are all corpses. You're not. You don't get to.

“The hag got what she wanted,” Endlessly calm, Chuuya set his eyes on the pink cellphone buried underneath the debris of Yuan's fallen desk. “War is on. We're destroying the Four Moons.”

agent minami: we have files on arahabaki with your face on it. we have literal videos of you walking on walls upside down chuuya, playing the long game: that's not me i don't have a face

Daikokuten: a syncretic Japanese deity of fortune and wealth.

hey there guys! hope you're having a good day, and thank for you reading! we're nearing the end of the second arc, and we're finally entering the Dragon Head Conflict era! which means we're nearing cool things as the Double Black era, some initial resolution to the executive position challenge, and some more stuff that i can't wait to show you!

one thing i spent a lot of time on on this chapter was that last bit with chuuya and koda. i'm always very curious about the way chuuya seems to deal with grief in canon — a constant moving on, without ever lingering on how it makes him feel. he compartmentalizes by fixing the situation to the best of his abilities (hence, immediately joining adam to defeat verlaine before the flags' funeral was even over). to him, i feel, it's more about what can be done after a person is already done for. that's why he's trying to put koda on a "that's a dead body you're holding" mentality; he doesn't want to risk him to get trapped in a cycle chuuya himself has never let himself feel.

i've taken a bad habit of posting these chapters right before i have to do something really urgent, which means i'm gonna post this and run immediately. as always, thank you so so so much for the love on the last few chapters, and thank you so much for every kudos and every comment you'll want to give this one! i hope you have a wonderful day, stay warm!

see you <33

LIKE

Chapter Summary

There was a rusty basketball hoop on one end of the abandoned gym.

Chapter Notes

see you at the end! :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xix.

---

There was a rusty basketball hoop on one end of the abandoned gym.

“You suck at this,” Chuuya informed, as he jumped bored circles around the shaking man. The seat they had tied him up on was covered in pencil scribbles; it was the only surviving furniture at the dead center of that too wide room. His name was the only information Dazai hadn’t yet managed to obtain.

“Look at this,” the boy insisted. Clothes stained in crimson, he clumsily ran across the moonlight painting the floor from the shattered windows, for the seventh time — and threw the ball.

It bounced off the square, landing almost close enough to smack his forehead.

“Great job,” Chuuya complimented, sour.

He had spent the summer slipping down the stone stairs of the dungeons, bothering Kouyou about problems she couldn't resolve and offering his own solutions — good ones, she would tell him. A little too good to deserve such oxymoronic judgements — but most sports weren't quite his thing.

On the seat, the man cried out like a child.

“Referring to you as The Fanatic is not particularly flattering,” Chuuya mused, scratching his head with the gun Dazai had thrown at him before venturing off. “What have you got to lose?”

“Face, probably,” the boy replied, making his way to them, proud. His chest and upper arms were a slaughtered victim; blood dripping from his nails and dirtying his bandages.

“T-Told — “ Coagulations of blood dripped from the man's chin, landing on his tunic in a mixture of red, drool and vomit. “Told — everything, told, please , I —“

“Yes, yes,” Dazai confirmed, hurriedly. “We have established that. Your name would be a nice conclusion to this miserable pantomime, though.”

“Please, please, please please please —“

Humming, he pulled the man's broken fingers, an unenviable copy to Madame Tanaki's efforts to crack her knuckles in the morning. The man shrieked; experimentally, pale hands pressed right where the bone had shattered.

“Didn't he say he's from Okinawa?” Chuuya spoke up, once the perpetual screams started grating on his nerves. His cigarette was halfway done, similarly to the endless reports from his squad he was still boredly skimming through. “If he's not Sachiko , he's Fumiko. If he's not either, it's still irrelevant,” He paused. “Aren't pantomimes the plays where no one talks?”

“Irony flies right over your tiny head once again.”

“Can you hurry up and kill him?”

The bundle of black eyes and bleeding cuts snapped his attention to him, betrayed. “You — You said —“

“Masako is a strong contender, as well,” Dazai commented. “Did you know,” he drawled, spinning once, “That Hirose Fumiko is originally from the Okinawa Prefecture?”

“She's actually not.”

“Bet you three rounds at Motor Race she is,” he replied, like Chuuya hadn't been avoiding him whenever work wasn't inescapable. Bet you the skin of your teeth, he couldn't say, because Mori would execute them both if they dared to start another fight in the middle of that mess.

“Bet you Kazuko's next rat she's not. ”

He licked blood off his fingers, salts on chips and little table manners. He hadn't slept in two days, Chuuya knew — neither of them had touched a crumb of food since the bread they'd stolen from a street the KK Company had bombed. Deaf to the prayers the prisoner kept directing to him, Dazai tapped the heel of his shoe against one of the legs of his chair, pensive.

"Now that I think about it," he concluded, stretching on the ball of his feet. "I don't think you've been quite clear about where we'll be able to find your syndicates' codes."

Midnight had barely ticked the metal clock at the edge of Yamashita Park when they left, abandoning the man in a puddle of his own gravity-imploded brains. Gasoline they had strategically placed all around the city was added to the puddles inside the gym; Hirotsu's lucky lighter number five was thrown.

Then they stood, watching the first flames embrace the old box.

Chuuya's cigarette was stolen from his hands, caged by withered lips he'd shattered himself after a particularly nasty disagreement. Their shoes left matching scarlet footprints on the concrete. Silent and empty roads welcomed them; the News were still cautious to define the latest underworld conflict an emergency, but Yokohama wasn't blind enough not to recognize the taste of the storm.

One or two attacks involving civilians could be justified; Chuuya knew they wouldn't know what to do with the blood readying to accompany falling leaves — impending; breathing down the city's neck. Doom was already there; it was simply satisfied with the alleys, for now.

"Kingstain," Dazai said, boredly.

He hadn't needed to be told, and he made sure to let him know. Raising his hand to the right, Chuuya closed a fist around a rifle's quick-sequence bullets, clenching the other one around the boy's tie — choking him, he hoped, as he pulled him down, away from the next round. He threw his loot in the air — kicked it to the window of the skyscraper at the end of the street.

"You can take care of the rest on your own," Dazai announced, ages later, tapping away on his phone. The side of his shoe tapped against his own. "Do your best to crash that tacky motorcycle of yours into a wall."

"Jump off a bridge and land on wet concrete," Chuuya replied, ripping the burned out cigarette from his lips. He stepped on it; left.

Cautiousness suited Yokohama in the way of autumn. The fogged up windows were a crime scene; the freedom of roaming through abandoned streets with his bike was a breath of beauty — driving up walls and down unpaved roads; flying, when he got bored enough — and the all-but-gentleness he showed to a dead man's last action of giving.

Why the clothes from your funeral?, Mori had asked him, somewhat too deep in his war mentality to muster up a grin. Along with the beginning of September, the heat had left his ice skin once and for all, and he'd resolved to change his clothes again. I sincerely hope you're not intending to die just now, Chuuya.

His or theirs, as Arahabaki might have mustered up. Blood tasted all the same.

A stolen vehicle was parked near the main entrance of the Church. To its credit, it didn't bear any faults or telltales — except for the fact that only one person Chuuya knew would have picked a '67 Chevrolet to hot-wire in the middle of the night.

"Did you get it?" Noguchi asked, as soon as he entered his visual field. Chuuya felt no need to squat behind the car with him, having already located every single sniper the Bishop's Staff had placed in the heart of their territory. "Is she okay? The codes —"

"The answer's the same," he grunted, squinting at the ajar doors of the Church. None of the snipers was moving a finger. "We need to get in."

It was an astonishingly — suspicious to the point of bizzarity — easy feat.

The Church was as empty and dark as it had been on his first visit — men in the traditional white-and-gray tunics littered the road outside, but not one of them was standing guard in front of the doors, or between the vacant pews upon the stained-windows-painted floor. Silver masks kept their lifeless eyes on him — but never raised their hands to stop their stride to the building.

At the dead center of the altar was a wooden seat, with dried blood on its legs and shackles wrapped all around it. On the seat, in the muddy snow dress of the ghost she was, was Yuan.

"Leave," she stuttered, the moment she saw them. Trails of red and blue had turned her round face into a canva. The glint in her eyes was defiant; no tears down her cheeks. "Leave, leave, you can't —"

"Shut the fuck up, kid," Noguchi snapped. He was already halfway down the aisle when she screamed, again: "I can't give them to you!"

"Who cares about the codes, just let me —"

Yuan kept protesting, kicking when he got too close. Yuan kept her eyes on him.

Along to rumble down his spine, Chuuya breathed.

On the far left corner of the Church, the green dot of light from a camera blinked at him, mocking. There were no guards inside; there was no need for them. There was no need to take either of them down — they wanted them to see. They had regained their lost prisoner, and instead of sticking her in one of their beds again, they'd put her on display and caged her — cheap handcuffs; the kind she knew how to escape in less than a blink. No fear that they might leave that site with a prize, because — "Noguchi," Chuuya called. "Step away from her."

The man turned a stupefied look to him, hands halfway to the chains around her wrists.
“What?”

“Chuuya,” Her voice was a prayer. She knew he’d understood; she knew he hadn’t come to save her. “Chuuya, I’m sorry, they —“

[“Your girl has the codes,” the prisoner said, between his shattered bones and the bandages mocking his bleeding flesh. “The Bishop’s Staff’s — and the Port Mafia’s”].

“Noguchi,” he echoed. “Step away from her.” Somewhere behind the camera, a hand moved away from the trigger. “She has bombs strapped on.”

---

...

---

Encrypted SDUP Line:

Requesting Access: D0156, S. A.

On the matter of the “Dragon Head Conflict”

To the righteous Commander Santoka,

It would appear that, at last, A0000 and A5158 managed to do what our intelligence was unable to. The answer to our ‘how and where’ questions laid in the Bishop’s Staff, specifically in whom they have referred to as Prisoner 117 — a girl from the now disbanded Sheep, who A5158 has been secretly harboring in the last month and a half. Information on the Daikokuten and her Ability was researched tirelessly by our men; A0000 came to the right conclusions about this whole ordeal in astonishingly little time. As my previous reports have stated, he is someone we might need to keep a closer eye on than even A5158. Luckily, I had a somewhat — fateful encounter, with both him and B3234. I will disclose more on who I have decided to refer to as, “The Friends”, in my next report.

“Uchide No Kozuki”, the woman’s Ability, is described in our files as “the Ability to hide a secret inside a person, so that no one but them will remember what they have been told.” We have spent the last few weeks trying to understand how such an Ability might have helped her spread the five codes to her fortune; our conclusion is: it wasn't just her.

With the help of one of her closest men, an Ability User himself, she managed to locate what the Bishop's Staff's member A0000 and A5158 tortured called "people of interest". This man's Ability allows him to study a subject's mind and find those who make up, as said, a point of interest for them. As we know, the Daikokuten organized her game until the last moments of her life; the young shadows of the Port Mafia seem to believe this User noticed a shared person of interest between A5158 and the Leader of the Bishop's Staff — Prisoner 117 and took advantage of it.

According to A5158's reports, the girl — Yuan; no traceable lineage or Abilities — is being held captive in the Bishop's Staff's base, strapped to several bombs ready to blow both her and any knowledge of the codes up, should the Port Mafia or any other organization so much as dare trying to free her. Thei Bishop's Staff's confidence worries me; more-so, because the Port Mafia will not react to it in kind.

The stalemate will be all but peaceful. I can hardly predict what battlefield they will choose to fight on, now that the codes are unavailable; I can presume they will both turn their attention to the missing codes, as of now. Takasekai have already obtained their own; their person of interest, as A0000 reported, is no one less than their own leader.

[...]

You might have noticed my choice to refer to this upcoming war as "the Dragon Head Conflict". I did not do so out of any poetic sense. According to A0000 and A5158, this is the mark the Daikokuten's Ability leaves on those who receive her "secrets" — a dragon-head shaped scar. One thing is for sure: war has come, and we cannot stop it. All we can do is sit back and observe.

My greatest worry, as of now, is A5158. With the help of A0000, I fear they might —

[...]

In hopes of better times,

Sakaguchi Ango.

86 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

Abilities exist, and that's that.

No one had ever felt the need to offer reconfirmation on the structure of the world. The before was the before — a time when Chuuya had roamed through the debris and the side effects of his own being, and he had assumed everyone could fly.

The existence of difference does not equal a debacle, Mori had explained, once, studying the hems of new clothes for Elise. Difference simply is. We live with it, and we breathe with it, and we'll die with it.

“This is how we win,” the former doctor said. “By having what they do not.”

The oldest story in the Port Mafia ended in obvious conclusions: Abilities flourished in the syndicate because they were unquestioned, and the syndicate flourished because its enemies hadn't been smart enough to nurture the most venomous souls the world had to offer.

Nonetheless.

In an unrestrained war against stubborn men and never ending metal, Abilities were an advantage and a crimson brush — but not an end to the sentence.

“It's hard to stop, once you begin,” the Colonel offered, silver platter for dripping viscera. He joined him in the eye of the hurricane, ruined shoes sinking in the blood racing to the sewer grates at the end of the street. “Finding a reason to becomes an uninteresting feat.”

Wherever he turned was a corpse. He played pick and choose — kept his eyes on the closest of them, hanging from the roof of a car with dislocated arms and imploded eye sockets. His cellphone had been ringing non-stop ever since Chuuya had stepped in.

More, the other living thing in his ribcage encouraged, rarely left unsatisfied, growing spoiled in those days of caresty in all but blood. More of it.

“It's just easy,” Chuuya replied.

He snapped his fingers to direct Virgil and Rin to the cargo of weapons bearing the Shadow Blade logo. Their person of interest was one of their most high-level merchants, according to the voices; the plan was to shoot in the dark until they found him. Any other plan had the same premise.

“Bloodthirst?” the Colonel asked.

What a wasted word, he thought, and didn't say. Philosophy belonged to different times; to moments in a library of books he would pretend he wasn't interested in. What a wasted word, when they don't know a thing of it.

“Killing,” Chuuya corrected. He sent a quick glance to the man. “Talent ain’t a matter of eagerness for violence. People do what they’re good at.”

He hummed. “Do you believe yourself talented?”

“Did you believe yourself a good soldier?”

“Not by choice.”

“And a mafioso?”

“Oh,” The Colonel nudged a dead woman’s head with his foot, studying her lacks — judgemental before any creature in the afterlife had a chance to. “Wasting all that bloodthirst seemed like a bad deal.”

Some alleys away, where the flesh wouldn’t be smelled, police sirens shattered the silence. Yokohama and its underworld had lost all modesty once the News had begun to show off their filth to cautious civilians — but being caught red handed still went against the Port Mafia’s code.

Chuuya barked out orders to the suited silhouettes he had stunningly witnessed orbiting around him after Kouyou’s temporary departure. He didn’t wonder about the Colonel’s sudden interest. He let him observe the wounds gravity could leave on a body — let him trace the sound of his instructions; let him stand next to him when he abandoned a man’s open jaw on the curb and kicked.

“I have received reports about a User,” the Colonel spoke up. “He attacks with preciseness; because of his Ability, he prefers to haunt the aftermaths of tragedies.”

Chuuya frowned. “What’s his Ability?”

“He reopens every wound whoever he touches has ever been inflicted. Every scar, every cut, every bullet hole — all of it, all at the same time,” the Colonel murmured. Chuuya, very calmly, pretended not to pause. The Wound Reaper from the Division. “It’s certainly vicious. I just came back from the Port. We lost the 37th battalion because of him.”

How did he escape?, he wondered. Then, stilling — Why would they let him out?

“But the 37th wasn’t at the Port.”

“No,” the Colonel confirmed. “Which means there’s at least two powerful User we need to worry about. I have yet to receive warnings about others.”

His frame was endless; Chuuya recalled meeting him for the first time, neck tingling with stretch and irritation, unwilling to tilt to meet his eyes for the sake of studying his raw disapproval.

Was that all he needed to do?, he wondered. Had flooding the streets with blood been enough to chain Noguchi to his graces — had allowing Tainted to roam freely through the embers been enough to get the Executive to offer him respect?

You're late, he didn't say. I have killed before I knew how.

“Abilities will win this war, Nakahara,” he said, eventually, pointedly. “And Abilities will lose it.”

The oldest story in the Sheep went like this:

A child was powerful. Before he was that, though, he was treacherous in nature — and thus, made for distrust and tight embraces. Only few certainties made him; unfortunately, the ones the child believed and the ones his cellmates believed did not match. The child would not have ran, embrace or not embrace; the child would have won.

All of it.

(The Flags had no stories, because there was no time for origins from something so short-lived. The oldest story in the Flags went like this: there was a boy, and he never allowed any stories to be written).

“No need to worry,” Chuuya concluded, always a keen listener. “People will win you this war. I’m sure the blood will still be plenty.”

---

...

---

85 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

The oldest story went:

People started wars they could not end, and people fought until something — more endless than they would ever be — got bored of it all.

War came the way all did: ungentle and bright.

Whatever order might have sneaked through the weeks of the Nine Rings' Conflict, it refused to grace the streets of Yokohama once again. Attacks came sporadically, either right at the borders of the territory, or in distinctively public areas, uncaring of the number of citizens involved in the massacres — highways at night, interior parking lots in the afternoon, parks and lowly apartment complexes in the middle of the day; whatever place might distract a syndicate long enough to sneak through their land and search for their people of interest.

“Our first target is Takasekai,” Mori explained, to the Colonel and Ace — to Chuuya and Dazai, half behind a column, half too wired up to pretend they weren’t listening. “The Bishop’s Staff is holding both our and their codes hostage; we will take care of them once we’ve gained the remaining three codes.”

“Our first target is the Shadow Blade,” he overheard Dazai tell his Secret Force, seemingly uncaring of whether the shootout between the Black Widow and the Hounds would end up taking him out, too. “But let no one know.”

Consequently, Chuuya stood in front of Kouyou’s subordinates and said: “Our first target is the KK Company.”

Unclear as the lines of the conflict were, murmurs spoke louder than any bomb left in the generals’ cars; as open fire as that war was, none of the organizations had any intention of braving the Port Mafia alone. Smaller syndicates united temporarily to march against the Four Moons; the Four Moons wasted more bullets than even the depths of the bay had ever seen between each other. The Port Mafia stood, waited, and pointed weapons on every single one of them.

Chuuya had never felt more alive.

It would have made Detective Murase frown, he thought.

Perhaps he’d been waiting for it. Death was not a welcomed friend; but conflict kept him alive. Perhaps he’d been chained up too tight on his own bones, stuck with a being who was not allowed to scream.

Whoever you fire against, the voices said, never fire against gods.

But there was only one, and the entire city was waiting to see him bleed.

The Four Moons had witnessed his return with hesitant looks and clenched weapons; the startlement he’d caused by activating Tainted in front of their confident steps had almost healed all frustration from the weeks at the Special Division Headquarters. An entire wing of men had been annihilated with the ease of crooking fingers, too busy pointing their weapons to Dazai, uncaring of the boy whose Ability they hadn’t seen.

“Good job,” Mori said.

Anonymity was mostly lost; Chuuya was too recognizable. And so the voices followed; whoever you fire against, never fire against him.

More, Arahaki replied, simply. More.

Yes, he thought. Transactionality and divine understanding — no reason not to tie their existences together by the neck, when the race would bring enough blood for both of them. Yes, all of it.

And so he moved.

---

...

---

81 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

The Hospital was drowned in flames on the coldest day of the new season.

In response to it, an Infirmary was set up in the middle floor of Building One, and filled with wide eyed doctors and nurses whose features slowly began to fall, the more bodies crossed the doorframe.

[In response to it, Chuuya and one of Ace's squad were tasked with rolling Kajii's bombs down the path of the Takasekai's territory, until the sky lit up in unlikely fireworks and scarlet raindrops. It brought some of their men to the Infirmary; a good first day test.

"A happy ending, dare I say," Mori concluded, either joking or not.]

"I could call this a macabre show," Tsuchiya commented, her sole eye running up and down the never ending rows of stolen medical beds. Symphonies filled the silence; coughs and shrieks and the wet squelch of viscera being put aside and sewn up. "But it just smells like shit."

She'd ended up in several physical altercations in the last few days — mafiosi who refused to be helped by her; mafiosi who joined in with the fun for no particular reason. They never dared when Chuuya was around, but she did her best to steer away — unwilling to accept protection.

"If they wanna fight, I'll fight every last one of them," she told him. True to her promise, whenever the squad wasn't fighting, she wore the sterilized clothing of the medical help. "They won't receive any regret from me."

Grunting more than admiration would have been a dead giveaway — so he didn't.

Familiar faces laid everywhere he turned. Chuuya hadn't even quite realized he knew so many people in the organization; had underestimated, perhaps, just how many of those people could recognize him with a glance. Murmurs were both fearful and just a bit stunned; as if they couldn't wrap their heads around the almost daily visits he paid to the Infirmary.

Arahabaki detested the tradition. Death was an attractive concept to him, in theory — this specific brand of decay was too human for his nonexistent taste, though. Chuuya had taken to lingering longer, stubbornly.

“It makes them feel important,” Hirotsu explained, one day, after a wounded man had almost shattered his progress to offer Chuuya a bow. “That someone of your rank would come to visit them — it means they’re necessary.”

“It means they’re people with holes in their chests,” Chuuya replied, playing with bullets he had stolen from a shooting in Virgil’s direction. Kouyou would have lamented his bad manners. Make them look at you, she’d said, once. Make them look just long enough to see you. Once they do — they will line up to lit up your cigarettes.

Little god.

Thirst was a flamed road up his throat — hunger such an insisting bother he might even forgive the blood squeezed in his every meal. “Besides,” he said, “I prefer coming here, than to the warehouse.”

Body bags gave him no particular feelings. A deaf rumble down his spine, maybe. Disappointment. It wouldn’t have happened if you’d been there. It had happened all the same. Corpses were corpses; the best Chuuya could do was remember their name.

And so he did.

The Infirmary was suffocating, in smells and sounds and blood — but at least it was alive.

“Are the Black Lizards doing as I asked?”

“Obeying me?” Chuuya replied. A frankly unsettling number of cables was connected to the old man’s body; with no monocle and an unshaved face, it was hard to look him in the eyes. Risk was all that was keeping him hooked to a more private area of the Infirmary; Hirotsu didn’t appreciate the concept. “Somewhat.”

It had been easier than he’d expected it to. The old man was probably to thank; whatever he’d told his seconds in command, it had made the deadliest squadron of the Mafia more or less pliant. The Black Lizards were sharply organized and well used to their own tactics; all Chuuya had to do was give them direction, and they would probably obey with little complaint.

Unlike the subordinates he and Dazai had had to deal with during the Nine Rings Conflict, the Black Lizards seemed to understand the danger they were facing. In its name, they were willing to forgive personal dislikes — jealousy, distrust, and whatever other brand of bleeding humanity had painted a target on his back in the last year.

“It’s been interesting enough,” Chuuya added, curling the IV through his fingers. “You’ve trained them well. Another squadron would have fallen apart as soon as you were out of the scene.”

Hirotsu sighed. “Perhaps it is time I pick two new commanders — as the Lizards were always meant to have. We wouldn’t be in this mess, if I...”

A coughing fit interrupted him; Chuuya watched him shake through it, unsure of how to help — uncomfortable with the pang of franticness rattling his fingers.

Once the risk had been pushed to the side, he closed his eyes, sighing. “There’s a reason the Black Lizards were built as they were. Finding the right people will take much effort and much training, but it’s time I do what’s right. I have been — selfishly attached to my own grief.”

Chuuya stared at the floor.

“How,” He cleared his throat, looking into nothing. “How are you?”

Hirotsu barely suffocated his amusement. “Quite alright, Chuuya.”

And yet —

“Should we begin the journey to the Under Port, sir?” the woman asked, nodding towards the body bags on the floor. It was only half a wonder how the warehouse had not been attacked yet — Dazai had been cautious enough to build a wall of guards all around it, while leaking fake information on its whereabouts.

He nudged a tag from the nearest bag. Through blood stains, he read, Tsu — and nothing else. “They will attack the vans if we do it now.”

“I understand,” she replied, after some awkward moments of silence. “But we can’t let them rot here. The police can’t be alerted.”

Chuuya pulled the chain of his hat, removed the moment the doors had been opened for him. “The police isn’t stupid enough to get involved.”

“And when we don’t have any space left?”

He bit the inside of his cheek. “Then we start cremating them here, and sending the remains to the Under Port.”

Astonishment widened her eyes. It didn’t last long — somebody from the entrance screamed her name, dragging a new hoard of body bags along the filthy floor. Understanding dawned on her with slight panic; as she ran to the doors, he saw her crouch down next to one of the bags, caressing a cheek she couldn’t see.

There had been a subordinate, once. One of Pianoman’s. He had died at his feet, hit by a stray bullet none of them had been quick enough to see, right as the mission was over. A single night had been spent drinking, as Pianoman murmured and counted fake bills and ripped apart new ones — either blind to or uncaring of Chuuya’s presence.

At one point, he’d paused. Let’s go, Pianoman had told him, before dragging him to the house of that dead man’s family. They had sat together as his parents cried in their wrinkled hands; Pianoman had given them the bullet that had killed their son. Chuuya had watched him pray, quietly and unreligiously. The next day, without a word or a blink, a new subordinate had been put in the empty place.

The dead already have so many bothers, his friend had told him. Why keep them caged in a world they don't belong to anymore?

---

...

---

78 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

He couldn't get the blood under his nails off.

It grated some hidden nerve of his, something well shielded by more pressing matters and less sensitive flesh. Suribachi had been filthy all the way to its nervous system, and Chuuya had always been dirty to the bone. Privilege had rounded his edges; these days, he cringed at the feeling.

Hyper-aware of every brush of his gloves against his fingertips, he stuck himself in the communal bathrooms and, perhaps improperly — punched the mirror until there was too much red to differentiate.

“There's no need to be rash,” Madame Tanaki told him, forceful and gentle all in one, bandaging his knuckles and fixing her revolver in the neckline of her dress. “There are many much guiltier than glass.”

There were many he enjoyed killing much more, he didn't tell her.

Body bags began to crowd the entrance halls too, and the one warehouse they had specifically turned into a wait-in-line for the Under Port. Chuuya slalomed through them with a grace even Kouyou would have praised; then he undid all of Tanaki's bandaging work against one or two foolish brats from the KK Company, who had thought jumping him in the middle of the day would have been a good idea.

“Their person of interest is an Ability User,” Virgil explained, hiding behind an unstable-looking column at the edge of the underground parking lot. “You need to get me his name, and then he's done for. Smaller groups have been tailing him for days now. We still haven't managed to see him leave that car. Their protection technique has just been — driving in circles, hiding in plain sight. The civilian massacre near the Precinct happened in an attempt to snipe him.”

“All this bullshit,” Chuuya summed up, perched on the ceiling like a bat, “For one son of a bitch inside a second hand Lexus?”

“Sir.”

He snapped his tongue against the roof of his mouth, tasting the metallic leftovers of the bread Tanaki had slapped into his mouth. “We need him alive for that secret, don’t we?” he dared, fishing the last cigarette out.

Virgil made a face. “Yes, sir,” A pause. “You know, I don’t know if ten cigs a day is a good deal for a teenager.”

“That’s a nice life lesson. You should put it in your book,” Distractedly, he searched for the cameras throughout the parking lot — counting along to the open-and-shut rhythm of Hirotsu’s stolen lucky lighter number seven. “When are you going to tell me what it’s about, anyway? Gotta be good, to get you out of the Mafia.”

“Don’t even joke about that,” the man hissed. Whether the idea of betraying Kouyou’s trust or the fear of consequences lowered his voice to a whisper — it didn’t really matter. “Kenta’s remarks are already enough stress for a lifetime.”

“Oh, yes,” Chuuya recalled each of them with vivid clarity. Then, in a surge of spontaneity: “When are you going to put the bastard out of his misery, by the way?”

Virgil flinched so violently his rifle danced up and down his hands. Something about the genuine startlement on his features made him snort. “I don’t know what you mean.”

“Sure you don’t.”

“He’s very sweet, yes, but —“

“He’s not a religious freak with world domination purposes, under the mental enslavement of a lady psycho,” Chuuya agreed. “That’s definitely a step forward.”

Virgil’s lips trembled. A feat in itself; only a few months ago, trying to imagine hilarity as the first reaction the man would get upon being reminded of Dante’s fleeting, scarring existence would have been delusional.

“I mean. We haven’t discussed religious beliefs yet,” A huff. “Which is curious, considering the man is going around boasting proposals as soon as he gets Sake down his throat.”

Something settled — in his chest, in his lungs, in his throat. Kicks and snickers, whispers and accusating eyes; names spat in the grimmest streets of the things Chuuya held tightly to his chest, not quite ashamed, not quite bothered, because who the fuck cared what anyone said, just — mindful of survival, in the way everyone in the Suribachi was. Too busy for that stuff. Too busy to linger. Too smart to dare.

But there were no names in that parking lot. Yokohama was a fighting ring, these days — Virgil and Kenta might even get away with doing one of their drunken slow dances in the middle of the square.

“Pretty sure he told Noguchi to go eat God’s ass just a few weeks ago,” he reassured him. “You’re probably alright. Just make sure to put my name before his in the book’s dedications.”

Again, what is it about?”

Shoulders against the column, Virgil said, secretly — with all the shamelessness of someone who had been given an out: “It’s about war. Well. Not exactly. It’s about this one man, but not just him, whose city is burned to the ground —“

Tired tires — outrageously stained in blood, on a second look — rolled down the descent to the garage. As one, every mafioso perched behind the rows of vehicles straightened, preparing their rifles. Chuuya tucked his cigarette behind his ear, relishing in the burning edges tickling his eyelashes, and extracted his gun.

“Ain’t that familiar,” he concluded, undeterred, striding across the ceiling towards the one car making its way inside. “Give me five.”

Whether the car had noticed him or not, it was a lucky guess. To make up for that lack, he pointed his gun to the floor and shot in quick succession, waiting for the bullets to ricochet in his waiting palm. He brought his arm back — mindful of Albatross’ chirps, complimenting his natural talent for pool — and glowed scarlet as he moved closer and closer to the vehicle.

He threw the projectiles, and didn’t wait to watch them destroy the windshield. The car wheels screeched, perforated, too, as the vehicle drew circles on the ground and came to a stop upon shattered glass shards. Chuuya jumped down, walking unhurried steps to the target, lips tight around the dying cigarette.

“Please ,” the man who had stumbled out of the backseats stuttered, holding onto the roof of the car, reaching out with a pacifying hand. “Please, please, I’m not —“

Chuuya sunk the last bullet between his eyes, smashing his boot against the car door — keeping the driver from taking advantage of the distraction to run. Virgil’s snap was a distant warning in his in-ear; we need him alive—

Through the held-in breaths of their hidden audience, he sneaked his hand inside the car window, wrapping it around the driver’s throat.

“Smart enough, I’ll give it to you,” he said, plucking the cigarette from his lips with his free hand, staring forward. “Also, the oldest trick in the book. Now your actor is dead, and you’re here. Was the pay that good, Mr. Taxi Driver?”

The Hirose Fumiko quote was for his entertainment; the gasps of understanding in his in-ears were for whatever part of him enjoyed being recognized as more than the brawn. Choked attempts to breathe trembled under his gloved palm; the KK Company’s person of interest shook his head, uselessly clawing at his grip. “Not — not — him, not him —“

“You’re not him?” He hummed. “Let’s check.”

He smashed his front on the steering wheel, paying little attention to the cries coming out of his mouth. Ripping the back of his suit apart was easy — as soon as he was met with the bright lines of the dragon tattoos signaling the Daikokuten's Ability, he pushed the man back into the seat.

"You owe me a beer," Chuuya shrugged. "What's your Ability, Mr. Taxi Driver? Something useless, clearly, since you're not using it. I'm gonna need the name."

Protests came wet and small, insisting against the deadly embrace of his fingers around his throat, pooling down his nose with the snot and the blood from the fracture.

With a sigh, Chuuya tightened his grip, pulling the man out of the vehicle.

"A name," he echoed, forcing him to kneel. For good measure, he put his cigarette out on the User's forehead; without waiting for his screams to subdue, he added: "And then you get to get cozy in the Port Mafia's dungeons, with this Mackerel of mine. You'll like him. He's a fucking idiot, just like you."

Some more whining; some more denying. A distinctive movement of his jaw caught his attention; lightning quick, Chuuya's hand climbed up his throat, clenching like a vice around the man's chin. He sunk his fingers until he broke the skin of his cheek apart. There, through the blood and the drool and the devilish shrieks, he extracted the suicide pill he had been about to bite down.

"Nasty," he commented, upon the screams. "Don't tell me that's your Ability. You must have done billions in the pharmaceutical industry, ah?"

It took little more for a name to be given; barely a blink for Virgil's Ability to activate, rendering the KK Company's person of interest into little more than a delirious, powerless puppet. The men behind the cars were tasked with cleaning up — staring at Chuuya with something in his eyes.

"Bring him to the HQs," he ordered, still. "But keep your heads up. Takasekai is planning a main street rampage."

Their nods were hurried; excitement was clear in their careful motions, as they handled the first place of the puzzle the war had been set ablaze by. Virgil left with them, clenching a hand around his shoulder. Distantly — uncaring of subtlety or willing to risk it all, as they disappeared in the black SUVs of the Mafia — he heard them talk.

They always did talk.

"One, five," he spoke, out loud, for himself only. Watching the cars line up towards the exit, he removed his gloves. He bit at his nails, once, twice. Raised his head — stared into the closest security camera. Offered a middle finger.

With clear tempism, mocking the blood he couldn't bite off, the bomb in the KK Company's car trunk beeped 00:00, exploding.

74 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“Heard you got yourself blown up,” was the first thing Dazai told him. He didn’t even turn; the moaning mess of blood and raw skin hanging upside down in front of him was his only concern. “Mori is delighted with our latest Takasekai conquest, which I will never forgive you for.”

Chuuya scoffed.

As of late, the dungeons were busier than ever — enough to mold the uneven stairs even further. Kouyou’s absence had barely stopped the flow of her higher ranked subordinates, taking care of the ill-famed Torture Department all on their own — but it was rare for anyone to willingly choose to share a room with the Demon Prodigy as he showed off his most infamous talent. His corner of chains and blood stains was always utterly empty.

The man dangling from the lower roof could have been from the Hounds, or from the Black Widow, or from any other smaller syndicate — as per Kouyou’s subordinates orders, Dazai was not allowed near high-level prisoners.

Chuuya thought it a mixture of jealousy and unwillingness to spend more time with him than what was needed; a sentiment he could share, but that he hardly understood in the face of necessity.

He scares them, Kouyou had told him, once.

“There had to be a better way to get the evidence you wanted.” The explosion had certainly opened the secret drawer in the car truck nice and well; it had also given the squad and Virgil the scare of a lifetime. “You almost dropped the building on my fucking head.”

“A way to get it without the KK Company knowing we had it?” His tongue hit his palate. “Doubtful. Plus, it would have deprived me of the chance to see you almost blow up. Light me one up, won’t you?”

If he had thought there was nothing left to break in the hanging puppet, Chuuya was rapidly proved wrong.

Dazai found some perverted kind of amusement in abandoning the corpses that couldn’t tell him anything else in the weirdest shapes for the cleaners to find. Smashed skulls, broken knees turned the wrong way, even blood scribbles on their faces — while respect to the living seemed to drip from his every blink, the dead did not share the same luck.

Jealousy, he’d explained, once.

The man had no voice left to scream with. Barely a meek left his mouth when Dazai's knife caressed the length of the space between his legs. A hum fell from the Prodigy's lips — coincidentally enough to cause him a face, it was Hirose's Mr. Taxi Driver.

With borderline irritating precision, he cut the dirty flesh of the man's member following the rhythm, his tone unchanging even as the prisoner began to screech wordless shouts.

"Thank you for all the information," Dazai said, through the sprays of fresh blood. He still refused to wear all the pieces of his suit. Crunching down, he patted the man's cheek. "Now you can see how it feels, how about that?"

Chuuya curled an eyebrow, searching for an answer in the tears and the blood striding down the man's cheek, his mouth stuffed with his cut off organ. Most tended to leave victims in that state when they had wronged the ladies of the syndicate, or when they were particularly intent on making a fool out of their enemy.

Or, he considered — "Is this about the brats your Oda's been taking in?"

Scurrying around to gather his fallen coat, Dazai barely looked up to reply: "One of them was almost kidnapped by this Hound man, before Odasaku could swoop in and save the day. Now he has two of them! Very small. They both cry a lot. For some reason, they miss their parents." He fixed his bandages in place, going as far as to partly remove the ones on his eye to turn them. "The Hounds killed the latest one's during a shootout. Medical staff, maybe? But now he has Odasaku, so it's fine. I've been telling him he should consider a full time babysitter position, but for some reason he didn't find the idea tempting. Might be the snot, or the digestive problems."

After raining that train of information on him, he shut his mouth. Chuuya knew what it meant; enough is enough.

Of the little he was allowed to know about Oda Sakunosuke, there was even less Dazai was genuinely glad to share. He existed somewhere behind the most obvious layers of pretense of the boy's eyes — and then lower and lower, somewhere Chuuya had never even brushed.

"I get leaving them like that on enemy territory," Chuuya pointed out, nudging the man's head with the tip of his boot. "But this is just a shitty show one of ours will have to clean up."

"Maybe it'll teach them to leave me the main room, when I need it," the boy considered, because Dazai's plans had plans. Because he had spent the evening torturing a man who had attempted to hurt a kid, and Chuuya still smelled the blood from the Orphanage. "And maybe the cleaner who will take care of it — a Hound spy, by the way — will be delighted by the reunion with her husband. Thank you," he added, nodding towards the lit cigarette Chuuya had almost forgotten to be holding.

Blind to the raw contempt on his face — or simply undeterred by it — Dazai pulled his wrist closer, turning his hand so he could remove the cigarette from Chuuya's fingers with his mouth.

He paused, lips on the tab, still connected with his hands — blinked with his sole eye.
“You’re still mad, aren’t you?”

“Maybe I’m just stressed,” Chuuya replied. From behind the walls, muffled shrieks and begs echoed off the stone. “We’re at war, aren’t we?”

“Yes, but you’re enjoying that part.”

“Aren’t you?”

Dazai kept quiet; Chuuya held the weight of his halved stare.

“Come on,” the boy said, at last, breaking their point of contact. “Let’s talk somewhere where people have nicer things in their mouths.”

The bars weren’t as packed as they’d been before the conflict. Chuuya recalled countless nights fighting for a table with the rest of his squad — neutral meeting spots were bound to be unsuccessful, though, when gangs had killing-on-sight orders out for each other.

Even daring to step inside was a statement of sorts; fearlessness or stupidity, sagging the air with the same insistence as cheap Sake. He allowed Dazai to pull at the chain of his hat to keep him from barking back at some low murmur about their age; when they settled on the stools of the counter, Chuuya kneeled the back of his legs to make him fall.

“The data itself is irrelevant,” Dazai explained, once they’d managed to open the laptop stolen from Hirotsu’s office. “Merchant deals, bank accounts information, some maps of the city underground. What’s important — is that this flash drive is not from here.”

Chuuya tapped two fingers on the small device, damaged by the KK’s Company car explosion. “Aren’t flash drives all the same?”

“Technically,” he replied. “But this? The restock of this type of flash drives is located in California. It was a large scale company who began to grow a bit too successful in the last decade; the Japanese market feared the competition, so they shut off the commercialization of these specific American goods. The KK Company had to have a reason to hide it. And none of the datas in it is worth that much hustle.”

“So the secret is — that the flash drive is American?” he concluded, skeptical, drowning the bite of the sandwich they’d forcefully split with the beer the waiter had left for them, eyeing them suspiciously. No one had dared asking for personal documents — then again, he was pretty sure Dazai had a vertiginous bunch of it for both of them, somewhere in his pockets.
“Why is that relevant?”

“Because,” Dazai insisted, mocking, “It means someone American, with access to gang-like funds and currently in a sort of alliance with the KK Company, is in Yokohama — during a treasure hunt for enough money to make every relevant gang on the international scene perk up,” A flick to his forehead. “Use that dog intellect of yours. What could it mean?”

Chuuya stared. “You’re telling me foreign syndicates are joining the conflict?”

“Mh-mh,” he confirmed. “I have my eyes on two or three of them already, but Strain is the one we need to worry about.”

Imperceptibly — violently enough to pull at the hair on his nape — a wave of silence blinked through the bar.

Their eyes met.

“Strain?” Chuuya echoed, seamlessly. “As in, that one manufacturer company? We’ve dealt with them before.”

“Before being the keyword,” he confirmed. “No one has claimed the attack near Yamashita Park yet. My men are verifying the bullets left on the scene, but I already know what they’ll find. Westerners sticking their nose where they’re not welcomed,” A sigh. “Americans and their spies.”

He frowned at his plate. “Is that even allowed? I thought the Daikokuten had made this whole thing up for the benefit of Yokohama.”

“I don’t think they really care,” Dazai said. Pointedly, he raised his voice by a single note, just enough to stride against the murmurs of the late night crowd. “Americans tend to be self-absorbed, according to Boss.”

Tension rattled his bones, all the way to his fingertips. Chuuya’s leg shook against the stool. “What does it mean for us, then?”

“Cheese.”

He waited. “Stop being cocky, bastard.”

“No, I mean it. Cheese, is what it means,” Dazai threw his bottle back, emptying it out with a tranquillity he could not afford. “There’s an attack planned on the Muji Department. One of the stores is a front for the Shadow Blade’s substance market — basically, all they’ve got left. I’m assuming they’ll stop by for cheese, while they’re at it. Isn’t that an American thing?” He turned his head to the side. “Like that book series Madame Tanaki likes. What was it called? Never To Return. ”

Chuuya watched.

On the television hanging from the wall, the News — dreary as always — murmured some data; the shattered colors of the glass bottles reflected on the ceiling. The crowd was listening.

“Damn it,” Chuuya sighed, settling his eyes on the security camera in the far corner of the bar. His reflection mocked him, backed by Dazai’s waving fingers. Never to return. “I fucking liked this place.”

He smashed his bottle on the counter right as the first woman jumped to Dazai’s side, sinking the razor-sharp edge in her chest.

His stool was kicked out from under his legs — the boy slid down underneath him, as Chuuya jumped five feet in the air. As one, they attacked the upcoming wave of Strain members.

The rest of it was a blur: faces smashed on dirty tables, bones and windows cracking, bullets sinking in flesh and old lightbulbs, screams from hiding waiters and bar-men — who had definitely not been paid enough, for an occasion for the Strain to get rid of the Port Mafia's youngest ones. Dazai's sudden desire to save Hirotsu's laptop and their treacherous flash drive almost got him killed; Chuuya watched him stick a table knife up his attacker's nose, before carelessly abandoning him in his hands.

"This is why Never To Return is a stupid strategy," he let him know, as he tore a hole in a man's chest with the leg of a stool, driving the bloodied edge that came out into another member's skull. "You just leave all the dirty work to me!"

"I'm being useful," Dazai replied, on his tiptoes, playing around with the security camera. As a woman from Strain tried to sink a knife in his thigh, he sunk his shoe in her throat. "I watched you be all dramatic with the KK Company guy, by the way. Hacking parking lots' cameras is easy. You were absolutely pathetic."

"Ah?" Chuuya snapped, slamming a man out of the window. "Says the one who stuck a dick in a man's mouth. Bet you're gonna jerk off to the sight."

"Scandalous, hatrack," he replied, gasping. "What kind of dreams have you been having about me?"

By the time they marched out of the bar, info on the Strain's base hidden in the card in Dazai's pocket, the moon had reached the dead center of the sky. Chuuya wiped blood off his cheeks with the flagging sleeve of the boy's coat.

"Excellent work," Dazai clasped his hands, already distracted by his console. He'd found some kind of game that played piano songs — except all the notes were a cat's meows in different pitches. "Terrible company. All according to protocol. See you at the Cheese Factory?"

"It's literally not a Cheese Factory," Chuuya replied, unimpressed, already halfway to his motorcycle. He changed his mind; strided back, kicked the back of his knees. "Next time you need us to kill someone who hurt your darling Oda — just fucking tell me. Easier than threatening them into pretending they're part of the Strain bunch."

Expectations came with habit; habit came with expectations. He didn't stay to watch surprise bloom on his face — mostly, because he knew it wouldn't.

---

76 days until the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“— urge all citizens to keep away from the Yokohama Bay Bridge, as a terroristic threat has been — Matsumoto? Matsumoto. Matsumoto, can you hear me? Can you — “

---

...

---

73 days until the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“Evacuate!” Chuuya snarled. The mine would explode the minute he blinked too tight, his hands still holding it tight. His subordinates stared at him, speechless. “Evacuate, right now —!”

---

...

---

71 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“I pray, sometimes,” Yuan told him.

No tension marked her voice; no trace of croaks or leftover screams. Anger had always been a sticky drape on her small frame; once it touched, it was hard to remove. Clearly, she thought the Bishop’s Staff didn’t deserve more than her chained body.

Consequently, Chuuya didn’t understand. “To who?” he asked, nose scrunching up.

Her glance was sharp, spat in his direction with something akin to the shamelessness she'd been known for in the Sheep. Cross-legged on the floor, all he could do was look up at her, and wonder if a massacre of children had been enough to wake her up from the haze the exact same disaster had put her in. "We raised you better than to judge others' faith."

[He had tried to ask, sometime during his first visits. Hadn't been sure of how to bring up the Orphanage. All he'd received was a blank stare and detained fingers curling in the air, reaching towards nothing at all.]

"Oh," she'd said, blinking owlishly. "Oh, yes. The Orphanage. How familiar."

They hadn't talked about it again].

"You didn't raise me," he grunted. "And you weren't here during the Nine Rings' shitshow. I have a thing against God."

Yuan's head tilted to the side. Her chest was littered in emeralds; green dots from invisible rifles. Underneath the moonlight streaming from stained-glass windows, she could have been one of the paintings in Kouyou's courtesan house. "I'm not praying to any god."

"By definition —"

"I don't know who I'm praying to," she interrupted him. "I spent a lot of time alone. It's just — the company is nice, sometimes. And begging the nonexistent to help me is a good motivation to help myself."

Chuuya pulled the corners of the empty food container in his lap. She had assured him they'd been feeding her. He had assured her he didn't particularly care. "So you have an imaginary friend."

She huffed. He couldn't remember the last time he'd heard her make a similar sound. "I don't have an imaginary friend —"

"That's what it sounds like."

"It's not —"

"It's fine if you do. There's this kid I know, Elise, and she's basically an hallucination —"

"Maybe I am crazy," she said, suddenly. "Maybe I've lost my mind, or something. Toru was always talking about — trauma, and stuff. He thinks everyone in the organization has it. Isn't that insane?"

"Toru, ah?" Chuuya echoed. "He was born rich. Bet he even read books about that stuff. Don't worry about it."

It's just a fever, they all used to say, don't worry. Don't call the doctor; we can't afford him or threaten him or anything else.

They were silent for a long time.

It wasn't unusual. His visits were sporadic — sometimes quiet throughout the entire hours or minutes he could dedicate to her; sometimes filled with words. Perhaps it was Yuan's own brand of forgiveness; perhaps it was Yuan's own brand of raw, earth-shattering exhaustion, and it had nothing to do with him. Making this about you, again?

He sat and he waited. He had time.

"You know," she said. "I think they kind of look like you."

Chuuuya pulled at her shoelaces. Noguchi had to have brought her shoes, with the same spirit he'd spent to bring her food she didn't need. Different worlds, different priorities; same idea. "Who?"

A blink. "Whoever I pray to."

He shut his mouth.

It took her a while to talk again. "I hate it."

"I know you do."

"I don't —" Frustration crowded her face. That red hair fit the season — he couldn't quite decide if it fit her, too. "It's not fair, Chuuuya."

Eyes on the ceiling. "It's not."

"I'm sorry I landed you in this mess."

"Shut the fuck up," he replied, easily. "I'll be the judge of that. It's not your fault."

Yuan kept quiet. Then: "What happened during the Nine Rings Conflict?"

"Well," he said, once the astonishment had been forcefully wiped away. "For starters — and I know you'll shit yourself about it — I was literally possessed for most of it —"

Every word out of his mouth was sandpaper on his throat, was a balm on sunburned skin. He kept coming back to sit on the floor — to tell stories to someone who was not his own lingering mind or his graves. He kept drinking her interest like the forgiveness he did not care for, and he got drunk and drunker, and he talked — because Shirase was miles away and the Sheep were dead, but the two of them were not.

Her stories came later.

Not all of it was a nightmare; not all of it was a funeral. A nice woman from the slums had taken her in for a while, in exchange for stealthy thievery and companionship. She'd left because she couldn't bear her own home any longer; when she'd resurfaced in Yokohama, the first thing she had done was visit Yamashita Park.

"We didn't have parks down there," she told him, a bit dazed. "And we never wandered that far. The Arcade and the bridge — that was all. Oh — I went to the Arcade, too. Someone put an unbeatable record in the Go Drive machines, you know? Whoever Slug and Mackerel are.”

Some topics were declared untouchable — by a tacit understanding of where the ice would crack more easily. Yuan kept the Port Mafia out of her mouth, conscious of the negative reactions she would receive by insulting the people Chuuya had chosen to exist alongside of. Chuuya was careful, very careful, to not even utter the name Dazai Osamu where she could hear it.

The war became a topic too soon.

“There’s been a lot of attacks,” she admitted, once he offered her the full picture of her role in the conflict. “None of them managed to enter the Church. One of them was the Ability User you mentioned — the one who can reopen all your wounds. They didn’t manage to kill him, though,” She frowned. “There’s been less attempts, lately. I suppose they must have spread news of my — situation.”

Chuuya studied the valleys of her chest, hidden bombs underneath white fabric, upon a too thin body.

The Port Mafia had an entire section of men worrying about the technical aspect of her removal; the easier solution, he knew, would have been getting rid of the snipers before they could shoot and activate the bombs. But they had no way of proving whether the bombs could explode even with a command from afar.

They are rancorous people, Mori had explained. They will gladly destroy their own chance at gaining the prize, as long as someone who’s not them doesn’t obtain it.

We can’t risk it, Chuuya had decided.

“We’ll get you out of here,” he promised her.

“And then?”

“Then,” He scratched his nape. “Whatever you want, I suppose. I offered you money, and I offered to send you back to Shirase, but —“

“No.”

“Yeah, ‘thought you’d say that,” he grunted. “Well, Noguchi is more than willing to take you in.”

Genuine astonishment parted her lips. “He — is?”

Chuuya looked at her funny. “The man fucking licks the ground you walk on. He’s got a little-sister complex of sorts. He’s also an airhead, a bastard, and the worst shit to come out of a jerk’s asshole — but he’s a good guy.”

“He said he’d bring me horse riding,” Yuan said, very quietly.

“Horse riding,” he echoed, a little lost. “That’s — nice?”

She fell quiet.

Right when he thought she wouldn’t open her mouth again, she dared: “It’s weird.”

Briefly, he wondered if she was talking about horse riding. “What is?”

“Having someone so old worry about you.”

Something like a snort arose in his chest; when he tried to spit it out, though, it came out as simple warmth, forming a cloud in the cold air.

Only then, he realized just how heavy it felt — perched on his bones like crows. Waiting.

“It’s just, the Sheep —” A flinch; minimal, but never lacking. “We were all so young. Fifteen at best. The little ones had to be taken care of, and we — we were the old ones. Every adult in Suribachi hated us. The police officers from Yokohama were all jerks. But now —” She sighed. “It feels good. I hate myself for it, but — it feels good, having someone who’s old, and who cares, and not having to take care of anything. Toru is a half idiot, but...”

“But he makes you feel like a kid,” Chuuya completed. Unfamiliarity was easy to recognize; he always knew when the language reaching his ears was not one he could wrap his head around.

Just for a moment, he thought of Detective Murase. Of Hirotsu, cooking dinner with a revolver in his pocket. Of Kouyou, keeping the doors of the Pomegranate closed. Not the place for children.

“Yeah,” She nodded, raining relief. “Yes, he does. Isn’t it nice? It feels so nice. Like when the kids talked about school. School. What a weird idea. I—” Glass covered her eyes in the way of lids on caskets; her voice broke. “If I could get it, even just a bit more, I — I think I would like it very much.”

I don’t get it, he wanted to tell her. I don’t get it. I don’t want it. I would hate it. I can’t even imagine it. What are you even tired of? What right do I have to be tired? I don’t get it.

He couldn’t say it. He was not in the habit of offering an open chest to unwashed hands; he was not in the habit of offering himself for failure. He had no need for understanding; couldn’t ask it from anyone, not when he was —

What would she think, he wondered, of the body he’d held as it died, with eyes softer than his would ever be?

“You know,” Chuuya said, instead, with something akin to desperation, something akin to blankness. Confession for a confession; guilt for guilt. Shirase was in London; the Sheep were dead. “I don’t think school would suit me.”

Yuan’s lips parted, again. She didn’t speak for the rest of the night.

---

...

---

68 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

Koda refused to talk.

He was efficient. Men who had no idea of his connection to the attack to the Wild Geese Orphanage wouldn't have suspected a thing. He showed up to missions, hit every target with ease, responded to orders with decisive — if somewhat quieter — determination. Chuuya wasn't in the habit of keeping a portfolio of his squad, but had that been the case — the man would have gained top marks.

Chuuya had to slam him against the nearest surface to even convince him to look him in the eyes.

"You need to breathe," he told him, because he couldn't tell him, you need to take a day off from the war — they both knew. "You need to get rid of them, not yourself."

Koda nodded, only once, sharply. He went back to the rows of men and weapons; he didn't meet his eyes again. He did not talk.

"Give him time," Tsuchiya told him, as they hid behind a wagon, waiting for the Shadow Blade to leave the Takasekai building they were ravaging through. "Let him do his thing. He needs to deal with it on his own."

"His grief is gonna get him killed," he muttered.

"This isn't him grieving. It's just like you said to me," She cocked her gun. "We don't have time for that."

And they didn't, Chuuya knew — they spent their mornings guarding the Headquarters and their nights attacking, pushing civilians out of conflicts and gathering their fallen. Sleep was a distant reality; he couldn't recall the last time he'd seen a street filled to its usual capacity.

He knew there wasn't time — he knew Koda was the first friend he'd made after the Flags had died.

"Don't let him get himself killed," he ordered Virgil, because he was the only one he had actually seen Koda talk to. Noguchi had been a surprisingly useless attempt; the twins had almost gotten shot in a fight that had broken out between them. “And keep him away from the Secret Force and Dazai. We can’t deal with revenge journeys.”

Not that Koda had outrightly declared who the spasms of his fingers were meant to choke — not that he had ever dared to utter the Demon Prodigy’s name out loud. He wasn’t high-ranked enough to do something so stupid; he wasn’t even conscious enough to do anything more than — stare at him.

Stare at him. Obsessively — with emptied out features and feverish eyes, with his fingers tight around his rifle; with conclusions he had gotten to all on his own.

Koda was too prepared to put a bullet in his head; Dazai was too willing to beg for it. Koda would be executed for insubordination; Dazai would laugh, and laugh, and laugh, the way he did, sometimes, when Chuuya had to drag him out of rivers and nearby bombs, when eerie silence didn’t seem to fit him.

When the quick-sequence explosions of a merch train from the Shadow Blade reduced Koda to a trembling mess — the attack he had ordered him not to join, exactly for this reason — Chuuya sat next to him.

“This isn’t going to bring your brother back to life,” he told him. “You dying won’t solve anything.”

Koda’s flinch shook the ground.

“Revenge isn’t going to do a thing either,” he added, because the Special Force had been tasked with exploding that merch train, and he knew the man was aware. “It will feel good. It will feel so fucking good, you hear me? And then it will be over. You’ll have regained nothing. You’ll just have one more body to bury,” He laughed, humorlessly. “Or not even that.”

The wind answered him, stained by the smog of the explosion. Face in his knees, Koda’s shoulders trembled.

Chuuya hadn’t been at the cemetery in weeks. There had just been no time. There had just been no time to climb to the cliff with Rimbaud’s stone — Verlaine had nothing, and deserved less than it.

Chuuya was made of mourning, and the obsequy had come to an end lifetimes ago.

“Think about anything but it,” he told him. “Let him rest where your mind can’t reach. You can’t do anything else.”

65 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

Thirteen visits in, Chuuya eventually realized he had never seen Kouyou with no lipstick on.

I need to leave, she might have said, had she been more than a sleeping stain of red against the snowy sheets of the Infirmary. There's a war in my city, and I have an IV in my arm. This is absolutely presumptuous.

This is the second big conflict you miss, he would have told her, consequently — because he knew she would have approved. Ace will be on your ass about it, you know? And because he wasn't a child, he wouldn't have been disappointed once it didn't wake her up.

The lack of lipstick was unignorable, even underneath the oxygen mask. She had thin lips, not an inch of chapped skin — the valleys of her chin were bruised, remnants of the man who had blown himself up in her face. Scarlet curls rained on her pillow, tickling the stitches on her forehead.

Sometimes, he thought he could see onyx shadows run all the way to his fingertips — cling to her flesh, rotting her further.

[“Your subordinates keep babbling about you,” he told her, on a morning he had stomped his highest number yet of men to the curb. Munching on stolen protein bars, he leaned on the visitor seat, continuing: “One would think you died, with the way they act. They’re giving me a headache. Isn’t it time you wake your ass up?” A pause. “Ma’am.”]

“Fine, send Kajii,” Chuuya spoke into the phone. On the other end, Noguchi’s grimace was almost tactile. “But tell him to get a grip. If he hurts any more civilians, we’re going to have the police on our asses. You hear me? Tell him. No, I don’t care if he — it’s just lemons, knock him out or something. And make sure Koda isn’t around. I’ll get there soon.”

The corridor of the Infirmary floor was eerily charged; he turned the corner, ready to bash the umpteenth skull of the night against a wall — and found a crime scene.

A stolen one, Chuuya considered, petty and relieved. Three bodies had been abandoned on the carpet, puddles of blood pooling underneath their disjointed corpses. A familiar knife was stuck in a woman in a nurse outfit’s forehead, pinning her to the wall all the way to the back of her head.

“You should probably ground Golden Demon or something,” Dazai was saying, obnoxiously, patting Kouyou’s wrist.

Sat as he was at the end of her bed, cross legged and staring her down between the hands caging his cheeks, he looked bored enough to overcome the blood stains he was leaving all over the sheets. “Isn’t she supposed to sense bombs? She’s even more incompetent than you are, Ane-san. As soon as you wake up, I'll put you on calligraphy duty until you pass out again."

Chuuya tended to only ever visit when the sun was in the sky. He found it made her look less like a corpse.

The Executive had been reserved a quiet corner of the Infirmary, hidden behind double the pristine white curtains. He studied the curling — unchanging — lines of the heart monitor, as he threw the decapitated head from his vigilante rounds on the guest seat.

"Oh, it's Chuuya," Dazai exclaimed, vague. "Hello, Chuuya. There you are. Haven't seen you in a while. I'm rather displeased."

He kept his eyes on his stolen hat, perched on top of the boy's head. Blankly, he asked: "Are you?"

"Mori's been sending me on solo missions," was the whine out of his throat. The gun he had used to kill the Strain spies was nowhere to be found — one of Kouyou's IVs was intertwined with his fingers, pulling harshly enough to draw blood from the needle in her arm. "Not that he trusts me enough not to send his men to tail me. An annoying matter. I've been killing them all, of course."

"We're on a man shortage," Chuuya reminded him. "And those poor motherfuckers are already being punished with your presence. Control yourself."

"Maybe if you were less busy," Dazai sighed. "I bet this whole matter would be over, if you could just be a competent lap dog. You've been around so little, I couldn't even put out this week's Chuuya Is A Sore Loser's newsletter. We still need to get the Takasekai and Shadow Blade's codes, remember? What are you doing, running around gathering poor men's heads?"

"Sure," He nodded towards the bleeding mess on the seat, imploded-by-gravity eyes and mouth stuck in a scream. "Come take a look at this."

He abandoned the boy to study the relic, making a beeline for Kouyou's sleeping body. His gloves were dirty; he removed only one of them, grasping weakly at her pale fingers. Busying himself with her medical file, he got distracted by unaltered numbers and reports of removal of stitches — until Dazai hummed.

"A Bishop's Staff's tattoo on his lip," he noted, pulling at the skin. "They were sure quick to ally. I'm surprised the Staff would accept not to fight an every man for himself war, though."

"That's what I don't get," Chuuya shut the file. "Alliances make absolutely no sense for the this kind of conflict. What game are they playing?"

Dazai's sole eye squinted. "Pretty sure we might just get a repeat of the Nine Rings' strategy."

He frowned. "In what way?"

"How come they attacked you?"

“There’s an international bounty on my head, apparently,” Chuuya replied. “As if having the Special Division on my ass wasn’t enough.”

“Don’t worry about that,” Dazai brushed the matter away. “I’m sure Mori can’t wait to give you back to them and gain us an Ability Permit, as soon as this mess is over.”

A mixture of rage and something else tickled him. “Excuse —“

Blinding pain exploded down his spine, turning his vision into a white so bright he gasped.

An assortment of screeches and curses was ripped from his mouth — more out of astonishment than actual pain, his knees gave up, landing him on the floor.

“There, there,” Dazai put his hat back on his head. “Dislocated shoulders will do you no good. You already have the posture of a savage. What would Ane-san say?”

Circles and lights fought for the space in his visual field; he leaned back, teeth gritted. “Fucking tell me, next time, you fucking — piece of shit —“

“Ah, but where’s the fun in that?”

They theorized as they made their way down the stairs, entertaining Madame Tanaki’s questions regarding the decapitated head they still had to drop off somewhere. Chuuya won a round of rock-paper-scissors, and got to drop the relic into Dazai’s arms. He ran to his waiting men; spent the night crashing over the Shadow Blade border, until an entire level of defense for their person of interest’s supposed refuge was annihilated.

When morning came, he was back at Kouyou’s bedside — lipstick in hand, fingers in hers.

---

...

---

62 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“...Two hundred and seventy civilians were killed in the bombing attack that took place at Ishikawachō Station. It is unclear, at this point, whether —“

---

60 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

While Chuuya was in charge of massacres, the general consensus was that Dazai was in charge of death — altogether.

“There’s still a competition you need to worry about,” were Mori’s smiling words, as he appointed them to this or that slaughter. “What better occasion?” Hands on their shoulders; no photographs to be taken, but something close enough. “Bring me the codes, boys.”

And so the crowd dispersed. From the sidelines, they watched them.

An assortment of seamless collaboration and full tacit understanding got them into the filthiest holes of Yokohama — down dark roads that led to rooms with the secrets holding the city up day after day.

Talking had not been necessary for a long time; they wasted their breaths on bickering that left most of their enemies dumbfounded, that shook the shoulders of men they were torturing with teenagerish glee, that intertwined with words they had picked for strategies and shorthands they couldn’t seem to stop adding — fingers on skin, blinking eyes, traced letters, bird songs, memories and broken traffic lights —

Killing, he found, could be a somewhat uncomfortably intimate affair.

“Does he have it?” Dazai asked, holding onto the hilt of the knife stuck in one of the Shadow Blades’ guards’ neck. The grip helped him keep the corpse on his feet, as Chuuya ripped his suit apart to search for a tattoo. As soon as he received a cursing scoff, he extracted the knife, abandoning the lifeless puppet to the ground. “How annoying,” he sighed, cleaning the blade on the bandages on his neck.

For good measure, Chuuya removed it from his grip — unwilling to have to chase him down the hallway to get the dazed, drunken look of suicide out of his eyes. “You seriously couldn’t find any better information than ‘in the building’?”

“I’m sorry,” Lazily, the boy spun him around — throwing him towards the entering guards, alerted by their companion’s dying scream. “Next time, why don’t you hack into a syndicate’s security, while I go around kicking my feet like a ballerina?”

“I’d like to see you try.”

Advantages came in the reduced number of attackers — since neither of them was willing to work together while having to deal with barely decent men Mori always insisted on giving them, their missions were always a solitary affair.

Disadvantages came in a simple enough realization — they were both having fun with it.

Unsettled matters were reserved for the Arcade, always empty these days, and often shut down for its own safety — although it didn't mean much, to two mafiosi with pickpocketing tendencies. Settled matters were to be exploited at all costs — and so they broke through the Shadow Blades endless lines of defense, left a river of corpses in their wake, and carried a woman with a dragon tattoo to the HQs with an electric spear stuck in her abdomen.

[No one asked for the story — except the report they got stuck in Dazai's office to write — because no one had truly expected them to fail, once the official order for them to act had come. Chuuya still had to get used to that part — the trust in them. Sometimes, even stronger than the tendency to lower their eyes.

He might have told them, had they asked — about bad attitudes and matching moves, striding down corridors as their shoes sunk in puddles of blood, slashing someone's neck and lowering their gravity until their eyes popped out of their sockets, and always, always, making sure at least one would survive to see them leave the room.

Secrecy had been an ancient deal; these days, Mori wanted Yokohama to know who would leave their windows ajar.

But they didn't ask — didn't put their nose in the strange pull-and-push keeping Dazai and Chuuya in each other's orbit, under the sound of insults and unwilling teams up. And so he didn't say].

“On your right,” Dazai informed him, politely enough, eye on the scope of his rifle. He fired another shot; from the rear view mirror, Chuuya saw one of the two cars chasing them skid down the road. “Kidding. It's left.”

His upper body was half hanging outside of the car window; with every swerve down the highway Chuuya took, he had to remind himself curving too fast and splattering the Mafia's Prodigy against the concrete would be frowned upon. “Remind me why infiltrating the Hounds was necessary?”

“Apart from them getting too cocky with the bigger fish in the pond?” the boy screamed back, fighting the soaring wind.

Chuuya turned the corner in all the wrong ways, dragging the side of the vehicle down the wall, trying to get the following cars to accidentally pass them. Flares and sparks arose near his ear; he punched the metal railing, pushing the car several feet into the other lane with his Ability.

“Well — one of them found the location of my shipping container and gave Kazuko the scare of a lifetime. The poor thing refuses to leave my bed!” Dazai shook his head, sinking a bullet in the driver's shoulder. “Also, they're named after dogs. That's enough reason.”

A projectile hit one of their wheels, slowing them down considerably — enough to give the chance to the two cars to sandwich them. Each hit the two halves inflicted on their sides shook the whole vehicle; Chuuya pressed on the accelerator so hard his foot started to tingle.

The sound of a car window opening next to him raised every hair on his neck; in the corner of his eye, he saw the mouth of a rifle brush his own glass, too quick for him to react.

A weight dropped on his lap, pulling a oof! out of him — the road now hidden behind Dazai's coat-wearing shoulder. His rifle shot before the Hound's one could even think about it; the glass exploded on both of them, making the car swerve and release them from the tightening embrace.

“Move!” Chuuya raised his knees, trying to kick him away. “I can't see shit!”

“You're welcome,” Dazai muttered. “I hope the next one hits you.”

“I hope you get squashed like a bug!

“Well, I hope —”

A jolt went through his nape; right as Dazai made to throw himself back onto his seat, Chuuya gripped his hair and pushed him down again, yelping as he freed his hand — just quick enough to stop the three bullets that broke through their rear windshield from decapitating the boy.

“Why did you have to put the stolen goods in the trunk?” Chuuya lamented. “I could have crashed this fucking car on them by now! What are you even — hey!”

“Wait a second,” Sliding down in the non-existent space between his legs, Dazai grasped at something near the pedals. Once he managed to extract himself from the tunnel, the prize in Dazai's hand became visible: a hand grenade. “Bingo.”

“Great,” Chuuya turned the steering wheel all the way, catapulting them out of the highway. “Blow the motherfuckers up!”

“Not yet.”

“Not yet?”

“Let them come closer,” His rifle took care of the closest car with a clean shot; hiding behind his headrest, he studied the vehicle tailing them through the scope. “We need to take them out at once.”

“They're shooting at us —“

“Let them come closer,” he echoed, once again distracted. Anticipation stiffened his every muscle. “Let them come closer...”

From the rear view mirror, Chuuya saw them accelerate. Their cars were clearly faster than their own — they would catch up soon enough, and close range bullets were always harder to stop.

He groaned. “You couldn't have just said —“

With a curse, he kicked his own car door open, gently releasing his death-pressure on the friction. Leaning so far out of the frame of the car that the wind whipped him to a painful level, Chuuya sunk his fingers in the concrete, digging.

The suddenly razed road slowed down the Hounds cars with surprising efficiency, carving astonishment in the curses flying out of their windows. Their vehicles appeared closer and closer — right as Chuuya let go of the clawed cracks in the concrete, a wrist wrapped around his other arm, pulling him back in.

A grenade appeared in front of his mouth. Still deadly focused on their chasing dogs, Dazai ignored the unamused stare Chuuya directed his way.

“Hurry,” the boy ordered — eyes unmoving; finger on his trigger. “Would you?”

With a sigh that felt never ending, Chuuya bit down on the pin of the grenade, spitting it out right as it was thrown out of the fractured frame of the rear windshield.

The sky lit up in golden and red, sending their own car skirting forward of a dozen feet, spinning and spinning. Dazai barked out a vaguely unstable laughter, licking the blood from a cut on his cheek away with childish contentment. “To hell with dogs!” he chanted.

In the privacy of his elbow, Chuuya snorted.

Attacks to the Headquarters began in the morning.

The News blamed them on workers' protests against Mori Corporations, mixed with the rise in gang violence of the last few months. The Moons, all except for the Bishop's Staff, refused to allow them to breathe — smaller organizations joined in. Soon enough, the glass doors of the HQ were too sticky with dried blood to even be touched.

Chuuya flew through the windows, instead.

“I can just kill them all, if you want me to,” he told Mori. “Even if they send another wave — I can get rid of them.”

“Not yet,” the man replied, as he had in the last few days. He didn't understand the logic behind it — but Dazai, who was stuck in the man's office whenever he wasn't wandering around with Oda Sakunosuke and the glasses-wearing friend he'd made from the Intelligence — and whenever he wasn't busy popping Chuuya's bones back into place, and moving aside as he wreaked havoc down the city — seemed to. “As long as they're alive, the Special Division won't intervene. We can't deal with that, not until we get all the codes.”

Dazai hummed. “How do you know they haven't intervened yet?”

As one, they turned to look at him.

His smile wasn't meant for that place — for the mountains of corpses outside their doors and behind them, sagging the Infirmary and the air, piling in body bags in the warehouse they had no choice but to use as a crematory.

“Say, Boss,” he started. “And you, Chuuya, fresh out of Europe. Have you ever heard of the White Giraffe?”

---

...

---

86 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“Your brother,” Yuan began. “You said he killed your family.”

Stained-glass windows and gunpowder floors; he scrubbed at it with the pads of his gloves. Complexity was made for different things — for the roof of a room that was not his, for shelves of poetry books in a language he wished didn’t come as instinctual as it did.

Complexity was the ethical choice to take; did he? Yes. Did he? For me. Did he? I did.

Chuuya nodded. “Yeah.”

Jealousy soaked every letter out of her mouth; thicker than blood, colder than rain. Longing, in it, too; the mindlessness of someone who was angry out of habit. He understood. Shackled to a seat with a bomb on her chest; he understood.

“What were they like?”

The next time he came, he brought spoils of war: an endless amount of dusty photographs, ripped from the walls of Albatross’ apartment.

Talking about the Flags, he found, was much different from talking to their graves. He had to keep his shoulders from flinching whenever Yuan inquired after something — the sound of her voice enough to startle him. He had to keep a small house in France out of his mind; had to circle her questions about Verlaine, whose name he would not say; had to stare at the familiar — forgetting, slowly, inevitably — faces on paper longer than he had ever been brave enough to.

It was as he talked — Doc wanted to kill as many people as God had in the bible; Lippman’s favorite movies to make were the romantic comedies; Iceman had given him his first gun; Pianoman had been the first person to call him a friend after the Sheep; Albatross ate peanuts even if he was allergic to them — that he realized he had never slept in Albatross’ bed.

He was haunted by every inch of the house he couldn't call his own. Every bizarre piece of furniture whose story he'd been told too many times — let me tell you just one more time, Chuuya, in case I missed something — and every picture he couldn't bear to look at for too long.

It was one of two, he knew — Chuuya had never stopped grieving; Chuuya had never started.

“You know,” he told her, on a night his voice had almost given up on him. And so he said it again, because he needed her to understand — needed someone to hear his sins, just once. “I’ve killed a lot of kids.”

Yuan studied him some more. More pensive than she'd ever been; mature, in the most disdainful of ways. Bizarrely, the sky did not fall.

Bizarrely, Yuan did not stop looking at him.

He hadn't done a damn thing, Chuuya thought. He had done all of it. Wasn't it enough?

“My friends, though,” He tapped two fingers on the pictures. Not all the blood in this world had been spilled because of you, Madame Tanaki had said. A shame, he believed, that Adam wasn't there to explain it. That Verlaine couldn't trace their matching scars and remind him, I've killed for you; who else would give you that? “My friends, I killed.”

One night, Noguchi joined them.

He watched him blink down at Albatross' face, grinning and shameless, as heart-wrenchingly printed under his eyelids as it was on his own. Yuan couldn't understand the sudden silence; Chuuya wanted to tear the ground apart until his knuckles bled — unnecessary. He hardly needed touch to destroy.

“He,” Noguchi started. “The idiot tried to cause a mass escape from the Yokohama Zoo, once.”

When someone you love dies, he remembered telling Yuan, endless moonlights away, endless pictures in his hands, endless ghosts in the space between his teeth, You've got to kill yourself. Other than that, there is nothing left to do.

But if you do keep on living — be of service in those days you take.

And so with ease, in the middle of a rising gravestone of a city, he grieved.

59 days until the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“Gang violence has been a problem in this city longer than we’ve had to deal with anything else — wars, economic crisis, even widely spread epidemics. Yokohama flourishes in Ability Users, Mrs. Fukushima; is demanding a tighter control of where, exactly, these Ability Users end up such a wild request? I believe —“

---

...

---

57 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

There was a body on the floor of Albatross’ bedroom.

Sleep was a luxury, and opulence was short lived in the trenches. Chuuya dragged himself back to the apartment every single day, understanding that he wasn’t quite at the point where he could sleep unguarded anywhere in the organization.

And so he got home, and he dropped on his futon, and he slept. As the clock on the nightstand ticked 03:00, his arm snaked out before he was fully awake — glowing fist sinking in a man’s chest.

He extracted his arm; stared at his bleeding out silhouette on the bright green floor, silent. A Takasekai crest was tattooed on his neck.

At once, reality drowned on him.

You can’t stay here, someone said. It sounded like Albatross, just a bit — but he would have never said anything similar to that bizarre conclusion. His door had been open weeks before Chuuya had even considered stepping through the frame. Every piece of furniture he couldn’t look at, every picture he ignored, every sound of Ōmu’s mind — it was his to have, because all Albatross owned had always been.

You can’t stay here. It’s compromised.

Understanding settled between his bones. His mind ran; blood dirtied his socks; he came to a conclusion.

“Did you tell anyone?”

Hirotsu's eyes didn't widen a bit.

If he felt the weight of the blade on his throat any harder than the IVs brushing against his arms — he didn't show it. In the darkness and unusual quiet of the Infirmary, he simply stared at his stone cold eyes, and asked: "Tell what?"

"My apartment," The rise and fall of his chest was borderline painful; Chuuya had forgotten to put on shoes, too busy jumping from one roof to the other to notice. "It's compromised."

"Chuuya —"

"Mori gains nothing from telling," Chuuya insisted, between gritted teeth, pressing the knife so close a choked sound left the man's chapped lips. Were someone to enter, he would be executed on the spot. "Kouyou is in a coma. Noguchi was unconscious when I brought him there. Fucking Dazai wouldn't tell, because I know where he lives. But you," He leaned closer. "You weren't even meant to know what building I lived in."

"Chuuya, I didn't tell anyone."

"Bullshit," he snapped. "Someone had to tell, and we all know how many friends you make in a bar —"

"I didn't tell anyone."

"It was my fucking apartment!" Pounding settled on his nape; he'd left Ōmu on the window seal, he thought. No, he had been a mess of blood and feathers on the ground. "It was — Albatross' apartment, and —" He gulped; tightened his grip.

Silence spread through the walls. He was choking on it. He couldn't step in that building again; Mori had been clear on protocol regarding his closest men since the first day.

"You brought Yuan to your apartment," Hirotsu noted. "Couldn't she have talked?"

Chuuya didn't lower his eyes. "They're not asking her questions," he insisted, a bit hesitant.

"She stayed at the Orphanage," the man replied, soothing, almost; not quite scared. "They might have had an insider. She could have talked any time," He met his eyes; genuine, intent, blank. "Chuuya, I would have never told."

The knife didn't shake in his grasp, because he knew better than that. He thought back to Hirotsu's body on the floor of the Hall, the surge of anger he'd felt — I didn't even think you could die. He thought of the first days in the organization, stomping his feet, running from a man he didn't trust on principle and whose approving winks he still treasured. Feeling mocked and stupid and angry, because he'd never been a child, and their play pretend wouldn't change anything.

It's nice, Yuan had said. Having an adult worry about you.

Right as Chuuya physically recoiled from the notion, sounds exploded throughout the Infirmary.

The doors were thrown open; the stretcher that was pushed inside carried what looked more like a scribble of a man — dripping red, black, viscera and pus from every inch of it. Murmurs of astonishment joined the show; the nurses screamed to make bystanders move, as doctors put their hands on the body before he'd even been laid on a bed.

“What the hell is that?” Hirotzu wondered.

A familiar face caught his attention.

Chuuya took his knife back, making his way to Koda's silhouette, standing still near the entrance doors. The old man tailed him; he couldn't bring himself to care.

“Koda,” He snapped his fingers in front of his face, trying to call his dazed eyes on him. “Koda, what happened to him? Are you okay?”

It took him a moment to focus on their faces; blood stained his face and his hands, all the way to the rifles still tight between his fingers. “I... Yes. It was — Ability User. Opened — he opened all his wounds.”

He froze.

“They still haven't captured him?” Hirotzu snapped, holding onto his IV with white knuckles. “This is too powerful of a threat to leave wandering freely outside.”

“What happened, exactly?” Chuuya repeated.

Koda gulped. “He sneaked behind the recognition squad. Two of them died before they could even muster up a s-scream. Too many scars. One of them had been impaled, once. And then — Rin shot him, and he escaped. We can't f — we can't locate him. We've tried. We had to bring Miro here,” Distantly, his eyes blurred. “He was a victim of an explosion, a few years ago.”

Another scream crawled out of the man's lips. Red bloomed all over the doctors and the nurses' clothing, as they worked on burned flesh. His monitor beeped slower and slower; every eye in the room was on them.

Pale, Koda straightened up. “I have to go.”

“Wait,” Chuuya had been trying to catch him for a talk for days now. “Wait, can you just —“

“I have to go,” he repeated. His words were butterfly wings. “I have to — he was our temporary commander. I have to... take his place.”

The idea settled uncomfortably in his hands; the veil on his eyes didn't make him more confident. “Koda, maybe —“

Too late; by the time he'd realized he didn't know what to say, the soldier had already left.

Miro screamed, again and again. His heart monitor curled in too straight lines.

It took him three more minutes to die.

Chuuya's bones were wet fabric.

Perhaps the sudden awakening was to blame — perhaps the unbridled risk of pointing a blade to the commander of the Black Lizards' throat. He felt Hirotsu's eyes trace the bluish stains under his eyes; he settled his jaw.

“So,” he concluded, monotonously. “I need a new apartment complex.”

---

...

---

55 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

It was him they called when Dazai got shot.

Reasons thundered inside a bottle of beer he'd stolen from under Tanaki's desk. Perhaps none of his men had the guts to go against the clear order to keep the two of them away from medical cares — perhaps they couldn't stand the sight of the Mafia's uttermost-feared bleeding out.

Are demons supposed to do that?, he heard them ask, as he pushed his way through the Special Unit guarding the alley Dazai had holed up at the end of. If we tried to touch him, would it go through?

Chuuya thought them rather stupid, on principle. Cowardice was hardly ever not so.

“Keep the bedtime stories for slacking off nights,” he barked out, watching their spines snap straight. “Make sure the Blades are gone. If I catch any of you letting anybody know he's down, you'll be the ones pissing yourself in an alley.”

They obeyed — by proxy, he assumed. There was a competition, and there was a war, and there was Chuuya and Dazai, with the unspoken accord that one's plans were probably the other's. Dazai didn't have seconds in command. Dazai didn't care about authority. Dazai's men were ready to leave him to die. Dazai —

“Come on,” he told him, lightly kicking his side. “Come on. You can't die near Chinatown, Bandages. Those Takasekai assholes will claim your revolting corpse, and Mori will get mad.”

A sack of too-new bones still weighted like something that had a soul, he learned. Dazai's front bled on his back — incoherent, cheerful murmurs reached his ears all the way to the nearest safe-house of theirs, too precise not to be intended, too intended not to be delirious.

He thought about dragging him to The Alley; they had stuck an emergency kit in the hole in the wall. But the subordinates' faces were stuck under his eyelids, and Dazai had been left in an alley to bleed out in relieved silence.

He hosted him up higher. "Whatever."

Miracles and the ripped off sleeve of his shirt, tight around his torso, were all that kept him from bleeding out before the doorstep of a safehouse. By the time Chuuya dumped him inside the bathtub and turned the water on, his eyes had rolled to the back of his head.

Protocol was old; he stuck to it — because the rain from the shower-head couldn't hide any pimples, and he had a kill order for a small group from the Hounds in less than three hours.

"How did they get you?" Chuuya asked, pointlessly, brusquely, sinking in the rapidly increasing depths of the tub.

"Let them," was Dazai's uncaring murmur — unfazed by the hands removing his scarlet stained shirt, keeping the bandages where they were. Chuuya sunk his fingers deep in the bullet hole near his heart, the knife wound on his side. "I had poison in the cut their leader prodded. He had documents I needed in his pocket."

"You could have taken them from his corpse," Chuuya made him notice.

Genuine confusion crowded his eyes. "Yes," he agreed, waiting for his point.

Protocol was old; stitching up was the most boring part of the job. Dazai refused to cooperate for the savory taste of it — he stole thread and needles; he huffed and laid in all the wrong positions; he turned the shower-head off and on on repeat, soaking them to the bone and taking great pleasure from pinching the goosebumps on Chuuya's skin.

He sank his teeth in Chuuya's shoulder — because he refused to scream, even with fingers digging through his flesh for a lost bullet; because it was funnier than biting on a towel. Because he knew the sting was barely a beep in Chuuya's radar — but he also knew Chuuya would push him, and wrestling in a bathtub was the only way to keep the eerie quiet of the safe-house away from the air of their lungs.

All according to protocol.

From the space between the toilet and the bathtub, he grabbed a half-empty bottle of whiskey, shoving it into Dazai's chest.

He scoffed. "Your ass' already feverish," he concluded, pushing sweat-dripping bangs off of his clammy forehead. Scorching skin aside, the assortment of ghostly complexion and reddened eyes would have denounced the return of Dazai's most aggravating con — his borderline useless immune system. “You’ll be dribbling snot all over the city before you know it.”

“So will you,” the boy sniffed. “You’re naked in freezing water. I would curse you with a thousand colds, but your stupidity needs no support.”

“I don’t get sick, Mackerel,” he reminded him. “And I have boxers.”

Distaste appeared through the haze of his eye. “You truly have no shame, do you?”

“Lost all of it in the slums,” Distractedly, Chuuya searched for the edge of the dossiers he’d abandoned. Blood was trailing down the knife wound in Dazai’s side; he frowned at it, uncertain of where his stitches had gone wrong. “Not much time for pudor when you live with a dozen other children in a house with no actual places to shit.”

“I suppose shame is subjective,” Dazai leaned his cheek to the side of the bathtub, allowing the cold ceramic to bloom scarlet stains on his cheeks. “When’s the last time you jerked off?”

Chuuya sent him a deadly glance.

“You’re no fun.”

“When’s the last time you did, asshat?”

“Right now.”

“Shut up.”

“Maybe you should jerk off more,” Dazai considered, with the tone of someone who could not believe something less. Delirium did to his musings what winter did to decaying flesh; there was logic in every sound out of his mouth, and his eyes were frantic in their unwillingness to move. Chuuya knew he should consider himself lucky; it was a good day. He hadn’t even tried to kill himself with anything at reach. “It’d do wonders for your unpleasant personality.”

He snorted. “Bet your sick ass passes out as soon as you touch your dick.”

“That only happened once.”

“Shut the fuck up.”

Chuuya slapped some gauze over the stitches. Every light in the apartment flickered, mocked by the sudden explosion appearing from behind the moulded walls; the light bulb of the bathroom creaked miserably, before giving up the fight to stay on. Car alarms filled the silence. Dazai ripped the drain stopper off.

Heavy on his bones, he thought. The silence. Not being at the very center of that explosion.

“I have a job to do,” he insisted, countless, protesting the pull of the boy’s blood stained hands. “Stop acting like a child, I have to —“

“In two hours and thirteen minutes,” Dazai replied, not even opening his eyes, one side of his body pressed against the floor of the bathtub. “I will wash all your clothes in acid. I will draw moustaches on every single one of Mori’s paintings and blame you. I will tell Hirotsu you cried when he got shot —“

“I didn’t fucking cry, what are you even —“

They laid down, back to back, elbowing and kicking and cursing the narrow space, soaked and raining blood down the drain. Two of their safe-houses had been compromised in the last month; Chuuya’s tired mind tried to remind him of the warehouse he’d found as a possible substitute.

Nowhere was safe. No bathtub was small enough. No one could kill them.

Lullabies were an abstract concept, the way warmth had once been, but Chuuya hummed that old melody he sometimes recalled all the same. The ear he wasn’t pressing against the ceramic caught the tip-tap of the broken faucet, and the cartoons channel from the TV in what had once been a living room.

Hair brushed his own. A buzz seemed to come from the ceramic. Fingers tapped his side. Whoever closes their eyes first loses, it said.

Chuuya turned when he did. Nose to nose, he studied the bruises under his eyes.

[“Your problem, Chuuya,” Kouyou had said, “is the same as mine.”]

“Whoever closes them first wins,” he replied.

“That seems boring,” Dazai said, nonplussed. His fingers were spasming.

He had emptied out his pockets as they crossed the threshold to the bathroom; the assortment of medicine stolen from the infirmary was a constellation. Oxy? Robaxin? The suicide pills from the Nine Rings Conflict?

Water drops. Ivy, in the warehouse he’d decimated before receiving the call. Dazai’s blood under his nails. Come take him or we’ll have to leave him here. Sir.

[“You care too much about the unsavable”].

“It’s not,” Chuuya concluded. “Whoever closes them first wins.”

Somehow, they slept.

He cursed Dazai all the way to his next assignment, late for it and uncomfortably filthy, enraged for the lack of time he’d had to come up with a revenge on his surprisingly still asleep body.

He took down the group; stretched his fingers in his gloves until he was sure they would break; stood guard in front of the seven body-bags of subordinates that were brought to him, hands crossed and Flags' vows on his tongue.

The dead are to be respected, Doc would chirp.

The dead do not give a shit, Iceman would reply.

"Here," Dazai ordered, the moment he returned, moonlight over stolen clothes, scissors in hand. Chuuya knew he had entertained himself by cutting up every piece of clothing he'd dared to leave in the safe-house. "Cut my hair."

Why, he almost asked. No, he almost said. Leave me alone. I didn't even know the names of those body bags. I'm not cutting your shitty hair.

"I'm not cutting your shitty hair."

"You've been telling me to cut it since June."

"Yeah," he said. "So get it cut."

Dazai's glance was patronizing enough to burn. "You're stupider than I thought, if you think I'll let anyone do it."

Am I not anyone?, he almost asked, and he didn't, because the possibilities made him nauseous — the idea that fingers tracing scars down his chest might have meant something more than fascination. Dazai was Dazai, and his fascination ended where Chuuya's skin looked the most human.

"Surprised you'd let me put something sharp near your neck," Chuuya said, instead. "I might just do myself a great favor, while I'm at it."

"Oh," He shrugged. His shirt was too big on him. Perhaps, he noted, it was simply always tucked too tightly into his pants. Pristine and expensive and little lord, Yuan would have called him. Extracting another pair of scissors from unbuttoned pants, the boy concluded: "I have leverage."

His legs grew more used to the porcelain of the bathtub with every slight inconvenience of life. The clothes he'd let the midnight wind dry were soaked once again, because Chuuya only knew hair was meant to be cut wet. Cut off strands surrounded them — and it was just a bit disgusting, just a bit exhausting.

Just a bit irritating, the steady gaze of Dazai's eyes, — eyes, even the blind one and its strangely vital nonexistent light — and the stubbornly raised hand he kept near Chuuya's shoulder, scissors blade brushing his ponytail.

Not uncomfortable, not exactly. There, in the way of stars; in the way of corpses, on the News channel they'd turned on from the old TV.

Dazai stared, through cell bars of wet hair and wearing an overly naked face — his clothes floated in the water. “Are you the reason why every single one of the Sheep looked like a sorrowful little orphan?”

“The Sheep were all orphans,” Chuuya replied, distractedly. “And I was no hairstylist. The brats did the damage all by themselves.”

Snap! “Could you truly kill me with those?” he asked, for the pleasure of wasting air on questions whose answers he knew.

“I could kill you with anything.”

“Not your Ability.”

Snap!

“Arahaki could kill you,” he reminded him, like they both didn’t know. Dazai studied him like he knew too much. “A boulder thrown right into your scrawny face would certainly do some damage.”

“Then you’d be killing me with a boulder.”

Snap! “That’s not —“

He paused.

It started somewhere between his ribs; someplace warm. Climbed up his throat with the masterful ways of desperate disuse; rattled his teeth so violently the waves of it shook every muscle of his face.

In the stillness, Chuuya snorted.

“What?” Dazai asked, suspicious.

“You look fuckin’ ridiculous.”

An offended hum abandoned his lips. Chuuya paid it no mind — he gathered more hair from the muddy strands brushing his eyelashes, pushed them all out of the way to leave his forehead naked. Hilarity wrecked his frame, coming out in choked sounds.

“It’s not that funny,” the boy noted.

“I get why you grow your hair out like a hobo.”

His eye tic-ed. “You’re braver than I first assumed, considering how absurdly tempted I am to use the scissors in my hand.”

“Do it, and you’ll be Big Forehead McDazai for the rest of your days,” Chuuya threatened. “Maybe I’ll get you a headband. You can wear it the next time you lose at Smash Smash!,” Snap! “With little dead fish on it? What do you say?”

“You’re having so much fun with so little, it’s almost sad.”

Childlike was Chuuya’s most precious filthy cloak to lay on the shoulders of the deadliest boy he knew. The lack of bandages squeezed the danger out of his features. He had blood smeared on his clothes and stunningly big eyes; for a single moment, he understood Kouyou’s tipsy admission to having tried to dress him up as a schoolboy, once, back when Mori had brought him along.

Reality crashed with effectiveness: the unexpected snap! that choked the silence out of the bathroom — too close to his ear.

None of their subordinates dared to speak up, once they rejoined the troops. They had to wait for Kajii to come around and snicker — asking where they had found the time to go to a barber during a war.

Now devoid of a ponytail and a whole chunk of bangs respectively, both scratched by scissors all over their faces, Chuuya and Dazai didn’t say a thing.

---

...

---

51 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

An entire squadron from the GSS died in a shooting near the Headquarters. He found Rin and Kenta on the stone stairs, soaked in blood all the way to their once-silver hair, the only souls in a mile with rifles in their hands.

“It didn’t feel like anything,” Rin confessed, staring blankly ahead. “I knew most of them, but it didn’t feel like anything.”

Kenta hummed. “I think Shinso was the first to die.”

She snorted. “Predictable.”

“Predictable,” he echoed.

And then he threw up.

Chuuya couldn’t do much more than sit with them and offer them a cigarette; it didn’t feel like they were expecting anything more, though. He understood what they felt and didn’t — he’d never actually had to fight the Sheep. Perhaps they would have had more empathy.

Traitors, though — traitors, he didn't understand.

But these traitors were his friends. They had gladly dragged him home anytime he forgot he couldn't drink more than two glasses. Rin had taken a bullet for him. Kenta wanted to ask Virgil out and marry him the same night. So he sat, and he tried.

"It wasn't them we wanted to leave," Rin explained — maybe to him, maybe to the ghosts she didn't believe in. "We left a place that was rotting us from the inside. Not the people who held us through that destruction."

"Shinso sucked with a gun," Kenta sighed, face first in his own vomit, eyes glossy in a way he knew he would beg not to remember. "What a fucking moron he was."

---

...

---

49 days until the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

"Almost a year since the death of beloved actor and philanthropist, Lippman H —"

---

...

---

47 days until the end of the Dragon Head conflict.

Sleep is a luxury, and opulence is short-lived in the trenches, Kouyou had told him, once her before-sunrise training routine had begun, an endless time ago. If you fall asleep on your feet, I will ask Golden Demon to skew you.

Mori was courteous enough to inform him that all the makeshift bedrooms of the five Buildings were occupied; Chuuya came to find it meant: hope you're lucky enough to find an empty room when you need it. He could have stayed at one of Kouyou's homes, probably, but he soon discovered that never having to leave the workplace — made work much more efficient.

“I don’t think being here all the time is a good idea, Chuuya,” Kajii was the one to tell him, one night, as they met in the Entrance Hall for an infiltration. “You should spend at least a few hours somewhere that isn’t — you know. Bloody and gloomy — and your workplace.”

I’m here all the time anyway, he didn’t say. With his mind and with the repressed energy in his spine, making him scratch his skin as if could rip it and let it out. If he wasn’t allowed to do, he could at least sit near the starting line.

He wasn’t the only one. Finding mafiosi asleep in the hallways was all but a rare sight; the squad tended to pile as close as they could in a specific abandoned office at Building Five. Night and day were the same; snores filled the silence at the most various times, light sleep that would be shaken by too-close footsteps.

Having sworn off sleeping on floors for the rest of his life — Chuuya took advantage of the general tendency to avoid his gaze to secure the uncomfortable, golden lined couches littering the hallways of Building One.

“You’re so stingy with space,” Dazai whined, from the other end of the couch, sinking his muddy shoes in his side. “How does someone so imperceptibly small occupy so much space?”

As far as he knew, the boy’s shipping container had not been considered compromised — because Mori was Mori, and Dazai had always had different rules. Him being stuck at the HQs was a sign of the height of the conflict; whenever Chuuya passed the doors to the Boss’ office, he was guaranteed to see him leave or enter the room.

Gravity was something he understood. Whatever it was that kept pulling the two of them in the same square of air — he knew it had nothing to do with it.

Perhaps, easily enough, it was bad luck.

[“Just look for Chuuya,” he heard Elise say, to a member of the Intelligence looking for Dazai].

“Find another couch,” Chuuya muttered, some days later, as he fell on the closest surface. The winter sun was high and bright in the sky; he was still drying up from the storm that had caught the squad near the eastern border. “Sleep under a fucking desk, since you’re so fond.”

“I hope those foolish words you love to spit around choke you, one of these days,” was Dazai’s reply, half hanging from the armrest, eyes closed. “And desks are good for thinking, thank you. Not sleeping.”

He was too exhausted to fight. The moment his cheek connected with a thigh — good quality pants; the insufferable texture Dazai preferred in his every piece of clothing — he was back on bloodied concrete, with Arahabaki too satisfied to knock.

Dazai's head landed somewhere near his own legs; then he was out.

When the hallways were too crowded and his trust in any body apart from his own were too low — he took refuge in one of the safe houses still standing. Dazai's presence there was sporadic; his tendency was to sleep in the bathtub, for some reason. Sometimes — when no other place was empty and silent-but-loud enough — they stayed in Kouyou's makeshift room. Backs to her bed, working on reports and plans they — officially — weren't allowed to share with the other.

"I'm getting bored," Dazai said, one evening, head tilted back against the hospital bed. A few aisles away, one or two patients were tearing their throats apart. "No one has told me to stand straighter in forever. When is the Sleeping Beauty going to wake up?"

Dazai's lap overflowed in maps and reports, as he muttered in other languages and scribbled all over the chocolate-stained paper with a glittery pen that had Elise's name all over it. The exhausted line of his back paused at the dip between their shoulders, before restarting with Chuuya's own.

His fingers spasmed, involuntarily. He counted water drops on the floor, dripping from his nails, from his hair — an accident near the port. There was something in Chuuya's chest that demanded him to breathe — he wanted to curl around it, arms tight around his knees, all to make sure it wouldn't escape.

More shrieks echoed off the walls; they rattled the windows and his skeleton alike. He was rarely affected by these kinds of sounds. But every water drop was a roar, every heartbeat a storm; childishly, he wished he could put his hands on his ears and —

Kouyou's sleeping frame was a familiar picture; he didn't turn to look at her. "Her medical records are alright. Recovery is guaranteed to be smooth. She just won't wake up."

"As I said," he huffed, but there was little energy in it. Eyes were eyes; Chuuya didn't know what about Dazai's told him he'd spent the night in the dungeons, but it was there. "Lazy."

For that, he slapped his nape.

"You know," Chuuya licked chapped lips. "It could be worse," He closed his eyes; yawned. "At least they die when we hit them."

A snort. "The Souls were rather stubborn."

The screams subdued. Less than a breath later, the agonizing crying started.

Hirotsu came to check on them, seemingly bearing no antagonism for Chuuya. Another dozen wounded were brought in. Kouyou did not wake up. At some point, miraculously enough, Dazai's eyelids began to drop.

The sight was aberrant enough to keep Chuuya still — even when Dazai's body fell sideways between the hug of his chest and knees. Maps and reports spread on the floor. His eye was closed, only fluttering along to the calm breathing pattern of his chest.

[“You always look mad when you sleep,” Doc had told him, once].

Crying turned into hollering; the frequency of it popped something in the depths of his skull.

He fixed Dazai’s body so that his head would be pressed against his waist instead, crossing his arms upon his side. He laid his chin on it; caged the breathing close to his chest — relished in the quiet. Chuuya needed more.

Finding a free bed in the endless rooms of the Headquarters was a stroke of luck. Most rooms hosted bunk beds and non-descriptive desks — the bathrooms, at least, were untouched by the blood and organs staining every outside wall.

As it went, Chuuya was rarely awake enough to scoot the floors to find a possibly empty room. Whenever it happened, he made sure to make his presence known — a crater or two outside the door would usually do. Sharing hadn’t been his thing since the Sheep.

Again, only one person seemed to miss the memo. The insomniac one.

“Remember that time we got in a fight at that one konbini Tanaki sent us to, and that grandma told us to go back to school?” Dazai asked, leaning over the edge of the top bunk — low enough that it was a wonder he wasn’t falling.

Eyes to the wall, Chuuya pretended not to hear.

“Was it that time you almost gave me a concussion with a baguette?” he continued, undeterred. “Or was that when I beat your record at Shooter 300?”

“You never beat that record, you liar — “

Days later, as they were curled up in the further corner of an empty hallway, coats stuck to the wall with medical tape like a makeshift curtain, he said: “I’m hungry. Let’s go eat somewhere.”

“We can’t,” Chuuya reminded him, pressed against the wall. “We’ve been banned from every diner in the city.” Fights tended to break too easily wherever they went; shadows of the Port Mafia had a nice ring to it — but he bet whatever name the food chains of Yokohama had given them was nicer.

“Not from the Arcade,” Dazai insisted, throwing himself over him until he could blink at him upside down. “They give out chips. ”

“No, that too. We just pretend it didn’t happen.”

“Of course we do,” he considered — always the clever one.

Chuuya wanted to shake him. Two halves don’t make a whole, he would have spat in his mouth, until it reached his skull and got rattled around enough to stick — but it was pointless, because Dazai already knew all he had ever considered, and he only did things to show off that he knew them first. Two halves don’t make a whole, and we’re barely a quarter.

Two hopeful fools won't make a man, he wouldn't say, and I won't make you any more human at all.

On the bloodier days, the conflict seeped underneath the door, and it soaked the sheet until they were too cold to lie in. On those days, they laid maps on the floors and they plotted, begging the clock to land on the time to escape that cage they had locked themselves into.

“Only the Bishop's Staff left,” Dazai whispered. Smart in the way of prodigies, he had managed to take imperceptible steps everyday — and the end of the race was under the blankets of Chuuya's bed. “And the fools that keep drooling on the doorstep.”

“Isn't shitting a better term?” he replied, too tired to even keep his eyes open.

A huff of air hit his face.

His body wasn't sure of whether to scoot closer or move away. Dazai would have never admitted it, but Chuuya knew that — for whatever reason — he slept better like that. Knees were pressed against his own; there was a voice in the back of his mind telling him to reach forward — sleep quietly.

He didn't do it.

“Doesn't matter,” the Demon Prodigy concluded. Their badly cut strands of hair got tangled up. “We'll put an end to this boring farce soon enough.”

At some point, they began fighting for a room, discovering the full capacity of the murmurs draped all over them like a veil. A bed was more tempting than a couch or a safe house's mattress on the floor — but the more the war lasted, the less he could care about the idea of resting a moment more.

They returned from duo missions; they stumbled up the stairs, because Chuuya still refused to enter the elevator and Dazai still refused to stop asking after it — and when he dropped on the nearest bed, he didn't flinch at the second indent in the mattress any longer.

“Bet you a Smash Smash session we end it this week,” Dazai would yawn, sometimes, under the cocoon of the covers — a dome upon too small bodies for a city tearing itself apart.

For the sake of arguing, Chuuya would yawn too — a nice quirk, Doc had called, how we are all thieves, in the end — and say: “Bet you my 73th revenge method we end it tomorrow.”

---

...

---

40 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

Hirotsu's Ability was solemn in its anger, but lethal all the same.

He appeared at the front doors of the Headquarters like a thundering god from the stories Virgil loved to blabber about — the cigarette in his hand was premature, but a promise in its nature. The crowd attacking the building paused along with the smoke he breathed out.

“He missed the action, didn't he?” Rin whistled, watching the purple strikes of his Ability tear into flesh. “Has he been informed about the don't kill too many order?”

“He won't care,” Chuuya replied, eyes stuck to the scene. The first he'd seen of Hirotsu Ryuro was his Ability; the last he'd see of him would probably match that fateful encounter. The King of the Sheep had respected strength more than most things — being the only person in Suribachi City with an Ability, powerful visitors from Yokohama had been the highlight of his days.

I can teach you, the man had told him, only once. He had done something cool with his gun; Chuuya had hated being caught. If you want.

Joining their command, the Black Lizards roared.

“Oh, Hirotsu is back?” Mori commented, at the end of the day, with borderline genuine surprise. “How wonderful. Hirotsu, how would you feel about eradicating what's left of the KK Company? Is your heart feeling alright?”

Upon a puddle of blood from the edges of his own coat, the man smiled. Upon the Boss' shoulder, he met Chuuya's eyes, and winked. “My heart is right where it should be, Boss.”

---

...

---

37 days until the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“Another attack, this time near the suburbs, caused an earthquake of unprecedented vitality — and of dubious naturality, seeing how the Government refuses to answer clearly to the most demanded question of the last few months: what are they going to do about the Ability Users destroying our city? It seems —”

---

...

---

36 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

The unsterilized blankets were moved aside with little grace. “Move your shitty backside,” Chuuya ordered, quietly, not to disrupt the ever so rare silence of the Infirmary.

Dazai’s reddened, sweaty face appeared, blinking confusedly at his climbing silhouette. “Chuuya?” he croaked, in that way — not one of his nicknames, though it felt like it should have been; the, I always know when it’s you, kind of way; the, don’t ask me why I ask anyway. His unfocused eyes were spinning around frantically, alerted and insisting, unwilling to match the sickly embrace of his whole body.

“Yes, yes, don’t piss your pants. Move.”

The bed was a nest of unhealthy warmth and sweat; the brush of those filthy blankets on naked skin, when his shirt rose with the effort of slipping in, was enough to twist his nose. Under the stunned gaze and crimson stains on Dazai’s cheeks, he settled the blankets all the way to their chins. “Heard your dumb ass got himself sick again. Like the fucking moron you are.”

“It’s not my fault if we’re in the rain season,” the boy protested, nasally. “Don’t tell Mori I’m here.”

“I’m not stupid,” he mumbled, hanging his hat by the headboard. “It’s not like —“

“Don’t tell Mori,” Dazai insisted, cutting him off sharply enough to make him blink. Something in his eye was begging to grow dark; it was too blurred to. “He said no doctors. It’s just very loud, everywhere. But no doctors. Don’t tell Mori.”

Chuuya stared.

“We’re just sleeping,” he said, tentatively. There was something he was missing, he knew; something as secret as the shut doors of Mori’s office, and the blown out pupil the boy sometimes sported when he left it — the frequency with which he’d had to remove a gun from his grasp these last few weeks. “It’s late. I just came back from a mass shooting near our warehouse. He should have furnished more rooms, if he didn’t want us to steal the nearest free bed.”

[Chuuya wasn’t blind. He just wasn’t —]

Somehow, the words settled him down.

“Stop that,” Dazai lamented, eventually. “It’s loud and aggravating. Just like you.”

“Stop what?”

Warm fingers removed his hands from his arms, pausing the scratching. “He can’t eat away your skin, anyway,” A sneeze. “Unfortunately.”

How unstoppable it was, he thought — to be known, to some extent. Arahabaki had been a secret for as long as he could remember; he didn’t know if either of them would ever truly enjoy the company.

There’s decay everywhere, he could have told him. It’s unfair to keep him locked. There’s so much. It’s going to go to waste.

Instead, he studied the sweaty stains of white fabric on his face, hiding the half that wasn’t sunk in his pillow. He tapped on it. A bit brusque, softened by the whisper-like shade of his tone, he asked: “Can I take these off?”

Hesitation sagged the space between their bodies.

“There are curtains,” Chuuya reminded him. There’s only me. “At worst, I’ll just strangle you with the pillow to hide you from sight.”

A tap on his nose. I hope you die.

He had to search for the metal clip, hand in his matted hair, watching Dazai’s eyelid tremble with it. He hung the bandages around the metal railings of the bed; the clip clinked, only once.

The sight of his uncovered face only heightened the sickness he radiated; a mixture of unusual youth and the ruined dress shirt he wore, no tie. Chuuya’s little finger was caught: Dazai’s own wrapped around it with ephemeral strength, pulling at the fabric of his glove until he got the message. With a huff, he removed both gloves.

“One tacky accessory less,” Dazai noted, satisfied. “Now we just need to burn your hat.”

“I’ll burn you. ”

“I’ll stick you in those paper grinders Hirotzu likes.”

“I’ll ask Elise to make you wear a schoolgirl dress.”

He gasped, offended. Chuuya took his face in his now naked palms, tilting it up to study a new scar between his eyebrows. His eyelids fluttered shut; he sighed, going pliant in his grasp. “Cold,” he murmured, deliriously, pressing harder against his fingers. Chuuya could understand — he was a living furnace, marking his hands with clammy, scarlet cheeks.

“You look like a dead fish,” he concluded. “Even more than usual. The stench is that, too.”

Touch evaded Chuuya like a subject the Sheep had had no time to teach. But it never failed to shut Dazai up — an assortment of longing and astonishment that he probably didn't think he'd noticed. He had pushed him away from a hidden mine, the last time they'd seen each other; had held onto his wrists like there was more reason than survival to it.

"Hey," he sighed, because fair was fair. "Tell me shit about bugs."

"I don't like bugs anymore," Dazai whined.

"I thought they were your favorites."

"No," Dazai said. He moved his head in his grasp, just barely — just enough for his thumbs to land underneath his eyes, where skin grew in the colors of the Bay. "You didn't."

Always the smart one.

He sighed. "Tell me shit about snakes, then."

"I want Kazuko," His hands slipped off his face; sinking his face in the pillow, Dazai sighed, too. "Did you see the new squadron at Building Four?"

A frown. "Yes."

"And?"

It took him a moment to swerve through the possible requests of that nonexistent question. Eventually, he landed on: "How would you kill the undercut bastard? The one who carries those big ass guns around."

"That's boring," Dazai sniffed; he scooted closer, staring up at him with quiet wonder. It was an agonizingly young expression. He realized, a bit belatedly, that he had never dared to be the one entering his bed. "How would you frame him for murder?"

He fell asleep mid conversation; Chuuya stayed where he was, because the other option was sitting next to Kouyou's bedside and watch lines that refused to change until he started to blink. He stole the warmth; kept himself from scratching his skin as much as he could; focused on the eventual cough and murmur from behind the curtains, ready to pull the blanket and hide them.

Don't tell Mori.

Naked fingers did not deserve to go to waste; he traced the veins underneath Dazai's blind eye with his index, feeling the slight bumps of the barely-there scars surrounding the eyelid.

Revenge method number 54, he recalled, demanded him to sit a few inches from the glowing screen of a Smash Smash! station, eyes forcefully separated, until he began to cry. Simple enough even the Sheep would have praised it — expected enough the Flags would have snickered, the memory of the afternoons Chuuya had been dragged to the Arcade by the local demon all too fresh in their minds.

His nape was a lake of sweat that made him retch — nonetheless, when a mumble escaped the Dazai's lips, after an accidental knot of his fingers with the hair tickling his neck — he didn't move.

"I had such a weird dream," he mumbled, at some point; and if Chuuya hadn't heard the change in his heartbeat, he might have been surprised. "Chuuya was a dog. That's the realistic part. But I think you were chasing Kajii down the street? That's realistic, also. And then Beatrice appeared, and she asked me to play her a song," He stretched in that contained space. "Dreams are intriguing."

"I wouldn't know," Chuuya said, before he could convince himself not to. "I don't dream."

A pause. "Never?"

"Never."

"You don't remember dreaming."

"No," He shook his head, pulling at the sheets of the mattress, looking at nothing over his shoulder. "I just don't. It's — shit from the lab. In whatever sense. Clones don't dream," He frowned. "Neither do experiments."

Genuine confusion painted his features. Perhaps it would have been hidden better, had he been more in his right mind. "But you're —" His lips shut. "That's stupid."

The instinct to start a fight rattled his spine. "I know it's fucking stupid, thank you very much."

"No, I mean —" Frustration shut him up again. "Whatever. Whatever, I —"

Murmurs appeared behind the curtains.

Chuuya reacted quicker than even he had expected; his fist closed in a death grip around the back of Dazai's skull, pulling him under the covers he threw over their heads. His other hand landed somewhere around his blind eye, an unlikely eyepatch — automatically, the way they'd learned slipping through vents and sewers, their bodies curved around each other, turning them into a mere bump underneath white sheets.

Don't let Mori —

The sound of the curtains being pulled aside made them stiffen; two nurses said something about a sleeping patient.

Their steps pressed Dazai's fingers harder against his mouth; he kept the urge to bite them off to himself, eyes tightly shut, hearing nothing but his heartbeat and the one against him.

Years later, the nurses yawned, pulling the curtains back as they moved on to the next section.

Since illness was a hushed curse upon Dazai's body, he didn't erupt in a coughing fit as soon as they dropped back straight on the bed. His chest hit the mattress with an imperceptible, frustrated groan — he landed nose first on Chuuya’s shoulder, and Chuuya kept his eyes on the ceiling, counting reasons to push him and his snotty face aside. Relief sunk them deeper and deeper down the bed — an awkward intake of air, between a kid getting scolded and a soldier being executed.

It doesn’t fit, he thought, nonsensically. Led lights on the ceiling and blood under his nails; he’d have to be up soon enough. I don’t know where to put it.

Dazai’s stomach rumbled. He longed for a console, some video game he might lose his mind over. Another grenade pin between his teeth. For Kouyou to wake up. For the war to be over; for the war to never end. For Mori not to exchange him with something more useful than he’d managed to make himself, as soon as the streets were no longer black and red.

This youth — I don’t know where to put it.

“Dreaming,” he murmured. “What does dreaming feel like?”

The words were bit into his shoulder. “Like what you feel when you genuinely believe you’ll become an Executive.”

Chuuya sunk his nails on his nape; traced the tattoo he couldn’t see, underneath bandages and bandages.

“Like a story,” Dazai said, eventually, more than an hour later. His cheek was on the pillow; they faced each other even like that, and he could have pressed himself against the metal railing and stepped away — and he didn’t. “Sometimes good, sometimes bad. Most times it makes no sense. Like growing numb under Elise’s squeaks about her dolls’ latest conversation.”

Chuuya didn’t speak.

“Hey,” He perked up. “Do you want me to tell you a story?”

“That’s not how it works.”

“Here’s the story,” Ignoring him, as it went, Dazai cleared his throat. Resigned to his fate — to the gravity pulling his eyelids closed, pulling them too close on a spacious bed; the gravity that gravity was not — he bit his tongue and he listened. “I met this cat, once. He carried a cane everywhere.”

---

...

---

38 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“I don’t want it,” Noguchi admitted, fixing Yuan’s sleeping head on the back of her seat.

He kept quiet.

“The Executive seat. I don’t want it.”

“I know you don’t,” Chuuya said.

They dragged body bags across the floor, and the man spilled the matter all over the floor again — next to blood he was losing from the bullet wound they’d bandaged to the best of their abilities. “I think you’d be good at it, though.”

Chuuya zipped the bag closed; the sound as familiar as his heart flow in his ears. “At what?”

“Being an Executive.”

He wasn’t quick enough to hide his surprise.

“You — save people,” Noguchi continued. His cheek brushed the ground; all he could see was the edge of his tattoo. “Whenever you can, however you can. The men talk about it. They’re not used to commanders throwing themselves into the battle before they are ordered to. They admire that you’d take a bullet for the lowest ranked of them.”

He kept his eyes on the fabric. “Saving is a secondary issue in criminal organizations.”

“Said criminal organizations wouldn’t exist, if someone didn’t bother saving those who make it.”

Heat flicked his fingers, spreading up and down his gloves. Chuuya was done with unworthy victims. Chuuya was pent up to the tip of his bones. He couldn’t get tired.

“You save people,” Noguchi concluded. The guilt in his tone could have eaten him alive.

“Mafia or not Mafia. That’s what an Executive should do, I think.”

Be grateful, Chuuya.

---

...

---

34 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

Q was holding Mori's hand.

"Give me a moment," the man said, abandoning the child on the armrest of his seat. He spoke into his phone — seemingly blind to the speechless drape embracing the Executive tables.

Ace and the Colonel exchanged a heavy look, on opposite sides of Q's distracted humming. Taking advantage of the distraction, Chuuya pulled Dazai behind the nearest column, hiding them from the Executives' questions. "Did you know about this?" he hissed. "Has he gone senile or something?"

"Well, Q needs to be used, at some point," the boy replied. "It's in the word. Ability User."

He stared. "Last time we let them out, they attempted to murder the entire lobby of Building Three in cold blood."

"They also helped us, in Rengoku."

"Because we were controlling them," he insisted. "Who has time to babysit a psychopath during a war? I'm already dealing with you."

Genuine surprise marked his next words. "And here I thought you'd gotten attached to the brat. They have a little hat and everything."

"It's not —" Frustration sagged through his teeth. Lowering his voice, he snapped: "I lost an entire squadron to Takasekai yesterday, all because Koda wasn't fully in his brain. Q is not stable. They need training, and to metabolize why Mori stuck them in a high security cage. We can't deal with this, too."

Thoughts traveled behind several invisible layers on Dazai's sole visible eye, too quick to follow. Abruptly — regretfully enough to jolt him into stillness — Chuuya got the feeling of having made a mistake.

"Forgive the interruption," Mori offered a tense smile to the table, settling back on his seat. Leaning one gloved hand on Q's shoulder, he continued: "I suppose I should ask whether there are any questions."

His tone wasn't particularly inviting. Nonetheless, Ace was uncharacteristically bold enough to clear his throat. "Boss, are you — absolutely sure, this is the best course of action?"

"The Port Mafia's major strength has always been its Ability Users," the Colonel intervened, surprisingly. Chuuya, who had thought they were all on the same wave of length, snapped his head to him. "While perhaps — uncertain, at times, Q's Ability is powerful. Enough to get us through the last defenses for the codes. Maybe," He intertwined his hands. "Maybe, even to retrieve our codes from the Bishop's Staff."

Mori smiled; mockery lined it like fake silver. "Couldn't have said it better, Colonel."

“But will they collaborate?” Ace insisted.

Q tilted their head to the side, realizing all the attention had moved to them. The overgrown pullover they wore hid hands and arms he knew to be scarred — he wondered, sometimes, whether taking the blades off wouldn’t have solved many of their problems.

With wide, entertained eyes, they teased: “Q wants the doll back.”

Chuuya knew. He’d heard them talk about it relentlessly, during every visit he’d forced himself through in the name of — something. Misplaced empathy; Arahabaki’s unusually delicate claws tearing his chest apart whenever he dared to visualize a child stuck in a metal cage, surrounded by soldiers and needles. It doesn’t hurt.

He had grown up around children with eyes just like theirs. Lesson learned; he didn’t trust them one bit.

“—to guard them,” Mori was explaining, still. “Dazai is the best option, of course. But I need him. Someone will have to dedicate themselves to the task with more frequency, until we get a hold of at least another code.”

“What about Koda Katsumi?”

For a single moment, Chuuya failed to connect the voice filling the waiting silence with the body next to his. Once he did, he stiffened, fingers curling into the column — he would have wiped the betrayed look off his face with his nails, had he been able to.

“From Chuuya’s squad?” Mori asked, blinking curiously at the boy, now standing at the other end of the table. “Why him in particular?”

Dazai didn’t waste a second. “He’s to indirectly blame for the annihilation of Squadron 45, down the Bankoku Bridge,” he reported, ignoring the widening cracks Chuuya’s fingers were leaving in the marble, underneath his feet — into the temple he was piercing with his eyes. “His brother was one of the victims from the Wild Geese Orphanage massacre. He has been difficult to control. Several attempts on my life were put in place — which I can only thank him for, of course. I believe a break from his duties might help.”

All was static.

He could have heard a pin drop, Chuuya thought. He could have slit Dazai’s throat open with it.

“Is that so?” Mori’s toneless remark raised every hair in his body. “Nothing of the sorts was reported.”

“Koda is under control, sir,” Chuuya spoke up, taking a step forward. Anger shook his frame only harder than it poisoned his letters; he felt Dazai’s eyes on him, and he wanted to — “Grief has made him less precise, but he is still one of my most competent men. The accident at Bankoku Bridge — I was the one to send him with the group. I reported as much; I take the blame for it.”

Chin on his hands, the Boss hummed, pensive. Q was waving at him. They had never looked so excited.

“The kid will need guards,” the ex-doctor noted, a bit distractedly. He nodded. “Alright. Koda will direct the group. Colonel, he’ll report to you, and you will let me know how he intends to proceed. He is excused from any other occupation — work with Chuuya’s squad included,” His seat didn’t screech when he stood up; he was reminded, somewhat pointlessly, of just how much taller he sometimes looked. “Q is to be never left alone. Understood?”

The Colonel bowed his head.

“This is a second chance. Should he somehow be — lacking, in his duties,” Mori added, eyes settled on Dazai’s undeterred gaze. “He will be punished for all the trouble he has caused. Permanently.”

He froze.

“As for you, Chuuya.”

Pin drop, he thought. Pin drop —

“Your loyalty is admirable,” the Boss concluded, once the silence was no longer to his taste. “But you will be asked to put it aside, for the well-being of the organization. I trust you will be able to. Clear?”

Because it was expected, Chuuya kneeled to the ground, hat in hand and —

“This isn’t going to solve anything!” Madame Tanaki snapped, pushing Dazai away from his clawed grasp, pulling at his severed strands to get him away from his silhouette on the floor. “Chuuya, stop it — stop it right now —!”

“He needs to keep my friends’ names out of his fucking mouth!” he snarled, fighting against her grip, munching on his words along to the blood pooling from his split lip. The Entrance Hall had been emptied out the moment the two of them appeared, bruised and screaming and pushing each other down the stairs; Chuuya hadn’t seen any of it. His eyes were stuck. “I’m not fucking letting him put his dirty tongue where it doesn’t fucking belong again —“

“Look at you,” Dazai mocked, toneless and blank, dragging his bandaged wrist up the blooming blood of his eyebrow. “So much for being loyal to the organization. Causing problems as soon as one of your beloved children pulls at your gown —“

“I was dealing with him!”

“You,” Bark and no bite — teeth indents in the quiet of his eyes, “— were letting him fail his missions.”

“You got his brother killed —“

His laughter was a spit. “I’d do it again.”

“Dazai!” Madame Tanaki thundered. “This isn’t the time to fight with each other —“

Chuuya didn’t hear anything of it. He escaped her grasp with some well placed kicks he would regret later, and paid no mind to her rage — all he saw was red, was Arahabaki’s laughter down his skin, scraping, scratching; was Doc’s upper body on the floor and Lipmman’s hand on the edge of Verlaine’s truck, and all of it was his plan, the clammy skin under his fists, as he kept him down and punched, punched, punched —

“I’m killing you,” he promised, fingers locked around the collar of his shirt, foreheads so close they were brushing, bleeding on him and smelling his blood. What does dreaming feel like? “I’m killing you, this is a promise —“

Drool and red on his teeth, all Dazai did was stare up at him — impassible. Bored. Untouched by it. This is my carcass and you cannot hurt it.

“You liar,” he said.

Before Chuuya could strike again, arms wrapped around his middle, bodily pulling him away from his target — too strong to be Madame Tanaki, too quiet, as he dragged him out of the glass doors and threw him on the sidewalk, until the sound of her worries and Dazai’s nothingness were muffled and distant. He panted, fingers sinking in the concrete, smashing and creaking and destroying, and —

“On your feet,” the Colonel ordered, blocking the doors. “Ability Users don’t belong to the ground.”

“What the fuck do you want?” he growled.

“For you not to kill one of our aces out of some misplaced sense of loyalty,” was his answer, simple. Chuuya climbed to his feet, purely to feel less like had to look up at him; his posture was that of a soldier, and he could not stand the sight — had grown sick of it, after years he didn’t even remember. “We don’t have time for children.”

“He —!“

“Nakahara,” Firmly, he stared him down. “Remember yourself.”

He breathed.

Sunk his nails in his palms; breathed again.

“Come on. Take a cigarette. We need to talk.”

It took several miles to calm down enough not to dig holes in the street with every step he took. His mind was stuck in a loop; he couldn’t stand the vision of bandages and blood and the blankness on his face any longer, but it did not stop him.

I told you, Arahabaki crooned. I told you, I told you, I told you all the time.

“Should Koda be executed,” the Colonel spoke, once the port had appeared at the edge of their vision — once Chuuya’s cigarette had grown to be the brightest light in the night, instead of his shaking frame. “It would not be your fault, or your merit. Only his. You do not have the right to steal from lesser men.”

Acutely — for no real reason, and every in the world — he wished Kouyou was standing next to him instead.

“He’s more of a man than the bastard will ever be,” he replied, teeth gritted. “Maybe even more than you. Sir.”

The Colonel hummed. “Were we in the army, that remark would have gotten you court martialed.”

“How lucky we aren’t.”

“I forget it, sometimes,” He came to a halt. Hands crossed at the small of his back, he leaned across the railing facing the bay, studying him. “Here’s a question, Nakahara.”

Chuuya kept his eyes on the currents.

“If the need arose,” he asked, “would you use Corruption?”

He didn’t hesitate. “Obviously.”

“I heard it was killing you,” A long look at his hidden forearms told him just how well he’d heard about it. “Boss seemed to think it was messing with your body and your head. Dazai believes you’ve strained yourself, and might now be — more sensitive, to new attempts. That’s why you had to stop.”

“I don’t care what he thinks. I know what I’m capable of,” Arahabaki wouldn’t risk me, he didn’t say. He cannot afford it. He will, one day. Not yet.

“You would do it,” the Colonel echoed. “Even at the cost of your life.”

“Yes,” Chuuya snapped, defensive. “Yokohama has given me more than anyone. Yes, I would.”

His half-burned cigarette was thrown over the railing. “Wrong answer.”

“What?”

“You should have said, yes, I will,” the man corrected him, swiftly. The moon reflected in the bay — a drop of fresh blood from his lip pooled down, ruining the circles of air in the water. “And I will not die from it.”

---

...

---

33 days until the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“...certainly predict a rise in victims before the month's end — bringing us to an astonishing number of three hundred casualties in the last few weeks. We have reasons to believe the height of the conflict has not yet been reached; as always, all citizen are asked to remain home and —“

---

...

---

31 days until the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“...victims numbers rise to —“

---

...

---

29 days until the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“...evacuate the area immediately —“

---

...

---

28 days until the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“...seem at least one of the gangs might be attempting to leave civilians out of the conflict —“

---

...

---

26 days until the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“...European and American located —“

---

...

---

24 days until the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“Chuuya nii-san,” Q grinned. A man had impaled himself in a deranged rage; he’d rained so much blood on their waiting, small frame, every inch of them was crimson and onyx, all down the drain of the streets of Yokohama. “This is so much more fun than those army generals.”

---

...

---

23 days until the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“Chuuya,” Mori said. “Power is not to be contained.”

Since he had first heard his name, Chuuya had thought about killing Mori Ougai exactly four times.

The first had been more inconsequential than the others — hatred for a whispered name in the slums. He hadn’t even had a face; only a thick stench of blood and stealing hands. With every new day in the syndicate, all of it began to taste inconsequential — measly thoughts of slaughter; sticky but unwanted. Chuuya’s thoughts were always shaded crimson at the edges. Mori sat on a throne of bones all the same, and Chuuya had kneeled all the same.

Underneath the shattered colors of the glass-stained windows, he kept his eyes on the ground — as it suited a man faced with the one weapon he did not have the authority to move from his neck. “I know, Boss.”

“Q is certainly a threat,” he continued, fingers still scamming through his latest report. A massacre had occurred near the Takasekai border, all to stop an attempt to retrieve the codes they had stolen. By accident, Q had killed seven of their men — three of which were part of their guard. “But power is not,” he repeated, gently, “To be contained.”

“Power is not to be hidden behind a wall, to gape at — to fear even when away from it. This is the way we think. This is what keeps us alive. And I know you understand,” Mori put a hand on his shoulder. Chuuya was hanging from every word out of his lips; here’s what you never were. “Because you have never contained your power. You have always been smart. The Sheep underestimated it; the Flags understood it. Using Q is necessary. This is the way we do things.”

Chuuya nodded, just once.

“Any other mentality belongs to the other side,” His fingers slipped; tapped his pulse, on his neck, pressing harder when he stiffened under it. “To people who can rightfully claim their blood has never seen a pigment of black. Why do you think the Special Division was so desperate to get their claws on you?”

The first thing he had learned in Suribachi City was the most important of them all. Subtle and sharp, upon gentle eyes of the man who he had given his life to. Chuuya knew how to understand threats.

“I have proved my loyalty many times, Boss,” he said, simply. “I will continue to do so.”

“Not loyalty,” Mori corrected. “It bleeds out of you in copious amounts. I should be blind not to see it. But I need you to trust my decisions. And to obey them.”

Shattered colors on the floor — Q's giggles when he had extracted them from the blood of a subordinate whose name he had known. Koda's blank gaze, and his hand tight around their smaller own.

“As you wish, Boss,” Chuuya concluded.

---

...

---

22 days until the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

The moment his hand touched his chest, Chuuya recalled everything he had ever been told about him — all they had talked about.

[“They’re calling him ‘The Wound Reaper’,” Kajii reported, one day, as they watched a body crumble and shriek near the entrance to the Infirmary.

“Fuckin’ pathetic,” Chuuya muttered, as he had whenever Agent Minami mentioned it. “Where even is he? I haven’t bumped into him once. Even that shitty Dazai has no idea of where to find him.”

The next scream out of a woman’s mouth startled the entire room.

“Isn’t that an unfair advantage?” Kajii said, eventually. “Look at me. I’m immune to lemon shaped bombs. That’s a normal Ability. But something like this? How is it fair?”

Chuuya could have told him stories that would have scarred him for a while. He had no desire to. “As long as there’s someone weak enough to be defeated, people who can defeat will exist.”

A curious look. “Where did you hear that?”

A rural house in western France, he thought. Blood on the walls. “I read it in a diary.”

“Some of our men are to be kept as far from this Reaper as possible,” Ace ordered, during the next meeting he spied on. “They survived unimaginable horrors. One touch from this man could turn their body into a minefield.”

Hirotsu’s eyes were a weight down his frame, tracing craters Chuuya lacked and rotten skin he hadn’t seen anywhere but in his reflection in eons. With a blank tone that knew which borders were not to be violated, he said: “Leave him to us, Chuuya. Just him, alright?”].

Something rose and golden had appeared at the edge of his vision; the User didn't see him, he knew, but he settled his eyes on his running silhouette — up and down the buildings, sword in hand — and thought, nice of you to visit your cellmate.

Thought: when I kill you.

“There,” the Wound Reaper murmured — with Chuuya's arm sunken to the elbow inside his chest. “Two bothers less to the world.”

Chuuya did not feel pain. His body could not understand the concept — could not create comparison between unhealed skin and battered one, for the distinction did not exist.

Every crater reopened; every stitch disappeared. Every memory of suffering he had got stuck in his ribs, sticky and clawing and dirty and endless — it bloomed. Chuuya did not feel pain; the warmth of the Ability offered the truth on a silver platter: he had never felt anything but.

When he fell to his knees, he did so without a sound.

---

...

---

[It was close to midnight, when unmistakable knuckles knocked on the man's door.

He made his way to it, dragging naked feet up on moquette. Although Yokohama had had better times to survive without over-exaggerated protection measures, only one lock separated him from the source of his curiosity.

Relative curiosity. He knew there existed less surprising things than him visiting at unpredictable times. He never broke in; just knocked.

His silhouette was a known sight, framed by the rusted edges of his too-small apartment door — the overgrown coat he was never without, brushing the muddy ground as if reaching to dig for blood it was sure to find. He had looked just like that, the day he'd found him in a blackening crimson bed of death. He had never looked any different.

Today, he was the one carrying a corpse.

“Odasaku,” Dazai greeted, politely. If the bleeding mess of bones and harsh breaths and violent scarlet on his shoulders was affecting his world in any shape, no proof of it besmeared his face. “Hi. I'm truly sorry to bother you, but would you mind helping out with an annoying little matter of mine?”

“You know,” he added, like a second thought. “I’m pretty sure he will die, otherwise.”

For the second time in six months, Oda Sakunosuke laid a doomed sixteen years old on his couch, and he sighed.]

Chapter End Notes

hirotsu, rational: chuuya maybe don’t go near the guy who reopens every wound someone ever received.

chuuya, a living needle-holder, arm deep through his chest: listen but it did work strain: international syndicate named on the bsd wikia, took part to the dragon head conflict.

“when someone you love dies, you’ve got to kill yourself” / “be of service”: from one of (irl) nakahara chuuya’s poems.

“never to return”: (irl) nakahara chuuya’s poem.

the story virgil is writing: a reference to the aeneid, of course.

hey there! can i just say R.I.P. omū you were so cool? have fun in parrot even. you were the realest one. also!!! subtle ango introduction! he’s finally in the narrative. everybody wave to the local traitor. i know my man is tired.

fun fact for this chapter — this fic was initially meant to be a much shorter, much less complicated fic about the dragon head conflict. so technically what you’ve been seeing last chapter, this chapter, and next one, was all this fic was ever gonna be. then my brain started thinking “yeah but what happened before that? and after?” and here i am, revising 600k+ words. yay!

thank you guys so much for the nice words, the kudos, and the support. seriously, i re read your comments everyday. i’m so glad some of you like this enough to comment on every chapter, and i hope you’ll continue to do so! i hope to live up to expectations. thank you so so much, and see you next chapter! (technically the last part of this, interlude excluded. very excited for that, cause then we enter 17 skk era!)

keep warm and see you soon! <3 p.s. odasaku chuuya interaction? in my skk masterfic? its more likely than you'd think

FIG

Chapter Summary

On the twelfth of December of the current year — eighty-eight days since its beginning; among the longest conflicts in Yokohama history — the Dragon Head Conflict came to an end. The victim count is currently being analyzed by Section 57B, and will be reported by the evening, to be inserted in this — hopefully closed — file.

Chapter Notes

fyi: this chapter has numerous references (and text passages) from dead apple, the novel (including the microscope trick the movie itself did not portray). keep that in mind, and feel free to ask if something's confusing for you.

see you at the end! :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xx.

---

Case number: 7886990

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Ango S.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

---

On the twelfth of December of the current year — eighty-eight days since its beginning — the Dragon Head Conflict came to an end. The victim count is currently being analyzed by Section 57B, and will be reported by the evening, to be inserted in this — hopefully closed — file.

Five hundred billion yen richer and now lacking several members, the Port Mafia came out victorious.

While self-destruction was a major factor in the end of this Conflict, two other merits are to be signaled: the presence of Ability User Shibuwasa Tasuhiko — codename: White Giraffe — and the annihilation of the Five Moons. Apart from the numerous smaller organizations whose demise was brushed but not settled — the Hounds, the Black Widow, the Temple, and more — the Dragon Head Conflict emptied Yokohama of every major syndicate outside of the Port Mafia.

The KK Company was the first to fall; Shadow Blade followed; the death of the Takasekai's leader by the end of American syndicate "Strain" (check file 67B0089) was the last drop in an overflowing vase. By the time the Three Moons were defeated, their codes laid in the hands of the Port Mafia; the Bishop's Staff held the Mafia's and its own.

Hirabayashi Mitsuru's competition is officially over. The prize, as far as our men report, is currently being divided across the Port Mafia's international banks.*

The destruction of the last Moon and of Shibusawa Tatsuhiko can be faulted to the hands of Dazai Osamu and Nakahara Chuuya. Hereby, we begin an attentive reconstruction of the events that led to [...]

[Continue reading] [?]

??? days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

The moment his veins caught fire and tore his eyelids apart, he began to scream.

It was torn from his throat with relentless, abrupt violence — he felt nothing and heard nothing and was nothing; only the white noises making blood seep from his ears and land in his mouth from his vicious attempts to tear himself off any tactile surface, any pressing hand, any distant voice — he shrieked and screamed, legs kicking until the torn skin began to tear like fabric, spraying blood and scarred flesh like the scream out of his bleeding lip —

“ — him still — ”

“ — trying, can't you — ”

“ — is not — bleed out — ”

“ — mushroom hallucinations? ”

“ — steal — morphine — ”

“ — enough time — ”

In the beginning, there had been a circular light, and the flies buzzing around it.

He hadn't realized he remembered it. It pressed against his eyelids like a hammer, pressed harder and harder, harder and harder, cracking his skull as if it existed to render him a puzzle. A light on the ceiling, blurry through liquid and over a glass tank — flies buzzing and swarming and never dying, never dying, never allowed to —

He screamed until his throat was dry — he moved his body up and down, crashing it against the hard surface under his spine, bones, he thought, bones to break and body to dry, and kicking and punching and spitting and screaming, out of his mind with something so distant he couldn't —

Lab-gloved hands appeared between the webs of blood and spit keeping his eyelids together, holding tools.

“No,” The voice didn't even sound like his own. Panic had never been welcome in his bones — terror had been gulped down with gritted teeth; grief had been torn out of his veins. This was too different — it wrecked his chest and climbed out like a thing of flesh and despair. He was seven. He was five. He was dead. He would rather be dead than — “No, no, no, no, no — ”

He kicked and he shook — he landed on the ground so harshly his entire body was rattled, and he crawled back, palms reaching for the slick ground — blood and others.

Hands cupped his cheeks.

Something in him — something somehow more primordial than the memories scratching at the bloodiest parts of his brain — expected silence. It didn't come — all that came was a single eye, staring into his own — cheeks scratched in shapes he knew were his nails; a dangling band-aid from a rounded cheek. A single eye, staring.

“ — to stop,” a voice said, over the muddy waters of his own subconscious. He was in a tank. He was on the floor. He was just five, he had promised, and the man kept saying — “Time to stop,” the voice repeated, again and again, as if knowing he wouldn't get it on a first try, “It's time to stop.”

“No,” he croaked, shaking his head, breath short, N's taunts and Verlaine's promises — the spear through his chest lighting up his whole body for the world to see — to pick apart, to accuse — he begged, begged — “No, no, no, they'll know, they'll know — “

“They won't.”

“They'll know — they'll know — “

The hands became talons.

They sunk into the sides of his head with nails — keeping him still so mercilessly that he heard his blood pump against his eyeballs. Skin and bandages and a wet fringe, and a single eye — the color of the tiles of the Old World; the color of a gentler sort of absence. It was colder than stone; with no space for doubt, it held him still.

“I'll kill them,” Dazai promised. He was too close — their foreheads almost touched with every spasm of his own body. His sole eye was wide; was unmoving. “I'll kill them if they know.”

Sincerity, someone had once said to him — sincerity is only honest when it has known blood. And then this: if you trust, let it be in death.

He stared, chest slowing. The hands had a heartbeat of their own; it seemed much more familiar to the thing inside his veins. It was good, he thought, delirious and floaty, head dangling back and forth inside a hoax, a stubborn grasp, it was good being touched. The Sheep had always been scared he would sink them in the earth. It was good being looked in the eyes. It was good not being feared.

He searched and searched until the whole world was the color of the Old World's tiles — searched until his lips parted, dry and chapped, and no scream came out.

The eye grew blank. “Do it.”

One of the talons left his cheek so quick it dragged blood out — it was slammed on his mouth with no hesitation, pressing hard enough to break his jaw, breaking the inside of his lip against his teeth. A gloved hand sunk into his chest, soaked in something so blistering it was cold.

He shrieked so loud his back arched with it.

The hand didn't yield, no matter teeth and screams — it crashed against his face with enough might to crack the floor under his head. Pain was a firework field all over his body, kicking his legs and drying his lungs. After some distant point that was no less ablaze than the others, he gave up on understanding which part was being slaughtered — what the boiling liquid being pooled on his wounds was. There was nothing but the ache, and his pounding head, and a thumb swiping up and down the side of his jaw — kinder.

“Shh,” someone said. There was a chin on his forehead; sharp and absorbed and hiding him. Fingers pulled soaked hair from his sweat matted cheeks; the hand stayed where it was even when his screams became nothing but whines, quiet and dying, attempting to tilt into sobs — falling before they could.

Never, he thought, Never again. A crying seaside brat. A man's hand. Want to find your mom? A man's hand — the blisters the glass of the tank made on his palms, pressed to wave at him.

He whispered something — attempted to. The hand was too suffocating; the light upon the ceiling was getting blurrier, swarmed by flies. All of them dead. All of him scooped out — left on the ground, next to the flesh someone had cut up to fit and forgot to take the sewing stitches out of.

“Shh,” the voice promised. The freezing tip of a nose brushed the end of his cheek; he thought it might have wiped a tear. Lips touched his ear, a mere touch where the hand shattered. The flies, spinning and flying and dying. “You'll kill them. Shh.”

When his eyes and his head dropped, there was sand under his feet.

---

...

---

21 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

The first thing he smelled was rubbing alcohol; the first thing he saw — stubble on a pointy chin.

Oh, he thought, floaty. Doc must have knocked me out for checkups again.

Dirty beige walls and a humid-stained ceiling peeked through the blurred patches in his eyes. His body was floating, held tight between fingers-stiffening cold air and a mattress that was all but soft. Pain had been locked in a soundproof bird cage — the echoes of it were a never ending cramp up and down his spine.

A wooden seat was stitched to the side of the bed; the intricate bundle of black and white seated on it stretched all the way to his pained lap — curled on himself, truly, small enough to fit in that space; a mop of dirty hair and play-pretend sleep. He wanted to push him off. He wanted his ears to stop ringing.

“Oh,” Rubbing-Alcohol-And-Stubble said, blinking at his struggles. “The mushrooms actually worked.”

His tongue was asbestos. What?, he didn’t manage to say, before the void swallowed him whole again.

---

...

---

20 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

The moment his eyes opened, Chuuya was on his feet, cracking the moquette open.

The man was tall — tall enough to crank his neck, endless in his slim frame and general pointiness. Rusted copper in strands towered upon a remarkably normal face, with undeterred eyes and a carefulness someone actually normal wouldn’t have worn.

There were no weapons in sight — none except for the line of his shoulders. Chuuya recognized a threat with the ease of the changing season.

“You woke up,” the man said, eventually, once a quick glance had been directed to the destroyed lines of his floor. “That’s good. The Wound Reaper’s Ability is — devious. He told me you killed him?” An approving nod; starkly quick, as if he couldn’t be more aware of how little Chuuya would care about that judgement. “That’s for the better.”

“Who the fuck are you?” Chuuya snapped, only glowing brighter with every word.

The texture of the bandages on his skin was driving him insane; the cold seeping through his newly made stitches seemed to drip from the walls of that old apartment, corroded at the edges and too small for that man’s presence. A jolt went through his legs — his knees wobbled, rattled by the aftermath of an electric shock.

Teeth gritted, he raised his hands, watching furniture begin to float menacingly around the man’s unmoving silhouette.

“Maybe you should sit down,” he said, eyes settled on the stitches he could feel reopening. He didn’t step forward; didn’t try to touch him. “Loss of control over your Ability wouldn’t be —“

“I’m not asking again,” Chuuya snarled. All shook: his skeleton and the house, and something in the man’s eyes — as if already seeing the end of something he hadn’t even begun. “Who —“

One paper wall away, the front door slipped open.

“Odasaku, I brought mochi!”

The cheerfulness of his tone crashed violently against the gun Dazai pointed at him, unmerciful and unhesitant. Not a grin lit up his pale face; his grip around the plastic bag in his free hand was relaxed. With earth-shattering finality, he put himself in front of Oda Sakunosuke.

“Chuuya,” he said, calmly. The tone he used with the Secret Squad; the eyes he wore when he was genuinely not lying. “Sit down. Now.”

“Fuck you.”

“Not with him,” Dazai’s finger slipped on the trigger, infinitely easy. He wondered, with a scientific curiosity of sorts, if a bullet shot by his nullifying hands would amount to anything. Had they never tasted that theory? They had pointed guns at each other with worrying frequency. “Never with him, Chuuya. Yes?”

He stared.

I can’t kill you, Dazai didn’t say. You can’t kill me. Here’s the ground rules, nonetheless.

Jaw aching, Chuuya lowered his hands, drowning the bedroom in darkness again. The moment the boy threw his gun on the mattress, he was on him.

Thump!, against the wall — vaguely wet fabric tight between his fingers, posing next to a bandaged Adam’s apple — Dazai’s eyelids, close enough to brush against his own. In the corner of his vision, Oda Sakunosuke didn’t move an inch.

“Don’t you ever,” he warned, barely a whisper, “Ever, threaten me again. I’ll kill you.”

A curled eyebrow. “Is that worse than threatening your friends, or are we on even ground?”

He pushed him against the wall again. On powerless ground, they both knew, Chuuya would always come out victorious.

“You left me unconscious with the nearest busybody you found,” he noted. An assortment of discomfort and rage and regret crowded inside him — things he didn’t want a stranger to see; things he couldn’t let a stranger smell; viscera that were only his to bleed out.

“You’re welcome,” Dazai sing-sang, teasing and sharp. “He saved your life. Where are your manners? With all the ouchies you got yourself in the last few years, you’re lucky not to be buried with those five graves you like so much —“

Anger blinded him. There was nowhere to turn; no other road to take. It was a game, like everything else. The blinding lights of the Arcade; a smirk that never was, because he was always pulling right where Chuuya couldn't —

Mellowed than he might have months before, he informed him: “Mori is going to tear us to pieces, and he’ll start with you.”

Glee disappeared from his face. All that was left was familiar; deaf to it, Chuuya tightened his grip — thought of the man Dazai refused to talk too much about, and yet had knocked at the door of, when the boy he wanted dead had walked too close to the edge.

“Great,” Dazai said, with a smile that sucked him dry. “Can’t wait, partner.”

Disgust overcame him with such viciousness he was left stunned.

Why save me?, he couldn’t spit out. Why save me, why not save yourself, why not care? What was the point of understanding the importance of stitching skin back together — of understanding how deeply death touched others, of insulting every grave he’d carved with his knees in the dirt in his face, of knowing the opposite of existence was something to be shaken by, if he didn’t even care when —

I’m not like that. I’ll never —

Chuuya let go of him, watching him drop to the ground between coughs. Only then did Oda step forward, offering him a hand to stand.

“Well, then,” he concluded, endless silent times later. He had no accent and no tone; when he cleaned dust off Dazai’s shoulder, though, he was a puzzle piece. “We should fix those stitches, before you stain the floor with blood again. It already took me some time to clean up.”

The sheer quantity of his wounds managed to leave him, too, speechless.

Nights upon nights with Arahabaki; the torture from the lab; the fight against Verlaine; the scratches and bullet wounds he’d gotten himself in Suribachi, before learning the art of untouchability — all of it had reopened in one go. Chuuya tried to recall a single moment of it, and came up empty.

He set his jaw, staring at the ground.

Oda Sakunosuke moved like a man whose first word might have mentioned a close friend’s demise. There were weapons all over his apartment; less than a man with no Ability would carry, though. When he introduced himself, unnecessarily, he didn’t appear bothered by Chuuya’s refusal to shake his hand.

Did he see them?, he wondered. The scars and the pain stricken features, the blood and the lines of codes. Chuuya had lost all pudor in the slums — but regained all strength of comparison when faced with a copy of himself.

He thought, uselessly, that he'd never be able to visit a doctor again.

The man didn't talk as he fixed him up again for the second time; but he answered every question Dazai threw his way, as if there wasn't a thing he didn't consider worthy of analyzing. He didn't flinch when the boy moved furniture and knick-knacks around his apartment; didn't ask him to stop when he climbed on the table and stared right into the lightbulb, until his eye began to water.

"One of the legs is unstable," he warned him, simply.

"Yes, Odasaku. Hey, do you think that thing outside is a sniper or a crow?"

"That's a traffic light, I believe."

Around that enigmatically plain man, Dazai was a dead flower someone had deemed pointless enough to paint. Laughter and endless curiosity; he stepped in and out of Oda's space like a cat searching for sunlight in the winter; he looked up and down at him like a wide-eyed child who had never quite been taught that words could make songs.

Chuuya felt surges of ire even just looking at him. Chuuya couldn't stop staring.

The moment he left the room, mochi between his lips and every source of water in the bathroom opened, he bit: "What game are you playing at?"

Oda's perplexity seemed genuine — but nothing about that man could be called that. "Little Doctor, I suppose?"

"With the bastard."

"Dazai tells me his parents were married."

"You're not funny," he snapped. Parents. "What does an insignificant postman gain from hanging around with the Demon Prodigy? From humoring him? Are you trying to make him obsess over you? Because I can assure you — he is."

A hum left his lips — he tightened a bandage around Chuuya's elbow, where he'd torn his skin apart at nine years old, on the edge of a building in Suribachi City. "He's my friend."

"Your friend."

"Is that hard to believe?"

"That someone would willingly associate themselves with that mental case?" He scoffed. "Yeah. He's an asshole. You look like a weirdo, not a dick."

A pause. "Is he not your friend?"

“No,” Chuuya made a face.

“I’m not taking advantage of him. Although, it’s nice of you to worry for your...”

The pause was heavy.

“Rival,” he landed on, eventually, painfully. “Pain in the ass? Mummified son of a bitch?”

Oda blinked. “He’s your mummified son of a bitch?”

“He’s not my anything. And I’m not worrying —“

“Dazai calls you partner,” he mused. There was a certain lack of impatience in him; as if he could have sat in front of that bed and tended to his wounds until the end of times, untouched by the explosions and shootings he could hear come from behind the windows, in the night. “He also called you his gravity boy, once, but I’m assuming you won’t react positively to the notion of me knowing much about you.”

“But there’s no need to worry,” he added, before Chuuya could open his mouth. “All I’m interested in is the ones I can save.”

Startled, he froze.

“Odasaku!” Dazai whined, from the other room. “Your late pets woke up! Tell them to shut up!”

Muffled and distant, came a familiar sound — children crying.

Oda sighed, standing up. “If you’ll give me a moment.”

Eons might have passed between the first humidity stain he counted and Dazai’s appearance in the far corner of the room. He spent them in a haze, caught between a sharp answer he hadn’t been given time to wield and the unwanted weight of implications. Perhaps, he thought, it was the headache from Arahabaki’s attempts at smashing his skull.

“He’s being nice,” the boy asked. It didn’t quite sound like a question. Sat on the floor, he still sported bruises around the nose Chuuya had punched. “He doesn’t even trust you. Although, I suppose he doesn’t trust anyone.”

“Why does he have so many weapons around, if he doesn’t intend to use them?”

A shrug. “What makes you think he won’t?”

“Those hands haven’t pulled a trigger in years, at least,” Chuuya huffed. “Mock me about shit I don’t know. How did you end up idolizing a guy who won’t kill?”

The ones I can save.

“It’s truly a bother, isn’t it?” Dazai sighed, chin in hand, obnoxious and insincere and not your business. “He could have helped us blow up some more citizens. You know, a quarter of your squad was killed by the Reaper, before you impaled him,” A snort. “Maybe you can ask Q to join, instead.”

He studied him, over shushed crying and the echoes of conflict; pulled the gloves no one had removed from his fingers. He felt the weight, for once, of every scar that kept reopening, Ability or no Ability. “It’s fucking annoying when you do that.”

“Do what?”

“Pretend you don’t give a shit.”

A hint of glass, behind secular curtains; not even the inside, but at least a reflection. It was gone before he could smear his dirty fingers all over it. “I don’t.”

Chuuya stood up; gathered his clothes. “I don’t believe you.”

When Oda came to open his front door, a kid was napping on his shoulder, peaceful and too tiny. He didn’t try to stop him — he did, for some reason, offer him a sugar packet. “In case your head feels light,” he said. “Chuuya.”

He hadn’t said his name yet. Chuuya found he would have taken it back, had there been a way.

This is the man he refused to let you know a thing about, he concluded. This is the man he rips the curtains off for.

“Thank you,” he managed to say. There wasn’t enough suspicion to wipe out a favor — not a life-saving one. “He shouldn’t have brought me here — but he did. And you had no reason to help out, but you did. I apologize if —” Chuuya cleared his throat. There was no vocalization of what it meant to meet Dazai’s gaze. “Thank you.”

Oda blinked. “You’re welcome.”

He seemed perplexed.

“If you don’t trust me, why did you let me in the house where your kids are?” Chuuya asked. He thought back to bedtime stories; to the fate that had followed every kid he’d ever dared to walk next to. Had they seen him sleep? Had they seen him bleed?

A shame misfortune follows her so earnestly, he recalled Beatrice saying, distantly.

Oda shrugged. It reminded him, strangely, of Dazai. It should have been the opposite, he thought — should have been the so-called demon acting like a child, stealing life tricks off a man who he had yet to see fear him. Chuuya didn’t understand a thing about adults.

“Dazai trusts you,” the man answered, easily — and oh, Chuuya realized, and it was earth-shattering in its absolute irrelevance, and it was the most obvious thing this world had to offer, astonishing and there. Oh, he realized, he’s like the Flags. “Forgive the reasoning. But I do think that’s enough.”

---

...

---

19 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

Kouyou was a golden flame, and the first time he embraced her, she was covered in blood.

“Not mine,” she said, even if there was no need. She was warmth personified — she smelled of ash and the artificial lakes of her home; so devastatingly alive it was breathtaking. Her hand cupped the back of his head; Chuuya sunk his nose in her shoulder and inhaled. “One word — fun. I couldn’t let you guys have all the fun, could I?”

Alive, he thought, and not even Arahabaki could long for her blood right now. Alive, alive, she touched me and she is alive.

He was quick to tear himself apart from her — bowed, as it fit his superior, and cleared his throat. “Good to have you back, Ane-san.”

“Good to be back, little god,” Kouyou replied. Behind her back, Golden Demon kept slaloming through the rows of Takasekai’s men, unforgiving and free and hungry. “But we should get to the Headquarters as soon as possible.”

Chuuya perked up. “Did something happen while I was gone?”

“No,” She raised her chin. “But I do know how to rescue your Yuan.”

---

...

---

18 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“The plan for the end of conflict,” Dazai said, legs dangling from the edges of his office’s couch, “Can be easily left to Mori. We’ve been doing so much in the past months, have we not? You and I have more pressing matters to worry about. Look at this.”

Chuuya settled his eyes on the photograph of a corpse.

Don’t worry, he remembered saying, a thousand eons before. People will win you this war.

“The Colonel’s dead?”

The words tasted like rust — like talking shit, in the way that would have made the man scoff and straighten his posture. He had been endless and powerful; he had told Chuuya those like them couldn’t be stopped by something as human-flavored as war.

He took a step back. “Who — Who killed him?”

A blink. “The White Giraffe did.”

---

...

---

[Report back to — 18 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.]

— not what you should be saying,” Dazai brushed the matter away with a smile, the picture in his hand nothing more than a piece of evidence, the storm of viscera and soldier uniform inside it a far away ghost. “For us Executive candidates, it’s: ‘another Executive seat has opened’.” A too-smart gaze; lidded eye and the shameless lack of care he had sworn upon in his best friend’s home. “Right?”

I don’t believe you, he thought, in the way of misunderstandings, in the way of children, in the way of a boy who was angry, in the way of the envious. I don’t believe —

“I’m human too, you know?”

---

...

---

[Report back to — 18 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.]

— “No one would believe that shit,” Chuuya spat out, knuckles aching.

---

...

---

16 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“The White Giraffe has declared war against all organizations involved in the conflict,” Mori announced, boredly. His only Executives left exchanged a gaze. “Get rid of him, yes?”

---

...

---

14 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“— conflict has somehow managed to grow. We urge all citizens to —”

---

...

---

146 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“Nakahara,” The Colonel stared forward; something about his pallor was an omen. Chuuya wanted to leave. “Did Albatross die in peace, as far as you know?”

---

...

---

13 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“I’m sorry,” Koda said, distractedly, eyes on the floor. “I know I’m disappointing you.”

The squad was a circle of limbs and bruises on the floor of the hallway, sleeping the latest attack to the Shadow Blade borders off soundly. Tsuchiya’s head was in Noguchi’s lap — since she’d lost her eyepatch during a close-range fight, Kenta’s hand was dutifully hiding the missing piece. The sight of his free fingers hooked in Virgil’s jacket almost made him grin — the criss-cross of scars on Rin’s face almost paused that motion.

Chuuya recalled, vividly enough for his head to hurt, the clash and crash of their razor-sharp edges against the similar. They had fought his constricting hands until they bled; then they’d given up. Chuuya had felt a little less lonely.

It wasn’t about filling a missing space, he thought. It was about breaking his knuckles until his hands could create another hole in the wall — another family picture to hang.

“You’re not, Koda,” Chuuya replied. He turned to look at him — his arm was in a cast. “I don’t know if Uchiyama would want you to kill yourself over a ghost, though.”

His flinch sent him a few steps back.

“But if it’s me you don’t want to disappoint,” he continued, swiftly, settling his eyes back on the sleeping bundle. “If it’s us — would you mind not dying, Koda?”

Glossy eyes moved up and down his face, too quick to follow; a choked sound left his throat — something like thunder and like tears. His lips parted. “I—”

The entire city trembled.

---

...

---

13 days before the end of the Dragon's Head Conflict.

“— to report the collapse of the main building of the Mori Corporations' five towers last night, with impactful consequences on the surrounding plaza and neighborhoods — Firefighters and policemen are currently still working at the scene, trying to — Survivors are few and in between, with an astonishing number of victims and still unfound. We encourage volunteers to —”

---

...

---

9 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

The Bishop's Staff's sniper was praying.

Chuuya stepped over the mauled corpse left by Golden Demon, viscera squeaking under his polished shoes. His eyes stayed settled on the man's crawling body. Voices and endings echoed across the collapsed walls of the Church — the cohesive attack had cost men and relevant territory; but the kidnapped women and Yuan's stutters in the face of the Port Mafia's rescuers would satisfy Mori's hunger enough.

Fanatic blood would satisfy his own.

“God isn't real,” he informed the sniper, holding his trembling skull between gloved hands. “But don't worry. I'm close enough.”

---

...

---

5 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“My squad,” He frowned. “Ane-san, where’s my squad?”

---

...

---

4 days before the end of the Dragon’s Head Conflict.

“We are even missing people from our Executive and associate-to-Executive ranks — Vice-Executives and guards,” Mori sighed, eyes running from Hirotsu’s frame to Chuuya’s own. “Including Dazai.”

Who cares, his mind retoriated. Hard-earned loyalty was to be left on less offensive altars. Hard-earned care was to be left to those who wouldn’t waste what they had been given freely. Chuuya had been sleeping alone. Hard-earned trust was to be given to those who —

“He bought a new microscope,” Hirotsu shrugged.

Oh.

— those who gave it back, once it had been bled dry.

---

...

---

3 days before the end of the Dragon Head Conflict.

“Your friends all killed themselves,” the White Giraffe sighed, throwing another gem in the fire. “I had nothing to obtain from them. Meaningless and worthless...” He laid his chin on his hand. On the floor, Noguchi’s fishbone tattoo glistened, hit by the reflection of a sapphire. “Boring humans are boring even at death.”

---

...

---

— — ?????? [Error?00?]

[More, Arahabaki murmured, and he was all he had left. More, little god.]

[—bringing him was a mistake. It was a mistake! I tried to tell you—“

“Agent Sakagu—“

“He was never going to work with—]

À mon chéri Arthur,

[scribbled with a different pen][Oh, so you finally accept to call me by my name?]

I cannot say I am used to your absence [I thought I always slept long enough for you to rot?]. Although you always seem to be writing in that diary of yours, I must wonder if it ever feels as improper as these letters feel to me [That's the point of a diary, Paul. I will explain more when I'm back]. Joint missions are much more amusing, anyway [They are, my friend. But I believe we have different reasons].

As you have suggested, I took a walk down that park you had seemed so enthusiastic about [I do not seem enthusiastic about parks, Paul. I simply believe it would do you good to find enjoyment in the everyday world] — the one with the ducks, and with the old ladies wearing that cotton you're so envious of [Lies upon lies]. Beautiful trees and mesmerizing lakes, yes; but fate wanted me to interrupt a funeral. [Fate, or your own curiosity?]

It was a small event. No one we had... disposed of; I made sure to verify that [Not every ounce of blood has been spilled because of you, Paul. You need to stop assuming so]. Only a man, unremarkable and very much boring, but by the enticing name of Gaspard [Why do you like that name so much? You always mention it]. Most of the chairs had been left empty — but, then again who will sit at our funerals, Arthur? Who, if not you and I, in the very remote possibility one of us survives to what might one day kill the other? And what could that be? Not an enemy, surely. Is old age an enemy? Is that something humans fear? Are we to presume my body will know death, as it very rarely knows blood? [Death is a very human concept. I assume you will fall victim to it, one day]

When I sat, I found myself particularly curious about the eulogy a young man offered. I do not know what Gaspard had been to him; I am even slightly confused about whether his words were meant to be a farewell or a curse [Most funerals follow this structure] . Here, let me recite them for you. (You can picture it. You are a smart man; picture me in front of you, talking). [I will picture you. I'm rather used to it. Do not judge me for it]

Though nobody would call me brave

And I have neither king nor country,

I went to war to find a grave.

Death did not want me, either.

Was I born too early or too late?

What am I doing in this world?

I tell you all, I am desperate—

Say a prayer for poor Gaspard.

[This is tacky. Do not make me read it again.]

*Are poems traditional parting gifts? Funerals among us Transcendents always seemed much more severe. If that would be to your liking, I will find the strength to write you a poem, the day of your inevitable demise. [I think I would like a poem very much, Paul.]

*But this particular parting gift seemed rather self-centered to me. Did you get the same feeling? If not for that demand for a prayer, I would have thought this man was about to steal one of my guns and shoot himself in the head — there, in front of his already grieving family. I wonder if he would have succeeded. Death does not want him, after all. [Is that not a metaphor? Perhaps he is being self centered again. Death does not despise anyone. Injustice is offered equally to everyone]

I keep thinking about his words, though.

*I do not know if I was born too soon or too late. I suppose, being created, I was created exactly when I was meant to. [Born. You were born] Errors come from man-made creations, and from wombs; I am not quite that [Source does not determinate result. We have talked about this, have we not?] . I do not know what I am doing in this world. Fighting. Searching for someone like me. Trying to listen to your words; to trust them. [That's good enough, I think. Most people do the same]

I did not go to war to find a grave. I will welcome it, should it come. But not before my answers.

*Death leaves me fairly untouched. Leaves are bound to fall; snow is bound to melt; and do we not call spring and summer beautiful? [We do] Is that something human beings are supposed to feel? I have a feeling it's not. Perhaps the thing in my veins is too focused on his immortality, to care about decay. [Paul, you need to stop assuming human beings are good people]

I do not know grief. I have yet to find someone who would deserve it. People die everyday; war and famine and accidents and even old age. Does the act of dying itself demand respect? For pain? Were I to find a way to put an end to my own life — who would mourn?

*You, Arthur. You have always been better. [Not better. Never better]

I do not worry about such things, though. Just as that selfish man on the stand, I know death does not want me. [I will stay unwanted with you, then. If you'll have me].

I'll sit here and watch the world die first, I suppose. [We shall]

À toi pour toujours (si la mort ne veut vraiment pas de moi),

Paul Verlaine.

[À toi pour toujours (toujours),

Arthur.]

---

[ONE WEEK AFTER THE DRAGON HEAD CONFLICT]

---

“So, Chuuya,” the Social Worker said — tight smile and eyes settled on the hands Kouyou had yet to remove from his shoulders. “How do you like working at Mori Corporations?”

There existed, as he'd been recently informed, a thing called 'emancipation as a means of joining the workforce', which he was assumed to have taken advantage of. Suribachi City had lacked such notions. Chuuya had existed simply because he did — not even the occasional cops would have dared ask those kinds of questions.

Social Services, though. Those he was familiar with.

“It’s cool,” Chuuya answered.

The two men — perfectly bright and fairly interested — waited. There wasn’t a crack on their faces; undeterred, they attempted to find his eyes, dragging them off the shining edge of the desk. If he could have sat further away, he would have had.

A beat. “Anything else?”

There was a knick knack of sorts upon the desk — a silver slide with an automatic system of little spheres tumbling down. Chuuya had yet to look away — its motions were nearly hypnotic. The sharp sound of each ball was slowly, inevitably dragging him to insanity. His fingers spasmed against the armrests.

Curtly, he offered: “Pay’s good.”

Fingers on the endless piles of papers they had pulled up the moment Kouyou had welcomed them in, the men exchanged a glance.

Chuuya could see his face on most of the documents; it was more than the Workers had ever managed to obtain back in the settlement. He’d implemented a clear policy among his people — if you see the blue shirts, kick them in the dick and run the other way. He hadn’t been willing to lose any of them to the dangers of the underworld — even less willing to let a supposedly good-intentioned adult steal them off.

“And what about your guardian?” Worker One started again, just as enthusiastic as before. “As, ah — official as your relationship might be, given your independence, what do you say? Is she nice?”

Tell me she’s not, his eyes begged. He could imagine what reputation the Port Mafia had to have with such systems — unspoken secrets in all minds and no one’s tongue. He couldn’t decide whether managing to take Chuuya from them would have been a win for their morals or their hunger.

Just a tad defensive, Chuuya replied: “Yeah. Ane-san’s the coolest.”

Lithe fingers tightened around his shoulders, quick and affectionate.

The two men cooed. “That’s wonderful,” Two said. “I’m ecstatic. That means —“

“I know what that means.”

A strident sound; maybe his teeth. “That’s great. Does she take care of you? Makes sure you continue your studies?”

“I told you she’s great,” Chuuya insisted. The silver balls went up and down. “Want me to write you an ode, here and now?”

Uncomfortable laughter filled the room.

“Say, why did you choose the jewelry store?” Number 1 wondered, after a murmuring pause. “Mister Mori told us you were offered many possibilities among his — ah, possessions.”

“I like jewelry.”

“Do you? You’re not wearing any.”

“The pay is not that good.”

“Oh,” Two perked up. “Have you encountered any salary injustices?”

A sharp sound left Kouyou’s lips. Calling it exasperation would have been too nice.

Chuuya let his chair swallow him. Tin, tin, the spheres said — he sunk a bit deeper with each hit. “Calm down, jackass. They treat me just fine. I don’t even know the point of this tea time.”

“The point, dear, is evaluation,” Worker Two insisted, visibly scrunching up his nose at the insult. “Where would we be if we left our children unaccounted for? Emancipation gives you autonomy. It doesn’t grant you abandonment.”

Something cold pressed against his nape — one of Kouyou’s rings, sending shivers down his skin right as his feet moved to unwillingly crack the ground. He clenched his jaw to the point of pounding; clung to the ache to push the anger where it wouldn’t blow the meeting off.

“I don’t feel abandoned,” he managed to bite out, at last. “Thank you for the concern.”

“You’re welcome,” One replied. “You know, it would do you good to keep your language in check.”

“I talk how I talk.”

“Did you know that six in ten youngsters whose files describe them as irreverent are said to not pick a university career?” The man shook his head. “These are complicated times for successful lives. High-ups are looking for polite, polished young men. It’d be a shame to ruin what Mori Corps could give you.”

Tin, tin. The spheres slid down.

“Chuuya is a terribly bright young man,” Kouyou intervened, the longer his aggressive quietness lasted. “His future might be affected by many things, but his — choice of words isn’t among them. He’s one of the most promising pupils Mori has ever taken in.”

I don’t know if that much swearing is good for a teen, Virgil had said, once.

Bile drowned his mouth.

Some more mutter, some more borderline pitiful stares. The two workers put their heads close, searching through their papers for whatever would make that meeting last even longer. Chuuya knew they couldn't do anything; knew the Mafia would intervene before they could report anything suspicious that would get an asset taken away so pathetically. Nonetheless —

Nonetheless, standing there, watching them discuss his existence —

“— a little worried about his socialization skills,” One murmured. Tin, tin, tin. “The list of his daily interactions is rather unhelpful. Almost no one is in his age range. Friendship is a fundamental step in full maturation.”

“Growing up in that dumpster can't have helped,” Two agreed. “Wouldn't it be better to make some — ah, some checks? Just to be sure everything works right, up there. I mean, his —” Tin, tin, tin tin tin tin — “Not to mention the attitude. Are we absolutely sure he can take care of —”

The world blurred at the edges.

There had been white sounds stuck in his ears for almost two weeks; he had grown used to the metallic screech. He only knew he had thrown the knick-knack across the room when he saw one of the silver spheres roll all the way to his shoes.

Silence fell.

Kouyou's hands were nowhere to be found — endlessly marble-like, she looked at him with nothing under her eyelids. The absolute shock dripping from the men's faces was diesel for his flames. It took the pain in his legs — a constant by now; gentle flames stuck at the junctures whenever he couldn't afford it — to realize he was standing.

“Chuuya?” Worker One dared, staring.

His body was a few seconds too early — sound came later. Chuuya didn't remember rising; couldn't pinpoint what his intention had been.

Nonsensically, he thought: they should have sent Matsuda, if they wanted results.

He stuck his hands in his pockets; cleared his throat. “We're done here.”

Rooms at Building Three were too big, he thought, among every other contracting idea crowding his skull. It took too long to get to the door. The acoustics were terrible — just enough to hear the stuttering, offended squeaks coming from the men; to hear Kouyou's pointless reassurances and disgusted remarks.

“ — can't just — ”

“We have reports to — ”

“— a better time,” Kouyou insisted, with the balanced murmurs she used to quieten down angry clients at the Pomegranate. One of the silver spheres had landed under his foot, Chuuya rolled it under his sole, back and forth — crushed it for the sake of it. Breathed from his nose. Did his best to recall what he was meant to be feeling. “I told you — almost everyone in the city is dealing with a personal loss. He’s just sixteen. Asking for some understanding shouldn’t be —“

The doorknob glittered golden under his palms. He counted specks of dust; watched them stick to his gloves like they weren’t physical.

Mori’s eyes were purple from up close.

Like the sky behind the factories at night, he had once heard Lippman describe it as — woefully poetic; elegant in all pretense. The crinkles around them made them a tad too friendly; like he might have just used his scalpel to dig them himself, for the sake of gain. All for gain, the doctor had said. He couldn’t recall when.

He couldn’t recall when he had opened the door.

“Apologies for my lateness,” Mori smiled. The trio at the desk had fallen quiet, eyes on him; all his attention was on Chuuya. “I did promise you I’d be here — construction has slowed down the traffic immensely. Chuuya, did I miss much?”

Had you promised? He couldn’t recall.

He straightened. “Just getting started, sir.”

The Boss’ presence was terrifyingly efficient in fastening the procedures the Social Workers had to go through. A nauseating mixture of respect and horror — decisively not shown in Kouyou’s presence — soaked their eyes. Clearly, it aggravated her just as much as it did him.

Chuuya got to sit in his chair, staring at the ground he wasn’t allowed to destroy — because renovations costed money, and because it wouldn’t make sense, and because he wasn’t a child. From the floor, rolling pathetically away from its slide, the remains of the sphere stuck to his sole sang: tin tin.

“Dazai won’t be joining us, today, no,” Mori was shaking his head, apologetically. The name had his fingers digging into the leather of the armrest. “You know how sick he gets. It’s seasonal, really. You can have your interview next week.”

The slam of the wooden doors against the wall would have been nearly comical — had it not been for the gun in Dazai’s hand.

“Jeffrey and Tom!” he exclaimed, tumbling in with his sole eye wide enough to appear to be pulsing, disheveled and so euphoric. “It’s been so long, oh fairy godmothers!”

To call what he did from the door to the desk a dance would have been too kind — there was a skip to his step that couldn’t be natural, and a lack of finesse to the splits and cartwheels he did — attempted — in the meantime that was glaringly obnoxious. The gun didn't help his balance; the moment the Social Workers' eyes locked on it, they jumped to their feet.

"Is that a —" One thundered.

"Toy, toy, toy," Dazai huffed, pirouetting all the way to Mori's seat — leaning his crossed arms over its top, as the man did nothing but smile into nothingness. "This is a weapon factory, Lucius and Marcus. Do you think we have no prototypes?"

Hesitantly — only lowering into his seat once his colleague stopped gaping at the quick way the boy was spinning the gun trigger over his index — Worker Two sighed a: "Dazai, you know our names are —"

He burst out laughing.

His legs did their best to climb over the back of the seat — once he managed to be completely off the floor, hanging like a monkey, he sing-sang: "I was feeling a bi-i-it down, like Mori said. But when I heard Matt and Adrian were coming, I dragged myself by the elbows and the knees!"

"How enthusiastic," One said, vaguely.

"I know," Dazai dropped his head back. His voice got a rough note because of the strain. "I stopped by the sidewalk to try to hang myself, but this one university student dragged me down the light pole. He dropped me in a puddle! Look, I'm all dirty!"

A line of red divided his deadly pale, sweaty face in two — the spot where blood had stopped circulating. The closer he got, the more absurd his eye looked as it frantically studied the room — pupil blown so wide, he could have been one of Elise's stylized scribbles. Deaf to the two men's protests that one joke about America did not give him the right to mock them whenever they met, he took his place next to a stiffened Kouyou — all beads of sweat and harbored breathing.

Tin, tin — Chuuya frowned.

"I'm good, I'm good, you know I'm always good," he insisted, leaning over the desk, chin in his hands. "Truly, you might as well stop wasting your time! Mori likes me too much. You'll never find me dissatisfied! I get a roof and treats. Not even the Emperor's dog is happier than me!"

Quick enough to snap his neck — for the first time since they had dragged themselves out of the building that had buried his squad's bodies — Dazai's eyes settled on him.

"On the matter of happy pets — have you met our latest one?" Conspiratorial, he wiggled his eyebrow. "Look at him. Hat and all! Between us, isn't he absolutely enthralled?"

"Dazai," Kouyou — careful to only pull him by the coat — forced him to sit down onto the chair again. Someone else might have failed to decipher the inch of worry in her eyes;

Chuuya only failed to understand her decisiveness to ignore it. “Some demeanor, if you don’t mind?”

“You’re so boring, Ane-san,” he sighed. He was blinking incredibly fast. “If you intended to push your etiquette on me the moment you woke up, you could have just stayed sleeping! Sleeping Beauty and all. Beautiful and useless. Sorry,” He bowed to her. “My lady. Ma’am. E-x-e-c-u-t-i-v-e. Ought to respect you! Ought to respect your pet, too. Enthralling. Not like you. You’ve never even allowed me to ask Demon Golden if she could kill painlessly.”

There was a knife in each of his boots, Chuuya reminded himself, out of nowhere. There was at least one gun in that room, and Dazai was scratching the space between his eyebrows with it. His Ability wouldn’t work on Dazai — but he had other means to stop him.

“We were just talking with Chuuya,” Worker One confirmed, clearly used enough to whatever was happening to simply move on. Mori’s smile was sculpted on his face; he stared at the two men too insistently. “He’s a lively young man. You must be happy to have someone your age around, yes, dear?”

His next laughter might have just been a scream; Chuuya cringed away, right as everyone but Mori flinched. “Rick, you were always a funny one. He’s not even my age in dog years. Don’t be silly. My dog. By the way. He’s just Chuuya. Well — sometimes. Only sometimes!”

More laughter — when Dazai abandoned his hands on the edge of the desk, his fingers were shaking so violently the band-aids Elise had given him became invisible. Something in the back of Chuuya’s skull asked him to be enraged. He’d been insulted; more importantly, he’d been looking for an excuse to fight.

Chuuya clenched his fists. “What the fuck is that supposed to —“

A white blister pack peeked from Dazai’s pocket. Then another; then another. With an unhurried, gentle motion — only the tip of one finger — Mori pushed them back inside.

His voice disappeared.

“— great friends,” the Boss was saying, one hand on Dazai’s shoulders. How he’d managed to keep him still enough to put it there, he couldn’t understand; his entire body was vibrating under his grasp, hyperactive and cheerful, feet tapping and fingers reaching and lips blowing raspberries in the air. “You’ve told me many times that Dazai might receive some — positive influence, from being around people his age. Chuuya was truly a godsend. His intellect and strength saved us from many sticky situations.”

He laughed; all polite, all head of Mori Corporations, nothing of the man who’d walked past his destroyed building and barely blinked at the smashed corpses stuck between the cracks. “To be fair, calling their relationship a good influence for either of them might be — slightly untrue.”

The Workers leaned forward. He could see their hunger sink its claws in the mahogany. “How come? Unhealthy environments might not —“

“They are both stubborn, proud boys,” Mori reassured them. “They’re young. It’s normal. Conflict is an important step in development — competition, even more so, is fundamental. Luckily, Chuuya and Dazai are mature enough to realize this.”

Worker Two snapped his tongue against the roof of his mouth, judgemental. “Maturity — an interesting concept. Your boys’ resourcefulness, their cleverness — all positive things. But they’re children, nonetheless.”

Kouyou’s smile slipped off her face.

Chuuya watched his own land on his lap; he stared at it, its uncomfortably shades of pointless anger. A default reflection, perhaps — technical defect. The non—understood was to be raged at. If he grew taller, he mused, on the shapes of Doc’s syllables, swearing anger would do him good — would they stop calling him a child?

More laughter erupted underneath Mori’s slightly disapproving grasp.

“Oh, no, no,” Dazai intervened, shaking his head vigorously. “It’s all fine. All fine. No need to worry. Children, not children — Terminology is the cage of man. Either I will kill Chuuya, or he will kill me. It’s inevitable! Like Christmas. It’s almost Christmas, isn’t it? We made a blood pact about it, anyway.” He turned around to wink at him. Chuuya could have sunk his fingers in the waters of his sole eye and never touched the floor. “You don’t have to worry about us at all.”

Chuuya stared back.

His eyes blurred. “Well, hopefully I’ll get myself first. That’s more important than any blood pact. You know how disappointing it’d be, if I —” Blindly, his hands reached forward, gun and all — hovering too close to the collector pens abandoned on the wood. “You know how — ha — How damn disappointing —“

Before he could even think about moving, Mori’s fingers were slammed on the desk — right where the pens laid, his gloved hand great enough to hide them from sight completely. Eye snapping open, dry and more focused than it had dared to be before then, Dazai — flinched.

Chuuya had to be losing his mind.

Their stare off was quiet; seemingly blank. A hint of petulance pulled the boy’s mouth down; even seated, Mori seemed endlessly tall.

Worker One cleared his throat. “If we may get back to living accommodations —“

Dazai raised his gun and fired into the space between the Social Workers’ heads.

What followed was a blur — the two men yelped high enough to break glass, as they jumped out of their seats with a mixture of fear and anger that didn’t seem to know who to push forward. A hint of amusement colored Mori’s face; by the time Dazai had started humming some Hirose’s song and brought the gun to his temple — Chuuya’s own hand bumped against the doctor’s, as they both pushed it out of his grasp.

“You — in the hands of a —“ Two was stuttering, horrified. “You said — You —“

In a show of coordination, Kouyou slashed his head off with the blade hidden in her umbrella right as Mori threw his scalpel into One’s chest.

The thud! of their bodies landing on the carpets was nothing new. Chuuya only realized he had flinched when he felt Dazai’s gaze — pupil still blown; and yet now doubtlessly bored — swallowing him whole.

“Wonderful,” Mori sighed. “They’re sure to send someone else by next month, now.”

Just as mildly displeased, Kouyou hummed. He tried to stand; his body stayed unmoving.

At once, Dazai deflated.

“Whatever,” he huffed, throwing himself onto the desk, back up. His face had wiped itself clean. All that energy from before had to go somewhere, he thought. All the shake in his hands. All the pens no one had hidden. No human could turn himself off. No human could — “Mori, send Chibi and Ane-san out. We ought to fill Tom and Jeffrey’s reports — I don’t want them to hear me talk about how puberty is treating me. Shoo-oh!”

“How I hate faking Governmental papers,” Mori sighed, like nothing had happened.

Kouyou had to drag him out of the room; Chuuya hadn’t even realized his own hesitation, until his neck began to hurt from the effort to call Dazai’s lost attention to himself.

No one would believe that shit.

You are, he thought. It was nauseating; the layer of vomit Chuuya had felt stuck in his throat since the smell of bodies crushed under a building. He had yet to throw up. The knot in his chest was an assortment of too many things — the rage he’d put in that punch and the stubbornness with which he’d driven his bike to him and the smell of blood from his squad’s corpses and the green lights of a life he didn’t remember. You are and I’m not and how can you waste it like that?

Kouyou shut the door behind them.

His fists unclenched.

“Why did he have that many pills from the Infirmary emergency stash on him?” Chuuya hissed. “Are you kidding me? Boss has to know. He can’t know — he’s going to kill him if —“

She straightened up, brushing invisible dust off her kimono. The imperceptible worry she’d shown inside the room was nowhere to be found; with all the demeanor she’d demanded from Dazai, she began her march down the stairs. “No need to worry. In exceptional cases, Dazai is allowed to.”

“Allowed to?” Disbelieving, he widened his strides to catch up. “He was going to kill himself with a fucking pen.”

“Mori knows how to stop him.”

“The guy is suicidal two thirds of the week. Maybe put a lock on the cabinets?”

“We already have them,” she replied. “And as you might need to be reminded — as Dazai knows — addiction isn’t allowed in the Port Mafia.”

He stared. “And what, assisted suicide is?”

“Don’t be silly,” She glanced his way with something like genuine confusion. “It’s not what you’re envisioning, Chuuya. You think the demon child would ever allow himself to die like that?”

“But —“

“Chuuya,” she admonished. A familiar tone — the symphony of yes, a shipping container. The world-ending orchestra of Dazai-related matters that they were all politely demanded to keep their noses out of. “Mori certainly knows better. If he lets him break into his cabinets once or twice, mix up medications in an effort to commit a suicide he will stop him from — perhaps that’s one of the reasons why the demon child hasn’t killed himself with a pen yet. ”

From the floor upon theirs came laughter. Mori’s; the corpses’; fake all the same. They would be disposed of soon enough.

Chuuya couldn’t pick that battle.

But —

“I met Oda.”

Surprise slowed her down to a stop. “Oda Sakunosuke?”

He wasn’t sure of why the words had left his mouth. Yokohama was caged between devastation and the need to build something over it. Dazai Osamu was one problem too many to deal with. The only problem he had left, he considered.

“He’s a weirdo,” Chuuya added, eventually. “Lives in a shithole. Actually enjoys Dazai’s presence. Looks like he could kill me in a blink, but refuses to. It’s — ” He shrugged, uneasy. “It’s weird. ”

“Dazai having a best friend?” Kouyou sneaked a glance towards the door. The Boss was the Boss. Dazai was Dazai. They could only look. “I understand the skepticism.”

Memories tickled his nape. “What did you mean that time?” he asked. “You said Oda Sakunosuke wasn’t the man you thought Dazai would pick as a best friend. Because of the killing thing?”

“Not exactly,” Her complicated look switched some colors up, turned some pieces around — then, it struck him, quieter than the deadliest arachnoid, brighter than thunder. “I assumed — feared — that he’d pick you.”

Wind that was not there hissed through the floor-to-ceiling windows. It tickled his nape, raising old, familiar goosebumps. Something fierce and scorching hot climbed up him, using his ribcage as holds, using his lungs as cuscinions — something he knew, because one could only look at the same mirror and feel the same thing so many times.

He wanted to wipe that idea off her mind. He didn't know how. He didn't know where he'd gone wrong.

"I could never," he said.

Kouyou studied the busy crowd of the Entrance Hall; men discussing the fallen tower, men discussing the fallen. She offered a gentle smile to Madame Tanaki's vigorous waving. "I cannot say it isn't a relief, in some ways. Although, I suppose, Dazai..." Whatever she was thinking, she shook it away with a distracted motion. "Doesn't matter. One might wonder what it is that you are."

The doors of the office were long gone. He stared at the end of the hallway like he could knock on them, still — stare at Dazai's gun, on the ground.

"His partner, I assume," he offered.

Her next glance was the peak of astonishment — he paid it no mind, making his way to Madame Tanaki, ready and willing to let her chatter distract him from the mess that interview had been. Kouyou followed, eventually; he couldn't quite shake her insistent gaze off of him. Couldn't quite take what he'd said back.

Grieving, he thought.

Grieving, he tasted — how could he sit on the ground and do it again?

"Nakahara Chuuya?"

Round glasses and dossiers in hands; it took him a blink and a curled eyebrow to recognize the man appearing behind them. Sakaguchi Ango, member of the Intelligence, nodded in greeting.

"Forgive the interruption," he said. "Boss would like to talk to you."

---

...

---

The moment Agent Minami sat down, she had a knife pressed to her jugular.

“You sit still and you listen,” Chuuya said, evenly, leaning his free hand on the armrest of her office chair. The skyline was a grey curtain behind the floor-to-ceiling windows, swollen with snow that refused to fall; it drowned the room in smoke-like light. In that haze, her choked breath seemed to stick. “If you call anyone,” he continued, “I will gut you like a pig. If you refuse to talk, I will gut you like a pig. If you do anything that even slightly pisses me off, I will gut you like a pig. We both know I don’t need weapons for that.”

Silence trembled between his fingers. She gulped, pressing her throat closer to the knife; her shoulders stood straight, still.

A nod. “Alright.”

Chuuya tightened his hold — just enough to draw a line of blood. When he let go of her, she coughed wetly. He circled the desk and dropped on one of the guest chairs in front of it.

Muffled, frantic conversations echoed from behind the door — the Special Division HQs had been dealing with the aftermath of the Conflict with just as many sleepless nights as the Port Mafia. Some of the deeper lines of tension down the Agent’s frame had nothing to do with his arrival.

“Are you here to execute me?” Minami asked, eventually.

Dossiers and photographs occupied the length of her desk, highlighted and scribbled. His file, he thought, was probably among those. If he had believed to be on the tongue of the underworld before, he’d been soundly proven wrong. If his bounty had been high before —

“That would be fun,” Chuuya answered, crossing his ankles on the edge of the table. “I’d start with some waterboarding.”

Through controlled breaths, she waited.

“Dealing with the mess?” he wondered, nodding towards the papers. “The jewelry shop had to close for a while. We’re dealing with reconstructions. Conflicts like these are bullshit for sales.”

Confusion was a crease on her forehead — torturously slow, she straightened in her seat, clearing her throat. “Are you looking for a raise?”

“It’d help with the mechanic bills,” He shrugged. “The war almost blew my motorcycle up. Luckily, I know a guy.”

“A friend?”

Undeterred, Chuuya stared at her. “The father of a dead one.”

Her lips closed. She lowered her eyes to the papers.

“You know, we lost men, too. Good men,” she made sure to specify, vaguely defensive. “We did not bring the war. We were merely aware of its inevitable march.”

“My men died,” he replied. Each word was a bump against the glass — he was too far away to hear impact. He hadn’t stopped in days. “You people would have never classified them as good. Is their death somehow less worthy?”

“I’m not saying —“

“I don’t know,” His eyes searched the ceiling; not a single humid stain. Smell of money; smell of power; only the kind most people gladly accepted to be bent over by. “I don’t know if it is. I don’t think so. All I know is that your beloved information could have saved them. Or maybe not,” Pull of gravity, weight of necessity. “It’s all bullshit. They’re dead anyway.”

Although he did not look for understanding, he could not ignore the familiarity of her gaze. Still tense, still waiting, she softened at the edges — just enough to show days old mourning.

Chuuya wanted none of it.

“I’m here for a favor,” he said, eventually. “One you will do me.”

Caution soaked her tone. “Will I?”

“You owe me a favor.”

A curled eyebrow. “Owe you? ”

“I got rid of Shibusawa after you brought him here,” She stiffened so instantly her seat screeched. “Not to mention the Wound Reaper. You fucked up, and I crushed the root of the problem under a skyscraper. I’d say you and your Agency owe me enough.”

Agent Minami raised her chin. “What makes you think we brought Shibusawa to Yokohama?”

“The fact that you don’t care about this city one bit,” Chuuya traced dirt lines on the wooden desk, cleaning his boots in lazy circles. “But you won’t admit shit to me, and I’m not here to waste time. If you want this to be more personal, then — we obliterated the Bishop’s Staff. I’m sure that must have painted a smile on your face, at least.”

Her mind traveled miles inside that small room, curving and intertwining possibilities, until she came to the only conclusion possible. Leaning back against her seat, she conceded:

“What do you want?” Mock stuck to her letters. “Your freedom?”

He tilted his head to the side. “My Boss will give me that, if he sees it fit.”

“He hasn’t broken our deal yet,” Minami scoffed. “Do you believe you’re worth that much?”

“That’s not for me to decide,” Chuuya replied. “But if I end up being worth an Ability Permit — you can be sure I’ll be damn efficient at what I do. Do not forget that.”

The same caution she'd worn with a knife to her neck returned; she tightened her lips, and waited.

He removed his feet from the desk, extracting a thin file from behind his jacket and throwing it onto the desk. "I won't waste time introducing her. As one of the Dragon Heads, I don't even want to imagine the information you have on her. But Yuan doesn't have anything but her role — no personal documents, no home, no money, no anything. The Bishop's Staff promised her all of that," He tapped on the wood. "You, better than anyone, must know why she's still in this situation."

Minami's eyes ran up and down her photograph, fingers tracing her lines. "You want me to legalize her, in short?"

"Yeah," Chuuya said, pausing. "No. I want you to bring her to the light."

Hesitation tightened her grip around the folder. "Talk."

It was midday by the time he escaped the building — from the same exit he'd strided out of months ago, covered in blood that wasn't his and reeling from weeks of necessary trial. No one jumped from the shadows to attack him. No one told stories in an alley.

No one came; Chuuya left.

Yuan found him near Building One, sleeves up and busying himself with the removal of the rubble and remains of the main tower. An assortment of Ability Users — the muttering men and women crawling past him, offering him a respectful nod and an occasional bow — would make the reconstruction quick and easy enough; reports assured full function of the base by the time January came around.

But bigger rocks were still bigger rocks. And he had an Ability made just for being useful.

"Hey," Yuan said.

Her voice was still damaged from the fumes she'd inhaled after he and Kouyou had set the Church on fire. She'd cut her hair to her chin, just unruly enough that charred strands and tips had probably been to blame. It made her look older. It was still red.

Against the greyish sky, she was a vibrantly green stain: his leather jacket to blame. Seeing it around her shoulders was a complicated thing; he took it for what it was.

He laid a piece of concrete on the other side of the square, nodding. "Hey."

Chuuya sat on the nearest block of metal. She followed. The foot of space between their thighs was no longer an uncomfortable sight — all he did was accept it. Dead bodies had to fit somewhere.

"Did you talk with the woman?" Yuan asked, as they studied the bustle of people in the plaza. Journalists were valiantly informing cameras of the current state of works. Almost no inch of the city had been left untouched by the war; Mori Corporations was more than glad to offer its funds for reconstruction.

He pulled the cuffs of his shirt. “Yeah. She agreed.”

Her breath caught.

An Ability User dug a hole through a tunnel of debris, cursing the sky. At the edges of the road, police cars stared at the mess.

“So what,” A shaky laughter left her throat; something as rawly enraged as her first words to him after a year. “What, I — I stay with the pigs and get trained to slam your ass in Ability Users’ jail? Get a medal and do paperwork? You want me to just pretend I’m like them?”

“You can do that, if you want,” Chuuya said, calmly. “But Agent Minami enrolled you in the local High School, for now.”

Yuan fell quiet, eyes widening.

Kicking rocks aside, he added: “She says you could go live with her, if you wanted. She’s got a whole penthouse — rich piece of shit. She has a brother your age, too, and — Well. She knows whatever the fuck was going on with the Bishop’s Staff,” The other girls were mostly being handled by Kouyou; work, he knew, was work. “If it makes you uncomfortable, she can get you emancipated and find you a room. But she’s paying for your school career — and for the acceleration courses you’ll need to be admitted. And for whatever you’ll want to do after.”

“But,” she stuttered. “But — “

“She owes me a favor,” he reassured her. “All you have to do is collaborate. She’ll get money from the State for the great sacrifice of handling you, anyway. The rich get richer, and whatever. She’s an adult. She can help you.”

Her flinch knocked on some hollow part of his skeleton. Opening the door would mean facing the problem. He had yet to do much more than stand next to Yuan’s sobbing frame, as he delivered news and a missing corpse to her hopeful hands.

Nothing to be said. Nothing to be done.

“Chuuya,” Her voice was a murmur of wind. “Chuuya, what right do I have to this?”

He was getting tired of recalling faces he’d stuck in a shoebox — along with his bracelet, his jacket, and the knife that had torn him apart. But he’d opened it himself; had wrapped it around her shoulders and accepted to take care of a problem he couldn’t help but consider his own.

“The others wouldn’t blame you,” he lied.

Yokohama was being assembled again in front of his eyes — he thought about running up and down the roofs of Suribachi City, following orders and trying to ignore the ghosts through the streets. He felt nothing at all. “They were petty assholes, most of the time — but they’d be happy for you. Taking away good things from your own hands won’t bring anyone back.”

“But why are they dead?” The line broke. Glassy eyes stared stubbornly forward, fists tightening around the edges of her sleeves. “I don’t get it. I’ve tried to, but — why do I get good things, and they don’t even get a grave? Why are they dead, and I’m here?”

And wasn’t that the point, he thought.

Nothing to say; nothing to do.

“Shit if I know,” Chuuya concluded. “All I know is you won’t get an answer, no matter how hard you ask. You live with it, the way you live with everything else. As selfish as it might be —” He shrugged. “Isn’t it easier to just take it?”

Yuan’s eyes searched. He let them. Pretended not to see when she wiped a tear. Still and silent, her features firmer than they had ever been before, she offered: “Shirase was right about you.”

He paused.

“He said you’ve grown,” she clarified. Some kind of wonder overtook her; she studied the forest fabric of her first new property. “You’ve always been more grown-up than any of us. But you’ve grown,” A flicker. “No matter what we tried to do to stop you.”

Buildings and debris, mafiosi and journalists. It would take a while to wipe all the blood off the road. It would take a while for the ink-like streaks to completely disappear from the tips of his fingers — the spiral-like scars would never. But dust was never optimal; and he wasn’t quite ready to kill what was still alive. He thought about the box with what he had left of the Sheep — he dreamed of setting it on fire; keeping the ashes in a lock.

“I think he’d like it,” Yuan offered. “If you called him, I mean.”

He stared at the ground. “No.”

“Chuuya —”

“You know,” he cut her off. “I’ve killed a lot of kids.” He studied his gloves, and when the air broke his ribs — he breathed out. “I don’t know if Sheep are among them.”

Somewhere beneath the dust; beneath a cliff with a traitor’s grave and his first family’s demise; somewhere where not even gods could find redemption — Chuuya closed his eyes. He gathered the blood and the poison pooling down his side, and found he would never be able to tear his shoes off the rocks.

You owe them that, at least, he concluded. His death would serve no purpose. He’d haunt the house and be haunted in return. Only that.

Slowly — the time it took the world to exist — Yuan nodded.

“Me neither,” she whispered, lost. Her head landed somewhere on his shoulder; the texture of his old jacket against his skin did not start a fire.

This is Yuan, he thought, and perhaps never again. Perhaps they had nothing left to say to each other. Be nice to her.

“Me neither, Chuuya.”

---

...

---

The cemetery had never been as crowded.

Frequent visitor as he was, Chuuya had never felt the vaguely distracting pull of questions, watching the floor of mourning men and women kneel in front of the endless new graves. Each picture was a bit younger than the one before; each sobbing face, he wondered if he'd been the one to kill the beloved they were wasting their tears on.

It was the lack of guilt that bothered him.

Unable to muster up tears, he vowed to send a thanking flower basket to the open sky upon his head, soaking him and the hurriedly escaping crowds to the bone.

The squad got no graves.

The graveyard was soon empty, abandoning his crossed legs to the muddy grass and the fake stones lacking the Flags' names. Chuuya could hear thunder. Kanjis and numbers alternated in front of his eyes, curling and intertwining and stubbornly fighting the blur of the storm.

Don't hurt yourself, Madame Tanaki had said, marching to her own ghost. They wouldn't want that.

Well, Chuuya had wanted to say. He'd kicked and punched and destroyed the cars they'd abandoned at the street racing circuit until his body was numb. He'd spoken less than he had in years. He had no one to take out his bottomless unfairness on. There was no Verlaine around anymore. Fuck you, guys.

Not even Noguchi uttered a scoff at that.

He thought —

The first Physics book he'd stolen from under Kouyou's nose — long before she'd begun to put them on his desk instead — had been a tedious, never ending, beautiful study on black holes. He had been curious enough to stay awake all night.

A black hole acts like an ideal black body, the book had explained, thankfully just humble enough not to use terms he would have to look up, haunted by his own pride. A black hole cannot reflect any light. They are impossible to be observed directly, partly because of their temperature. A region of space from which nothing can escape.

“Flowers,” the old woman near the gates called, near his cart. It gathered her some nasty glances. “Come get flowers!”

Too still to pay attention to the buckets of ice raining on him, Chuuya fiddled with his shoelaces. Koda would have batted his hand away. Koda would have told him to shut up, even if he hadn’t said a thing.

Sorry, he wanted to say. His lips wouldn’t move. His coat — Pianoman’s coat — was slipping down from his shoulders. I’m sorry.

Steps appeared from a distance; Arahabaki had been much quieter and then much louder — Chuuya had gained heightened senses in exchange, and an aggravating tendency to scratch his skin to raw blood. He felt each slap of the soles on the wet ground — felt it grow heavier and closer, until it stopped right in front of his hunched back.

A dome appeared upon his head, drying a column of existence right where he was seated. The tip-tap of raindrops on the black umbrella dug holes in some malleable part of his skull.

“Chuuya said no,” Dazai spoke up, at the end of the world. Barely louder than the rain; genuine in his confusion. Even the structure was meant to be perplexed; here’s the facts; why don’t I get them? “Why did you say no?”

He didn’t answer.

It took the boy a while to speak again. “It’s tragically low, even for you. I don’t like winning by default.”

Distant thunder; mud sneaking in his boots. Five graves. Eleven. A hundred. An Executive, Noguchi had told him, should save people. That’s what I think. Chuuya hadn’t found a new apartment yet. No place seemed big and small enough.

The chance to fight was right there.

Stand on his feet, push Dazai away until his pants were all filthy, scream in his face. You don’t get to decide, he would have snarled, you don’t get to be mad. You’ve never mourned a single person in your life. You’re going to die as alone and quietly as you wish, and no one will mourn you either. You’re gonna choke on that suicide book of yours and stick a bullet in your head and laugh as you waste all I’ll never have, and the Executive seat will be free again.

How’s that for a victory?, he thought.

Chuuya just needed a few breaths. He was a fast learner. He’d leave that graveyard and let it haunt the places no one else could see; he just needed a few breaths. He had never needed anything else.

“I’ll beat you some other time,” Chuuya concluded. “Any and all others.”

“That’s not —“

“Dazai,” His voice sounded disconnected to his own ears. He couldn’t tear his eyes away. He couldn’t stop thinking about black holes. “Leave.”

It thundered and it rained. Chuuya watched the chain on his hat dangle quietly in the corner of his eye, dripping rain from before an unwanted roof had come. Discomfort soaked Dazai’s final words; their lining was inevitably honest, unable to come to any other result, no matter his calculations.

Partner, he’d told Kouyou. What else?

“You told me to wait for you.”

A smashed microscope on the floor; the surge of understanding; the motorcycle he’d left in Noguchi’s father’s hands, still keeping his son a secret. Wait for me. Perhaps Hirotsu had told him.

Your friends are dead, Shibusawa had said, easily.

I’m sorry, Koda had sighed. Just don’t die, he’d replied. As if it was that easy. Just don’t die. Just don’t die. Not you too.

[Verlaine hadn’t needed to say a thing. He’d just opened his car truck, and —]

It thundered and it rained. Do you think you know rage?, Kouyou had asked. Shielded by an umbrella and a bandaged fool, Chuuya didn’t move — for a few breaths only. So little, they wouldn’t change a thing.

---

...

---

[“You’re Glasses Guy,” Chuuya noted, as the Intelligence member led him to Mori’s temporary office. “Dazai’s buddy number two.”]

“We drink together, sometimes,” he replied, hurriedly, staring pointedly forward. “My name is Sakaguchi Ango. I don’t think we’ve met before.”

“Have we?”

The rigid set of his shoulders told him he’d recognized the genuine question — Chuuya couldn’t shake the feeling of familiarity off his bones. Perhaps the library. Perhaps the archive. Perhaps —

“I think I would remember meeting the boy perched on every tongue of the underground,” he replied, pushing his glasses up his nose. The echo dissolved; he was left with nothing but empty hands, and the grim reminder of belated fame. “One of the two, anyway. Follow me. Boss is waiting.”

Mori’s temporary office was a less grand, less lived-in version of the well known and feared attic of Building One. Floor-to-ceiling windows and golden-lined velvet couches stood unchanged; but the never ending shelves of books — an assortment of medical texts, literature, and children coloring books — were nowhere to be found.

Unframed by that somewhat intimidating background, the Boss looked less like a statue bestowed with convenient — whether fair or unfair — judgment; more like a man who ruled the city in all the ways that mattered, still working his shoulders under the new weight.

Five hundred billion yens and no other Moon around any longer were doubtlessly a heavier crown. Mori’s glee was evident. His satiated eyes even more.

“Thank you, Sakaguchi,” he nodded, as the archivist bowed. “Leave us alone.”

Elise laid on her stomach on top of his desk, humming as she dangled her legs, focused on some probably relevant report she was dragging her crayons all over. Over the gentle, young lines of her silhouette, were the Boss’ intertwined hands, and the unwavering gaze he laid on him.

Chuuya stayed bowed, hat in his hands. He waited.

“Then,” the man started. His smile was teasing. It stopped at the edge of his lips, unfinished carvings; his gaze was focused. “Did you enjoy Social Services Day?”

He made a face. “Necessary business, sir.”

A huff of laughter. “Stand up, Chuuya. You did good. I apologize for the theatrics of it all.”

Mori patted Elise’s head, shaking his own, vaguely exasperated. “Coming to power taught me that most illegitimate activities only survive by playing clean in the fields’ they can afford to. I doubt the Government will ever bring the police to our doorsteps, but they might very well incriminate me for abuse and exploitation of minors,” His grin was pure camaraderie; Elise giggled. “That wouldn’t be ideal, would it?”

“No, sir.”

“Being infantilized can’t have been fun. Not for the most talked-about Ability User in Yokohama,” he noted. “Kouyou tells me they made some — insensitive comments.”

“Governmental officials have mouths to shit and asses to sit,” Chuuya quoted, tonelessly. At the man’s face, he cleared his throat. “It’s fine. Suribachi way of saying.”

“Rintarou said I cannot use those words,” Elise mumbled, dragging a violent red line down her drawing. “He says it’s not ladylike. That’s not fair at all,” She glanced critically at him. “Chuuya. Move closer to the light.”

“I especially wish to apologize for Dazai’s behavior.”

His head snapped up.

Mori’s entire self was apologetic. From the vaguely embarrassed tilt of his mouth, to his brushing-off motions; a parent, in the simplest way, paying for his son’s attempts to put the family name through the mud. He wondered, for the first time, if he had something like Kouyou’s fingers tapping her under-chin. Silent but necessary; unjust — for two people who only looked like children, but obeyed all the same.

“He’s been under a lot of stress, lately,” he justified. “His mind was certainly pivotal in this conflict. And right when the war ends, he loses that beloved pet of his. He didn’t look much bothered by the loss, truly — but I know him. He was always very attached to his creatures.”

It took Chuuya too long to understand. “Kazuko is dead?”

“Unfortunately,” Mori sighed. “She escaped Dazai’s home while he was busy, and some retreating troops from Takasekai cut her body up. Purely sadistic, as far as I managed to understand. Dazai didn’t care much, but he was fixated on avenging the thing, no matter his own wounds,” Elise muttered something about stupidity; the ex-doctor smiled. “I had to calm him down, before he did something drastic. Forgive me, if you felt uninformed. I assumed, close as the two of you are, that he might have explained that he liked to experiment by mixing medicines. He has a particular fixation on muscle relaxants.”

His brain had been dumped in a cold lake; endless hours spent subjecting himself to a boa constrictor’s praises, endless bite marks on his calves, the unsettling joyfulness the boy seemed to show whenever that unconventional pet of his was mentioned — Chuuya couldn’t understand.

Dazai didn’t care much.

“And that’s alright?” he asked, uncertain.

Mori tilted his head to the side. “I told you a long time ago, did I not? Dazai is not stable.”

He thought of his body floating in the river; the distant light his eyes would get, sometimes, when he was pulled out. The frustration of it. “And just letting him try and try again to die is supposed to solve the problem?”

“If it keeps him alive, Chuuya,” the man replied, firm, oxymoronic — something else; something he wasn’t allowed to look in the eyes, “Anything is worth a try.”

He didn’t look alive, he didn’t say. He was breathing. Is that enough for all of you?

“But enough about him,” Mori leaned back on his seat, looking up at him with his sincerest smile yet. “Say, Chuuya. Are you ready to gain access to our investigations about your past?”

Sudden and unwanted, he remembered France.

Charleville-Mézières; the dusty furniture and ancient ceiling of a home he had haunted in the way of ghosts, too sagged with godlikeness not to make the floor creak — too nauseous with guilt, blood-food, and the poisons Mori had given him, to sleep soundly in the pushed-together beds. He had been sent to France to evaluate his abilities in the syndicate’s foreign deals; he had been sent to France because the high-floors needed more time to decide where their more-powerful-than-predicted tassel would fit.

He had come back, and he had sunk his head in the stream for an ounce of power in the city he wanted to be in — because if he didn’t care for answers any longer, he might as well care for a seat in the highest floors of Yokohama. If he couldn’t even buy furniture for his own apartment, he might as well vindicate a boy eating cockroaches and vomit, and drown in more than he would ever need. Because if he wasn’t real, he might as well be useful.

More, Arahbaki insisted, and he’d misunderstood him everyday of his life, had he not?

More.

“I don’t want it,” his lips carved in the air. Something around his rib cage shifted; tightened and released — and he was breathing, for the first time since he’d kneeled on another’s office floor, and sworn his life away again. “The Executive position. I don’t want it.”

Mori’s bewilderment was genuine enough to startle Elise, too; the sound of crayons on paper was cut short. “You don’t — want it?”

He searched for words. Actions were the one language no unstable family had ever needed to teach him; he’d known killing was a clear alphabet before he’d known what the sun was. Words were gloves on his hands, goosebumps on the decayed skin of his arms; Chuuya wished he could have read out whatever code had supposedly made him and have everyone understand.

“I don’t want to be given power,” he said, eventually, slow and careful, weighing each sound on the tip of his tongue, “I don’t want to be given power, only because I’m powerful.”

A flash passed on the Boss’ face — without a blink, Elise disappeared.

“I want to deserve it,” he added, frowning at the floor. Perhaps it wasn’t always rage, that violent shake in his veins — perhaps it was unmalicious stubbornness; perhaps it didn’t want him as dead as he had long believed. “We agreed I was — unfit to rule, when I first joined the Port Mafia. I have my faults for the Sheep’s end. But I never took the crown for myself. I had just been too powerful for anyone else to dare take it away.”

“I fought for Yokohama. I fought for the organization, and for my friends, and for myself. My strength shouldn’t steal someone’s spot,” Chuuya set his jaw. “An Executive should save people. I did many things, during this war — but I did not save. Being a soldier is easy enough. Being a leader is — something else. Something I haven't learned yet."

Mori studied him. He couldn't decipher his face; he dropped his head down, huffing another laugh — as if he had expected nothing less; perhaps infinitely more.

"Chuuya," the ex-doctor declared. "You will be given more power, whether you want it or not."

He waited, shoulders straight.

"Neither you or Dazai seem to understand the mark the two of you left, during this conflict," he continued. "I understand. You have both been busy. But I have ears everywhere this city dares to grow, and I know what they are saying," His seat did not screech when he stood; he moved to the front of the desk, pensive and hungry. "You have, quite literally, captivated Yokohama."

"There is not one, one, criminal — professional assassins and petty thieves alike — or organization, who isn't whispering about you," Pride overflowed from his lips; Chuuya could see it drip on the floor, red and black, black, black. "They warn their men. They tell stories about the god who annihilated an entire organization in one go, and the prodigy who seemed to have predicted this entire conflict from its first day. The shadows of the Port Mafia; never seen, never unsuccessful."

Chuuya couldn't speak.

"I visited the Infirmary, at the beginning of the week," Mori said. "I had dozens of men demand you were rewarded for your efforts. Demand to be put under your command. You are as much of a myth as your origins are, and men want to touch the inhuman. It's the way the underground has always worked. You want to deserve power? That is certainly noble. But you already have it, Chuuya. And I cannot take it away, even without a title."

His body was ablaze. Pride, he thought. Terror. Vindication; the feeling of holding the city he'd bled for in his palm, and knowing few would be strong enough to dare —

"I had a title, in the Sheep," Chuuya replied. "You called it undeserved, sir. Perhaps I can't stop them all from talking — But I can learn. I can grow. I can —" He cleared his throat. "Shut less coffins, the next time danger comes."

The man leaned against his desk, nodding. "Very well, then," he concluded. His expression softened, imperceptibly. "For whatever it might matter, Chuuya. You lost the competition."

He stilled.

His next smile was barely there; he reminded him, for some reason, of Virgil's quiet seriousness — explaining academic concepts he had never learned in the slums. "There is one thing that separates you from every other man in this organization," the Boss explained. "Not your Ability. Not Arahbaki. Not your story. It's your loyalty." He reached forward; laid a hand on his shoulder. “Unwavering and undefeated. You would tear your limbs to enclose Yokohama in a safety net, if you could. You’re loyal to the ground that raised you.”

“You were loyal to the Sheep, who were lucky enough to deserve it,” he went on. “So did the Flags, who you defeated your own brother for. You’re loyal to Kouyou, for taking you as one of her own. You were loyal to your squad, for standing next to you, even as most men of the syndicate refused to look you in the eyes. You’re loyal to Kajii, who you brought here. To Hirotsu, to Madame Tanaki — even to Q, at times. To me. You’re as devoted to Dazai as he is to you.”

Devoted, he thought. What a terrible word. Wasn’t he supposed to be the divine one? Wasn’t this supposed to be temporary?

“I’m not —” he tried to interrupt.

“Do not fight me on this. Loyalty is inestimable,” Mori swore. “But only when it is given to something greater than people, as well. You lost many faithful friends. Should every person in this organization who you deem worthy of this loyalty of yours die — what would you do? What choice would you make?”

The hand on his shoulder slipped down; unmistakable, it pressed between his collarbones — where his tattoo rested. “Is the Port Mafia what you would die for, or are its people?”

Chuuya found he didn’t know.

Outside the windows, the sun disappeared underneath the waves, drowning the room in crimson and gold.

The Boss sighed. He fixed his coat around his shoulders; offered him a much less intense expression. “We’ll discuss more on this matter, anyway. The new year is coming. New responsibilities will come with it,” The man put his hat on top of his head; déjà vu almost suffocated him. “For now, you should rest. And, maybe — have someone at the Infirmary check if those Corruption wounds of yours are healing correctly.”

His jaw brushed the floor. “But —”

“Rescinded privileges are — no longer rescinded,” Mori winked. “You boys did a good job. You are more than welcome — required, actually — to come to me, should this unplanned usage of Corruption cause you any sort of side effects. We had vowed to let you rest a little longer, but — Well. The war is over.”

He bowed. There wasn’t much else to do.

“And Chuuya?” Mori called, once he had reached the door.

He turned to look at him. His head was tilted to the side, pensive.

“No need to worry. You will not be punished for the medical consultation you received after the Reaper’s attack. It wasn’t your choice, after all,” A chuckle; Elise, he noticed, had reappeared. She waved her finished drawing at him; himself, covered in bleeding Corruption marks. “Dazai has already been — disciplined, for bringing you to that Oda Sakunosuke of his. No need to worry,”

It hadn’t been his intention, Chuuya thought. Something about it sounded wrong. Something about it sounded unfair. Kazuko, he thought, nonsensically. What about —

A closing nod. Mori’s scarf brushed the dusty floor; Building Two could have used a sweep. “I beg you to forgive him, once again,” he sighed. “That boy truly forgets himself, sometimes.”]

---

...

---

Festivities came with little care for a city still struggling to climb to its feet.

It was a mixture of discomfort and delight. Between dazzling lights hastily thrown over every crack and wreck, and the Christmas decorations turning each road in a blinding ray of moonlight — most would have been hard-pressed to find every hospital in Yokohama was still filled to the brim. Choirs muffled the sound of underpaid workers; the smell of sweets and cotton was borderline nauseating.

Chuuya had always liked the end of the year.

“The Sheep knew when to leave me alone,” he narrated, bending to pick up a fallen frame from the floor. Albatross’ apartment had been left a mess after the intrusion — glass shards and ripped curtains and dangling posters. He had taken Ōmu off the floor already; had thrown his ashes in Albatross’ favorite vehicle dumping site. “But I would still wait for them to be asleep to leave.”

He would circle their perimeter like a starved beast — sure there would be no fools brave enough or brave ones foolish enough to dare, but unable to risk it all. “I’d find the tallest mountain of shit and rubbles in Suribachi, even if it was filled with so much snow I would freeze my ass off — and I would sit and watch the Christmas lights.”

“Not that there were any in Suribachi,” He kicked the side of a couch, pushing it back to its original place — floated broken cutlery off the counter with a touch. The lights had overfilled Yokohama with borderline tackiness — too pretty to grimace at. An unreachable skyline; a tasteless joke at the expense of a kid who could fly — just not quite that far.

“Some of the older kids tried to get me to believe in Santa,” Chuuya scoffed. Lippman’s eyes stared back, grinning. “I didn’t even have the face to tell them I had no idea of who he was.”

One of the windows creaked, pushed open by the winter wind. He nudged some glass with his sock; sat down a few inches off the floor, crossing his legs. Tsuchiya's eyepatch was wrapped around his wrist; he pulled at it, lithe.

Last December, the Flags had dragged him to some precocious Christmas Festival. They had refused to stop waddling around until their feet were numb and he couldn't see straight. They'd all made him a gift — except Lippman, who had finally dropped the Nakahara, after months of his snarls.

We're doing this again, Albatross had warned him, dragging him home on unstable feet, So get ready. As soon as New Year comes around! Koda had begged them to join him and his brother to go witness the fireworks on Mount Omaru. Chuuya can finally experience being tall, Kenta had sighed.

Then they'd been dead.

A knock came on the ajar door.

"Merry Christmas," Hirotsu said, peeking in. His scarf had been substituted by a green one; he offered no judgemental gaze to the chaos of the room — instead, he studied the space between the ground and his legs. "That is quite the nice trick."

"You should see me when it rains," Chuuya replied, rolling glass under his index. "You've got some face showing up here."

"Me or you?"

He let the shard fall. Hugged his shoulders in; tilted his head to study the picture stuck to the kitchenette. Soft steps grew sharper; the sound of ruins being crunched under Hirotsu's foot, as he picked up his abandoned broom for no real aim. The warmth of his body settled behind his back — never touching; but present. He reminded Chuuya of the makeshift canopies in Suribachi City.

"Chuuya," the Commander said, gentle in that gruff way of his. "He won't let you stay here."

One of the shards had dug a small hole on the middle finger of his glove; he poked it.

"Chuuya."

"I'm not staying," he lied. "I know. Tanaki gave me a pamphlet of free apartments in our territory. She wants me to get a penthouse."

She had been there with him, locked in the bathrooms of Building One, with nothing but a pair of scissors and a lighter in her hands. She had let him pick the strand he wanted to burn; Chuuya had smelled the ash in his hair for hours. Why do you think we do this?, he had asked her.

Her shrug had been vacant. The strand of hair in the back of her skull hadn't regrown yet; the tips still looked tortorously black, in the light. Isn't doing nothing worse?

His scoff must have been louder than he had predicted; because a small wave of amusement curled at the man's feet. "Seems a bit much for your taste."

"Yeah, well," Chuuya shrugged. She had been rather enthusiastic about it; had pressed her side against his under her desk with the papers in hands, like there was nothing to fear. Not afraid I'll explode?, he had wanted to ask. But almost nobody had time to fear him, these days — they were too busy mourning those he had killed. It was only him who could hear the incessant beep. "Maybe I need better taste."

The man's pause lasted a bit too long. He cleared his voice; it sounded awkward.

"You know," he started. His tone had him blinking. "Kajii tells me the Old World has some truly nice drinks to its name."

Chuuya stared.

"I'm just saying — should you ever need a drinking buddy, I would greatly —"

"Gramps," he cut him off, speechless. "Put yourself out of your misery."

The Commander's shoulders sagged with relief. "Very well."

He frowned at the ground. "I know," he muttered, very low.

"I beg your —"

"I said I know," Chuuya said, a bit too fast. The man's eye was still a bit scarred, behind the monocle — all of him was a tad too thin. Chuuya had never even seen him sleep, before the accident. He met his gaze with defiance; with acceptance. "I know, Hirotsu. Of course I do."

The man was the one to stare.

He snapped his gaze back to the floor; stood up, and threw the spare broom into his arms. "Get that look off your face and help me clean up."

---

...

---

Christmas was spent at Kouyou's mansion, twirling wine in one of her tall glasses and losing his voice in a screaming match against Kajii.

“Won’t Miranda miss you?” he asked Hirotsu.

Yuan had sighed about Christmas being a romantic holiday every year since they’d met; this one in particular, he had watched her banter with Agent Minami in front of the woman’s apartment, hands full of mochi and her face slowly, slowly, melting. He hadn’t said anything. Shirase hadn’t called. Adam had sent another pop-up postcard.

My information tells me some religions believe this festivity to be the birth of a creator, he’d written. Do you know what androids call their creator? Da-ta.

“She can survive a few hours,” the man replied, easily. “She is very independent.”

They played Igo until the choirs outside got too tired to sing, and Kajii drunkenly offered him one of his lemon bombs as a present. Madame Tanaki kept him on the phone for more than an hour. Kouyou kissed his forehead before he could leave; he felt himself blush to the tips of his ears, and dropped some too-obvious scoffs about it.

Chuuya was too drunk to even think. It wasn’t until he landed on the guest bed Kouyou had reserved for him, that he found himself wondering what demons did for the holidays.

“Hey,” he muttered, when Kajii threw his door open to scream his good nights. “Where do you bury snakes?”

Very confusedly, he told him he did not know.

Works at Building One were still on — the journalists in the area lowered in number day after day, though. TV News slowly began to change their first segments; protests in front of the Special Division HQs came to an end with eerie ease. Few people bothered being courageous under shining Christmas trees. Yokohama wasn’t gentle enough not to threaten itself into normality.

He thought he should have been more surprised about how quickly the city seemed to forget the months of hell; Mori shrugged, when he admitted it to him.

“What else should they do?” he questioned.

Given the circumstances, it was decided the annual New Year’s Eve party would be hosted in Building Two instead. The event was meant to fix a common problem throughout the organization: the solitude most of its members experienced on such a family-like festivity. A bit too nice for a criminal organization — a show of trust and welcome, from the Boss most had hated, at first.

Wrapped in the maroon kimono Kouyou had thrown his way before he could escape, Chuuya stared at the hastily hung pictures on the hallway, pretending the laughter from behind the ballroom doors did not shake the ground.

He’s grieving, he had heard both Kouyou and Tanaki insist, again and again, to every voice wondering about his unusual quietness. The holidays are complicated.

The pictures had been saved, he assumed — or Mori owed multiple copies. Severe and slightly malicious faces, straight shoulders — the something in their eyes that told the thing in his veins they knew blood intimately.

The Colonel's face was solemn. It hadn't been visible in the picture of his corpse.

The nearest of them, almost eye level, was all cracked glass and slightly blurred outlines — ruined by the shivers. The golden plaque on the frame read: Randou.

At the bottom — a waiting frame.

"There you are," Dazai exclaimed, appearing from the end of the hallway. "I thought I had smelled dog and kadomatsu up the stairs."

Two rows of suited men followed him; he didn't recognize anyone from the Secret Force.

"You can go," he told them, as he skipped to him. His kimono looked offensively expensive, and Chuuya didn't doubt it was — in shades of cobalt and grey, it gave him and his bandages a ghostly appearance; right out of Rin's horror stories. "Do you need to check the air I breathe? How will I ever commit a peaceful suicide, with you ninjas stalking me?"

"Boss' orders, Executive Dazai," the woman at the front replied, undeterred. She bowed. "You will find us inside." A respectful nod was directed to Chuuya's own way. "Vice-Executive Nakahara."

He thought about correcting her. He wouldn't know with what, though.

Dazai's sigh was endless. The moment the unwanted crowd disappeared, all childish obnoxiousness slid down his face like melted wax; the thing left under it made Chuuya more uncomfortable than he was willing to admit.

Not honesty. Never that. But —

"I thought I'd smelled dead fish and bullshit," Chuuya replied, tonelessly. "But now that you're here, the self-satisfaction has muffled everything else."

Dazai hummed. His pupils had abandoned their overtaking quest, sometime during those last few weeks of December; but color had yet to return to his cheeks. He sneaked a glance at the photographs; seemed to change his mind about commenting. "No hat," he noticed, instead. "Did you hit your head hard enough to heal?"

"Ane-san said it would clash," he replied. "Fuck you."

"Did you burn a strand yet?"

Defensiveness stiffened his shoulders. "It's none of your business."

"You're one for customs," Dazai said, as if he hadn't heard a thing. "Personally, I never got this one in particular. How are you meant to decide who's worth the flame, anyway? The Port Mafia was deprived of many men. You might be out of hair too soon, have you thought about that?”

His teeth clenched so tightly he almost bit his tongue off. “I’m not responsible for every corpse on this earth.”

“Only you who doesn’t know it.”

“‘You makin’ shoes out of Kazuko, or just using her body as a low-cost hanging rope?’”

Muffled laughter appeared from behind the doors; a cheer and a toast, as some kind of classical music managed to make even the walls tremble. They stared at each other. Neither one of their kimonos was unfit — tailored to the skeleton. Nothing more useless than the knives hidden underneath the robes.

Wordlessly, Dazai offered his hands, palms up.

I’ll kill him, he recalled. Once there is no need for a cage. I’ll kill him.

Arahabaki did not answer, because he could not answer — because he wouldn’t care to, anyway. Sorry, he couldn’t say — he wouldn’t say it either. Kazuko was no matter at all, according to Mori. Sorry, I know she was something. Sorry, I never understood what.

He removed his gloves with his teeth, and laid his hands on his waiting palms. “Ain’t you gonna get a second tattoo or something, anyway?” he asked, planting his feet on the ground not to turn that small concession to gravity — not gravity — into something greater. “Executives’ inks are different.”

“A detail is added, yes,” Dazai studied the bluish paths up his knuckles, searching for black roads he did not find. “Nothing much. Nothing that could kill me, unfortunately,” Usual glee — the underline of whatever had been rotting him inside for so long, he couldn’t remember when it had started. “On that matter. You still owe me —“

His head pounded. “If this is about that now I can boss you around shit —“

“Chibi, where’s your heart?”

“ — I will gladly remind the nose I made bleed just a week ago of why you’re not allowed to be a piece of fuck about this —“

The doors slipped open. Rose-pink and red appeared from the slot; Kouyou’s eyes fell on their joint hands, cutting off the words visibly perched on top of her lips.

They jumped back as if burned.

“Ane-san,” Chuuya snapped.

“Boys,” she offered. One of her eyebrows was dead set on brushing her hairline — hiding a strange expression behind a fan as decorated as she was, she nodded. She hadn’t brought a jacket; he made a mental note to steal one for her. “You’re awaited. Come in.”

Fresh pine branches, bamboo decorations, straw ropes, and kagami mochi; the explosion of colors and trinkets in the ballroom pressed against his eyes like fireworks. Maroon curtains hid fogged up windows — the chandeliers were shinier than they'd ever been, raining golden light on the long tables filled with food dividing the room in two.

A small classical band was playing, in the far corner of the room, easily ignored by the crowd of gut-wrenchingly richly dressed people — mafiosi, associates, investors, and families; dripping in diamonds and gems and the softest fabrics for the most elaborate traditional clothing.

At the dead center of the central table, pierced by a spear of sorts, standing tall enough for every guest to see as it bleed recently-dried blood on the cloth — was the Boss of the Bishop's Staff's head.

“How tacky,” Dazai commented, not bothering with lowering his voice. “Hatrack, remind me not to eat any dessert.”

“So they did kill him, eventually,” Chuuya replied, observing the brutally torn apart caves where his eyeballs had once been. Not one of the silent waiters gave more than a glance; some of the younger members ogled it with smirking scoffs, like children with a stuck fly. “Thought Kouyou might just drag it out longer.”

“Even her sadism knows bounds. How surprising,” the boy replied, but it soon blurred off somewhere, sometime — as every head in the ballroom realized who was standing there.

Silence did not fall.

It would have been distasteful. The swarm of sounds lowered to a pitiful volume, dragged down by the falling smiles of the guest's faces — but only for a blink, before it climbed to its most normal semblance. Decay and torture on the table, he considered, and fear settles on the brats in festive kimonos?

Decapitated heads could not kill, was the immediate reminder. And they had spent the last few months proving just how willing they were to. Their eyes told him they knew.

He stuck his hands in his obi, pretending it would count as pockets. “Boring,” he huffed.

Then, he stalked towards the refreshments.

Stuck between preening and rolling his eyes when people parted and flinched and offered his bows, he felt Dazai's presence like a shadow. “Are you not close enough to a god to appreciate worship?” he asked, stealing his Champagne glass from his hand the moment it was in it. Executive Dazai echoed from the widening circle around them.

Chuuya took his glass back after a sip. “Are you?”

Celebration moved forward — music and drinks and talks of victory, as the streets outside the window shone with belated Christmas lights; the head stayed in the eye of the storm. At one point, Ace fed it grapes.

Every mouth in the room laughed.

“Bet they wouldn’t, if we did that,” Dazai said.

They bet some more — somehow, Chuuya ended up being the one to do it. Predictably enough, wide eyes and steps back welcomed his fingers on the lifeless flesh. They will line up to light your cigarette, Kouyou had said. As the crowd offered charmed, terrified approval for his every move, he thought he understood.

Hirotsu had officially begun a search for two co-commanders for the Black Lizards; he made sure to offer a place to Chuuya, addressing him as Vice-Executive with the clear expectation of a refusal. Madame Tanaki was dealing with the aftermath of her divorce; she was thinking of getting herself a dog, or perhaps a firearm of sorts — whatever would guard her new mansion better.

Kajii was muttering under his breath; something about these parties being too similar to his parents’ events. Kouyou, when she floated their way, admitted to be wasting most of her days away on relocating the Bishop’s Staff’s women and their children. Mori would want either; she would give them to him.

As an endless violin piece came to an end, small arms wrapped around his legs.

“Nii-san,” Q said.

The smell of blood was so thick it made his head swarm. Their kimono hung off their shoulders, sweeping the ground with its greyish hems. The hat was still in place — their hand tight around the edge of Elise’s unchangeable red dress.

“I did not see you.”

He knew they didn’t mean now.

“Lise!” Dazai exclaimed, reappearing from whatever horror story he had been cheerfully offering to the nearest teeth-trembling pair. He dug some envelopes from the back of his kimono, crouching in front of her. “How repulsive you look. Did Mori buy you another dress, after you murdered the boss of the Bishop’s Staff?”

She humpf-ed. “Two of them, actually. You still owe me for throwing up on my dolls.”

“Oh, that,” He shook his head. “Kill me, and I’ll make it up for you.”

Some more dances began; some more toasts. Some Black Lizards began peeling away pieces of skin from the face of the room’s sacrificial lamb. Perhaps it was necessary; perhaps it was too much, asking a crowd of men who lived off blood to stand in a room and play pretend for all those hours without something to rage over.

You know, he had heard two men whisper, dead eyed and white-smiling. I almost miss the conflict.

Chuuya let them fade in the corner of his eye; Q was still staring up at him.

“Sorry, kid,” he said, at last. A grave, a face; why wasn’t Koda with you; what were the last words he said; why did you kill our own men and then cried about Hell? “I’ve been busy. I hear Mori might give you a new room, though. Very soon.”

The idea made him uncomfortable — hypocritical to the bone.

Because he didn’t want it — the violence, the blood — he told himself. And Q didn’t either — someone who cried about their own sins so deeply couldn’t. But they enjoyed it as it happened; left the sorrow for the aftermath and the corpses.

Don’t we?, Arahabaki scratched.

“Are you scared?”

He was startled. “Excuse me?”

“Are you scared?” Q insisted, gripping his clothes. It didn’t appear as if the possibility tormented them. “Your friend was. I’m sorry he’s like the corpses. It wasn’t me,” Their lips trembled; for a moment, their intensity seemed too wide for the room. “It wasn’t me. I promise. Promise.”

“Don’t talk about him,” Chuuya ordered, abrupt and rude enough to make them recoil.

“Don’t —“

“And Q, you too!”

Bandaged fingers appeared; Dazai kneeled in front of them, shoving another envelope in their pale hands, and closing them around it.

“Here’s your present,” he explained. “New Year is a child’s paradise — that’s what Odasaku said. We don’t get gifts. But you do! Isn’t that great? I apologize for the lack of viscera and men on the border of insanity,” His smile took a sharper turn. “We all know how much you like those.”

“Hey,” Elise whined. “These are empty!”

It didn’t take Q long to notice the same; Dazai gleefully let the two children lament the deception as he snickered, before holding out a hand to Chuuya. He blinked.

“What?” he protested. “I’m not your wallet.”

“Didn’t you grow up around poor, sad, little orphans?” the other hissed. “Where’s your soul? Where’s the goodness of heart those mafiosi keep talking about? Or are you that irrelevant your pay can’t afford some New Year’s presents?”

“You,” Chuuya breathed. “You bandaged bitch, you don’t have the money either —“

He stood up, quick enough to startle both children. “You lost the last Motor Race round.”

He stared.

He slapped some yen on his palm.

“Come on, stop crying,” Dazai chanted, patting the kids’ heads, offering them the money. “It was just a prank! It made everything funnier, right? I wouldn’t have left you without money on New Year. What am I, a monster?”

Elise kicked her feet. “Yes!”

“Vile,” he muttered, crossing his arms to his chest. “I knew Chuuya had the money, obviously,” With a poisonous glance his way, as cruel as every remark about his burned hair, he added: “We’re partners, haven’t you heard?”

Chuuya opened his mouth, unsure of what to say. Gloved fingers laid on his shoulders; Mori’s voice shook his chest, rumbling against his spine with a little too much joy. “I believe everyone in the underworld of Yokohama has, by now, Dazai. I hear they even gave you two a name.”

Every motion of his face stilled.

“What a town of gossipers,” he lamented, less than a note of piano later. Mistake was written all over his frame, bright and frantic, insulting its own master. “First the bedtime stories, now the workplace relationship speculations? This city’s obsession with two children could be considered scandalous, in another world,” Dazai tilted his head to the side; he smiled. “Right, Mori?”

The grip on his shoulders did not tighten, did not widen. Mori chuckled. “It’s not children it’s obsessing over. Yokohama appreciates those who are willing to destroy it in the name of its protection, I assume.”

“Certainly,” the boy agreed.

Every dance, every toast, every laughter — there came the epicenter. There came the man who might put another head on the table, if someone got the choreography wrong. He was standing proud and satiated with the best dancing monkeys of the evening — Chuuya knew the gazes he felt had nothing to do with Arahabaki.

“Yokohama could stand some fucking minding its business,” Chuuya muttered.

The threads of tension between the doctor and the boy shattered.

Another chuckle. Something sharp pressed against his clavicles; his eyes settled on the old-style camera hanging from the man’s neck.

“Oh, this,” Mori said. Elise was pulling at the purple fabric of his kimono, whining about some gift. “Our new Executive will need a picture for the wall. Tradition wants the Boss to take care of the formalities. Perhaps we can worry about it once this little party is over?”

Dazai stared at the camera. “I suppose.”

“Wonderful. May I have your attention?” Mori raised his Sake glass and his voice, calling every eye in the room to himself. Music fell quiet; he smiled amiably at his guests, eyes not pausing when they traced the head on the table. “I propose a toast,” he called, “For our new Executive. A wish of prosperity, and of good work. Raise your cups, would you?”

A hundred shiny glasses shone underneath the chandeliers, liquid brimming in the same shade as blood, upon the carefully blank faces of every high-name in the syndicate. Belatedly, Chuuya realized they were standing at the dead center of the room, surrounded by no one and nothing.

The head was still on the table. Someone had scribbled a kanji on his face, with something that might have been spit or might have been champagne.

Retaliation; always.

“Too kind,” Dazai said, eyes of steel.

Mori’s smile softened.

“And to his partner!”

A murmur went through the crowd. Head snapping up, Chuuya frowned, searching the faces for the parted lips to blame — the only thing that welcomed him were the raising voices. The waves at the port; the faraway lighting — it grew slow and untouched, syllable after syllable, until it was too loud to be understood and too attached to the glasses to be taken back.

It took him eons to shape the words.

“To Double Black!”

“To Double Black!”

Applause and cheers rained down on them — and he was seated on the muddy grass of a cemetery, he was stumbling at the very end of a crater to be burned alive, he was flying on the wing of an airplane with a man to kill and the world under his feet. He had wanted this.

For a speck of a second — he looked into Mori’s eyes before the doctor could look at him.

“Soukoku?” echoed the only other voice in miles, just quiet enough to beat the roar of the crowd. “What a tacky name.”

Clapping hands and artificial smiles and terrified eyes. Why did he look like that? He nodded. “Bet they’ll forget about it in a week.”

“No,” Dazai replied. “I don’t think so.”

A flash went off.

He cursed under his breath, scrubbing his eyes. When his vision managed to overcome the blurriness, he saw Mori’s humming smile — perfectly normal; perfectly undisturbed at the interruption; why had he looked like that? — as he waved a photograph around to make it develop fully. When he met their disconnected gazes, he winked.

“One or two pictures will not make much of a difference,” he said. “Dazai can keep you company on the wall, until you earn your own Executive seat. Right, Chuuya?”

He looked at the piece of paper and longed, agonizingly and nonsensically and with a ferocity he could barely explain to himself, to tear it into pieces. Someone threw a grape onto the head. Celebration went on, and the guests gulped the blood — Port Mafia black, always and anyway, only because it was theirs — in their mouths.

He enjoyed fame until the flattery took the cadence of Virgil’s comedic novellas.

He thought Lippman would have criticized the fireworks he could see lit up the sky behind the windows. He thought about asking where the secret Executive was spending his New Year. He thought about questioning who had come up with a name like Double Black; whether it was someone they had torn apart or ignored. He thought about Verlaine — wondered if he’d put Dazai among his killing list, were he to come to drag Chuuya away from his home now.

That partner of yours, Noguchi had spat out, once. Koda had been plotting to kill him. He would have failed.

“To Double Black!” some drunken voice insisted, belatedly.

Chuuya hadn’t stumbled on his feet since he was eight years old. He walked out of the room without a tremor in his calves; without breathing.

Before his lungs could maim him for it, he was inside the elevator.

There was nothing to think about — there was no hypnotizing, endless hum; no silver at the corner of his vision; not a sign of Dante’s voice. He had either been born into a cage or locked into it — it had been glass and it had been darkness and it had been all. He spread his palms on the glass doors as they closed, crystallized ice muffled by his gloves and sinking inside his veins all the same. His reflection was the same as it had ever been — was him but wasn’t; was bleeding and was grinning and was sporting an ember eye set on fire. He wondered if at least one member of the squad had been alive to see him rage — if their last movement had been to flinch. If they had tried to call him.

He sat on the floor.

Spine against the wall — whether the rattling feeling came from his bones, or from the metallic wires pulling the elevator up. The lights outside spun and twirled, as far as they had been from the mountains of trash of Suribachi City.

He didn’t move when the doors opened. He knew the sound of the heels pausing on the glass — the smell of her perfume; the way she fit against him when she dropped next to him.

Tanaki didn't speak as they climbed the sky. He sunk his nails into his calves. There was no liquid to drown into — there were no blinking numbers to follow with his eyes, counting and counting until he fell asleep or simply didn't remember. No accusing mirrors; no lab coats who might have put his parts together or torn them apart.

Impostor, Dante's voice swore. Impostor.

Chuuya stared forward. Sunk his nails in his calves. Waited. He had destroyed that tank; he had killed the only other who knew how it felt. He had burned a crater into existence to let himself breathe in the open air. Kouyou called him little god. Yuan had said his name was pretty. They had called him Vice-Executive. They had called him Double Black.

Fuck you, he mouthed, taunting, between gritted teeth.

"You know," Tanaki said, very low, "I used to blame myself for it."

Cement had dried between Chuuya's teeth; it hurt his jaw to let out: "For what?"

"Wanting to be needed."

He spied her way, chin half hidden behind his crossed arms. The curve of his legs was starting to ache. Chuuya wasn't made for small spaces. "I don't think that's fair."

"The Port Mafia gave everything to me," Tanaki insisted, eyes set on who knew where. The emerald shades of her kimono made the x scar on her face look silver, instead of aging. "A home. My people. My safety. At first it seemed reasonable — I merely wanted to foot the bill. It's why I returned so soon after..." Her fingers reached for nothing; the spasm reminded him of his own hands, forever cursed by an electrified spear. "Then I discovered — there was selfishness in it."

Chuuya didn't know how she had ended up there. She made it sound like she had been saved; then again, he considered, few mafiosi ever talked about the syndicate in any other way. Salvation was only shaped differently.

"It isn't selfish," he scoffed. "It would be wasteful, otherwise — having something to give."

"The things we lose," she insisted. "People. Values. All of them — there is no erasing them. No amount of good work — no amount of, next time, I won't let it happen. Next time, it will be different," Tanaki's eyes traced the Ferris Wheel, its lights moving from red to green to golden. "This is a home, despite the blood. It deserves better than to be used as an attempt to erase our guilt."

He frowned. "I don't understand."

"I'm saying they can call you a god all they want, Chuuya," the woman told him, leaning her face close enough for him to study the white roots of her hair. "You don't owe this place any divinity. Bleeding yourself out for this organization — It won't give you back what you've lost. It will only make you feel like you aren't doing enough to."

There was probably a more suited answer than staring. Chuuya couldn't find it — he couldn't focus on the staggering beat of his heart enough to say that the elevator didn't horrify some deeper part of him, still.

He couldn't understand how one could be given a hand and not die for it.

“I want you to believe this place — your Flags, your squad —” If she noticed his flinch, she didn't let it interrupt her; refusing to look away from him, Tanaki's eyes and voice grew fervent, “I want you to see this — they didn't die so that you could bleed out in their name. They died so that you could live.”

He knew his words would be cruel before he could even taste them. “They died for nothing,” Chuuya said. He didn't remember how she had screamed when he had hit her — he remembered how she had breathed when she had been robbed, though. Remembered the pointlessness.

“But their deaths are something,” Tanaki replied, undeterred.

The floor was transparent — the gallery of darkness and cables under them was deeper than Suribachi, and three times more unknown. If they were to fall, it would hurt. But Chuuya could fly. He had never worried for anyone but the ones who couldn't. “We are mere tassels for this syndicate. I know. We allow it to place corpses in our hands, and to steal our past from our fingers —” He sucked in a breath, eyes widening in alarm. “But it's more than most get. Chuuya, in the end — all people like us are, is something someone will mourn. Not everyone is so lucky.”

Would you die for the Mafia?, Mori had asked, smiling, like he knew, or for its people?

“So?” he asked, voice hoarser than wanted.

Tanaki shrugged. The flames in her gaze softened endlessly — the talons that had been reaching for nothing at all settled on his knee; tapping one, two, three times. “So step inside the elevator all you want — but don't stay here.”

His reflection tilted his head when he did. The blood was lost amongst the red lights of the skyscrapers outside, turning his eyes the same color. For a moment, he was just a person.

When the elevator slipped open — the third time he had let them, after Tanaki had left — the doors to Mori's temporary office were ajar.

He didn't wander out for a reason. There were no guards in front of the doors, for once — unsure if he wanted to wander like a ghost or graffiti the walls, he simply stood, until hushed voices caught his attention. Floating to the slot to ensure his steps wouldn't echo, he squinted, searching the blindingly illuminated room.

“— brutality,” Agent Minami was hissing.

Chuuya didn't breathe.

“This organization has always prided itself in regard. Displaying your enemies for the masses to spit on?” There wasn’t any respect in the distance she kept from the Boss of the Mafia; the gun in her hands didn’t shake. “I might not be one of the officers on your case, but you are very much challenging the ease I could incriminate this whole building with right now.”

“Certainly,” Mori agreed, hands intertwined. “But the masses need something to spit on, Agent. After such intense weeks — even more so. Otherwise, they might grow restless and cause more problems than either of us desires. As for your little threat,” he continued, once her hesitation lasted too long. “I believe you should use some of that intellect I heard so much about.”

“Do you know how an illegal organization manages to stay alive for such a long time?” Lithe steps; back and forth, like a teacher, a congressman — maybe even a doctor. “By taking precautions. By having something on every someone who dares to pass through the door frame. And if you have no such thing, you build it for yourself.”

Mori offered her a polite tilt of his lips. In some indescribable, unreachable corner of himself, Chuuya thought it a cruel sight. In every other — he knew it to be earth-shatteringly clever.

“For example,” he started —

---

...

---

The furthest side of the dumping site had been turned into a vehicles junkyard.

It was another mountain of sorts — tall and mechanical and glittering weakly with all its rust underneath the moonlight. When Chuuya picked up a discarded, sharp-edged pipe from the ground — something too burdensome to lift without Tainted, and a wonderful excuse to try all the same — and began smashing it on some old Toyota’s window, the entire mountain seemed to shake.

Chuuya was floating. He only regained physicality when his phone, abandoned on the edge of a vehicle, offered, after a three minutes long rant: “— So yeah, I’m fed up with the prank calls.”

If the nasal tone of his voice was to trust, Shirase had gotten sick during the holidays again.

It was a gradual thing — he felt the cold, first; pungent and muffled over the parts his kimono didn’t hide, whipping the newly burned strand of his hair against his nape. “— call people who will find you, you son of a bitch, and then we can have a talk in person, instead. You think I'm scared? I haven't been scared since the womb!"

And then the sweat down his palms; the unjustifiable grip of his fingers around the pipe. Chuuya smashed a back wheel. At the edge of his vision, he could see the monotone edges of the shipping container.

He heard the steps even through the mess of well-planned smashing, because Chuuya heard everything — he recognized them, toes unhesitant on the descent and heels digging the metal.

"You know, he would probably answer, if you actually spoke," Dazai said, gingerly dragging his fingers near the speaker button of his phone. He wouldn't unblock it, probably — he only enjoyed entertainment when he was far away from it. Chuuya was still relieved when he shut the call off instead. "Not that I would dare assume you know how phones work. Dogs are yet to develop opposable thumbs."

Undeterred, Chuuya kept his eyes on the car hood in front of him — the crack at the center, widening a bit more with each strike; the lines of metal curling upward in razor-sharp lines.

Tainted could have cut through just the same. Kenta had been buried under maceries and a metal foil from the vents.

"How come," Dazai insisted, tone a tad too jovial for someone who had escaped the HQs in the middle of their celebrative frenzy, "Someone who's lost almost every friend he has refuses to do something to keep the ones left?"

The car good gave up under the rainstorm of the pipe's bent edge; a panel of it flew upward, and Chuuya struck it as if a baseball ball — watching it fly past Dazai's frame, a mere breath from his side.

It landed onto the side of the mountain with a roar. Dazai didn't even flinch.

Chuuya threw the bat away, unimpressed. "How come someone who goes around boasting about partners has no trouble keeping secrets?"

The boy tilted his head, owlishly. He didn't seem concerned. "Secrets," he spelled out, like the word held no meaning — only sound.

It echoed. Chuuya tried his hardest not to care — he knew he had failed by the time the words fell out of his lips, quivering like magma underneath the concrete. "Did you know?"

Dazai did nothing but look at him.

He traced the hems of his kimono, blowing with the winter wind. There had been almost no snow yet that year; the tips of his hair twirled into knots — shining a candid white in front of the half broken car lights of a Camaro.

[“If you refuse to hand me the recording device hidden in your pocket, Agent Minami,” Mori said, smile untouched and eyes hard, “I will order the sniper in front of your apartment to put a bullet in Yuan's head.”

Chuuya's feet dropped to the ground.

The line of Minami's shoulders stretched to the ends of the earth. He couldn't see her face — he could recall the way she'd looked at Yuan, day after day he went to check up on them. She had bought her some gifts for Christmas; Yuan hadn't laughed, but she hadn't left either.

Even if it wasn't, he thought, humbly. Even if it wasn't — people from the light wouldn't let someone die. Even if it wasn't —

Chuuya thought about killing Mori.

Too late. Too unconvinced. The woman fished a metallic square from her pockets, throwing it at his feet. "And you'd kill me before I could leave the building," she concluded, bitterly.

Mori's smile was brilliant. "Precisely."

With utter clarity — because he had thought about killing him four times, since the first time his name had been whispered; because Chuuya never, never could — he understood.]

Fake snowflakes and something in Dazai's eye, too unending to be fake. Chuuya only figured out the ache in his jaw when he heard himself laugh.

"He had it all planned," he snorted, head thrown back, spine aching and scars burning. He could have flown with it — the sheer exhilaration of a magic trick; the flicker of the last piece falling where it was meant to and spelling out a life sentence — a life. "The son of a bitch had it all planned — from day one. He was testing me," He kicked a loose wheel; insisted, threatened, spelled out: "Did you know?"

The record started again — Dazai's face was wiped clean of any wrinkle resembling a beating heart, and he shrugged. "Does it matter? He did."

Body swinging as if paper, he walked across the metal parts and airless wheels, until he could cross his arms behind his back and lean forward, blinking obnoxiously too close to his face. "Don't tell me you thought your little bottle-redhead had found time to leave a dead sheep on your mourning ruote?" A sigh. "Oh, well. Guess that's why I'm Executive and you aren't."

The thick smell arose from his memory, sagging his throat. Bait and bite; rinse and repeat. Breathing shallowly, Chuuya concluded: "I'm not doing this."

Dazai hummed. "When's your transfer to the Special Division, then?"

Something settled inside his skull; it began to be rattled by his own lungs, a melodic tin! that made him think of Social Workers and the face the boy had made with a gun to his temple. "I'm not doing this," he said, again. Then he turned, and he made his way through the scrapped cars — away.

"Not many would be so glad to be manipulated," Dazai called, scratching his ankle with his other foot — the way he did when he was hiding a gun there. He was following him.

“This is his game,” Chuuya replied, eyes on the junk — eyes on the shipping container. The bright fireworks in the sky; the distant decorations. “This is his city — this is his game. Did you ever think I didn’t know?”

Their steps matched — the boy was too lazy to find the best places to walk on not to disrupt the mountain, and too annoying not to pretend he didn’t know that place by memory.

“Chuuya,” he asked. The wind and the silk caressed his skin; Kouyou’s gifts and the feeling of Dazai — the idea of something leaving. Temporary and amnesiac — quiet. Always quiet. “Do you think you’re going to kill me?”

The wind not brushing his nape was still an unfamiliar sensation — his hair, he had noticed, was growing with urgency. It would be long again soon. He would still be there.

He felt his smile land on the ground. When it rolled down the trash, leaking pipes baptized it in something a bit realer — stuck it to his face as the hopeless nothing stuck under his nails. “You’re not this stupid.”

“Maybe not,” Dazai admitted. Like you’d ever let me. Like anybody could. “But I heard what you said to the Bishop’s Staff. Tell me this — do you feel powerful?”

He stared at his shoes. He climbed the crater. He always had. “I know I am.”

“Divine, then.”

“That wasn’t —“

“I’ve got other synonyms,” he insisted. Dazai had longer legs. He could have caught up with him. “I know all of them. Holy. Celestial. Almighty. Mythical. Otherworldly — Do you feel otherworldly, Nakahara Chuuya?”

Fireworks pounded against his eyelids. Chuuya was still in the elevator — still in the ballroom of cheering mouths; still stuck in the slot of Mori’s door; still curled up under a plastic roof, being told his name for the first time. “What the fuck are you talking about?”

“Do you think you could do it?”

“I’m not playing this game.”

“Aren’t you?”

“No,” Chuuya stopped; turned. None of the crazed, blown-out-pupils haze was left between Dazai’s ears; something calmer had taken all the space, bleeding down like vomit. “No. Have one of your moods somewhere else.”

“Don’t tell me you’ve never wanted to see me bleed out,” Dazai insisted, stepping forward. He had the same look Mori had had — only from the other side. “Don’t tell me this isn’t maddening — me in your seat. Me with you, in the title the underground has decided to fear.”

“It’s consequential.”

“It’s inescapable.”

“I don’t run,” he snapped. “You do.”

“I’m not running,” the boy let him know. His eye seemed to dig through the barely reconstructed skin of his scars, poking at the brink. “You told me you don’t dream — do you think you’d dream of this, if you could? Maybe more theologically,” Out of nowhere, he dropped to his knees, good fabric in the mud and trash, clenching a death grip around the edges of his sleeves.

“What are — “

“With altars and worshippers,” The light of his pupil was psychedelic. “Bleeding me out for a cause?”

“I’m not —” Chuuya spelled out, startled — attempting to pull himself out of that horrifying picture they painted, “— doing this, Dazai.”

“Why? Do you think Mori would be mad?” He didn’t laugh; the curve of his mouth was nearly invisible, but sharper than the moon. Why did he look like that, Chuuya had wondered, meeting Mori’s eyes, as they chanted. Why did he look — “Don’t be so disappointing, now. What else have you been snooping around my business for?”

“Don’t fucking try to shoot yourself in the open air if you don’t want people to get their brains moving,” he hissed.

“Alright,” Dazai promised. The like of the shipping container appeared from each of his ears; there wasn’t enough blood. “You do it instead.”

Chuuya’s teeth were aching. His head was right by his hands — if he could have touched him, he could have made his brains leak out of his eyes. “Don’t tempt me.”

“You keep saying Arahbaki is nothing at all,” he insisted. “You talked a lot in the aftermath, you know? Merciless, you said. He doesn’t care about anything. He lacks the pure notion of caring. But he would murder me with his bare teeth, if he could manage to escape you for a second too long. You swore that. It’s why you did the heartbeat thing, yes? Because it might keep him at bay. Because you fear you won’t be able to do it, one of these days.”

“Dazai.”

“You think you can kill me?” He seemed sincere in his marvel. “I’m not a quarter as special as any man in that ballroom is convinced of. Neither are you. I don’t need Arahbaki to kill you — you said that. You could shoot me. You could rip my heart out with your hands — you wouldn’t even need to take the gloves off. You wouldn’t even need to clean up — the goons begging to watch you maul someone into pieces would do it for you.”

Chuuya could feel his heart in his throat. He didn’t know if it was anger. He didn’t know if it mattered. “What are you doing?”

“Drop me from a building,” he listed off, a bit closer, a bit lower with every syllable. “Push me off into the bay. Accuse me of betrayal — tell the entire organization I attempted to steal Mori’s seat. Let them burn me alive. Set me on fire yourself. You think you need Arahabaki? You think Arahabaki needs you? You think Mori does?”

He held his breath.

“You think there’s a corner of this earth,” Dazai whispered, pulling his sleeves until he had no choice but to bend — he always did. “A corner, Chuuya — one where you can live knowing you aren’t needed? One where you wouldn’t let that hunger kill you? You think you can kill me?” He smiled. “I think I can kill you. I think Arahabaki can kill you. I think your squad —“

Chuuya kicked him right in the middle of his chest — in a whirlwind of dust and metal parts, he landed through the unstable floor.

He exhaled.

It came winding down quietly, after.

The world stopped being blurred and red at the edges. Another memory laid over it all — one of the alleys of Suribachi City.

A morning of old smells, when some of the kids on patrol had come to tell him about visitors. Chuuya stuck his hands in his pockets; made his way to where Dazai was laying in the dirt, and set his shoe in the middle of his ribcage.

“He called me invaluable,” Chuuya let him know, easily. He felt him stiffen even through his sole; could have found something in his eye, if he had bothered to let it linger — he didn’t. “He told her the deal was off. Nakahara Chuuya is, frankly, invaluable.”

Dazai looked at him like he was waiting for the punchline.

A singular red line chased the top of his nose, landing in gentle droplets onto his Adam’s apple. The fireworks rained down in kaleidoscopic shards. They painted gentle landscapes on his bandages; when Dazai blinked, it all made him look a tad too young for a framed picture in the Hallway.

If the price is reigning it in, Chuuya didn’t know how to explain, then I can never let it flood again.

“Of course he did,” Dazai said — a tad too quiet. He hadn’t changed a bit since Suribachi; he was a crafty stranger in skin Chuuya knew better than his own palms.

It left his mouth before he could stop it — it had been stuck in his teeth since that summer morning in Kouyou’s bed. “Just why do you live here?”

The boy still seemed deep in thought — in a strange kind of resignation. Chuuya didn’t enjoy being looked at like a caged thing. Chuuya wasn’t stupid enough not to believe it true. “Why do you care?”

I lost them the moment I set my eyes on that bandaged bastard, he had explained to Noguchi, once, over stories of his Sheep. All he had tried to quieten the buzz of power with was covered in the half moons of his nails. With revolting certainty, despite its untruth roots — it's just us, he had said — Chuuya watched him bleed and concluded: you're all I have left.

Dazai sat up — still locked underneath the grasp of his shoe. “Do my tattoo.”

A pause. “What?”

“You lost our bet,” he insisted. He cleaned the blood from his forehead; studied the red tips of his fingers with something akin to wonder. “I bet you I would become the youngest Executive in the Port Mafia’s history. I am.”

He squinted. “Technically, I forfeited.”

“I don’t care.”

“And my punishment is completing your tattoo?” Chuuya eyed him, skeptical.

“So you shall look what you lost right in the eyes, yes,” He raised a hand, waiting. “And because Ane-san will kill you if you get it wrong.”

Invaluable, he tasted. They had called him Vice-Executive.

Something cold settled on his calf, under the hems of the kimono. The shape of a thumb pressed against a vein; the fingers curved around his ankle like a bracelet. It was a strange point to be touched — nothing compared to viscera; everything to the strange way Dazai stubbornly met his gaze.

“Has he been quiet?” he questioned.

The silence had come so suddenly it took him a moment to understand. “You saw it. No black lines,” Chuuya replied. “I think he disliked being used as a training exercise. He wants to taste air that’s a bit more — purposeful, I suppose.”

He tapped his thumb. “I thought he didn’t want anything.”

“He doesn’t. But I do,” He shrugged. “And he’s as me as I let him be.”

Dazai let go of his calf. He sat up more — Chuuya took his leg back, and tried to figure out how much glass from the cars they both had stuck under their soles. “As I let you be.”

He set his jaw. Didn’t answer; which was an answer enough.

“I don’t want to touch your slimy skin,” he informed him, when Dazai dangled his raised hand in front of him, quietly requesting.

He curled an eyebrow. “You’ve touched my slimy skin countless times.”

“Are you admitting you’re slimy?”

“Are you admitting you touch me a lot?”

“Me?” he spluttered. “You hang off of me like a — like a goddamn koala or something —“

Eventually, because there wasn’t much left to do, Chuuya grasped his hand, and they made their way to the entrance.

He studied the electrodomeestic parts underneath their feet — the barbed wire; the dying shadows from the old neon signs. Moss grew between the metal, and Dazai’s steps at his side were too familiar — and he thought of the serpent tattoo on Rin’s middle finger, crushed underneath rubble. He thought of his cheek against Dazai’s leg, and the sound that he hadn’t allowed his ribcage to expel when his eyes had opened to the end of the world.

There was ivy between the junctures of his shoulders — burdensome and inevitable in the hollowness of the bones; it might always be there. So would the Port Mafia.

Invaluable.

Despite of, he could imagine Mori tut, with that smile of his. Not because of.

“I’m going back,” he declared.

Squinting, he could see the scaffolds on Building One in the distance. Kouyou had to be drunk, by then. Tanaki could be convinced not step on his feet too much, if she truly wanted to dance. The Flags’s fake graves had to be covered in snow — his squad’s had to have landed in the depths of the Bay. The people could talk all they wanted.

Dazai crossed his hands in his obi; he played Hopscotch like he did when he was going to meet Oda Sakunosuke. “I know you are.”

A slug charm dangled from his phone, new and shiny. Chuuya blinked, belated.

“You —“

“Ah, yes,” Dazai commented, locked in his Hopscotch, with faux innocence. “I forgot to tell you. I finally found my souvenir from France.”

Chuuya gaped like a fish, feet locked to the ground. He had to run to catch up with him, eyes so wide they ached, following the swing of the slug charm like one might a pendulum dangling to the hour of death. “You — that was in —“

“In your office,” he agreed, helpfully. “You didn’t think the new lock would keep me out, yes? Or the code on the safe — this is the sixteenth time, Hatrack. There is a finite number of Kouyou’s birthday combinations you can use.”

“You had no right to — that is not —“

“I didn’t bring you a present,” Dazai continued, undeterred, stalking to the makeshift gates. “But that’s fine, because I gave you a birthday present, and you didn’t —“

“You refuse to tell me when your birthday is —“

“Not my fault if you can’t guess. By the way, I took the initiative to hang your own on your phone. Since you bought us —“ Dazai’s lower lip trembled. “Matching phone charms.”

Horror sagged his veins.

Laughter exploded from his sickly, bandaged lungs. “You bought us —” Dazai chuckled, skipping like a schoolgirl, mock radiating off of him in waves, “Matching phone charms. Matching phone charms. That’s pathetic!”

Chuuya couldn’t scramble for his phone fast enough — the new hanging fish charm stared back at him, still smelling like the Parisian roads he had bought it from. Passersby and tourists had paid no mind to him; it was a summer morning, and traces of fault did not show on body.

For the first time since he’d flown from Yokohama, eyes on a souvenir stand — he had wondered if Dazai even knew he had left.

A senseless thought. Perhaps it was Arthur’s home — Arthur, who had called Verlaine his partner. Dazai, who had never gotten a present, and had only started to play Hopscotch on all streets after seeing Chuuya do it, and refusing to ask him what it was.

“Fucking fine, ” he muttered, staring at the moon like it might offer him mercy. “Now shut the fuck up. It was just — shut up. Fuck you. It was funny, alright, so I bought it — I was drunk, anyway, so it’s not like — Give it back.”

“Are you kidding me? I’m gonna wear this forever. You’re absolutely embarrassing. Everybody deserves to know just how loyal my dog — hey!”

Despite the protests, Dazai didn’t seem to mind the hits to the knees much. He was busy studying the small item in his hand, devastatingly silent, as if struggling with the concept of it.

Double Black, Chuuya tasted. Bile and blood; stuck, like all of them. Double Black. Double Black.

“They will forget it,” he said, offhandedly. He didn’t know who he was trying to reassure. He thought of leaking pipes at the Headquarters, an infinity ago; Dazai’s wet fringe hiding the crease between his brows. If we’re doing this partner thing — “They’ll get bored of this, too.”

Somehow, Dazai knew. His phone lit up with the name Odasaku. His fingers twirled in the air, eye distracted by the lone firework dying out. They could never get bored of power; he signed.

He scoffed. The boy hummed.

Blood sticking to his soles, Chuuya said no goodbye, and made his way to the Headquarters.

---

...

---

[Continue reading]

[...] as far as our analyses go, there is no other interpretation of our current predicament. Inevitably — putting aside the lakes of blood left in their wake and any moral consideration regarding the dynamics of this conflict — we are to thank Dazai Osamu and Nakahara Chuuya for this final result, and for the balance they brought to this city after eighty-eight days of chaos.

Or — as the underground appears to have begun to call them — Double Black.

Special Ability Department Agent.

Intelligence Archivist 061, Ango Sakaguchi. end act one.

---

Chapter End Notes

dazai, roughly ten chapters ago: chuuya is, frankly, invaluable

mori, scribbling on a notebook: go on this is fire

(the poem from the verlaine's letter rimbaud corrected (it is my personal headcanon they used to send each other's letters back and forth, "correcting" their answers over it; don't mind me as i offer the idea of a fic i'll eventually write) is from irl paul verlaine)

i'm once again in a little hurry, but first i want to say: R.I.P. kazuko. no pet survived this arc finale. the way i hadn't even noticed? that's kinda funny. wonder if that snake really died that easily...

and so we end the second arc of this fic! mori is once again to blame for most of it; did you expect it? he planted the dead sheep, and he always knew chuuya had yuan/was dealing with her — call it a final test before he refused the Ability Permit in his name. the interesting detail is, i don't think mori ever suspected chuuya would betray them. i think he just wanted to verify how important his past — which he knew always held him back a bit — was to him.

(anybody wants to discuss future symbolism of chuuya being the first reason why they didn't get an ability permit, and the actual plan mori has in canon to get one? and who will be killed by it? no? we will see more of it i guess) we're about to enter the 17 Soukoku era (as soon as chuuya's interlude is posted), and i'm very excited for it. the next arcs will be shorter, but they're some of my favorites, so i can't wait to show them to you guys! we're going back to dazai's POV. i hope you liked my interpretation of chuuya, and i hope you guys will continue to be as sweet and supportive as you've always been — it really keeps me going, seriously. i can't thank you enough.

i'll see you soon! keep warm <3 p.s. you've probably caught it, given the joke at the start and everything, but the reason dazai froze when chuuya told him the words mori had used to refuse the ability permit in his name were the exact same words dazai told mori at the end of last arc. fyi! ;)

LEAVES

Chapter Notes

see you at the end! ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

interlude

---

August, four months before.

The needle glistened threateningly inside the makeshift tent of Kouyou's silkiest sheet.

"Why do I have to do it, anyway?" Dazai complained, holding it between two fingers the way one would bomb cables. But Chuuya had seen him deal with those, too, and he could swear he'd been less farcical about it. "I might hate dogs, but animal cruelty won't look nice next to my honorable accusations."

"Your honorable accusations of torture and manslaughter?" Chuuya pointed out. "I'm sure you'll live. Just put the goddamn thing in."

"Kinky."

He grabbed the spare needle and stung his palm. The boy howled as if shot.

The ice cube pressed behind his earlobe was starting to melt; the freezing droplets should have been a relief against the summer heat, but the absolute darkness — only broken by the flame of one of Elise's night lights; house-shaped and abandoned between their brushing knees — tinged the air colder.

"Why can't you just ask Kouyou, anyway?" Dazai insisted, stalling. Chuuya could hardly trust it was a matter of squeamishness, given his job; he assumed it was just to be difficult. "Like your old business should have told you, she knows all and any jewelries around the city —"

“Because, jackass, she’ll bitch about them making me look like a gangster.”

The boy stared. “We are gangsters.”

Chuuya offered him his most revolted gaze. “We’re refined gangsters.”

“Oh,” Dazai tilted his head to the side. The makeshift sheet-tent over them crumpled a bit with the motion; the triangle of their breathing space grew ever warmer than the summer air. “Is that why your ugly suits are of actual good quality now?”

“They’re not ugly — “

“You look like a gold-starved slums-child.”

Chuuya raised his chin.

“Great,” he sighed, pained, “You’re actually proud of that.”

He stuck his hands in the space between the beds, drying them from the melting ice and holding it up with his Ability — given the endless rooms of the villa, Kouyou had saddled them with a shared room purely out of spite; their response had been to unscrew the beds from the floor with Tainted and move them around, out of better spite. “Jacketless-Tie Van Suit doesn’t exactly have a right to judge my sense of style.”

“Never heard of that brand,” Dazai replied, willingly obtuse. “This is Armani. Thank you.”

This being his everyday clothes. Unlike Chuuya, he had taken one look at the traditional yukata in the wardrobes and ranted about the unshakable grip to tradition of tasteless nouveau riche, and stayed as he was.

Pointedly, Chuuya flagged the green sleeves of his own yukata until they whipped him. He rolled the spare needle between his fingers.

He recalled — Albatross had had one ear pierced; Lippman both of them. He had forgotten both the facts until one of the more zoomed-in pictures in the man’s kitchen had landed on the floor. Noguchi wore a flower shaped pendant on his left ear every weekend, when — according to Tsuchiya — he went to the cemetery; Rin had more piercings than one could count.

Three days after Arahabaki had wrecked him open, he had stared at the regenerating skin of his separated earlobe, and wondered.

Bad idea, Iceman would have said. Always focused. More things to grab in a fight.

I don’t get grabbed, Chuuya would have replied.

The man would have almost smiled. I grabbed you.

“On my three,” he insisted, pushing his hair back again. “We’ve been at it for an hour. It’s just two holes.”

“That’s what she said.”

This time around, he was fast enough to escape the needle before Chuuya could pinch him with it. Wrestling grounds, shoot-outs, and secrets about the vaguely divine, vaguely poisonous thing in his veins — Dazai could never be surprised more than once.

“You should have had this teenage crisis when you were in an actual gang of brats,” the boy muttered, squinting at the little x he had drawn on his earlobe. “Leather jacket and all. I’m going to buy you sheep shaped earrings.”

“Liar,” Chuuya accused, too fast to land on something less vague than a desire for rebuttal. “You don’t know what a sheep looks like.”

Actual irritation flashed on his face. “What does that even mean?”

“I’ll tell you what it means — “

A stinging, lighting-quick jab pierced the skin of his earlobe. He didn’t flinch — the press of the needle against the ice rolled more water drops down his throat, though, sending shivers that died as soon as the drops met the barrier of the choker.

“I said three,” Chuuya seethed.

“I can’t count,” Dazai replied. “One out of two done. Move.”

“You just counted —“

He ripped the ice from behind his ear — made sure to hesitate long enough for it to drool on his crossed legs, before holding it behind the other lobe. Chuuya grasped for the stolen paper clips he had abandoned near the night-light; he opened one of them up, and stuck it in the hole.

“That’s probably unsanitary,” Dazai let him know, tongue between braces-sporting teeth as he aimed.

“I can’t exactly wear Kouyou’s earrings,” he huffed, flicking the dangling paper clip. It stung a bit — more like a distant itch than actual pain; the weight was imperceptible, but new enough to warrant a moment to get used to. “Those things are actual gold. They’re heavier than me. I’ll find something when we’re back home.”

“Aren’t you technically weightless?”

“Only if I make myself so. One, two —“

Dazai stuck the needle in.

“For fuck’s sake, I said — “

The door of the room opened; light rained in, blinding them both. Dazai let out an overdramatic yelp; Chuuya stuffed the needles and the ice between the beds, and peeked from under the veil.

“We’re doing drugs,” he offered. A bit too late, he slapped his hands on his ears. “Promise.”

“The execution is in three days, in that case. Boys,” Kouyou greeted, gracefully, studying the set up with something stuck between eye-ticking exasperation and mild interest. “I don’t know if the notion might even remotely interest you — but the purpose of a summer house is, often, that of spending time outside of it.”

Dazai peeked from under the sheet as well. “Outside, where Hirotsu is wearing swim pants?”

Chuuya shivered.

The woman crossed her arms. Her summer concession had been giving up the layers of pink kimono for a pinker yakuta; her hair, braided on her right shoulder, had the telltale sign of Tanaki’s hands on it. “Is this about Muramoto Kei?”

Pettily, they stared.

Her sigh was never ending. “Really? This is the front you two decide to share?”

They recoiled. “I don’t share fronts with dogs,” Dazai let her know, horrified. “This is my front. Chuuya is merely pretending this situation was an insult to his microscopic self as well.”

He glared. “Last I checked, I’m the one who had to drag those disgusting corpses to that weirdo farmer’s porch for him to do who knows what —“

“I still think he’s a cannibal.”

“Muramoto isn’t a cannibal,” Kouyou said, with the tone of someone who was right on the verge of being tired of repeating it. “For the last time, boys — He’s merely a guard for the border. Given the fundamental aid he offers with our shipments, I don’t believe gathering one or two trinkets for him is that much of a job.”

“Trinkets,” Chuuya echoed. “He had a two page file about physical requirements for the sort of trinkets he wanted. He’s fucking the corpses.”

“He isn’t fucking the corpses,” the woman and Dazai chorused.

“I’m telling you —“

“Because he’s eating them,” the boy said. “I beg you to use your intellect, however little. Every competent person in the underground knows that green eyes taste better.”

Chuuya gaped. “That’s so not true —“

“All the same,” Kouyou interrupted, her knuckles rattling the door frame. The flower frescos on the walls followed the motif of her clothes; she was stuck like a leaking trace all over the house. “If you didn’t wish to be saddled with official matters on the weekend break, you shouldn’t have driven Hirotsu’s car into the lake.”

“I like official matters,” he muttered. “I just don’t like necrophilia-adjacent grandpas.”

“Cannibalism-adjacent.”

“Necrophilia.”

“Cannibalism.”

“Necrophilia.”

“Can—“

“Would you consider forgiveness,” Kouyou cut through, once again, tilting her tone the same way as when she offered the last deal to the men in the dungeons, “If I told you Hirotsu is merciful and willing to teach your horseback riding?”

They fell quiet.

She raised her eyebrows, waiting.

Chuuya was dragging the sheet back into place long before he could catch a glimpse of Dazai doing the same — hidden by that makeshift tent again, their gazes met, questioning.

Swimsuits, Dazai mouthed. Hirotsu.

Horses, he rebutted. Then, using his fingers to trace the idea more clearly: People falling from horses.

His eye lit up.

“I want the biggest, fastest, coolest one,” Chuuya declared, tearing the sheet off to jump out of the bed. “And I want it to be black.”

“We shall see what we can do,” Kouyou smiled, watching as Dazai scrambled off the bed, loudly complaining about the claim. Then, she blinked: “Chuuya — why do you have paper clips hanging from your ears?”

---

...

---

Kouyou's summer villa was a three stories, traditional Japanese palace of curling wood, gentle flowers and warm stone, mere steps from the near middle of an enormous emerald lake right outside Yokohama.

Trees circled the valley, moving along to the summer breeze and reflecting on the clear waters. Chuuya had already wet the edges of his sleeves to drag Hirotsu's car out of the river, not willing to pollute that little valley; the ripples on the surface were gentle amidst the swimming bodies — as if grateful.

"Thank you," Kouyou had said, when he had dropped the dripping vehicle in the grass. The summer sun had given her freckles; she had ruffled his hair. "We wouldn't want to be interrupted by noisy men with their noisy machines."

Being invited by Executive Kouyou is a big deal, Pianoman had said, the year before, when Chuuya had explained where he would be disappearing for a weekend. Every year, she uses the occasion as a means to establish her inner circle — the people she trusts. It's a message to the rest of the organization; you should take advantage of it.

"I'll name you Slug," Dazai said, caressing the candid mane of his horse. "Because you look rather slow and you've clearly never had a single thought in your life."

Chuuya clenched his jaw so hard it hurt. "Why was he invited, anyway?" he hissed, hiding his words in his own horse's neck, staring Hirotsu down. "He's not in Ane-san's inner circle. He's not even remotely near the outer circle."

"Boss offered him as a substitute, given his necessary absence," the man said, patiently. He had been saddling the horses with expert hands and a good explanation for everything — when Chuuya had glared hard enough to kill, being offered help to get on that unfairly tall beast, he had simply coughed and mimicked the word: Ability. "The meeting in Tokyo couldn't be rescheduled. Dazai was kind enough to show up as a representative."

"And you smell," Dazai was insisting, in his world, his caresses growing a tad too vicious. "And you're clearly too short compared to your peers. And you're ugly."

Chuuya let Tainted light up his veins; he sat on his horse with enough aggressiveness to hurt his thighs.

"Can we get on with it?" he snapped, at last. Then, raising his voice: "Mackerel here has a little competition to win."

In the process of attempting to climb his own ride, Dazai gasped. "You're so unoriginal."

Hiding amusement, Hirotsu grabbed both his and Dazai's reins, and led their horses outside the small stables, into the meadow.

Spread across the grass, familiar faces shone underneath the sun, meeting Chuuya's gazes with mostly sheepish grins. Virgil was curled up next to Tanaki, reciting passages from the notebook he was always carrying somewhere in his pockets; there was a softness to the hands the woman had curled around her abdomen that spoke of a less painful remembrance.

Kouyou was entertaining some of the most frequently-visiting subordinates of hers; a few of the older women from the Pomegranate splashed water in the lake, laughter echoing off the branches and the food-filled porch.

But why not me?, Kajii had whined, all the way until Chuuya had left. I've been nothing but a delight! Tell her to make me inner circle. I deserve a vacation.

He hadn't been sure of how to vocalize just how many accidental explosions of his had been a pain in the ass for Kouyou's own missions; or that the woman always had a too-polite comment to make about that scientist's tacky glasses — so he had merely promised to talk to her about it.

“Remember not to be aggressive with it,” Hirotsu was saying, shushing Slug and Mackerel. “But not complacent either. They aren't leading you; they are your ride. If you need to stop, pull the reins near the ends and kick right — here.”

Dazai raised his hand too high. “Would you know anything about the rate of horse-related accidents?”

Not pausing, the man replied: “I'm not sure anyone has ever committed suicide by horse.”

“It must have happened,” the boy insisted. “All those paintings in Ane-gan's gallery here — too many horses. Too many battles. Too many horses in battles. It must be possible. Are hooves as painful as they're said to be?”

“I suppose —“

Chuuya pulled on the reins. “Whatever,” he called back, as Mackerel neighed his approval to the starting. “If you wanna die on a horse, choke on my dust!”

Clearly petulant, Dazai watched him sprint through the grass, arms crossed as he screamed: “You're stupid! That's not even death by horse!”

The closest thing Chuuya could compare to the feeling of it was riding Albatross' motorcycle — only with a pulse underneath his hands and the feeling of convulsing muscles under his grip. He began to get an idea of why horses were used as a measuring unit for speed in vehicles. Hot wind whipped his face, dangling the chain of his hat so viciously it bumped against his nose — he grinned.

Dazai did appear, at some point; he seemed much less enthusiastic than he had been before the suicide had been ruled out.

Nonetheless, he and Slug chased him with the same energy reserved for the lights of the Arcade — eventually, once they had lost count of the races, Dazai settled for turning in circles and reciting passages from the love letters his — for whatever reason — yearning past dates had sent along with bombs to his rather uninterested horse.

Chuuya, utterly surprised at the acceptance from his own ride — having assumed dogs, cats and parrots' dislike of him would have spread to other animals as well — wandered through the trees, close enough to the lake to study his reflection.

He found Golden Demon first.

“Meeting benevolent water spirits without me?” he questioned, attempting to drag the horse to a halt near the rock Kouyou had curled up on.

“Don’t be silly,” she replied, running river-wet fingers through her hair. Golden Demon was slashing the crystalline waters with an absence that was almost human; when the drops hit the sun, a thousand shards of rainbow shimmered. “I would never entertain benevolent spirits. Too many good wishes,” She tilted her head. “Malevolent ones, on the other hand.”

He snorted. It took some coddling to get Mackerel to stay still — munching on grass and huffing at the gravity-heightened pebble Chuuya had settled on the ground, upon his reins.

“I know, man,” he said, pious. “Stick and stones.”

Kouyou perked up, wincing. “That’s not what that —“ She deflated. “Never mind.”

Chuuya shrugged. He made his way to her; unhesitantly, the woman offered him a hand, helping him perch on the bundle of rocks, feet brushing the surface of the lake. Chuuya kicked his shoes away to dip his toes in — she watched them fly off, and curled an eyebrow.

“I know, I know,” he huffed.

“One word?”

He thought. “Elegance.”

“Grace, maybe. You’ve got ballerina feet. I merely suggest you act accordingly.”

Chuuya arched his feet, blinking. “I don’t really know how impressed enemies would be at me pirouetting at them.”

“It would surprise you,” Her side was warm where it was pressed against his, shoulder to hip — a strand of her hair flapped along to the wind, cutting her face in two. She reached up; flicked his makeshift left earring. “How come?”

“Too many reports and never enough paper clips at hand,” he lied.

“I’ll get you something prettier,” Kouyou insisted, more to herself than him. “We might be mafiosi, but we are refined ones,” He snorted; she frowned. “Something to match your eyes, maybe?”

He shrugged. She pulled the edges of his fingerless gloves, only once — then they settled, studying Golden Demon’s choreography in silence.

“How is the competition going?”

Chuuya kicked the water. “Same old.”

“There are many voices,” she said, after a moment. Careful; measured. There was something she didn’t want him to misunderstand. “There are advantages to ignoring them. There are advantages to paying attention, too.”

“Bad publicity is still publicity,” he summed up.

“Yes,” Kouyou agreed. “But it is also better to know just what of you makes people talk. It will give you an advantage over them — it will tell you exactly what they are most afraid of.”

He made a face; splashed some water to the sharp blade in Golden Demon’s hands, watching her blink at him with something almost offended. She wasn’t aware enough to feel so, of course; she was merely worse at pretending than Elise. “Didn’t need the competition to know.”

Kouyou didn’t reply.

Eventually, once screeches came from the side of the lake closer to the house — something like Tanaki’s voice; something like Dazai’s victory speeches — she offered: “What do you think of this year’s invitations?”

Chuuya glanced her way, careful. “This is your clique, Ane-san.”

“I would still like your opinion.”

“Apart from the bandaged bastard?”

“We only have a few hours before dinner,” she said, sounding vaguely nauseated. “So — yes.”

“The girls from the Pomegranate have been whispering about you,” he said, after a bit. “But I assume that’s why you invited them.”

She hummed. “I needed a closer look. They won’t do anything rash, but — well. They’re this year’s selection for the arranged marriages.”

“Because that isn’t prehistoric in the least.”

Her glance was a warning.

“Yeah, I know. I’m just saying,” he grunted, uncomfortable. “You can’t exactly blame them.”

“A syndicate is still a syndicate,” Kouyou replied, with the cadency of a sentence carved on the ceiling of a cell. Chuuya had never quite had his stomach full enough to judge where necessity had pushed him; Chuuya knew there had to be a limit, somewhere. “Their sacrifice deserves better than to be pitied. And I will die before I leave them in the hands of just anybody,” She glanced his way. “You should consider yourself very lucky. Arranged marriages used to involve high placed mafiosi only, when I was your age.”

His head snapped to her. “You — ?”

She made a face; raised her chin, proudly.

“Who?” he pushed. “Do I know him?”

“Perhaps.”

“How come it didn’t go through?”

Kouyou nodded towards Golden Demon. “I was declared an asset. The marriages were either a means to temporary alliances with other gangs or an occasion to raise ranks in the Port Mafia itself. My worth grew inestimable in less than a night,” She studied her nails. “Ace didn’t quite compare.”

His jaw dropped into the lake. “Ace?”

“Close your mouth. Malevolent spirits will get in.”

“Ace as in Ace? That rat?”

“Do you know many other Ace?” Kouyou said — almost a snap. “Nobody knows of this — the old high court has long since been dismantled. Mori took care of it, thankfully. Hirotsu might still remember. I trust you will keep this to yourself.”

Chuuya couldn’t wrap his head around the idea; a mixture of disgust and terror settled in his bones. “You would have eaten him alive.”

“I would have,” she agreed, satisfied. “Your word that you won’t tell?”

“Only if I can see pictures of what the rat looked like as a teenager.”

Another hum; basically a confirmation. “And you won’t tell that partner of yours either?”

“Dazai?” Chuuya spat. “Why would I tell him?”

“Who knows,” she trailed off. Something like amusement flashed in her eyes; he fought off the urge to tuck the whipping hair strand behind her ear, and lost. Right before he could remove his knuckles from the sun-heated apple of her cheek, she said, nonchalantly: “You know, had one of you been a girl, and had we been in the old regime, you would have undoubtedly been promised to each other.”

He mimicked retching. She laughed; it was only a inch louder than the summer wind — only a tad warmer than the pressing sun.

“I won’t tell about Ace if you don’t tell that to anyone, how about that,” Chuuya muttered.

“You truly hold so little loyalty for me, you have to be transactional?”

He shrugged. “Should have thought about it before you took me in as one of your own.”

“Don’t be silly,” she replied, for the second time. She slid down the rocks with the grace of one of the leaves landing in the river; Golden Demon immediately turned in her direction, like a flower to the light. Kouyou looked up at him, yukata only parting enough to show off the Mafia tattoo in the middle of her clavicles — a mirror of his own. We hold it to our chest, she had said, after bringing him to get his own. “You are mine.”

We hold it to our chest, and we let it beat.

Dazai didn’t manage to throw him into the lake when they came back to the house, despite all his best efforts; Virgil did, though — a brief pause from his reading, full of enough mischief that he had to believe it was a bet with the squad.

Chuuya cursed him all the way from the near center of the lake, yukata floating around his kicking legs and hair sticking to his eyelashes. The weight of the water reminded him of Albatross; for a moment, he thought he could see the edge of his blond hair. Just swim faster, he used to laugh, and we’ll be home before you can think about getting mad!

“Was he the one to teach you how to swim?” Tanaki asked, floating just far enough from him not to get splashed.

“Teach is a loose term,” he replied. “He just turned around enough times to make sure I hadn’t quietly drowned behind him.”

But there had been kindness in that too, he thought — there had been reason, too. The failed returns had only started to rise in number after Chuuya had offhandedly mentioned never seeing the sea, back when he lived in Suribachi City. The Flags had all been like that — quiet in their reasonings; endlessly blinding in their intentions.

He attempted to float next to her — stare into the sun until his eyes pulsed, lulled by the echo of Virgil’s laughter and the annoyingly high pitched plastic recorder Dazai had stolen from who knew where. This is for you, my beauty!, he dedicated, winking at one of the Pomegranate girls. For some reason, it seemed to work on her — she stared up at him with a light blush on her cheeks, and a ravenous light in the eyes she dragged down the wet bandages sticking to Dazai’s neck.

Peace didn’t last long.

“First to drown wins!” Dazai squeaked, as he landed into the water with a dip vicious enough to raise a wave — dressed from head to toe, framed by a sky growing darker and darker.

From the edge of the lake, Kouyou cleared her voice — face fractured by the fireworks some nearby village was beginning to paint the sky with. In the way only thoughts of Mori’s made her, she suggested: “How about a holding your breath competition?”

Chuuya glared. “I was trying to relax.”

Dazai glared harder. “And I was trying to kill myself.”

“Are you admitting defeat?” the woman questioned, saccharine.

“I’m not falling for that.”

“Yeah, I’m not falling for that!”

“I see,” she considered. A glint took over her gaze — she directed an apologetic glance to Hirotsu’s direction. “And how about the winner gets to drive the tractor?”

A blink later, both their heads were shattering the reflections of the fireworks in the lake, disappearing underneath the surface.

The afternoon faded into a dark cobalt sky and ripples of water, between choruses of Ane-san, are you watching? Ane-san? Ane-san? Ane-san, are you, Ane-san?, and Virgil’s red-cheeked acceptance to read his drafts in a louder tone. Chuuya got lost in the blurred panorama underwater — fish and old trash and pebbles and falling fireworks, and the edges of Dazai’s bandages, carefully tucked back into place.

His fingers turned wrinkled right as the edge of the lake was painted blood red by the vanishing sun. Chuuya had never experienced a fever, but he assumed the feeling of insistently warm ice all over him had to be similar. A perpetual sunburn, and air-starved lungs — tired eyes falling on the curling stretches of fabric of his yukata underwater.

“It’s so weird how fast they heal,” Dazai commented, at some point.

The lake had been emptied out; most had retired into the house to change into something dryer. Hirotsu and Tanaki carried grills outside to prepare dinner; Virgil was letting Kouyou pick his next yukata under the porch, his stuttering praises amusing her to no end.

Chuuya, water all the way to his nose, had to squint to see Dazai’s face — the reflected greens and golds and reds from the sky, painting him like a fractured fresco. “Corruption?”

Dazai hummed, unnecessarily. His hair was still too long; half-submerged as he was, mirroring him, it floated around his violently sunburned face like a poisoned halo. He was going to get a fever for sure. He always did. “Sometimes they look like they might never stop bleeding.”

He couldn’t quite imagine.

He had no real memories of his wounds opening; he hardly had any memory of what pain felt like at its peak. He studied his arms underwater — having hooked his gloves to his silky belt, the swirling black of his hands curled up his wrists, dispersing like ink and mixing up with the fireworks.

The scars were so white they looked like skin on a corpse. Dazai’s dress shirt was soaked and bubbling like a jellyfish under the surface — even with the kaleidoscopic light, Chuuya couldn’t see the glass-shards marks he had caused him.

He couldn’t quite stop thinking about them either.

“They do,” he replied, attempting to nudge his knee underwater. It was all too slow; Tainted was stuck behind gates. Fireworks made his bandages look more cheerful than Chuuya wanted to believe them to be. “That’s what I pay you to do.”

A glare. “If only.”

From the porch, Tanaki’s laughter filled the valley. Dazai tilted his head in the direction of the sound, as if in wonder; when only his eye stayed above the surface, it looked too wide even for a kid.

Chuuya stuck his hands on his head and pushed him underwater.

Eventually — once he had resurfaced with offended splutters, uselessly attempting to climb over any part of Chuuya to push him down too — Dazai knotted the end of his tie around Chuuya’s own hand, lapping around the lake with loud tales of dogsitting on his lips.

“Keep those bloodied,” Hirotsu warned him, a bit later, when he tied the upper part of a dried yukata to his waist and helped him out with grilling the meat. They’d had to force Kouyou out of the cooking area; Chuuya and her subordinates had offered enough tales about the kitchens she had almost set on fire. “Tanaki likes them raw.”

“How come she’s not Madame Tanaki, but Kouyou is Executive Kouyou?” Chuuya questioned, handling the forks carefully.

The man tilted his head, as if he had never truly thought about it. A sunburned circle had been left under his monocle. “Where would you place Tanaki in our hierarchy?”

Chuuya wasn’t sure. “Everywhere, sort of.”

He shrugged. “Then, she hardly needs the added weight of a title.”

It took the sky growing dark for his hair to dry into a knotted, strangely rigid mass. Right as the cold painted goosebumps over his chest, he fixed his clothes in place and floated the plates over the gathered group, dragging his fingers through the knots. Virgil started a bonfire near the porch; with a strangely youth-lined gasp, Kouyou dragged him to use Tainted and settle furniture from inside the house around the rising flames.

“You know,” Dazai informed no one at all — avoided by every gaze that wasn’t familiar, apart from the Pomegranate’s blushing girl, still exchanging charged gazes of sorts with Dazai’s doubly-suicidal tendencies — as he gingerly picked at his meal, “They used to throw bones in the flames and talk about their dead ones. That’s why it’s called a bonfire.”

Scoffing, Chuuya threw himself onto the carved, cushions-stuffed chair the boy had curled up on, elbowing his way into the too small space. “Who are they?”

“Just they,” he replied, vague. He elbowed back. “I won the competition, and the tractor isn’t even working. I should get the best chair.”

“You didn’t win shit. I get the chair.”

“I can get you guys the matching one from the basement, if you want,” Virgil offered.

Dazai frowned at him. The man flinched — Chuuya wondered, for the umpteenth time, just what their conversations during the Nine Rings Conflict had been like. “I was here first. Even a dog should get that. And it’s not the same chair.”

“Well,” Chuuya kicked, “I’m not leaving.”

“Well,” He threw a piece of meat right into his face. “I’m not leaving either.”

“Well —“

A cleared throat. “Some more meat, yes?” Hirotsu called, just a tad too loud to be casual.

Fireflies swarmed across the grass as they ate their dinner on every available seating surface around the glimmering flames; some of Kouyou’s subordinates took turns telling stories of missions gone wrong, saying names Chuuya recognized and talking with a camaraderie that made his chest burn. He had to take his eyes off of it — he studied the sky, instead, darker than even his gloves and littered in more stars than he had seen since he’d climbed out of the Suribachi ruins.

Kouyou’s hair was free and unkempt, even if nobody would have called it so. Hirotsu had his coat on his lap, like one of the endless blankets he and Virgil had dragged outside. Tanaki’s tattoos seemed to grow colorful against the flames, as she did her best to prep marshmallows into long sticks.

“How about you, Tanaki?” one of the girls from the Pomegranate asked, huddled close to the fire. She and Dazai were exchanging gazes more curling than the flames; Chuuya sort of pitied her. “Sitting there all day, watching all of us come back — you must have heard some great stories.”

The woman blushed, just a bit; she passed Chuuya one of the marshmallow sticks. “Depends on what you mean by great, I suppose. There is much sadness to be taken from our lives.”

“Gossip about other organizations, then!” one of Kouyou’s subordinates replied.

Shyly, propped up on a wooden chair right by Chuuya’s own, Virgil studied the few fireworks still stubbornly blooming in the sky, and offered: “You could tell them that story about your sister.”

Something passed by Tanaki’s face. The x scar shattering her face into pieces glistened with the flames, seeming more silver than white. Filled in with mercury; making her eyes seem darker. A small wave of murmurs arose from the group — in a practiced show of nonchalance, Kouyou and Hirotsu exchanged a glance.

“Oh-oh,” Dazai commented — so low Chuuya wouldn’t have heard him, if his cheek hadn’t been crushed against his shoulder. It was a somewhat uncomfortable fit; Dazai was growing too tall and too awkward to fit against him as easily as before, and both refused to uncurl their legs and leave them on the ground. “Dark past unlocked.”

He poked him with the stick.

Tanaki settled a bit straighter. Rolling one of her marshmallows in the flames to the point of incineration, she offered: “There’s not really much to say. We all know enough victims of the Special Division, don’t we?”

Chuuya didn’t stiffen. He didn’t lock eyes with Kouyou either.

“My older sister was full of ambition,” the woman started, some eternity later. “She was loyal, too — to the very bone. The syndicate she joined when I was a child didn’t truly see that; I think it used to bother her. She would stretch herself into pieces just to prove her commitment. From what I know, though, they used to chain her in the room she would work in. Latecomer; they called her. Too ambitious. Nobody drank or ate around her.”

“The organization fell. Like most do. It was all but a quiet crumble; it shook the entirety of the underground,” She extracted her marshmallow and bit it, ash and all. Half laying down on a couch, Kouyou studied her with her chin in hand. “My sister was the sole survivor.”

“She told me she had this memory — one of the heads of the organization, dying right by her feet. He looked at her with more contempt than even his murderer. He told her —“ Tanaki’s voice bent into something goosebumps-inducing; with flames painting caves on her face, she recited: “It doesn’t matter if you survived us by cleverness or by betrayal. It doesn’t matter if you wanted it or not. You are alive, and we are dead, all the same.”

Not even the wind whispered.

Dazai turned his stick into the fire. There was something both distracted and too careful in his eyes, when he hovered the marshmallow too close to Chuuya’s face for it to be accidental.

He took a single bite; Dazai finished it off. Chuuya chewed and stared at a wandering firefly until his eyes began to burn.

The dead cannot blame, he recalled. He had begged Kouyou to invite the Flags, the year before. Next year, she had promised. The dead don’t give a shit.

Tanaki cleared her voice. “My sister never really forgot,” she admitted. “Obsession devoured her. Her only aim was rebuilding the syndicate — she thought proving herself to the air and to the lingering ghosts would be enough. The Special Division caught up with her, though.”

“Did she have an Ability?” Kouyou asked, with a gentler tilt to her tone.

“I’m sure she did,” the woman confirmed. “She never showed me. Perhaps she thought I was too young. All the same — she was taken. I haven’t seen her since.”

A mocking sort of grin took over her face — it was the same facade, devoid of it all, that she had worn to blame Chuuya from an old Hospital bed. Mourning; desperate for a target.

“Syndicates, organizations — calling them crueler than whatever the Division is makes little sense. I don’t believe methods or traditions make a person. They can make a group, but not the people. Mercy is mercy everywhere,” Briefly, she met Chuuya’s eyes over the dancing tips of the flames. “And they don’t know anything about that.”

The bonfire creaked, devouring the wood. There was something in the way Hirotzu offered Tanaki his next marshmallow; something in the unmovable, warning smile Kouyou directed to all of her subordinates.

Imperceptibly slipping both of them a bit lower down the seat with every blink, Dazai stared at Tanaki, and didn't move his face an inch.

Virgil stared at the grass. "Well," he started, somewhat quieter. "If we want to talk about how pathetic the Special Division is, I do have this story about one of their agents slipping on blood and breaking his own nose."

Madame Tanaki was the first to snort. It unclenched something in the air; the subordinates began butting in, offering strange anecdotes.

The fire creaked some more. Chuuya didn't quite choose to start zoning out; he let words like hilarious or ridiculous sit on his lap longer than words like mercy or all the same, until he couldn't — then, he started counting tiles at the Old World to match his breathing, and studying the spasms of his fingers to remember what the Net had felt like.

The laughter and the stories lulled him like the hum of the Suribachi always-on engines. Dazai didn't speak either, content to watch.

His head was a sweaty weight on his shoulder; with no marshmallows to throw in Hirotzu's hair, his fingers grew bored too quickly — he settled them over Chuuya's own, tracing all the corners where the leather had started to fall. There was a vein right by his cheek that pulsed too loud, or that Arahabaki was too focused on — he could feel it thunder against the curve of his neck.

"Get off me," he murmured, weakly.

"Yes," Dazai murmured back. Chuuya wanted to pinch him between the eyebrows; he was too tired to. He settled for pushing his feet under his thighs, wiggling his toes. "Disgusting."

He wondered if he cared about the glances thrown their way, murmuring. Chuuya was too languid, too cocooned to linger. The chair sucked him in like deep waters. Eventually, when Dazai got bored enough to untie the outer layer of his arm bandages and set about wrapping it around Chuuya's wrist, he did nothing but memorize the pattern — never as simple as mere circling motions.

Because it was him, and Chuuya despised him, and Chuuya would have recognized his burnt fingertips even if his own skin had been pried off. Slowly, he let his eyelids flutter over the rhythmic puffs of Dazai's breaths on his clavicles.

"Two spiders in a cage," he heard him sing, in between a yawn and a push of his head, settling closer — Elise's favorite jingle for when she braided her doll's hair. Who knew why Dazai did the things he did. "Sixteen legs and too much change."

He thought he saw Kouyou's eyes on them. It was too blurred to be certain.

“Another,” the subordinates encouraged, as Hirotsu went over the most brutal ways the Black Lizards had killed some Division officers. “Another story.”

The goosebumps from the sunburn and the afternoon in the lake twirled on his skin. Chuuya watched Kouyou throw her head back to laugh — hair like specks of blood over the flames — and didn’t think of anything at all.

---

...

---

Chuuya opened his eyes to Virgil’s hand on his shoulder, gently shaking him awake.

“Hey,” he whispered, very soft. Soundless fireworks made a halo around his head. The entire firmament stood behind him, framed by the smoke of the dying fire. “Want to see something?”

He was slumped over the armrest, and his back protested the treatment. Dazai was slumped over him, unmovable and seemingly truly asleep. An overgrown coat had been laid over them. All the chairs and couches were empty — Hirotsu had only left that piece of clothing behind.

He yawned, over the smell of burnt food and dew. “Hell yeah.”

It took some maneuvering to get himself out; Virgil did his very best to set his eyes elsewhere as Chuuya awkwardly hovered over Dazai’s curled up form, removing the bandages stuck around his own wrist and tucking them over the single layer left on the boy’s own.

Tuck and bent, he recalled. Then, because Dazai didn’t sleep in public, and the curve of his face was a tad too soft for the open air, he tucked his fringe away from his forehead and pulled.

It was painful.

Dazai didn’t move — his heartbeat took a note that was unmistakably awake, though. Fireworks were splattered on him like blood; they curved over the thick curls on his forehead, and divided his lips into two chapped halves — gently parted; stuck on a breath that was warm over Chuuya’s naked wrist. He was good at pretending to be sleeping.

Something in Chuuya’s chest pounded. It was vicious; he grimaced. That’s what looking at his stupid face too long does, he concluded, irritated. He thought about asking Doc about it, just to make sure — thought about it again; felt like throwing up; decided that was probably the point.

He threw the coat on him as rudely as possible, to balance the weird thing in his veins out, and didn't stay to watch the Pomegranate girl's feet make the porch tiles creak, as she made her secretive way to him. Dazai half smiled at her. Chuuya climbed up the grass with naked feet, and jumped on Virgil's shoulders with a whoop! that he almost fell from.

"When we crumble to the ground, please don't blame me," the man hissed, fixing his hands under his thighs to drag him to the pier.

"I've seen you weight-lift with Rin. You can do this."

The man winced. "You mean you saw me get destroyed by her biceps?"

"Almost the same thing," Chuuya peeked over his shoulder, studying the unmoving surface of the lake. "Midnight skinny dipping?"

Virgil blushed to the top of his ears. "Even just midnight dipping is fine."

"How come?"

He shrugged. The movement rattled him. "I've never done it," he admitted. "The closest lake to Rengoku was — Well. Poisoned."

"Yeah," Chuuya tasted acid and flames; mimicked passing out. "I recall."

"Maybe Dante made me do it," Virgil said. There was nothing in particular in his tone; there was a slightly tighter grip on his legs. "I don't really remember. Can't have been fun."

"Can't have," he agreed. Spurred, he called: "Last to jump in has to tell Tsuchiya he broke her fox mug at the Orphanage."

He was already catapulting himself off the pier, as Virgil tried to catch up, screaming: "This isn't fair, you know I hate cold waters —"

The moon wasn't as blinding as the sun had been; less of a persisting ache and more of a hum sliding between his eyelashes. He floated with his arms and legs spread wide. The rush of waves in his ears muffled everything else; but he felt Virgil's hesitant entrance in the moving currents, and forced his cold-numb fingers to reach out to pinch his side once he starfished next to him.

"It's colder than I thought," he admitted.

"Don't think about it," Chuuya said. "Just focus on the tactile sensation. How the water feels — not what temperature it is."

A pause: "It feels, like — smooth."

"And?"

“Wet.”

“Is water wet?”

A side eye, half hidden by silver liquid. “I am not doing this with you. I’m not Noguchi.”

Chuuya huffed.

Some heartbeats later, he dared: “Was it Albatross who told you that?”

Blond tufts of hair in the distance — a booming, always entertained laugh. He thought of Tanaki’s eyes, stuck in the fire. “What’s with you and bad memories today?”

His flinch shook the water. “Call it a search for inspiration.”

Chuuya felt somewhat guilty. Impulsive, the Sheep used to call him — one of the things they had gotten wrong. Chuuya always thought before acting — just too much. “It’s fine if you do it with me,” he said. “Just be — careful, with Tanaki. She’s very reserved. If she told you stories, it means she trusted you with them.”

“She thinks stories deserve honesty,” Virgil replied, still somewhat chastised. “I just — words have always been much easier than thoughts,” A beat. “Than mourning, too.”

“That’s what nightmares are for, I hear.”

He dug invisible lines in the water with his legs. “I don’t really dream much.”

Chuuya turned to study him. Water got in his ear; in the muffled blink of silent fireworks, he offered: “Me neither.”

He searched his eyes. Whatever he found got his traits to soften; Chuuya cleared his throat, staring up at the blindingly candid circle in the sky. “It’s better off this way, I think,” he said, a bit too fast, “Hear the nightmares are shit.”

“Yeah,” Virgil agreed. The fabrics of their sleeves intertwined underwater; a braid of green and blues that had Kouyou’s taste all over itself. “I think I would dream of her more than him.”

“Beatrice,” he guessed. Perhaps he only said it out loud out of pettiness; fair is fair.

“I write about it, sometimes. What sort of nightmares would be more realistic?”

“Are they even meant to be realistic?”

“It’s easier to believe so,” he replied. “I need more practice. I’d dream of her face through the windows of the Institute. Spying. Maybe her in that Hospital bed Dante was in,” He curled up on himself; gasped in the effort not to be pulled down by his own weight. “Or maybe that first time — her and Dante’s bodies bent over me. It will work. You’ll wake up soon,” Virgil frowned. “It’s the last thing I remember. Death was very — quiet.”

Chuuya traced the slowed down motions of his hands underwater. Rage, Kouyou had said, do you truly think you know what it is?

“Lippman,” he said. The name was rough on his tongue — familiar as the poisons Mori had smiled as he offered him. “I think I’d dream of him the most.”

The man didn’t talk. Didn’t breathe, either.

He couldn’t keep his mouth shut. He didn’t dare to open it. I used to wonder if maybe he was alive in that car trunk, even for a second, he could have said, the curve of his mouth a tad too cruel. He covered it with his fingers; held still enough to make sure he wouldn’t sink his nails in. Had he ever even told Virgil? Maybe it had been Noguchi. Everyone in the Port Mafia knew everything about the Flags’ end. If he wasted his last breath trying to warn me. I’d dream that I could have saved even just one of them, and I didn’t.

“Your Limbo,” Virgil asked. Selfish like an author; but gentle by the edges. Friend, Chuuya mused, fierce and desperate, it’s my friends, and it won’t be like last time. Dazai had once muttered something similar, out of Mori’s office — what’s the point of a wound? “I never asked what it was like.”

He thought of the elevators at the HQs. The hum of the water all around him; holding his breath.

“A tank,” Chuuya offered, low. Some things were to be kept close to his chest. Others were to be plasmed like the earth before being bled out. “A glass one. Somewhere.”

Virgil’s eyes traced his profile. There was an antiquity in them that matched the one Beatrice’s own had held. He had the strange, cruel realization that Kouyou always looked him straight in the eyes when they talked.

“I’m floating in it,” he added. He knew he wouldn’t understand what it meant. But Chuuya would — Chuuya had understood what it was from his first infinity in that Limbo. He had breathed in onyx water and known, even if he didn’t remember. It was as familiar as a womb. “Some men are talking outside. Barely voices. I float. I don’t do anything else.”

I want my mom, he didn’t say. I want my dad. I want to go home. I won’t remember any of it by my next blink, and I’ll never even know.

“That sounds boring,” Virgil said.

Chuuya snorted so viciously some of the water went up his nose. He choked, sitting up to cough it out as the man attempted to hold in his laughter. “Yeah,” he gasped, between puffs of his hilarity, “Fucking boring.”

“Boring isn’t bad,” Virgil insisted, carefully. Maybe Kouyou had told him too much. Maybe he had noticed her staring into his eyes, too. “Boring is safe, sometimes. Kenta always says so. If I’m bored I’m not getting chased by guns. We’re all safe.”

“I know,” Chuuya assured. He swam up. He followed a firefly with his eyes, all the way to the grass. The fire had long since died — the little bug settled amongst the smoke. “I know, man. I’ll make sure of it.”

January 1st.

“She looks pretty happy, yeah?”

Perched on top of the bench, Chuuya kept the hood of his jacket on, and didn’t offer any sort of acknowledgement.

Officer Matsuda didn’t even huff. He sat right by his legs, strangely well-dressed and holding onto a steaming cup of coffee, and followed the line of his vision all the way to the two women on the other end of the square. If he had anything to add onto that description — if the tentative curve of Yuan’s mouth, and the delighted light in Agent Minami’s eyes might mean something other than happiness — he didn’t dare theorize.

“I have to leave for a bit,” Chuuya said. It was an understatement, but the man didn’t need to know — uniform on or not. “Can you keep an eye on her?”

The man curled an eyebrow.

There was something painstakingly heavy in the way he studied his too casual clothes; the look of someone observing old photographs. The texture of the hoodie had brought bile between Chuuya’s teeth — he had worn it in spite and because of.

“Don’t look at me like that,” he said.

“Chuuya, you left her with one of maybe the most untouchable people in Yokohama,” the man said, nodding towards Agent Minami’s arm — where the golden badge of the Division rested. “I doubt she won’t be safe.”

“Maybe I don’t trust the most untouchable people in Yokohama all that much,” he replied.

Matsuda frowned. “Don’t you think they could help?”

It was too complicated to summarize. “Will you or won’t you keep an eye on her?”

“Of course,” he said, after a pause. There was too much honesty in his gaze; he didn’t want to look at it, so he didn’t. There were eyebags too; restless nights fixing up the city after the Dragon Head Conflict. His lips itched to ask if his squad had been registered among the fallen — he knew it hadn’t, though. The idea of not asking was as nauseating as the principle of an unchanging truth — he would forget the sound of their voices soon enough. “Of course, Chuuya. You know I will.”

He nodded. Nodded some more — studied the auburn, familiar tinge of Yuan’s hair and the old green leather that had nothing to do with her festive clothes, and tried to determine if any of it meant anything.

Does it matter?, he wondered. Chuuya was leaking from all the pores. His arms and hands hadn’t been black and decaying since Shibusawa. Are you content, he wanted to ask, sometimes, to the only being who would never answer, was it enough?

He knew he would say no.

“Well,” Chuuya jumped down the bench, hands in his pockets. “Gotta go. Do try not to be an asshole to your ex wife for the festivities.”

“She’s the one who —“

“She made sweets, man. Your loss.”

Matsuda sighed.

In typical fashion — he waited until Chuuya had almost vanished from sight to call out his name again. When he turned to look at him, one eyebrow raised, hesitancy curled his shoulders forward.

“Listen,” the Officer spat out, all in one go, drying sweaty hands on his pants. “I was about to go visit Murase, if you wanted to come.”

Chuuya stared.

“What in hell makes you think he’d want me there?” he questioned, before he could decide if it was a smart sight to offer.

Matsuda seemed to gain thirty years in a single breath. The wrinkles by his eyes grew a tad deeper — the light in them blurred, as if hiding behind cataract and too many things he had not been able to do more than look at. “Chuuya,” he said, almost like a reprimand. “You don’t get to decide that, kid.”

Only Tainted, subtle and invisible, kept him from taking a step back.

“Fine,” he heard himself say. Yuan had long since crossed the street. She hadn’t even seen him; Murase had died looking at him. They always did, one way or another. If you knew, he thought, as Matsuda’s shoulders relaxed. If you knew. “Fine.”

Quiet, walking side by side, they made their way to the cemetery.

Chapter End Notes

virgil: i love to swim under the moonlight and have fun chuuya: i sometimes wonder if my friend wasn’t dead in my brother’s car trunk virgil: ok!

a little interlude for you! next chapter, we’re moving into the next arc and dazai’s pov again! we got some of tanaki’s backstory (she’s a silly character, but i can’t wait to casually mention her in future fics and giggle like a living easter egg lol) and one of kouyou’s mafia rituals (she’s my wife). i hope you guys like this little break, and i’ll see you soon! (heads up, it might be a day after the usual, ‘cause work decided to give me an event right on the usual day)

see you soon! <33

OR

Chapter Notes

see you at the end ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

ACT TWO

---

[...]

i wonder if he knew

he was dying.

he would laugh and tell you

the stars became him,

when he stared at them.

[...]

[autumn poem, nakahara chuuya,

second stanza]

It only took a shot to reduce the screaming child into a rag doll.

“Hello, there,” the man said, as the doctors dragged the body out of the room. The echoes of her shrieks pooled down all the utterly vacant faces in the room; she’d stained the floor in blood, banging her skull against it. “Mind if I sit?”

He was tall, and unassumingly awkward. If not for the his hair — brushing the shoulders of his lab-coat — he might have gotten mistaken for one of the doctors relentlessly roaming the halls of the psych ward. But the personnel weren’t allowed to keep their hair long.

The patients like to pull, the Hall director would have explained, if asked.

Gloominess dripped from the walls of the Game Room; the visitor’s smile, though, was very warm — almost encouraging the silhouettes in the room to go back to what life had been, before a naughty child and her blood had interrupted it.

His intention to wait for an answer seemed as genuine as it was pointless — the muzzle-shaped restraint around his interlocutor’s jaw would birth no words.

The plastic chair on the free side of the table screeched against the floor as he sat. Similar set-ups filled the rest of the brightest room of the facility, with card games and thoroughly checked knick-knacks for the short-lived entertainment. The boy had already extorted one hour more in the Game Room from the nurse who changed his sheets and rattled his skull whenever he managed to get them bloody — whatever that not-doctor wanted, it would have to be quick.

As if he’d heard, the man lowered his eyes to the chessboard, humming.

He pushed one piece forward.

“Your turn.”

The boy — muzzled and handcuffed; too small for his seat — stared.

“It can’t be fun, playing on your own,” was the man’s conclusion, after several moments of nothing but the hiss of the moving hospital-gowns. “I come here often, to check on a little friend of mine. You never have anyone to play with.”

Observance meant something, for all did. The boy had seen the man too — chatting up distracted doctors and standing where she would not notice him breathing her in.

She — fourteen and always a bit pensive; taller than he was at eleven years old and paler than even the scars on his back — belonged to the age group next to the boy's own; it was rare for them to meet eyes. Solace was in the familiar, viciously stark and painfully obvious when seated next to a crying child whose restraints were meant to help them — before any eventual victim. He knew, with placid certainty, that she had killed before.

He knew she knew he had, too.

[In a room of chains and chained up ones, the ink had told him, what does it matter who is guiltier than the other?]

“Say,” the non-doctor proposed. “Do you know Morse Code?”

He nodded.

They played.

It took longer than it normally did — the times when the boy moved pieces in his mind and chuckled when either he or himself won the game. The former doctor did not ask the purpose of abandoning a handcuffed child in a room filled with toys — he did not take the offered advantage and move his pieces somewhere he hadn't told him to. All he did was smile, a bit more amused with every checkmate the boy couldn't vocalize.

The boy wondered if the man remembered him.

“What a mind,” he sighed, after his seventh loss.

Staring pitifully at his Queen, he intertwined his hands, leaning his chin on them. With some curving and some pulling of his cuffs, eyes squinting, like a passionless painter studying his reference — the boy mirrored him.

The man huffed; not quite a laugh. Framed by the dirty windows was a painting from other times, times yet to come. A mirror; the ink had said, is only so when it can break. The boy dangled his feet, too far from the ground and the blood they wouldn't clean until the next morning.

“Did they lock you up here because you were too clever,” the man asked, “Or because you weren't clever enough?”

He tilted his head. The muzzle was more uncomfortable than it was a bother; the stuttering words he could not say would have been nothing but a reminder of better times. Worse times. Betterworse, he concluded. He had no name and he had no blood; all he had was a chessboard.

Neither, he tapped. Just was.

Another hum. “Your turn.”

He asked his question.

A spark of surprise overrode the man's face; he looked right into his awaiting eyes, searching. He looked right into his eyes — because observance meant something, and he had killed enough to know when to breathe in.

"I do have one," he answered, eventually.

What is it?

"Ah," His smile was timid. His tongue wet his lips, slow. "That's a secret."

The boy squinted.

"Do you have an Ability?"

The painfully white lights flickered. There was no real need for them — not when the sun mercilessly embraced the world outside the endless windows. The general consensus, though, was that being locked up in that place meant some things deserved to be taken away.

There was a curtain of hair upon only one of the boy's eyes. There was an unmistakable kaleidoscope of unspeakable things shattered across the boy's features. The man recognized it — solace, he thought, was in the familiar.

You've done your counts wrong, he thought, as he would again, four years from that white room and those pointless lights. You've done your counts wrong about him.

Doesn't matter, the boy said, tapping it on the bloodied ground. Crossing the doors, the doctors returned from disposing of the girl. Doesn't matter at all.

He stood up. Clever and quick learner, he did not make a sound when he smashed his head against the corner of the table. Once the guards had approached, it only took a single shot to reduce the screaming child into a rag doll.

scene iii.

[learned to do one trick and does it again and again]

---

The boy in front of him was human.

Dazai knew this with an expert's certainty; no rabid dog could have ever walked even two steps carrying the full weight of the hatred in his eyes. Contempt was too rational of a thing. Human, he thought, watching him run, blood dripping profusely from his wounds, but new to it.

"An Executive is free to take on whatever underling they might wish to," he explained, dangling blood-soaked shoes from the rock he'd sat on. An Executive, he did not say, but he tasted it inside his mouth. But new to it. Only a day old, in fact.

Eviscerated and wide eyed on the ground of the woods were six men — the wounded human in front of him couldn't keep his eyes away from them. Revenge was among those types of hunger Dazai had never quite understood; but recognizing the unfamiliar was much more useful than the opposite.

You wanted them dead, he did not say. He wasn't looking for thanks. They killed your friends. Here are their bones.

Akutagawa Ryunosuke heard anyway.

According to the voices, the latest devil's child of the slums had eyes like those of a silent dog. Dazai found he disagreed — found that the useless attack he had attempted against him, the malnourished skin of his frail body, and the deep nothing cracking his eyes from the inside, much more resembled —

[“You are responsible, Dazai,” Mori told him, polished shoe deep into the dead thing's throat, eyes settled on him — speaking through metaphors just to keep the not-quite-anything that kept them two steps from each other unnamed. “Until the end of times, you are responsible for what you tame. If that is what you wish, find yourself another snake, and this time — break it until it fits.”]

There wasn't much to add. Kazuko had long since closed her eyes. Bored, he questioned: “Why are you quoting books at me, now?”

His smile could have banished Yokohama's regent blood moon, bright as it was. “You like those very much, don't you?”]

But the boy appeared human, and Dazai was not in the habit of despising the unreachable.

Utterly stupid, he considered, this whole revenge thing. Both hatred and vendetta — both the moonlight and some boy who could not be older than fourteen; who had very well attempted to kill him even after recognizing his name.

Most did, these days.

Competence is the weapon of the long-lasting, Mori would have said. Hands on his shoulders; pride in his eyes; something never-ending in his carefulness not to touch his skin. Never uncautious; not when Dazai was in the room. He had put on a different coat today, just for the occasion. I will not tolerate mistakes, and you will not either.

“I’ll give you money, if you choose to refuse my offer,” he told the boy, shrugging. “Enough to bury those dead friends of yours. Enough for you and your sister to live comfortably until your lungs stop working.” He tilted his head to the side. “If not life, though,” he added, holding tightly onto the rope, skinning his palms to keep the weight of comfort from drowning those promising shoulders. “If you choose the Port Mafia, I will give you everything.”

Odasaku wouldn’t have approved.

Orphans aren’t promising, Dazai, he said, in some corner of his skull he might have called a conscience, both to his face and not. He liked to hold it on winter days — liked to see a reflection he did not quite recognize. The unknown was more tempting. Orphans are just orphans.

“Not without trial,” he conceded, lending some rope to the voice in his head. “There won’t be no easy treatment. This fake god of mine tells me the slums are hell on earth. What awaits might just make you long for that hell. But if you do have the resolve...”

Men should not pride themselves in forcing rats to run through mazes for food. But men were not rats, and men were taller than their cages, and it made for easy judgment — being different. Get a pet, Ango might have said. Ango did not care for orphans; he did not care for much, Dazai thought. Get a pet, he would have said, still. Get a pet, and let those who are meant to be corpses be corpses.

“Is there something you wish for?”

For the second time since their eyes first met, Akutagawa Ryunosuke was human.

“A reason to live,” His voice was littered in cracks and dirt; the dying wisteria in his lungs had splattered his lips in blood, and granted him only a few years of life. Enough to make him long for it. “A meaning to my life.”

There is none, Dazai might have told him, had he been Odasaku. There was purpose; there was stubbornness. There were the placid waters of Kouyou’s contentment; the whips Chuuya would allow to land on his back, taking one piece of skin away, giving a rope to hang on. There was little more. Go to your sister and die where it’s warm.

But he wasn’t Odasaku.

“I will give you one.”

There were comparisons to be made, when he laid the coat that was not Mori's around his shoulders. Black swallowed him, starting from his eyes and only abandoning the tips of his hair, snowy as his skin. Atlas, you fool, he thought, and then, be grateful it's new and weightless. And then: I'll fill it.

When he screamed — when he howled, in grief and in oath and in a thirst for life he did not recognize — Dazai offered him a grain of honesty.

Make it last for years, he did not advise him, bad mentor from his first breath, and you might even find a way to lie to yourself.

“Good answer,” he told him. Hands on his shoulders; thumbs brushing naked skin. Get a pet and break it. “Let's go home, Akutagawa.”

---

FOUR MONTHS LATER

---

Case number: 78665432

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Ango S.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [Code Name: Double Black] reported a hundred percent success rate regarding the [...]*

---

Secure encrypted communication line — Yokohama, The Temple.

“—move before they—“

“—can't, all the entrances have been—“

“—Fox? Fox, answer immediately—“

“—gravity—“

“—they are here, they—“

“—black?”

“—black!”

“—get out of there before—!”

Dear Odasaku,

See? I told you I would accommodate your ancient ways. I still insist you should let me show you how SMS work, but if mails are your preferred method of communication, I suppose I can take a step back, this once. Don't take it for granted! I've been hearing voices around the syndicate that daring to demand a sacrifice from me equals a death sentence! Say, Odasaku, do you believe me so terrible?

I ask you to forgive my impatience; missing one of our Friday nights at the Bar has left me unnerved. But the Boss is the Boss, and those three rules of ours can't quite be defeated by respectable whims. Well, I could. But Mori would whine. And then Elise would whine. I'm sure you understand the less than optimal circumstances.

I hope to see you before I embark on this bothersome quest. I'm not sure of how long we will be away; Chuuya put his foot down to have us return to Yokohama at least once every two weeks, but there is much to do, and not a lot of time. Unfortunately, he's too stupid to understand it. Unsurprising, but I am but a fool who is still weak to the art of disappointment.

We have a great deal of money to situate; and a great deal of control bases to establish with it. Most importantly, we need to make sure the sudden immigration of syndicates we received during the Conflict does not happen again. I would very much enjoy not dealing with Americans ever again.

And you? What will you be doing? Something exciting, I'm sure. Your job is much more interesting than mine. Ever since I was promoted, the paperwork has been endless. And Chuuya refuses to do it for me! That means I have to waste at least fifteen minutes of my day figuring out how to trap him into doing them. A bother. I could use them to check on you, instead.

Please send my regards to Ango, should you two meet up all the same. Which I would be horribly tickled by. Let him know that the notebook with the reports from the last months ~~he will surely be losing his mind over~~ is safely kept with me. I meant to give it back, but the prank will have to last some more. Pitiful.

Regards,

Your friend.

Secure encrypted communication line — China, 樱花

“—在他们到达之前立即退休—”

“我们不能再失去更多—”

“不到 1778 人死亡—”

“—black?”

“Double—”

Secure encrypted communication line — South Korea, 떨어진 가지.

"사령관이 죽임을 당했다—"

"Double—"

"젠장 Port Mafia —"

"대답하다. 대답하다. 대답하다!"

Dear Odasaku,

Forgive the delay. Chuuya smashed my phone. I proceeded to put needles in his favorite pair of shoes — but it took me some time, and this nauseating motel we're staying in had no computers to offer me. The Slug's presence poisons the air I breathe and marks my days with endless martyrdom, but I've been told of a certain mushroom that might just be the solution I'm looking for. Deadly in 78% of the cases, they told me.

Did you hear about Ango's promotion? It's great news! Soon, the two of you will both have much more interesting jobs than mine. I had to leave Yokohama in the middle of the night just two days ago, and you want to know what my last order was? An execution. One I couldn't even witness. No, I just had to give the order! How is that fair?

It could have made for an interesting show; apparently, the men had already attempted to end their lives in our dungeons. Watching them die could have been interesting. I have rarely seen men get what they want.

Regards,

Your friend.

Secure encrypted communication line — Germany, Bluthunde.

„—sie haben jede letzte Verteidigung, die wir aufgebaut haben, ausgeweidet —“

„Sind sie Dämonen? Wie konnten sie-“

„Pass auf, bevor sie – Marcus? Markus —“

„Double—“

Dear Odasaku,

I am inconsolable.

This city is too well organized. I attempted to kill myself, as I told you I would the last time we met, throwing myself in the midday traffic — to no avail! These cars know the rules of the street too well! I had several men and women stop and insist they could bring me to the Hospital, and being all worried about the only wound I managed to give myself — a scratch down the elbow! It wasn't even the result of the cars, that rabid dog of mine just tried to stab me with a pair of chopsticks! (!!!!).

My pain is never ending. Every passing day I wonder where I might be going wrong. But fear not; I have since then realized that such grand methods will not suit me. For starters, there was no beautiful woman to follow my journey to the Aftermath. Secondly, I think too many cars at once might end up being painful. Perhaps just one, next time.

How are you? How are the kids? Did you carry any interesting packages? I know you told me you're more interested in my stories, but I do believe we should be even. You had me tell you all of my secrets; it's only fair I try to gain something back.

Do not take me for calculating. As much as my self-inflicted thorns allow me to, I promise you genuineness.

Regards,

Your friend.

Secure encrypted communication line — Tokyo, Black Widows.

“—the entire plaza has been annihilated, we cannot—“

“—for two fucking sons of a bitch—“

“—black!”

“We cannot find—“

“Commander? Commander, what is—“

“Double—“

“Get away! Move away immediately, get—!”

Dear Odasaku,

I saw a child die today, and I thought of you. I also thought of Kazuko, but that was short lived. I keep thinking I should feel as you told me — saddened by her absence. Truth to be told, I don't. Killing children doesn't really help, but it's the job.

Have you ever killed a child? You must have. Did it feel different? It doesn't for me. I know it does for Chuuya — he gets this look on his face that speaks louder than even his barks and growls. I think it's a bit hypocritical. What difference does it make if I shot a five or a ninety year old? Did the kid have more days in front of them? Perhaps. But why should their hundreds of days be more important than that old man's two, three, ten left?

I tried to ask Chuuya about it, because research is the heart of the matter. He didn't react positively. He never really does. That's fine. It's very entertaining. He called me some weird names, and then he said, “At least, an old man had enough time to do something bad.”

Your snotty orphans tried to steal my coat, last time I saw them. Akutagawa's gloominess keeps ruining my days. Is that fault enough to deserve death?

I don't remember if I ever even saw something akin to a mirror. You remind me of it, at times. Not quite reflecting, though. Opaque, maybe. Ango would know the term. You're so weird, Odasaku. I do rejoice in your existence, still.

I can't help but think that, should everyone understand that death and life are all but dissimilar, less people would munch over worth. You understand, don't you? You die anyway. We all do. Asking if we deserve it — if we did bad enough to deserve it, if we were too young to — is inconsequential. Was I too mean to deserve sunrise? No one would ask.

But I did think of you when I saw that dead child.

Regards,

Your friend.

Secure encrypted communication line — Tirana, Ujqërit.

“—bomba tashmë shpërtheu, ne nuk mund të bëjmë asgjë—

“—ata djajtë japonezë nuk munden—“

“—djajtë? Kjo është vepër e perëndive, jo—“

“—Black?”

“—ndërkombëtarisht, ne duhet të—“

Secure encrypted communication line — Alaska, C65ss.

“—insane? Retire immediately!”

“We can’t just let—”

“Don’t—”

“—can’t stop—”

“—to me, not them, never them, get—”

“Commander, we—”

“Step away from Double Black, now—!”

1. [Yokohama Intelligence; Recording 6785].

---

...

---

“Rebecca Winfield threw up in the pool, and White-Teeth Jackson’s having a fit over it,” Chuuya said, as he appeared between the wooden seat-legs caging Dazai under the table. “Why are you throwing a tantrum?”

“Are you kidding me?” Jackson — the birthday boy, as his pair of sparkly sunglasses read — groaned, right in time, somewhere over the crowd. Had he been closer to the DJ station, he would have probably demanded a record-scratch. “The cleaning system won’t activate until six in the morning, dude!”

Whatever makeshift lackey had brought the news forward shrugged apologetically, pushed back and forth by the crowd.

Dazai could only truly see their legs; the kitchen table that was his roof was uncomfortably short. Sweaty, pimpled bodies had been dancing since crossing the threshold of the so-called king of the Baltimore’s Lions High School; holding up plastic red cups and throwing glitter-y decorations around to the sound of the beat.

The mansion could easily accommodate it all: an assortment of highschoolers of all ages partying in widely different ways, drunkenly destroying antiques and singing songs Dazai did not know. He had spent a little less than twenty minutes extorting information from a fourteen year old on the verge of a panic attack; half an hour after, he'd scared off the football squad from doing body shots off his table, and settled.

"I'm not throwing a tantrum," Dazai let the boy know, gathering some joy from watching his knees end up in a pool of discarded red ponce. "I'm changing my tactics."

Chuuya curled an eyebrow. "For what?"

"Three out of the three girls I've proposed a double suicide too —"

"You're a shitty toilet paper substitute."

"— mistook my intentions for a mere flirting technique," he explained, inconsolable.

"I mean —" Blinking, the boy pushed one of the seats, until he could sit next to him, caging them in that claustrophobic space. "Isn't it, sort of?"

"No. It's the flirting that's the technique."

"Why are you flirting with random chicks, anyway? Didn't you come here with that Charlotte girl, from Biology?"

"Lottie is not particularly serious about this, I assure you," Dazai laid his chin on his hands, just as sad. "And given her respectable amount of bear plushies and the college applications on her desk, I doubt suicide would fit into her agenda."

Chuuya made a face. "Dude, gross, you went to her house?"

Before he could answer, a roar rose through the partying crowd — someone had stood up on the glass table of the dining room and allowed two cheerleaders to rain commercial beer on his white shirt. Whistles ensued; the DJ — a thirty years old man very invested in pretending to be drunker than he was — put on a song about the USA's coolness.

"You hear this?" Dazai nudged his arm, ear to the lyrics. "You turned seventeen and tonight is the night. Perhaps your hat will finally devour the little that's left of your brain."

"I'll fry you like tempura," Chuuya said. If he could have sank into the floor, he thought — with or without Tainted — he probably would have. "Am I losing it, or have they been playing this song in a row since ten P.M.?"

Chances were he was right.

How a party could appear both so cheap and so grand, he wasn't quite sure; perhaps it was the American way. Half the people in that place he wouldn't have recognized, hadn't they spent days memorizing every face they might meet at the school. An arduous job, for a one week long infiltration — but they were getting free alcohol out of it.

“Tanaki’s right. They’re a living stereotype,” The redhead’s nose scrunched up, watching some guy jump on the piano to start a Go Lions, Go Lions! chant. “And why is every guy here wearing a varsity jacket, anyway?”

He could hardly talk, when he had stuck himself in a grey one as well — but Dazai knew his contempt was the result of a week of barely contained murderous intent, barely quietened by his own pinching fingers on naked skin.

[That little violence-proof trick had caused a great number of voices — among many others. Not every day two Japanese transfer students entered the doors of Baltimore’s Lions High School — according to Therese, their first-day guide — and people there were endlessly attracted to gossip.

“Plus, you two look very —” She’d cleared her throat, blinking at Dazai’s bandages with almost vocal desperation. “Exotic. Wait, is that racist?”

Voices had been many and wide: suppositions about their criminal background — Chuuya had started a fight in the school canteen by the second day; Dazai had stuck a pair of child-proof scissors in the P.E. teacher’s seat when he’d asked him to get rid of his bandages — suppositions about their clear lack of interest in making friends — Chuuya had failed to understand the cheerleaders’ flirting by asking him to teach them his high-kicks and locked them in a severe training regime; Dazai had gotten the Chemistry experiment wrong just to stop Mitchel, from the Debate Team, from talking to him — and about their general connection to each other.

But birthing voices about them had been the intent, so they hadn’t complained.

Mostly.

It did not, of course, stop the voices. It hardly could. As far as the students of Baltimore’s Lions High School were concerned, Dazai only sat next to Chuuya, and Chuuya only talked to Dazai — and both occasions were so hostile, they mostly ended up with them in the principal’s office. They shared their lunch on the roof and attempted to throw each other from it.

The school Dean had memorized their names by the second day. ]

“How long until we can bring him out?” he asked, keeping his eyes on Jackson’s swaying frame.

“He’s still the life of the party,” Dazai replied, leaning down to miss the impact of some drunk guy sitting on their table. Chuuya yelped, bumping his head under the bent wood — why is everything in this country made of paper, the boy had complained, mere days ago, staring at the hole Dazai’s head had left in the wall.

As a window got smashed in the distance, Dazai added: “If you had found a way to befriend the fool, we wouldn’t be here now.”

A gasp. The buckle of his choker was caught in the colorful lights — it almost distracted from the collar of bruises he'd received during their last shoot out, somewhere near Boston. "How is it my fault if Miss. Bailey refused to put me in tutor classes with him?"

"How is it my fault if you can't even pretend to suck at Physics?" he scoffed. "Who gets every answer wrong on a test? Obviously she figured out you were lying. Statistically, a hundred percent failure rate is — Oh, hey, Charlotte is here!"

Dazai extracted himself from under the table, ignoring Chuuya's offended spluttering.

The drop of his tone was enough to get a painful retch out of the boy as he climbed out; the moment the giggling girl stepped closer and stuck her lips to his, he saw his eyes roll deep in the corner of his own.

He paid him no mind.

Kissing was a new concept. The dentist Mori had dragged him to to get rid of the braces, at last, had winked and said something about it; in the one class he didn't share with Chuuya, he had listened to fast English murmurs about himself perhaps nobody had thought he would catch. Lottie didn't kiss very well — but she always stared at him, and Dazai knew what a ticking clock meant.

"Hey there, handsome," she murmured, smirking on his lips. She had a mole under her left eye, the same black of her shimmering skirt.

"Hey there," Dazai echoed.

"Refrain from drooling in public," Chuuya barfed, in quick-snap Japanese.

"I share none of your slimy slug tendencies, thank you very much," Then, in English: "Sorry about the hiding. Someone lost his earring."

"I'm not even wearing —" A kick to the shins; Dazai tapped the side of Chuuya's shoe, dirtying it, because it was Italian leather.

"I told you to text me when you arrived," Charlotte reminded him, after laughing puzzlingly at their antics. Her fingers were skirting across his jaw; it didn't feel as ticklish as Dazai had been waiting for. "I wanted to show you Jackson's parents' wine cellar."

That got Chuuya's attention. Before he could act on it, the girl had already grabbed the hem of Dazai's turtleneck, pulling him forward — and Chuuya, too, given the two fingers Dazai had hooked in his pants' back pocket — towards a circle of people on a quieter corner of the floor.

They settled, bony knees against bony knees, surrounded by sliding dancing bodies and the unmistakable taste of children playing mature. When he tried to sit next to Charlotte's spreading skirt, she playfully slapped his chin. "You can't sit next to me, dummy," She rolled her eyes, hanging onto her giggling friend. "Or do you not want the bottle to land on us?"

“Right,” Dazai said, squinting at the empty beer someone was carefully fixing at the center of the circle. A wordless glance exchanged with Chuuya — what’s the bottle for?; answered by a mouthed, shit if I know? — abandoned them on opposite ends of it. “Can’t wait, Lottie.”

She grinned. Jackson fell somewhere next to her; unseen, Chuuya tapped the bottle with his foot.

A blur of music, ugly laughs, and the unholy sounds coming from the body-shots corner filled the time. Someone passed a joint; both he and Chuuya accepted it, sharing a cringing look. Mori would kill them if he knew.

A few couples threw all decency away with the midnight tick, occupying the nearest couches and walls — as he came to learn with each round of spin the bottle, that was exactly the point. He lost count of the making out sessions, hickey dares, and various pieces of clothing that got lost. Charlotte offered him a chuckling apology before sticking her tongue down Jackson’s throat; a girl with green eyes whose name he couldn’t remember pecked Chuuya’s lips with a squeal, and he courteously fixed her skirt where it had risen up.

I thought the dares would be funnier, Dazai’s knuckles tapped on the floor. No one was asked to jump into the vomit pool yet.

I’m gonna stop the bottle on me and dare someone to try and shoot you, Chuuya replied, pushed further and further into the wall by the couple rubbing all over each other next to him. That will light up the whole evening.

How scandalous.

L-O-T-T-I-E wants to lock you in Jackson’s bedroom and get you to fuck her, he informed him, once he’d unsightly stared at her whispering silhouette on his other side. The effort he went through to spell her name denounced something Dazai would mock later. Stop judging what I get off on.

He tilted his head. Me?

Chuuya’s knuckles hit the ground. They didn’t crack it open — but the bottle reacted to the pull of Tainted. It spun and spun, slowing down with each clap from the drunken circle, until it landed on —

“Ooh, get it!” Charlotte’s friends roared, shaking her so viciously her brain had to be rattling in her skull. “Her boyfriend and the competition!”

Chuuya’s face grew deadly calm.

He knew what that expression meant. “I’m too high to remember what we were doing,” Dazai slurred, immediately, swaying. He yawned. “What do I have to do to the Hatrack?”

His whole body jolted forward. “Why are you assuming it’s you who —” he snapped, in that slightly accented English of his. The mixture of that tone and his boastful brightness had gained him a different sort of attention; one he was steadfastly blind to.

It hardly made any sense — not when the list of his negative traits should have been far more blinding. But Chuuya was Kouyou's deserving disciple, overfilling in the delicate lethality she'd beaten into his swift steps; he'd been sharpened not unlike one of her blades, until he was just as unignorable as she was. Dazai had watched those children gawk at his seamless existence and unmatched eyes, and he'd —

Reluctantly understood. Somewhat. It made no sense, still, for the sloppiest dog in existence. But Dazai had never had the gall to decide what the sun was supposed to be.

“— Seven Minutes in Heaven!” some jock was telling him, screaming to overrule the teasing roars of the circle. “And don't even try to cheat, we'll keep time.”

“Don't take too long, though,” another girl snorted. “We don't want poor Lottie to cry.”

“What do you know, maybe she's into it.”

“Oh, shut it —” Charlotte lamented.

“Seven Minutes in Heaven,” Chuuya echoed, over the forceful touches of the people pulling him to his feet. “Sure. Obviously.”

Miracle came unexpectedly and joyously. Jackson jumped up. “I gotta show you guys where the closet is. Follow me.”

“Great,” Dazai commented.

“If they don't already know,” the same jock from before murmured. Laughter exploded.

“Delightful,” He smiled, not understanding a single thing. Language barrier, he assumed. Amongst the whistles, his fingers found Chuuya's wrist. As they followed Jackson's skipping steps, he leaned down to hiss: “Seven Minutes in Heaven?”

“Fuck if I know,” Chuuya replied, defeated. A moment later, eyes digging into their guide's back — his gaze grew unrestrained. “Sure don't know us if they think we'd get even seven minutes there. What, like an exchange year project?”

Too focused to snort, Dazai followed the curling line of his lips until it felt like violence.

Jackson's house branched out into thin, disconnected stairs, leading to an upper floor the partying crowd had been politely ordered not to destroy. The further they went, dirtying the shadows with their vomit-soaked soles, the more muffled the chaos from the main event became. Dazai crossed his hands behind his back, climbing the steps with calculated calm.

At the end of the staircase was a bright yellow sticker, something akin to an anti-slipper safe.

It caged the garden outside the mansion and most entrances, too; Dazai's researches hadn't been able to give him a name for that high-level technology. The videos he'd stolen of Ability Users being reduced to a babbling mess because of its bolts were clear enough.

Not a fly buzzed when they passed it.

[“Brad heard from Lily, who heard from Janet, who heard from Marcus, who heard from one of the transfers, that the police will be doing rounds,” they had watched some girl from Chemistry tell Jackson, the day before. “You need to get rid of the security system for the night. Your parents connected it to their alarms, right? Those things will shriek if we tip-tap.” ]

“Aaand,” Jackson sing-sang, knocking on the wardrobe at the end of the hallway. He opened the doors, showing off a small cubicle of overcoats. “Here we are! You two have fun. Ah, not too much fun, you know. I don’t want jizz on Mom’s fur.”

Dazai should have guessed. “Seven minutes, you said?” Another roar came from downstairs; his joint hands reached for the gun in the back of his pants.

His eyebrows danced. “Not one less, not one more. Do tell Lottie if it gets you good, though. She’s a sweet girl. Don’t lead her on. That sucks. ”

“Seven minutes,” Chuuya said, again, very casually. Something in his tone shifted the boy’s attention to him. “Yeah, I think we can do it.”

Jackson’s father’s office occupied the entire third floor of the mansion. Four glass walls leaned on a square-wide balcony, equipped with a Jacuzzi and a nice view to the city; all the furniture was offensively white to the eyes, modern and minimal to the point of impersonality. Jackson’s passed out body got tied to a chair the moment Chuuya got bored of floating him around; Dazai browsed his father’s computer, occasionally criticizing the decor.

“We were right about the Ability-morphine cargoes,” he informed. “He’s refilling the Special Division legally — and through other means for anyone who makes a big enough offer. Apparently, he’s known as the Ability-Destroyer,” He frowned. “Wouldn’t I deserve that title?”

Chuuya scoffed. Blood had splattered on the white collar of his varsity jacket and on his jaw, from the bone-breaking punch he had knocked Jackson out with; in the moonlight, and paired with the gun he had stolen from Dazai, it could have been a fashion statement.

If Dazai only looked at him peripherally, a valley of bright spirals and Corruption scars littered his skin. “I have some other titles in mind. Did you put the —“

“Of course, I did. Did you cut off his —?” He meaningfully lowered his eyes.

A scoff. “If we’re trying to frame his parents, wouldn’t that be in sick taste?”

“Yeah,” Dazai said, stretching the boredom out of his limbs. “That’s the point.”

The mechanical sound of a safety being switched off curled in the air right by his ear.

Still crouched down in front of Jackson’s seat, Chuuya paused. His hands hesitantly raised to his shoulders, pulling away from the kid’s legs; he kept his eyes on something a tad too tall to be the top of Dazai’s head, and rose to his feet with well calculated slowness.

“Alright,” he said, calming. “Let’s not.”

“Free my son and we can talk about it,” the male voice by Dazai’s ear said. He had frozen on the spot the moment an unmistakable weapon had been pressed against the back of his skull; when the owner of the house pulled his collar to straighten him, he followed, obediently. “Delete whatever framing evidence you’ve put into my computer, let the kid go — and I might consider not shooting your friend. If you’d rather be interrogated tied to the same seat.”

His tone was utterly pleasant, but lined by a smell of sweat. Daring to dart a look to his left, he saw a slightly crooked nose and silver hair, and the rain-covered jacket of someone who had just come home.

You didn’t check the outside stairs?, Dazai mouthed, enraged.

Chuuya’s jaw dropped. That was your job!

“Eyes on me,” Jackson’s father growled. It broke in the middle; a shard of panic. He pulled Dazai harder to make up for it, digging the mouth of his gun so deep into his skull it burned. “I’m not above killing kids.”

““You’re not above acting out against the American Division for Special Abilities’s orders either,” Dazai commented. “Or above financial theft. Or human experimentation. Or whatever that squirrel statue at the end of the hallway was. Why would we think you’d draw the line at child murder?”

“Will you shut up,” Chuuya called, teeth clearly gritted, “I’m bargaining for your miserable life here.”

“That is rather kind of you. I have been researching the painful side effect of bullets based on areas, however, and —“

“The statue wasn’t even a squirrel,” he cut through, “It was clearly a monkey.”

“Are you blind? That —“

The bullet Jackson’s father fired grazed the shell of Dazai’s ear. He wouldn’t have noticed — distracted as he immediately was by the sound it made as it opened a crack in the wall right by Chuuya’s raised hands — if not for the warm trail that soaked the neck of his shirt; he grunted. “Now that’s ticklish.”

“Are you fucking listening to me?” the man snapped — just loud enough to fight a reasonable war against the music downstairs. Dazai could see his eyes frantically lay on his son’s bloodied temple. “I don’t know who sent you. I don’t know what your aim is. I’ve got men who’ll make you beg for a chance to tell — but right now, you either do what I’m telling you, or I fucking shoot him —

“Listen,” the boy tried.

“— I will shoot him dead, are you listening to me?”

The light in his burned eye — oh my god, some of their classmates had gasped, on their first day, were you born like that? Are those contacts? — dimmed out into something not disconcerting.

Dazai's shoulders stiffened. "Slug —"

"Fine," Chuuya said.

He raised Dazai's own gun.

Fire-laced, thundering ache exploded right between his eyebrows. The world got blurred and more blurred; vaguely, he heard the sound of the man behind him choking, screaming words he did not catch. Dark bloomed in his pupils; Dazai felt nothing at all.

When his eyes opened again, the same song about the mighty cool USA was playing somewhere under his feet, rattling the bones of his legs.

Chuuya's face appeared upon him, upside down. "Is that shit about how electrocuting people in the water doesn't leave marks real or not?"

The rush of the turned-on Jacuzzi came to his ears a bit belatedly; when he managed to blink the headache out of his eyes, he saw the passed out bodies of both Jackson and his father half hanging from the edge of the bathtub.

A hole had been drilled right in the dead center of his forehead. "I thought you'd said you didn't like this strategy," Dazai whined, rubbing it.

"You're welcome," Chuuya replied, flicking that same exact spot — like it was a normal response to follow up shooting him in the head. Blood attached itself to his forefinger like cooling honey; distractedly, Chuuya licked it off his glove. "You came up with this strategy."

"You said you could make it painless."

"How, asshole? I said bloodless."

"That's so not fair — Chuuya has to take responsibility — "

"Fifty-four kilograms, by the way," Chuuya grabbed him by the wrists, hauling him up through whines. "More or less. The — oi, you're heavy — the wonders of gravity. The bruise will be wider than Ace's frontal teeth."

"One day," he promised, fervent, trying to keep the world from feeling like a spiderweb connected to his aching forehead, "Ane-san and everybody else will see through your act, and accept you as the sadistic psychopath you are."

Somebody downstairs began chanting a Happy Birthday choir, unconcerned with their missing guest. Belatedly, they turned their heads toward the bodies in the Jacuzzi.

Dazai curled an eyebrow.

They exceeded the seven-minutes deadline — if the consoling pats being delivered to Charlotte's shoulders meant anything. Hands sticky from blood and from the rubber from the electricity cable they had torn off the ceiling, they leaned on the railing overlooking the ground floor, studying the swaying crowd.

Framing one of the most infamous assets of the American Abilities Division would have no impact whatsoever on their lives. Baltimore's Lions High School might organize some service to mourn a beloved student; those teens would gossip about Mrs-Jackson's-Mother and whatever signs they would swear they had caught that she was insane.

Criminals rarely get caught for their own crimes, Mori liked to say, when Social Services Day came closer. And as with every grain of sand, Dazai learned.

"Go on," he said, still pettily rubbing his forehead. "I'm bored."

Chuuya muttered under his breath. Still, he tapped feather-light fingers on the railing, waiting until Tainted had spread down the stairs and across the makeshift dance floor. Less than fifteen seconds later, they were walking among the passed out bodies of Jackson's guests, pale underneath the techno-pop music.

One of Chuuya's fighting boots ended up in Charlotte's curls, a spreading halo. His hum of consideration echoed all the way to the kitchen, where Dazai made sure to steal one sealed bottle of whiskey.

"That was boring," Chuuya commented, floating some grains of salt he'd stolen in the air. "But kids are wild these days."

"I get elderly people are usually on the shorter side as well," Dazai replied, as they fell inside the stolen car; he downed a sip of whiskey, studying the LED lights from the windows. "But you're still not ninety, so maybe lay it off?"

The boy grunted, starting the car.

No more Lit homework, he considered — a bit hypocritically, considering he had completed none of them. No more cheerleaders rallies. No more English. No more school.

Fingers pinched the space between his eyebrows. "Earth to Mackerel," Chuuya snapped, rudely inserting them into the street with only one hand, using his free one to rip the bottle from his own. Vibrant old Chuuya, still freckled in blood, still a dog, still unlike them — and thus, consequently, inevitably — "I haven't bothered to learn the way to the port. If you don't want me to fuck around and find out, pay attention."

Stupid, he thought. Unless he was aware that Dazai would lead them elsewhere out of spite. They had saved most of the missing budget — and there had to be at least one Arcade around. "Sure."

The edge of the knife they had used to cut the table was pressed against the side of his throat, before being hidden in Chuuya's shoe again. Dazai cheerfully spread salt on the tip of his middle finger, and pushed it against the boy's mouth.

Chuuya, ever so efficient, made sure to loudly announce his disgust, before licking it off and downing some whiskey.

His mouth, Dazai thought, inconsequentially, was warmer than Charlotte's — even on the bruised skin of his fingers. He wondered, a bit too analytical, if he'd be warm to bite.

“Happy birthday, by the way,” he recalled, licking his own salt off, throwing his feet on the dashboard. He'd planned a kidnapping to celebrate — organized it all to the dot, so that the sycaries would easily manage to break into their motel and bodily drag Chuuya away. And then Dazai would finally get some free time, as the shorter boy had fun beating them up into a pulp.

Truly, Dazai mused, he was one partner of a kind. It rarely went appreciated as it should have.

“Mmh,” Celebrations had long since grown sour on his face — neither the Flags nor his squad had ever witnessed one of his birthdays. Dazai wondered if every occasion was good to grieve, for a beacon of destruction. “May thirteenth?”

“Dang!”

“June twelfth?”

“You should give up. Nothing assures you I'd tell you, if you actually guessed it.”

“I don't know,” Chuuya swerved right into traffic, shrugging the varsity jacket off for the road to devour. “I have the feeling you might.”

Two hours later, they reached the port of Baltimore, and — as Chuuya's other, glory-lined birthday gift — they blew up every last one of Mr-Jackson's-Father's cargoes. Four hours later, his phone was blown up with facetime calls, showing the boy's bloodied, shrieking face as he kicked the sycaries into human craters — undeterred by how Dazai steadfastly sang Happy Birthday to him, with his flattest tone and a broken kazoo.

---

...

---

In the way of money, Mori had explained, as he showed off their pictures in the hallway of the high-names and cracked frames, you need to travel.

In the way of blood, Dazai had corrected, since the man would never say it out loud, I need you two everywhere.

“I don’t get it,” Chuuya said, head tilted so far to the side he resembled the smartly-eyed owls depicted on the walls of Kouyou’s home. “Art should look like art, y’know?”

Clicking his tongue, he chirped: “That’s a high standard, don’t you think?”

Berlin was blossoming and sticky at night — the stench of stillness filled up its own city with a polite sort of insistence. Its museums held the same kind of polished grandeur; the modern art section housed enough monochrome canvas to get even a mission-focused Chuuya curious enough to ask.

“I’m not saying I could do this,” the boy insisted. “I have as much artistic talent as that one drunken lady that plays the saxophone outside the Old World —“

“Don’t you always tip her?”

“You seriously need to stop it with those fucking spies you have on me. I’m just saying — it seems like a cheap way out.”

“If this poor man felt like a blue square on a canva,” Dazai replied, mighty, “Then he felt like a blue square on a canva. Don’t be so judgy.”

The crowd around them was unassuming; high-placed betters and event organizers — swirling their minds to explain the decades of pain behind a single stroke and why half an inheritance would be worth the buy.

“Do you ever feel like they can smell it?”

The lines of Chuuya’s newest accessory — a leather harness crossing on his chest, caging his Port Mafia tattoo and Dazai’s bullet scar he still had from the parking lot accident — cut a stark line on a too white dress shirt; neither of them looked too out of place amongst the well dressed nobility, but Dazai had been feeling eyes on his neck from their first step in the room.

“Your wet dog stench?” he asked, stealing the Champagne glass of a particularly busy woman passing by him. “Absolutely.”

“The smell of your bullshit will cover it.”

“Doubt.”

“The blood,” Chuuya insisted, stealing the glass from him — finally straightening his head to drink from it. The painting in front of them grew even duller from the lack of attention. Dazai did a quick mental count of his new Executive pay, and wondered if those Babysitting Union Official Unauthorized Proposal emails he’d been receiving could be soothed by buying Hirotsu such a gift. “Does it ever feel like they just know?”

“That statue seriously looks like a finger,” he mused, squinting at the podium in a faraway corner. Behind it, a man with silver hair and dark eyes was doing his best not to look at him. “What do you think the symbolism is?”

“To shove it up your ass.”

“Do you kiss Ane-san’s cheek with that mouth?”

Instinctively, Chuuya straightened.

German high society didn’t look much like the Japanese one. Their clothes were less intricate; their mindless chat just a hint more pragmatic. The evident lack of honorifics made their words a slightly strident in Dazai’s ears; but he knew better than to judge respect based on speech. Charity events looked the same everywhere, though.

“Familiar calls to the familiar,” Dazai shrugged. He met the man’s eyes; nodded. “If they smell it and recognize it, that’s on them. Pretend to pass out.”

“What?”

He smiled at the passersby; underneath his breath, he spelled out: “Pretend to pass out.”

Promptly, Chuuya dropped to the ground with a thump!

“And you say you aren’t a dog,” Dazai let himself mumble under his breath, stepping away from the concerned, gasping circle that was slowly gathering around the boy’s fallen body. There was a tone that would get Chuuya to answer; Dazai couldn’t quite point out when he had conditioned him to it, but he could only compliment himself for it. He made his way to the speck of silver on the other side of the room.

Marcus Schulz, head of the Black Glove, welcomed him with an extremely tight smile and new Champagne glass.

“Wonderful exhibition,” Dazai greeted, in a badly accented German. “I do wish to warn you — Miss Bachmann has every intention of offering you gambled money for that Malevich. You might not want to deal with the hassle.”

“That is surprisingly generous of you,” the Boss commented. “But perhaps the surprise is my mistake. You easterns always seem to display more politeness than we can rationally accept.”

“My mother taught me manners,” he lied.

“Mine tried. Given this, I thought I should let you know that my men have all of your men at gunpoint, as of now,” Pleasurably, Schulz glanced at the circle of concerned guests slapping Chuuya’s cheeks. “All I need is to say go and they’re all gone.”

Dazai hummed. “That’s problematic.”

“Indeed. So perhaps, you may want to go back to your Boss and let him know our deal has changed?”

“You mean,” he attempted, “Instead of you allowing us to store our money in your city, you want to simply take the money and return me and my partner’s bodies stuffed in a German krapfen?”

“Something like that,” Schulz agreed.

He hummed again, tapping his fingers on the side of his glass. The sound of a commotion startled a good number of the guests gathered by the fallen body and the head-tall finger statue; it seemed one of the Black Gloves had had no qualms about grabbing Chuuya’s skull and smashing it against the ground.

His neck was bent at a weird angle; his eyes were open and vitreous, lifeless. One of the women who had been raising his legs screamed; the woman in tailleur on her other side extracted a gun out of nowhere and shot her in the chest.

“That is not nice,” Dazai commented, only barely louder than the commotion of guests. A good number of them almost threw him to the ground in their haste to reach doors they would find closed, chased by bullets of men who didn’t want witnesses; both he and Schulz stood still, holding their glasses. “My Boss has taken quite a liking to that pipsqueak of my partner.”

“Does your Boss know your syndicate is on its way to an end?”

He sipped the champagne. “How come?”

“Your efficiency during the Dragon Head Conflict is commendable, but it attracted too many eyes,” Schulz explained, studying the pool of blood under Chuuya’s skull. “You had enemies in your city. Now you have enemies everywhere. It’s only a matter of time before they come for you — and I have it on good authority that some of them may have a tighter grasp on your Government than even you do.”

“Problematic,” Dazai echoed. “But I will deal with it once I’m home, I suppose.”

“You?”

Subtly, like a cat stuck on the counter, he took advantage of the chaos and the blood on the walls to push the finger statue to the ground. “Ah, yes,” Schulz said, suddenly. He studied him with an interest that was almost scientific. “I do know who the two of you are. The pride of the Port Mafia.”

He blinked at him. “And you think you’ll come out of this place alive anyway?”

“Rather.”

“How admirable. Are our men dead?”

Schulz tilted his head, casually, listening to his in-ear. He muttered something in German, too fast for him to catch; he nodded. “Now they are. So, should we get on with it, or —“

The wet, creaking sound of bones snapping into place was stark; but not enough not to get muffled by the choked scream out of the man who had been leaning over Chuuya’s body. The nail of the finger statue breached his back where his heart rested; turning his head back and forth, working a cramp, Chuuya kicked his corpse off, and snapped his fingers.

“Yes,” Dazai said, gulping down the last of his Champagne. “Rather.”

Later, when the room of the exhibition had turned crimson, and Marcus Schulz’s body had been left on top of a mountain for the authorities to find, Dazai was the one with a gun pointed to the hollow of his throat.

“Our men are not your fucking chessboard pieces,” Chuuya snarled, standing in Port Mafia blood outside the museum, pushing him against a gelid stone wall. The siren lights of police cars were growing closer; they both knew this dance to a fault. “You can’t just up and sacrifice them — we could have moved faster, and you fucking know it — “

“You know we needed an excuse to exterminate the Black Glove without appearing to be starting a conflict,” he noted, dull. “We have big contacts in Germany. We can’t just paint ourselves as bloodthirsty. As far as everyone will know, they came here and slaughtered our men unprovoked; no one knew they had made a deal with us. End of the story.”

His laughter was filled with disbelief. He had blood on his eyelids; keeping his eyes open seemed harder because of it. Chuuya was no more than a Sysyphus; he would knock on every family door and apologize for a wasted child — he would do it again. “There were a thousand possibilities that did not involve them dying for —“

“I told them to bring guns,” Dazai leaned his chin on the weapon in Chuuya’s hand — he gulped, just to feel it press against his carotid. No one is listening, Mori had said.

“They’re Mafia. They should have known how to use them.”

---

...

---

“Ma’am,” The pulsing vein in Chuuya’s temple seemed to move along to his broken English. Counting its tics, Dazai leaned on their fuming, stolen car, ignoring the creaking metal of the SLOW DOWN! sign they had crashed on. “For the last time. We did not steal you ladies’ booze. We haven’t touched alcohol in —“ His face fell. “In far too long.”

The biker didn't seem impressed. There was a fake mole painted on her upper lip, bright against the hot pink lipstick; her haircut was as stylish as it was windswept, and the snake tattoo that circled her throat looked at them unkindly.

"You stole it," she insisted, stone-faced. "You give it back, or we run you over."

The three rows of bikers behind her — all of them women; all of their vehicles shimmering; all of them sporting hot pink jackets that read Switzerland's Hot Chicken Wings on their back — nodded in unison, staring them down. A particular lady wearing an eyepatch dragged her thumb along her throat.

"We've had our own shit to deal with," his partner insisted. The sleeves of his jacket were still raised up to his elbows; they had been trying to get the car to magically restart for three hours. "All we did was stop at the same gas station as you. There was no need to follow us for thirty kilometers and start a professional chasing."

"There was," the leader insisted. "Because you stole our booze."

"We did not steal your goddamn booze."

The chasing itself hadn't landed them on the SLOW DOWN! sign, to be fair. It had been rather intense, and Dazai had given unnecessary commentary — but Chuuya was adept to racing. The problem had been the sudden realization that they had been driven miles off their course.

The map, Chuuya had said. We need to be out of here by tomorrow. The contact is waiting — and he's got that gun collection Mori told us to subtly steal from him. He'll get pissed off if we don't.

Possessed by an urge Dazai hadn't quite understood either — not that he would ever admit it; perhaps, realistically, he'd blame it on a desire to watch Mori's eyebrows twitch in disappointment — he had thrown the map out of the window.

They had watched it land under the bikers' wheels in stunned silence.

"My —" Chuuya was still saying. The word seemed to escape him, "Partner, here — He lost a map we really needed, and we got in a bit of — an altercation," Fancy wording, Dazai mumbled to his own thoughts, massaging the nose the boy had crashed on the dashboard. He had accidentally dislocated Chuuya's little finger during the fight, which they had needed to cut part of his glove for; but it was hardly as relevant. "That's why we had a hard landing. We weren't trying to challenge you."

"That," one of the bikers intervened, hand pointing at the SLOW DOWN! sign, "Is the Holy Hot Chick Wings Oath location, you creature."

Decades of exhaustion landed on Chuuya's shoulders. "Beg your pardon?"

With a chest-deep sigh, Dazai climbed to his feet, and made his way to the stare-off. Cars passed by the highway sporadically; the sun would go down soon, and they would probably be left for dead on a Swiss road — which would make Mori more than annoyed.

“Is this where you madams take the oath to join your — gang?” Dazai questioned, leaning his elbow on Chuuya’s shoulder, smiling charmingly up at the leader. “It’s a marvelous location. What inspired the choice?”

“We killed a man and buried him here.”

“How lovely,” He clasped his hands. “Well! Ma’am. You’re more than free to check our car — or what’s left of it. You won’t find your —“

“Secret Appletree Wine.”

“Your Secret Appletree Wine,” he agreed. “It’s the easier solution, isn’t it? You check, and if it’s not there — we all go our separate ways.”

“Not like I haven’t proposed it,” Chuuya muttered.

The leader — whose name tag read FIRE LORD — squinted at them, before exchanging a glance with some of her comrades. Skeptical, she said: “You could have drunk it already.”

“Oh, trust me,” Dazai told her. “You would know if my partner here had drunk just enough wine to feed an entire gang of beauties — such as you,” Cospirationally, he leaned down, hiding behind his hand. “Don’t tell him I said it, but Chuuya here is a bit of a lightweight. Let’s just say that sign wouldn’t have gotten destroyed for a tussle.”

“Mmh,” The light of an idea shone in the back of FIRE LORD’s eyes. “You don’t say.”

Paying her no mind, Chuuya shrugged him off. “Who the fuck are you calling —“

“What, are you going to deny it?”

“I can hold my wine perfectly fine —“

“Let’s not lie to ladies as pleasant as these. Which reminds me,” He made to turn his widest eyes to the crowd in front of them, grinning, “I don’t mean to presume, but would any of you women be amenable to a double —“

Dazai only saw it in the corner of his gaze — too fast to react to; too outside of Chuuya’s rumbling complaints to be stopped. The pink leather of a gloved, enormous palm landed against his temple — and the world went utterly black.

At some vague point, he came alive with his cheek squished on the back of a Hot Chicken Wings’ jacket. He only managed to turn enough to find a similarly passed-out Chuuya on a bike close by; the sky had already turned dark.

By the time a whole glass of some sort of liquid was thrown to his face — Dazai’s gaze landed on the inside of some road-trip bar.

“Hirotsu can never know,” he warned, his voice low, watching Chuuya’s eye tic from the stool next to his. The bikers had picked a round table with a hole in the middle — they had placed them in that central space, and were staring them down under the lively sounds of the bar. “He’ll think that babysitting bill of his has some value to itself.”

“Maybe it fucking does,” Chuuya hissed, studying their surroundings. “Can I just blow the place up? There’s too many people, though, I —“

“And kill so many beautiful women?” His tone turned grievous. “And if anyone has the map, it must be them.”

“Maybe if someone hadn’t decided to play fucking kite-catch in the highway —“

“Maybe if you hadn’t made us sleep under that bridge in Italy for four hours yesterday —“

“Well, maybe if you hadn’t told the mafioso who’s gonna guard our money that his wife would be a perfect suicide partner —“

With a dull thud!, two chest-tall glasses of a yellowish liquid were placed in front of them.

FIRE LORD crossed her arms, rising from her seat like an unlikely member of the last supper. She pushed the glasses close enough to almost fall into their hole-shaped space; then, she ordered: “Drink.”

They stared.

“What?” Chuuya asked, politely.

“You said you couldn’t have drank all of our wine to hide it,” the leader insisted. “You will prove it. You will drink until you black out, and we will see if it matches up with how much wine we are missing.”

The sisterhood nodded. Dazai felt himself laugh. “That’s actually kind of ingenious! It’s —“ A thought passed by in his mind. He paused. “It’s — Uhm. Ma’am. Lady — Lord. Remember what I told you about my partner?”

“Yes. Lightweight.”

“I am not a —“

“I’m gonna have to deal with him once this is over,” Dazai begged, joining his hands under his chin. “And he’s going to go crazy after half of this first glass. Find some mercy. Don’t do this to me.”

Chuuya reached up to slap the back of his nape. “Can you fucking stop talking like I’m not in the goddamn —“

FIRE LORD raised one hand, mimicking a slap.

They stilled.

“Not a chance you can give us our map and let us off with some verbal humiliation?” Dazai tried one last time, with his most convincing smile. “I’m sure it would blow off some steam. And it wouldn’t waste your wine.”

“Drink,” the table chorused.

“I’m gonna strangle you,” Chuuya let him know.

Gingerly, they reached for the wine.

Dazai’s expectations were defied. It took less than a glass.

“And that’s,” Chuuya stuttered, engulfed in a Hot Chicken Wings’ jacket — so big his gesturing hands were lost somewhere around its elbows, “And that’s —” He insisted, nearing his face to that of the woman who had sat him on her lap like a misbehaving child, “That, my new, beautiful, beautiful friends, is why the goddamn streetlights are the — the reason,” He squinted. “The reason. Yes. What are they so tall for? Narcissism?” He slammed his hands on the table. “No mind. Who’s up for an arm wrestling duel?”

The women around him cheered.

“You know who else is fucking tall for no fucking reason?” he snapped, in the middle of the contests — no Tainted and no mind for the easy defeats from the bikers’ biceps. “That bastard Dazai. Fucking beanpole. Ha! He thinks he’s the goddamn Tokyo Tower. Milk? I’ve seen his fridge! He doesn’t even have a fridge, how would he have milk? Store it in the fucking bandages?”

“Nightly supermarkets,” one of the women proposed.

He gasped. “That cheater.”

The crowd clapped again.

Chuuya bowed with wide motions; one of them — ANGEL DEATH — straightened him up before he could fall. He looked at her upside down, blinking confusedly.

“Oh my God,” he gasped, eyes turning into bowling balls. “Hirose Fumiko?”

“She is a formidable specimen,” ANGEL DEATH agreed. “I am flattered.”

Promptly, Chuuya kowtowed in front of her.

“You were not lying,” FIRE LORD said, a bit disappointedly, from where she had sat on the boy’s now free chair. “Lightweight.”

“We would have run ourselves over by ten seconds if he had been driving in that state,” Dazai informed, idly sipping on the first glass of wine. Chuuya’s own was almost empty, to be fair — and it was way bigger than normal. Watching his eyes gather tears as he pulled ANGEL DEATH’s pants, he made a face. “You’re a mean one, FIRE LORD. As cruel as beautiful. I’m gonna have to drag him to steal a new car by the ankles.”

“Call me Firey,” the woman clicked her glass with his, before downing a good half of it in one go. “I can help you with the vehicle. As an honor bound apology for falsely accusing you. My lady, back at home — she’s like him.”

“My condolences.”

“Love is a stronger chain than hardships.”

Chuuya climbed on the table, disheveled and bright eyed, beating his hands on his chest. “Get me a microphone!” he screamed, just loud enough to call the attention of every patron in the bar. “I will show my devotion, right now!”

Dazai stared. “So is hatred.”

“Mackerel,” A weight of thousands of rocks landed on him — he only barely managed to keep upright as Chuuya blinked unfocused eyes up at him, speechless, attempting to point at the group of women behind him. “Hirose Fumiko.”

“Yes, that’s wonderful,” he swore.

“Mackerel.”

“Yes.”

“Tell Hirotsu.”

“Tell him that someone ought to kick you out of the Mafia for embarrassing conduct?”

“The —” His eyes seemed to zoom out. “The babysitting bill. Lost my tongue.”

“I think you do have your tongue,” Dazai supplied, helpfully. “Though the world would be given a service if you did lose it.”

“No,” Chuuya insisted. He opened his mouth far too wide; choked. “The fucking biker polly pockets took it from me. That’s why they’re so evil. All the evil is stored in the pockets. All of it. And I’m better with a motorcycle —”

“He’s joking,” he assured, slapping his hand on his mouth so fast, the boy gasped as if he had been shot. Dazai smiled up at Firey. “He’s stupid. Stupider than a rock, really. Don’t mind him.”

“The French are coming,” Chuuya swore, through his drool-lined fingers. “With the polly pockets and with the fucking streetlights.”

“No, they came last year. Verlaine?”

“Silence!” he cried out — then he tore himself from his grasp; with Tainted appearing out of nowhere, he started to float up to the ceiling.

“Was your Boss truly clever to send out two brats to deal with something as delicate as you say?” Firey questioned, watching as Dazai hooked two fingers on the hem of Chuuya’s shirt, holding him like a balloon. “It does seem awfully important.”

“I’ll let you know that we are renowned in our field,” Dazai replied, doing his best to ignore the fake leaves Chuuya was ripping from the ceiling, to throw them to his head like bullets — before they got nullified. “Forgive us if we didn’t quite account for you. Is there any way we can help you find your wine?”

FIRE LORD curled an eyebrow. “You’d do it?”

Dazai shrugged. “It was a nice evening, all things accounted for,” He nodded to his makeshift balloon. “And Slug here is gonna be mad if he learns we haven’t helped out some cool women in trouble. He has this pseudo sister, you see —“

“One word,” Chuuya said, immediately.

“Whatever you say.”

“I appreciate the gesture, kid. I’m afraid there’s not much to be done, though,” Firey shrugged. Her eyes turned cruelly sharp. “I suspect our rival gang might be responsible.”

Chuuya somersaulted clumsily, directing a dramatic gasp! to their direction. “Rival gangs — Mackerel.”

“Yes.”

“Like — Tanaki’s dramas. Mackerel.”

“Like your life, you —“ Dazai sighed. “I do have contacts. What’s this gang name?”

“White Lotus.”

He froze.

With a surprised yelp, Chuuya landed on the ground, limbs sprawled and glass broken. The jacket covered him entirely, like a sheet on a corpse; one of the bikers reached out to tie his shoelaces.

“Gun collection,” Chuuya mumbled. “The Lotus bastards,” He hiccuped. “Mori is so old.”

“Well, my lethal Firey,” He smiled. “If you can bring us to them, I think we might catch two birds with one stone.”

The Switzerland Hot Chicken Wings’ did not have phone numbers; instead, once the group, Dazai, and a hangover Chuuya stood in the middle of a knocked out circle of White Lotus men, they offered them two pink jackets with an address. If they carried any resentment for how Chuuya had blabbered the whole night away, and throw up on two of their bikes, they didn’t show it; in fact, they seemed to hug him tighter than Dazai.

“Train with beer, baby chick,” ANGEL DEATH let him know, patting his shoulders.
“Remember — little glasses. You can become a stronger man. We will meet again, and your liver will be deeper than a woman’s heart.”

“Yeah,” Chuuya muttered, red as a beetle, kissing her knuckles. Dazai had the bad feeling he would pay for it. “I’ll do my best, ma’am.”

---

...

---

Forced cooperation came in shapes.

Dazai had naively thought a balance had been reached in Yokohama, when they had been making a name for themselves; said Double Black name, though, was full of unexplored corners. And they both lacked patience.

Given Mori’s radio silence, they had no real possibility not to try anyway.

January was spent tip-toeing.

The name on their enemies’ lips was fresh, and the snow under their feet always grew red before anyone expected it. The myth of the devils of Yokohama had flown over the borders — no one had believed it quite enough, though.

After a massacre, they cornered a bunch of kids from the closest Arcade and bet all their coins on Dazai’s good aim. Once they realized the gun he was holding was real, the bet was quickly called off — and the coins lasted for a good five hours.

It might be sensible to remind you what your funds are for, Hirotsu’s update email let them know that same night. They scratched their heads for a bit about how he’d known — eventually, they got distracted by the umpteenth P.S. note on the babysitting union, which they had scribbled fake signatures and drawings of children on a leash on before sending it back to Hirotsu.

“He’ll hang it on his fridge,” Chuuya told him, unconcernedly peeing while Dazai took a bath in some Ukrainian motel bathroom. “He’s kept every single mean drawing we’ve ever done for him during a meeting, did you know?”

“Of course,” Dazai sniffed. “He’s not one to know better.”

That same night, they put a bomb on the wagon of a train, and waited until the boss of the Red Fly Lillies was done crying on the wretched carcass of her sister's body, to be told where to store their money.

---

...

---

February and March were mosquitos bites inside their ears, and the suffocating knowledge of never being alone.

Chuuya lacked shame.

I hardly mean to offend you, Kouyou had been far too quick to tut, when her protégée had spluttered at her declaration. They had been caught steps from the women's bathrooms at the Headquarters — Chuuya still quite perplexed by Dazai's exasperated insistence that they couldn't simply walk in and get more shampoo. There's a difference between shameleness and a lack of sense of shame. It's rather amusing. Now scram.

Calling it naivety would have been more than a disservice. The Sheep had shared makeshift beds, and they had shared used-up bandages, and they had shared the snot dripping from their noses.

Nudity bore the same weight as an eccentric — but mostly inconsequential — raincoat.

“— and they swear the data is correct, but I went by the calculations myself, and they mean jack shit,” Chuuya grunted, toweling his hair with enough viciousness to rip it off the scalp. “If I find out you've corrupted my datas again, you slimy asshole, I swear to —”

“Chuuya is always accusing me,” Dazai was quick to whine, biting his tongue to squint at the stitches he was currently sewing on his calf.

“Chuuya has reason to.”

“Just because I changed your mission info once or twice it hardly means —”

“You sent me,” he cut him off, with feeling, “To Alaska. The meeting was on third floor —”

“And Elise loved the souvenirs.”

He threw the towel on his face.

It didn't change much — the boy had been naked since he had stepped out of the bathroom. The apartment they had broken in was lived in but cold with it; the endless mirrors scattered around the walls were covered in old handprints and dust coagulations.

Dazai, however, did have shame. He threw the needle and the spare cotton puffs on the floor; rolled onto his stomach on the bed and only stared at the line of Chuuya's spine from a reflection.

"You hate emails, anyway," he recited, when the widest of the scars between his sharp shoulders grew pink with after-shower heat.

Chuuya had more scar tissue than he had skin — it was so well plastered to his flesh, though, that it hardly seemed more conspicuous than the freckles.

They were rather ugly. They were stuck anyway.

"Yeah, 'cause they're a scam," Chuuya said, skipping over the fallen bullets and reports to find his clothes. "And everyone with a shred of social adjustment knows —"

His rant was a familiar tune. "This is the fourth time a foreign syndicate warns us about a supposed storm that is coming," he interrupted, thinking back to the Chinese Boss' last words. "Do you think maybe the Dragon Head Conflict was more trouble than it was worth?"

"What," Chuuya snorted, scratching the bullet scar on his chest. Dazai recalled the sound of a parking lot crashing against the ground; the grip of Matsuda's arms around his middle. "The five hundred billion yen? Sure."

Muscles shifted underneath his skin with each step; rolling down his forearms and thighs the same way things seemed to do when Corruption was activated. His toes dragged on the moquette, red and bruised — Dazai recalled the sound of his clothes having to be torn from his skin, fixed with blood like a persistent bandaid.

Beauty is hardly a reliable bias, Mori liked to say. Chuuya's hips were covered in freckles.

"Hey," When he blinked, moving his eyes from the broad expanse of his clavicles on the oval mirror on the shelf — and why wasn't Dazai such a good fit for his bones, anyway? Shortness should have followed unsettled growth spurts. Why was he lanky and screeching; like a sheet on a child playing ghost? — Chuuya was bent over him, in a grey shirt that was not their own and boxers that were Dazai's. "I don't care if the torture damaged your brain. I don't care about conspiracies either. You're writing the next report."

"Of course," he lied, easily.

But Chuuya got under the covers of the only bed a beat later — building a pillow line between them; loudly arguing about it — and Dazai forgot to argue his case more convincingly.

Chuuya lacked shame. The only dislikeable things in existence were the ones he disliked.

Dazai wasn't allowed to pee while he was showering, not even when it was urgent, no, you stinky fish — but he had bought a bear-shaped nail cutter, and at times, he would grab Dazai's hands and do the unrequested. He wore layer upon layer of a suit that was still coming onto its stable form — he used Dazai's discarded tie to get his hair out of his face when he was extracting glass shards from his wounds.

He ate food with Dazai's teeth marks all over the edges — he got mad enough about Dazai using his shampoo to let a bullet graze him during a shootout. Dazai stared at his hands whenever he took off his gloves, and Chuuya never told him to quit it.

He bled all over Dazai's hands, and he was somewhat quiet in the aftermath.

“Las Vegas?” he read, one week and two power-asserting massacres later — face hidden underneath the hood of a gray hoodie that reminded Dazai of a fool with his friend's knife in his side. “Doesn't Ace always say it's too obvious of a place to hide money in?” He lowered his tone, sleep-deprivation seeping in the imitation: “A den of faux jewelry embellished white patrons with narcissistic delusions of cinematic grandeur.”

The Calgary Airport's flight information displays shone a horrifyingly blue light on the white marble of the floors.

Behind the windows it was night in the ways of reluctantly getting out of bed for water; the little crowd carried eyebags bluer than their suitcases, listening to the late announcements with murderous intent.

“That's precisely why no one will check,” Dazai replied around a yawn. When Chuuya tried to stick his disgusting energetic bar in it, he kicked his shins. “Simple men think the way Ace does. I had Ango spread a voice that the Demon Prodigy himself is taking care of the placement — They will assume I'm craftier than that.”

“Everyone makes mistakes.”

He steadily ignored him. “I even had them whisper about a supposed artificial island I'm having someone build in the Pacific —“

Chuuya's eyebrows touched his hairline. “And who is building you this island, again?”

“This one very obedient dog in a hat — I'm assuming he could just punch through the seas and drag the earth up or something —“

The endless spit of insults the boy directed his way was drowned out by the announcement of 3 A.M. flights, echoing across the flickering lights of lunch spots and souvenirs. Dazai had bought a little superhero keychain for Odasaku; it currently hung from the shell of his ear, flicked by Chuuya's fingers whenever sleep seemed to take them over.

Some late travelers hurried through the doors, almost slipping on their suitcases — the current of ice-lake air that slithered in raised goosebumps on every inch on his skin, awakening a sleeping newborn in nearby seats.

“I miss Yokohama,” Chuuya huffed, as if the temperatures would have been any better. He glanced nastily at the doors; but he still kicked an abandoned piece of trash, watching it glow red as it closed them by itself. “At least the cold makes sense, there.”

“That’s stupid,” Dazai replied, honestly. It was a gleeful pastime — saying the obvious. It made Chuuya’s lips tremble with something, and it was always more amusing than his own skull.

He huddled inside his coat, plastering his chest against Chuuya’s back. The boy did his best to shrug him off, dragging him around the mostly empty hall like a makeshift overcoat — Dazai tied his whipping sleeves around his struggling body, knotting it tight.

“You’re stickier than an eleven years old’s snot,” Chuuya grunted. “If you’re putting itching dust in my clothes again —“

He whined. “We’re about to get stuck on an economic flight for almost five hours. Would you mind briefly experiencing the wonders of positive assumptions?”

“Would you mind not putting yourself and the word positive in the same context?”

“Would you mind not —“

The newborn tore his lungs out crying.

Technically, the Port Mafia had an endless number of traveling resources on the palm of its bloodied hands — staff working at every airport in Yokohama; flying companies held underneath their thumb; Embassy-like quantities of private jets collections to assure Kouyou’s delicate kimonos would never touch the old fabric of plane seats.

Private jets had been wiped off their tools the moment Dazai had filed Chuuya’s information as emotional support dog and their resulting brawl had blown up the jet itself.

Chuuya humpf-ed. The call for their flight came through the intercom. Dazai wiped the last of the sneezing powder on his waistcoat, and then pulled the boy towards the check-in.

“Come on,” he said. “I’ll teach you how to cheat at poker. You’re not embarrassing me in the land of free debt.”

Underneath lilac and blue chandeliers in a Casino of Las Vegas, Chuuya pulled an offensive amount of fiches close — a perfect match to the ones Dazai had won from eye-ticking old men in suits. The wink sent in his direction was sharper than a blade; the lights bouncing off the dangling chain slashed his face in two.

“You came too late,” he let him know, in the tone that spelled the Flags’ names out.

It was Dazai’s turn to humpf, smile stuck to his face like carvings on a stone statue.

Their target was dancing absently upon the closest table — according to schedule, she would keep doing so for the next five hours. He blinked at the mess of cards on the table — then he gathered a deck and stuck some fiches down his shirt, before grabbing Chuuya's harness and raising his gun to shoot the dancer three times square.

"The bite to the curb will have to wait," he commented, under Chuuya's groan and the shrieks arising on the blood-splattered faces around them. "We have to settle this score immediately."

The police started a search party that lasted the entire night. Dazai and Chuuya stole a radio from one of the Casino guards, and used it to offer the other policemen directions for sightings of themselves in their most high-pitched tone. They hid inside an old box underneath a rust-covered bridge, and played poker until Dazai's almost consecutive wins got him accused of cheating; and until the whoever wins this wins everything round swayed in Chuuya's favor — which he threw all the fiches inside a nearby mermaid-shaped fountain for.

---

...

---

Lately, Chuuya was quiet.

Not in the way he had been under Dante's spell; not in the way Dazai was sometimes called, either. It was its own kind of soundlessness; as loud mouthed as before, but lined in something rusted and too knowing — to afford the blind cockiness he'd worn like a crown in his youth.

Perhaps it was grief. The Sheep; the Flags; his squad; the Orphanage; the collateral damage of the thing in his veins. Perhaps it was Arahabaki, and the way Chuuya scratched him off himself when he got distracted.

Perhaps it was being seventeen years old, and Tanaki's sighs had had a point.

"Show it to me again," Chuuya ordered, studying his cuffed hands intently. The lights of the diner were a weight on their impatient bones; their contact was late. Dazai considered killing him, just for that.

"It's terribly easy," he insisted.

"It's not easy, you're just weird."

"Or, you're stupid."

"I'll get it. Just one more time."

“Sure.” His hairpin moved seamlessly inside the lock; with a snap of his fingers, the handcuffs fell on the table. Chuuya’s frown grew deeper and deeper. “Dear, there really is nothing up there, ah?”

They started a fight. It was a lucky deal; as he had expected, their contact had meant to betray them from the first moment.

The seemingly innocent crowd jumped to its feet right as they did, misunderstanding the violence splattered across their bodies; in a mess of limbs and the pulse of Chuuya’s Ability, the dam was rebuilt. Then they sat under flickering lights and blood pooling from the ceiling until sunrise, muttering about the handcuffs.

Dazai trapped Chuuya’s ankle between his own; he let him make fun of his sugary coffee. He ate with a split lip.

Three days later, Dazai stepped on a mine.

“I am truly glad your amusement demands so little to be satisfied,” he made sure to say, teeth gritted and body incredibly still, as he watched the boy roll on his back from laughter inside the river. The Korean border was quiet at dawn; the sound of his giggles was probably going to start a war. “No wonder that hat is stuck to your head. It must be eating your brain like a leech.”

“This is hilarious, shut the fuck up,” Chuuya gasped, soaked from his fall. “Mister, I have memorized the mine map, don’t even worry about it —“

“Yes,” Dazai snapped, “I did. This is a clear suicide attempt. I knew what I was doing.”

“Oh, did you?”

“Yes.”

“Alright,” he encouraged, sitting back on his heels. He motioned. “Go on.”

He set his jaw. “Mori will get mad if I blow you up too.”

The crimson light of his Ability shone on the boy’s frame. “You won’t.”

“I’m not dying with you, I keep telling you. This flirtation of yours won’t work. You’re even more pathetic than a dog. Give it up.”

Chuuya climbed to his feet, brushing dust that wasn’t there off his pants. “Alright, then,” He made to step away from the river.

“I have simply —“ Dazai called, too quickly. When the boy turned, eyebrow curled, he stood as straight as possible, glancing uncaringly at the sky. “— decided death by mine won’t be painless.”

“Oh, have you?”

“Do you even know how to unlock a —“

“Ah,” Chuuya smiled brilliantly at him. His head pounded; Dazai suddenly realized he had never been more irritated in his life. Reaching with his hands, stopped by his necessary stillness, he watched his hands flex with a need to grab his skull and rattle. ““Guess we’ll find out, yes?”

Between unreleased and yet overly shown tension and their endless strings of victories — one hundred percent rate of success, the reports swore; never seen before — April exploded in their faces — not unlike the weapon factory in rural Portugal they were tasked with destroying. It left Dazai with severely burned hands no amount of creams would save from scarring.

“I can change them,” Chuuya offered, that night, seated on the ground of their lock-picked apartment with the silver flask Hirotsu had gifted him. He wasn’t quite framed by the open door of the bathroom Dazai had stuck himself in; only its yellowish light illuminated him. “If you want.”

Dazai, naked but for his bandages, dangled his head from the edge of the empty bathtub. He studied the choker-less neck of his observer, and the slightly paler line it left around his throat.

His hands pulsed with every stream of smoke from the cigarette he’d started just to mock the wounds. The bandages were wet. They were suffocating and unkept. They were all he had.

Odasaku, he thought. He had to have seen under the bandages when he’d patched him up.

He had to have had questions. He hadn’t asked them; if Dazai could have a say on it, he never would. He didn’t fear judgement; he didn’t even quite care — caring was hardly useful and easily manipulated. Childish. He didn’t want to, still — because.

Dazai knew he called for him, sometimes. Chuuya had told him. Ango too, sometimes. Can you give me a lift? Can you buy me another glass? Can you give me an answer that won’t bleed me dry?

“Not yet,” he said.

The boy hummed.

“Tell me,” Chuuya would say, other times.

“Tried to hang myself while you were out,” Dazai would reply, throwing a ball to the ceiling and catching it as it fell — who cared if it was a prison or a hotel room, as long as it was unnerving. “Thought about overdosing, but it seemed like too much work. Tried to drown myself in the bathtub, four days ago. Ate that one traditional poison from this area. Stuck my head out on an Amusement Park ride, but nothing cut it off.”

Chuuya would hum.

Perhaps, he thought it made him appear particularly indifferent to those grim lists of his. Chuuya never looked concerned; just angry.

He was always getting angry, and never doing anything about it — and Dazai was always dying, and never dead.

“It’s a double mission for a reason,” Chuuya told him, one afternoon, in Greece, after coaxing him out of a window seal with one yeah, hope you do it and two threats to call Mori; and a face, a certain face — one that made Dazai mourn the chance to annoy him that killing himself right then would have taken from him. “You can’t die on me.”

“I don’t think being partners gives you any right to interfere with my life mission,” Dazai replied, offended. The doctor’s latest security camera: a dog’s bleeding heart.

He added: “Don’t let them think you don’t want me dead.”

“They can think what they want,” Chuuya replied, his thumbs digging into a cut a sharp edge had left on his jaw. He wanted to ask him how he knew; that Dazai hated pain and had nothing quite similar — that he would scrub at it all night, like an urge he wasn’t allowed to act on. Then he thought of his gloved nails down his scarred arms, and — “You and I know.”

“Do we?”

“I’m not a river or a rope,” he replied. “And there are just enough Smash Smash! rounds I can win to grant me your death.”

He snorted; choked on something too rusty to be blood and too sincere to be his tongue — and that night he slept inside the bathtub, and Chuuya pretended not to lay right where the bathroom could be seen from the bed. “I’d rather die.”

“You will. Tell me.”

He did.

Enemies barely managed to hurt them; it made for boring days of a beautiful season, so they took the matter on their own hands. Dazai wasted lives; Chuuya wasted his own. Dazai spat and prodded and pulled and touched and ruined the canva he had not allowed himself to paint, and Chuuya took it all in stride and doubled it with the sharpness of his brother’s eyes. Double, double, double —

“I’m your partner and you’re my dog for life,” Dazai told him, the next time they broke into a fight during a mission. “Deal with it.”

Not the last of it; maybe never so — but a rift all the same. I can hate the shape of myself for fitting with yours, one of Ango’s books had said, but my wounds cannot change it. Sometimes, when the work was done, he would sit in front of the TV and ask, what’s your least favorite movie?

A crown of black spread around Chuuya’s golden eye. He wanted to touch the retina itself; see if Arahabaki would flinch. You know me. “You deal with it first.”

They got stuck in Baltimore with high school kids who were probably innocent, and when their youth sagged his throat to the point of vomit, he leaned his cheek on Chuuya's back as he emptied out his poison in the toilet.

Haven't you built a tolerance yet?, he never asked him. Not enough, he would have answered.

The days were long. They skipped all lessons that would not gain them questions, though Chuuya always skipped less — though Chuuya would never admit the puzzled carefulness with which he studied every inch of a classroom.

Not something he wanted; not something he understood; not an itch he would leave alone.

"I don't get it," he would say, sometimes, when they sneaked on the roof and stole lunch off each others' trays. Hirotsu had sent them a letter through the encrypted line — congratulated them on a recent massacre near Boston.

"Unsurprising," Dazai would reply. "What don't you get?"

Chuuya never answered.

It was fine. It was pointless and never ending — he enjoyed causing troubles with the school server, and Chuuya enjoyed playing dodgeball. He would have accused him of using his Ability to win, if the arms he showed off — with that horrifying, vomit-colored sleeveless gym shirt the school forced them to wear — hadn't put him to the ground one too many times.

Whenever Dazai went down — when the teacher did not allow the two-against-all match they kept sending kids to the Infirmary through — Chuuya would lean over him, all bony knees and gloved hands no one dared to question.

"Who knows," he'd muse, "Perhaps that hit will fix your head."

It never did.

"You need to do my Physics homework," Dazai told him, dim in the silence of the bathroom. His toes brushed the opposite wall; he leaned his weight on Chuuya's never-fragile frame — unfocused on the curses between his spit. "And I need to charm Charlotte Hastings into letting us in that party."

"Those," Chuuya coughed, between spits, "Are widely different missions."

"You're the smart one."

"You're literally the smart one."

"No," Unprompted, Dazai sat up. He rammed his fist so viciously against the boy's back, all the poison came out in one go, shaking his frame with painful relief. Dazai pulled his hair back; knotted them, just to make it all but an act of kindness. "I'm the strong one."

What did it matter, outside of Yokohama? They existed to keep that city safe — on the other side of the border, they only existed to scourge. Decimate. Throw up in the toilet and wear dirty bandages.

Dear Odasaku, he wrote, in his next email. Do not tell anyone. I find myself wishing to go home.

---

...

---

The tattoo on his nape only hurt when Dazai forgot about it.

Somewhere in an underground ship cell on its way to Novorossiysk, as some brute's punch attempted to fracture his jaw — the sweat pooling down his skin refreshed his memory.

Mori hadn't done more than shrug when they'd reported the penalties of their lost bet. Do not ridicule yourselves, he'd told them, handing a purely fuming Chuuya some stolen tattooing set. But that was a given he had been made to ignore, so he'd dragged unprepared hands to his nape on the unmade bed of his shipping container.

It would have been funnier, he considered, if that scaredy cat of his partner hadn't secretly taken lessons for it.

It had taken the whole day. Dazai had moved as much as he could, deaf to his makeshift tattoo artist's snarls and pinches. The needles had hardly even tickled; the smell of dying flesh might as well have been part of his nostrils.

"Seriously," Chuuya had barked, "Do you want to be stuck with this shit looking good or not?"

There was something to obsess over — Chuuya's genuine attempts at something decent, and the way he had to tuck his hair behind his ears to squint at the reference of Kouyou's own tattoo. He would push the tattooing gun harder with each remark Dazai offered; he hadn't asked to remove the bandages on his nape, apart from moving them aside.

Want a picture or something?, Chuuya had asked, throwing his gloves away.

An assortment of sincerity and hostility drowned whatever existed between them with persistence. No, he'd told him. He hadn't thanked him — hadn't dared to put into words how his skin had no strength to form goosebumps when it thought about strangers' hands doing that work. Want a tattoo?

The boy had soundly refused.

By the end of the night, as he slept, Chuuya had been gifted the small outline of a dog, on his underfoot. As far as Dazai knew, he hadn't noticed yet.

"Leave them to starve," the man smirked, in a breathy Russian, as Dazai heaved from the punch to the jaw. Both he and his companion wore bright blue uniforms; it matched the decorations on the ship. "'Heard it makes the bitches more useful."

Chained against his back and dripping blood on Dazai's shoulder, Chuuya offered the only Russian words he'd picked up: "Go down on your rotten grandmother."

It gained him a broken nose — hit with enough force to crack both the wooden seats they'd been tied on — before the two men decided to slam the cell bars close and leave.

"They took my phone," Dazai whined, once their harsh breathings had subdued. The cell was mostly dark; the insistent swaying of the ship was nauseating. "Chuu The Slug better be okay."

"If you don't stop it with that name," Chuuya warned, slightly nasal, knocking his skull against his own.

"I heard you call your phone charm shitty dead fish. That's a name."

"That's an affirmation!"

"All of this," Dazai sighed. "All this for some senator's adventurous wife."

Five hundred billion yen was — to put it kindly — an aggravating sum. Those months had been a seamless, dirty assortment of solutions: stealing secure bases across the globe to store part of the fortune; destroying organizations who were talking about part of the fortune too hungrily — and making favors to senators to justify their borderline mental bank movements.

Senator Masayoshi was only one corrupt man in a crowd of corrupted men. Their payment was the White Wolves — the organization he had once funded, before betrayal had come in the shape of a scam and his wife's relationship with one of the commanders.

"He just wants them annihilated," Chuuya had concluded, after browsing through the report. "He'd enjoy the commander's dick on a silver plate, for his wife."

The chances they would follow the suggested plans were slim. But Mori had gone through such trouble after the Special Division had polished the magnifying glass they kept pointing at them — a refusal to write non-coded documents; the presence of the Mori Corporations logo on everything they reported — that Chuuya never ignored them completely.

Sometimes, when his unmatching eyes were fixed on some target he could not see, Dazai suspected some kind of guilt must abide him.

The knowledge that the lack of an Ability Permit was partially to blame on him — maybe the chirps of Vice-Executive Nakahara he sometimes allowed to straighten his back. Except insecurity had no room to devour in such a tiny body.

“So,” Chuuya concluded, once the steps had faded in the distance. “Flowers of Buffoonery?”

“Obviously. Go.”

“What? Why me?”

“Because I have weak knee joints,” Dazai noted. “And because you’re vertically challenged. I don’t have time to go over this with you again.”

“I did it last time. We agreed to switch.”

“Promise thirty-four does not include —“

“Fuck you,” Chuuya slammed the seat backwards, rattling their handcuffed hands. The metal had stuck them to the back of the chairs, too close for his Ability to work. It was rarely an ideal situation — a technically powerless Chuuya usually meant a pissed off Chuuya; who would do his very best to remind the world why he was known as the best martial artist in the Port Mafia before any god and gravity user title. “You deleted my last save on Dragon Files. You owe me.”

Dazai whined.

Lower body strength was more of the other boy’s business, considering his adeptness to kicks; nonetheless, he planted himself sturdier against the seat and jumped.

It took some tries for his shoes to land on the chair. An assortment of curses and sharp bones welcomed his backwards climb, as he turned his wrists inside the pinned cuffs to settle his soles on Chuuya’s chair, next to his knees. The binds pulled painfully at his beaten up shoulders, as he dropped his weight on the boy’s thighs.

“You need to cut back on the canned crab,” Chuuya grunted.

“Maybe it’s for best that we did it this way,” Dazai bared his teeth and leaned down, searching for the hidden pin in the buckle of his choker. “Whatever bones those brutes didn’t manage to break, you would have snapped them with that fat backside of yours.”

His head knocked against his own, hard. The dim lights showed him a bleeding nose; if Tainted could have worked, the irritation in his gaze would have forced it to. “I’ve seen trucks of dog shit weigh less than you.”

“Getting friendly with your family?”

“Trying to fatten up to fit your ego? Hey — Don’t fucking bite me, you fucking animal —“

Eventually, he spit the needle in his hands, humming as he worked on the locks of both their handcuffs — trapped between the clammy breath on the bandages left on his neck and the lulling motions of the ship.

Metal hit the ground. “Fuckin’ hell, my back,” Chuuya scoffed, in that sharply promising way of his, all violent oaths.

He pressed his forehead against Dazai’s own, quicker than a heartbeat and warmer than summer; perhaps the hysteria of the seventeen hours they’d spent there. Dazai saw nothing but the moon, dancing between golden craters and blue shades. “Good enough, partner. Now get your ass off.”

The ship corridors were vast and extremely luxurious; they didn’t meet any passengers, but had to get creative when they spotted guards near the doors to the deck.

Chuuya knocked out the third they met; he passed the woman’s guns to him, and Dazai made sure to target the hidden cameras. The moment the glass exploded, a blinding red light appeared from all around them.

Alarms started to blare.

“Genius planning,” Chuuya screamed, over the chaos.

“Thank you!” Dazai replied.

It took no time for a crowd of guards to show up at both ends of the corridor. Without a word, they threw themselves against the bullets.

Dying was amongst the hardest things Dazai had ever attempted. Not a single projectile touched him, as he made his way towards the ranks with both guns flaring, eyes settled on the metal door at the end of the corridor.

The deck was mostly empty, illuminated by a silvery moonlight. The sounds of Chuuya’s massacre echoed behind him as he shot a portion of the pavement crossed by a x — the unsubtle, still useful indication of a Russian man the Port Mafia had bought with less money than he could have asked for.

One of the guards managed to climb out of the stairs, dripping blood. “Vy ne mozhete byt' — “ the White Wolf tried to say, hands lighting up in the unmistakable shade of an Ability — Dazai let the shards of the lounging wooden chair fly to his face, and rolled underneath them to stick the knife in his hands into his chest — deep enough for his naked hands to touch his viscera.

He died nullified. Dazai ripped one of his eyeballs off, for good measure — and used it to open the facial recognition lock of the security safe hidden in the fake-hole under the floor.

“Japanese translation too, really?” he muttered, studying the documents inside the little case. “It’s like he wanted us to steal them.”

The ship began to sink the moment the first explosion bloomed from the ground floor.

Like the clockwork of a particularly fed up machinery, explosions began to go off as he hid the last of the important dossiers under his shirt.

“Impatient dog,” he muttered, as he walked through the screaming passengers running to the deck; the corpses being devoured by the smoke appearing from the stairs. Another explosion went off; Dazai landed some stone-throws away.

The hit to the head pissed him off more than anything else — not nearly vicious enough to kill him; not nearly nice enough not to drool blood down his overheated face. A bird song came from the end of the hallway, more of a scream than a whistle —

A sparrow, he thought, which meant —

Distracted as he was with stomping his boot in running White Wolves’ chests, Chuuya did not feel the grasp of Dazai’s hands on the back of his chest harness — dragging him up the stairs on a ten seconds count. “Don’t you dare —“ he didn’t have time to say, before Dazai was clicking the remote he had carefully hidden in his shoe, and throwing the two of them over the deck railing.

The breaking surface of the freezing ocean was the last thing Dazai felt; Chuuya’s string of curses reached his ears even through the waves, as the boat exploded in a flower shaped disaster.

---

...

---

This isn’t the White Wolves’ main base, Dazai had explained, exploring the differences between Russian Arcades and Yokohama ones. The Senator just wanted the ship destroyed. Or, well — what was inside it.

The games still sculpted the professional edges of Chuuya’s shoulders into something more easily workable with — a kind of street even his driving-inept self would easily judge unbumped. And scamming kids was as easy there as it was everywhere else in the world; when a pair got aggressive about his bandages, Dazai removed the first circle, showing off the words he’d scribbled on his wrist with a marker.

When did you have time to stalk the little fuckers?, Chuuya had asked, cleaning the address off his wrist with saliva. Before or after you found dirt on Masayoshi?”

What makes you think I have dirt on him?

The several calls from Mori that you keep declining in the middle of the night.

Russia had been nice, he considered, as he made his way through the Hospital. Smoke-smell thick hallways and cockroaches in the shower; clean streets and the constant electric hum that seemed to sag the air. Most of all, he'd liked the silence; no other place he'd visited had managed to triumph in the art of being grievously quiet among the thousands of people they pickpocketed for fun and killed for a job — or the opposite. He didn't know.

[Russia wouldn't, to their surprise, give him pneumonia. A wrecked cabin in Canada would.

It would slow down their tracking mission of several days — most of which he'd spend wrapped in every blanket a particularly peeved, perpetually muttering Chuuya would steal from adventurous explorers after knocking them out, sinking into steaming baths all the way to his nose, no matter how violently red and sensitive his skin would be after, digesting more fluids than he ever wanted to see again —

(And the antibiotics. He had a vague memory of those showdowns; brawling across the wooden floor and pulling hair and biting hands as Chuuya attempted to get a spoon stuck down his throat, and spitting the disgraceful medicine right in the other boy's face — pretending Mori hadn't forced him through more bitter, more disgusting solutions. The damn antibiotics.)

— and relearning the redhead's heartbeat, head always in his lap but never closer; lulled by Chuuya's mumbled insults and his tendency to wrap his arms around his head and strangle the stupid out of him.

He'd gotten pneumonia once already, when he was much younger. It had felt distinctively colder — he mused, sometimes].

All of it had been nice, and utterly boring, and devastatingly repetitive — like the scars on Chuuya's face that mixed with the freckles and made him lose count every time.

"Finally," the man at the entrance desk huffed, juggling thick dossiers. "It's been three days, sir. Your cousin has started several fights with the staff, tried to escape the premises seven times, and kicked two holes on the wall of his room. We had to move him! Never saw a victim of a sinking ship so pissed off. With all due respect, we are very willing to sedate him again."

"That's just how he is," Dazai sighed.

Blame overflowed on his pale features. "You could have come sooner."

He could have — had he not abandoned Chuuya's passed out body to the shore after they had swam through half the bay. "I've been busy!"

His skeptical expression spoke more than any word he did not say; he sent him on his way, and Dazai made sure to snatch some pills off the first passing trail he bumped against. He detoured; he smiled at doctors and nurses who found him where they shouldn't — he stole morphine from the IVs of some rooms he hid in.

The promises of sedation had already come to fruition: when he kicked the door of the two-bed room open, Chuuya's battered body was asleep — drool on his pillow and a clearly annoyed expression painted on his features.

“Look at you, lazing around,” he lamented, abandoning his coat on the guest seat.

He wriggled in the small space between the boy's side and the metal railing of the bed, pulling and knitting the IVs stuck in his sun-kissed skin — muttering as he moved his head and his cascade of hair out of his face.

“Kouyou keeps calling your stupid phone,” he informed. “I only answered once, and told her you've finally fallen to your demise. For some reason, the calls only increased after that.”

Dozing-off mumbles came from the other side of the curtain, separating the two beds; Dazai studied the rapid climb of the moon outside the fogged up window, as the sky painted that snowy room in shades of copper. He pushed his head forward, the way Kazuko used to do to gain the attention of his bite-stricken palm — and planted his ear where Chuuya's heartbeat would echo.

Odasaku had once said, distractedly — flares are beautiful because they are occasional.

The face Ango made when he said something outrageous; Hirotsu's sighs; Odasaku's blank-faced warmth, his refusal to judge, his refusal to kneel, his refusal to let him pay for his drink at Bar Lupin. Blood, sometimes. Stitches, others. Bandages. Elise's ephemeral finger pinning flower hairpins to his head — just far away enough from Mori that their resemblance was easy to miss.

Perhaps Odasaku would understand, he considered.

Chuuya can be bothered in every inch of the globe, he reminded himself. Perhaps it was easier in the corners where few knew of his light — where there were no subordinates with glinting eyes and offering lighters; men who would have plastered their forehead on the scorching hot concrete to be kicked by his dog shoes.

Perhaps it was easier in dirty motels where he had no choice but to lay his hyperactive eyes on Dazai's coming-undone lines — for, willing or unwilling, he was the only thing alive for miles.

“I think these months of travel might be Mori's stupidest decision yet,” he informed the sleeping body underneath him, tapping his chest.

Touch bothered him the most, he knew.

Dazai cheated at video games; switched the wine in his beloved bottles with vinegar; stole all the blankets when fate or silence pushed them on the same mattress; snapped the brakes of every car he drove; scribbled on his face and bought dog whistles; stuck him in Hospitals even though he hated them with passions; broke out in want me to tell you a story? that never depended on his answer; told him nothing of what he could figure out; kept the Chuuya Is A

Sore Loser newsletter to life — and he molded his bones until they were small enough to live in the forgotten slots of his thousands shut doors, and he did it because Chuuya hated it.

Seventeen is a big number, Ango had told him. Seventeen was like every other year, to me, Odasaku had replied. Chuuya's heart spiked up and down, all wrong. He couldn't remember the last time he'd managed to sleep.

Dear Odasaku, he would write. What's the point?

He felt him wake up in his ear.

Fingers found his hair — chasms spread through his spine, pulling old scars apart; widening with every scratch of nails on the sensitive skin underneath. Sometimes, Dazai was a cat under the sunlight; sometimes he was a skeleton that could not remember the sticky grip of viscera. Sometimes he was unreal, transparent and see-through even to ghosts. He pushed his nose in the itchy fabric of the hospital gown and breathed in.

"I'm gonna deep fry your face like fucking fish," Chuuya announced, hoarse. Sedatives made him wobbly; if Dazai was lucky, he wouldn't remember a thing.

"Senator Masayoshi doesn't have a wife," he replied, extracting the dossiers and throwing them on the ribs he knew the boy had cracked. His free hand skimmed through the papers; he wondered if he'd have to beg for the remaining fingers to stay where they were. I'm training him, he would say, if asked. "He has a purchase from the sex trafficking market he tried to scam the White Wolves with."

"They keep him on a leash with the information they could release to the Japanese Government, and drain him of his money," he continued. "That's why he asked us to destroy that base. He wanted any and all upper hands to be destroyed, and he wanted the White Wolves to come after us instead — hoping his two bothers would destroy each other."

"But their main base is still active," Chuuya concluded. "So we need to get rid of it, now. And then we can be the ones with the upper hand on him."

"It's always better for the pawns to owe us a favor, than otherwise," he shrugged. "We'll get rid of them as soon as you stop lazing around."

The fingers tightened; pulled. "They kept stuffing me with morphine, motherfucker. Where the fuck where you?"

"Derailing a train," Dazai responded.

"Mmh. To make Masayoshi end up in the Hospital, I assume."

"Obviously."

"So that he'd lead us to his safe house, to gather all the existing proof we could easily sell to the Government."

He stuck one finger in an old hole of the gown, on the pelvis. He traced rising goosebumps; wrote miniature kanjis of insults that got his ear pulled. He blew a raspberry in Chuuya's side and got kicked between the legs for it. He was warm now, and it made his head spin. Warmer than the sun, than the season — than he could stand.

It was easier, he thought. Easier where no one would see what he'd been prodigious enough to secure.

"Precisely. You see, I was too busy to bring you flowers. I'll do it next time. Which one do you hate the most?"

"Mmh," Again. "You do know he's in the bed behind the curtain, right?"

His pause didn't go unnoticed.

"Of course," Dazai said, pointlessly — Arahaki knew his heart better than he did, and he would feel the lie. "That's why you fought the nurses to switch rooms, then."

"Obviously," Chuuya mocked. Raising his voice, he called: "Senator, good evening. I do hope everything is clear?"

It took an infinite time for an answer to appear.

Stuttering, the man behind the curtain gulped: "All clear."

That night, in the small television of the diner they dragged blood-soaked bodies at, the News offered worrying information: a victim of the late ship accident had escaped the Hospital. He had been caught sneaking out of the window with another silhouette, and he was yet to be identified or found. Authorities urged the local populations to communicate any information regarding the missing patient.

[As it went for Double Black, it would become a bedtime story, too. Don't sneak out, the nurses would tell the younger patients, or the Red Ghost will pull you out of the window, and you shall never be found again].

"Camellias, by the way," Chuuya said, between bites of a hamburger Dazai could see him force himself to devour until the end. Kouyou's teachings, perhaps; the effort to teach waste to someone who had starved.

"What about them?"

"The flower I hate the most," He licked sauce off his fingertips; behind the counter, a waitress kept moving her eyes from the pictures on News to their table. His fingers closed around his gun; same old, same old. "You're allergic to it, aren't you? Buy a ton. Bet they'd look cool on your grave."

His smile tore his face in two. In what world am I buried where you're not? "Bet."

---

...

---

Through all but words, Dazai learned this: Arahabaki laid dormant in all mirrors.

Perhaps reflective surfaces would have been a better definition. Eyes, even, because Chuuya had a tendency to speak meeting those. Catching the fleeting difference between a zoned out Chuuya and a Chuuya who was seeing something was the same as chasing fireflies.

Not quite what Mori's orders demanded of Dazai, either.

"He's not here, you know."

Someone else wouldn't have felt his flinch; Dazai saw it through the rear view mirror both of their eyes had settled on — from the blood-sticky backseats of some hotwired car; the heating turned all the way on. More than that, he felt it shake his legs — where the boy's half-concussed skull laid, quiet and supposedly passed out.

He pulled on the soaked strands of his hair — sweat and blood and liquified viscera, and all that the Ability Users group in that old road in Singapore had had to offer to a gloomy deity with a sharing problem.

(Arahabaki was a neighbor, Dazai would sometimes muse — only because no one but Mori would ever ask, and everyone but Mori would be a better person to tell. His picket fence was splintered, and he never waved when their gazes met from the windows. On a stormy night, he had rained on his porch, and Dazai had dried it off.

He was never quite forgiven for it.

But Arahabaki was the late owner of a sold mansion, and he had nothing left to do but turn it into a haunted playground. The new neighbors were far kinder. The ghosts would kill them, one of these days, and Dazai would clean the porch.

The ghosts wouldn't forgive. They'd be gone anyway).

"We have to cut off some strands," he told him, then, with great joy. "Some knots won't leave."

"So you tried," Chuuya observed — always one for the unsaid.

His voice was nails on chalk. His eyes were stuck on the rear view mirror. Dazai — always one for the unseen — tried to see something more than the valleys of bleeding cuts; of the rotten-golden bruises and the violet stigma of ruined flesh.

Corruption was a last resort.

It needed to be, he thought, academically — and told a skeptical Chuuya whenever the scratches on his skin grew impatient and his voice sounded too distorted over the phone. Chuuya would have dragged himself by the elbows before admitting to a wound; Arahabaki would have let him. What good is power for, if shattered?

He wondered, sometimes, if Arahabaki's unawareness was aware enough to know; to feel the unrelenting desert wind drying the walls of Dazai's mouth, the pressure of eye bags when his eye escaped from his control and widened — and settled and refused to let go of the brightest thing in existence.

The two of them were rats in a maze, and hatred amounted to nothing at all, and they both had much to waste.

“He's not there, you know,” he informed him.

(Sometimes, when it was quiet and it smelled of cigarettes, he saw Chuuya trace his scars. Too reverential for a vessel born to destroy himself in the name of manifested rage; too gentle for the way he talked about Arahabaki. But Chuuya cared for all strays, and Dazai was there, if anywhere — with the scabs of his scars, loathed and needed, and loathed some more, and in his skin).

You fool, he recalled, I'm not letting you fall.

“I know he's not.” Quiet; as enraged as ever. Then, very quietly, he began to hum.

It was the usual tune — it had taken Dazai some time to recognize it, what with his grumbling and his canine growling. It couldn't be called a song — it barely lasted more than five seconds. But he had a tendency to hum it before he slept, and the few seconds before he started bleeding out.

“Want a violin to go with that too?”

No answer.

Chuuya turned in the little space he was allowed. His skin creaked wetly against the leather of the seats, dried blood and the metal spikes of his boots leaving a mark. Corruption rarely left him in a big enough piece not to have him dragged to the nearest place that might have a needle and some thread; whenever it happened, Dazai lingered.

Sick, he considered, running his forefinger down the bridge of his half-shattered nose. The boy batted his hand away, weakly; turned to lay on his side, that same nose stubbornly sunk in the creases of Dazai's ruined shirt, his eyes far from whatever he could not see. His body was spasming, still — seizures had left him viciously breathless.

Sick and dishonest, Elise sing-sang. Find something more human to be fascinated by.

But Chuuya spent too much time passed out, and Dazai spent too much time waiting for him to wake up.

“Here’s the story,” he would say, leg numb and police cars sweeping past them; Chuuya’s feet in a puddle, to wet his socks. “You hate the dog, and the dog keeps bumping against your legs, under the table.”

“He’s the neighbor’s dog, though; everyone loves him and feeds him. You can’t cast him away. The ghosts will get mad. They always did get mad when their garden was trimmed slightly differently from the other ones. Must have thought it was important,” he would hum. “So you let the dog bump against your legs, and you let him bite at your old shoes, and when they smile at you from the end of the table, you know the dog hasn’t bitten them once. The dog only hates you. Of course, at that point — You have to hate the dog.”

“Or not,” Dazai would stick his fingers under his choker, clammy and blood-soaked. Trace the paler circle of skin left underneath; press where there was a heartbeat. “Maybe I got it backwards.”

There were little excuses for Chuuya’s fugitive fingers, brushing against him in the days immediately after — tucking hair behind his ear to brush the shelf of it, muttering about a haircut or not saying a word; punching and slapping and fighting and being mean, like a child, and afraid, like an adult; pinching him when he got too close on the bed; sinking on his throat to listen to his heartbeat.

Arahabaki’s most hated, he assumed — Dazai had to be.

“That tickles,” Chuuya muttered, face in his pillow. Buenos Aires had come with a slight curiosity for high quality rooms — soaked in more blood than any of the men at the reception would ever appreciate. “I’ll tear you apart.”

“That would be a greatly exaggerated reaction,” he let him know. In the aftermath of Corruption, he supposed his approval didn’t mean a thing.

No broken bones, which had been a nice change. The absurd amount of those spiral craters of his — under his skin but not quite ; tearing him apart but never for too long — had stubbornly refused to be stitched up, though — and the bed was paying the price.

He hoped it hurt. He knew it didn’t. Chuuya carried wounds with grace, and crossed without checking both ways.

The city was nothing but lights behind the wide windows they had forgotten to shut, in their haste to end the trail of blood disappearing through the door frame.

“Then I’ll — tickle you,” Chuuya insisted, delirant. He had smashed his own skull against the building Arahabaki had dropped him on, making a hole through several floors. “And that will teach your stupid ass.”

“Of course it will,” Dazai assured. His fingers worked quickly around the buckle of his choker, nails across leather and the swallowing motions pressed against his knuckles. He removed it and threw it in the trash. “You just need to grow tall enough to reach my ankles, how about that?”

Hands hooked themselves on his waist, right where his shirt had been ripped apart — the messy work of Argentinian busybodies, who had certainly done their best to torture him, between one slip up and another.

Bad choice, he had told them, as he waited for familiar steps down the stairs. They never listened, though.

Calling what that grasp did tickling would have been too nice on the boy's slumped muscles and absent mind; and yet, less than a blink later, Dazai was jumping ten feet away, snorting.

They stared at each other, horrified.

"No," Dazai said, immediately. His lower half was at the edge of the bed; he backed away from the dangerous glint shaking the redhead's body awake. "No. No. Hatrack. Listen to — !"

Fingers wrapped around his ankles and pulled him back into the bed. He shrieked.

The rest was a blur.

His brain registered frames and neon thoughts; Chuuya tearing apart every stitch he had given him — and if it wasn't his frantic motions, it was the nails Dazai was attempting to sink into his skeleton to get him off. They had forgotten the bathroom lights on. His foot crashed against the headboard, and he knew the bruise would last for weeks.

His body was stuck: the dying fits of cackles escaping his throat sent conflicting signals to his emptied out skull. It was overcharging to the point of tears, and every escape and kick and bite he attempted was fruitless, and Chuuya had always, always been the strong one.

"Leave me alone!" Dazai screeched, curled on himself, pushing the weight off. He was rolling in bloodied sheets and it sucked; he — "Bad dog! Bad dog!"

"We might just have a new entry to my list of revenge methods," Chuuya replied, fascinated, attempting his very best to choke the life out of him.

His face was vertiginously close, though it was all blurred — though his grin might just have been a hallucination, because Dazai wore more layers than any deity could break through, and laughing was a mere physical reaction, and that apartment was too wide for how close they stood.

But he was the mind, as the voices went; and Chuuya was not. Unsurprising and yet world-shattering — he pressed even closer; stuck their bones to each other until their hearts beat in tandem, as if genuinely convinced Dazai had either; shook the ground with the words brushed against his ear, inconsequential and everywhere he could breathe.

"Tell me a number, Mackerel," he said, and he grinned, close enough to bite, and Dazai thought, Mori will burn me alive, and he thought, inanely, if he's kind.

In the windows, when that pointless brawl gave Dazai his own concussion against a bed column and Chuuya a fallen tooth, he thought he saw black wings spurt from the boy's shoulders — an unfamiliar smile bleed down his chin.

The next day, they fought under a bridge, and slept in different beds again. He took the room with a mirror in the bathroom.

---

...

---

Dublin was rainy.

It was among his worst days; he couldn't quite recall anything else from their stay. But Dazai didn't have bad days, per se. The lingering dread was saliva on his chapped lips; it burned and it mended, and some days he was too busy to taste metal. Some days he was too busy, but the world was littered in raindrops and the thick odor of human remnants — and some days he wasn't a corpse enough.

It was a complicated thing, he would have written to Odasaku, had he found the right reason to, being a constant guest. You'll need to leave, at some point, won't you? To stop bothering those who let you in; to walk in the rain, towards —

It was a complicated thing. The house was a body, and there was nowhere to go.

"Snap out of it," Chuuya dared to snarl, at some point, pushing him against the graffitied wall of some alley they were hiding money under.

"Being so tiny certainly can't be a deal for your brain," Dazai replied, automatically.

He could have pushed him away. He could have held his naked skin and killed him.

Conflict raced between his eyes. Loyal little dog; angry never-ending god. Months of forced cooperation had shown him just how deep the rotten lines of Dazai's carcass went; Dazai knew, no matter effort, that he didn't quite see the point of pulling him from the edge.

And yet he did, cursing and spitting, soaring through unknown streets at least one night every week, until he found him at the bottom of a river or with a swing's rope wrapped around his neck. Chuuya had shot his palm to get a gun away from his forehead; had stuck his head under the shower until his lungs had accepted to breathe again.

With furious eyes and despising motions; if he didn't want him dead, he still didn't want him alive.

But he stuck. And he followed.

You can't even grab me, he wanted to tell him. His saving ways were the most selfish part of him — Dazai knew, in the way of the unspoken between the matching scars on their thumbs, that if Chuuya were to sit in front of another grave, he might never get up. If I jumped, you'd fall with me. You can't do it.

And how funny it would be, he didn't tell him. Double suicide for Double Black. They would tell bedtime stories about that, too. Bickered in life, bickered in death.

[“You'd probably find some creepy ass necromancer to make me into a — a fucking dog zombie, or some shit,” Chuuya ranted, as he tore each soaked layer off his shivering body, all but the bandages; as he gulped down pure ire and pretended Dazai's heart hadn't stopped, just for a few breaths. “Or my soul would be so fucking aggravated by your existence that it would get stuck on this damn earth as a ghost. You know that 'unfinished deals' bullshit? No way. I'll kill you myself. You hear me? I'll kill you myself.”

Dazai didn't ask. He didn't talk. He'd only heard half of that ode; had been underwater for most of it.

My death is your death, he thought. Your death is mine. All Dazai needed was to convince Arahaki to take two at the price of one. Gods tended to be greedy. Vessels tended to be loyal].

Dublin was rainy.

It had rained when they'd found Kazuko.

He wasn't sad about her death, he noted, academically — two fingers on his unhurried heartbeat; on the newly stitched scar down the side of his neck. He thought he ought to be. Odasaku had offered him condolences, when he'd told him. I know you liked her a lot.

Dazai liked tons of things. He liked his console and the fireflies that sometimes lit up the dumping site. He liked the smoke circles Kouyou had taught him to do with his cigarette.

He liked tons of things. He didn't know how to grieve for them.

I'll prove my worth to you, his newest responsibility had chirped, dressed in clean clothes that only burned the contrast into his retina. Akutagawa Ryunosuke. Dazai had once sat and watched a car accident he'd planned play out, until the very last piece of brains had landed near his shoes. Dazai had once wanted permission. It's all I can do.

Was it?

Kill me, he'd told Mori.

Dublin was rainy.

He didn't know how long he'd been lying there. His coat was soaked; all of him was, attacked by the rain and the puddles the speeding cars kept submerging him with. Highways were large in that place. Traffic was benevolent. Dazai couldn't understand how he hadn't been hit yet.

It hates you, Mori had explained, once, tapping his nose; like a child — tapping his naked ribs; like a corpse. Don't you get it? It hates you. It won't let you.

Please. His lips didn't move. Won't you do it one more time?, she used to ask him. Please, please, please.

It thundered.

On his next blink, red appeared.

“Come on,” Chuuya said, dripping, vacant. “You’re no cat. This death would be stupid even for you.”

He tried to focus on that string of words. Snap out of it, he'd told him. Common mistake.

You should tell me to kill myself, he didn't say, because medical gauze and a blind eye did not make for helpful men. No interior emptiness would ever manage to beat the sheer need Dazai had to do everything Chuuya wouldn't like.

The boy was aware. Perhaps, he even knew how easily manipulable he was. Perhaps he knew that Dazai knew and that Dazai let him — let Chuuya slap his wrist when he stole food off his tray; let himself give up on suicide missions because Chuuya had called them smart, let him, let him —

Car horns screeched.

Insults were bitten in the wet air, followed by self-explanatory hand-signs the boy had picked up during their short stay. He was rough and he was exasperated when he grabbed his calves, pulling him towards whatever stolen car he'd stopped mere inches from him.

The concrete burned his skin. Water entered his ears. How do you find me every time?, he appointed to himself to demand. Finding Chuuya was easy; one just went where it was loudest. But him? How do I get you to stop?

“I don't like pain,” he reminded him, over the storm.

“Yeah?” Chuuya screamed, not turning back. The car headlights were blinding. “Not what I'd guess, seeing your choices. Want to become one of Madame Tanaki's collection rugs? Let me go grab a fucking van.”

“Let go of me.”

“Fuck you.”

“Chuuya.”

“Fuck you.”

He was thrown into the car with the attention one might offer to a cursed doll. His limbs had a mind of their own, which Mori wouldn't have approved of, which meant next to nothing, next to everything — he slid into the driver seat before Chuuya could; stepping onto the ignition with a loose skeleton and shaking hands.

A heavy weight landed on the roof of the car, denting it, as he sped down the soaked road.

He paid no mind to street signals and other vehicles; he paid no mind to the body that sneaked inside the car from the car window he wasn't fast enough to shut.

“Dazai,” Chuuya snapped, fighting him for the steering wheel, “Dazai, stop it—” And they punched and pinched and left streets of their nails on each other, and they sprayed water around, skirting down the highway.

Dear Odasaku, he'd written, however it goes, I wish to die fast, and I wish to die displeasing everyone around me.

“You did this with those friends of yours, didn't you?” he mused, tasting the mock. His knuckles were white around the steering wheel, no matter the hands slamming his face against the window. “Street race.”

“Stop that,” Chuuya snarled, attempting to break the bones of his foot. “Don't fucking bring me into your psychotic —”

Cars swerved to miss them, horns and screams and bright lights. “Did anyone ever die during the races?”

“Let go of the damn wheel!”

“What, afraid to die?” Dazai felt his eyes widen, even the one that could not see a thing, welcoming the wet texture of the bandages. He wanted to laugh. He thought he might throw up if he did. “That must feel nice.”

The walls of some factory grew closer and closer. A crumpled up car, he thought. A crumpled up skeleton. Kazuko's body curled under his bed; his picture in the HQs' hallway. Mori would be disappointed. Wasn't that enough reason?

I'm not the kid you found, he would tell him, one day. I know, Mori would say, I found no kid.

Pain exploded in his face, flames so hot they felt freezing on his lips. He only saw white. His hands abandoned the wheel, raising to cup his shattered nose.

A body pressed against his, as Chuuya climbed out of his seat and fell upon him, pulling the wheel with all his strength. “Fucking piece of shit!” he snarled, as he turned them three hundred and sixty degrees, abandoning the trajectory that would have smashed them against the wall. “Fuck you, fuck you, why don't you die, fuck you —”

Let me, he thought, why can't you let me —

Dublin was rainy.

No, he corrected, tilting his head up. That was a shower head.

The shipping container had no access to running water — if he wanted to wash up after a mission, Dazai had to make his way to the communal bathrooms of the Headquarters and lock the door seven times. Not that anyone would enter, knowing he was there.

Little quirks. Little forgetful quirks; most days, he fell on his bed covered in the dirt from an ungrateful day, and he forgot. Most days, the feeling of his skin made him want to crawl out of it.

Motels had showers. Showers. Showers were nice, even when they were too wide.

He watched the rosy-red trails of water run to the drain, taking his blood with them. He'd have to put something on his nose, or it would never heal right. His face would be purple, soon. The three-nails scratches he'd left down Chuuya's cheek would probably get infected. They had access to doctors, now.

They had yet to use that access.

All Mori's plan, he considered. Always him.

Rudely, the curtain was pushed aside.

Scarred feet landed in his blood; overflowing eyes settled on his bandages, only for a moment. "Spread your gloomy fish smell somewhere else," Chuuya said, brusquely. "We don't have warm water to waste."

Dazai leaned back, curving his spine until it touched the cold surface of the wall. It should have made him flinch; he wasn't sure if it did. He wasn't sure if the boy cared about his insistent stare — he watched soap race down the planes of his abdomen; tangle in spiral scars he recalled stitching up, in bruises he had probably given him, in the cascade of red hair curling between his shoulders.

You know, he'd told him, I don't dream.

"Do you want me to tell you a story?"

No answer. Only that hum; that melody he didn't know, lined in unusual anger.

"Did you sign the lease on the new apartment?"

A squinting look. A hat of bubbles sat between the fingers Chuuya was scratching his scalp with. "Yeah."

"Was it the one I told you?" Dazai asked.

"I picked the one you hated."

He tilted his head back against the wall, pulling the sticky bandages.

How Chuuya had found time to go apartment hunting in the less than three days they'd spent in Yokohama, he wasn't quite sure. Perhaps he'd entrusted Kouyou, and asked her to send those pics he sometimes caught him browsing through, fingers intertwined with the mackerel-shaped phone charm. Dazai's commentary had been unrequested. He had offered it anyway.

"The penthouse?" He blinked. "You're too small for one of those. You'll get lost going to the bathroom."

He rinsed. He left hair everywhere he went; Dazai hated it. He'd started wearing a hair tie around his wrist, right where his bandages ended, just because Chuuya was stupid and lacked foresight — because he liked the snap of it against his skin when the boy ripped it off to use it. "It's an investment."

As in, you won't spend a single night there?

"Something to leave in your will?"

"My will," Chuuya scoffed. They'd first updated their own together. Dazai had never considered having something to leave behind; perhaps, Chuuya hadn't either. Their money would go to the organization; Chuuya might find a way to leave something to Yuan.

As it went whenever they sat on chairs that reminded them a bit too much of their growing bones, they'd gone for the childish route: left each other the wildest objects — from Hirose Fumiko's records they'd broken roughhousing, to the empty bottles abandoned under the desk of Dazai's container.

"You know," Chuuya started, "There are no stories to be told when you're dead."

He dangled his head back and forth, slow. "Mori wouldn't blame you for my demise."

"Mori isn't —" He bit his lips; fell into a raging sort of quiet, eyes stuck to the wall. "Whatever," Then: "Tell me."

"Just that," he answered, as disappointed as he felt. "Since last time."

Chuuya set his jaw.

Sometimes he wanted to bite. Taste blood. Taste flesh. I don't dream, he'd told him, no shorthands and no secret messages. Whatever it is I am, I am different. Dazai wanted to die. That's yours to feel, Odasaku had told him. I cannot feel it for you.

"Can I brush your ugly dog hair?" he called.

Suspicion tightened his face. Whatever Chuuya found on his own, painted him in a different shade of blue: one that would shoot Dazai to stop him from doing the exact same thing to himself.

As long as I take it from you, he thought, mean. As long as I'm not blamed for your corpse.

Chuuya offered him a hairbrush, decorated with small flowers that screamed Kouyou's name with gentle insistence. "Do anything suspicious and I'm shaving that mop on top of your thick skull while you sleep. Weirdo."

He should waste less oxygen, Dazai thought. Talk less, when everything he did was a monologue. He was maturing quicker than Dazai was; harder lines and less pimples and less bared teeth when someone offered him a hand.

He grabbed the brush and got to work.

"Are you growing them out?" he asked.

It was colder, without the water turned on; it was still. There was a reason — a reason why he'd asked to do this. He couldn't quite recall, even as he pointlessly counted each thread temporarily severed by the blunt teeth of the brush; reddish rivers rejoining down with the bluish veins and the violet bruises.

A curse was muttered with each knot he did not know how to untangle gently; Dazai's brows curled whenever he encountered objection to a section he'd already taken care of. His hair would have made for good bandages, he thought, nonsensically. Less itchy. More known. Attached to someone forced to stay close.

Chuuya shrugged. His back was one stubborn line of tension; his fingers kept clenching in the air — around invisible steering wheels. Dazai wasn't good enough to demand worry, and Chuuya wasn't good enough at being angry. "Think so."

"Why?"

"Because I like it. Moron."

He hummed. "You look like the frontman of one of those weird punk bands Madame Tanaki likes. Very much last century. Or like those dogs with the long ears."

The sound of his teeth gritting managed to fill the bathroom. He had freckles on every inch of his skin — a single black dot on his right shoulder; a mole no clone would have been decorated with. When he turned — just enough to show him one furrowed eye — a raindrop hurried down the bridge of his nose, landing on his lip.

Dazai's thumb spasmed. The brush fell.

"Hey."

He picked it up. "My bad."

---

---

[They overfilled their nostrils and mouths with liquid copper and rotten viscera — and sometimes, when it was dark, Dazai sat in front of a toilet and did nothing at all. They dug and they punched and they tortured and they killed and they played at the Arcade with blood on their teeth. He killed them all; they exchanged a glance when the latest tied up victim shrieked, because —

Desensitized, he thought. Not to death; he was too reverential of it to ever grow numb to its lightning strikes. Not to death; perhaps to the face men made as they died.

Perhaps to gloved fingers tight around his chin, one golden eye always bristling with intention; a threatening hold and a warm touch and fingers as red as his own. Sharing a cigarette, sharing a lifeline — sharing whatever after place would be reserved for the nastiest kids in the neighborhood.].

For whichever of three possible reasons — necessity, teeth-chattering cold in dilapidated motels, or the jaw-clenched rage that took over Chuuya’s face when the scratches down his arms grew bloodied — they ended up sharing most of their beds.

“If you touch me,” Dazai warned, sinking under the blankets, “I’ll start screaming.”

“If you touch me, I’ll kill you,” Chuuya muttered, clearly disgusted. “Jackass.”

Hidden all the way to his chin under a blanket somewhere in Egypt, on a bed squishy to the point of swallowing them, Dazai pressed his cheek into the pillow and kept his eye — eyes; except it did not matter; except the bandages on the nightstand made him tilt his head whenever he thought about them — on the blurry canva of red in front of him.

And they did not touch. The beds were always infinite. Their bodies were small — with bruised calves playing footsie a tad too viciously to flawlessly mimic a childishness they’d long since tainted.

Their bodies were besmirched and scarred and irrevocably wrecked, unbelonging puzzle pieces someone had forced into each other. The jagged pieces would never fix themselves; the pieces were stuck where they were not meant to be. You’ve wounded yourself and you’ll live with the scar.

“Here’s a story,” Dazai would say.

---

Not many knew, but Corruption began with the wet, sharp squelch of breaking bones.

It hardly seemed necessary — it was petty in every note and every crack, lined by Arahabaki's ephemeral unhappiness. Each time it was louder; each time it reminded the hisses in the air that the longer he spent in those bones — the better he knew them.

It was usually the spine — close enough to the tailbone to snap Chuuya's back backwards; a makeshift scream to the sky. When they were in a hurry, it had the decency to only crash the boy's skull against the nearest wall once.

"He does it less these days, though," Dazai commented, thirteen hours and a half later — an entire Korean neighborhood razed to the ground, and the small bathroom of the hotel they had slipped inside splattered in blood. It stuck to the walls and drooled down in fading droplets, landing on the dried puddles over the sink and the floor. Chuuya sat on the edge of the bathtub, expression far too open — despite it all, Dazai let the air dryer in his hands cover it.

Be hungry when it's darker, he told himself. The bathroom light was golden and blinding — he knew the bruise the forced nullification had left on his wrist was too visible. Where he can't see.

"Arahabaki?" Chuuya questioned, always in tune, too distracted by the energy-drink-stained crosswords puzzle to meet his eyes in the mirror. His left foot was outstretched — stuck to Dazai's naked calf. Be mean about it, he considered. Or — "What's a seven letters English word for mean?"

Dazai waved the hairdryer towards his head, lazy, doing his best to direct as much water towards the paper as possible. "Has he finally figured out that climbing his way out of your mauled throat might not be as successful of a plan as he believes?"

He made a face. Raising his voice to drown out the dryer, he said: "That's a mental image."

"Did you think he would come out of your womb like a newborn?"

His expression turned tentative. There were blood-stained bandages around his middle, where the scars had refused to close on their own; a long cut on his cheek had needed to be stitched up, and it shone a pale white against soaked hair.

There was no pain in his unmatching eyes; but Chuuya never seemed to feel any at all. "You — You do know that's not how childbirth works. You do, right?"

"Do you think he's become more tolerant?"

“Dude. Seriously. You do —“

“Because you figured him out?”

Chuuya huffed. He abandoned the sheet of crosswords onto the toilet, climbing to his feet — when his left heel touched the ground, his face was carefully blank. His fingers reached up to pull the burnt strand of hair rooted in his nape; the only pain indicator Dazai had learned to recognize.

He stole the dryer from his hands, shaking his head like the dog he was under its blow. “‘S nothing to figure out. The training pissed him off. Now we have an understanding.”

Dazai stole it back. “I didn’t think there was anything to understand. He doesn’t want anything, shitty Dazai. Are you changing the narrative?” He moved the dryer towards Chuuya’s mouth — a makeshift microphone.

It was pushed back by a gloveless hand. A new purplish bruise dotted the space between his right thumb and index — Dazai felt the need to pinch it, so he did.

“Listen,” Chuuya started, after an eternity. The mirror was all fogged up; their hair puffy and electric. “What does No Longer Human feel like?”

Dazai tilted his head. The dryer was a hum in between his ears — constant and buzzing, no more and no less familiar than the sound of his nails scratching his bandages. “I’m not telling.”

A nasty look. “Fuck off. I’m trying to —“

“Who says I care?”

“You keep asking. I’d assume —“

“Maybe I merely aim to be annoying.”

“You do that anyway,” Chuuya waved the matter away. “Humor me, you bastard.”

He whined, mostly to be obnoxious. He turned the dryer off; threw it into the faucet. “You know when you stare at a loading video game screen for too long and your eyes start to water?”

An unfriendly type of hesitance colored the boy’s face — like he wasn’t sure he wasn’t being made fun of again. “Sure.”

“Nothing like that.”

A vein in his temple pulsed. “Then —“

“You know when you step a toe into the bathtub, thinking that the water has warmed up, but it’s actually freezing? Nothing like that either.”

“Fine,” Chuuya snapped. “Whatever —”

Dazai’s hand sneaked up, clenching around his chin, until his cheeks were almost touching on the inside.

“Y’ h’ve t’ree ‘econ’d’s” the boy let him know, deadly serious. “O’e I k’ll — “

“You tell me,” he interrupted him, calmly, curious. “What do I feel like?”

Slowly, the murderous intent melted from the goldens and blues of his eyes. It settled on his scarred cheek in a complicated shape, carving his bones to give them a facade Dazai was not immediately privy to. The idea was irritating on its own. Chuuya, among it all — despite it all; because of it — was utterly simple.

“Quiet,” Chuuya offered. That’s something to linger on later. He tore himself off his grasp with ease; pinched his bicep, for good measure. “But I asked about you.”

“That’s the point, though,” he insisted. “It doesn’t really matter what it feels like to me, does it? It matters what it does. Otherwise, it would hardly be a weapon. Have you ever questioned the red glow Tainted gives you?” Dazai pulled the dryer cable out of the socket; he spun it around two fingers like a cowboy lasso. “But Arahabaki is different. Arahabaki is not you; you’re one of the others as much as everyone he’s a weapon against,” He tapped on the old bruise on his forehead. “Unless you can change that. Unless it’s working.”

The Hotel heating system turned on with a beep. It broke whatever stare off they had been locked in — Chuuya huffed again, extracting his feet from the curled up cable on the blood stained floor.

“You always make things more complicated than they need to be,” he said, finally. “There’s no point in reasons, outside of functionality.”

“Murderous functionality. How lovely.”

“Who, me?” Between overly vaporous strands of hair, even Chuuya’s fluttering, coy eyelashes had an attitude. “I’ve never killed anyone in my life. It was all gravity.”

“I’m sure,” Dazai squinted at the red water in the sink. “Boss called, while you were out.”

“And you didn’t hang up on him?” the boy yawned, brushing wet hair off his forehead.

“No, I did,” Dazai confirmed. “But on his seventh attempt, I granted him my attention.”

“Mmh.”

“He asked me to send you his best recovery wishes.”

“Very grateful.”

“Apparently, Elise is missing her favorite dress up playmate.”

“That was one time.”

He kicked the marble under his feet. “He said the mission is over.”

Silence choked him, only for a breath.

Chuuya straightened up. “You’re not bullshitting,” he dared, cautious. The glint in his eyes could have lit Yokohama up with no electricity. “Don’t tell me you’re bullshitting me, or so help me —“

“I only waste my time in useful endeavors, Hatrack,” he informed him. “I’m not kidding. The mission is over. You and I,” He stretched, obnoxiously so, raising his cigarette in a mocking toast, “Are free from this circus of a cooperation.”

Astonishment looked abnormal on him. Not quite surprise, because his small brain tended to be easily caught in similar results — but genuinely, blindingly speechlessness.

“Fucking —“ Chuuya concluded, voice so sagged up it was vacant, “Finally, ah?”

His laughter came out in huffs of breaths, despicable snorts that were amongst the most irritating sounds Dazai had ever willingly subjected himself to. With unexplainable energy, Chuuya jumped out of the bathroom, walking on wobbly legs to pace around, picking up his discarded choker and gloves, muttering something about a hundred percent success rate.

A cigarette had been forgotten on the floor of the bathtub. He picked it up.

“No more motels,” Chuuya was chanting, still, appearing and disappearing from the door frame. “No more damn cockroaches. Only the good old wannabe gangsters only Yokohama can make. Hikari is going to kill me for how long I’ve been away —“

“Ane-san’s demonic dog wouldn’t kill you,” he pointed out. “Me, on the other end — I’m pretty sure she tried. You know, there was this one time —“

“— and the Arcade!” His excitement put a crack on the floor; he swatted at his guilty feet, as if his limbs were to blame. “And my motorcycle! And the beach, and Japanese breakfast —“

“I thought you’d enjoyed the tour de monde. ”

He huffed. “I did,” And what else, for a brat from a seaside village, grown in one of the throats of the Earth? “Maybe I’m tired of your company. Your sticky, inevitable presence.”

“Apart from the obvious.” There wasn’t much to discuss on that. Dazai wasn’t sure he’d ever spent so many months talking. Dazai wasn’t sure of what to make out of it.

“It’s like — you know,” Chuuya shrugged. “It’s Yokohama. ”

His favorite, he thought, without a doubt. Chuuya had many favorites; Chuuya had never looked at anything dully. The color grey; dogs; the romantic soap operas he had once found stupid; peaches and Miso soup and the cloud-patterned shirt Kouyou had bought him; the face Dazai made when he was quiet; the ding! of a won game; a thousand things more he was not stupid enough to leave in Dazai's hands. Chuuya had many favorites, but none like Yokohama.

My debris belongs to the wind of my land, he remembered reading. Never to my father.

"I know," he lied.

Chapter End Notes

hirotsu: i have drawn up a power point presentation of the advantages of me getting actually paid for the shit i'm going through on the daily

skk: i like to draw and to play

hirotsu: this is social security business

skk: i like to draw and to play

"i'd like to die displeasing everyone around me" well dazai. do i have news about your future character development my buddy.

hi there! thank you so much for all your support until now, and for reading this monster of a fic, and indulging my silly hcs and even liking them! i re read all your comments on the daily, seriously, all of you will be getting a shootout in the ending notes i'm preparing lol.

we're finally starting ACT II, part three of this fic. seventeen skk is upon us and they are. well. i mean i hope you got the vibe change i'm trying to offer. i tried my hardest to make the three acts feel very different between them (sixteen - seventeen - eighteen) so i hope eventually you guys will feel it too!! this chapter was really funny to write; i feel like flows of chronologically confusing episodes are where my best efforts lay at lol.

i'm sure i'm forgetting to say something, but that will be a problem for future me. i hope you guys liked this chapter, and i'll see you soon!! <33 p.s. anybody got the yosano half cameo at the very start of the chapter? ;)

SOMETHING

Chapter Notes

see you at the end ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xxii.

---

Case number: 62770097

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Ango S.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [Code Name: Double Black] returned to Yokohama, following a [...]*

---

He had searched for him on a whim.

The man who lived in the street no nerve fibre of the criminal system of Yokohama dared to approach had a too ordinary name — so Dazai had changed it for him. Generosity was as extraneous as the ether; but when Dazai thought back to those weeks, he found that every malicious thorn he'd dragged down his walls was framed by a much less sharp edge than he'd first believed — genuinity.

There are men even dogs steer away from, she had once told him. If the water cannot catch their reflection, it means they were once ephemeral too. Familiar calls the familiar.

No water was around to test that theory; Dazai drowned him in his most gleeful disgraces instead — with the traitorous tide of the wounds he scratched at night to reopen, and the debris he had diligently polluted his veins with.

The man who refused to let him die had no reflection — or maybe he did. Dazai wasn't quite sure. He'd been thoroughly distracted by all the card games.

Odasaku, as he made it to be, was Odasaku precisely because Dazai had decided so. Things of the world fell under his control with the ease of grains in an hourglass; of all of them — that was the most breathtakingly puzzling.

“Oh,” the man blinked. Odasaku was a sandcastle to the many winds of Dazai Osamu; he would survive the end of the world. “You're back.”

In the flesh, Dazai replied. Or, with furor!

It was out of his mouth before he could linger; it was smudged under his soles' barely restrained steps down the stairs of Bar Lupin. He spun on his seat right as Ango leaned down to study the cooking pan in his hands, and he breathed.

“The airport was so very crowded,” he justified, needlessly, unsure of which direction to twirl into, unsure of how to ask for another glass of whiskey without betraying excitement. They would think him too old for his age; they wouldn't mind. “Might have been the fake bomb emergency warning I sent out.”

Something between a sigh and the quicksand decision not to comment crossed Ango's face; at last, he nodded towards the barman, settling himself straighter in the last seat of that heart line of theirs.

Months, he thought, between stories — lost Chuuya's baggage just to make him look for it and scribbled on the airplane windows just to draw horns on his wing-riding short rack body; jumped into a river and thought of Ango's soaked clothing when we pushed him in the bay; licked every spoon in the Royal Ambassery before killing the guards; played clapping games with a Turkish kid and thought of the mole on Odasaku's wrist; ran around and thought, thought, thought of — it had been months.

“You haven't blinked once since you came in,” Odasaku noted, flat enough to appear unconcerned.

Ango cleared his throat. Ango, too, he thought — for good things came in pairs and down creaking wooden stairs. But Ango was no sandcastle and no dragon-slayer; still, cockroaches would survive the wind with ease.

Dazai, though. Dazai, he might not survive.

“I thought I was imagining the fanatic gaze,” Ango said.

“You’re also covered in ash. Is it a style thing?” Then, a bit hesitant, Odasaku added: “Won’t Boss ask for you, if you just returned?”

He had been covered in blood, the first time Odasaku had laid his eyes on him — as it was only fitting, he had been covered in mud, the first time Ango’s leery gaze had touched him. In a way, he liked to think that was what had bonded them together — a recurring tendency to drag pupils on his naked skin, and the things that truly made it.

It took obstinacy, he thought, to exist near his hands.

Dazai liked to tell himself he had been lucky enough to stumble on two interesting men instead of two interesting grasshoppers. Only two of those liked to drink Bar Lupin’s cheap alcohol; only two of those liked to listen when Dazai spoke. When he sat with them, he was nothing more than a man in a bar.

It took something, he thought — fallible prodigy — to make him ersatz real.

“Boss can wait,” Dazai said. “Tell me.”

They talked. He listened.

Ango’s job was the pinnacle of formality, and he was severely entertained by the sheer frustration it never failed to carve on his otherwise unperturbed face. Odasaku’s job was the epicenter of every inch of plainness any human being in the world might have ever felt, and Dazai would have thrown his coat in the flames to have it even just for a day.

An incident with the city sewers; a curious case regarding a peeved ex-general, convinced the Mafia owned him his grandma’s lost-at-sea jewel; the counter of Bar Lupin, and that one time it got stained by the cat that liked to hang around.

“It seemed too polite to defecate on the table,” Ango considered, clearly disappointed.

“You can say shit,” Dazai informed him.

“I really think the cat did it on purpose,” Odasaku mused, looking somewhere faraway.

“Looking me right in the eyes, too.”

A suicide joke got him the man’s genuine question regarding the technicalities of it, and Ango’s consequential smack in the nape, — Odasaku, you need to start reprimanding him when he says stupid things; like this, look. An intricate story he made sure made no sense at all got both men to hold their heads in their hands — it happened in Portugal, I’m sure; but when we were in Romania, that's when it got entertaining, around the time we reached Paris; no, we did not go to France.

There was too much to say and not nearly enough blinks. Dazai webbed moments into existence with a franticness that gained him that observing look in Odasaku's eyes — running from one story to another anecdote; from Charlotte's lipstick kisses to the Korean grandmother he had abandoned in her daughter's blood; from insistent questions to wide eyed obnoxiousness.

"Let's play Tragic or Comic," he exclaimed, at the end of a deep breath he had forgotten to take.

"Cherry blossoms," Odasaku offered, immediately.

"Tragic," Ango shivered.

"What? Why!"

His glasses seemed to glisten. Some stories, Dazai would keep for winter days. "I hate cherry blossom trees."

"It's about the word, Ango."

"A horrible word, nonetheless. Peas."

"Comic," was the chorus.

"Anteater."

"Tragic."

"The New Year's Bell?"

"108 rings to clean the year's sins," Dazai recited. They had spent the holidays together, apart from Mori's obligatory victory banquet — he had jumped in the background of every picture Ango had tried to take of the firework show, and begged Odasaku on his knees and curry-offering hands to come up with a gift for him too — how is it any different from those kids of yours? "Tragic, isn't it? Although, bell is a very comic word."

Odasaku hummed. "What if it was the New Year's Gong?"

"Tragic, of course!"

"I don't agree," Ango downed his alcohol. "Isn't New Year a very comic set of words, anyway? What's new about years? You get one every twelve months."

"Same for birthdays. Is birthday comic?"

"Tragic, according to the poets," Odasaku replied.

“If the poets said it, it must be false.”

“If you said it, it must be a means to an end,” the archivist replied, skeptical.

Dazai laughed.

The clock ticked well after midnight; the barman was still cleaning glasses. At the end of the stairs was Yokohama, and Dazai could taste it all — couldn’t understand if it was joy in his lungs or a tickle just strong enough that he might convince said lungs not to protest his refusal to inhale.

With the collaboration of the barman, a bowl was placed in front of each of the three companions, and filled by the cooking pan Dazai had dragged all the way down there.

He dangled his legs, gleeful, watching them blink at the reddish-brown mush exhaling bubbles under their noses. “Well?” he incited.

“You,” Odasaku leaned down to sniff, “Made this?”

“Personally,”

“This, ” he continued, “Being...?”

“My Peppy Hot Pop!”

“Certainly a figure of speech of its own right.”

“Didn’t you once threaten to stab yourself with my glasses if we ever entertained the thought of you cooking?” Ango pointed out, daring to pinch a piece of unidentified meat with a single chopstick. Pale man as he already was, the sniffs he took only painted his cheeks whiter.

“Forgive me if I don’t believe your tour de monde developed a culinary sense in you.”

“Things change,” Dazai huffed. “You see, that annoying Slug of my partner got it into his head that he should learn survival skills. He’s been reading cooking books. How pathetic is that? I can hardly quantify my disappointment. Is it worse or better than the poetry? Than the Physics textbooks?”

A sigh. “You stole Vice-Executive Nakahara’s Peppy Hot Pop?”

“First of all, he’s not actually a Vice-Executive, ” he replied, nose scrunching up. “That’s just a consolation prize title everyone has decided to bestow him with.”

Odasaku blinked, again. “Doesn’t that make him a Vice-Executive?”

“Second, you two are to refer to him in the appropriate way. It’s only fair, being outranked by him. Talk about him as you would about my dog. Because that’s what he is,” In an effort to explain, he waved his chopsticks in the air, drawing schemes. “For example, you can ask — Oh, hey, Dazai, how’s little Chuuya doing? And see how I put the emphasis on little.”

Hands tight around his glass, Ango downed it again. “And third?”

“I didn’t steal his Peppy Hot Pop,” Dazai concluded, proudly, snapping the hair tie around his wrist. “I simply had to prove to him how much superior my own cooking would surely be. And this is the result! You will be the judges. Be careful in your verdict,” He smiled. “Should we draw straws to decide who eats first?”

“No,” came the immediate answer. “No, that won’t be necessary.”

Ango appeared a bit green; Odasaku squinted at the mahogany of the counter — as if focusing on remembering just how Dazai had managed to trap them into an enemy organization’s basement with no pants and a baby monkey from the Yokohama Zoo, the last time they’d dared to play that particular betting game with him.

“Well, then,” he huffed. “Enjoy your meal!”

Stars might have been one of Yokohama’s many lovers in some past life; pollution hardly managed to hide them from the tallest glass buildings. It was all but starry when their trio stumbled out of Bar Lupin — and yet, when Dazai tilted his chin and waited for the two men to finish emptying their stomachs on the sidewalk, he saw nothing but constellations.

You know, he recalled Ango saying, among their first instants spent together, there’s no need to look for beauty in the garbage. Repugnance has its pros.

“Come on!” he incited, draping his arms around his haze-eyed friends. It was strangely cold, the air seeping down his lungs. “We should go to the Zoo and break the glass of the snake pit, what do you say?”

“Snake,” Odasaku replied, sensibly. His voice was senselessly muffled; he tried to focus on the steps of his two left feet. “Snake. Ango, what about —“

“Snake!” the archivist cursed. “We forgot the funeral!”

Unexpectedly enough, Dazai ended up being the one dragged down the street.

A bouquet of yellow roses had been hastily left on top of a sewer grate near the suburbs — awkwardly leaned against a friendly snake-shaped stuffed toy with its fabric tongue hanging out. The plushie had clear signs of a child’s vicious affection all over it; he blinked at Odasaku and Ango’s discoordinated hurry to fix up that makeshift altar.

“Sit,” Ango ordered.

Entertained, he did.

The Peppy Hot Pop had been carefully studied, but even he couldn’t help but tilt his head to the side watching its effect come to life. Odasaku’s too-tall body stumbled disgracefully, destroying the bouquet as he did his best to find his mouth to cover as he cleared his throat.

Standing straight and serious next to him, Ango hummed a familiar tune: the Port Mafia’s funerary hymn.

“Kazuko,” the first man began, solemnly, “Was a queen among men.”

“A queen among snakes,” Ango agreed. “Constrictors. Is that the same?” His gaze blurred. “Are constrictors the same as constructors? Where do boas come into play?”

“Executive Kouyou’s closet,” he answered, helpfully.

Odasaku burped. He insisted: “She deserved to bite many more calves.”

He nodded, serious. “Endlessly more. Is boa comic or tragic?”

“Tragic,” Ango replied, easily, right as the other man deadpanned: “Comic, of course.”

Dazai recalled a day of almost a year ago, emerging from those same sewers with an overcoat of mud, hands tight around the latest shimmering jewel in the dirt under his nails. Just what I need to die, he’d said. But stubbornness followed every creature that dared to meet his eyes — and as every story went, there was a doctor, and there was a dying being, and there was nothing to be done about the pain he did not feel.

He leaned on his palms, legs crossed like a child, and offered his widest grin to the two men’s composed faces. “Let’s see who can give her the best requiem, and the winner gets to jump off the nearest bridge!”

Much was done in that single night. Cages were opened and cars were bumped; organizations were infiltrated and various petty crimes were committed.

He abandoned the duo to their drunk-like ballet some time after the sun begun to climb the sky, watching them stumble mindlessly; he laughed in the silence of a nearby alley with no sharp enough metal to slit his throat open, reading the endless telegram Ango offered him days later demanding recollection of those days, for he had absolutely none of it, and Odasaku’s single ? mail.

Dazai never answered, and they stopped wondering out loud.

He did not ask if they remembered the makeshift funeral; if Ango recalled spilling tears for a snake he’d spent months bad-mouthing the safety and health hazards of, and if Odasaku remembered accepting Sakura’s favorite stuffed toy with the seriousness he dedicated to his every other mission.

It wasn’t his, that beggarly grave. As far as rehearsal went, he was satisfied all the same.

Be as good, he prayed. Be just as good to me, when it’s me who’s underground.

Yokohama. Distraught and relieved, envious and nothing, nothing at all, nothing that ever lasted enough — he breathed. Welcome home.

“Seriously,” Odasaku questioned, as Ango lost his mind in the nearby seat. “What did you even put in that Peppy Hot Pop of yours?”

A Chevrolet Corvette — C1, black, a convertible from 1962, in the name of accuracy — had been parked right outside the Brick Wall; one of the most famous underground-fighting bars in the Port Mafia territory.

He wants a car, he had heard Kouyou tell Tanaki, before they had left — she had sounded particularly victorious. He'll get a car.

“Excuse me,” Dazai said, waving to the bet gatherer slithering amongst the cheering crowd. The ring was a slightly elevated podium with no railing of any sorts; when Chuuya slammed a six foot tall guy down, his teeth landed mere inches from his shoe. “I’d like to bet twenty thousand yen on whoever the redhead slug will be fighting. Make it a weekly thing.”

The man blinked, confusedly. Right then, Chuuya threw his adversary over his shoulder, and crashed him against the ground again.

“Uh,” he said, studying the crowd as it lost its mind at his clear victory. “Your loss, sir.”

It took some wiggling to get close enough to the stage without the crowd crashing him. His newfound height gave him a perfect visual of the moment Chuuya trapped his adversary’s head in between his legs — laying on the podium as if no more vexed than before falling asleep.

Chuuya had been recently figuring out how to snap necks with his thighs. Dazai was sort of obsessed with him — which was normal. Sheer disgust was bound to do as much.

“Have you already forgotten what Madame Tanaki said about fighting rings?” Dazai asked, as he laid his elbows on either side of Chuuya’s head.

Mostly unconcerned, the boy arched his back enough to meet his eyes.

“Ain’t you too posh for these places?” His red-faced opponent gasped for air, contorting on the ground. The crowd chanted for Chuuya while calling him by name; clearly, these were the men he was so insistent Dazai shouldn’t treat like dirt. “Ah — has Gramps filled your inbox with When will you re-enter society, Boss is getting annoyed texts too?”

“Probably,” Dazai tapped his fingers on the podium, stretching them until they could brush the naked mountains of Chuuya’s shoulders. The nullification changed nothing; he huffed.

“Are you ready to re-enter society?”

“I’m not stalling,” he corrected, frowning with effort. Sweaty strands of hair were stuck to his lips; Dazai moved just to pull. “I just had — shit to deal with.”

Graves, he guessed. Graves needed flowers, and flowers needed water, and water needed gloved hands. Gods were nothing but persistent; Chuuya was nothing but just — enough not to deny mourning to anyone. Even in a graveless syndicate. “Don’t you have a penthouse to get lost in, now?”

A complicated expression filtered through curtains Dazai had never quite deemed thick enough.

His adversary attempted to sneak his hands under Chuuya’s hips and take advantage; the boy signaled a wait to Dazai with one hand, and stood — dragging the man by the calf and twisting his leg just enough to make him scream. Then, easily, he returned them to their starting position — this time, cushioning his head on Dazai’s crossed arms instead, for sadistic comfort.

“Sure,” Chuuya said, carefully. “Need to furnish it and whatever.”

Dazai hummed. “Oh, you will actually do it this time around?”

“You have no place to talk.”

Touché, he conceded.

The crowd roared; he blinked, and realized he had missed the man’s surrender. Chuuya’s still gloved hand reached up, pinching the skin between his eyebrows; even upside down, his gaze seemed too inquisitive.

“Wanna know what you and this trash have in common?” he offered, chest raising back and forth in strangely hypnotic motions. Dazai had slept in his own bed yesterday — hadn’t traced that same movement until his eyelids had given up, lulling him into slumber.

“Do tell.”

“All pieces of shit need to go home, at some point.”

What is home, he wondered, What is home to the unneeded? Pointless questions. “Domesticated dogs would know.”

Kouyou’s birthday present for her dearest knife up her sleeve was sleek and bright underneath the moonlight, and the most tasteless thing he had witnessed in a long time.

Clearly, given all these circumstances, Chuuya had vibrated with barely contained ecstasy the moment he’d been offered the keys. Dazai had mostly been surprised his ideal car wasn’t some ten feet tall monster truck — all in the name of overcompensation and general need to disrupt.

“No funny tricks,” the boy warned him, as he opened his car door for him — unwilling to risk him breaking the window and sliding in, as he’d taken up to do with hotwired cars at their disposals. Slamming it on his face, he leaned into the square. “No cutting off brakes, no neon spray painting, no key lines, no fucking up the leather — no anything. If I find you’ve done shit to my car, I’m reproducing the damage on your bandaged corpse. Clear?”

“You truly need to stop assuming the worst whenever I’m concerned,” Dazai sighed, fluttering eyelids up at him, because it tightened his jaw and it tickled against the bandages. “I’m in the habit of steering away from tackiness. Wouldn’t want it to be contagious.”

Genuinely good driver as he was, Chuuya’s choices to surf the streets like a madman were exactly that — purposeful, willing choices, who he very much doubted were ever taken when his passenger seat was occupied by anyone but Dazai. His fingers tapped relentlessly on the gear shift; if it was a message, it wasn’t his to disclose. He drove tucking his unused foot behind the driving one; he always stopped at every unnecessary red light, and it was pathetic, and Dazai hated it in the way of selfishness.

He met passing eyes from darkened alleys, from sidewalks littered in puddles; filled his cheek to make a kid giggle on his father’s shoulders at a stop — held the gaze of a woman in a barely-there skirt as she tiredly accepted money from lingering hands.

He breathed. Fixed his jacket; unfixed it again. Longed for his console; longed for the river under the bridge.

“Shitty carpets,” were Chuuya’s words, upon entering the newly rebuilt Building One. “Did they add more chandeliers? I thought the roof would fall. Is that a crystal ashtray? Shut up.”

His commentary didn’t stop him from striding across the mostly empty halls; swift motions that betrayed his eagerness, knuckles rapping on the walls that betrayed his thirst to relearn every corner of those roots of theirs. Dazai moved every piece of furniture slightly to the left; the boy fixed it without blinking.

“Ten that Ane-wan chokes the moment she sees you,” Chuuya bet, uncaring of the whispers growing louder the more men they encountered.

The meeting room doors stared at them. “Twenty that Ace starts muttering under his breath the moment he sees you,” he replied, eyes forward, pulling on the chain of his hat to make it dangle correctly; tapping his thumb on the small of his back to fix his slumped spine.

Two fingers hooked themselves onto the knot of his tie, tightening it. Lighter than air, they tucked unruly strands of hair behind his ear. “Two lives in Apocalypse VII that Boss says something about us being an example.”

The doors were opened. “Three lives in Motor Race that Elise tries to hang off your arms like a monkey.”

Mori was the first thing he saw.

His mind was quick to place him in some quiet corner. Instinct and gut were tools, but far too untrustable in nature — despite the nails he had hammered to the edges of his mind to keep it where it should have been. No cell bars could hold the amused something in the gaze Mori reserved for him. Dazai wouldn’t humor his psyche’s insistence to seize the most dangerous thing around.

Instead, they strided down the aisle made by two rows of Executive guards, their chins raised and their eyes furtively darting their way; towards the blood-light washed table at the center of the room. Under the obscurity of the shut windows, the men dropped to their knees at their passage.

It opened no cracks on that newly carved floor; it did not muffle the breaths cut short. Dazai didn't know what about authority demanded silence — all he knew was that no one had spoken to him in eons.

“Oh,” Mori said, bleeding a grin on their bowed frames, from the other end of the table. “You’re back, then. Please, do sit.”

Ace hid a cough. The Colonel’s death had freed a chair on Kouyou’s right; the hesitancy that slowed Chuuya’s steps allowed Dazai to speed up to drop on its velvet cushions — but the moment his thighs landed, the muscle-sharp texture of his seat made him pause.

“Too slow,” Chuuya informed, extremely satisfied, fingers twitching towards the hand Kouyou was subtly reaching in his direction under the table.

They met — the grip was short, but more intense than most things Dazai ever felt.

“I’m the Executive here,” he reminded the boy, as clearly as possible. His temple was already pounding. “In case you forgot. You can stand three steps to my left, if you want. Or outside the room! That would be even better.” Hadn’t the point of returning been some distance, anyway?

Chuuya looked around, pretending not to hear. Ace cleared his throat again.

“Fine,” Dazai said, teeth gritted. He kicked until his hips were screaming for mercy; under the stable flood of the other boy’s warning hisses, he pushed until the two of them were painfully squeezed between the armrests of the chair. “Have it your sticky slug way.”

Kouyou coughed. Chuuya’s spine stood a bit straighter on reflex; there wasn’t much space to accommodate the urge, though.

The chair creaked.

“Well,” Mori’s smile could have burned the city behind the shut windows walls. “Things have certainly been quiet, without you two. Maybe we could bring another chair?”

“I’m not standing up,” Chuuya declared.

“Me neither.”

The chair creaked again.

He felt his shoulder stiffen almost against his skeleton. “I was literally here first.”

“I’m literally an Executive.”

“You’re a quota hire.”

“Oh, yeah? What quota? The short and mentally challenged, like yours?”

“Boys,” Kouyou called.

Murmurs climbed the air — confusion mixed with something else; easily intertwining through each kneeling body, sticking to their clothes in the way of raindrops, of particularly insistent bullets, sunk to the bone, stuck through the viscera, it’ll end quicker if you stop moving, asshole. Water to Chuuya’s flowerless dirt, he knew. One more painting on Dazai’s walls.

“Unfortunately,” Dazai concluded. “We’re back.”

From the other side of the table, one of Ace’s eyes ticked. “Successfully,” Mori corrected. Warmth rejected every thread of his very being; the sheer affability of the smile he offered them both was doing its best to prove him wrong. “Truly an example for the entire syndicate.”

Chuuya kicked the side of his shoe.

Whatever the meeting had been about before their entrance, Dazai wasted no time trying to understand. Summer had just begun — it could have been transportation for the season; a small group causing troubles; the ever present Ability Permit. One of the dossiers passed around the table caught his attention; on it, in capital letters, was the word WHISPERS.

Mori didn’t meet his eyes.

Words curled in the sweaty air, the red lights on the ceiling a match to the print under his eyelids. It wasn’t his first Executive meeting — like all the others, though, he only lasted seven minutes before he began tearing slices out of the relevant documents, boredly singing child chants; and nursing his bent fingers when he dedicated some long minutes nautical-knotting the shoelaces of a very interested Chuuya.

It came to the end without a sigh. Dazai missed Ace standing; he yawned, hanging off his armrest like a corpse.

“Little god,” Kouyou breathed out, in front of them out of nowhere — she pulled Chuuya out of that painful bundle, and held his cheeks like a blooming tree branch in her garden.

Eons and miles away, a hand laid on his shoulder.

“Dazai,” Mori said. He was less tall these days — as imposing as ever. Imperceptibly, the grip dragged him even further away from what he was not allowed to enter. “Welcome home.”

Pale features and combed hair; the blooming red fabric pooling down his chest — the only blood he might ever bleed. Dazai felt the urge to ask him for an injection; he felt the urge to propose a chess game. Instead, he shrugged. “Home’s as boring as ever, correct?”

The man's smile only widened. "Might have something to change that."

He led him out of the room. Dazai didn't turn, no matter the eyes he could feel pierce his back — didn't speak a word until the doors were closed behind them, inevitable and quiet, and a hand suddenly gripped his sleeve.

"You," Elise's high-pitched tone demanded, as her hair plashed the air enough to fool even a walking nullifier, "Owe me so many games, Dazai, you can't even imagine. And you'll dress up for all of them!"

There wasn't much to say; under the door guards' pitying gazes, he huffed, "Maybe, if you're not too annoying."

Pettily enough, she attempted to reach for his fingers, possibly intending to pull him towards her room before Mori could come closer. Dazai didn't know — what he did know, intimately and somewhat in wonder, was the way Mori's shoulders suddenly stiffened, and the rush of deafening silence that filled his veins.

For some impossibly long seconds, all they did was stand in front of the nullified, empty air that had once been Elise — and breathe.

It was quiet.

Mori recovered fast. "Dazai."

Before his name could be entirely out of his mouth, the trigger of his gun was already tickling the underside of his forefinger; Dazai set his eyes on the two guards' faces with little attention, and fired two quick bullets in succession. Their bodies landed to the ground with a heavy thud!, spraying the wooden doors in blood.

"Sorry," he attempted, then. Uncertain.

It was too late; there was a thirsty interest in the lighter corners of Mori's eyes — they studied his hands with more hunger than Dazai had ever felt for anything the worms wouldn't devour. "Not a matter for apologies," he replied, as deceitful as ever, "Getting stronger never is."

"I didn't know that could happen."

"Who knows," the man shrugged. It can't be this easy. He had yet to look at his face. Dazai's fingers twitched; it got him to smile a bit wider. "Oh, how petty she will be about this," he sighed. It wasn't a question — still, Dazai thought, however petty you wish her to be. "Come on, then."

"Mori," he tried, again.

"Come on," the former insisted, before his mouth could close. There was something between his teeth Dazai hadn't seen in too long.

Dazai scrubbed his shoes over where Elise's had been. He'd have to warn her about sitting on him, he found himself thinking, watching as the two guards' blood reached the spot. Then, more rationally: Mori will never let her touch me again.

The floors were different.

They'd been rebuilt with careful intention, hardwood mahogany dark enough to hide any blood stain. Not a step could be taken without every soul inside the rooms hearing; not a soul could take a step near Mori's office and not be announced by a trustworthy home-ground.

A security device — all of it. Everything. Every corner of every part of Yokohama.

The Haunted Floors, he'd taken to call them — because naming meant attaching, and he knew which beasts he was allowed to collar. As it wasn't requested, but Dazai still knew was demanded — he studied Mori's steps, evidently calculated, and set to memorize the silent path only they were allowed to walk.

“Passcode of the Port Mafia's emergency armed vault?”

His tongue was concrete against his teeth. “B3560982.”

“Number of cameras in Chuuya's office?”

“Seven.”

“What's your name?”

“Search it yourself.”

The man hummed. He smiled, and Dazai wished it didn't feel familiarly warm. “It's good to have you back.”

[There had been a day of winter — when he was still fourteen and handcuffed to various pieces of furniture, all to be sure he couldn't reach his neck with both hands — when it had rained, incessantly, for a little more than a week.

Dazai never felt much physical; the bad weather, though, always felt too similar. Always resourceful, Mori had taken advantage of the free time to teach him how to stitch himself up. Luck has been on their side; in an effort to grab some toxic solution off the table with his teeth, given his stuck hands, Dazai had managed to slash his shin open against the edge of the table.

“I had this friend, once,” the doctor had told him, from the other end of the Hospital bed. Whenever Dazai's fingers trembled a tad too hard for the needle, the man's gloved ones wrapped around his own, forcing them to stillness. Not skin contact — but contact.

No use for a scar you can't tell a story for, he would remind him.

“You don't have friends,” he had interrupted him.

His offense had been fabricated, but somewhat entertaining. “Aren’t you and dear Elise my friends?”

“Don’t be embarrassing.”

“Still,” he’d insisted, peeved. “This friend of mine collected stones. Gems, rocks, debris — whichever the earth would deem him worthy of finding. I remember he had an entire room dedicated to his treasures; when the lights were all out, it had nothing to envy a small galaxy.”

“There was this one time — He found a precious gem. A beautiful thing, bluer than the sky, sculpted by nature. It had a rough sort of beauty, untouched by those tools he collected,” He’d tapped his needle, pushing it deeper into one side of the wound. Dazai hadn’t flinched. “A buyer of his encouraged him to sculpt it into some type of jewelry. Cut it, polish it. Few legal markets were interested in pure gems, back then; he would have had greater luck selling jewelry.”

“Pure gems are worth a lot on the Black Market,” he’d pointed out. He’d needed to make himself useful from the moment he’d crossed the threshold of that clinic.

“Not everyone is as ready and willing to choose — ah, unconventional ways, as we are,” Mori had replied, awkwardly. “His buyer insisted and persisted that he would lose earnings. But my friend refused to touch the gem. He was enamoured with what nature had managed to do. Tainting it with my hands would be nothing but a disservice, he told me. Why should I touch what’s lucky enough to exist purely?”

Dazai had dragged his finger up and down his bleeding gash, well aware that the doctor would slap his unsanitary hands away as soon as he noticed. Behind his white shoulders, rain had dug holes in the windows, uncomprehendingly gentle in its ferocity. Each stain it had left on the glass was gone a moment later — too evanescent to stick.

I know, he would have told it. I understand.

“And then?” he’d asked.

Mori had made a face. “Then?”]

“Because I’m easier to find?” Dazai asked.

*“Among other reasons,” Mori paused in front of the second-to-last doors of the last floor. He pushed the doors to Dazai’s office open. “We have many matters to deal with. No rest for the wicked, isn’t that Ace says? Have you noticed how strangely cold it is, these days? After you.”*

Cold, Dazai frowned. What about —

The room was as plain as it had been from his very first steps inside — undecorated, because it wasn’t a shipping container. Small knick-knacks Madame Tanaki had brought him from her travels were the only stains of color; in a drawer of his desk, he knew, was a lucky coin Odasaku had once picked from a fountain.

They're the ones who threw it, he'd told him, shrugging, wiping his hand on his coat to dry it. Here. Have it.

Spread and tied on his desk was a man.

Tears streamed down bruised cheeks, uninterrupted by desperate gasps for air — by his chest rising and falling voraciously; the skin of his wrists and calves tearing itself apart to fight the restraints. One of theirs, he immediately knew — for when he managed to raise his head enough to meet Dazai's eyes, his shrieks could have razed the tower to the ground again.

"No," he begged, shaking the whole desk; the carefully planned floors. "No, no, no — anyone but — no, please, I beg, kill me, kill me, kill me, if you have — I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I beg, I beg, I —"

"We've been having some troubles with our friend. A pain resistant Ability," Mori explained. The corner of his mouth brushed his earlobe; there was no smile in sight. Only the deep inhales from his nose, as the mafioso's screams got more frantic; savoring — not caring a bit. "Here's your welcome party. Shall we get to it?"

["Yes," he'd insisted. "What happened then?"].

"Suppose," Dazai concluded. Elise's skin was stuck to his fingers; he stared at them until the bandages felt less transparent.

The man choked on a scream.

Peacefully, Mori locked the door behind them.

---

...

---

Had Gin Akutagawa been an Ability User, Dazai would have probably shot her brother and abandoned him in the woods.

"That's the voice I want you to spread, at the very least," he explained to Hirotsu, leading him through the rows of mostly vacant beds. There had been talks to shut the makeshift Infirmary down, once the Hospital had been regained — in the end, in the name of urgency, it had been left exactly where it was. “Your Lizards are more gossipy than old aunties; I’m sure you can figure it out.”

“Is that the phrasing you wish for?” the man demanded, polished and polite.

“You can work on it,” He shrugged. “But make sure it sounds mean. I’m hoping all the attention will get her out of that shyness,” Playing Hopscotch between the beds, he sighed, “Poor health conditions and a clear lack of support to her pre-existing issues made her particularly sensitive to wounds — One of the recruits managed to hit an old scar. It’ll take her a week to get up.”

“But?” the man asked.

“Who says there’s a but?”

“You wouldn’t have dragged me here if there wasn’t.”

Hirotsu, as reliable as ever, was the one thing in Yokohama to truly appear untouched, following months of absence. Wrinkles were either too smart or too irrelevant to increase on his permanently too attentive features. When they’d met again, he’d bowed. Welcome back, sir.

“True,” Dazai hummed. “You know, she’s training with the secret Executive.”

The man’s eyes widened — as one of Mori’s most trusted, he knew all too well. He was quick to regain composure. “Did you bring her to him?”

“I haven’t met him, if that’s what you want to know,” he replied, paying no mind when the other cleared his throat, awkward. “Boss won’t let me. However, I’ve heard enough. Gin needs someone to break her into her full potential — she’s clearly not a front row fighter, and I’m not fit to train an assassin.”

Hirotsu kept quiet for a few steps, walking a polite distance from him. He wondered if the man would be willing to manhandle him and Chuuya, still — if his respect for hierarchy would keep him proper and impersonal.

He has our drawings on the fridge, Chuuya whispered, somewhere in his brain.

Stupid, Dazai thought — if true.

“That’s good,” Hirotsu said. “But, sir — why are you telling me?”

With a shrug, Dazai frog-jumped over the kneeling body of a nurse, who’d dropped to the ground in her haste to bow to him. “In spite of the astonishing number of times both her and her brother have ended up in the Infirmary, I believe in their strength,” He paused in front of the last curtain of the room. “They’ll get used to a — finer lifestyle, at some point. I hope. They kinda smell. I thought I would make you a gift.”

The Akutagawa siblings shared a cruel fate: resemblance, in vastly opposite ways.

Snowflakes dipped in ink, stuck so tightly to each other nothing but violence could have made them the duo they were — Gin's flustered silences and infallible aim, and Ryunosuke's unfit arrogance and distaste for bloodlessness. Improper to define either miserable half of that embrace as bright; improper to deny the timid sunlight overflowing from their hunched spines when they shared air.

Dazai had never had anything resembling whatever their bloodied nails liked to cling to. Two heads of dirty black strands mixed and knotted and stuck. When Akutagawa had dragged her to him, the grip around her wrist had been the first act of delicacy he'd seen him carve in existence.

A dying man's first intake of air; a child's eyes found him. "Executive Dazai, sir," he breathed.

There was always an eagerness of sort in the pools of frantic onyx he would set on him — a desperation Dazai had watched keep rats alive in the sewers.

It would, he knew, reduce him to ash, inevitably. Nothing that devoted could survive in the hands of a meticulously picky believer.

Akutagawa left Gin's sleeping body to the machines hooked to her skin — fingers only hesitating slightly before abandoning her hand. From the other side of the bed, he bowed. "You're — back."

[“Alright,” Mori said, eyes on the kneeling piece of meat he'd thrown at his feet. He wondered if it meant something — that every point of interest he'd ever had in that organization had been caged inside its rusted, golden bars by his own hands. Childish, perhaps. Selfish. If no one was around to sell toys, he would carve them himself. “Alright, then. If you can keep him alive.”].

Ratty clothes had long since been thrown into the flames, replaced by Dazai's suffocating coat and some white neck-handkerchief he would cough blood into when he thought he couldn't see him. These days, he thought Akutagawa mostly resembled — not a person, not quite. A vengeful ghost, perhaps.

A foolish one, he considered, not to haunt him.

"Clearly," Dazai replied, widening his hands. "Have you been hallucinating me?"

He grew tenser. "Forgive the impatience."

"Ah, that's what it is. Why, anyway?"

A glimpse of eyes appeared. In the way he sometimes wondered if Mori had ever felt — being looked at by him was nauseating.

Lips tight, he risked: "I thought — that we could start real training, once you came back. That's what you told me, sir."

Ah, Dazai thought, endlessly weary. That.

“Asking whenever I make the mistake of stumbling upon you won’t fasten the process, I assure you,” he concluded, and it wasn’t as sharp as it could have been. The Devil’s dog had less of a bite than what the shadows of a forest had let him believe; he’d had months to accept that truth.

“But,” Akutagawa attempted, fuming. Less of a bite, but still some. “But I —“

“Seniority is still reason enough to show respect, Akutagawa.”

Startled enough — anger, he saw, lining every inch; anger, but not one he would ever show, blind to true survival as he was — the boy turned his bow to Hirotsu’s direction, deepening it by a single inch. “Commander.”

“At rest,” the man said. His eyes had yet to abandon Gin’s face, half hidden by her oxygen mask. “I shall hope her recovery is going well?”

“According to the doctors,” Akutagawa confirmed, unconcerned with offering his gaze to anything but his target. “Executive Dazai, you — why are you here?”

He curled an eyebrow. “Was I meant to book a meeting?”

“I meant —“ A frown. “You don’t usually visit the Infirmary.”

“Not when you’re hurt, no,” he confirmed, distractedly, brushing a strand of hair off Gin’s clammy forehead. Nodding towards Hirotsu, he explained: “You’ve been looking for recruits to fill in the Commander positions, haven’t you?”

Skepticism curled on his face, unmindful of Akutagawa’s surprised intake of breath. “She doesn’t look older than twelve.”

“We’ve come to the conclusion that she should be around thirteen, actually,” he corrected. The boy made a face; perhaps recalling how Dazai had dragged him to a Game Stop and had him buy him one more game on his pay whenever he guessed an age different from the one Dazai was ninety five percent sure of. “Almost fourteen. Our Akutagawa here recalls her birth, but only barely. He promises he’s newly fifteen,” Dazai shrugged, “I’m sixteen.”

“Training for the Black Lizard is the most torturous — career path in the Mafia,” the man reminded him. “Most are rejected before they can even reach a quarter of the process.”

“You were ready to offer one of the three seats to Chuuya, weren’t you?”

He blinked at him. “Chuuya is Chuuya.”

“The annoyance is incomparable, yes,” he scoffed. “Quit it with the defensiveness — the Chibi does like you, I promise. I’m just saying — you believe someone must be capable of filling those positions. Gin is a worthy candidate for that belief. Some female touch to your Lizards, ah?”

Hirotsu hesitated. “Why not her brother, then?”

He felt Akutagawa's back straighten before the sentence was over. A part of him considered suppressing the snort that left his mouth; it was a considerably small part. "Gin is being trained by a professional assassin — someone good enough to gain both the Executive seat and absolute secrecy — and she's reportedly amongst the best students he's ever had. Young and new as she is, I already hear people mutter about her abilities."

"But Akutagawa here is being trained by you," Hirotsu pointed out. "And he's got an Ability, doesn't he? It's rare for Commanders of the Black Lizards not to have one. You've been teaching him, haven't you?"

"Attempts are being made, yes," he sighed, slightly hopelessly. "Akutagawa, why don't you explain to Hirotsu why your dear sister would be a valid recruit?"

While unbearably stupid, at times — no starved dog who the slums had not munched and spit back in pieces would ever be blind to threats. Dazai did nothing more than blink at him. He knew Akutagawa heard, all the same.

[“Taking care of your sister is a valiant task,” he told the boy, the first time he pushed him against a wall, gun in hand. “Rather admirable. Respectable, even. Do you take me for a fool?”

Horror filtered through thin traits. “No, sir “

“Do you take me for someone easy to fool?”

“No, sir — No, I thought —“

“You thought I wouldn't know your darling Gin hasn't held a knife once, her whole life, the moment I gave her one?” he insisted, undeterred. “You thought I wouldn't know you'd do anything so I wouldn't leave her in the slums? You thought I wouldn't send her where powerless girls like her end up in organizations like this, if I believed she could pull her weight in a fight — if she could give me even a quarter of your disappointing performance?”

“Sir —“

“Lie to me again,” he dared. Few things as familiar as the weight of a gun; few things as joyously petty as solving problems without the mind that had made Mori so proud. “Do it.”

His gulp rattled his whole body; Dazai's own, too, inevitably, pressed together as they were. There was urgency in the unstoppable dance of his eyes; he thought his victims should show some gratefulness, once in a while, for how easy his single eye made it to stare into the void before the end. He thought powerful people should stop believing themselves powerful. He thought Mori wouldn't accept another recruit who refused to do what mafiosi did.

“Here's your first lesson,” Dazai offered, generously. “Make yourself a valid piece, or you'll be discarded. That's all there is to it.”]

“She's quick,” Akutagawa hurried to say, faster than his lungs would allow. “Faster than all the other recruits. She's told me — the Executive told her. Her learning curve is enviable.

He's thinking of sending her on her first mission, as a support to Battalion 05 — she's small enough to sneak almost everywhere, and she's fierce enough not to mind most wounds."

"Sure doesn't seem," Dazai intervened, cheerfully, tapping her forehead. It did not stir her; it hardened something behind the glass of her brother's eyes.

"Nothing escapes Gin," he insisted, adamant, daring to meet Hirotsu's eyes. "She used to be able to hear spiders, when they crawled in our refuge. Insects, mosquitoes — people are too loud for her senses. She never lost a single chase we were involved in, and she's spent the last few months learning blades. She could kill me in her sleep."

"Because that would be hard?"

"I'm getting better too," Akutagawa snapped, finally offering Dazai some fire. "Just because you refuse to directly train me until I reach impossible standards, it doesn't mean —"

Silence fell.

Dazai didn't watch his lips cling to each other. Regret didn't need to be seen; not when the air creaked so desperately with it.

He hummed. "Alright, then."

"Sir," the other attempted.

"You're getting better. Alright," He crossed his arms. He leaned on the steadily beeping heart monitor next to him, feigning confusion. "Why don't you tell me the success rate of the missions I've demanded of you, while I was overseas?"

Akutagawa's eyes tickled the floor.

"Well?"

He muttered.

"Enunciate your words clearly," Dazai snapped. At his tone, even Hirotsu turned. No one will obey what they cannot understand, they'd told him, before and after — a dirty apartment and a mansion and a doctor's clinic. Stand straighter. Speak clearly. Stop stuttering. I know you're making it up. "If you've got something to say, say it. I have no time for mumbles."

Teeth gritted, Akutagawa offered: "Forty seven percent."

"See? That was easy," Dazai complimented. "Hey, I never asked you. What do you think of my bandages?"

Lost, he echoed: "Think?"

"You'll need to form an opinion. Chances of you ending up without one or two eyes are always high, with those kinds of results."

Though untouched, Akutagawa flinched.

“That’s what happens with a forty seven percent of success rate,” he continued, bored and intent, uncaring of Hirotsu’s frown — of the boy’s shoulders brushing the wall a bit more with each word. “Forty-seven percent is the reason why half of my shipments will need to be sent out again —“

“I — There were some complications with the men you — I’m not —“

“ — Forty-seven percent, ” he insisted, raising his voice, “Is the reason why you’re still stuck in a basement, training with some desperate lowlifes who’ve never tasted a inch of an Ability as flashy as yours — why you haven’t trained with me, and why your sister would manage to kill you, if she ever decided to take pity on our souls and do it. ”

“Dazai,” the Commander called.

“Silence. Forty seven percent is exactly why your sister needs to be able to protect herself,” He tapped her oxygen mask with two fingers. With each touch, Akutagawa’s shoulders stiffened a bit more. “Because you can’t. In fact —“

A blink.

Dazai was used to gaudy Abilities — had grown familiar with the scarlet glow surrounding Chuuya’s silhouette as he stepped across the ceiling in irritation; had sat on the ground and watched Elise’s rosey light paint wounded shadows on the floor of Mori’s clinic for countless nights.

Akutagawa’s ink-and-ruby’s scorpion tails were nothing new — if anything, they were slightly cheap, in the hands of someone who had never considered using them for anything but their effortlessly served poison. One of Rashomon’s claws wrapped around his wrist — a vicious attempt to rip his hand off Gin’s mask before he could touch it. Hirotsu’s Ability came alive at his shoulders, ready to defend — uselessly, given the mere seconds it took for the contact with his skin to nullify that foolish venture.

Rashomon slid down, tearing a bloodied line on an unmasked portion of the girl’s cheek.

“Oh, oh,” Dazai said.

A choked gasp abandoned the boy’s throat as he threw himself on his sister, frantic hands unable to stop the bleeding. Dazai thought, a bit frivolously, that perhaps they’d ended up sharing flesh as well.

“Hush, ” He clicked his tongue. “Try not to infect her as well. She’s so weak already. Hey.”

He settled his elbows on the bed, leaning close enough to freeze Akutagawa in his motions. His handkerchief was stained crimson — blood new enough to be his sister’s; dirty enough to be his own. In the desperation of his spasming fingers, he saw youth itself.

Unnecessarily heavy, he considered; perhaps recalled. As such, to be removed.

“Hey,” Dazai repeated, “That’s the second time you try to use your Ability on me. Two times too many, but I’ll let it go. Normally, I’d welcome any and all attempts on my life — unfortunately, your possibilities of success are low,” He dangled closer; saw the drool of a hungry beast upon the meal he refused to feast on.

Hate me, he thought. Hate me, if you dare.

[With Elise gone, Mori had looked afraid — for a single moment. Perhaps, he’d considered, munching on his blood, on his flesh — perhaps he’d feared she wouldn’t come back.

Perhaps —].

He warned, encouragingly: “Do it a third time, and I’ll break every bone in your hand. Yes?”

Blood seeped from Gin’s cut, staining her pillow. Teeth gritting, too unhealthy and small to fill the shoulders of that coat — the boy nodded.

“Words, Akutagawa.”

“Yes,” he seethed. “Yes, sir. I apologize.”

He straightened. “Well, then,” Hirotsu welcomed his smile with a sharp line of shoulders, and an ever sharper edge in his gaze — one of years ago. “How about we give Gin here some more time to train, and then we let you evaluate her?”

“Evaluate her,” the man echoed, finally.

Dazai shrugged. “She can fight whatever busybody you put in front of her. Should she be worthy, you can mold her into your little Commander,” He sighed, patting her unmarked cheek. “What a darling. So, what do you say? No, wait,” He backtracked. “I’ve got a better idea. How about we let her fight her brother, to prove her worth? Should she lose, who knows — I could be persuaded to actually begin my lessons with our newest boy. Two birds with one stone.”

Akutagawa stilled.

Hirotsu’s expression was familiar. It didn’t matter much. Dazai had been watered by people with slightly perturbed features — a cowardly accusation of having done something not quite human enough; not enough to pass the test with flying marks.

The test was always happening and always graded; Dazai thought it aimlessly exhausting, keeping up with this one subject he was born to fail.

It wasn’t Hirotsu’s failure to grade, still. It was no one’s. He would bring it to his grave, and let the dirt judge him where it simply wouldn’t matter.

The man bowed his head. “As you wish, Executive.”

“Oh, how formal,” He batted the words away. “Pass me some gauze. We’ll have no competition if Akutagawa bleeds poor Gin out, will we?”

---

...

---

[“And then?” he asked.

Mori made a face. “Then?”

“Yes,” he insisted. “And then?”

“And then he wanted the money, so he did as he was told,” the doctor shrugged, perplexed at his confusion. “What else?”]

---

...

---

Summer made everything scratchy.

Bandages on skin and pens on paper; triggers under his forefinger and hot concrete under his shoes; the roof of his under-desk hiding place and Elise’s satin — away from his hands. He spun on his office desk and relearned his duties and downed one pill for every sleepless hour.

Everyone swore it was several degrees colder than it usually was. He paid no attention to it.

The Executive position was a frame on an abandoned painting — drooling undried gold on unfinished sketches of a lifetime he hadn’t quite asked for. “There’s been a surge of men who have convinced themselves the Port Mafia can be forsaken,” the Boss told him. “Chase them like those fireflies of yours, yes?”

I was young, then, he didn’t reply. He used to escape the clinic in the middle of the night — wander through the city to learn its roads; capture grasshoppers and fireflies to put in those medicine containers Mori never left in his hands when filled.

Kouyou had a hand in everything the organization reckoned worthy of spilling blood; Ace controlled every border and entertainment of their territory; the secret Executive trained promising assets. The Colonel had organized troops. Dazai, the youngest of them, was offered the priciest column of all — manage everything, and some more.

Exploit the fire while it's still burning, Mori used to say, as they played pharmacist, or you'll lose money on the ashes.

Every movement the syndicate did on the Black Market ended up on his desk, at some point; every bloodshed the smaller gangs would mutter about, he'd dip his hands into at least once; every defense system built had been inked on blue paper by his hands — childish enough to still use that hair tie around his wrist to keep still.

"There's no escaping him," he heard a member of the Secret Force Unit mutter, as they cleaned off an execution. "He's got his hands in everything. Is Boss trying to build an heir from scratch, or is he just lazy?"

As it went, Dazai had to blow his head off.

"You used to be a shadow," Madame Tanaki explained, ever so quietly observant of it all, offering some sweets off the box on her desk. She had dyed her hair a warm shade of golden, just different enough from her old silver to make it entrancing. "Everyone is in fearful awe of the person behind our efficiency. It's not an insult to Boss — having found you is his merit."

Only had himself to blame, he thought.

"Oh, but I'm still a shadow," He smiled. "Hasn't our local dog told you all about it?"

She rolled her eyes, fondly.

The sweets she'd been devouring were undoubtedly his habitual morning treat; it was the most Dazai had seen of Chuuya since that day in the meeting room. Last he'd heard, he was juggling the Guerrilla squad Mori had put under his command — the second largest in the organization.

How unusual it felt; these days, no flashes of red appeared in the corner of his sagacious gaze.

But use denounced need, and he had nothing of the sorts; when the itch in his nape started — when the melting oil colors on the roof of his containers blinked with more insistence than slumber — he snapped the hair tie against his wrist, and relished in one more hidden blue unbelonging to a god's eyes.

"How are you, Tanaki?" he would ask, sometimes. Dazai wasn't sure he cared about the answer, but he thought Odasaku might approve of him asking.

Her eyes always clouded the same way. She hadn't touched her ribs in a long time. He knew she'd taken to going to the cemetery with Chuuya — could imagine her fingers around his arm, her crisscross scars a match to the silver kanjis on her child's grave.

“I’m breathing,” she would say, “I’m growing.”

Grief was too tricky of a job, even for the man with the most responsibilities in the syndicate. He thought perhaps that was why Mori never asked him to deal with the corpses he left behind; thought it both an act of understanding and a lesson on its own.

Nothing for you to learn; nothing I need you to be human about.

Dazai would lament his paperwork under distraught subordinates’ desks; play Hopscotch in the hallways he was slowly relearning; scribble on the paintings and the stained glass windows; steal Mori’s stuff from under his nose and hang papers of the Chuuya Is A Sore Loser newsletter where he could only hope the elusive redhead would find them.

“That’s an ugly picture,” Elise made sure to tell him, the first time they found themselves in the hallway where the Higher Floors’ photographs were framed. “You’re lucky Chuuya is there to save it.”

It was, objectively, a terrible picture.

Mori had made sure to click the camera right when the astonishment from the New Year party’s revelation had tightened their lungs; a tad too close to each other in overgrown kimonos, surrounded by the blurred motions of the horrified acclamations they’d received — their eyes dug holes in the camera, a bit too young.

He wondered if that had been the intention; huffed, at himself, for even daring to consider something out of Mori’s hands hadn’t been planned.

“Maybe you should ask Mori to let me set it on fire,” he proposed, moving to pat her curls — stopping. “And then you can take the new one. And let me cut the Hatrack’s face out with some blunt scissors of yours.”

“Mm,” She sniffed. “Don’t play smart.”

“I would never,” He crouched down, removing the halvened pieces of her doll from her unresisting hands, careful not to touch. The genuine rage in her glass eyes was overshadowed by a curious enough sadness; he hadn’t thought her capable of something so brittle.

Another thread to Mori’s mind tapestry — why curse her with dejection, when he could have not? Was it an effort to make her realer, or easier to control?

“Do warn me if you’re about to cry,” he told her. “I don’t want snot on my pants.”

“I don’t cry!” Elise yelled, kicking him in the side. “Rintarou hates crybabies. Have you been away so long you’ve forgotten?”

How could he.

“He’ll try to put me in those ugly maid dresses again, if I do,” she sighed — because Mori liked them bratty, and liked them unreal, and weren’t the two of them a nice picture, huddled together on the floor? There were probably cameras on them, he considered. Mori wouldn't leave them alone again. "And those are ugly."

"Mori is a weirdo," Dazai pointed out. "You, according to your endless soliloquies, are a princess. Wail to your heart's content."

Despite that — either a defect of production or a doctor's sadism — she blew blond locks off her nose, and didn't.

Visiting one of the Mafia's honorary children left him not choice but to visit the other; but apart from wide, untrusting eyes and a demand to be picked up — only to look through the window, they assured him; and how pathetic it was, he considered, that they'd put them in a cell with too tall windows? — Q had nothing to offer him.

The Dragon Head Conflict had left them more vacant than before; a distant gaze framed the curious shapes of their pupils, as they dragged small fingers up and down the blades in their arms, tempted to press.

"I promise to be good, if you let me out," Q swore, hands clenched around his coat. "Boss said — I was good, last year. Boss said I was forgiven."

"You are," he assured them, because many had killed more than they had and were not locked in a cage with too tall windows. "Somewhat unwisely. But you're also an incomparable scoundrel, and we need to make sure you won't release a metaphorical plague the moment we let you back into society."

Too difficult words; he abandoned them to munch over them, kicking their feet. Dazai had nothing else to offer them.

You're caged because cages were made, and someone has to fill them. You're caged because paperwork is tedious and the Mafia wasn't made for children, but Mori is too greedy to understand — but what was the point? Dazai thought they believed it all genuinely entertaining.

Being known and being feared came with boring consequences; there was no need to pick locks, when no one would have dared to close a door to his face.

"And what if someday you lose the key?" Mori asked, when he whined about it on a monthly check-up. Boxers and bandages and bruises; he dangled his legs from the hospital bed of his never-dusty clinic. "What if you find a door you can't break your bones to go through?"

"That kind of hypothetical is next to impossible," he reminded him, drowsy. "Look."

The dislocated shoulder he gave himself didn't manage to make him pass out; the merrily laughing way he attempted to stick the corner of the bed through his skull did, though.

He woke to handcuffs and Mori's exasperated sighs, and blamed the heat for the disappointment he couldn't gulp down. "Do you never get tired of pretending?"

Lights swarm on the familiar ceiling; he was fourteen, he was ten. "Pretending?"

“That you would ever end your life so deplorably,” Mori pushed sweaty hair off his forehead; no reservations to touch him when he couldn’t take advantage of the caution always lingering in the man’s eyes. “We both know you would not dare. We both know it’s not what you want.”

You don’t know a thing, he didn’t tell, or perhaps he did. Mori was everywhere in every instant of every day. Caring for circumstances — caring for aesthetics, even — who had time to pause decay?

“Lessons are the weapon of the most capable warriors,” he let him know. Perhaps, if it hadn’t been Mori — perhaps, if Kouyou had been to one to take him in — there would have been no reason to.

He did not roam through the Pomegranate to let her know; neither did he do it to exist in the same place as her — to mock those drugged-drunk thoughts he hadn’t been quick enough to suffocate. But the night was deep and the silence shattered by her women’s melodies, and he twirled around the pavilion with the most charming smile he would ever be able to carve on his face.

“Daa-azai!” the women from the balconies teased, as they waved enthusiastically, “I can hardly believe my eyes. Did the Executive finally grace us with his presence again?”

He bowed too deep — made a show of clenching his hands on his chest. “If you will have me, my ladies! May you forgive the endless wars that keep us divided, and may we celebrate happier times!”

They laughed.

They called him — sang his name along to those old hymns, masquerading every sound of flesh and pain coming from behind the locked doors.

He danced with the older women; accepted flowers from the amused onlookers from the balconies and gifted them to newcomers; kept his smile right where it was whenever affectionate hands from dead eyed women dragged down his bandaged skin.

Glee was a play pretend they all shared; the ease with which they worn their mask had been why he’d wandered in that place more and more nights — kneeling on the pebbled ground to attempt his very best proposal for a double suicide, allowing them too coo all over the most feared man in the syndicate that held them in their first.

He thought of Yoko, and the man she had loved — the man who had sold her to Dante’s waiting hands, Beatrice’s puppeteer fingers. She’d become a bedtime story — one the women would sometimes giggle about, as they laid their heads on his shoulder.

“Foolish,” She was young, or she looked so; when she sunk a finger on his chin and parted his lips, her curtain of wooden curls rained upon them with the delicacy of snow. He would have granted her anything, if she could have torn his skeleton out of its pocket and wrung it out. “There is no escape. Only shackled life or empty death.”

“You sound sure,” he considered.

Her grin was a cat’s. “I don’t need to see a corpse to smell it,” she promised him.

Can you smell me?, he didn’t ask.

She kissed him with tired sensuality, worn out and desperate for a last show, spider-web fingers barely brushing his jaw. Pressed herself against a column sturdier than he was; pressed him against her clothed skeleton, as every inch of him wished for more bandages, more warmth, the loudness of a rose-scented room where all eyes knew he could touched.

“Now, don’t be so passionate, Mimi!” some girls hollered, raising chuckles. “If you get attached, what will you ever do when our Demon ends up bewitched by some mobster madame?”

“An unlikely possibility,” Mimi — he learned — scoffed. She snapped her teeth mere inches from his mouth. “How is he meant to find someone, when he and the Madame’s boy are constantly with one hand down each other’s pants?”

Roars of laughter erupted; Dazai protested loudly, singing tales of dogs and slugs and necessary partnership.

Chuuya was well beloved anywhere Kouyou was worshipped; although he doubted his visits ever looked like his own. The women twirled and sang — some soft-spoken poem on a warrior with hair of fire and long virtues; Mimi set two fingers on each side of his jaw, enclosing him in the putrid warmth of her mouth again.

“No need to be jealous, anyway,” she whispered, pulling his lip between her teeth. Her hands were electric shocks down the length of his sides, tapping the metal frame of his belt.

There existed a bridge, he knew, between enjoyment and a brain pleurably shut down; he tip-toed, too old for his age, too young for his skin.

“We’re debauched here, are we not? Just bring him around with an open mind...” She dragged those last words; in the time it took a petal to dissolve, he saw sapphire and gold, unmatching eyes dragging across him like bloodied wheels on scorching asphalt, gloved hands pulling his hair — and it burned his tongue, that he did not need to imagine what scarred skin would feel under his fingers. “...and you can have us taking care of your burdened shoulders, ah?”

A familiar grip enclosed his cloat; he was pulled out of that lungs-constructing embrace, and the word was tinted in shades of pink — startlingly, through the cold air of the night and the open sky upon him, the women straightened.

“Back to work,” Kouyou’s words were a breath; he couldn’t see her paper-thin smile, couldn’t see a thing but the wrinkles of her kimono. “Immediately, girls.”

He recalled the dried blood on her hairpieces, as she ripped a man’s teeth out. “Madame,” Mimi dared, hesitantly, “Madame, I —“

“Back to work, ” she spelled out, still pleasant, still gentle. “Do remember your place. He’s not even seventeen yet, Minami —“

Dazai froze. He pushed Kouyou away; a move that would have granted him bleeding craters all over his chest, had she not been too surprised. He laughed.

“Don’t be such a prude, Ane-san,” he huffed. “There, there. Leave poor Mimi alone. She’s done nothing wrong. Ah, look. You made her run away. Dear, how is one supposed to make friends with you around?”

“You aren’t even allowed to be here,” the woman snapped, all pleasantries vanishing from her features. Dazai would have judged her willingness to genuinely show herself to him a victory, had it not been born out of disinterest to make him believe in her good heart. “And anyway, this is a service. You can’t just come around and throw yourself into their waiting hands —“

“I’m an Executive, though,” he reminded her, lashes fluttering. “No High-Floors discount? Where will our corrupted empire end up, with you acting like this?”

Balance once again restored, she looked at him with lazy disdain.

“Where will it end up with your hellish lack of manners?” She replied, scoffing. “You’ve been back for weeks, and you haven’t even brought your regards to me yet. The old Boss would roll in his grave, if he knew.”

Aim, he thought, entertained, and shoot.

“Neither did I bring them to Ace,” he reassured her. “I’ve been just too busy, you see. I’m sure your pupil must have told you all about our tour de monde, though, did he not?”

Kouyou made a face. “You must have had fun.”

“Fun?”

“Demonic contamination takes time and isolation.”

He laughed again. His lips were tingling. “Ask me when I kill him.”

“My doubt will remain forevermore, then,” she concluded, smile sharp.

From opposite sides of a sword no one had unshied, they kept their eyes on the other. Don’t touch me again, he did not say. She hadn’t touched him at all. These days, she was older, and he had never been young at all.

“Alright, then,” She offered him her arm, and it was not a question, because the Mafia had no dusty corners left for those. “Come. I have something to give you.”

Dazai grinned in that way she would know was synthetic, and hung off of her like a child, loudly recounting Chuuya’s most embarrassing tales from their months away in the tone of voice she would hate the most. Her posed contempt had never been sour on his tongue; he had known from the beginning he would receive nothing else. A dangerous woman for a dangerous boy; in another life, they might have met at the ricochet.

“Here,” Kouyou said, at last, extracting some dusty object from one of the lockboxes at the entrance of the Pomegranate. She blew the dirt off and handed him the camera. “I finally sorted out my first living quarters, and this came out. I offered it to Chuuya, but, well — ”

“Our loyal dog is not very fond of pictures,” Dazai concluded, distractedly, turning the offer in his hands. A nearly invisible crack ran down the lens; a star-shaped sticker still decorated the far end of the other side, slightly more yellow at the corners. “Not anymore, at least.”

He had been a personal witness of the wall of photos in Albatross’ old apartment, and of the sheer number of faces a single person could make when made the unwilling subject of a camera. Even since Corruption had brought side effects along, though, Chuuya had soundly been refusing to be involved.

“Why am I the next candidate?” Dazai asked, as he watched the Executive through the lens. “You don’t even like me.”

“I never went anywhere without it, when I was you boys’ age,” She shrugged. “Try not to break that brain of yours upon it. You’re the only other seventeen year old I know.”

He blinked, owlish. “I thought I, wasn’t even seventeen yet? ”

Whatever her furious answer was, he paid it no mind, too busy studying the saved pictures on the ancient display. Most portrayed Yokohama, or the skyline of some European city; the latest ones, could not be older than one or two years ago.

Her devil dog, Hikari, was the main subject of the vast majority of them. Occasionally, Hirotsu or some subordinate of hers appeared. He was stunned to meet Arthur Rimbaud’s face, his frame blurred from how violently he was shaking; and then Chuuya, with short hair and a green leather jacket on.

“Oh,” He blinked. “That’s me.”

Barely less rare than Randou, and so little into frame it wasn’t a surprise he had never noticed — but there, all the same, pulling Chuuya’s hair as he screamed in his face; standing uninterested next to Mori’s never unspeaking mouth; carrying Q through the Hall of Light and Darkness.

“Delete those, if you’d like,” Kouyou said. “They’re somewhere in my office. As for the camera — throw it away, if you don’t want it. No one else to give it to.”

He took a picture.

Once it developed — her lips half-stuck, eyes looking in opposite directions, hands blurred — he hummed, amused.

She crossed her arms. “Great. One trinket less. You’re free to leave, Demon Executive.”

“Did I update?” He tilted his head to the side. “That’s nice. I appreciate the initiative.”

“Dazai,” she called, once he was halfway out the door. Under the gentle moonlight and the muffled hymns of her women, he thought he might have dreamed of her — only once. A younger, more tired version of him.

“You’re not allowed in here,” she repeated. Too cowardly to look at him; too sumptuous to be touched by it all. “If I see you around, Boss will be informed.”

His smile was bitten down. He wanted to laugh; give her something true to be horrified by. Hypocrite. Blind. Unwanted. Late, late, always too late. “And what,” He yawned, “He’ll be mad because you have no little girls around?”

She stilled. “Dazai —“

“But it’s fine if I go anywhere else, I bet?” His head hung loosely off his neck; whatever the flash in her eyes was meant to signify, he had no time to waste with it. “I really didn’t think you so prudish, Kouyou. You always manage to surprise me. It would be interesting, if it wasn’t so tedious. Let me tell you,” He leaned closer, “I’m not you, alright?”

Regret pooled down her ceramic face in waves. “Will not make the same mistake again.”

“Whatever, whatever,” He brushed the matter away, so bored it might kill him, so decomposed it wouldn’t matter. He bowed. “Thank you for the camera, Ane-san. I’ll let you know if I take any boudoir photography, ah?”

He was gone before she could ask Golden Demon to chase after him. He got the feeling, as he roamed up and down the echoes of the women’s funerary hums, that she was right where he had left her, with her eyes on the floor.

---

...

---

In his oldest memories were hands on his shoulders, pushing him to break the surface of a rusty bathtub.

The rush of water in his ears was a sweeter lullaby than most would believe, intrusive enough to sneak in through the cracks of his teeth. No soap and no bubbles — only a tinge of alcohol in the little air he could steal, dizzying and days old, sagging his nostrils.

But when his eyes burned and his lungs constricted, all he could think was: at last.

It took him a moment to recognize the arms under his armpits, dragging him up until he shattered the surface of the river. His mouth gasped more air than his lungs could reasonably do anything with, greedy things he had not learned to control; he choked, spitting as his unwanted savior swam them towards the closest bank.

Back on the concrete, eyes set on the afternoon sun, Dazai groaned out a, “Truly unnecessary, Odasaku, I will say.”

The man hummed, wringing out one of the sleeves of his coat, before sneaking his arm in again. The wrinkles on his face were not deep and old enough to make him — not mad, no. But Dazai knew he sometimes felt the instinct to wring him out like his clothes. Everyone who spent too much time with him ended up soaked.

“Why did it look nice?”

“Huh?”

“You said, this river looks nice,” the man explained, not blinking. He had settled next to him — the concrete was all but comfortable; so that was nice of him. “Before you jumped in. Why did it look nice?”

The words hung there, along to the birds on the wires, somewhat unnecessary. Odasaku did sometimes give out the impression that, if no one in the world were to speak to him again — he would be more than content in his silence.

“If you had to pick your executioner,” Dazai asked, spreading out in a star shape. “Would you choose a man in a mantle carrying an axe, or the last sunset on Earth?”

“Eight minutes to die,” Odasaku considered, because he always caught up quickly. “Isn’t a quick death most people’s preferred option?”

“I’m not most people,” He shrugged, laying his cheek on the blistering road. He smiled up at him; grinned until it dried the water out of his cheeks. “Neither are you.”

His eyes were lost in thought. Fate seemed to rest on his next inhale; when he spoke, Dazai thought he sounded like waves.

“Anyway,” he said, logically, “Barely anyone uses axes anymore,” A pause. “Apart from that guy I met in Osaka.”

Dazai sat up, eyes wide. “Who?”

They walked where the sidewalk was sunnier, to dry their clothes, as the man offered his tales. Twirling around and climbing upon stone railings, Dazai studied their matching footprints until the water faded away from their soles, oooh-ing and aaah-ing all in the right places, as true as he could push his limbs to be.

If he straightened his shoulders just enough — pushed his chin back, stood just a bit on his tip toes, and pushed his hands into his coat pockets — they were almost the same height.

“It doesn’t make sense to me,” Dazai insisted, between one mouthful of ramen and the other, leaning against the window of their destination — a konbini. “When they’re so scared — it doesn’t make sense to me.”

Odasaku’s chopsticks were frayed at the edges; he always carried a pair in his pockets. Cars passed them mere steps from his still-soaked pants, honking with the breeze. “I don’t think true acceptance can be reached before the moment people are asked for it.”

“But most people have years to come to terms with it,” he replied, pressing all the noodles until they were a mush. He was eating too fast, he knew; he would be sick by the evening. “Boss read me this book, back when I was younger — A fairytale of sorts. No one, apart from the heads of the kingdom, was informed of the existence of death. People were only explained what it was mere minutes before being executed.”

“That sounds gruesome.”

“I know. And I could understand it, then — the terror I always see in their eyes,” Dazai huffed. He had spent the whole morning conducting executions; the sound of jaws splitting open against a sidewalk was familiar, at that point. “Minutes to understand the concept of fatality? Of course people would go insane. But that was just a book. This is real life.”

“Books are about real life,” Odasaku pointed out. “No one can come up with anything they haven’t seen at least once. Perhaps that was what the author was implying — that none of us knows the true essence of death, until it comes.”

“Death is death. What is there to understand?”

“Life is life,” he proposed, then, shrugging. “Does that make it easier to understand?”

Dazai hummed. “Synonyms.”

His arm appeared in front of him; not touching his chest directly, but pushing him back from a passing bicycle all the same. “Is synonym tragic or comic?”

“Tragic. Of course.”

“How come?”

“Too many repetitive syllables. Say, Odasaku,” He slurped the last of his ramen, throwing the package into a nearby can. His hands settled upon two sides of the parking rack, pressing to separate his feet from the ground. He swung: “If we cannot change the verity of death, then, are we all not dead — from the moment we open our eyes, until we close them?”

Odasaku seldom said what he did not believe to be true; though he would have insisted his word wasn’t unshakable honestly, Dazai had yet not to take something he said as such.

Dazai was all but blind to trust; someone so eerily amusing, simply, could never be wrong in any ways that mattered.

“I don’t think so, no,” he said, eons later.

Disappointment crowded in his chest. “No? Why not?”

“Well, there is something in the middle, isn’t there?” He spoke as if unfamiliar with the concept; watching it all from some rain-wet rooftop. Odasaku knew all about humanity; it wasn’t a matter of feeling it on his skin, though. “That’s what makes them so afraid, I believe. What they will lose. No one would be scared to lose death, so there must be something else.”

“Something else?”

“You wail and you die,” he said, and his tone said he was quoting something. “These are two things no one needs to be taught. But many more need time to be learned, so there’s the in between. And however bad it might be, I don’t know if it deserves to be revered as a simple and.”

“Oh,” Dazai blinked. “That’s interesting.”

A car came to a stop right in front of their soaked silhouettes, wheels splashing puddles on their shoes. Same old dent near the left light — where Dazai had grabbed the wheel from its owner’s hands just to crash it against a stall — same old two-masks-shaped thingy dangling from the rear view mirror, when the driver window was rolled down.

“Great,” Ango said, running unimpressed eyes up and down their muddy exterior. “Did you two have another job in the sewers?”

They exchanged a glance.

“Shotgun!” Dazai concluded.

“No,” His eyes widened. “Wait, no, what —“

Despite all the whining, Ango did end up allowing them to enter his car, attempting to make Dazai stop fidgeting with every button and radio station in existence. Hirotsu Fumiko’s Photograph played from the old stereos as Odasaku leaned between their seats, his seatbelt dutifully on, and offered unnecessary directions.

He talked about it all, leaning out of his window to wave at every bored passerby, repeating the action whenever their stressed driver’s fist closed around the back of his coat to pull him back in.

“I’m still practicing my cooking,” he let them know, “And you will be the first to taste it, won’t you?”

“That’s debatable,” Odasaku said.

“I would rather die from strangulation,” Ango added, swatting his hand off the dashboard lighter.

“Rude,” he replied. “Ango, what’s this I hear about some pretty colleague of yours making moves on you?”

“How do you hear about everything —“

“I’m an Executive! I need to execute things!”

“Congratulations,” Odasaku offered, honestly. “I have experience with being a best man. Should you ever need it.”

Dazai blinked. “From where?”

“This job I did North Korea, I had to —“

“The only marriage that might ever happen is with my work,” Ango constantly sported eyebags and slightly ruffled hair; insomniac as Dazai was, even he had to concede that the man’s exhaustion might just beat his own. “I don’t know who is spreading these rumors, but rest assured that I have no time for —“

“You should direct her to me, then,” He clasped his hands under his chin, begging. “If she is suicidal enough to ask you for a date —“

“What is that supposed to mean —“

“ — then, she might just accept to commit a double suicide with —“

“And how are the kids, Odasaku?” the man asked, his voice even higher than Hirose’s last drawn out notes. “You said two of them have been protesting your offer to get them enrolled in school?”

“We might as well check in together,” he answered, nodding towards the esplanade in front of them. Delighted, Dazai began to open his door, ready to jump out — quickly stopped by the click of Ango’s finger locking them all in. At the edge of their vision appeared the building Dazai himself had bought, all those months ago, out of some curious, detached desire to make sure the kids would be safe. “Park there. No, not there. Here. Yes. Pops might just murder me if I get the van scratched.”

A borderline overwhelming fragrance enveloped them the moment they stepped inside the Freedom Restaurant, rusty bell chiming along to their squashing shoes — warm curry and old soup, accompanied by some economic tea and cheap beer.

A chubby man raised his spatula in a debonair wave, smiling at Odasaku in the way most people tended to smile at him — slightly perplexed, but much too amused to pay any mind to it.

“There you are,” the owner said, either not noticing or just not caring about the wide-eyed glance Ango was directing to his once-white shirt — seemingly mauled, splattered in some red substance that looked too much like blood. “Here for another cooking lesson for that birthday gift of yours, or for the kids?”

Dazai perched up. “Cooking lessons?”

“The latter,” Odasaku replied, gladly accepting the spoon the man offered him, right out of his curry pan. “This is perfect, Pops.”

Dazai and Ango exchanged a glance. If that curry was perfect for his standards, then most men would have caught fire just attempting to smell it too closely.

They took a step back.

Pops finally seemed to notice them. He grinned. “That must be the birthday boy, correct? Or did you find some new orphans?”

“I’m not seventeen yet,” Dazai informed him, pretending not to notice his friends’ raised ears — hoping for a slip up and a date. “But I’m assuming I’m the one all these cooking lessons are for, then? Odasaku, you shouldn’t have! Do you even know what my favorite dish is?”

Ever-knowing, ever-moondust Odasaku offered him a curled eyebrow. “That’s a trick question.”

His smile burned with unbridled joy. “Of course.”

“You know,” Ango intervened, as the man dragged them out and up the wooden stairs of the restaurant, “Crab would taste much better if you did tell Odasaku when he should bring it to you —“

“How do you know it’s crab?” the other two asked, with matching bewildered expressions.

He stared at them. “What, was I supposed to forget the hours he spent classifying every type of canned crab he has ever eaten in his life?”

“I don’t eat that much crab,” Dazai mumbled. “Do I? It’s very cheap. It does taste good. I did say I would pick it as my favorite.”

“You don’t pick a favorite,” Ango pointed out, fixing their three pairs of shoes tidily on the floor. “You just have one. And you’re obsessed with crab, so —“

“Technically, you do pick everything,” Odasaku said, with little concern. “Included your least favorites. If you don’t, you might end up in awkward silences with other people.”

“You would know about awkward silences.”

“What do you mean?”

“What do I — Odasaku.”

“It should definitely be crab,” Dazai muttered, making the mistake of pushing the door open. “I need to pick a brand, though. There’s so many. There’s no way I —“

A shrilling shriek pierced the air, mere pitches from cracking Ango’s glasses; three weights in total threw themselves at the man, without a care for any laws of gravity — burying him into the floor under a mess of flower-patterned shirts and gaping tooth-holes.

“Glasses-Niisan!”

“Kill him now!”

“Katsumi, his arms! His arms, dummy!”

“I am — “

“Oh,” Shinji gaped, mesmerized, waddling across the mafioso’s chest. He stole his glasses, and perched them on his too-small face. “Oh, Glasses-Niisan sees like when it rains!”

Ango’s screams were pointless; Odasaku did nothing more than step over that messy bundle of limbs and into the room, reaching the furthest bunk bed. Careful not to jolt her too harshly, he picked up a peacefully sleeping Sakura up in his arms.

Leaning his side on the doorframe, Dazai watched him lay scarred knuckles on her forehead, taking her temperature. Unworried and untouched — but the grip around her body was a doctor’s tool on the severed vein of some patient, laying chest open on his table. He had never seen raindrops as delicate.

“Dazai!” Ango cried out, hooking one freed hand around his ankle. Katsumi, Kousuke and Shinji were slamming their little fists on his back with vigor. “Do something, for the love of —“

“Dazai!” the trio shrieked, abruptly realizing his presence.

They didn’t dare to tackle him — they never had. They didn’t call him Niisan; nor did they reach out to pull his hair, when his tales took too long to get to the point. If coaxed with all but words, though, they would sit on his lap and teach him intricate hand-clapping games. On a good day, they would ask if they could draw on his bandages.

It was, it seemed, a good day. “I have a dragon design! A new one!” Kousuke begged. “Please, please, please, can I —“

Sun broke through, painting squares on the moquette and the scribbled pieces of paper abandoned all over the bedroom. They settled on the floor. Ango was plagued by Shinji and Katsumi, one on each leg, loudly discussing how to best disassemble and reassemble the man’s stolen watch; Dazai ooh-ed and aah-ed in all the right moments as Kousuke dragged some maker down his bandages, sitting on his calf.

The kids seemed to know enough about their sister’s recovery not to throw themselves at Odasaku; only Shinji whined until he was allowed to lay against his side, playing with the console he had begged Dazai to let him borrow.

“Of course,” he told him, patting his head, the way Mori did. Then, because Odasaku would have, he added: “But if you delete my savings, I will torture you. Mafia style.”

His eyes widened. “Not the tickles,” he whispered, unexplainably.

They talked. Odasaku rarely justified bringing them to visit the kids with him; it wasn't a recurring occasion, but Dazai had studied him enough to be familiar with the content curve of his shoulders. For some reason, though, he found joy in showing them off.

Not the right term. It was a cruel way of seeing the world, one that no one would call Dazai out for — an unfair stain on the best man he knew. Perhaps, he considered. Perhaps Odasaku just liked sitting in a room full of people he tolerated.

“Hey,” Dazai asked Kousuke, after finishing pointing out every wrong detail on the drawing on his arm. “What’s wrong with Yu-Yu? Did Sakura pass her fairy germs to him?”

The child was too close to tears to muster up a word — head lowered to study his markers with the same doubt he had seen on men walking to their end. He tried to make him jump on his lap, tickling his undersides, to no avail.

Shinji pulled his sleeve.

“Yu hid under the covers when we heard you three come up,” he explained, one hand stuck in the knot of Ango’s tie — uncaring of the man’s symphony of ouch. “The kids at school have been telling him stories. Now he’s always scared.”

“Just tell him other stories. A lot of them,” Odasaku brushed the matter away. “Dazai, if you could? He likes yours the most.”

“That’s why I’m not returning to school,” Katsume declared, one foot stepping right between Ango’s legs.

Odasaku’s features stayed unchanged, playing with one of Sakura’s chubby arms. “It’s been five months. Pops has already enrolled you for the next semester —“

“What? No, I’m not —“

“— He has enrolled all of you, actually, and Sakura will start too, as soon as she —“

“That’s not fair!”

“Instruction is fundamental,” Ango wheezed, holding his hands discretely over his hurt parts. “If any of you brats want to amount to anything in life, you should definitely —“

“Shut up, Glasses-Niisan!”

Dazai took advantage of the mess to put Kousuke on the ground. He made his way to the further corner of the room — the one bunk-bed only half occupied.

Yu is kind of shy, he had seen Pops try to explain to the other kids, when a fight had arisen about their sleeping arrangement. Be nice to your brother; or he will not be nice to you. A mafioso’s way of thinking — no matter if he was only so by association and protection. Poison spread far and always too efficiently.

Dazai settled on the floor, right in front of the evident bump underneath the superhero-adorned sheets. Because he had been raised by a doctor in all ways that mattered, he saw the hand half appearing from the edge of the blanket, and knew he wasn't sick.

He immediately saw him stiffen.

"I've checked the archives, like you asked me," Dazai said, laying his chin on his hands. "To complete that story I was telling you? I got it wrong — you were right. It wasn't four blown up corpses, it was actually five. I applaud your memory."

"Go away."

He stared. "What, did my story give you nightmares? Is that it? Please, don't tell Odasaku. He might make me eat his extra spicy curry again, and my stomach can't take it."

Yu turned around, offering him his shoulders. He was shaking from head to toe.

"Is it bullies?" he sighed, eventually. "I had those too, you know. They didn't tell me stories, though. Yours seem well educated. That's nice. It means the school your Pops chose for you is a good one. Odasaku will be pleased," He hummed. "I have it on very good authority, though, that bullies dislike yellow things. There's this colleague of mine who makes lemon shaped bombs. I could ask him if —"

"Demon Prodigy."

Downstairs, some truck driver paid for his meal and made his way to his vehicle. It roared to life with uncomfortable loudness, through the peaceful the afternoon; behind the sunlight peeking through the window — Dazai would get all burned up again, he knew; he got burned every summer season — it drove out of the parking lot.

He ripped the brightest of his band-aids off, sticking it to a column of the bed, blood and all. "Oh," he said. "Those kinds of stories."

It wasn't all that surprising. Pops was tight on money and schedule; that meant a school in the area had been the only possible choice. But the Freedom Restaurant was right at the edge of the Port Mafia territory — much too close to the borders of some other smaller gangs.

Every kid in the neighborhood had to have been warned about the dangers of the night.

They tell bedtime about us, you know, Chuuya had told him, once, in another bunk bed. Seemingly uncaring. He was, Dazai assumed; tales about the one King in Suribachi City had reached Mori's ears before any professional report. Maybe that habit was exactly what had painted his voice bitter.

"They told me you killed their dads," Gone was Yu's dangling head; the first rule every kid learned was — the monster won't reach under the blanket. "Saw when you and Oda came to pick us up, and — they told me you killed my dad, too."

"I didn't," Dazai told him, easily. "Theirs — I might have, yes. I might need to see a picture, to confirm. I killed a lot of people. That's what shadows do — they must have told you."

His flinch was an answer enough.

“Did they tell you the shadows’ name, too?”

He had yet to hear someone so young breathe out the unutterable. Double Black was a name for older lips. He assumed bedtime stories worked better without names, anyway.

He tied bunny-ears on his shoelaces. Yu gulped. “Was it the god, then? Did he kill my dad?”

“It’s dog, not god,” he corrected. “And dogs don’t kill parents. Unless they’re ordered to. Plus, want to know something cool?” He pulled on his blanket; Yu whined. “They don’t leave anyone alive, when they do kill. Take it as a reassurance, wouldn’t you?”

A friend from work, he had been introduced as. The children were well aware of the Port Mafia. The kids at school were probably just as aware; taunting someone under the Mafia protection was the most lowly gang members could do.

Yu’s shaking got worse. Odasaku would certainly notice soon — would walk there, smiling child still in his arms, and look down at him with —

(Not mad, no. But Dazai knew he sometimes felt the instinct to wring him out like his clothes.

Everyone who spent too much time with him ended up calling him a prodigy, at least once. If not that, then — certainly a demon).

He sighed, climbing to his feet.

Somberly, he patted the child’s head, because Mori used to do the same. “Rest assured,” he offered, because Odasaku would have soothed a crying child. He always fixed Dazai’s messes, when he let him see them. “Had it been us, you would not be alive.”

---

...

---

Elise found out he had discovered some new hand-clapping games, and she got mad when he couldn’t teach her. Hirotsu stood a reasonable, polite distance from him, at all times.

One evening, he strolled around Building Two with Madame Tanaki’s hand around his arm, as she recounted every inch of gossip he might have missed before his return. He counted the tattoos on her arms, wondering about most of their meanings.

“— which makes no sense, truly,” she insisted, leading him towards the Infirmary. “He should know better than to believe these voices. Look at Miranda — Hirotsu is always away for work, but she doesn’t complain, does she?”

“Maybe Gramps is hiding his marital problems from us,” Dazai noted. “Though, from how he’s described her, I don’t think she’s prone to jealousy. Apart from the rage fits.”

“The ones where she destroys his clothes?” Tanaki nodded in understanding. “It’s just — it’s those ditzy women my dear works with. I know they’re filling his head with rumors about me. See what a modern woman has to withstand for the sake of working? I’m his fiancé. He could stand having some more faith in me.”

“Do you want me to kill him?”

She paused. “Not yet.”

He hummed. “Shame. I really don’t like how he says r words.” Though he had only met him once — the man had brought Tanaki lunch, which had certainly been a point in his favor; and he hadn’t even blinked all that much when he had found her, Chuuya and Dazai holed up under his desk, catching up with Spider Eyes.

“What’s wrong with his r?” she asked.

“Are the ditzy women Momo and Kaneshiro?”

“You remember?”

“Of course I remember,” Dazai huffed, “You called them tentacles-vomiting backstabbing sluts.”

Her hand swatted at him. “No, I didn’t.”

“I recall that very vividly —“

“You know,” Tanaki muttered, “For two teenagers who swear and swear again that they have no care at all for all the gossip I offer, you and Chuuya certainly do print every detail of my stories under those naughty eyes of yours —“

Dazai whined, “Blackmailing material!”

“Oh, yes,” Her eyes rolled to the back of her head, disbelieving, “Just like arguing about the current plotlines of my soap operas — which you so despise — is purely a study on — how did you put it? The foolishness of human creativity —“

“Everyone with eyes can see that Uchida is the personification of plague,” he replied. He and Chuuya had thrown popcorn at each other for that discussion, Tanaki’s frame always between them. “If the Hatrack is too blind to see it, I must get worried. He might need glasses. We can’t have him shoot at the wrong people.”

She laughed. He stood straighter; kind of longed for a cigarette, just for the good job done.

“I haven’t seen you around each other much,” she said. “I mean, you’ve been attached to the hip for months. I had expected you to be each other’s shadows.”

“Mori is, sometimes, generous in nature,” Dazai was keen to explain, nodding obnoxiously down at her. She had always been short — even more than Chuuya — but he had not noticed how much he towered on her these days. “For a gain, of course. I get it. The constant mutter about Double Black this and Soukoku that — It started to bore me too. Perhaps he will be merciful enough to put an end to it.”

It was a hope dead from birth, and Tanaki’s glance said that she knew it. “You know, he’s asked about you.”

He snorted. “That’s a lie.”

“Alright,” she admitted. “But he asked in all but words. And you did too.”

That was presumptuous — particularly from the Slug’s side. He was prone to obsession and unwanted thoughts; but Chuuya was as free as the summer wind. As endlessly unconcerned with his fate as the necessity of Dazai staying alive — for his sake; forevermore a martyr’s only scapegoat of selfishness — would allow him to be. “You watch too many soap operas.”

“You two watch them with me!” Tanaki smiled. “I’m just saying — I know you have this whole gig of truly despising the utter of the other’s name —“

Dazai’s jaw fell. “Gig?”

“There’s nothing bad about being used to each other,” she insisted. “You can dislike someone and still feel their absence in a room, you know?”

He blinked.

Makes sense, he thought, reasonably. Habit created expectations. Cold toes bumping against the unbandaged corners of his legs — always, always careful not to touch; always hooking two little fingers if the scratches down his arms were too vivid; always waking up back against back, no one else to entrust it to, ever and ever — created a hollow sort of hiss in his skeleton, asking him to turn on his side and study a darkened silhouette that had grown to be as familiar as his burned-off fingertips.

“How boring,” Dazai lamented, instead. “Tanaki. Don’t bore me.”

Gin had recovered completely. She shyly allowed him to clasp her thin hands in his, as he sat at the edge of her hospital bed.

“A little miracle from the sewers,” he told Tanaki, much to the contempt of the girl’s blushing cheeks. “A little killer! Isn’t she just precious?” She was a pale thing, smaller than a petal; the bony fingers between around his had the careful grasp of someone who was learning how to choke the life out of a giant.

Astonishing results, Mori had said, after one of his consultations with the secret Executive. One would dare call her a child prodigy, if not in fear of offending you.

No offense, he had replied, as it was scripted. I take no pride in it.

“I’ll be up by morning, sir,” she assured him, with a small voice. Liquid ink strands rained down the sides of her face; certainly more cured than it had been when Dazai had found them. “I,” A flash of stubbornness brightened her eyes, before subduing. “I will start training soon.”

“Good,” Dazai nodded. “Your Executive has already taken in a few more students. All male, once again. You don’t want to lose your streak of difference, do you?”

Vacant determination filled her hollow cheeks, tightening her grip around his fingers. She would survive, he knew — she also would have put a knife in his chest and run into the darkness, if allowed.

Akutagawa had been the one to run into the woods looking for the escaped criminals. But Gin — healing from the uncertain bandages her brother had wrapped around her with vacant eyes — had been the one to sink her stolen kitchen knife in the few corpses her brother had managed to leave on the floor.

A pointless show of violence.

Corpses couldn’t die, and children like her couldn’t cry. But she had dragged herself by the elbows, dirt against her wounds, and held a knife in all the wrong ways. Port Mafia black, from the first glance Dazai had set on her.

Akutagawa had signed both of their fates away. He had seen her lips grow blue with the knowledge.

“They’re boys,” Gin said. “It’s the only reason why they think they’re better than me.”

Madame Tanaki caressed her hair. “Never heard truer words, sweetheart.”

“There’s a solution for every problem,” Dazai said, offering her a gift from his pocket. She blinked down at one of Hirotsu’s stolen lighters, tracing the print of a lizard on its front. “Well — I can’t solve unfairness. But when you begin training with the Black Lizards, you could present yourself however you prefer.”

Her eyes widened. There was nothing desperate in the way they settled upon him. Nothing begging; nothing starved. If she had met him in the woods, he thought — they wouldn’t have been here, now.

Cautious, she dared: “They don’t have to know I’m a girl?”

“As much as it pains me to say it,” Tanaki intervened, “The Lizards aren’t the best place to be a woman in. Things are better, ever since Hirotsu took over — but the previous Boss was not particularly keen on the idea of allowing women in the Mafia. Especially when they had no Abilities to offer,” She frowned; was quick to wipe it off. “Still, you could represent a good change.”

“Unless,” Dazai pushed her chin up with a knuckle, winking. Her cheeks were too hollow to blush; she despised him as respectfully as possible. “Unless, of course, you have other reasons to be known as something different.”

She gulped. The flicker of something in her eyes wasn’t entirely unfamiliar; the Mafia did have a thing for the outcasted. “I — can?”

“I don’t see why not, little spider,” He booped her nose. “Just win that duel of yours against your brother, and I’ll spread the voice of the Akutagawa brothers myself.”

The web tore at the seams.

She was fast to hide it, but her grasp around her sheets was not quite controlled enough yet. Tanaki made a face. “Sir,” Gin said, undeterred, “I was — thinking.”

Dazai leaned against the feet of the bed, curling an eyebrow.

“I am — honored,” Gin said, decisive even in the little hesitation she showed to look him in the eyes. “To have the occasion to compete for such an important rank. However, I don’t think mine and my brother’s fates should depend on each other.”

“You don’t think?”

Something in his voice shook her fingers; still, she insisted: “They have, our entire life. It’s a childish request, but — I don’t want things between us to turn sour. Ryuu, he is — Trying. Sir, he really is trying.”

“I know he is.”

Startled, both women snapped their eyes in his direction.

A short time to be known as the personification of any and all frustrating failures Akutagawa Ryunosuke couldn’t quite avoid; Dazai supposed there wasn’t much to do about it.

He sighed. Crunching down to allow Gin the higher point of view, he explained: “Let me be very frank with you, little spider. If I didn’t see any minimal effort from your brother, I would simply kill him.”

She didn’t flinch; didn’t protest. Only set her jaw.

“And if I didn’t think a fight between you two could show me useful results,” he added, just blank enough to turn Tanaki’s surprise into a frown. “I wouldn’t have proposed it. I’m not trying to punish either one of you. I don’t do things that won’t benefit the Mafia. It would do you two well to remember that, yes?”

Gin lowered her eyes.

“Should either of you not give their all during this trial, though,” Dazai sighed, again. “Well. That would be very annoying. And a direct show of disobedience. Unlike my ideas — those do warrant a punishment.”

“I —“ Her lips trembled; she pressed them tight. Good, he thought, good, good; what are you teaching her, old bastard? “We wouldn’t dare, sir.”

“I want to be clear, Gin,” He searched her eyes; dug as deep as one was allowed and then lower, where men would not attempt to avoid his gaze any longer. “If you lose on purpose, I’ll know. And when I know, I will kill him.”

A bone deep terror veiled her eyes, sticking ruined eyelashes together — terror and rage, never ending and aimless. The day he had brought a car to the slums to take them away, she had kept her eyes on the rear view mirror the whole time — holding her brother’s wrist like his bones might at least listen to her.

“I won’t, sir,” she promised — bloodied teeth in his throat. “I won’t. He — He would hate me for it. I would despise myself.”

For him, he thought. For him, you’ll do worse.

Would he?

“Wonderful,” He ruffled her hair; traced the almost erased mark Rashomon had left on her cheek. “Seeing your clear understanding, I trust you won’t say a word to your brother about this conversation. I hope you won’t prove me wrong.”

Spider-eyed Gin set her jaw. “No, sir.”

“Wonderful. You’ve got time. Rest a bit more, would you? Nights are always longer in Yokohama,” Dazai winked again. “You’ve got some boys to out-man, don’t you?”

---

...

---

Via some unspoken agreement, Dazai was not allowed in the Old World.

It’s a goddamn bar, Chuuya would have argued, unimpressed, had he been confronted with that staple of truth — because he was flippant where it mattered and he had too many things that mattered to be flippant — do whatever the hell you want. Dazai had it on good authority that his seat never changed — right by the pool table the Flags had preferred. Dazai had it on good authority that sometimes he scratched his pricey shoes against the too-new tiles, unmindful of how Kouyou would tut at the ruined leather.

Now, she would say, this is no Suribachi.

He had it on good authority that he wasn't allowed in the Old World.

"Alright," Aki Haruka — some Lizard in a pink ribbon and a particular interest in the curve of Dazai's eyeballs, as per her own words — dared, a bit lost. "But — wait. Was this before or after Vice Executive Nakahara locked you in the vents?"

"Pay attention," Dazai reprimanded. "I'm the one who locked him in the vents. You think I'd ever give my back to him in a secluded space? What if tried to sniff my backside like the dog he is?"

The mental image caused her a flinch. "And then he demanded you stay out of the bar because of that?"

"No. That was before, "He tapped the brim of his glass, spinning around on his stool. Through his turning vision, she was a rather pretty speck of full lips and the same apathetically murderous eyes the Black Lizards shared, dressed in green. When he dragged his vowels out, she blushed. "Around the time he got that ugly new eye color? I told you about that."

"You told me all about a lot," Aki replied, cheerfully tight. "I'm still trying to place the hat controversy."

"The less you think about it, the better," he advised. He pinched the space between her thumb and forefinger, gently, startlingly a nerve that raised her hand — grabbing ahold of it, he kissed her knuckles. "Such disheartening visions could fade that beautiful color in your eyes."

She nodded, seemingly amused. "Beautiful things should only look at beautiful things."

"Oh?" He grinned. There was a vitality in her eye-wrinkles that pulsed like blood out of a dying severed limb. "Should I look at you, then?"

She huffed. He squeezed his heart through the jacket, recalling the way the men at Ace's Casino tables treated the girls about to win them a fortune. He leaned in to stage-whisper: "Though, my colors might fade from the intensity."

"Might they?"

"It's bound to be an equal exchange. The horrid and the marvelous aren't all that different — most small-minded people mistake one for the other with ease," Dazai confirmed. Bitterness scrunched up his face. "That despicable hatrack would know all about it."

The curve of Aki's eyes turned pained.

Whatever that poison was, it didn't manage to sour her enough not to let out a giggle when Dazai grabbed the base of her stool and spun her around, swapping their drinks to leave her with the fuller one.

"How gentlemanly," she complimented, elbowing him. "Going straight for a girl's heart?"

“Always,” he assured, earnestly. “In the most literal, vividly flesh-like sense. In fact — how would you feel about a double —“ Behind a monocle, a grey eye started ticking the moment it met Dazai’s own.

His smile fell.

“You calling me to come here — it must be a ploy to show off how vengeful slugs can be,” he loudly whined, stomping, as Hirotsu dragged him away from Aki’s startled floor-deep bow. “Forgive me if I was trying to enjoy my time before my death sentence. Did I make a mistake by giving you my number, Hirotsu? Did I? I was on a date you know —“

“Why Slug, anyway?” the man wondered, undeterred, as he led him through the red brick walls and the tobacco-scented round tables.

“Once, I tried to lean my back on him, and instead of sitting up like any other human would have — he did a full split,” Dazai replied, stealing a glass from a crying man flat against the counter. “Like — a full split. Chin and chest to the ground. He didn’t even stop writing his reports,” He shuddered. “Do you think that’s why Kouyou likes him? Because he’s literally spineless? I know she likes that in a man, but —“

“Executive!” With little care for those in nearby tables he accidentally smacked in the face, Kajii Motojiro waved his arms. “Here! Here, Executive! Hey, waiter — do we get any discounts if an Executive buys us drinks?”

Dazai’s visits to the Old World had been occasional — before. It hadn’t taken anyone in the Mafia much to understand that finding Chuuya was a matter of stepping through those doors and having the admirable courage to interrupt one of the Flags’ pool games.

The place hadn’t changed much. It didn’t even smell of blood; he wondered what Verlaine would have thought of it — if inconsequential would have been too gentle of a definition.

“You don’t need discounts,” Hirotsu said, as he straightened the man’s stool before he could fall. One of his lighters had been abandoned mere inches from Kajii’s green scarf; Dazai’s fingers subtly snuck forward to steal it. “You get paid an obscene amount just to tool away —“

“Not nearly enough for all of my efforts!” he snapped. “I’ve been spending night and day studying those boring Ability-bullets — Sergeant Maresuke’s ones? The Senator? They’re — hic! — not even lemon shaped! Not even scholarly enough to wonder about their own annihilation — they just want to kill!”

“I assume that’s the point of death.”

“No!” Kajii snapped, wildly enough for the lemon bombs hanging from his coat to dangle in the open. Subtly, people from nearby tables moved their seats further away. “No, you heathen, listen to me —“

The scientist's loud protests — and the old man's attempt to divert the attention from it — did nothing to pull the gazes of the entire bar away from Dazai.

The attention had stopped being intriguing some time after the third occasion of him peeking from behind Mori's back during a meeting. What it had never stopped being, though, was useful; when he sighed, and took advantage of Hirotsu's curved back — looking for his lighter on the floor — to step onto one of the shaking seats, he didn't even have to click a spoon against his drink to call for attention.

"Good evening!" Dazai waved. The gesture seemed to horrify part of the crowd, as the voices grew lower and lower over the music. "Forgive the interruption. Do pile up your order on Chuuya's tab as a reward. Miraculously, did any of you see where the resident Hatrack might have gone when he left? Drunken than a sailor, I was told?"

Glances were exchanged.

Dazai's arms fell. "Seriously? He's that tiny you didn't see him?"

"Sir, can you get your foot off my back?" Hirotsu questioned, still bent in a half.

"You better start remembering," he let the crowd know, frowning. "Executions are anything but far and within these days, don't you know?"

The crowd stood so fast the lights trembled along.

"I was joking," he said, blank faced.

They were slow to sit down again.

He sighed again, jumping down to land on his seat, head tilted back against the headrest. "He's small, vibrant like a fire alarm and louder than the trumpets of Judgement Day," he noted, scrubbing his forehead, "How did you lose him."

"We didn't lose him," Kajii whined, words slurring as he drowned against the table. "He just set off. Good luck catching the — hic! — the guy who can walk on the roof. Too hard! Too hard!"

Murmurs surrounded them. No one could truly whisper in a bar. Nothing better than being looked at, Kouyou used to say, wiping blood prints off the floor — from shoes of men willing to die for her approval. In our line of work? Dazai would question.

Of course, she'd huff. We must hide under the sunlight. At the very least, let us be seen when it's dark.

What are we, he hadn't told her — because she wouldn't have laughed, and there was no other reason to speak — What are we, vampires?

"Executives don't get discounts," Dazai let Kajii know. Some low ranked punk had fallen to the ground in his haste to offer his seat to him — he juggled with the idea of taking his gun out, just to watch him pale. "Ane-san said so."

“Women and drinks aren’t the same thing,” Kajii made him notice.

“She has boys, too,” Dazai shrugged.

Murmurs raised, minimally.

Hirotsu cleared his throat, directing him a glance — ruff and exasperated. “I apologize for the late summoning, Executive. I wasn’t quite sure of who else to call.”

He cringed. “Don’t ever say those words in regard to the Slug to me ever again, would you?

Reaching out to slap Dazai’s shoulder amiably, Kajii ignored Hirotsu’s aborted attempt to cut his hand off. “Why don’t you catch him? You can do it. Y’two, always — hic! — always in each others’ shoes, aren’t you!”

Horried glances gathered at their feet; Hirotsu stared at the ceiling. Dazai turned his head to stare at the sweaty hand hooked on his coat.

“Kajii,” he called.

“Yesss — Yes, sir, Executive sir, sir Executive, yes.”

“Do you think you could lend me some lemon bombs? There’s this kid I know who might be interested.”

“At a price, certainly!” the man roared, immediately standing to open his coat. The nearby patrons flew their chairs in a haste; Hirotsu pulled him back into his own by the scarf, choking him. “How about you find a way to convince Madame Tanaki to give a chance to slightly younger —“

“You’re Dazai, right?”

The man was tall, and sporting eyebags a shade darker than the violet of bruises. A smaller man was half hiding behind his frame; when Dazai opened his eye to confirm, he squeaked.

“As in Chuuya’s Dazai?” he hissed, not low enough, to his makeshift wall.

“As in Executive Dazai, you moron.”

“Hamamoto, you know I don’t get how this whole hierarchy thing works —“

Chuuya’s —

The crests in Dazai’s brain had paused a few steps behind. He thought he should have been surprised by the way Hirotsu caught the slightest stiffening of his abandoned leg; he thought maybe that might have been asking too much.

A mixture of offense and hesitation had his fingers spasming. He tapped them on the table instead; jumped to his feet so fast, both the men in front of him lowered in a bow. Chuuya is one of the shadows, too, he thought about saying, pointlessly, as he recognized their faces. You play pool with him, though.

“You spilled your drink on you,” he let the taller one — Hamamoto; rancid street kid, second in command of the Guerrilla squad; and whether the two were connected, only Chuuya’s settlement scars knew — know.

“I’ll get another,” the man reassured. He had a debonair air to himself, lined by something that told him he had heard all of Dazai’s stories. “Since Chuuya is paying.”

“Quite,” He closed his eyes again, bored, vaguely agitating his arm in his direction. “Any idea of where he might have wandered off? Boss will be on my tail if he drunkenly takes down the Ferris Wheel. Imagine the paperwork.”

“Madame Tanaki likes paperwork,” Kajii sighed, positively enamoured.

“She’s engaged,” Hirotsu informed.

“I have bombs,” he reminded him. “Many of them.”

Dazai traced the cracked lines of his wrist watch. The display had never been repaired after Hirotsu’s accident during the Dragon Head Conflict — for unexplainable reasons, instead of just throwing it away, the man had given it to him.

Saw you look at it, when — he had said. And nothing else. When, he had thought, when — and sentimentalism made sense in some corner of his mind; it was merely untouchable.

He had kept the watch, though.

“Not if you give them to me. Well?” he insisted, obnoxiously twirling his arm again. “If you don’t have anything to say, I’ll just go see if Aki can still be amenable to duel midnight drowning.”

The two Guerrilla exchanged a glance.

---

...

---

Apart from the gravity-mauled grab handlers on the train to Tokyo, the congestion of police cars parked around the French Embassy had been all the giveaway Dazai had needed.

“A pigeon attack?” he guessed, jumping to walk across the hood of one of the blaring vehicles — landing a step from Officer Matsuda, braced by the dirty looks of the other officers. “No, no, wait, don’t tell me — it was raccoons.”

“Why raccoons?” the man questioned, just seasoned enough not to do more than glance a bit surprisedly in his direction.

“Pseudo opposable thumbs,” he replied, nodding towards the vandalized, vaguely shattered frontal wall of the building. The blue and red lights of the far painted the glass panels in purpleish shades; the crowd of police officers seemed more perplexed than concerned. “It’s actually a rotating system, but — well. How else would they have written that adorable,” Dazai tilted his head to the side, squinting, “Fock de Francais spyeyes graffiti.”

“Maybe it’s monkeys,” Matsuda theorized. “If monkeys know how to write checks, now.”

Dazai curled an eyebrow.

He handed him an evidence bag. Inside was a crumbled bank check — amounting for a sum much, much larger (???? add 0s on need, it said, too many fuckin’ zeros) than what the building would need to rebuild the broken glass panels, fallen walls and badly spelled out graffiti.

Scribbled on the back, as brusque as sincere, was, m’fault.

“Charming monkeys,” he concluded.

Matsuda yawned, tapping his bald head with the pen he kept in his pocket — never the same one the day after, according to Chuuya. “What brings you here?”

He studied the police tape, jumping from one leg to the other to keep warm. The road of smashed street lights led to the station, he could have said. And he left checks for that too. Or — “Why did they send you here? Yokohama is in shambles. The Ferris Wheel was mysteriously pushed into the Bay by unknown forces.”

“Low on staff. There’s a summer parade in the city,” Matsuda darted a glance his way; leaning on the car, he lowered himself just enough to get on Dazai’s level. “And I’ve got some experience with the kind of destruction that was described in this report. ‘Thought it’d be better if I was here.’”

“To lie to the State,” he nodded.

Matsuda flinched. “To keep an eye open.”

“And your mouth closed. How honorable,” A group of officers exiting the building dangled some new evidence bags. Chuuya’s handwriting was too polished — too familiarly unsure in the starting strokes — not to recognize. “Hey. Can you get me those?”

“I don’t know,” the man muttered some numbers on his radio; a tad too casually, he added: “Can you get Chuuya out of the Mafia?”

He paused.

“The Hatrack likes his shiny jewels so much he’s willing to bleed for them,” he replied, easily, studying the gathering crowd behind the cars. The amusement stuck between his teeth tilted his lips up just so; he bit them. “What makes you think I could unemploy him at will?”

“Don’t know, kid. I get the feeling that if anyone could —” Matsuda declared, his eyes on the building, “You’d have a good shot.”

The Old World’s lights; the pool balls on that green coverage, rolling aimlessly. The earnest look in subordinates who didn’t fear Chuuya at all and who ought to have learned his name from bloodier roads. Chuuya’s Dazai.

“I would have had him fired day one if it was that easy,” Dazai chanted, chin high. “Mutts stick like the plague, haven’t you heard? Smell the same, too.”

“He’s got you on a leash,” the man scoffed.

He snorted — something inside his brain started creaking in a completely different taste; a bitterness that almost had his fingers twitch for a gun. Chuuya’s, Chuuya’s, Chuuya’s —

“You would know,” he landed on, with the childish smile that always got his men to straighten up.

The apartment complex where Chuuya had lived before the Dragon Head Conflict was still an official Port Mafia possession; ever since the boy’s position had been revealed, though, only the lower ranks had been allowed to fill in its corridors.

The WORKS IN PROCESS sign was still hanging from the door of Chuuya’s original place; Dazai tapped two knuckles on it on his way up the stairs, picturing white sheets hanging over the old walls and abandoned French textbooks on the one piece of furniture. An eerie sort of nightly silence pierced the halls; not a trace of the neighbors Dazai had once gone around leaving flour bombs with Chuuya’s name on them under the doors of.

He tore the evidence bag apart with his teeth right as he pushed Albatross’ apartment door open with his shoulders.

“What’s this I read about a ‘they’ll blame it on us’ business, Chibi?” he asked, words muffled, reading the messy note he had left on the paper inside the bag. “If you wanted a rematch for my crushing victory in that Serbian Arcade —“

The ding! of an email came from behind the counter.

Hair a mess and cheeks an unmistakable shade of scarlet, Chuuya was huddled by the wall of pictures attached to the kitchenette, computer in his lap. The sole light of the kitchen hood gave the room a strange tinge — the sepia texture of an old photograph, faded where the mirrorball had been smashed and left with its sharp edges, and the colorful couches had been pushed around to hide the holes the aggressor and Chuuya’s fight had left in the tiles.

Hirotsu had mentioned something about helping Chuuya clean around — getting rid of Ōmu's feathery body, too. It was a sufficient job — he supposed the nape-cold discomfort was his own issue.

Dazai had it on good authority that he wasn't allowed at the Old World. But new ownership or not, he knew — in the way a less skeptical devil stepping through a haunted house would have escaped from — that he wasn't welcomed in that apartment.

“So,” he started — like he hadn't known that was an order Chuuya wouldn't listen to. “No penthouse, then?”

Chuuya grunted. His eyes were lidded; lines over lines of work reports succeeded each other on the computer, painting his face in cobalt shades.

“Who starts doing their job when they're hammered,” Dazai muttered, sinking to the floor.

The pictures got slightly crushed against his back, when he leaned on the kitchen drawers — all Chuuya did was growl some vague treat, and sit close enough for the naked skin of his hand to touch his knuckles. You've got to break them in, Mori had said, about the first pair of shoes he'd gifted him. What's a bit of blood?

“Seriously,” he insisted. “Who's coming for the Mafia? Is the French Prime Minister angry that we killed his top spies or something?”

“Cold,” Chuuya replied, nonsensically.

“It's summer.”

“Yes,” he insisted. He squinted at him very hard; the fatigue in his distracted breathing pattern pressed from his shoulder against Dazai's own. On his computer, emails regarding the graves property for the victims of the Wild Geese Orphanage were blinking impatiently, waiting for a response Dazai probably shouldn't have let him come up with while drunk. “So why is it cold?”

“Global warming,” he offered. “Did Ane-san insert anything about the Industrial Revolution in those catch-up studies of yours?”

“You,” Chuuya started, clearly irritated. He started drooling shortly after — cleaning it off with the back of his glove, he let his head fall back against the kitchen with a thud!.

“Streetlights,” he insisted, at last.

“You really do have a vendetta against those,” Dazai concurred. “Is it a complex? Height issues? Was there not enough electricity in dear old Suribachi?”

He didn't answer. His fingers ran across the emails, spouting badly spelled nonsense. Dazai let him, extracting his console from his coat to settle in.

Some distant pipes hummed over the click of the keyboard and the joystick buttons; an electric sort of buzz came from inside the sharp edges of the broken mirrorball, filling the silence with a gentleness that was weirdly familiar. Dazai thought of Romania, and of Korea, and of Canada — of bandaging their wounds in silence once it had gotten too cold to freeze their tongues arguing, and sleeping on the same bed.

An error in the system, he thought. Nothing more. A fluke that felt like a heartbeat.

Sometimes around his thirteenth round, a head of damp hair — Rin taught me, Chuuya had said, the first time Dazai had watched him stick his entire head under the faucet to get sober — dropped on his shoulder, clanking against his bones. The echo traveled all the way to the smallest moles on his feet — it reverberated quietly.

In barely intelligible words, cheek squished against his good cashmere, Chuuya muttered: “My stupid head hurts.”

“Must be your brain rattling around all the empty space. How bad?”

“Y’know,” His tongue plastered itself to the roof of his mouth for several seconds, “Budapest, when — Got caught in that shitty shootout — It took them fourteen hours to extract us.”

The memory made him wince. Rarely had he felt his limbs as unwilling to cooperate; a living bruise with no hope of ever standing, hidden behind a white van carved in bullets.

“Now you’re exaggerating,” He shivered. “Might have something to do with you drinking yourself to stupor on a Wednesday night.”

His fingers offered their best attempt at obstructing the screen from his eyes; his hand, uncoordinated and sluggish, fell somewhere near his elbow instead. “Hamamoto offered. I wasn’t,” A hiccup, “Gonna refuse.”

“Careful now,” Dazai pressed; the princess on his screen decapitated the nearest enemy. Pot, kettle — or however it went. “They might start fearing your aim will be worsened by something other than your offensive height.”

Mid that humming melody of his — a tad too drunken, and almost too confused to be recognized — Chuuya huffed. “I could shoot you with my eyes closed.”

“With an actual, legitimate gun or with your caveman hands?”

“Can’t I have fun with the actual decent people in this syndicate?”

He tilted his head to the side. “And mourn French secret agents?”

“Nothing to mourn,” His legs spread on the ground; he dangled his ankles back and forth, watching the silver edges of his combat boots shine under the mirrorball shards. “A whole lot to be pissed about.”

“As long as you don’t throw up on that piece of rock you call Rimbaud’s grave,” Dazai paused. “Actually, that might just be very fun. We should go. Now. Immediately.”

His punch was stronger than it should have been, but weaker than norm. “You’re not funny,” Chuuya announced, going cross-eyed, trying to wiggle a finger in his face. “Only the Jiggly-Man is.”

He blinked. “Who?”

“Shhh,” He squished his cheeks between his fingers, staring at some indistinct part of his face with serious eyes. Chuuya didn’t drink to mourn — that would have implied he mourned at all. He knew he had taken up drinking because Mori had told him smoking was bad for him. He smoked, still — but he bought Beatrice’s favorite wine and kept it sealed. “He hears. Everything.”

Dazai hadn’t scribbled the date of Kazuko’s demise anywhere. He was sure to forget it, give it a few months more. Dazai never remembered the irrelevant, and Mori never forgot a thing.

He stuck a finger under his choker, and pulled.

“Tell me,” the boy insisted.

“River,” he said. “Car. Roof,” And then he got graphic — and he got vacantly inspired to a heavenly extent, out of pointless pettiness and illuminated boredom, talking of currents against old bruises and waters down protesting lungs — and how it felt to breathe with worms in his ears and earth in his pockets. “And this strange box method — I’ve been reading about it.”

“I can’t wait for you to succeed,” Chuuya said. His head sank deeper against his shoulder, and if Dazai could have hammered his bones open and fit him there — where he couldn’t blind his days and haunt his nights; where he would have to keep quiet, no Chuuya’s Dazai and no he’s got you on a leash — he would have. “I should burn that book of yours.”

“Conflicting statements,” he noted.

“At least it’s summer,” Chuuya yawned. Dogs knew better than to bite the blade out of the master’s hand. Dazai knew Rimbaud had died a year ago, and he knew the Flags had planned a party for Chuuya’s six months in the Mafia, and he knew they had died, and he knew nothing of the utterly human ache in Chuuya’s bad-omen eyes. “I can jump in rivers. Try and stick to that.”

Dazai paused.

He had no time to add anything to it — by the time the videogame level got unbeatable enough to be pointless, Chuuya was snoring with his fingers stuck to the ? on the keyboard, leaving an email draft full of questions on the screen.

After some inner discussion, Dazai pressed send.

“You’re stickier than a slug,” he concluded, annoyed. “And you’ll get mad at me about it by the time you’re sober, won’t you? Hypocrite.”

There was nothing to think about but the rush of wind through the windows; a ghost's petty insistence that he shouldn't have been let in.

He let Chuuya drop to the floor, gingerly settling one of the half torn blankets over his strange sleeping pose and the illuminated laptop. Steal his bed, the more childish part of him ordered — so he stretched, satisfied, and dragged himself to his futon, next to Albatross' untouched bed.

People could not be owned, he considered, as he pulled the futon where Chuuya's freckled face appeared in the doorframe — people could only exist. Odasaku would agree. Would wring him out with all his dirty laundry, and never hate him enough. And yet, Dazai, Dazai as in Chuuya's —

"Shit," the boy murmured, in his sleep. It was quiet; it was loud enough to rattle the barely repaired windows. He slurred: "I hate your fucking face so much, man."

"You're a person-adjacent manifestation of hemorrhoids yourself," he called, over the horridly loud snoring coming, once again, from the boy's mouth. As he fell asleep, Chuuya began to hum. "Night, night," he chanted, too, because Chuuya would get mad the moment he woke up with back pains — and that ought to be enough reason to reject his own, free, sea-wind fresh bed.

If it wasn't, Dazai considered, snuggling just close enough to steal some warmth. Dazai was seventeen, at last, and no one needed to know. He fell asleep to the sound of that melody he really, sort of, almost, wanted to know where Chuuya had stolen. It would just be a means to an end instead.

---

...

---

Quiet and unnoticed, a snowflake floated down the sultry air, landing inside the remains of a muddy puddle.

Chapter End Notes

dazai: i love being an executive dazai: i do, however, miss the feeling of being happy,

“tragic or comic?” — fun fact! this game was taken from irl Dazai Osamu’s “no longer human”

“eight minutes to die” — fun fact! if the sun exploded, it would take roughly 7-8 minutes for the damage to reach the earth and destroy us.

hey there! as they kind of late upload might have let you notice, i’m currently in Work Hell, which means i do have to run immediately. as always, i hope you enjoyed this chapter, and thank you so so so much for all the kindness on the last one and the one before. thank you so much, seriously. i hope to see you next time (so we can figure out what the hell is it about snow flakes... anyway) keep warm and have a wonderful day <3 see you soon!!

LIKE

Chapter Notes

see you at the end! :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xxiii.

---

Case number: 62770097

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Ango S.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [Code Name: Double Black] dealt with the business upon the [...]*

---

“You,” The photographer’s shoulders were sprinkled in fresh, unexplainable snow. Someone would probably be sent to clean the carpets soon enough, if Akutagawa’s withering look didn’t take his head off with the snow first. “Stand straighter, please.”

Tactile indignation wrinkled his forehead, right under the atrocious tufts someone kinder might have called bangs. “I am standing straight.”

“Ryuu,” his sister hissed, blankly, from the other end of the gold-lined chair placed between them. “Please.”

Small, pale limbs drowning in that velvet — and the unchanging knowledge of being the one subject who would not appear more grown from the last Hallway picture — Elise huffed. “Not this again.”

“We’ve been here for hours,” Akutagawa insisted. The nurses had made Gin promise not to exert herself; acutely, Dazai knew that the boy would have rather died than admit the problem. “There’s no way it’s supposed to take —“

“He does have a point.”

Silence crawled down from the crimson curtains, parted over a summer sky plump and soft with snow. It lowered every shoulder in the room by a different notch, settling with insistence on the photographer’s curved spine.

“The hours of the day are truly never enough,” Mori continued, nonchalantly, as if he hadn’t noticed the communal frostbite. “And our Executive does have to deal with a certain business, does he not? Let’s speed up the process. What was it again, Dazai?”

“A traitor,” he offered, boredly. “You know that. I left you a report on that.”

“One that I wrote, jackass,” the stiffened frame next to him muttered.

The first flash went off.

Mori met Dazai’s eyes. Wordlessly vacant, face as contrite as those portraits had taught him — he settled his hands on Akutagawa’s shoulders before the second flash could.

It went off right as the boy’s skeleton crumpled up under his grasp. Hunger was an adjective that fit him too well for Dazai to bother searching for something more precise — Akutagawa curled his spine, as if he could have branded his fingertips through that coat of his and directly on his viscera. He bowed, as if managing to escape him would be graded, too.

Not stupid, he considered, unimpressed with that conclusion. Someone genuinely stupid wouldn’t have taken a pair of hands as a warning.

“There we go,” the photographer said, a tad nervously. “Just a few more.”

The Akutagawa siblings had clearly never been subjected to a similar parade; bodily flinches took over whenever the click! went off, squinting at the sudden light. Dazai had never blinked as a picture was taken — not for as long as he could remember. In his memories was the brush of kimonos against wooden floors; a hand covered in rings. If you close your eyes, I'll know.

Last year's portrait session had wiped the habit off Chuuya's mismatched eyes. Elise, were one to humanize the wind, had spent too many nights staring straight into the lightbulbs of Mori's clinic — her head of golden silk in Dazai's lap, like he might just make her the favor of snapping her neck.

I'll do you if you do me, he had offered her. But she was plastic and a man's desires, and she hadn't said a thing.

The shined tip of a brand new shoe nudged the side of his own.

"Executive," the photographer called. "Less — ah, bored, if you could?"

"How impossible," he sighed.

Chuuya's hair was tied in the way Kouyou liked. One of his gloved hands was secretly pressed against the small of Gin's back — a cheap excuse for help to her exhausted frame; a jarring, and yet not, intervention at the hands of someone who had never even seen the Akutagawa siblings before that morning.

Jarring, he mused, composed as the picture demanded. The boy had been holding his breath since he'd come in. And yet not.

Most knew that the local god despised photographs. Whatever Mori had told him, before the photographer arrived — if he sees anything, perhaps, we will get rid of him. Or maybe, we can paint it over, and make you as human as you need. Or maybe nothing of the sorts, because stubborn, uncertain Chuuya would not want his Boss to know that he feared remembrance of a reflection that wasn't his — had achieved the nod the man had wanted in response.

It hadn't chased the haunted look out of his unmatching eyes.

One shadow got sewed up, he considered, and the other got spread open. It was control all the same.

"Miss Elise," the photograph called, with a careful glance to Mori's direction. "Less smile."

Doctors knew needles, but not designs — there were other concerns, the man had shrugged, when a man was bleeding out on your table. But Mori lacked in all but weaving techniques; in all but his variety of threads and yarn, to wrap around a throat and to choke the failing cells out. Collars and hangman knots were merely rewarded differently.

The Akutagawa siblings flinched, again, pressed too hard against the side of the seats, forever matched.

He stepped on the shoe pressed against his, careful not to move a single muscle Elise's throne wouldn't obstruct.

“We should hang this up in the Hallway by tonight,” the Boss considered, with a pleased grin. “Let everyone know our boys aren’t the youngests around any longer, right?”

A fit went through Chuuya’s frame.

Ah, he thought, watching him start humming his mysterious melody. Dazai didn’t feel anything in particular about it. He wondered if he should have — eerie prodigy who hung around the Boss too much, scratching his nails on every meeting room’s door; local mauled black cat that he was; and then Executive, and then a whisper through the streets, and then alive, alive, alive long enough not to be called a child any longer.

The back of Akutagawa’s neck was bruised; it was, he noted, a strange spot to bruise.

Steadfast, with no message in mind and no ache in his chest, Dazai tapped his blood stained shoe against Chuuya’s own.

In the blink of another flash, Mori’s eyes had fallen on the joint line of the two chairs — the point of contact he could not see. He raised them to Dazai’s face — he smiled. He knew, acutely, that the man would keep that one picture for himself.

---

...

---

[Camera 7.8.III — Interrupted]

There was a saying in the Port Mafia.

Yasunari did not know it.

There were many sayings in the Port Mafia. Most of them would spread through the ley lines of the underworld of Yokohama, brittle and hissing, tracing the paths left behind by the crimson moonlight.

Of the lower gangs who had somehow survived the Dragon Head Conflict — not much crowded, nor efficient; not nearly intrepid enough to do more than taunt the Mafia — most fought for the scraps of it all. Black market deals, unwanted territory, unprotected businesses. Dutifully, they learned all the sayings, and behaved accordingly.

If rose-petal silk fills your vision, they said, with glazed eyes, a demon is soon to follow.

Where gems go without any glimmer, they slugged, dribbling card games and bad luck, soon another life is to be enslaved.

Day has its eyes, night has its ears, they whispered, glancing to the shadows with their fingers on the trigger, the Mafia has its Soukoku.

There was another saying — one more recent — but Yasunari didn't know it. All he knew was that it belonged to the Demon Executive.

"Keep up," a short, glass-wearing woman — a senior member of the Demon Prodigy's Secret Unit — hissed. Yasunari tried to remember her name, and failed. "You can make yourself tea later. He's waiting for us."

Sending one last glance to the red stains on his handkerchief, tasting the texture of the fabric against his cold-chapped lips, he hurried up the stairs of Building One.

Warmth engulfed his rain-soaked suit the moment the sliding doors closed behind them; abruptly, they were welcomed by an unexplainable uproar, sagging the vacant Entrance Hall — not quite an unusual background noise, considering most of the Mafia's activities took place at night.

Every single one of the TV screens hooked on the walls was broadcasting the same emergency edition of the local weather segment — an eerily echoing cacophony born out of the meteorologist's high-pitched timbre.

"— is still uncertain," the chorus was saying, bumping against the walls with the same efficiency of the pouring rain outside. "There is no doubt that this is set to be one of Yokohama's least usual summers since the Great War; temperatures have dropped inconsistently over the last three weeks, reaching longtime unseen records. Storms have been registering all over the Kantō region, and I regret to say — It is predicted it might snow, by —"

Almost pointedly, thunder lit up the sky, rattling the chandeliers with crystal glee.

Yasunari exhaled.

"Yes, yes, he did leave it here," Madame Tanaki was saying, half hidden under her desk, rummaging around. "But you'll have to tell him the Archivists couldn't find everything he needed. They're still working on the digital transcription of files from before the War."

"We'll tell him," his companion replied, instinctively frowning. Handing the Demon Prodigy bad news was not a particularly rewarding job.

Her fingers tapped on the marble, as impatient as she would allow herself to be. There wasn't a man in the Mafia — as far as he had seen in his six months long stay — who would have dared to outwardly insult Madame Tanaki to her face.

Yasunari knew they talked about her endlessly — about her shaking fingers and uncertain past, and the way no story to walk through the Port Mafia hadn't reached her ears at least once. She knew every member by name, no matter how new; she showed off the tattoos on her wrinkled skin with some sort of glint in her eyes — hiding a story so obvious, she couldn't believe they hadn't learned it yet.

She was, Yasunari had thought, after their first meeting, an evidently anguished woman.

“Here you go,” Tanaki offered them the envelope; before she could add anything else, the deafening chorus started again.

“— urge all citizens to stay inside,” the reporter was screaming, fighting the destructive aim of his umbrella. “The storm is predicted to last until next Wednesday, at least, and the wind is only set to grow more vicious. An emergency system might be put in place, after the accident on the Tsurumi Tsubasa Bridge, this morning, whose victims are still —“

“Dear,” Tanaki sighed, changing the channel. Some Japanese drama began playing on the screens, blasting the female lead's gasp all the way to his pounding skull. “Be careful outside, yes?”

Yasunari watched raindrops stain the glass doors. Executions, he knew, would not be paused for the bad weather. “We'll try.”

Before he could follow his senior into that wet devastation, she chirped, “Ah — Yasunari?”

Knows everybody's name, he recalled. “Yes?”

“Dazai asked me to tell you something, if I happened to see you.”

The roar of the storm, mere inches from the uncertain doors — sliding open and close more insistently with each second he spent right in their middle, petrified — breached through his ears, causing a jolt of pain.

Speechless, he asked: “To me?”

Managing to join the Port Mafia, Yasunari sometimes considered, at the end of a glass in some hole-in-the-wall bar; with some comrades whose name he wouldn't learn, lest it made for a duty to visit their graves — had been a miracle on its own. But managing to join the Demon Prodigy's Unit had been pathetically unreal enough, that he had walked to the first day of his job with an old rosary, certain that he would be executed.

After that, months got blurred.

The most on-field of the Executives was the Lady of the Port Mafia, he knew; but the Demon, strategist and shooter and not older than seventeen, he could bet, seemed to have his hands in every single blood deal the Mafia had ever made.

Yasunari had worked his first week as one of the suited shadows behind his unmistakable coat, sending quiet glances to those strange bandages of his, and being hissed at by his colleagues — do not look him in the eye. He had come to the conclusion that he would never manage to wash that much blood away from the very marrow of his bones.

How does he do it?, he had dared to ask, only once, to some good-willed senior.

Bile was stuck under his tongue; a group of them had left the premise of their latest mission in a hurry, spitting and throwing up and cursing out that devil incarnate — the result of a particularly gruesome massacre.

The boy had stood, watching them shoot with that vacant voice of his, surrounded by floods of viscera — and he had only played with some charm attached to his phone. Yasunari had thought he looked bored. Then, once the vomit was out — he had thought he looked envious.

Who cares, his senior had answered, studying a strand of hair stuck to the blood on his knuckles. Better him going to Hell than me.

“Yes, to you, I’m sure,” Madame Tanaki said. “Ah, he said to tell you — Your father knows,” She tilted her head to the side; on the endless screens, a gun was pointed to the woman’s chest, and fired in devastatingly fake slow motion. “A weird message to pass on, isn’t it, though? Dazai can be so enigmatic, sometimes, it’s really — Yasunari, are you alright?”

Outside, it thundered. Gently, finally aided by his indecisive silhouette moving forward to drop to his knees — the doors slipped closed.

---

...

---

“You should think about it twice, before opening your mouth in the presence of the Boss,” Dazai said, like an afterthought.

The sound of Akutagawa’s wet, cracking coughs didn’t quite muffle his words; neither did the rustling and murmurs of the Secret Unit around the destroyed flower shop. The street had been shut down a little after dinner; every body that was not bloodied and in pieces on the concrete or in the middle of fallen camellias had already run.

“Most of the Mafia spend their whole life not knowing what his face even looks like,” he continued, gingerly patting the boy’s back with the edge of a broken broom. “You’re not allowed to waste the opportunity.”

There was a red stain between his feet. It could have sprayed from the old man whose face they had cracked against the concrete; it could have fallen from his lips.

Staring at the head of once-silver hair peeking from behind the counter floor, Akutagawa asked: “Why are we allowed?”

His voice sounded like a nightmare. Some of the men hurrying around — looking for clues of the recent missed payment — threw him a half concerned look; Akutagawa answered with a chin too high for his obsession with warm baths.

Or the sugar packets, Dazai considered. He knew he collected them, for some reason. And the notebooks he doesn't write on.

“That wasn’t a starting point for a conversation,” he informed him. He sent a short glance to the gun in his hands, before going back to lazily studying the shelves of destroyed flower vases, bathed in moonlight. “Not enough cartridges, and you weren’t nearly fast enough. Do it again.”

The boy stared at the magazines Dazai had thrown to his face, along with the empty revolver. “What do I need guns for?”

Executions for failed payments were the most elementary job a new grunt could be given. The thin, wide eyed children the Mafia didn’t quite take in were paid to keep an ear out for them — then, usually as a training ground, the newbies would be sent to make heads bite the curb and leave the neighborhood as haunted as possible.

Akutagawa did not, Dazai had discovered, know what to do with a gun. He was rather great at the curb stomping, though.

“Still not a conversation,” he tutted.

“But —“

He met his eyes, unimpressed.

Frustrated, the boy attempted to slip the magazine in again, swiftly moving them from the wrist bracelet Dazai had swept off Odasaku’s arm a week ago. It was slightly too big on his bony joint; stretched by long-forgotten constant use. He was still waiting for him to realize it.

Dazai dragged two fingers down a petal — it had been red even before he had blown one of the workers’ brains off. Akutagawa’s coat was tight around his shoulders; he wondered, vaguely, if he slept in that thing.

You lose sight of it, Chuuya had told him, once, as they skirted past the edge of Suribachi City, and it’s not yours anymore. It’s either the other kids’, or the street’s.

Are you talking about an object or something else?, he hadn’t asked.

Akutagawa was certainly slums, from head to toe. It had been in the first step he had taken in his direction — in his lethal reflexes, just the kind of too quick to become a disadvantage. Rage and hunger were diesel in all ways: sparks to useful fire and slippery under dirty soles. Dazai had no time for aborted fireworks.

There was a little bonsai tree on the nearest window seal.

“How do you feel about plants?” Dazai asked, over a bubbling idea.

Silence stretched out, uninterrupted; only mocked by the distant traffic outside, and the sound of the Secret Unit fixing up the bodies in a way that would send a message.

Yokohama did always grow worse when it rained. Most of them did. Akutagawa didn’t answer.

“I asked a question,” he sing-sang.

A magazine was pushed into the gun; somewhat bitterly, Akutagawa muttered: “That was a starting point for a conversation?”

He blew dust off the bonsai’s window seal, watching it stick to the fogged up window. On the other side of the glass, actual, unexplainable snow framed the buildings.

Dazai extracted his own gun, and he fired.

One — two, three, five — seven. They echoed off the wall with a rumble, shutting every talking mouth from the Unit up with a swiftness that was vertiginous. Stillness followed with punctuality; the ricochet made a vein pulse in his cheek, plastering the sound of his heartbeat between his eyelids.

The men were left petrified, staring at the spot where Akutagawa was still standing, fingers white around his gun — caged in a wide circle by a half moon of bullet marks.

Some fragments of a vase fell to the floor.

It was awfully loud.

Dazai didn’t look at his squad; they started caring for their own business again on their own. Lowering his gun, eyes on Hirotsu’s cracked wrist watch, he offered: “You and your sister are allowed because I brought you in.”

Akutagawa didn’t move.

“Which means, of course, that I found something the Boss needs. Pictures can be retaken very easily, though,” He shrugged, tilting his head to study fallen decorative light bulbs. “That little photoshoot of ours? We did it many times. Should you and your sister prove yourself worthless, we would simply do another one.”

Here’s rule number one, he had told him, on their first day in a bloodbath. No one is listening.

Never an answer; they all kept looking at him for answers, and Dazai was all crammed up, all occupied, never spitting blood and never freeing his questions with it. No one would dare to make him bleed. He only had a doctor’s wisdom. Who knows, Mori would say, stitching up sticking cotton in the leaking abysses of his very being. Who knows, maybe this will teach you not to do it again.

Not everything is a lesson, Dazai would note. His lab coat was the dirtiest thing between those walls. He'd hang himself with that thing, one day. He had promised it to every inch of his bitten cheeks.

No point in bleeding, if you have nowhere to put it, the doctor would reply.

"The reason you need a gun," he concluded, offering him an unimpressed gaze, "Is exactly the one you just showcased to me. That you have been steadily, punctually demonstrating just how useless that pathetic Ability of yours is."

He took the hit in silence.

"And these are the answers to every question you have asked me today," Dazai added, eventually, taking advantage of the dust on the floor to do a spin. "I would beg you to take a look at the circumstances and consider two things: if asking any more of them is a wise decision, and if answering my single one is such a hard chore."

Akutagawa didn't speak.

"That is a starting point."

"Yes, sir."

He nodded, turning around. Picking up the fallen bullets was a boring task — and yet he did it every time, always cursed by the manners printed into his flesh. No one likes a mess, do they?

"Bonsais are fine," Akutagawa added, a tad quieter than before.

He never truly sounded afraid; he only ever sounded angry. Lost, maybe — a last survivor shooting the waves that had devoured his most precious possessions. Dazai had no use for a scared student; the last thing he needed, though, was one that couldn't walk if unblinded by the sun of something to avenge.

He picked up his fallen bullets. I'm not a god, he wanted to tell him — as if a starved, irate child had ever needed any deity that could do more than put bread on his plate and attainment in his future.

Akutagawa extracted the magazine from his gun, and put it back in.

Curtains of black rained on his pale, scarred face, hiding it from sight. The snowing ends only made him look sicker; a boy turning into a statue. Dazai wondered if the blood in his mouth or the marble would get him first.

"My last mission," he spoke up, eyes on the ground. "The one at Section 3, at the Port."

He curled an eyebrow. "What about it?"

"Fifty-six percent success rate."

Dazai hummed. “And you think it will be enough to be alive by next year's portrait session?”

“I’ll make it,” He raised his chin; met his eyes with something too electric to be stubborn, and too cautious to be insolent. “I’ll make sure it is.”

“How proactive,” he said, distractedly. The bonsai was well cured. Dazai didn’t know much about plants, but he remembered Kouyou’s garden at her lake house too well. You can abandon a plant, the Executive had told him, once, surprisingly willing to stand next to him in that garden. Or you can let it die. They are very different things. The unkilld will always thrive.

“See this?” Dazai nodded towards the little plant. He grabbed it from the shelf, kicking one foot to reach it — under Akutagawa’s skeptical gaze, he handed it to him. “This is yours now. Put it in that dingy closet you and Gin call a room. I want you to keep it alive.”

The boy still hadn’t moved from the cage of the bullet marks. His eyes were sagged in careful questions; a bit naively, Dazai wondered if that was where all the blood he coughed all day long came from — the overflowing curiosity for the universe inside a single, useless ant.

“Alive,” he spelled out, as if unfamiliar with the concept. He reached out to take the vase, and didn’t touch Dazai as he did. “Just alive?”

“If you want to teach yourself to garden, I certainly will not stop you,” He shrugged. “As long as it doesn’t take time from your occupations, obviously. They’re already as unsuccessful as I can take,” He flinched; raged about it. “But all I need is to see it alive. Let’s settle a date, yes? Six months. Keep it alive for six months, and we’ll see.”

He frowned. “What will we see?”

That was exactly where all that blood he coughed all day long came from, he noted. A misused tongue. Dazai’s fatigued bones — the skin-thin certainty that Mori wouldn’t have let it slide. The soul-deep knowledge that he had brought a dead bird to the doorstep for no proven reason, and it would be thrown away with finicky fingers, if he couldn’t breathe life into it again.

“I don’t know if I can get more bored than this about what you and your Ability are unable to kill,” He shrugged. “Let’s see what you can keep alive.”

Something like ice-cold rage settled over the starvation-wrinkles on Akutagawa’s cheeks. Chuuya had them too, Kouyou had muttered.

For a moment — a blink tense enough even the men of his Unit threw them a glance, hands sliding to their weapons — Dazai thought he might just try to kill him for it.

Akutagawa wouldn’t dare, he considered, sometimes. The boy had carved a portion of the skin of his back out, and at some point — between the coat he had laid on his cold-bitten shoulders, and the one time he had sat on the ground with him, eating the figs he had hastily been offered by a genuinely content face — he had settled whatever kaleidoscopic version of Dazai his shattered mind had created right between his viscera.

He wouldn't dare, he considered. Or maybe he would; perhaps only that much adoration could transform into the right amount of hatred to rip his flesh out with bare teeth.

Akutagawa's fingers tightened around the vase. He opened his mouth to talk.

The ringing shrill of police sirens cut him right off, painting the ruined shop and the hunger in the boy's eyes in crimson and cobalt shades.

---

...

---

[Camera 7.8.III — Interrupted]

His home rested three grain fields away from the local onsen town, Yuzawa.

They called the area a snow country. When candor filled the streets and the trees, it did so with overwhelming intensity, and it lasted much longer. Because of it, Yasunari had grown up with an ever present scarf around his neck, and the sound of frozen train tracks under his soles.

“You could just rent a place in Yokohama, Yu,” his father called, from the living room. “I keep telling you — Two hours of travel ain't worth it. You could wake up after dawn, for a change — go to sleep at a reasonable time.”

“Don't be stupid, Dad,” he replied, busying himself in every room of the house that wouldn't subject him to the man's eyes. Yasunari had always been a good vocal liar; your lip trembles like crazy, though, his father would tell him. He always knew.

Your father knows.

He was all a tremor, these days. Had been even before haunted words — when coughing blood in his sleeves, losing enough weight for his skeleton to be rattled as soon as he breathed. But sickness was human; terror was a privilege.

“I can't just leave you here, can I?”

“Is your old man a child?” came the offended shout. Yasunari leaned on the doorframe, holding onto two glasses of water.

In his oldest memories, the Kawabata household had never been anything but the paragon of essentialism: furniture was there for a reason, un-decorated and pushed as close as possible.

The one exception were the paintings: his father's life work, plastered on every inch of their wooden walls, streaming shards of a kaleidoscope all over the tiles of that dusty place. His father had been a music teacher; in his soul, though, he had never laid a single paintbrush down.

"You know that's not what I mean," Yasunari told him, offering him one of the glasses. He fixed his blankets around his frail body; pressed his lips together tightly, until they could not move. "My job isn't that hard, Dad. Photocopies have hardly ever tired any bones. I can sit on a train for a few hours."

He waited for him to speak up. Something more tragic than that, maybe — for the roof to fall under the weight of that absurd season; for his wrinkled finger to raise and aim and shoot; for the old, familiar stage to appear behind the curtains of his white eyelids.

Always, always disappointed.

He did nothing but hum. "There are things more dangerous than me asking for help from someone who isn't you, Yasunari."

Your father knows.

His glass slipped from his hands.

"Oh," his father blinked. "Are you —"

His eyes settled on his hands; Yasunari wasn't present enough to hide them under his scarf. Slower than the shrilling teapot in the kitchen, his expression grew cautious.

"Yasunari," he called, warmth personified. "Are you sick again?"

[The first lesson Yasunari learned, when he was too young to gather knowledge from any means but attempt, was: when you hurt, the puppets will make it stop.

He did not share this secret. His classmates were full of words to say, and full of stories to scream in their parents' ears at the end of the lessons — but he wanted nothing more than to hold his father's hand, and listen to what painting he had worked on while he was away.

"Make an image in your mind," he would tell him. "And when we get home, I will show you what it actually looks like."

"And what about my painting?"

"Oh," He'd blink. "Well. Do what you want with it."

Yasunari was silent when there was something to be heard — and so he grew silent about the screams, too.

There existed theories — his teachers had explained — that Abilities could speak. It was a language no one but them and their User knew; something that guided them towards the right thread to pull to activate it for the first time. It was a weak theory. Most Users would have advocated for it, thought — would have sworn to feel their Abilities like a soul, and not like a limb.

But Ability Users weren't quite there with their minds.

"Everyone knows that," his teachers assured.

Yasunari, who always listened, had never cared for calls and souls. Until pneumonia had struck, and his father had sold his mother's dusty wedding dress to pay for useless medicines, and he had escaped from his window — bumping against a local hunter.

The next day, he was cured.

The puppets, he knew, were to thank. He made more of them. At his very root — no matter the medicines, the sold utilities, his father's warm hands — Yasunari was a sickly boy.

Puppets sprouted, following the rushing rivers of the nearby bathing facilities. He grew, and they didn't. He got sick enough to be on the verge of death, and then he healed; he was cursed with a small, irrelevant cold — and he thought puppets wouldn't have been worth it, had they not been infinite.

Infinite and silent. All Yasunari had ever wanted: something like him, only — useful. All Yasunari had ever wanted: not to be sick.

The one price he had to pay was his father.]

"Don't be stupid," he echoed, settling his eyes on the closest painting. Sunrise, he thought; or maybe a landscape of grain. His father could never go too far from home. "I haven't gotten sick in years, Dad."

He seemed unconvinced. "Everyone gets sick, Nari."

"Pharmacies are a thing," Yasunari grinned. "In here and in Yokohama, Dad. I'll take care of it, if it happens."

Endlessness stretched between them, as cold as the fog leaving both of their mouths. Too cold for the summer. From the kitchen, the teapot screeched.

"I trust you," the man said, matching his smile. Your father knows. Your father knows. "You know I trust you."

The water in his glass seemed to solidify. Kneeling to gather the shards of his dropped one, Yasunari played the good son and the grown up mafioso, and pretended not to see his lip tremble.

The bottles of Temazepam and Xanax chirped a plastic-y clank! when Mori's hands threw them in his trash bag.

"And you're certain no one apart from your squad was informed of the execution list?" the man wondered, after a long silence — moments of analysis over that night's sudden retreat Dazai and the Secret Force Unit had been obliged to put in place. The memory of Rashomon's claws through a police car window replayed in Dazai's mind — he knew he had to figure that trigger out.

"No one else," he echoed, on his back on his bed in the shipping container. He had tried to slam the door in Mori's face, and close his fingers in between when he had persisted — it had been more than unsuccessful.

"That's odd. We haven't had the police on our traces in a while," Mori frowned at the blister pack abandoned next to an old whiskey bottle. "Two different muscle relaxants in one go? You're lucky Elise can't ask you to piggy back carry her anymore."

Would Mori be Mori if he wasn't a doctor?, he had once entertained, talking with Elise. And would doctors be doctors, if Mori wasn't one, too?

An entirely too complex conversation for her short attention span and the sheer number of hide and seek games they still hadn't played; stomping her feet, the bundle of all of the man's warped ivy had scoffed, why are you always talking about things that won't happen?

"This is unnecessary," Dazai commented.

Maybe a mistake. Being affected by things was the key to Mori's interest; the pills helped keep his eyes closed for a bit longer than an hour every three days, but they weren't worth Mori's belief that he had stopped thinking. Tell me, Chuuya would have said. And Dazai would have, because it was a sick kind of entertainment — watching him struggle with the notion of not wanting him alive but not wanting him to die.

I know I lie, he would tell them all, once springs came to an end. I know I lie.

The man's subtle smile said it all. "You're an Executive, now, Dazai." Holding strands of hair cut off in a rebellious streak, holding blades and holding him by his nape.

You kept the cabinet open, he wanted to tease, smiling until the stretch went all the way to his muscles, expanding him until he ripped. You told me not to die and promised me you'd help. "I'm no junkie."

"I never called you one," he replied — with a tone that said the mere idea was laughable. "You won't mind if I take these with me."

Dazai kicked his feet, just whiny enough he knew the man would lower his guard. “I know about thirty people in the near vicinity who could refill me by evening.”

“Ah, yes,” Mori closed the bag with a knot, swift and efficient. He knew Dazai wouldn’t do it — why not be cheerful? “But that would make you a junkie,” He pinched his nose; brushed dirt off his chin. “Wouldn’t it?”

The trash was thrown out of the ajar door, landing in the teeth-chattering snow. We need to talk about the snow, he thought. He snapped Chuuya’s hair tie against his wrist; dropped on his bed, huffing and lying through his teeth, as if it would get the rising sleeplessness out of his system.

White filled his vision.

The broken lightbulb hanging from his thirteen panels wasn’t that bright; the sound of Mori’s steps on his floor familiar as a few stars. He had stared at both with insistence — his savior and his sky. Disheartening, to say the least. Both too vast and vacant to leave his corpse to.

You were supposed to help me, he thought.

Mori crouched down in front of him.

It aligned his eyes with the cut a broken flower vase on the back exit had left on his chin — Dazai was unsurprised when he tapped two gloved fingers upon it. Anyway, all his wounds were meant to scar. “Report.”

“You already know,” he noted. “I just told you. I think we either have a mole, or the police are incredibly more interested in us out of nowhere.”

“You’re a mind before you are a gun, Dazai,” the Boss replied. “Pick one.”

He shrugged. “Both, I think.”

“Both?”

“The mole has contacts with the police. They — the entire city — have decided a second Dragon Head Conflict could be stopped by some alleged tighter guard. We’re the only ones left.”

“I suppose.”

Mori’s fingers tapped the rusty edges of his bed. He had sat on the floor, at some point; crossed his legs like a child. Elise was nowhere to be found — Dazai knew to expect it.

“Chuuya told me something similar,” the man offered. “His Guerrilla had the same accident two days ago. There was a secret meet up with one of your Government contacts — the police came by. And my spies tell me there’s been double the number of police cars around the Headquarters.”

Dazai shrugged, kicking his legs until the bed began to creak in that annoyed manner.

“Chuuya,” Mori repeated.

“What about him?”

“Have you come to trust him, at last?”

He groaned. “I don’t have time for this.”

“You’re right,” Mori studied the broken lightbulb. He was aiming for something; Dazai traced his scythe scar through the dress shirt, and tried to find it. “He had your trust from the first moment. Your loyalty, then?”

“That’s his job,” Dazai reminded him. “I can’t decide if he does it poorly, or too flawlessly. It’s certainly convenient for you. Will be, as long as he remains as he is.”

“Do you not believe he will?”

Yes, he thought. Yes, but Mori didn’t deserve to sleep easy nights. He deserved to wonder — to hesitate in closing the door behind him, when Chuuya fiddled with his gloves.

“No dog will accept to get kicked forever,” he offered. “No matter the treats.”

Mori smiled, indulgently. Unprovoked, he set to tying Dazai’s loose shoelaces; tightened them too much around the ankles, like he always did. “Didn’t you?”

“Chuuya will live a millenium,” Dazai brushed the matter away. He thought of his hum of stranger notes; the blood under his nails. “He’s too short to be killed in any solar burst. And I can’t imagine what else might put an end to him. But me?” He put a hand on his chest, honorable and proud. “Give me the time to finish that suicide book of mine, and then I’m gone.”

Mori’s backside had to be hurting, at that point. There was intention in all he did; intention in putting himself where he had to look down to meet his eyes. “You already finished it, technically.”

“Don’t be obtuse,” Dazai replied.

“Would your Oda-saku care, if you died?”

His fingers twitched against the sheets.

I know I lie, he swore.

“Don’t worry,” he said, bored. Something about names slithering through the doctor’s teeth; about Kazuko’s neck under his sole. What did you do, Dazai? “You can still give the eulogy.”

His eyes searched. He sighed. “Lay down. I’ll patch up the wound.”

He did.

Obedience, in a way; inevitability, in many, many other. Joined by untucked flesh tissues, the two of them. You will let them scar, yes? “How did you know I had a wound?”

“I don’t know,” Mori shrugged. They shrugged the same way, he thought; too much shoulders and too little chin. He would grow taller than him, one day, and crunching would be one of the few things he couldn’t do with meaning. “You always have a wound, don’t you?”

He didn’t take his gloves off to patch his scratched chest up.

Dazai did not sleep. Mori talked, mindlessly. He was never quiet when they were sharing air — there was always a deal he wanted his opinion on, a prisoner only his prodigious hands could coax open, a chess tactic he wanted to try.

They won’t get rid of you, Dazai would tell him, one day, as the last of him pooled out in polluted remnants. They’re loyal. If an altar were to be made, mafiosi would break their heads over how to make a statue for blood. They were loyal to it first; then, to their Boss. They would die for him; for the first of them to do what every creature in the ether must have wished for, at some point.

Mori’s no devil, he told himself. And all doctors must be a little bloodthirsty.

You are halved, Modi had said, once, one finger dragging down one side of his ribs. Halved things are not made for survival. Your wishes are natural. Inevitability is still to be earned.

“Tell me,” Mori said, eventually, when the last of the burning antiseptic disappeared. “Do you already know what’s coming?”

Eyes on the grey sky in the slot of the door, Dazai let his fingers trace his vertebrae. “Nothing blood won’t warm up.”

I know I lie, he would tell him, I know I lie, but don’t you lie too?

---

...

---

[Camera 7.8.III — Interrupted]

The Demon Prodigy was everywhere.

Factually untrue. Voices around the Mafia reported his disappearance more often than they did his presence; the Executive liked to disappear for days at the time — God knew where — leaving precise orders to the Unit on what to do during his absence.

“He’s probably with that partner of his,” the seniors told him. “Double Black missions are unpredictable. They might be in France, or just be downstairs kicking some poor asshole’s skull in.”

“It actually got better, after he became an Executive,” another chimed in. “You guys didn’t witness him in his first year with the Unit. When he disappeared, it was purely for his own entertainment. Apparently, the Commander once found him inside a storage closet at the Mall — He had been locked in there for four days.”

A third one grunted. “Entertainment. If that’s what you call it when a psychotic son of a bitch throws himself off bridges for fun.”

“Shut your mouth,” the woman sunk her nails in his wrist, keeping her eyes on a black-and-red silhouette passing by their corner. I don’t care how friendly he is, they had told him, and their voice had overflowed with a respect that always lacked in their discussions about the Demon. You don’t look a god in the eyes. “Nakahara will rip you apart if he hears you.”

Yasunari was a low rank among the low ranks of a high Unit; he stuck to the last rows. The Demon Prodigy had yet to tell him more than three words.

Visions of black haunted the corners of his retinas; a coat and a single eye, the glistening onyx of his borderline too precise calligraphy. He was always too far for him to see clearly; bored, he thought, when it happened. And then — Envious.

Your father knows, he said, in the mirror. Your father knows, and I know.

He wasn’t used to the idea of a secret kept by more than two people. He wasn’t sure it could work. He wasn’t sure his father knew, and yet —

If the Demon Prodigy wasn’t everywhere, though, he considered, fingers on his trigger. Then his father was.

He grew restless with each sunrise.

He rose before it, everyday — watched his father sleep in the creaking bed on the other side of their one room. Constant fevers were a symptom he had been dealing with since that last, fateful diagnosis; a mixture of night sweats and chills, the impending doom of the train doors slipping closed right when his shoelaces untied.

Don’t you wish me healthy?, he recalled asking, once. Don’t you wish me here?

Sickness was human; humanity was inexorable. Fearing your father, he assumed — had to be, too.

Madame Tanaki nodded good morning to him. He dreamed of merging his fingers with the ink on her throat, of pressing, of carrying her to her hole in the ground himself. Your father knows. Your father knows. Your father knows.

Your father knows.

“Move in ten minutes,” the Demon Prodigy ordered. He hadn’t heard him coming. Stupidly, he fired a loose bullet to the ground.

All eyes fell on him.

The Demon Prodigy was everywhere and nowhere at all; the gaze he laid on him said that he knew.

“You might want to be careful,” he told him, clearly unimpressed. He dragged his vowels in a way that was distinctively young. His expression turned sharper. The moonlight, he told himself. It was always crueler in Yokohama. “No reason to lose a hand, is there?” he noted.

Two lifetimes away, mere minutes after he had wasted one bullet, he sank his hands around the edge of the toilet until it hurt, and threw up blood and mucus and his every unconfessed sin — and thought, your father knows, your father knows, your father knows because I told him.

What are you waiting for?, he didn’t beg, every night, when they shared their dinner. What are you waiting for?, he didn’t scream, every morning, holding the urge to rip the man’s only blanket off his body — to make him just cold enough words might slip from the cracks on his skin. What are you waiting for, what are you waiting for, call me a killer, why won’t you just call me a killer?

“I came to the city for a normal job,” Yasunari confessed. Stakeouts could last hours at the time, he’d learned. “My father had to stop working, because of — a condition. His savings ended soon. I wanted to help.”

“And you ended up in organized crime?” The senior who had been with him that day curled an eyebrow. “What had you been looking for?”

“Office work,” he sighed. “Anything that wouldn’t ask too much of me, really. I wasn’t that good at school.”

“Can relate,” she said. “Ending up in an Executive’s Unit, though — That’s impressive. And on your first try, too?”

Yasunari shrugged. “I’m good with a gun.”

“I’m not,” He couldn’t recall her name in the slightest; it felt gut-wrenchingly embarrassing to even attempt to ask, at this point. “Yet Boss chose me anyway. You know, some people believe he sees something in recruits — something that has little to nothing to do with talent.”

He tried to imagine it — his thin silhouette, shorter than most of those heads in black of his that lazy drawl in his eyes, focusing and searching, somehow growing deeper than the ease with which he refilled a gun.

He was too smart for his age. He was too smart for anyone.

Your father knows.

“Are you one of those people?”

She snorted. “Not at all. It’s bullshit. It’s exactly the kind of story someone who’s never worked with him would make up.”

“Well,” he considered, “What do you believe, then?”

“That he’s Boss’ most trusted,” the senior said, unhesitantly. “And he gets to choose whoever he wants, because no one will stop him. You think he trusts any of us? I’ve seen him execute members of the squad for speaking one word out of turn. He doesn’t even trust us not to shoot him in the back. He probably knows no one would manage,” She tickled her trigger; fixed the eye-scope. “Or maybe he hopes we will. Who can tell.”

“He’s the most brilliant man in this organization,” she added, unprompted. Somehow, she managed to make it sound like a personal defect. “No one comes close. He is the backbone of this syndicate. Everyone knows. But none of us trusts him, alright? It’s a thing you need to learn. I’ve seen you look at him —“

He flinched. “No, that’s not —“

“We obey his orders. Every breath out of his mouth is for the good of the syndicate,” Her jaw settled. “Ability Users are rarely sane, anyway. He’s just — He’s dangerous. You watch him being psychotic from a distance, and you live to tell a story. The ones about him sell real well.”

“A bit young to be so feared,” Yasunari noted.

She cooked the rifle; shot a passerby from the other shore. “Then he shouldn’t have become a monster as a child. ‘Fuck you want me to tell you?’”

His mouth dried.

[“We don’t tell anyone,” his father stuttered. It had been three days since he had last looked him in the eyes. “We don’t tell anyone, and you don’t do it anymore. There are consequences, Nari. There have to be consequences, Nari, there have to be —”]

“The moment I get demoted,” the woman added, “I’m filling in for the god’s squad.”

Yasunari held his rifle tighter. “Vice-Executive Nakahara’s?”

“Him. He’s got the Guerrilla squad — It’s the biggest Unit, apart from the Lizards. And he’s a dream of a Boss. Everyone respects him — he did more for the Dragon Head Conflict than anyone in the organization,” She chuckled. “The asshole would throw himself in front of a grenade for his subordinates. This girl I had a fling with, she was part of his team during the Conflict, and she called him one of the best men she had ever known.”

Her mouth curved downwards; she cleared her throat. “She — She didn’t survive the Conflict. I saw him at her funeral, first row and all. He personally apologized to everyone in the room,” She scoffed. “What, you think the Demon Prodigy would do anything more than spit on our ashes?”

The thought left a sourness of sorts in his mouth. “They’re partners, though.”

One would not be given a pamphlet before joining the Port Mafia; at best, they would be lucky enough to meet the more gossip-oriented grunts. But some truths were as stable as the Five Towers — and recognizing a matching set of steps was part of the survival package.

[He had only seen them together once, months back. Two stark silhouettes, black and dirty white and a shock of crimson appearing a few inches down. They never touched — didn’t even brush shoulders as they stalked forward in the crowd, parting to let them pass — and yet, keeping your eyes on them for too long tended to arouse a strange sense of discomfort.

Something like peeking into a locked room. They were wrapped around each other’s skeletons in a way that put ivy and trust and horizon to shame.]

“Yeah, and Nakahara can’t stand him,” She rolled her eyes. “Not that Boss can stand him, but, you know — We all need to pick sides, don’t we? All that matters is not doing it in front of them.”

“Why not?”

She shrugged. “If you care about your life,” She clasped his shoulder, tightening in her hold with a grin. “Cheer up, man. You’re young and successful. You’ll stay so, if you play your cards right. Daddy must be proud as hell.”

Yasunari stared. “He — he doesn’t know.”

“Doesn’t he?”

Your father — “What the fuck is that supposed to mean?”

A weird glance washed over him. “Calm down, man. It’s kind of a hard thing to hide. I get it. My family —“

He grabbed her wrist. “What,” he insisted, head pounding, “Did you mean?”

“Knock it out, Yasunari,” she snapped. “What the hell has gotten to you, lately? Let go right now, or —“

Your father knows, the Demon Prodigy swore. He was behind the car. He had just appeared from the door. He was holding Madame Tanaki’s hand; he was delivering his head on his father’s door. Your father knows. Your father knows, your father knows, your father knows, Nari, of course I do.

“The lip thing?” The man blinked. “What lip thing?”

Food had tasted of blood since the diagnosis; food had been blood since before that. Habit did not make for less shadows under his eyes; his father was getting worried.

Your skin is a canva, he would tell him, when he was young and wanted to stay out late. Because he was an artist, and the world was pure art. If you paint it the wrong shade, no one but you will see its worth.

Aren't I enough?, he never asked. Do you not wish me healthy?

"You know," he said. "You told me when I was young. My lip trembles when I lie. That's how you always know."

His father laughed. "It's not true, Yasunari."

His white rice floated to the center of the bowl. Snow country, they called it. "No," Yasunari insisted. "No, it is."

"It's not," His teeth hadn't been white in a long time; his smile was as old as their walls. "It was something your mother taught me. Whenever you were getting ready to lie — you would lower your head. Cover your mouth, even. And I'd know."

He laughed some more. He would know, he thought. His father always knew.

Your father knows.

"Tuberculosis," Yasunari said, possessed.

Despite the summer, a gelid wind entered through the windows. The puppets would rot — their smell would alert the village. The village would never alert his father. His father would always know.

"Early stages," he added.

"Nari," his father's voice was kind. The Demon Prodigy was there, in the corner of his house. Fiddling with that phone charm. "Nari, we will fix it. Alright? We'll do something."

Make an image in your mind, he would tell him. And when we get home, I will show you.

What about my painting?

What about me?

"I had to," he choked out. "Dad, I had to."

"Nari. Yasunari. You need to —"

"I had to join," Tears dug scorching lines down his cheeks; he gasped for air, splintering his nails against the edges of their wooden table. "You don't — You don't get it, I had to — I tried looking for something better, I tried to listen to you — I wanted to be better —"

“Nari,” His father stood up. Yasunari threw his bowl to the floor — backed into the wall; met the Demon Prodigy’s only eye. Never look him in the — “Nari, I don’t know what you’re talking about. I don’t know.”

Your father knows. Your father —

If your father doesn’t know, he thought, utterly calm. If your father doesn’t know, make sure he never will.

There was a saying, in the Port Mafia. Yasunari did not know it.

All he knew, he thought, watching his father step closer and closer, holding onto his seat like a shield — like a weapon. The Demon Prodigy was everywhere. What his father didn’t know, he kept telling the puppets — would never manage to hurt him again. Was that it belonged to the Demon Prodigy.

---

...

---

“Fucking shit,” the bouncer at the Libelula said, a tad unprofessionally, the moment he raised his eyes enough to recognize their faces. “Fucking goddamn hell.”

“Thank you,” Chuuya commented, polite. It was clear he was the slightest bit pleased.

“Bless you,” Dazai offered. “Can we go in?”

The man spluttered. It seemed there was no sufficient efficiency in the world — his hands fumbled with the entrance door, muttering some vague mixture of Double and Black and clear out the VIP floor immediately until he managed to tear it open. Blinking owlshly, Dazai leaned his chin on Chuuya’s shoulder, watching him fumble with his radio as if it was a hot potato.

The lines of people crowded by the front of the club let out a roar of victory — one that turned into curses when only Dazai and Chuuya were pushed inside that maze of lights and chest shaking music.

“Shut the fuck up,” He vaguely heard the bouncer snap, as the door closed. “Do you know who those two are? You bastards want my fucking head on a platter of dog shit?”

“That’s original,” Chuuya stuck his lips to his ear to comment, pulling him down by the tie to defeat the music. ““We ever done that?””

“I heard we tore a man’s tongue out and shoved it between his buttcheeks,” Dazai said.

“Now that’s interesting.”

“Quite. Why are we here?”

The boy motioned him to sink through the swaying crowd. Best place I know to do this, he tapped on the small of his back, leading him to the doors on the opposite side of the club. And Tanaki grounded us.

“You can’t call it grounding,” Dazai replied. “It’s no calligraphy. She just — forces us to spend time together when we throw popcorn at each other during dramas.”

Chuuya stared.

“Maybe it is grounding,” he conceded, with a shiver. “Hey, wouldn’t it be fun if the roof fell on us? That’s a lot of heavy lights. Chuuya? Chuuya, where are you going —“

One or two times, vaguely familiar faces stopped dancing to offer a hurried, grinning bow to Chuuya — his enthusiasm was never unjust, but it was fairly more reserved than it had been with his squad; and a thousand miles from the Flags.

Still, the few subordinates they bumped against and stole drinks from bent themselves in a half at the mere sight of him — devoted to the very bone under the kaleidoscopic lights; swarming in hypnotic circles around him, moths to a deadly light; nearing more lighters than he would ever need for the cigarette between his lips.

“Slug’s awfully popular these days,” Dazai noted, halfway through the back doors. “Did that last mission of yours grant free concussions?”

“Fuck you,” Chuuya replied, pushing the emergency doors handles with a flare of Tainted. “It’s not my fault if Double Black sells.”

He studied the circle of free space around his own person. “You misunderstand.”

“What?”

Dazai rolled his eyes, and walked inside.

The beating chaos of the Libelula wasn’t entirely muffled by the heavy walls of the basement or the locked doors; but by the time Chuuya had removed his jacket and pulled a string to turn on a candid light, the endless gym in front of his eyes was entirely too empty not to seem quiet.

A professional fighting ring rose in the middle of it, caged by fabric grates and covered in a layer of dust shaped in footprints.

“That’s cute,” Dazai said, eventually. “Is this the place where you bury your bodies?”

“As if,” Chuuya replied, rummaging through the single locker in a faraway corner. “I’d hang your corpse from the chandeliers at the entrance. Everybody deserves to see.”

“I’m sure you’ll look like an ant from up there,” he reassured. “More than you already do.”

Something scratchy hit him in the face. He blinked at the rolls of bandages, hesitatingly; raised his eyes just in time to watch the other boy slip a pair of boxing mitts on, curling his sleeves all the way to his shoulders.

“Oh, great,” Dazai said, unenthusiastic. “This about me letting the Hounds break my nose and blaming it on you, isn’t it?”

“Letting,” Chuuya scoffed. A moment later, he was jumping over the railings.

Nonetheless, Dazai did his best to stall, as petulantly as possible. He sat on the ground and point blank refused to move, crossing his arms to his chest — when the boy managed to raise him from the armpits, ignoring his alarm-like shrieks, he moved to clutching Chuuya’s hair and pulling just violently enough to give him a bald spot.

“One you don’t already have,” he specified.

“I have,” Chuuya snapped, between tight teeth, stepping between his legs, “No goddamn bald spots.”

Eventually, whining and affirming his own dormant talent — if you can beat them, then do it, bastard! You’re making me look fucking bad! — he brusquely acquiesced to tentatively punch into the ruvid, padded surface of the mitts.

“Higher,” Chuuya would say, occasionally, deaf to his complaints. “Lower,” and, “Next time they come for your nauseating face, you go for the middle of the eyes,” and “Do you think people are made of fucking play-doh? Hit!”

“Short,” Dazai replied, maturely. “Ugly,” if he wasn’t fast enough to get down before Chuuya swung for his head. “Kouyou doesn’t even like you,” and “Fake Executive.”

His makeshift teacher didn’t even have the gall to get mad.

“So what’s this, ah?” he panted, between a shaky-leg kick and some punches that were lazier than Dazai knew he could do. “You’re so diligent that you had your men build you an underground training gym? So you can take a break from all the partying no one invited you to?”

“That’s funny,” Chuuya said, in a tone that said that it truly wasn’t. “No, this is all Iceman’s work. He owned the building, and he thought he wouldn’t get pestered by eager recruits if he kept his training grounds in a — less than typical location.”

His eyebrows flew to his hairline. Chuuya stuck a foot between his legs, and he almost fell. “Posh, aristocratic Iceman boxed?”

“Iceman kicked ass, ” he corrected. “He’s the only one who ever managed to land a hit on me, when you guys kept attacking the Sheep.”

“Oh, I remember that,” Dazai sighed, long and nostalgic. “I used to draw up the plans. Your hiding spots weren’t all that good, you know?”

Chuuya curled an eyebrow. He aimed a kick at his head, showing off his flexibility; by the time he landed, his hat had flown off to the floor. “Good enough to keep you on your toes.”

His next fists were more purposeful.

Some eons later, once Dazai was matted in more sweat than his bandages could withstand — summer snow or no summer snow — and Chuuya was done accepting just one glass from the spiral of devotees dancing around his bouncing hair, Dazai stuck himself in the boy’s car and forced him to drive to his brand new penthouse.

Chuuya locked him outside the moment they slipped out of the car. Given the place was only accessible via elevator handprint-recognition, and Dazai had both burned fingertips and one of his stolen gloves, it didn’t amount to much.

“When they open your eyes and see you for the stingy, insufferable maggot you are,” Dazai made sure to declare, loudly, as he turned on every water source in the house, “Then, you’ll have to start paying for your own drinks.”

“I paid for yours, asshole!”

“You’re older,” he reminded him. “Doesn’t count. Hey, what if you get stuck in that elevator pseudo door and the cables break and you miserably fall to your death?”

“I fucking won’t, you jinx,” A pause. Then: “March 17th?”

It came from somewhere at the end of the thin staircase of unconnected steps, framed by a see-through interior balcony. All the couches were in dark leather — the kitchen counter alone was longer than the hallway of both his and Albatross’ apartment. “Dang!” Dazai tutted.

When he took his shoes off and abandoned them in the sink, all the lights turned on at the same time. He stole canned crab from the filled up cabinets, and dropped to the floor.

“This place sucks,” he called, munching.

Physics and poetry books — for which he switched every bookmark — and two boxes of unfinished pizza, at least three days old; paintings he probably didn’t even like and an automatic trash system. Chandeliers. Actual dishes. A big place, he thought. Dazai knew they tip-toed the same path on many strings they would not pull.

What problem does he have?, his mind chirped. He has spaces to fill. He is here to stay.

You’re not.

He found a room with shelves of astonishingly pricey wine bottles, and he mixed their liquids until he got bored; he plastered himself on the nearest wall and traced a line upon his head, adding another three feet underneath.

Upon it, he scribbled: Heights Race (Lost).

Eventually, he played Hopscotch all the way to the balcony.

Shades of ink-grey had taken over the sky and the skyscrapers, following the rusty creak of a hammock. There was no snow on the balcony tiles; it had gathered on the flower-shaped metal railings, though.

Chuuya was a mere bump under some yellow blanket, curled up on the hammock, facing the city. Dazai grunted, dragging his pulsing ankle forward — he dropped down, shaking the whole bunk and startling curses worthy of opening the sky — kicked and elbowed and showed his tongue until their backs were pressed against each other, and he could curl up under the blanket.

“You’re cold and sticky, ” Chuuya snarled, pointlessly trying to scoot away, rattling the hammock. He shut his eyes, ignoring him, and pulled the blanket off his body. “Oh, you — “

It took them three car alarms in the distance to settle down. Dazai felt heavy enough to break through the hammock itself — destroy the floor and never stop landing, deep into the brightest sides of the earth’s insides.

“Why do you smell like someone threw up on you?” he asked, eventually.

Chuuya’s tsk! could have woken the birds. “Some idiot at the club. Should’ve seen his face when he recognized me.”

“He must have mistaken you for the ground. The difference is minimal.”

The boy settled his sock-cladded heel on his strained ankle, and pressed down. Dazai knocked his head back.

“Oi, asshole —“

“Mori is going to call a meeting soon,” he said.

Just like that, his attention was stolen. “The snow stuff?”

“You figured out it’s not normal?” Dazai feigned wide eyed surprise, though he couldn’t be seen. “I’m astonished.”

“Man, there’s polar bears on the street,” His heel dug deeper in his ankle. “And the police are on us like we’ve been going around without washing the blood off our clothes. Did he find something?”

“He will.”

Chuuya huffed. “Always does.”

The gaze they exchanged was in equal parts annoyed and benevolent. “Yes,” he agreed. “We just have to wait.”

“Way to be enigmatic.”

“You know how Mori is. You are to uphold the name of the organization, and to answer only when called. Et cetera.”

His wince shook the whole hammock. “That’s not how you say it,” he corrected, “It’s, you must uphold the name of the organization.”

“No,” Dazai said, pointedly, “It’s, you must uphold the name of the organization.”

“You must uphold the name of the organization.”

“You must uphold the name of the organization.”

“You must uphold the name of the organization.”

“Now you’re just making stuff up. You must — “

“You’re so fucking wrong it’s not even funny,” Chuuya snapped, voice loud to fight his own rising tone, “No — No, you’re wrong, you are, it’s — You must uphold the — “

“You must uphold the name of the organization — “

Cursed by the same wave of length as they were, when physicality was concerned, they picked the same moment to turn around — rattling the hammock like a boat in a storm, to the point of yelping and holding onto the edges of it.

“Why did you buy it, anyway?” Dazai asked, once they managed to lay on their side, bony knees knocking.

“The old man said it’s good for when you can’t sleep,” Little, infinitely warm space was left between them; just that speaking motion pushed them a bit closer. Had Chuuya started to hum his calming tune, Dazai might have even been able to finally understand what song it was.

He pulled the edge of the blanket up, all the way to their chins; Chuuya tightened the knot of his sweaty tie.

“Stop moving, ” he ordered, freckles and scars, unmatched eyes running up and down his face like the falling sun and its sapphire-stained twin, “Your shitty face is all scratched — teaches you to jump from cliffs. Shut up, I was better at that when I was a brat — “

“How would that work for a suicide? “

“The hell do I know?” he scoffed. “You’re the one who keeps failing.”

The sun was nowhere to be found. Dazai recalled the rubbles of a city — the razor-sharp, lightning-quick certainty of danger any fool who had tasted blood could feel on their skin. Chuuya, standing on him — crowned by the clouds and directing a band of misfits that was bothering the Mafia itself; refusing to be called a king. His boot had left a vaguely triangle-shaped bruise right under his pectoral. It had stayed there, unfading, for twenty nine days.

Fifteen, he thought, was the first time he had wanted to be alive. From what Dazai could remember, it was also the first time he had found something beautiful.

“We’re not fifteen anymore, Mackerel,” Chuuya mumbled, eyes closed — speech slurred just the necessary amount to assure the offered drinks had done something. “Stop muttering.”

I know. His mouth was dry. I know we’re not. We never were.

“Here’s a story,” he replied, scooting closer. Warmth was a thing of a different lifetime; warmth was the flickering lights of Bar Lupin — with the alcohol Ango would remark he shouldn’t drink; with Odasaku’s hands over his own, teaching him a trick to pretend his thumb had been cut off.

“God,” Chuuya groaned. “Not this again.”

“Quiet,” he warned. “A story.”

There was no rubbing they could do to be granted a spark; all bodies, Mori had said, are black, until you tear them apart.

“People have blades on their fingers —“

“Dude.”

“— and the world is the same, apart from that. It makes living somewhat more difficult.”

“Bet it would,” Chuuya commented, eyebrows brushing his hairline.

“Aestheticism is doomed. Washing yourself is a torture. Every act is bound to cause pain,” he continued. “There are many regulations in place, but the wounded and the dead are an inevitable habit. Everyone is used to it.”

“And then, one day,” he continued, wiggling his own fingers between them, “One day, every person in the world wakes up, and discovers the blades on their skin are all blunt. They can’t hurt anyone anymore. They can’t hurt themselves anymore,”

“Hallelujah.”

“And all the endless bureaucracy on the assured victims of circumstances? Useless.”

“And then?” Chuuya asked.

“And then they kill themselves.”

He huffed. Dazai wondered if he would be the type to do that even to a dream; if he would wake up, drowsy and real, and offer a soliloquy on everything wrong with his mind's delirium. "For a good reason, or because you're stupid?"

"I'm not stupid. I want to be dead."

"No," Chuuya looked at him weirdly. "You want to die."

"Same thing."

"No," he insisted. Over the edge of the building, the sun fell. He didn't add anything else.

Dazai shrugged. "You mean you don't get it?"

Where a cemetery couldn't grow, he had wilted flowers for the unmourned. You are halved, he thought. Mori's butterflies; the Yokohama's skyline, as balanced as the dead on water. That city only needed what was complete enough to survive without a blade. You are halved.

"Who knows," Chuuya yawned, easier than any death. How do you live, Dazai wanted to ask, how do you live? "I'm a better weapon than person, anyway."

---

...

---

[Camera 7.8.III — Interrupted]

"You know, access to the Archives has to be requested," the Demon said. "It's usually denied."

Yasunari didn't hear him. He heard him everywhere, in every corner of his pounding skull; the tremor in his hands only grew more vicious. Tearing his tongue off the roof of his mouth, he whispered: "Leave me alone."

The Demon hummed.

He kept his eyes on the mess of files on the floor; he couldn't remember if he had made the choice to kneel down, or if he had fallen. His brain hadn't been able to understand a single kanji in eons — his body was rattled so badly by the cold, the words were little more than blurred flares.

“If you’re searching for information on your Ability,” the boy told him, shoulder against the doorframe, “You’re in the wrong section. Medical abilities are in the A-7.”

He heaved. He took a breath and held it close, closer and closer; until he could feel his face turn blue. He darted looks from the corner of his eye; that hallucination refused to disappear. It stood there, stubbornly silent and bandaged. It had a hair tie around its wrist.

“You know,” He yawned, “I have a friend who seems to believe life and death aren’t the same,” Genuine entertainment framed him; he lowered his own to the papers again, searching for words between the red stains his nails were leaving behind. “I don’t know if I agree. Someone like you would know, wouldn’t he?”

The hair tie was snapped into his wrist.

Yasunari jumped ten feet back, plastering himself against the wall.

A gunshot, somewhere. A seat breaking into a thousand pieces; blood-stricken wood sinking into an old man’s skull, again and again, again and again, again and again, until brains splattered into paintings and naked furniture, and Yasunari was —

The Demon stepped forward.

His whine was animalistic to his own ears; he backed away, pointlessly, as if the walls could absorb him. When their shoes touched, the Demon tilted his head to the side. “You must be dead to make deals with the deceased. Which somewhat proves my theory, right? Or maybe not,” He shrugged. “Maybe the living can be cursed enough.”

“Leave me alone,” Yasunari stuttered, his voice a thread. “Leave me alone, leave me alone, leave me alone —“

“Your father,” he replied, conversationally. “How did he lose his hands, anyway?”

He stilled.

He ran.

“No, I think I can guess, actually,” the Demon added, from every aisle he turned. No human could appear that fast; no hallucinations could appear so material. Yasunari ran and ran and ran, and the Archives weren’t that big, and who would get lost in a circle — “You were the village freak, weren’t you?” He sighed. “Your father never said a word about your role in the disappearances, but they knew. Suspected, at the very least. And they weren’t happy with your father’s insistence to hide you from justice, were they?”

Yasunari held his head between his hands, screaming a muffled shout; he dove deep into the next aisle, an invisible weight on his nape. A seat and a blood-stained painting. His father’s hand and his mother’s wedding dress.

“Then someone braver than the others came,” the Demon concluded, walking slow steps behind him. It did not look like a chase; it had to be. “And taught your father a lesson about washing his hands off of his responsibilities.”

He choked. The Demon was right in front of his face.

“Your father couldn’t paint anymore,” he said. “And to make it even, you wouldn’t kill anymore.”

He backed away; the Demon followed, a slight jump to his steps, a black lake under his sole eye. Your body is a canva, Nari. He remembered — there had been so much blood. There had been so much blood, and he was used to it, the puppets were always —

“Puppets?” the Demon blinked. “You’re not a child anymore, Kawabata Yasunari. You should call them corpses.”

[“Nari,” his father breathed. His son was eight years old and dripping blood; his son’s deadliest illness yet was nowhere to be found. “Nari, what did you do?”]

Yasunari dropped to his knees. His throat was torn apart to raw skin; it was, a portion of his mind registered, because he was sobbing too hard. His father’s body was under him, lifeless eyes and missing hands and that stupid blanket of his, and he was sorry, he was sorry, and he hadn’t coughed blood since that day, because that was the rule, he killed and he healed —

“You made me kill him,” His breath came out in gruff, desperate inhales, “You made me — you told me he knew, you —“

“I didn’t tell you a thing.”

“You did! You did, you did, you made me do it —“

“Yasunari,” he said, pitying. “I didn’t tell you a single thing.”

Thunder rumbled outside the glass.

“Here’s a lesson on Abilities,” the Demon Prodigy told him, crouching in front of him. “Your Ability exists because you do. It has the same eyes as you. It has your mind. It shares your parents’ blood,” His fingers clenched around his hair. “And when you use it to kill those who gave it life, sometimes — Well. Sometimes it gets angry.”

“You’re not real,” Yasunari hissed.

“No, I don’t think so,” the Demon agreed. “But you killed your father, and you will never be sick again.”

His body jolted. The grasp around his hair kept him still, and it burned. “And guess what — Death and life might be the same thing, at the end of the day. That doesn’t change facts: when things stop working, they’re useless. And death, however beloved it might be, is an illness.”

Realization struck with the next line of lightning.

“No,” His mouth refused to move. “No, no, no, you’re lying, you’re lying —“

“Who knows,” He shrugged. “In any case — You must be happy. Isn’t that what you wanted? Isn’t it why you couldn’t stop? You were a well educated kid. Your poor father made sure of it. You must have learned what a corpse was very soon. And yet you persisted. Too afraid of sickness, weren’t you?”

He moved closer; plastered his face to his own. “Too afraid to die, just like your mother, weren’t you?”

---

...

---

“That’s the wrong turn,” Dazai informed.

Ango clenched his fingers on the steering wheel. His car always carried a vague candle-like scent; something both newly bought and worsened by the years. “You told me to go left.”

“I was lying. Go right.”

He swerved, barely missing a pedestrian.

“Dazai.”

“That’s the wrong right,” he insisted. “The other one. Ango, do you think I have an accent?”

“What about the accent? We all have an accent,” A pause. “Yours is vaguely northern, now that I think about it. Not very easy to notice, though. When you’re being aggravating, mostly.”

“I’m never aggravating!”

“Shameless dishonesty. I had an acquaintance from the Tōhoku region that spoke like you do. Aomori Prefecture, to be precise.”

He smiled, indulgently. “Did you?”

“Oh, yes. Poor man had a hard time when he came to Tokyo. You know, there’s a story he used to tell me — people from that region tend to speak with their mouths as shut as possible, to save heat for the coldest days. I never knew if he was just trying to justify those stutters of his.”

The traffic lights turned blue — Ango blinked, rethinking their conversation. Right on the verge of turning to the right, he asked: “You mean the left, when you say the other one?”

“Of course.”

The car screached. One of his eyes twitched.

Though the temperatures hadn’t lowered, it was much brighter than it had been in several weeks. Passersby in every season’s clothing roamed the streets, tapping the snowy ground in wonder.

The deeper Ango drove into the city, the blander it all grew. Good areas of the city, Dazai had learned, lacked the fight for something to stick — the one the underworld wore as its pride. No inch of a sunlit land would ever be abandoned enough to bleed for remembrance.

“We’re almost there,” he reassured the man, dragging his crutch up and down the dashboard. There had been two of them, until that morning, supporting the weight of his strained foot — until he had thrown one of them in the river. “You’ll get to bury yourself under condolences papers soon enough. Oh, turn left again.”

“It’s not just condolences papers, I told you,” Ango pushed his glasses up his nose, “On that matter, though — the department read your analysis on the police surveillance situation. It was — Illuminating.”

Dazai groaned, pushing the backrest of his seat all the way down horizontally. “I don’t want to talk about work, that’s boring —“

“Aren’t you forcing me to carry you around for work?” he snapped, one arm pressed against his chest — useless, should a car accident truly occur; but strangely delicate on his bones.

“Depends on how you see it. And you offered.”

“Yes,” Ango agreed, passionately, “Once, more than eight months ago. I asked you if you wanted a ride back from Bar Lupin, and you decided I am some sort of — public service, I don’t even —“

“Be nice,” Dazai chirped, “You’re older. You need to be a good senpai, or that girl from Intelligence won’t give you the time of the day. Neither will Odasaku, for what it’s worth.”

“Don’t you know how to drive anyway?” He made a face, soaking in regretful memories. “Well — enough to get by. Not to abide by the law, from what I remember.”

He dragged his leg up, dirtying the seat and knocking his knee against the window. Pointedly, he dangled his bright-pink ankle brace.

Ango rolled his eyes, sighing. “Yes, alright, I get it — Put it down. Dazai,” His voice was squeaky; the second safest sound in his existence. “Dazai, stop — not while I’m driving, Dazai, put that foot off my face, for God’s —“

The Minato Sōgō High School was a white square surrounded by sadly identical clones, with small darkened windows and stains of grass and trees near the entrance. Few students were gathered near the entrance, their blue-and-white attires both inconspicuous and unmistakable, as they chuckled and dangled school bags from fragile limbs.

Dazai's sole similar experience had been two weeks at a public school in America; the most he knew of those children's lives he had learned through Tanaki's dramas — something about cleaning the classrooms after the lessons, and sticking desks together to eat bentos, and doing nothing but bleeding when bullies attacked.

Ango parked his car nearby.

"Great," Dazai said, exiting. "Be right back. Ah, if you see a woman from the Special Division, do horn really loud, could you?"

He was barely close enough to see all the color drain from Ango's face. "What?"

"I'll be right back!"

"What?" the man hissed, as he dragged his crutch down the sunny sidewalk, "Dazai, what do you mean —"

Giggling over something on one of their phones, an unexceptional trio of uniformed girls occupied the furthest corner behind the rusty gates. The shortest of them was the first to see him approach; she pulled her friends' sleeves to grab their attention.

Yuan turned around, frowning.

Her school bag landed on the floor.

It took long, convincing excuses for her friends to leave her alone with him — the one who'd noticed him eyed his bandages, crutch and vacant expression until the last moment, before the other one finally managed to drag her away with an unmistakable wink in Yuan's direction.

Her cheeks were brighter than ever — only a few shades lighter than her dyed hair. She could have been Chuuya's sister, apart from the singular strand of pink hair — or the Queen of the Sheep a confused part of the underworld still talked about. She had cat-shaped stickers on her bag.

"You better have a good reason," she said. Barely a whisper.

He hadn't seen her once, during the Dragon Head Conflict; not even when she had been dragged to a safe location, to extract the code. Raw thunder flashed in her eyes the longer she kept them on him. Her fingers were spasming.

"It depends on your definition," he replied. "But Chuuya is safe. Keep it subtle with the street kid attitude. Don't want your little classmates to fear you'll nick them, or something."

"I should kill you," she said.

It was strangely emotionless. Her spine was ready, though. Dazai didn't know who she thought she'd defend from him; perhaps it came natural — to fear he would sink his teeth and never let go.

“Act on it quickly,” he encouraged. The metal fences were rattled mercilessly by the cold wind. “I’ve been hungry all morning. I’d like to die before lunch, if scum truly has it out for me.”

She set her jaw.

The last time they had seen each other, there had been Arcade lights and the tense lines of Chuuya's hands, deep in his pockets. She had hung off him like a leech. Dazai had wanted to laugh in her face — even if he, too, had not been chosen by the unreachable.

Closer than you, though, his mind had chanted, as they walked away. Like the blood they had spilled on its concrete gave him a right to call it theirs. Closer than you spoiled, blind children will ever be.

“Then?” he asked, leaning all his weight on the crutch.

Her fists tightened over the hems of her skirt; her tights were patterned in skulls, he noted. She settled her eyes on the groups still hovering on the school grounds; whichever visions of crimson fluttered in her retinas made a vein in her temples throbble.

They hadn't fought him for their anchor then, he thought. They wouldn't fight him for their revenge now.

Yuan muttered: “What do you want?”

“You might have information I need,” Dazai said. “How much did you know about the women the Bishop's Staff imprisoned with you?”

She flinched. The lack of bright pink around her face made her look gloomier. “I’m not helping the Mafia with shit. I already paid my debt — I helped you win the Conflict.”

“But we both know you’ll help Chuuya,” he replied. Something rusty crowded the back of his throat; he felt, vividly, that Mori would have disapproved of that lingering taste. “Since he’s the only reason you didn’t bleed your viscera out in a pool of your own foolishness.”

He knew what memories looked like on unwilling faces; her ghosts, though, couldn’t concern him less. “That’s not — I didn’t —“

“You don’t owe the Mafia, and you don’t owe me. But I should hope all these months spent building a socially acceptable status quo taught you a thing or two about gratefulness,” Amusement — amusement, but unbalanced — slit the corners of his mouth. Her eyes sharpened. “Or are you still a willful brat who believes her martyr dog chose to be hunted away?”

Yuan breathed.

He wondered, a bit distantly, how it all felt — the tentatively decorated bedroom he had broken in; the warm meal abandoned on her desk; Agent Minami's hand ruffling her hair, dropping her off at school. At the very least, he knew they shared the unease — the slight pause in a step, the quiet observation of the normal. But Dazai had never looked at someone with the same longing she reserved for her classmates.

“Do you know where Tooru's grave is?”

Dazai blinked. “Noguchi Tooru?”

Her gaze settled on a spot somewhere upon his shoulder, stubborn. “I never managed to ask him,” she said, quietly. “And I can't — I have no intention of bothering him any more.”

Chuuya, he knew, was an impervious stain on most people dauntless enough to come into contact with him. “We don't get graves,” he informed her. “But I know Chuuya has a spot for them.”

As if it was just a little less than spitting on her first family's grave, she nodded. “Who are you looking for?”

“One of the women you were with,” he asked, “Was her name Yoko?”

They parted without a word, enough time later for the school gates to have been shut. He didn't flinch at the metallic rattle; Yuan did.

He offered her the directions she was looking for; Odasaku would have encouraged her to talk to Chuuya, he thought — if anything, because he wouldn't have understood their hesitation. But Dazai was petty and restless, well trained in the art of attempting to sleep next to a body that could not dream, but could think. Dazai didn't care. Of course they're my responsibility.

Dazai didn't care one bit.

“Be careful,” he warned, waving his crutch as a goodbye. Staring right into Ango's window was Agent Minami — making her way to them from the other street. “Your new Mom might disapprove of you mourning criminals.”

She was quiet long enough he stopped waiting for an answer. As distant as the wind, her whisper was the widest coagulation of blood-rage anyone had ever spat in his direction: “What does a corpse know about mourning?”

Dazai didn't turn.

“Are you insane?” Ango snapped, steering his car with the franticness of a madman. “You know Boss ordered to lay as low possible, after the Permit's deal failure —“

He settled his strained ankle on his knee; uncapped the marker in his jacket and set to drawing on the pink cast — tombstone; a dog in a temple. “Agent Minami, did you know her?”

A pause. “She handled my case.”

“Your case?”

“The hacking accusations.”

“The ones that landed you in Mori’s radar?” Ango nodded; Dazai hummed. “What a small world. She’s the new guardian of the Chibi’s pseudo-ex-sister-sweetheart. ”

The glance he took the time to send in his direction got them a rain of honks; he hissed: “You threatened Vice-Executive’s Nakahara’s girlfriend?”

“Ex, ” he insisted, “Pseudo. Sister. Those are the important bits. He goes by Chuuya, by the way. And I didn’t threaten her. I just talked. Is ex tragic or comic?”

“Comic. Dazai,” Ango pressed.

“Turn left.”

They swerved, barely missing a fire hydrant. “For God’s sake, Dazai!”

“You truly drive badly for someone dead set on criticizing me,” Dazai mused. “What were you saying?”

His sigh fogged up every window.

“Alright,” He shrugged, dotting stars in his dreadful masterpiece. “Hey — I’m way too bored to work. Let’s find Odasaku and see if he’s up for a drink, what do you say?”

“It’s not even lunch time — “

From the backseat — having slithered in at some unclear point, rummaging through the secret drawers underneath the seats; and utterly calm when he met their eyes in the rear view mirror, — Odasaku offered: “Maybe not a drink, but I would be up for some curry.”

Ango’s car ended up dented.

---

...

---

Despite not being exactly scrawny — and despite mostly pretending he couldn't hold up his own in a fight and win — lifting weights wasn't amongst Dazai's abilities.

"You're going to die crushed," Chuuya let him know, mockingly dangling his hands over the metal bar of the weights. The padded cushions of the weight bench were damp with Dazai's sweat; he gritted his teeth so hard his head pounded with it, ignoring the blurry vision of Chuuya's dangling hat chain. "You're gonna be squished like a bug. You're gonna end up with a weight shaped hole in your face, and you'll look like the letter s."

"Can you die," Dazai asked.

"Nah."

"You should anyway."

Chuuya settled both his hands under the center of the bar, effortlessly helping him lift it — no Tainted or anything; only his scarred biceps pulsing with blood and curling muscles.

"I hate you," Dazai said.

"Tanaki says that you are forever banned from her desk and general existence, by the way," he announced, triumphant and pestiferous. "Your deranged ass should have thought about it before spoiling Spider Eyes for her."

His eyes stayed on the metal bar, trying to subtly gauge how much of the easy lift was to blame on Chuuya's hands. "Maybe she shouldn't have missed our weekly session, then."

"That shit fiancé of hers asked her to marry him," Chuuya reminded him. "She was on leave."

"Even more reason to ditch him."

Chuuya removed his hands. A mere second before the barbell could land on Dazai's face — carving a cylindrical cave right in the middle of his nose — only one of Chuuya's hands shot out, grabbing it a miserable inch from his bulging eyes.

"I'm gonna put you on corpse duty for the next seventy years," Dazai promised, with a thread of voice. "I'm actually going to. I'll move your office to the basement and have you listen to the prisoners' fingers being cut off while you do my reports —"

"You can't do that," he reminded him.

"I'm an Executive."

"I'm under Kouyou."

"Not," he said, with feeling, "If I kill her."

That got Chuuya to properly explode.

The unmistakable, thunderous hissing rush of Rashomon lit the ceiling in red-black shadows.

The training grounds were barely wide enough to fit its peerless rage; strokes of lightning hit without a care for decor or safety, chasing every opponent facing Akutagawa's mindless violence. Something about it, he thought, should have been satisfying; that one could kill without the weight of its act.

Dazai sat up, kicking the bench on his way to the wooden bleachers.

Rashomon was the sharpest potential blade up the Port Mafia's newly sewed sleeves — and its jailer the second most promising recruit ever brought at the Mafia's door.

[“These are the facts,” Dazai had told Mori, returning home with no coat on his shoulders and a newly hung picture in the Executive Hallway. It was fine, he had known. He would be given a new coat. He would be given a new blame. “Do you want me to throw them out, or use them?”]

Framed by the squares of snowy sunlight, from the thin windows of the underground rooms — some of the greatest potential in the syndicate was a storm, and it brought men nose to nose to the end with unfitting seriousness.

The thing about those storms was — you couldn't even use the water, soaked as it was in blood.

“Again,” Akutagawa panted, surrounded by the electricity-like shocks of his Ability. The coat Dazai had given him curled down his sweat-soaked shirt like ink, darting towards men on the ground — with their guns and their less interesting gifts, and the embarrassment of being held down by a fifteen year old. “Again!”

I understand, Odasaku might have told him, in that way of his. I understand, they hated me too. Had Dazai ever had something that fundamental to prove, when he was his age?

[On the coldest afternoon yet of that ruined season, Dazai checked on the lonely bonsai tree of the second emptiest room in the organization — let Akutagawa drag besetting eyes over it a little longer; obsessive as he looked when stood next to it — and said: “Come on. We're going out.”]

If not too afraid to show excitement, he was sure the kid would have found a way to widen his eyes enough to pop them out of the socket, and offer them to him. He had often offered him things, the first few days — reports and questions and glances and his sister. One monumental time, a fallen bullet — the leftover of the first execution Dazai had dragged him to witness.

Something about the picture it had made had stuck with him. He was a frail child; kneeled to gather a piece of metal from a pool of blood — offering it to him. How he had noticed Dazai's habit to gather lost bullets so soon, he had never understood. How he had made a beast so willing to crawl on viscera mere days after they had met — he would never justify.

“Use your Ability,” Dazai told him. “I don't care how, for now. Just use it.”

Buildings chased each other behind the glass of the train; he hung off the grab handlers, and the boy hung off him — and when the train was rattled, only one of them flinched. He thought, offhandedly, that Akutagawa would have gladly killed a man with a glance.

He thought, watching him hide his bloodied lips behind the handkerchief — that Akutagawa would die young, and there wouldn't be enough time to rip that blade he had sewn to his soul off.

You will kill and you will kill and you will kill, Dazai could have told him. Odasaku might have, he thought. And then there will be nothing left to eat, and that monstrous pet of yours will still be as hungry as his first day. And then?

Akutagawa wasn't a good student — but he was stubborn enough to raise his hand. Dazai could see him swear: and then, it will find something to eat.

You, Dazai wouldn't say, lips trembling, you, you, you.]

Bodies landed on the hard ground; training mats had existed, once, before the more violent Abilities had reduced them to stains on the floor. Duels and training sessions circled in the bored field of his vision; grunting men and knife-bearing women — flashy powers he could have turned off with a touch and uncertain glances thrown all the way to the bleachers.

Akutagawa kept trying to meet his gaze.

“That your kid?” Chuuya asked, nodding towards the makeshift battlefield, as he climbed the bleachers two at the time.

“Teen pregnancy is certainly a curse,” Dazai said — slightly surprised. He had expected the boy to hunt the siblings down mere minutes after their portrait session. “But little Akutagawa might even manage to say his first word, one of these days.”

Odasaku had scribbled the phone number of a man on his hand, for some transport business. The man wrote eights weirdly; they looked like nines. He traced them; rubbed one of them off — watched the onyx stain spread like a bruise, only more purposeful.

“Anyway,” he concluded, “He’ll have to.”

The Italian leather of Chuuya’s shoes settled next to his leaned-back hands. Pointy elbows dug in his shoulders, effectively caging his back in that strangely vicious version of a flesh shield. With the finality of a sealed coffin, he sunk his hat on Dazai’s head.

Imperceptibly, he leaned his temple on the inside of the boy’s knee.

He didn’t know if it was the right answer; the pinch it earned him — where his bandages meet the collar of his shirt; where his tattoo peeked — could have been a slap on the wrist or a high praise. In either weather, he knew, the two of them always made for a picture. Every other gaze in the room fell intermittently on them — and they did not have teeth, but the ripping was loud all the same.

Dazai, as in —

“That’s a waste,” Chuuya concluded.

Rashomon cracked the floor open, pulling a woman in with its sharp dentures. Sweat drops gathered in the palest caves of Akutagawa’s skull, as he stumbled forward, clumsy and lethal. Dangling mere inches from his chin, Chuuya’s gloved fingers flexed, very slowly.

Dazai allowed him to analyse — to dig and carve and taste, in that people-disciple way of his.

He hummed. “Why?”

One of his shoes stepped on his little finger. He leaned his elbow on his knee. Chuuya had hated touch for as long as he had known him; he wondered if a deity’s silence was worth it. He wondered if the Mafia thought it had them where it wanted them. “Quit pretending to be naive.”

“Is the thread of familiarity that overwhelming?”

“The general agreement the syndicate has settled on is that you want the rookie dead,” The tilt of his voice made it clear what he thought of that conclusion. “What, are you overwhelmed by the thread of familiarity?”

“Me?” he echoed.

Chuuya scoffed. “That’s a dramatic bastard who would die for no reason, if I’ve ever seen one.”

“Voices tell me Akutagawa is as resilient as the slum rats that probably raised you.”

“He strikes to kill with every hit, with no care for those flagging limbs of his.”

“An optimal ambition for a mafioso.”

“If the afore-mentioned mafioso wants to be dead by twenty, yeah.”

“Look at him,” Dazai dripped nonchalance from his lips, stubborn and willful. On the field, Akutagawa coughed in his handkerchief, caged beast eyes settled on the subordinates attempting to help him to his feet. “Inevitability is to be yearned all the same, isn’t it?”

His pause stretched out. Akutagawa stood; his hands moved in quick motions, demanding a rematch and begging for a gaze.

Failing at shallowness, Chuuya noted, “Did Mori tell you that?”

Something scratched in his brain. He didn’t answer.

---

[Camera 7.8.111 — Interrupted]

He saw him each time he tried.

“If you see him situate himself near anything deadly,” the seniors had told him, “You lower your eyes, and you leave.”

Is that what you do when someone is trying to die?, he hadn’t asked. The notion had appeared absurd; at that point, he hadn’t yet had the chance to see him drag his skeleton around with lithe fingers. Is loneliness what the self-destructive needs?

In the weeks that followed, haunted by a bandaged silhouette whenever his bones attempted their starved best to shatter against the concrete, he thought — yes, yes, it is, it is.

Blades were never deadly; ropes broke under his weight; guns would jam whenever he stuck them in his mouth, pressed them against his temple, laid them so heavy against his chest it felt like they might remain between his ribs. He stood on the edge of a building, and he jumped.

He tried. His feet did not move.

He started fights in every lowest bar their territory had to offer; begged one of those drunken men who had sold their life for the sake of nothing at all to destroy him; jumped in front of enemy fire with diligence — always, always, always alive.

Through all of it, he was there.

He laughed when his guns didn’t work; he hummed when his feet wouldn’t leave the ground. Every breath he takes is for the good of the syndicate, she had told him, and he believed it, how could he not — when he was defying every law of nature to make sure the latest Mafia cockroach would manage to stop his heart from beating?

He burned his father’s house with himself inside it. He woke up in the nearby woods, smelling snow.

You will not die, the Demon told him. Guilt was a shadow as much as he was. You will not die. Isn’t that what you wanted? Father, don’t you want a healthy son?

And then —

“Please,” he vomited out, forehead on the leather of his shoes, close enough to smell dried blood. He kissed them — cried, choked on every breath out of his mouth. “Please, please, kill me. I beg you. I beg you, I beg you, kill me — “

The Demon Prodigy blinked down at him. He was strangely tall; strangely young. “What makes you think I could?”

He gasped, “Nothing human could kill me.”

His gaze shifted, imperceptibly.

“Well, then,” the boy concluded, vacantly. “Tell me who made you infiltrate the Port Mafia, and I will.”

Drool landed on those polished shoes; his stupor lit up some entertainment on his features. “Don’t tell me you thought I wouldn’t know,” he teased. “You came with the bad weather, did you not? I have a criteria to let people join my ranks. You and Nakama talked about it, right?”

Nakama, he thought. Her name was Nakama. She probably didn’t know his name either. “What is it?”

The Demon lips did not turn; and yet he smiled. “People who need to be reminded of the consequences.”

Yasunari laid his forehead on his shoes. He talked.

Eons later, when the tip of his gun dug a hole in the middle of his forehead — when relief sagged his veins, choking the blood out of it, gratefulness, absurdly, for that demon of his, he asked: “Were you really there? All those times, were you really there?”

His fingers tapped the trigger, once, twice. He seemed lost in thought. He seemed crowned by the moonlight outside the window, whiter than his bandages. Justice, he thought — standing on its misplaced throne; holding a scale and a sword, to make the queue shorter in either way.

Justice, he thought. There was nothing just about a carcass playing man.

“Who knows,” Dazai Osamu told him, a bit obnoxiously. “But just so you know — you’re the one who didn’t want to die. Abilities could not care less about us.”

There was a saying in the Port Mafia. It would gain more voices once he was in the grave. But he did recall it, when the last of his air was gifted to the night.

The greatest misfortune for Dazai’s enemies, it said. Is that they are Dazai’s enemies.

Children got buried near the cherry blossom trees, usually.

I don't think separating them from their families is very nice, Dazai had mused, dirtying the foothold of his designated stool at Bar Lupin. Why make them whine? Children are professional whiners. In the name of what? A somber pantomime of kids' corpses under pink leaves?

Odasaku had downed his drink in that way, too slow not to flank the ice around the glass. It made Ango twitch. Dazai knew their every flutter.

I don't really think either of them cares.

Wouldn't you be mad if they buried your orphans far from you?, Ango had considered.

His vacant glance had been funny, because most of his glances were. The world would have probably found more entertainment in analyzing Odasaku than the opposite. I'm sure you two won't let that happen, he'd said.

"Nothing to be done," Akutagawa was muttering. Too heavy on the ball of his feet; infiltration would be a failed test. Underneath the shattered shade of the widest cherry blossom up the hill, the two siblings were columns of smoke from missing pyres, hiding revolvers and knives under an ill-fitted suit and a too long dress.

"They won't take our word on the names," He kicked one of the stones. "Said allowing us not to bury some faceless street rats in the common grave is already enough."

A flash of rage passed through Gin's face. At their feet, six unruined, nameless graves stood unmoving under the nearly winter-like wind.

They hadn't seen him yet, Dazai knew — and they wouldn't. He knelt near the grave of some fallen soldier from the Great War — ta- something, he read, apologizing to his remnants — and he waited. Let them mourn in silence.

"Do you think they'd be happy for us?"

Akutagawa's hesitance was uncharacteristic; he rarely thought about words before vomiting them out.

"No one in the slums liked the syndicate much," he said, eventually. "But their killers were slaughtered, and Executive Dazai is to thank for it. That, I think they'd appreciate."

"Executive Dazai," Gin echoed. It was the right way to say his name; all poison and all rivers, and the secret drawer in some dusty desk. Her brother tucked a badly cut strand of hair behind her ear, awkwardly loving. "I don't get what you see in him."

A myriad of shards made their way through the cracks in her brother's face

Dazai saw the backseat of a car, two hunched silhouettes occupying a single seat — and eyes, a single pair, so focused it burned, settled on him with the curiosity of the first sunrise.

I haven't done a thing, he had thought. Good job, Mori had said.

“He saved us, Gin,” Akutagawa hissed. “He’s giving us a reason to go on. He’s going to make me stronger than ever. Do you know what would have been of us, if —”

“He brought us in because the Port Mafia needed new grunts,” she insisted. “We’re weapons at best.”

“At least we’re something.”

“We were something before, too.”

The wind blew through the rose petals. They hadn’t brought a single gift for the dead. I don’t really think they care, Odaskau would have said. Akutagawa stared at his sister, speechless.

“And now, we —” Gin’s dislike painted her cheeks scarlet; something like shyness. “Mafia dogs, Ryuu? Is that what we’re supposed to be? We were destroyed by their flood. It was just years ago. What makes you think it won’t happen again?”

“I want to be on the side that can fight back,” the boy replied. His voice reeked of pride; Dazai didn’t quite know if it would warrant a slap on the nape or an approving nod. “What do you suppose we could do? Be eaten by rats until the end of our days? Wander around, with no meaning and no purpose?”

“We could run —”

His whole body jolted. “Don’t say it.”

“Ryuu, they want us to fight for a spot —”

“Have you got no loyalty?” Akutagawa snapped. “Most people don’t even get a glimpse of the Boss in their entire life. Executive Dazai vouched for you — You could end up in the battalion squad with no Ability, and —”

“They treat you like — like —”

“Gin.”

“We’re stronger than we were. We could try, and — Remember Katsuki’s plan? In Tokyo?”

He scoffed. “They’d find us everywhere. “

“You think Dazai would go looking for you?”

It echoed, somewhere. He heard it in his bones. Akutagawa stumbled back. Gin exhaled.

Dazai left.

Maple trees and bundles of snow lead the way through anonymous graves. The jacket was older than he remembered it being — a bit frayed at the edges, missing little bits of leather near the shoulders. Its green was faded; he remembered wondering if Chuuya had found it in the trash, or if he had liked it enough to beat someone up for it.

It was definitely too large on Yuan's frame. The near death-grip her cold-chilled fingers had around the hems made up for it.

"You know," he started, studying the nameless grave he had seen Chuuya kick in the weekends, when he was done with the Flags' fake ones. "Once, I dyed this handler of mine's beard purple. How scandalous, though. I've heard good school girls don't dye their hair."

An assortment of flowers was precariously balanced on top of the stone; graciously enough, stingy like an adult, she had laid a single one on the other five graves, as well. "Minami said I could keep them red, if I promised to turn to the other direction when I saw you again."

Dazai snorted. "Still a liar, then."

"I don't lie," Yuan replied.

"Neither do I. It's more Chuuya's thing."

She frowned at the ground.

"He used to sleep with his hands between his thighs," she told him, a bit pointlessly. Her eyes were bitter and warm. "Otherwise, he would start chewing on them in his sleep from hunger. Like he did before."

Dazai tilted his head back and forth. He still does that, sometimes, he could have told her. "That explains the gloves, at least," he lied.

Her gaze flickered towards him, at last.

He had thought he knew what despise looked like when directed to him; her strongest, most desperate efforts were startling — almost. Dazai would take what the harvest would bring.

"Did you land face first in a racoon lair?" she asked, eventually, nodding towards the bruises and scratches on his face. "Or did you go around threatening some innocent people?"

"Oh," Dazai blinked. "No, I fell in a ditch."

"You fell in a ditch."

"Reading. Unfortunately, it wasn't deep enough to kill."

One of her eyebrows twitched. She didn't ask further.

At the edge of the hill, where the sea was nothing but a vaguely polluted line and some boats, the sun began to fall. Once the earth-stained tombstones were bathed in reddish shades, and Dazai stayed put and staring just long enough for the tension to turn her shoulders into marble — Yuan spoke again.

“That thing Chuuya can do,” she spelled out, as tentative as thorns, “With — Arahabaki.”

Dazai stared forward.

She nodded towards the grave. “He never specified if — Did it kill them?”

On the other side, Akutagawa’s coat was too large on Gin’s shoulders, as he led her out. He was laying most of his weight on her; his neck handkerchief was stained red. The Secret Executive would have to be warned; while not a traitor — not without her brother — rebels weren’t to be tolerated.

Yuan’s jacket tickled some dirty, ignored piece of his rib cage; something like remembrance — like a sharp voice and a slap on his cheek, no one would believe that; and a hand around his wrist. Always on his blind side.

Whatever she saw in his eyes when he turned painted her face ash.

He grinned, throwing his head back in laughter. “My, my,” He shook his head, bones creaking, “You kids would blame pollution on him, were he tall enough to reach the trash can.”

Her flinch sent her a step back.

She didn’t try to stop him as he walked away; didn’t do anything more than sink her nails in her jacket.

Dazai considered appearing at the siblings’ car, giving Akutagawa the scare of a lifetime. He considered putting some antiseptic in those cuts of his, because Mori was insistent, and that one presentation on poor hygiene practices and the use of bandages was always there. He considered finding that ditch again.

In the end, he left his discarded bandaid on the rebels-dug grave of one Tsushima Masaru — he did not trust the world, it read, in old kanjis, and the world did not trust him — and walked towards where the sun disappeared.

yasunari: the demon prodigy is my sleep paralysis demon the rest of the mafia: ? same and yasunari kawabata, author of “snow country.” more on that soon!

fun fact: you know those pages in between bsd chapters that give you information on a character? among akutagawa’s dislikes is “bonsais.”

sugar packets and notebooks and warm baths: elements mentioned by beast akutagawa and beast atsushi as “dreams of kids who grew up in an orphanage” basically.

aomori prefecture: where irl dazai was born. the nod to the “stuttering” comes from my personal hc of a stuttering habit baby dazai used to have.

well! i can’t thank you guys enough for reading, once again. i know i’m getting repetitive, but i seriously need you all to understand just how often i re read every single comment! this has been a particularly emotional week for me, considering i’ve set to editing the last ever chapter of this fic (which will take. so. long. let’s not even start) and all the nice comments i’ve received have cheered me up tons! keep telling me all your favorite quotes and moments, and i hope you keep enjoying this just as much <3 thank you so so much.

keep warm and see you soon!!

AN

Chapter Notes

see you at the end! ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xiv.

---

Case number: 62770097

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Ango S.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [Code Name: Double Black] were sent to the town of [...]*

---

The car broke down around the first of the three hours it took to reach Yuzawa.

“I told you you shouldn’t have touched my car with your nasty fish hands,” Chuuya snapped, bent over the open, smoking hood of the vehicle. “Let’s take turns driving, Hatrack — I should have let you rot with a streetlight up your ass.”

“What’s with you and streetlights, anyway,” Dazai observed, cross legged on the car roof. He had spent the last hour offering unnecessary, more than inexperienced suggestions on how to fix whatever was broken. “And I would be touching the car in any case, dumbass. It’s called sitting.”

Chuuya hauled a screwdriver to his head. “Did you cut off the brakes?” he accused.

“I didn’t cut off the brakes.”

He squinted.

“I didn’t!” he swore. “And this isn’t your car, I remind you. Your pipsqueak-sized clown vehicle wouldn’t have fit all four of us.”

“I don’t know,” Unmatching eyes left the engine just enough to study the two quiet bodies leaning against the empty road’s safety railing. They both straightened. “From what I remember, the slums’s sewer system is even smaller.”

Gin stared forward, pointedly. Akutagawa opened his mouth — seemed to think better of it. From inside the car, on the radio, Hirose Fumiko hummed a funerary hymn.

Chuuya leaned crossed arms on the hood, directing a pointed look at his partner. “Remind me what you did, that now we’re playing babysitter during a syndicate emergency?”

“Stop assuming everything is my fault,” Dazai tutted, uninterested. “The curse of the world’s most useless User and his sharp-knifed sister is one I bear unsinful and victimized.”

Akutagawa flinched, jaw set.

“No one will be taking the useless crown from you,” Chuuya stated. He hit something a few inches off the center of the hood; with a hiss and a terrifying screech, the engine came to live. “Fuck, yeah! Finally, God.”

When Dazai attempted to slip into the driver seat, he kicked him so hard, he slipped on snow and landed on his knees.

The car was warmed up by the heating system, fogging the windows up against the snowy lanes. The bright lids of his console would give Dazai a headache by the time the sun started going down — it still wasn’t enough reason to take his feet off the dashboard and not tidily beat every record Chuuya had set.

Despite the distraction of Dazai singing along rather loudly to the radio, it seemed the boy’s mind was still stuck. “Mori wouldn’t have ordered them to join a Double Black mission for no reason,” he insisted.

His innocent blink tightened Chuuya's grip around the steering wheel. "Maybe their tendency to match dark monochromatism?"

"You're fucking annoying."

"Crash the car and die, then. Thanks."

Chuuya snarled. "No need for your hand me downs."

"Wet dog."

"Toilet paper dispenser."

"Eyes on the road, sweetheart."

Chuuya's fingers wrapped around the back of his skull, almost shattering his nose against his legs on the dashboard. Dazai hit him on the head with the console, cracking the screen. From the backseats, came a stunned silence.

Cold wind filtered in from the sole ajar window, fluttering through candid fields on both their sides. Over the last week, the region had reached temperatures that had every meteorologist on Tanuki's screens speechless. Most stared at the snow with an exasperated, hysterical acceptance.

Kouyou had — as subtly as her imposing frame was capable of — been pushing scarves in his direction for days, now; probably not willing to deal with his obnoxious sniffs and fragile immune system. It's not that bad, Odasaku had shrugged, blowing hot air in his hands. Summer must be hell on those bandages of yours, right?

It is, he had confirmed, but I'd prefer my corpse to be found with a soundtrack of crickets and dew.

I don't know. The smell of corpses under the sunlight is intolerable, the man had replied, ever so knowledgeable.

"Our target," Akutagawa said, eventually. "Who is she?"

Chuuya curled an eyebrow. He had left a nail shaped bruise on Dazai's jaw after his hat had been stolen — but he was now studying the road through wind-ruffled strands of hair.

"Reading debriefs is part of a mission, kid."

"Now, now," He yawned. "We can't be sure little Akutagawa knows how to read."

"He's reading every report you write, for sure," Clear skepticism painted his tone. "You might want to lock up any and all secret diaries you might own."

Outrage — or the closest thing to embarrassment he would bear — only made the kid pale further. "How dare you —"

“Very easily,” Unimpressed, Chuuya shrugged. “Just so you know, outrightly shown attachment gets people killed. Don’t be surprised when they try to get you by putting a bullet in your beloved Dazai and I have to step in.”

“Aw,” The hunting season had started a mere week ago, slowed down by the unpredictable temperatures. The deeper they went, the more often the distant thunderclap of rifles appeared.

Why do you never hear them cry out? Dazai had asked, once.

Because weapons don’t care, Mori had replied, clearly misunderstanding — or perhaps, not quite. He’d ruffled his hair and eaten his knights on the chessboard. Isn’t that merciful?

Blankly, Dazai asked: “Would you?”

“If I can’t make it look like an accident.”

A flash of red, void-bright light blinked from the backseat; something humming in unison with the breaths out of his chapped lips. “I would never — “ “Akutagawa,” Dazai called, eyes on the console.

He twitched. Gin tapped his wrist.

Fingers flexing in that way that meant he had miraculously understood something — Chuuya nodded.

“The target’s an ex-prostitute from the organization,” He had left his jacket and coat somewhere under Dazai’s own busy butt; under the fading lights of sunrise, the criss cross of his harness was a bruise upon a gray waistcoat. “We have reason to believe she and Kawabata were connected. If he died, leaving her with no immediate allies — it’s possible that she would have taken refuge in his town.”

“A living center near an onsen town, nonetheless,” Dazai added. “Think one or two baths might cure that cough of yours, Akutagawa? I heard that’s what happened to hysterical women in novels. A few months in the Alps and poof! As good as new.”

Gin’s eyes met his eyes in the mirror.

There was acceptance in there — though she still hadn’t realized it. Akutagawa wouldn’t live much in any case; perhaps, dying knowing he had breathed through corrupted lungs for something was a good enough deal for both siblings.

His fingers stilled on the console.

Then tapped, again, and again.

“That’s because every womanly reaction was deemed a sign of hysteria,” Chuuya informed, helpfully, either not noticing the veil of tension or — more probably — walking all over it with those ground-breaking steps of his. “Kouyou said she’s been giving you two catch up lessons. Right?”

Lower than a breath — and oh, what had the Secret Executive even done to her, after he had been informed of her less-than-loyal ideas? — Gin murmured: “Executive Kouyou said they were signs of depression, often.”

The boy snapped his fingers. “That, too. Why that tone about her, anyway? She’s cool. Don’t let the big demon fool you,” He slapped Dazai’s hand before he could change the radio station. “Want some advice? Call her Ane-san. We all do. It’ll piss her off to the point of growing fond of you.”

“No one calls her Ane-san except us two, Hatrack,” he reminded him. “Probably because she’s barely old enough to vote.”

A dirty glance. Akutagawa straightened in his seat at the sight of it, and he had nightmarish visions of a knight in shining armor, defending an honor that wasn’t there. “You’re barely old enough to waddle around with those beanpole feet, and yet you still stick your nose everywhere, don’t you?” Chuuya commented.

“And you’re barely tall enough to wear hats without resembling a leprechaun, but look at you,” Dazai tapped the hat on his own head. “Did the submission I sent to the local kindergarten ever receive a response, anyway?”

“That was you — you’re younger than me.”

“You don’t know that.”

“You told me!”

“Show it, then,” He batted his eyelashes. “Some politeness and your bento, senpai?”

In the backseat, Akutagawa choked.

Chuuya mimicked retching. “As if your deranged ass doesn’t make me pay for all your meals already,” he scoffed. “The Vampire Siblings sure won’t be voting for anyone soon either, so I think they’re good.”

The pale kid seemed bewildered. “Vampire Siblings?”

“Like the movie?” Gin whispered.

“Sure thing. So someone is catching you two up with the Outside Slum Life. That’s great.”

“The — Lemon-bomb maker,” Akutagawa said, with a perplexed intonation. “He keeps giving us DVDs.”

Chuuya cringed, just a bit. “Maybe don’t exactly take his word on — Ah, whatever. As long as he doesn’t put bombs in my office again for the sake of cinematography. Also, you don’t need to take his Opera recommendations, they're all shit. Which one of you brats kicked Tamaguchi's ass in the Sword Room the other day?"

Dazai saw them exchange a cautious glance.

Their shoulders seemed to bloom forward — one hesitant voice after the other, they allowed Chuuya to wove a conversation over their most pendulous thoughts, until their exchanges moved quicker than the occasional warning signs on the road.

There was a vortex, he knew — one mostly innocuous and genuinely not calculating; as, cruelly Machiavellian could only describe Chuuya when the scratches down his arms turned his gaze into the end of an abandoned well. There was an eye of the storm, and they both had the talent to make pieces of wind believe themselves necessary. Dazai made people talk, and Chuuya made them want to.

On his console screen, 0-1 appeared.

"What's that?" Chuuya questioned, at last.

Akutagawa's flinch was less startlement and more unwillingness; he didn't bother to watch him wrap the small branch in an old piece of fabric again — before hiding it in his pocket. "None of your business."

"It's a branch from a bonsai tree," Dazai informed.

Chuuya frowned. "You don't look much of a green thumb, kid."

"That's because he's anemic."

"And you're mentally unstable."

"That's not what —"

"One of the recruits has a nature-related Ability," Akutagawa intervened, for the sake of shutting them up. "The branch is connected to the main plant. I can check on its condition."

"It's a plant," Chuuya noted.

Akutagawa stood a bit straighter. Next to him, Gin eyed the hidden branch. "If Executive Dazai says it's important, it must be."

I-I, said the screen.

The assumption that the distrusting pair wouldn't be foolish enough to fall asleep was soon proved wrong. By the time the road had turned into little more than old concrete framed by grass, matching slow breaths were fogging up their windows — undisturbed by the bumps, the blinding dawn, and the gun whose safety Dazai was mechanically switching on and off.

Chuuya didn't appear a bit surprised. "They're used to sleeping together," he explained. "You still on about making them duel? They're already electric at the sole sight of each other."

Gin was plastered against her door, knees hiding her face; her brother was plastered against her, his too large coat covering every naked part of her skin. “Mafiosi should know better than to sleep where the door isn’t barred,” he replied.

Staring at him, pointedly, Chuuya locked the car.

He squinted, sitting sideways, shoes dirtying all over the leather, printing the fabric of the backrest on his cheek. Against the polluted firmament, the bridge of the boy’s nose was familiar and endless, and he had walked miles to reach nowhere at all. “Mafiosi should know better than to sleep where the local wonder duo is awake.”

“I could leave you here to hitchhike,” he offered. “Half a wonder duo is surely not a safety hazard.”

“Don’t play big brother with my subordinates,” Dazai ordered. “Is this your usual friendship-making method? It sucks.”

“Gin isn’t yours.”

“No,” he agreed. “She’s the Executive’s.”

Chuuya threw him a glance. “You ever going to tell me who the fucker is?”

“Why do you assume I know?” he asked, just to waste some air. That was all they were, he considered — a twitch in a well-oiled machine. Something he hadn’t quite wanted.

“You know everything that might inconvenience me,” the other boy answered, courteous enough. “I’ll kill you for it, one day.”

The Akutagawa siblings didn’t snore at all. The sound of their rise-and-fall through slumber was as mocking as any and all spit landing near his shoes. Chuuya was humming that song of his, and he found himself surprised by the urge to figure out what it was. The thought of him knowing what Dazai didn’t was haunting.

The horizon-less road and the snow-bruised sky embraced; the afternoon painted his mismatched eyes almost the same color. “How,” It fell from his lips, sticky until the last syllable. He pulled at the rolled up sleeve of the boy’s closest arm, until his hand abandoned the wheel; twisted the fingers until the bones creaked. “Tell me how.”

Chuuya studied him.

“A bullet seems like it would be poetic,” he said, at last, never one to question what would go unanswered. Price of partnership, he reminded the curiosity in his bones — that dozing creature insisting, reminding him that Chuuya had never not known. “You’d love something fancier.”

“You and your poetry,” The velvet of his gloves was a field of pins and needles, rougher than his own bandages and softer than the skin underneath. One of Dazai’s strategies, all of it — cruel when he thought of it, foolish when he forgot. Transactional until his very last breath. “You’d have to learn how to shoot properly first, though.”

“Don’t be stupid,” Chuuya replied. “I wouldn’t kill you with a weapon.”

He pretended drowsiness, endlessly vacant and perpetually unbelieving; leaned down until the tip of his fingers brushed his lips. “Wouldn’t you?”

“No,” he promised. Dazai thought saying thank you might have been polite. He thought Akutagawa would have to be taught not to sleep where men could plan anyone’s demise. Thought about biting to raw skin, and asking Chuuya to take off his bandages — hang him off them to dry up where it was warm.

It had to be, somewhere. He sneaked his thumb over the border of his glove; settled it where existence pumped and a scar he knew to be black rested — and thought about saying something, and didn’t. It had to be somewhere.

“No,” Chuuya repeated. He wondered if Arahaki would deign him worthy of something more than pure hunger, when he tore him apart. “I’ll put that bullet in you with my own hands.”

---

...

---

One day before.

If Dazai had to kill Mori Ougai — moved by the little insurrectionists left; or the spasms of his fingers at night — this was how he would have gone about it.

His hands.

“That little pet project of yours,” the man said, from the head of the endless table. They were the only souls in the meeting room; the walls had been rolled up from the windows, bathing the air in moonlight and the hot red lights of the ceiling. “Akutagawa. How is he?”

“Tending to bonsais and training mats all the same,” Dazai answered. He made to pull at the ribbon in Elise’s hair; she huffed, spread out in the middle of the table, and moved away. Before, she only ever fought back when it was Mori.

The former doctor blinked.

“Is that a riddle? You know I’m not good at those,” A slightly affectionate tilt curved his lips — leaning down, just a hint conspiratorial, he added: “Remember when I would give you all the ripped puzzle pages from the newspaper? Old age won’t change a stubborn man.”

His hands, certainly. Mori would like that.

He would die laughing like a madman. He would pat his head and say something funny — something that would get Dazai to shake his head, Pavlovian-ly fond. The men would call him ruthless. Fear would keep them obedient.

“Riddles are boring,” he reminded him. “You’re not old. Hirotsu is. Stop being dramatic.”

“You never like the fun things I propose.”

“Factually untrue,” Mori was tapping his hand on the table slower than usual; the bruise Ace had accidentally caused him — half sedated, as Mori fixed his dislocated shoulder — was probably still hurting. Dazai had been wanting to take his glove off, just to see the mark.

“He reminds me of you,” the doctor added, stupid man he was — always wasting the air he was given. After, he handed Dazai a piece of paper to play with. “Just a bit.”

He sighed. “Little Akutagawa is not nearly as remarkable. No need,” he insisted, not too anything, “To concern yourself with him.”

His smile was smaller than the barely there wedge of moon. “As you wish, then.”

The doors of the meeting room opened. With one last bored wink, Elise vanished.

Ace sat on the other side of the table, his missing digit adorned in old jewelry — because Mori knew his men. Kouyou in front of him, right hand woman and lady of the house — just the right place to meet Dazai’s eyes. The Secret Executive stayed in his basement. Dazai sat with his feet on the chair.

The newest chair next to him screeched against the floor. As Mori entertained some flattering words from Ace, Chuuya’s gloved fingers pinched between his eyebrows.

“Did the raccoons that attacked you steal your band aid as a war spoil?” he mocked.

Dazai stared at him, very blankly.

He turned to Mori, wearing all of his tantrums on his sleeve, and cried out: “Why is he here — this is an Executives only meeting, not the sub-Executives —“

“Shut your mouth you —“

“He barely reaches the the table! This is a safety hazard and a show of —“

“Ah, Chuuya,” Boss cut in. “Did your conversation with Detective Matsuda go well?”

“He confirmed the station has their eyes on us — but the more rational of them recognize the patchwork of, an years old bother. Someone who isn’t us,” Chuuya replied, uncaring of the taken aback glance Dazai was directing at him. “I don’t know what group he was referring to, though.”

He huffed. “You couldn’t have asked? ”

“I tried, dipshit —“

“What are you even doing here, if —“

“Boss asked me to come, unlike your noisy ass — who fell asleep during the last meeting —“

“So we’re back to playing charity cases —“

“Boys,” Kouyou called, very politely, in the tone of drying ink over tiredly traced calligraphy. Ace massaged his temples. Mori smiled again, very much on the verge of patronizingly patting their heads.

“Some composure,” the man tutted. “If you could. You’re not children anymore. You are to uphold the name of our —”

Right as Dazai sank his teeth in his lower lip, gulping down a fit — an endlessly gratifying, horrendously loud snort left Chuuya’s mouth.

When all eyes turned to look at him, he blushed to the tip of his ears, sinking the heel of his shoe into Dazai’s shin.

“Dear,” he sighed, as pained tears gathered in his eyes. “Unprofessionalism enters by the pet flap, does it not?”

By the time silence had fallen, all amusement had disappeared from Mori’s eyes, leaving space for careful analysis — settled on the fist-wide glass sphere Elise had left behind. Inside it, floating aimlessly behind the fogged up glass, was a lone speck of white — a snowflake.

“Kawabata Yasunari was an unregistered Ability User, and our most recent mole,” the Boss explained, with that vacant tilt he liked to call authority. Dazai studied the man’s eyes on the photocopied picture, evacuated by the weight of posing; thought about the weight of his ashes, and the end they had done. The end of all traitors. “His Ability, Snow Country, allowed him to heal his own sicknesses at the cost of a human life,” he continued, “Recently, it was the cause for his father’s demise. He joined the Mafia six months ago, roughly — we have reason to believe he was meant to infiltrate from the start.”

“And how is he connected to the — unusual weather?” Ace questioned. “Urgent as it is — several of our shipments and planes have been stuck for weeks — I’d be somewhat disappointed if a sloppy traitor was to blame.”

“Not every enemy is a mastermind,” Kouyou commented. “His Ability only mentions snow, though.”

Boss hummed. “According to the — final confession he offered to Dazai, Kawabata was part of a group known as the Ballerinas. ”

Straightening, Chuuya blinked. “You mean the freelance Ability Users mercenaries?”

“He sure didn’t move like a ballerina,” Dazai muttered. “He kept bumping into my men. And this one time, he almost shot his foot —“

“Have you met the Ballerinas, Chuuya?” Mori asked.

“Only one of their messengers,” the boy nodded, squinting. “The poor chick was probably shot in the head the moment she returned. They tried to recruit me, back in Suribachi.”

Dazai’s delight dropped the files from his hands. “Slug, you didn’t tell me you had a dancing past —“

He pinched his wrist — undeterred, he continued: “They’ve got this whole thing going on about institutional injustice on Abilities, don’t they? They tried to get me by promising they’d have their insiders find my information in the Government Archives.”

“Quite,” Kouyou intervened, eyes settled on her own dossier. “According to the voices, the movement started out as a peaceful protest against the institutionalization of Abilities. An attack was launched during the first night of a ballet performance, roughly a decade ago — that’s how they got their names.”

“Oh, I remember,” Ace tilted his head to the side, flimsily. “A colleague of mine barely came out of the theater alive. Almost every man inside it was slaughtered by the fire.”

“It tightened the regulation process over Users rather intensely,” Mori settled his eyes on the floating snowflake — some eons ago, before Dazai’s blood had ever stained his porch. “To this day, Ability Users are forbidden from any actual use of their gift, unless partaking in an activity in possession of an Ability Permit.”

“Yeah,” At the mention of Permits, Chuuya’s expression had gotten complicated. “They’ve unclenched the grip a lot, these past few years, but before that...”

“The Ballerinas used to have a purpose,” Dazai tapped lithe fingers on the paper. Without turning, Chuuya moved his glass of water — right next to his jittery bandaged wrist — closer. “Or they said they did, at least — most of their fundings were actually uncovered as a scam. But their first attacks were aimed very carefully, despite their morals being more words than actual interest in helping Users. These last few years, though, they’ve turned into epigynous criminals,” He yawned. “According to Kawabata’s scaredy-cat tales, many of their Abilities are related to natural phenomena. He mentioned a particularly upset colleague of his with glacial powers of sorts.”

Mori’s pensive expression was laid on his hands. “I believe I heard Elise mention something similar.”

“That’s an animated movie, Boss,” Chuuya clarified.

“Then,” Ace intervened, “This unlikely season is the result of some terrorist neophyte? Their next ballet is bound to cast a snow spell over the south of Japan?”

“Kawabata must have infiltrated for information,” Kouyou said. “As Ace explained, the weather has caused numerous economical delays and deaths — on a national scale. Information on our deals would have told them where to act.”

“And information on possibly recruitable Ability Users, from the biggest assortment of the already-Government-hostile ones available in the city,” Chuuya added. “For whatever large scale attack they’ve been preparing all these years.”

She nodded. “And whose squad could be better to infiltrate than the Demon Prodigy? He has his hands everywhere.”

Dazai curled an eyebrow. “Stop attempting to imply something, Ane-san. It doesn’t suit you.”

“Kawabata gave us some names,” Mori breached in, before the dangerous tinge of the woman’s eyes could pull her lips apart. “Our Intelligence is already searching for possible hideouts. News about their dead mole must have already reached them — and the men are mostly in agreement to say it explains the official invite we have just received from Standard Island.”

The sound of a pin dropping would have shattered the windows with ease. Before an hesitant Chuuya could turn his confusion towards him, chaos exploded.

“Standard Island?” Ace’s jaw brushed the table. “What in God’s name might have caused that?”

“They’ve sent back our offers for years now,” Kouyou laughed, disbelieving. “The former Boss sent gifts and threats almost relentlessly. They’ve refused to deal with our banking affairs for almost a decade.”

“Europeans,” Dazai shook his head.

The other boy frowned. “What’s Standard Island?”

“It’s a glorified perpetual cruise for white aristocracy,” he answered, helpfully. “As a street punk, I’m not surprised you haven’t heard of it.”

Chuuya snapped, “As a stinky fucking fish I’m not surprised you’d know it all about stupid islands —“

“It’s a floating city, to put it easily,” Kouyou offered, promptly ignoring his wide-eyed existence to lay a gentle gaze on her subordinate. “Germany, France, and England designated it together shortly after the Great War, as a — meeting spot. It’s an entirely self-sufficient structure, and it moves around the South Pacific Ocean, following the climate. Some summers, it passes by Yokohama.”

“Some of the most important banks globally rest on that island,” Mori added. “Gaining a credit there means tight-lipped, absolute privacy from indiscreet governmental eyes — especially since Japan has no jurisdiction there. The Mafia has been attempting to be granted membership for a long time now. We've always been rejected."

"And now they're suddenly sending offers themselves," Chuuya concluded. "And the Ballerinas have been known to receive support from European Abilities advocates groups for a decade, now — we can assume they have some sort of base on the Island?"

"And that they will take advantage of its recent stop near the city," Dazai nodded. "For, oh — whatever reason it is that's moving them. What I still don't understand though, is — how did Standard Island manage to contact us? We have Users to lock our communication lines."

"Through the Pomegranate," Kouyou explained, chin high, after a pause. "A fake client communicated the invite under the guise of buying a night, and promised to remain in the city until we offered our answer."

Ace frowned. "And how did they know about the Pomegranate? Not to assume such a powerhouse has no insights over the underground — but information on the Pomegranate is severely guarded, even in the criminal scene."

"He said he was sold the information."

"By whom?"

Gloved fingers wrapped around Dazai's hand, under the table.

Dazai selected a portion of his brain to keep up with the mindless, sharply polite exchange of the two Executives, under Mori's sadistically entertained gaze. He listened to the taps, with the rest of it; casually flipping through the pages of his dossier until he landed on the indicated one.

From the corner of his eye, he saw Chuuya study his other glove, pointlessly abandoned on his own paper. He read through kanjis of Intelligence information on names he had been confessed and their most recent connections, until —

— Kawabata Yasunari was recruited to the Port Mafia, according to the stories of his comrades, through information gained by the hands of an unregistered sex worker, by the name of Furata Yoko, age —

He paused.

"— accept the offer, knowing it's most certainly a trap?" Ace was insisting.

"Specifically because we know, Executive," Kouyou replied, collected, "It makes no sense not to take advantage of the opportunity. As Boss said, the Ballerinas must be well aware of the murder of their mole. A response is to be expected. We might as well try to understand what their plan is."

"We," the man noted. From the other side of the table, Mori stood up, hands twined behind his back and a gentle smile on. He walked to the windows; studied the skyline. "Have no care for squabbles against the Government, though, do we? If it turns out this whole play is a game to fumble with non Users, staging an attack might ruin any chance of staying out of the Ballerinas' path — as long as they aren't after us, who cares?"

"Who cares?" she snapped. "And you dare call yourself a Night Warden? The well-being of Yokohama is our utmost sacred mission. I will not let some willful terrorist wannabe —"

Dazai dragged his fingers over the rim of his glass, pulling it closer. Chuuya's eyes followed the motion — when they moved to meet his own, he raised his eyebrows.

"Boys."

Mori hadn't turned yet. His voice was enough to bring a breathless silence; with his hands, Dazai thought, and his spine readjusted to fit that tone. "Boss?" Chuuya asked.

A wedge of his gaze appeared, as amused as the moon framing his silhouette. "Something to share with the class? With your Ane-san, perhaps?"

Inevitable as gravity, Kouyou's eyes fell on them.

They exchanged another glance.

"About Furata Yoko," Dazai started.

Her lips parted. "I haven't heard that name in — I still have men looking for her. What does she have to do with —"

Ace huffed. "Are two brats' tales of whores the most relevant matter at hand?"

"You'll want to hear this story," Mori confirmed. He nodded towards the windows, innocuous and hungry. A coward, Dazai thought, again and again, with sadistic tendencies.

Undignified in their suddenness, all the Executives made their way to the windows.

Glimmering gently under the stars — and the eyes of an emergency helicopter reporter — was a valley of ice spikes, staking the entire square outside the Headquarters; curling into the night like white ink, wrecking the streets and freezing the puddles abandoned by the latest storm.

What passersby might have missed was easily caught from the highest floor: the ice road had been carefully woven through the square to create the Port Mafia symbol.

"I believe," the doctor added, unnecessarily, offering Dazai his most obnoxious gaze, "That we might be getting framed."

---

What remained of Kawabata's house stood mostly incinerated and bone-thin against the endless white valley, just close enough to some nameless lake oozing off cold air to appear satirical.

"Well," Dazai blew warm air into his hands. "Time to explore the abandoned ship, mermaids."

"I should have said no to that movie marathon," Chuuya grunted — he didn't hesitate to stumble down the hill, though, sinking into the snow knee-deep before deciding to simply float. Leafless trees hid the weak roofs of the town; he got the vague desire to paint it.

"Maybe if you hadn't bet on who could fall asleep the latest —" he hinted.

"Maybe if you stopped breaking into my house —"

"Maybe if all your door passwords weren't some variation of your birthday," he called, careless of the middle finger he could feel, rather than see. "Little spider, I need you to do me a favor."

Gin stood straighter.

Suspicion would only be clear to an eye as well trained as his; to the silent eyes of that freezing wind, she was the poster child of obedience.

"Go into town," Ignoring the intake of breath out of Akutagawa's mouth, he continued, "Gather every ounce of information you can squeeze out of the farmers' lungs on the Kawabata family. Their bar brawls, their preferences, the last person they talked to — All of it. And then," He crouched down, whispering into her ear.

To her credit, her gaze did not shift an inch, the more detailed his instructions grew. A hint of curiosity was brightening her face, by the time she ran towards the town — not before a concerned glance in her brother's direction.

"Sir, won't they find a stranger being so nosy suspicious?" Akutagawa pressed.

Dazai gathered some snow from the ground, shaping it up in a ball. "They would find two weirder, for sure."

"I wasn't suggesting —"

"Has your sister gone non-verbal?"

The kid's nostrils flared. "She's not — Gin has always been quiet," And that, he could imagine — that the two of them had been left in bundles of dirty cotton on the roads of the slums, and that a child might have not been a good enough teacher.

“She certainly had just the right voice to propose an insubordination,” Dazai observed.

Frail as he already was, all substance seemed to be sucked right out of Akutagawa’s lungs. “I would never —”

“Gin wasn’t wrong, you know,” Dazai said. “You two could run. And you would probably be welcomed by most organizations, in and out of Yokohama. Whether or not they would be better than the Port Mafia, though,” He shrugged.

“Sir,” Akutagawa insisted, fueled by unnecessary rage towards a target he wouldn’t strike. They had brought a good number of weapons, and the rifle stuck in his unfamiliar grasp pulled him down like gravity. “Sir, we’re not leaving. Neither of us. I owe you,” He licked his lips, “I owe you the knowledge that you didn’t make a mistake in taking us in.”

“The Mafia needs loyalty,” he noted. “Not debts.”

“A debt of loyalty, then,” he raised his chin. He was truly dramatic at heart. “You showed faith in me. Loyalty is the least I can give back. I’ll gather enough blood at your feet to be worth the effort.”

Something tickled his skull.

He disliked it vividly. Disliked the wide eyes settled on him, the curve of his too-big coat — a promise to kneel, or to attack. All of it in his name. All of it not enough to —

“All you owe me,” he replied, “Is a bonsai and your sister’s defeat in a duel. My faith in your success in either of those requests is terribly low, but I do sometimes sin in hopefulness,” Dazai tapped the barrel of his rifle. “Do hide in the trees and snipe any vengeful ghost that gets in our way, yes? Gun, Rashomon — you pick. If you let it decapitate Chuuya, I might even be proud.”

“He’s your partner,” His feelings about it were written in blood on his frown. “I wouldn’t dare.”

Dazai sighed. “You all say that.”

The skeleton of the house hardly recalled its shape, apart from the few walls left standing; Through an half an hour long exploration, he prodded at some mess of dust and cloth that might have been a dinner table, barely managing to hold on when it collapsed.

Alerted by the noise, Chuuya floated down the skeleton of the stairs. “Maybe try not to destroy our trail, sucker?”

“I think I hear a little fairy talking,” He blinked. “My, this place might truly be haunted.”

“Where the hell were you?” he insisted, crossing his arms. “I’ve been calling for you for ten minutes. You need to see something.”

Dazai looked at him funny. “I’ve been here for longer than that.”

“Whatever,” Chuuya sighed. “Joke all you want. Come on.”

Haunted or not, the place certainly had the look for it. Whatever might have been left of Kawabata’s father had disappeared among the onyx furniture and the decaying arches, giving the few rooms the semblance of rusty domes. He had visited burned down locations countless times; none of them so utterly —

“He was as fucked up as your reports said, ah?” Chuuya concluded, hands in his pockets, studying a vaguely human-shaped trace of ash on the floor. “Did his Ability make him insane, or did you?”

“Ability Users are tormented,” He offered him a glance. “You’d know.”

Chuuya’s fingers twitched. The electricity stuck to his skeleton had seemed to worsen, after The Net — sometimes, he caught him flinching at nothing at all. But his hands hadn’t been black and decaying in months.

Someone else wouldn’t have noticed. But Dazai was next to him more often than he wanted — and Chuuya was carved on his blind side, picking at the scabs of divine-shaped scars.

“So would you,” he said, eventually, eyes somewhere else. “And that’s not what I asked.”

“Stop worrying,” He fixed a brick back into place, aimlessly; studied the circle of light a hole on the roof painted on the floor. “Mori would get mad if I locked you into a storm of madness.”

“Stop worrying,” Chuuya parroted. “I don’t have any fathers your deranged ass can make me murder.”

Dazai snorted.

They roamed through that old skeleton, moving fragile furniture and searching inside the miraculous remnants of cabinets. A dreadful sort of absence embraced every inch of that place; the inaudible sound of some impersonal thing’s rage at being emptied.

“Is it warmer in here, or am I losing it?” Chuuya muttered, at one point, kicking what might have been a chair. “Like crossing the door fucked up with your senses.”

“Nothing so fancy,” Dazai leaned down, squinting at a slightly less incinerated tile. From underneath it, he extracted a dossier. “Someone with very warm hands was simply here before us.”

“A musician, then?” Chuuya wondered, leaning his knees on his back in a pointless attempt to unbalance him. Music sheets mixed with children drawings and professional sketches; at the end of that inconspicuous bunch, only numbers. “Or not. I’m assuming the Maihime Project isn’t some particularly hard piano piece.”

Dazai focused on the dig of his kneecaps under his shoulder blades, relaxing his heartbeat without a twitch — because they had both learned to hear, and now they both had a bad habit of listening.

“It’s a governmental project from the Great War,” he said, cautious. “Propositions on the aid Ability Users could offer to the conflict.”

“That was the first time Ability Users were allowed a license for any kind of activity, wasn’t it?” At his nod, Chuuya scoffed. “That spells Ballerinas out in capital letters. Are we to assume Kawabata casually kept secret Government files in the house?”

“We could,” Dazai considered. “But that wouldn’t explain how he would have scribbled on the wall with fresh blood.”

Almost comically, his head snapped up.

Half-hidden behind heavy curtains moved by a more violent hiss of wind, stuttering kanjis dripped red onto the ash. Dazai crawled to the puddle of blood, wetting his fingers to study its density. “This is from a few hours ago at best. They knew we were coming — they’re playing with us,” He climbed to his feet. “Right place, wrong time.”

When he turned, Chuuya was nowhere to be found.

“Did you get spooked out?” Dazai called, settling his hands on his hips. Louder, he screamed: “Unbelievable. Leaving me to talk to the walls — We have a job to do, you know?”

No answer came.

He huffed, cleaning the snow stuck to his coat, settling to squint at the kanjis. The tip-tap of the wind against the fragile walls was a eerie creak; when he studied the endless white valleys outside the windows, they seemed to last to the end of the world — inhabited and unfriendly.

The wood of the door frames cried out.

“But why us,” Dazai muttered, frowning at the scattered papers on the floor. “The Ballerinas do it for Media coverage. Why pin the mess on any other underground group,” He tilted his head back to meet the eyes of a painted woman — only her pale face having survived the fire. “Who knows. Maybe they hate Abilities these days.”

She didn’t answer either. With a sigh, he stood — and crashed right over a crouched down Chuuya.

“Oi, asshole!” he wasted no time saying — jumping to his feet just quickly enough to watch Dazai tumble to the floor. “What the hell is up with you? Playing hide and seek in the middle —“

“What is up with you, you germ!” Dazai snapped, spitting some snow mixed with ash. “You’re the one who just up and disappeared —“

“Sirs,” Akutagawa called.

At the destroyed doorstep, one hallway away, his rifle was digging into the skull of a child.

Said kid appeared strangely relaxed about the whole ordeal — a round-cheeked smile on and naked feet that seemed to shake from the effort not to jump in place from excitement. His ash-blond hair was intertwined with hay; the blue overalls he wore were torn at the seam in a way that spoke of affection, rather than poverty.

When he waved at them, enthusiastic, it brightened his freckled face. “City folks, aren’t you? I’ve heard all about your guns!”

The stillness was broken by another hiss of wind, just cold enough to be felt. Chuuya put two fingers on the bridge of his nose, shutting his eyes. “Akutagawa,” he exhaled, “Let the brat go. For fuck’s sake.”

“He was spying on you,” he spelled out.

“The wind could blow him away. Holding chatty brats at gunpoint is exactly —“

“I do not answer to your orders.”

“I’m your superior too, Dark Knight!”

Very politely, the child raised his hand.

Dazai stood up, brushing dust off his coat. “Let him go,” he ordered — and once Akutagawa immediately did, much to the spluttering offense of Chuuya, he nodded, “Yes, kid?”

“I wasn’t spying on you,” he swore. “I sat outside to wait for you to be done. I’m patient! It’s my prayer time!”

“Prayer time?” Chuuya questioned.

“For Uncle Eikichi and Nari-nari,” His smile lacked one or two front teeth; his eyes had the vacant glee of someone who had genuinely not considered the possibility of blood leaving the body once in his life. “The house was destroyed by fire. If we don’t pray, this place won’t be puri — putri —“ A blink. “That thing where we kick evil spirits’s butts. That’s how Granny put it.”

He couldn’t be older than nine. One glance exchanged with Chuuya confirmed his lack of suspicion — the possibilities crowded in front of his eyes, still.

“These evil spirits,” Dazai dared. “Are they, according to your Granny, by any chance — causing the bad weather?”

The kid's home was among the few buildings in the town that might have been repainted, at some point in the last century. The same couldn't be said for the others — or for the goggle-eyes the near-skeletons hanging from their windows had laser-pointed in their direction.

"Students," Dazai offered, cheerfully, kissing the hand of a particularly old woman who had screamed an intelligible — to all but their child guide — question. "Lucky to-be journalists, if it all goes as it should."

"And what's with those bandages?" she shouted. The upcoming darkness of the evening had her squint to see even a inch of them. "Are all photographers this eccentric? I've never met one."

"Most certainly!"

"Your friend will die if a flash hits him," the woman shrieked, nodding towards Akutagawa. The snow reached her hips; it was a wonder how she kept moving. "He is too pale. Get some meat in him."

"She will die if the photographer blinks," he heard the kid mutter, as their guide pulled on Chuuya's hands to lead them over the enclosure of cows and goats framing his house. "I'm not pale."

"Don't insult old women," the well mannered dog warned. "They managed to live longer than your stubborn ass probably will."

"Yeah, Akutagawa," Annoyed with his slow pace — a mixture of stubbornness and something he had no desire to analyse — Dazai grabbed one of his coat sleeves, pulling him along. "Don't insult old women in front of Chuuya. As a bag pet, he has an affinity for them."

"What does that raised finger mean?" the child asked, marveling at his gloved hand.

The front door was open; from inside came the chaos of four walls disseminated in children's drawings — holding more people than they should have been able to. What could have been a kitchen, a living room, and a bedroom at the same time welcomed them in a hurricane of colors and loud voices, more blinding than any stained glass windows in the Headquarters' hallways.

Dazai only registered the vague smell of warm food and a pair of children jumping on a couch, before a wooden sword was sunk in his abdomen — followed by the war cry of a victorious child in milk-stained clothes.

"Finally!" He exclaimed, immediately falling to his knees. "Defeat, at last! The embrace of death is finally —"

A flash of familiar bright-void appeared at the corner of his vision; quicker than lighting, he wrapped a bruising grip around Akutagawa's wrist, suffocating his instinctive call to

Rashomon.

Akutagawa's pained gasp was suffocated by a feminine voice, calling from the stairs: "Kenji, what in God's name —"

"Seriously," Dazai smiled. Given the look he received from Akutagawa, he knew it wasn't a flattering show. "Get a grip."

"Granny, I brought city folks!" Kenji waved his hands, bolting in the woman's direction. Short as he was, hanging from her gowns was still feasible; but the endless deserts of her wrinkles denounced antique bones — she patted his head, quietly asking him to settle. "They want to know about the fire woman!"

Dazai turned to meet Chuuya's gaze — and his eyes widened. "Chuuya was pregnant?"

"I will actually slit your throat open," the boy warned, the one arm that wasn't holding the awed newborn fixing an overly large blanket around its small limbs. He seemed to be wondering just how immoral it would have been to float the kid — just to be safe. "I think they — Oh, shit —"

Their guide's grandma — and not, as it turned out, the guardian of the entire maze of youngsters in the house; they just like to come around for dinner, she explained — cleaned the vomit off Chuuya with great effectiveness; but the child still refused to be taken from his arms.

Much to Akutagawa's distaste, they were forced at the endlessly long table and refilled with enough food to wonder if the whole town would come to join. Much to his rage, Chuuya and his newfound creature settled between him and Dazai — either not willing to listen to the boy's praises, or not willing to have Dazai bruise him under a stranger's eyes again.

"Everyone's washed their hands, correct?" Granny asked, though the army had already attacked.

There was an old glass, Dazai thought; close enough to his eyelids to tickle, and old enough to be greenish at the edges — it had been there since he was a child. The chaos behind it resembled the one of the giggling children around him; a bit distantly, Dazai had always thought such liveliness might have been rather nice, had he been able to clean the glass enough to set through it.

He smiled. "What a polite bunch."

"They are, aren't they?" Granny cooed, patting each of the heads she could reach from her middle-table seat. The kids hung off her like a lifeline — pulled at her gowns, put food in her bowl, fiddled with her heavy earrings. "I apologize for the mess. We rarely get guests in town."

"I cannot imagine why!" Dazai widened his eyes. "Such a little jewel you've got. A sheep tried to eat my shoes in the middle of the street. I'm cultured enough to understand a greeting."

Chuuya choked on his water. Akutagawa made an about-face, unwilling to ask the question on his lips.

“You boys came all the way here alone?” she asked.

“School project,” Chuuya confirmed, as he awkwardly rocked the little girl in his arms. She was drooling on the black fabric of his jacket; her eyes, brighter than rising suns, were set on him with something akin to astonishment. “Some of us are doing an internship at the Police Station, for — credits and stuff. They have us wander out of the city, and bring back reports of the situation.”

“Small towns tend to receive less aid,” Dazai continued, seamlessly. “Some middle schools use it as an opportunity to teach the importance of support to younger kids — you might have seen a little girl around, this afternoon? Black air, cute face — looks just like our companion here.”

“Ah, yes,” Granny nodded to Akutagawa, not appearing offended by his stillness in response. “Seeing her so interested in the Kawabata certainly caused some confusion in the neighborhood. A few of us started wondering if we’d just lost one kid in the count.”

“There’s fifteen of us!” Kenji, head on the woman’s lap, jumped to say. “Five-teen. But the twins are leaving. And the other twins too,” A sigh. “Soon, only the Aunties.”

“Don’t say that with that tone,” She pulled on his ear, affectionately. Turning to Akutagawa, she added: “Your sister is very beautiful, son. Very quiet, too. You should pack some of your dinner and bring it to her — She’s been working hard,” Her glance turned critical. “Maybe it’s better if I give you another plate. What do they even feed children in the city?”

“I grew up in the slums,” Akutagawa said, somberly.

“Excuse me?”

“He grew up with some loons,” Chuuya intervened. Both the kids in her lap and the one in his own seemed endlessly fascinated by every inch of him. “Horrible people. Forgot to feed him and all. Our school intervened,” A flash almost startled him out of his seat. “Where the fuck did you get a camera?”

Granny raised a finger to her mouth. “Language,” she lamented, sending a pointed look to her nephew’s eyes, bulging out of his skull.

“Hatman said a bad word,” Kenji whispered, amazed.

Chuuya’s eyes widened, “Don’t say it again, it’s — not until twenty and stuff —“

“You’re too short to be twenty!”

Akutagawa hummed.

“Excuse me — Mackerel, give me that camera —“

Enthusiastically, he shook the photograph in the air to develop it. “Ane-san gave it to me. She also ordered me to take endless pictures of you. Even when you were peeing.”

“Ane-san likes me,” Chuuya made to grab the picture, but was stopped by the weight on his lap — he did manage to elbow Akutagawa on the side, though. “No, she didn’t. Give me that, you — fudging — give me — “

“Don’t you look parental! Look, look — don’t you hit me in front of the — what? Oh, you brats want a picture too? Let’s go! Who can throw more rice right on top of the Slug’s hat — “

It took the table a good half hour to settle again, after that somewhat simple discovery. By the time Dazai was allowed to sit, abandoning a pile of pictures on some knitted blanket on the floor, even more food had been left in his bowl — and even Akutagawa was gingerly answering wide eyed questions from their smaller companions.

He offered Granny another smile, as polite as Mori would have put his hands on his shoulders for. “You’re as welcoming as your nephew promised us.”

“Oh, he’s not my nephew,” She ruffled his hair, patting the child’s squirrel-cheeks when he attempted to offer her a big smile through all the food. “His parents left to find work, and they asked me to take care of him. Kenji is not made for the city. He’s got a — delicate temper.”

Chuuya made a face — one that Dazai had not quite mastered yet, and that knew to mean someone had just lied to their faces.

“He certainly has good intuition,” he offered, with that gracious tilt of his mouth that got old ladies on the street to ask him to help them cross. “Took him no time to understand what we had come here for.”

“By spying on your conversation, sure,” Akutagawa noted, eyes and chopsticks inches deep in his soup.

Dazai attempted to direct him a look, leaning over Chuuya — only to be stopped by his foot stepping on his own. On his lap, the baby garbled some nonsense, small hands pulling at the asymmetrical strands of his hair.

“Our condolences for your loss,” he said, instead. “And our apologies for coming to disrupt your mourning. The media coverage on the case is certainly lacking, but our teacher suggested we might find one or two interesting details if we — took the matter into our own hands.”

“We’re studying a unit on filial homicide,” Dazai added, helpfully. “Perhaps you could help us understand what might have brought Kawabata to murder his father and burn his house?”

Chatter dimmed.

Every young eye at the table laid on him.

Granny's storm-colored eyes flashed. She was a curved line filled with generous intensity, and her floral dress was anything but threatening — nonetheless, her warning was more than clear. "Some subtlety, son, if you could?"

"Nari-nari is dead?" some young girl seated on the other end of the table stuttered. "But — But he was supposed to help Miri give birth! The cows can't —"

"The cows are perfectly capable of giving birth on their own," Chuuya reassured her, his mouth half hidden by the playful infant's hand. "Statistically, over 75% of animal births end up in a success. Miri won't fuck up the statistics."

Her eyes filled with tears.

"It's a complicated matter," Dazai hurried to say. Clearly offended by his nails in his thigh and Akutagawa's low *tsk!*s, Chuuya mumbled into his plate, systematically dumping all the vegetables he knew he detested into Dazai's own. "We know. But your child, he said something about — some sort of connection between what happened to the Kawabata and the recent meteorological mess?"

The woman's gaze fluttered — from them to the door; and then, to the small bodies next to them.

"This is an old town, boys," she sighed, eventually. "Myths and spirits are nothing new. According to our stories, a son shouldn't kill his father unless possessed. Burning our houses — You need to understand, most of the buildings you've seen have been here since the very foundation. We might fix them up, we might change some things — But our homes are our ancestors as much as our dead."

"Which makes Kawabata's actions even weirder," he guessed. "Is the general consensus in town that some evil spirit made him do it?"

"Yasunari..." Granny blinked. "He was never much — stable. A quiet boy. Very pensive, very shy. It got worse after his mother died, and when his illnesses began. He mostly stayed with his father. Then he got a job in the city, and he started bringing friends home."

Chuuya gently tore the child's hand from his mouth, trying and failing to stop him from putting his harness between his own drool-pooled lips. "Friends?"

Kenji leaned forward, as conspiratorial as a nine year old could be. "People with Abilities," he whispered.

Granny recoiled back, as if shot. "Kenji."

"You know about Abilities?" Akutagawa questioned, sharp — perhaps thinking back to his efforts to capture him by weapon, and not Rashomon. "I thought most towns didn't even believe they existed."

"The Aunties say they're all stories," the kid replied, elbows on the table and knees on his chair. City folks want to charm you into leaving home! But I will leave home, one day."

The woman's expression tightened — clearly, she had heard that monologue more than once. "Of course, little sun."

"I will walk a thousand miles, and go to the city," he continued, twinkling, "And I will join the Detectives!"

Half-amused, Dazai curled an eyebrow. "As in, the ADA?"

He might as well have dropped a bomb right in his bowl; Kenji's jaw dislocated itself, and he pointed an accusing finger towards his Granny. "I told you it existed! I told you — I told you, I told you —"

"You mean that shabby Detective Agency?" Chuuya asked, surprised. "The one that dealt with that one shipment failure a few months ago?"

The incident had been of great coverage, though the two of them had been stuck in some safe house in Greece, at the time — the Agency had dealt with a hostage case on some crusade ship near the Port, using Abilities to do what the authorities had not managed to.

It had granted them a publicity they were probably unused to; according to Mori's — always somewhat amused — reports on the Agency, they mostly dealt with security jobs for high names, and with unimportant lowlife that was lucky enough to sport an Ability. They had never truly crossed paths with the Port Mafia; either they were too big of a fish, or the detectives too small of one.

"I thought only Ability Users could join," Dazai said.

"That's not a problem! I —"

"Kenji," Granny hissed.

A glacial sort of silence descended on that portion of their table.

The boy sat back down, curling into himself like a turned-off toy. He picked up his chopsticks again. "Sorry, Gran," he murmured.

Tiredness was endlessly fast to take the place of sternness; she sighed, in an ageless way, caressing his head — and Dazai knew, irrelevantly, that no one had ever cared for him a tenth of the amount that old woman held in her creaking ribcage for each child in that village.

Akutagawa had been unwillingly captured by the tales of some entirely toothless child at his left. Chuuya met his eyes.

"Ah," Dazai started, widening his smile to the point of ache, "Enough with all this funereal stuff! Granny, I am very interested in that beautiful garden of camellias you've got in the back. Why don't you tell me something about it?"

"And those nice drawings on the walls!" Chuuya added, slightly less cheerful, but offering his best performance with his hands under the child's armpits. He made her dance a bit, much to the joy of the other kids. "Dare I presume someone in this room is to blame for them?"

The entire table lit up.

Dinner didn't quite end as much as it blurred away — in sleepy, slow steps, the kids began to rise from the table and wander off, either to play near the couches or to skip their way to whatever old house in the street was theirs. They all kissed Granny's cheeks before leaving; some of the younger girls waved in Chuuya's direction, blushing.

For that, Dazai kept the ugly photos.

At some point of that exodus, Gin quietly slipped in from the constantly open entrance door, making a beeline to her brother. The few children still in the living room refused to hear excuses — they dragged them along for some rendition of a game involving chairs.

Dazai offered an unimpressed expression in the face of Akutagawa's outrightly blank terror, tapping his wrist in a silent reminder.

"Come on," A weight was dumped in his arms; only by pure instinct did he manage not to drop the sleeping girl. Bright with determination and all the manners Kouyou had pushed into him, Chuuya turned towards their host. "My apologies, Gran. May we use your kitchen?"

They ended up washing ten cartoonishly unstable towers of dishes, under the grateful eyes of Granny — her ancient chair and her thousand blankets.

Officially, at least. Waving the child as a clear excuse not to move a finger, Dazai obtained the woman's coos and to lazily sit on the counter.

"You boys shouldn't face the road so late at night," she told them. "I have a free bed, and some futons upstairs — The attic is abandoned, but the heating and an old TV still work. If you four can split up, you can leave when it's sunny," Her face grew a bit contrite; she hugged her blankets tighter. "Well. As sunny as we get, these days."

Chuuya, sporting a comical pair of yellow rubber gloves, only paused for the time it took the warming up faucet to emit a scream-like screech.

It somehow didn't wake the girl in Dazai's arms; he rocked her, lacking the finesse of Madame Tanaki's beloved protagonists — he wondered if the texture of his bandages on her cheek was a bother, or if she had no time for such concerns.

"You two are good with her," Granny complimented. "She's a stubborn little thing. Her Mama works twenty hours of the day in Tokyo; by the time she gets back, she can barely even feed her. It has made her somewhat irritable."

"Why doesn't she move to the city?"

She shrugged. "Habit? Lack of trustable babysitters?" Her gaze swam over the mess in her living room; the chaos of children and the lack of lights from the other houses. "People already have so much to give up, everyday. Perhaps that's why they're stubborn about giving up their home, as well."

Dazai settled his chin on the child's head, blowing up a bubble out of the faucet. Chuuya scrubbed at a plate, eyes settled elsewhere.

Behind the glass, he considered. Behind the grave, only — up.

“Granny,” he asked, “Why are you so scared of Abilities?”

Not an inch of shock appeared through the wrinkles in her face; hesitation, perhaps, and an ounce of defensiveness.

“I’m not scared of them,” she admitted. “I’m scared of what it will make him believe about himself. I’m scared about what it will make the world believe about him,” Her fingers traced the flowers on the hems of the blanket. “He’s a good kid. His best friend calls him a fallen sun ray. ”

Dazai hummed. “My best friend calls me Did you put laxatives in my curry?, occasionally.”

“So he’s great,” Chuuya replied, squinting at the old woman. “Sweet and good. An Ability isn’t going to change that. Things aren’t as bad as they were a few years ago, Gran.”

“Any quantity of bad is a threat to his happiness.”

“All quantities of bad are as necessary as the ones of good, ” the boy insisted. His hat had been abandoned on his seat, and the children had decided the best course of action would be to put it on Akutagawa’s head — where it refused to sit, slipping on his eyes whenever a new round started.

The logistics of the game were as lost to him as they appeared to be to the siblings. Ever since he had dragged them to the Mafia, he had only studied the shape of their frames in a valley of much taller, much older ones — watching them tower over those over children did strange wonders to their features. Terror and longing, all in one.

He wondered if they would have gotten along with Odasaku’s orphans.

“You can’t give him a perfect existence. No one can. If you treat him like this, teach him that every person out there will despise something that’s part of him — He will think it’s out of fear. Your fear.”

Granny’s lips trembled. “I’m not scared of him.”

“He doesn’t know that,” Dazai said.

“But —“

“Gran,” he insisted. “Those friends Kawabata brought to town. They were all Ability Users, weren’t they?”

She stayed quiet.

The faucet was turned off. Dazai laid the sleeping kid on a bundle of pillows near the counter. Men, Mori had said, once, are much like animals.

“Kenji told us the entire town has been visiting the house to free it from evil spirits. But the house almost collapsed on us after a few steps, and the grass outside was untouched. That’s not a place that’s been visited,” He glanced at the maze of kids. “You sent Kenji there because you were alerted about our presence — by whoever left the place in a hurry when they saw us coming.”

Granny shut her lips. Once the skin around them had turned white, she murmured: “She said they’re working to create a — a better world for Ability Users. She said they will avenge Kawabata — create a city where Kenji will get to do all he wants.”

“They won’t,” Chuuya announced, matter of factly. “All they want is to cause a storm. They don’t care about Ability Users — If they did, they wouldn’t be killing people in their name.”

She paled. “Killing?”

Dazai crouched down in front of her chair. “I need you to tell us all you know about the woman who visited that house. About Kawabata’s friends — I’m assuming he might have introduced them. If he tried to use the kid as leverage —“

“I’m not putting him in danger,” she stuttered. “I — I am not putting him in danger. Killing — She said she could save him, and —“

The lights flickered.

Her pupils shrunk; petrified, but for the spasms of her wrinkled fingers — Granny’s eyes settled on the barrel of the gun half-hidden under Dazai’s coat, and the sharp edge of the kitchen knife Chuuya had slipped down his sleeve.

“I know how to kill quietly enough no Auntie will find out until the morning,” Dazai explained, very softly. “I know how to get enough screams out of them, all those runaway parents of theirs will hear it from whatever hole they have scurried into. Those pictures will be the last you have of them.”

“Your so-called saviour has her eyes on my home,” Chuuya added, still polite to the bone. Granny’s eyes flew to the playing bunch; standing still in the middle of the jumps, Akutagawa and Gin were staring right back at her — Rashomon a there-not-there possibility in the air.

“And it’s not with any intentions of justice. I hope you can understand.”

Sweeping into the attic by the window didn't manage to startle Chuuya — dropping his game console on the dusty tiles of the vacant floor almost did, though.

“That’s where you ran off?” he gawked, grabbing the red controller, as automatic as every fight they had had about anything in this world. “I thought you were going to lay awake in the car out of fear Granny would fuck us up in our sleep.”

“I’m hardly fortunate enough,” Dazai replied, reaching for the blue one.

“Fortune helps fools.”

“And Grannies help starving kids,” He dropped on one of the old futons the boy had spread out in the one corner with a dry ground, and coughed through the cloud of dust it raised.

“Want to debate?”

“You’re less of a debater, and more of a shit-talker,” Unimpressed, Chuuya kneeled to hook the console to the ancient television in front of the beds. “Your protégée stole my hat.”

“You like him.” That, at the very least, was abundantly clear. He knew the face Chuuya wore when he wanted to make friends — all the muscles he never moved near Dazai got into action.

Seamless, the boy said: “You don’t.”

“That’s certainly an idea,” he offered, and added nothing else. Veiled by his blanket, he shuffled forward on his knees — wrapping that heavy semblance of his body around Chuuya’s curved form. “You like them both. Or you would have let us take the bed.”

“Mackerels belong in fishbowls,” Chuuya replied, and dodged that makeshift shield only seven times, before settling on selecting their game options — which was as good of a white flag as he would ever receive. “And I’m fucking done with your snoring.”

That was hypocritical. “I could snore in another bed, too.”

“I can wrap myself up in a cluster-like creature and drown you out, though.”

Dazai embraced the circle of his shoulders, wrists knocking as they crossed under his chin, where he could reach with nimble fingers to pull at his choker. Nuzzled into a piece of hair that got stuck in his mouth; wondered if he could push until magnets formed on their rib-cages, and no one could question his corporeality — not when attached to gravity itself.

“I can recite the Bible in Russian,” he concluded; nonsensically, tightening his grip until Chuuya couldn’t breathe — because it was less world changing than asking can I wear your skin until they notice or can I sleep in your bed again. “You pick.”

“Can you learn to do something actually useful, instead?” Chuuya proposed. “Since you keep breaking into my apartment —“

“Albatross’ apartment.”

“— and eating my food, and using my —“

“You’ve gotten so stingy, since Ane-san —“

“And why the fuck do you keep washing only half of the dishes?” he snapped. “Not even — it would be better if you just didn’t wash some of them. What’s the point of you washing half of a plate? I’ll just have to do it again —“

“You asked. I did them,” Dazai insisted.

He barked some more — slipping into the cracks of Chuuya’s defense was an art, though, and he only ever painted when his pockets were empty. If he moved just imperceptibly enough on the couches of the Headquarters, he would end up with his head brushing his thighs — if his eyes followed the hoards of reports Dazai had tricked him into writing, he could get away with laying his head on his lap.

There were warmer things than a fight. It had all been about survival, though. All of it — always.

“I miss Odasaku,” he mumbled.

“And I miss when I didn’t know you,” At last, moved by either the moonlight or the racing video game, Chuuya shrugged him off, throwing his controller in his lap. “Whoever wins this gets to tell Gin you bruised her brother.”

“Her brother clearly needs to understand not to cause problems where they aren’t needed.”

“Gets to tell Akutagawa you sent his sister to gather blood from the happy villagers, then.”

Dazai twitched.

Gingerly, Chuuya smacked his nape. His back landed on his futon; he wiggled madly, until he managed to drag it into a parallel line to the TV. “Stop underestimating me.”

“But it’s so easy,” he lamented.

“What are we up against right now, Dazai?”

“Oh, name basis. Are you about to kill me?”

His glare was unmoved.

“What do you think it is?” Dazai yawned, pinching the more bruised sides of his thighs until he parted them — crash-landing his head on the hardened lines of his abdomen as the boy let out a oof!. It wasn’t the most optimal position to play in; he ignored Chuuya’s yelps for an elbow in less than acceptable areas, and laid on his side, until his ear could be stuffed with the distant heartbeat of one of the veins over his ribs.

On the screen, his pink princess character swerved through roads of rainbow. Chuuya scoffed, attempting to raise his thigh enough to block his vision of the TV. “What do you think I’m prodigious enough to find out?”

“Ability supremacists,” Dazai answered, a bit honest. “Or Ability persecutors. Lowlife or senators. They want the Mafia to go down — so whichever it is, they will be dealt with,” The smile he threw his way, lit up by liquid neon lights and nothing else, was vacant enough to empty out his bones. You are halved, he recalled. “Isn’t that enough, soldier?”

Quietly, they played.

All but silent, in actuality — curses and gloating and insults, and the sound of the pack of chips and the whiskey he hadn’t brought from the car — so, Chuuya ; which said much about his reluctance to play along with his bored antics.

Sleep tickled his spine as much as the sleeplessness; his mouth was dry. The warmth was suffocating and mind-numbing and gathered in unusual points of tension — the quality fabric of Chuuya’s pants over his jaw; his sharp hip, where the shirt had risen, being covered in goosebumps with every exhale out of Dazai’s lips.

“Mackerel.”

He tilted his head back. The unmatching eyes he met told him he had only heard the last of a few calls.

“Too scared for a rematch?” he questioned.

Chuuya slipped his hair free from the hat; brushed the strands of atomized autumn back, worked the buttons of his waistcoat open — he hummed his melody all the way through it. He envied, for a moment, that unblemished penchant of his — for molding existence into something that would fit him. He envied how easily he let existence touch his skin without flinching.

“The Maihime Project,” he asked, like that had been the whole point of that evening. “Was it connected to the Arahabaki Project?”

Dazai dropped his head again, rolling his thumbs on the commands until they ached. “All Ability-related projects are connected to the Maihime Project. It was the first time the Government ever considered using Abilities.”

“Not what I asked.”

“Why do you assume I know?”

“You’re an Executive,” Chuuya’s distaste was clear; his aims even more so. “That was what the race was all about, right? You’d read the files on my past before me,” His fingers curled around the commands. “I’m assuming you know all about that, by now.”

“Did you ever consider,” Dazai asked, in occasional honesty, “That just because I wanted to read them first, it doesn’t mean I wouldn’t have let you see them?”

Chuuya scoffed. “Fine,” he hiccuped, downing the last of the bottle, already swaying in that way of his. “Bullshit all you want.”

He stared at the floor. They played well until after midnight — until the urge in his bones subdued.

There’s a glass, he had told Odasaku, once — except then, he had forgotten what he wanted to go with that start. There’s a glass, and they all know how to punch it hard enough to crack but me.

Is the glass a window?, he had asked.

He hadn’t thought about that. It used to be, I believe.

“A file or two on whatever seaside village you came from won’t tell you much, you know?” he noted, after his next round win. “Professor N died with the relevant stuff. You knew it would happen. You decided it.”

“I don’t regret it,” he replied, and Dazai knew, from the depth of himself, that it was the most honest he would ever be. “Can’t I just be curious? It’s my life.” A sound left his mouth — something between a scoff and a hiccup, plus some word he wasn’t meant to understand. “Fuck, do you think he had a Granny?”

Kneeled over the television, he paused. “He?”

The cables were disconnected; the room drowned in a silvery kind of darkness. One of their shorthands, he recalled, stupidly, worked only in reflections — a blinding dot to the eye for aid in escape; two of them to signal enemies; three to annoy Hirotsu.

“Y’know,” A yawn. “The other one.”

They hadn’t annoyed Hirotsu in a while, he thought — Kouyou hadn’t punished them in a while. He was an Executive, and Chuuya was the closest thing Mori could concede. The portrait had been hung in the hallway already.

“Let’s sleep,” Dazai decided. His cheeks were warm; there was an ache through all his body — something softened by the drumming nausea. “Tomorrow will be fun.”

Chuuya grunted, gathering himself on his lower limbs, and he stumbled to the abandoned bundle of his coat, taking off his clothes to the best of his chuckling abilities. His failure was predicted and ordinarily amusing; by the time he tripped his way to where Dazai was folding his suit jacket — his waistcoat was hanging from one of his arms, his removed harness stuck around his knees.

“Stop,” he admonished him, batting his hands away from his tie, “You tie this shit wrong on purpose, don’t you? You fucking donkey.”

“Yes, Chuuya.”

“Don’t you Yes, Chuuya me,” He fumbled with the tie himself, attempting to choke him with it — hanging so heavily off of him, they stumbled around the room, soaked feet getting stuck in the old tiles, “Bitch,” he added.

“Moron,” he replied. “Slug.”

“Fuckass. Mackerel.”

“Simpleton.”

“Mummyfucker.”

“Hatforbrains.”

“What? Enemy of all women.”

“Women adore me.”

“No,” Chuuya swore, folding his tie and sticking it in his own pants, fixing his collar up and down, indecisive. He didn’t protest when Dazai got his fingers under his choker to remove it, tracing old Corruption scars over his gulping — so he did it, doing his best not to fall over his attempts to get the harness off. “They really fucking don’t.”

Dazai was somewhat buzzing.

He slid his hands down his arms in a way that would have tickled someone else — stuck two fingers in his gloves and pulled them off, “I think they do,” he insisted, under the garbled mess of Hirose’s Killer At Noon, and some added insult.

“You’ll never know if you up and wring your own throat,” Chuuya muttered, naked hands and mind elsewhere, the burned eye brighter than the other — and it was a strange concern to have. Mori won’t blame you, he kept telling, and —

Before he could do anything about the fingers almost — almost — brushing his own, they landed on his arm bandages — not a question and not a threat and nothing at all. Lighter than wind, he thought; realer than —

He stumbled back.

Chuuya paused.

“Sleep,” he yawned, absolutely forgetful, too unstable to even walk a straight line to his futon. He fell face first — curled up; he slept on his back but fell asleep on his side, Dazai knew. “Fuckin’ senator,” he added, for no reason, and he slept, or pretended to.

Dazai laid on his own futon.

He thought of the hiss in Ango's voice when he sent the local cat away; the eyes Odasaku wore to handle a gun that would not kill; Mori, always Mori, in a dream — making his way down the stairs of Bar Lupin to check on his stitches. You always have a wound, don't you?

"Hey," Chuuya called, at some point. "Tell me."

He did. He dreamed, he thought, but he did not sleep.

---

...

---

"Right," Chuuya concluded, eyeing the — entirely rebuilt, it seemed; shimmering wood and stone roof and snow-covered cobblestone road — Kawabata household. "Because that's not ominous at all."

"Are you referring to the blood?" Dazai made sure to ask, courteous, nodding to the plastic bag in Gin's hands. The girl's knees peeked only barely from the snow; a gentler shard of Rashomon kept trying to shake snowflakes off her hair.

"I'm referring to Ability: House Renovation or whatever we've got going on here," the other boy replied. He tilted his head. "Ability: Interior Decor?"

It was terribly funny. Dazai would have rather died than admit it. "Give it up," he said. "No one cares for dog-hosted cabarets."

Chuuya massaged his temples. "Allegedly haunted house later. Blood in a bag first," He set his eyes on the Akutagawa siblings, standing quiet and wide eyed a few steps away from them. Then, he blinked at Dazai. "Why. No — How."

"Black Market grunts used to accept blood without too many questions," Akutagawa replied, defensively, having already bitten down the urge to question Gin's secret job. "Gin adapted."

"Remind me to be mindful of any paper cuts I get if the little spider is in the room," Dazai said. He lowered his eyes to her. "Anything to add to your report?"

A short report, certainly — cut-throat to the extreme, but not imprecise enough to demand more clarity. Almost meeting his gaze, she shook her head, wind-chapped chin and lips bleeding.

"You should invest in a mask," Chuuya told her, predictably taking the bag off Gin's fingers and pinching her cheek. "Listen here: you can even get a black one, how great is that?"

Dazai squinted. “Didn’t Detective Matsuda have some pictures of you wearing —“

“We should go,” he interrupted.

Someone had polished the walls. They were a shimmering shade of wooden crimson; bright as if oiled with sweat and all that kept viscera soft one against the other. The summer sun broke through rusty, fogged up windows; the particles of dust in its rays chased each other through the shadows — their imperceptible hum louder than even the tiles. Dazai danced on them; they didn’t even creak.

The silence was heavier than the snow. No one dared to make a sound; even the knife Gin was playing with slashed the air soundlessly. At the end of the entrance hallway, a grandfather clock ticked.

Tactless, unconcerned as ever, Chuuya let out a huff, dragging his nails down an empty canva settled against the floor. “Well,” he said. “Maybe we should start upstairs.”

A distant buzz broke through the air, like a ticking bomb; out of nowhere, a gust of wind shut the entrance door right behind their backs.

Very subtly, Akutagawa moved behind Gin.

“We should,” Dazai agreed, nodding to the stairs at the end of the hallway. “After you.”

As soon as the last of their row climbed the last step — Dazai turned, feet barely brushing the tiles, and set off to the living room.

The old chair took up most of the space — a leathery thing, covered in blankets much cleaner than they had probably been when Yasunari’s father had died on them. The paintings on the walls were full of eyes; they stared him down with the void-filled stillness of corpses, tilted and round, too fleshy to be mere oil colors. Their smiles were mostly bright green lines, though.

When he turned, a man was hanging from the flower-shaped chandelier.

The man didn’t seem to notice him.

“Kan Kikuchi, I assume,” Dazai offered.

That, at least, seemed to catch his attention. His naked toes twitched — the skin of his feet had turned a greenish shade; his body was bloated and scratched, like wallpaper removing itself from its own surface. The skin around the hangman’s knot had turned stone-hard and pale; his bulging eyes settled on something over Dazai’s shoulder.

He said: “Are you back?”

“Your father, you mean,” He settled on the ground, legs crossed, studying the torturously slow way the Ability User’s body dangled. “I might be missing some details. I hope you can forgive me. I had only a few hours to read your files, after my friend sent them to me.”

Kan stared at nothing at all.

The house bloomed and died around him; sun filtered through the newly made foundations and shone on paintings that were ripped one blink and fresh the other. When he attempted to gulp, the world turned upside down — and Dazai was on his feet inside a bedroom, as Kan Kanuchi did not die from a new chandelier.

“It’s the house, then,” he guessed. “Is that why the Ballerinas use you? To trap people they want to chase around a looping cage?”

“A father died here,” Kan informed him. “I couldn’t have done anything, otherwise,” His eyes focused, only a bit; he laid them in Dazai. They held the transparency of ghosts. “I’m told you are to thank. From one haunted house to the other — I thank you.”

Dazai bowed his head, respectful. “Father Returns is the name of your Ability, correct?”

The wrinkles around his eyes curled. With a blink, the windows over the bed exploded in a thousand pieces — they turned into dust the very moment the wind entered the room, vanishing in the middle of frail snowflakes.

He studied the white dots on his coat; when he raised his head again, he was on the first step of the stairs, and Kan was standing.

“She wants to talk,” he said. Without the distinctive characteristics of a corpse, despite the old age, he was rather handsome — ruffled hair and round glasses, with a mouth that seemed well used to curling up. “I don’t know if she will want me to let you out, after.”

“Do you, usually?” Dazai questioned.

“The house doesn’t want you here,” Kan answered, easily — but his eyes were seeing right through him. “You know that, Dad.”

“Ah, right,” he said. “I apologize.”

There was a pause. All the walls and all the foundations seemed to hold their breaths; when he studied them, he thought he saw blood drool from the edges of the ceiling — landing on the floor in a tip-tap, quiet and gentle.

Kan Kanechi was nowhere to be found. He turned, and made his way up the stairs.

“ — found where the hell he’s gone,” the unmistakably irritated inflection of Chuuya’s tone came from the kitchen, over the muffled sound of their rummaging. “How are we supposed to figure out where she’s hidden? A Ouija Board?”

“What’s that?” Akutagawa questioned.

“Oh, that will make for a fun night. I’ll tell you later,” Chuuya settled his hands on his hips, hat chain dangling madly as he frowned at the long, empty space between the table and the single couch on the other side of the room. “Am I sleep deprived, or there wasn’t a couch here?”

“You are sleep deprived,” Dazai tried. “Not that you’d ever admit it.”

Not one of the three heads turned.

Gin stepped forward; hesitantly, she kicked the edge of the couch. Confirming it was real, she offered a helpless shrug.

“Not like this place is normal,” Akutagawa pointed out, arms crossed, warily dragging the tips of his fingers over one of the framed paintings. Just to try, Dazai walked to stand in front of him, and offered him a genuine smile. He didn’t even blink. “You do remember it was destroyed until yesterday, right?”

“Well, forgive me for trying to figure out what’s fucked up about the Halloween Location, smarty pants,” Chuuya muttered, hands deep in his pockets, twirling around the edges of the room in wide strokes.

His burned eye squinted at the peerless job of the wall paint; he kicked the wall mere inches from Dazai’s calf, and didn’t even turn red from anger when Dazai told him: “You’re really hopeless if I’m not around, aren’t you?”

Pointedly, out of nowhere — grabbed the nearest flower vase and smashed it on the floor.

Both Akutagawa siblings flinched.

“What a brute,” Dazai muttered.

“No point in getting mad,” Gin said, very quietly. She was still twirling her knife in her hands — she seemed at loss for an excuse to stop Chuuya from stealing it from her hands, when he stepped close. “What are you —“

Wordlessly, the boy kneeled by shards of the destroyed base; frowning, he gathered the closest of them, and made it face the blade.

Muffling laughter, he crouched down in front of him, shaking his head. “Chuuya,” he said, surprised. “Look at you being self-sufficient.” Out of spite, even if he couldn’t hear, he began humming his recurring theme.

“What are you doing?” Akutagawa asked, carefully walking to stand behind him.

“There’s a reflection,” the boy said. “It had no reflection when it was whole. The pieces have one, though,” When the vacant, uncertain gazes of the siblings fell on him, he huffed. “The house was destroyed until yesterday, yes? The Mackerel and I explored it. There were fragments everywhere — I know they’re real. If the entire vase has none, it means it isn’t real,” Chuuya climbed to his feet; he studied the ceiling. “It wasn’t rebuilt — we’re just seeing something that isn’t here.”

Understanding pooled down their faces. Gin held onto her knife tighter when Chuuya threw it back to her; Akutagawa straightened, the tell tale hiss of Rashomon surrounding him like a second layer of oxygen.

“Which means—” Chuuya concluded, eyes focusing on unsuspecting corners of the room. In a fit of inspiration, he turned in the wrong direction and recited, light: “Oh, grantors of dark disgrace—”

It took Dazai a petrifyingly long moment.

He had tasted the boundaries of the strange invisibility with complacency; under a threat that made his fingers remember the feeling of bloodied skin layers ripping apart, his feet flew.

The wall digging into his shoulders one moment — the next, he was close enough to break his skull against Chuuya’s on impact.

Nothing happened; not even the fabric of the table cloth fluttered with his hurry. “Don’t be stupid,” he warned, annoyed, ignoring the way his hands were fluttering over his cheeks — unable to touch; unable not to curl forward, sharp like claws, intent in their efforts to tear the flesh off Chuuya’s eyelashes before his eyes could become a void.

“— that?” Akutagawa was asking, mostly unconcerned, examining the inside of the ghostly fridge. “It’s hardly the time for metaphors —”

“Tell that to Dazai,” Chuuya replied.

He hadn’t moved an inch; his eyes, though uncertain in their placement, were looking straight at him.

“What?” Akutagawa snapped, turning so fast the fridge shut itself. His eyes searched around; Gin’s own flew to the doorstep. “Is he back?”

“Somewhat,” the boy replied, distractedly, palming the air between them. His palm would have pressed against his chest, had it been possible; he curled gloved fingers over his shoulders. Dazai noted that he remembered them lower than they had become. “His heartbeat is.”

A pause.

Dazai smiled so wide his face hurt with it — then, theatrical for no one, he retched. Exchanging a rather heavy glance, the siblings kept quiet for a long breath.

“Oi,” Chuuya frowned. ““You there, right? I’ll look so goddamn stupid if you aren’t.”

He held his breath, regulating the pumping blood in his veins. The boy tilted his head to the side; slowly, endlessly slow, his face turned crimson red with absolute exasperation. “Who the fuck are you calling sniffing police dog, you wrapped corpse looking —”

At last, Gin asked: “Did you just say his heartbeat?”

“Of course,” a new voice confirmed. “That divine thing in your veins must be well accustomed to his presence. I assume not even Kan’s efforts can tame a Singularity’s obsession.”

She was waiting for them near the table — destroyed, in the next blink; surrounded by the same skeleton walls and the same burned floors that had been there the day before. Dazai got the feeling that leaving the room would have been impossible all the same. Both Akutagawa siblings slowly backed towards the door all the same.

“No need,” she told them. “It’s much better to talk where it isn’t quite so snowy, yes?”

The shades of emerald of her kimono broke the monotonous grey of the sky behind the torn apart walls; her pinned up ash strands, resembling old hairstyles from Hirotsu’s fashion magazines collection, made her look taller than she actually was.

When Dazai leaned down to kiss the hand she offered him, she barely reached his shoulder.

“Night Wardens at my doorstep,” she breathed out, glazed. Akutagawa and Gin were both blinking at his sudden appearance; Chuuya did nothing more than lean against a more stable column, studying the scene. “I do apologize for singling you out. I had to check something. Have you come to be melted before your organization can burn?”

He tilted his head. “Just how painless of a death do you think that would be?”

She studied the malodorous blood bag they had abandoned on the table. “Depends on how much of that you brought.”

“Granny said nothing about vampires,” Chuuya commented, shoulders as relaxed as ever.

“For a reason,” the woman confirmed. “It’s about the act of violence, not the blood itself.” She met Dazai’s eyes again. “A good death, child. Better than the world would offer.”

Dazai smiled. “Good enough.”

Komako — as she introduced herself in a shaky breath of cold air, forming clouds over the blood she kept scrutinizing — insisted on making them tea.

“You should have probably predicted that,” he noted, when the entire table pulverized under the pressure of the mostly incinerated teapot.

A cough — less bloody than usual — escaped from Akutagawa’s lips, as Gin let out a surprisingly violent sneeze.

“I’ve met people in worse conditions,” she replied. The finger dipped in the blood moved to her mouth; then, she lit a birthday candle flame on her forefinger. “They tend to become the worst versions of themselves when they’re with me.”

“A firey Ability,” Chuuya observed. The reports on the Ballerinas had assured those, at least — someone who could drown the city in winter; someone who could burn it from the inside. “You must be the one behind the fire at the theatre — all those years ago. The first Ballerinas attack.”

“I never did like ballet,” Komako confirmed.

“My mentor takes me to ballet shows every weekend,” he replied, and Dazai suffocated the urge to ask, still? “None of the dancers ever threw us out because of our Ability.”

“Not outwardly,” she agreed. “No. But you think even only one of them picked up a pen and asked the world not to ostracize us? Protested our inability to get jobs not licensed to handle our problematic traits? Cried when we were declared dead on national television?”

“That’s cool. But did you assholes ever care?” Chuuya questioned, skeptical. “Because I clearly remember your group being revealed as a bloodthirsty scam who never meant to help out Ability Users at all.”

Her smile turned into a snarl. “Did they care?”

“Maybe not,” Dazai commented, settling on the mixture of ash and snow on the floor, chin in hands. “But the Port Mafia exists for that, too — protecting Users, and making sure the Government knows we exist. Did killing them grant you the tears to heal your wounds?”

Komako studied the silver lake, right upon his shoulder, from a crater in the wall and two lifetimes away. “Not yet.”

A humorless laugh — a voice, out of turn: “Daring to challenge the Port Mafia won’t solve it. All it will accomplish is to teach rats where they belong.”

“Akutagawa,” he warned.

“Perhaps not,” Her smile grew mocking. “I think the rats might surprise you, though.”

He paused.

[A letter, he recalled. It had been heavy in his pocket and half-hidden by snow — abandoned on a grave that did not exist, but he knew where to find all the same. Curling letters from a hand more adapt to music sheets than stories.

“Doesn’t mean I cannot learn,” it read, in a language he hadn’t spoken in years. “At least, she would always put it like that.”

Dazai had not slept a single unplanned rest since that day.]

“You don’t care if Ability Users get blamed,” he said, following the turn of her fingers inside the bag. It was somewhat hypnotic; not quite hungry, at its roots, as much as entertained.

“You’re not looking for recognition anymore. You’re past that. You want attention, but not for Users’ sake.”

“It is,” Komako spelt out, smile creaking, “For Users’ sake. It’s for everybody’s sake. We were blind for a long time — but we understand, now. All we needed was someone to show us the error of our ways. We believed the lack of fairness to be the issue. But isn’t the root the problem? The difference?”

“You mean Abilities.”

“Certainly,” She motioned towards the plastic bag, more disgusted than she had allowed her traits to show until then. Drops flew from her hands; they landed on Gin’s face, splattering her in freckles. “Is accepting this what fairness is about?”

“That’s blood,” Chuuya noted, unimpressed.

“This is a curse,” she spat. The entire house shook with her offense. “And so was Yasunari’s. Blessings don’t come with counter prices. He was a desperate kid, not a murderer. My Ability,” She nodded towards the blood. “It requires an act of violence. One done in my name, or to hurt me. How is that a strength?”

“And whoever in your group got a grip on snow,” the redhead questioned, “Do they have a similar price?”

“Worse,” A trembling thing pulled one edge of her mouth. “He’s a romantic one. An act of love is all he needs.”

“We’re stuck in this situation because your Boss has an admirer?” Akutagawa snapped, before Chuuya could open his mouth.

“Must be,” Dazai intervened. “No other reason to ruin everyone’s fun like this. Midlife crisis. Mid-Ability? Kids love summer, don’t they?” Akutagawa and Gin didn’t answer his encouraging glance. “So I’ve heard. You’re doing this for Media coverage, I assume. You want to make the world watch the strange season of Yokohama, to have the chance to blabber on how Abilities ruined your lives.”

“They’ve ruined —“

“Why pin it on an illegal syndicate, then?”

Komako twitched.

“Ah,” Dazai blinked. “You’re just pawns. To whoever is waiting for us on Standard Island, I assume. You haven’t been told why you’re doing this.”

“She said you’re one of the keys to the city,” Despise drooled between her teeth. “She filled our Boss’ head with ideas. Amazing how many things a whore could find out about her organization.”

Chuuya leaned forward. “You mean Yoko —“

The table had been an idea — the moment her palm landed on its surface, it crumbled like a sandcastle, dragging the ruined tea set and the plastic bag with it. Blood splattered on the floor; Dazai watched dirty Komako’s floral kimono — Still life to a point of exaggerated realism.

“That’s certainly a waste,” he commented. “Gin spent hours gathering that. We gave you the upper hand as an act of peace, you know?”

“Don’t utter that bitch’s name,” she growled. “Don’t you dare. If it wasn’t for her —“

“Furata Yoko has no Ability,” Chuuya said. “We know that. What is she doing in your little group?”

“She’s here because he loves her,” There was no blood left to throw; Dazai felt it land on his face like a spit, straight from the depths of her scratched throat. “She gave him one or two details on the biggest syndicate in this cursed city, and he decided he will destroy it — if it makes her happy.”

Dazai tilted his head. “So whoever inspired your change of ethics — your rats — they didn’t want to target us?”

“I don’t know,” Komako taunted. “Just a pawn, as you said. I, at the very least, remember what we’re fighting for. He’s too busy running after the first woman to ask him to put it all at risk for her.”

“The first woman who isn’t you?”

Vapor began to rise from the blood on the floor.

At once, the woman deflated.

“This isn’t about love,” she said, in a firm voice. “And it never was. This is about hope.” Her eyes fell on them, brighter than the flame she had lit on her finger. “You’re young. Younger people are often the only ones who understand. The ones who didn’t get stuck in the day-to-day yet — who won’t accept it as something that has to be. If someone told you one last act of violence could bring a world where violence is not a thing anymore — how could you put honor before hope?”

“People with no honor still understand common sense,” Chuuya replied.

“There was a world without Abilities, once,” Dazai noted. “It wasn’t any more peaceful.”

“There’ll be a world that is used to Abilities, one day,” she replied. “And I can assure you — it will be worse.”

He curled an eyebrow.

“They will accept all Abilities, at one point,” Komako said. Her fingers grasped something on the ground; the dossier they had found the day before was waved in their faces. “Of course they will. They accepted every shade of violence this world was able to create, and they will continue doing so. The moment they find a way for us to be useful — “ The dossier fell open. “That’s when we’re allowed to exist.”

Akutagawa flinched.

Dazai studied it, quiet.

“You don’t get permission for that,” Chuuya scoffed. The set of his jaw was harder than another eye would have noticed. “It just happens, and you can’t do shit about it. Blaming Abilities for an increase in violence is like blaming whoever invented sharp objects for murder.”

“Someone has to be blamed.”

“No,” Dazai took a step forward. “You’re just mad no one can get rid of those flames for you.”

“But what if there was a way,” Komako insisted. Her hands reached forward; she stopped, shy of touching him. Gin stared at the blood on the ground. “Wouldn’t you want a free life? One where you will not be the cause of the newest way men will find to kill each other?”

“I would like not to freeze whenever I go outside,” Dazai replied, wide-eyed. “But I wouldn’t know, really. I don’t have an Ability.”

The beat of shock coming from behind him didn’t last much; the blood on the ground bubbled, melting the ash and the snow and the edges of Komako’s kimono —

— before the flames had reached her eyes, Gin had sunk a knife in her abdomen.

Her face twisted into something haunted.

The skeletric house trembled. Komako lowered her eyes on Gin’s determinate face — the white-knuckled grip of her thin, pale hands around the hilt.

“Gin,” Akutagawa called. It was a sound Dazai had never heard before.

Chuuya was as still as a rock, eyes set on him. Wait, he thought. Wait. When the Komako’s hands wrapped in a skull-bruising grip around the girl’s face, Gin had no time to scream — a current of bone-melting heat exploded in a wave, sending all of them flying.

---

...

---

[“I’m making you a deal,” Dazai whispered, leaning closer to her ear. “But you’ll need a bit more than to gather blood to obtain it, little spider.”

The slight curl of her eyebrows was a question she would not vocalize. He offered her his most charming smile, and said: “We will meet a woman. She will attack whoever gets to her first. For a very important reason, I need her to hurt one of us. If you agree to be that person —“

Imperceptibly, he moved his gaze to her brother. “I might tell Hirotsu to test you and your brother’s aptitude with something less arduous.”

Gin’s breath hitched].

---

...

---

[Unlike he’d spent weeks whisper-spreading through the Port Mafia, Chuuya did not sleep with his hat on.

His coat was the last thing he folded; the hat was usually abandoned upon it — upside down, so that his perpetually half-destroyed phone and gloves could be abandoned inside it. He didn’t wake when Dazai grabbed his phone by the fish charm, and he didn’t wake when he lowered himself down from the attic window.

The closest of the windows from the camellia garden offered him a glimpse of Kenji’s sleeping form, curled around a tiger-shaped toy.

“You don’t do night shifts on Thursdays, do you?” he questioned, into the phone.

Detective Matsuda’s terribly awake voice replied: “Not usually, no.”

“You went to work just to talk with Chuuya?” He widened his eyes, unseen. “That’s sweet. I’d consider it stupid, if you’d done it for the sake of telling him the Station knows about the Ballerinas. But you took the occasion to bug him, so I will offer you a single clap.”

He held the phone between his shoulder and cheek, and he clapped, once.

Silence answered him.

Then, “Putting a spying device on a minor is a crime.”

“And this is a registered phone-call,” Dazai agreed. “So I want you and all your cop buddies to listen to this — I deactivated it yesterday, the moment he entered the Headquarters. Jewel companies don’t much appreciate outsiders’ eyes.”

Detective Machida gritted his teeth; he could see him, if he tried. “Dazai, the entire city believes the Port Mafia’s Users are to blame for this shit. It doesn’t matter how many ties you guys have — The moment you step out of line and put the city at risk, they will ask us to intervene.”

“And if it was proved the Mafia is being framed?”

A scoff. “And how would you do it?”

“By reactivating that bug of yours tomorrow,” he said. “Let’s say — Eight, nine o’clock? The Hatrack won’t notice. Someone needs to give him a lesson on how to recognize cheap tricks,”
A sigh. “That someone will probably be me.”

“You’re telling me Chuuya didn’t notice?”

“Oh, no, he did,” Dazai corrected. “Took him — One hour? He thought I had put it on him.”

“Why would he think that?”

“Wouldn’t be the first time.”

“Wouldn’t be the —“

“Be there tomorrow,” he ordered. “The Port Mafia has more important matters to deal with than putting beaches out of service,” A pause. He smiled. “Or so I assume, Officer.”]

---

...

---

The back of his skull was scalding warm and uncomfortably wet.

Dazai blinked through the blurred quality of his own vision and of the heat-woven air; his hands clung to the knee-tall snow, unfeeling and burned, as he concentrated on the fresh blood making its way under his bandages, sticking to his eyelashes.

A wall of smoke filled the field; vapor arose from the lake. Burning pieces of the house had landed on every inch of the white valley, turning it into a minefield — caged by a ring of fire, growing higher and higher, closer to the town.

“Gin!”

Akutagatawa’s voice breached through the fire and the ringing in his ears.

He blinked until he found the onyx of his silhouette, dashing towards the lump on the other side of the ground, painting the show scarlet. The unmistakable void-bright of Rashomon whipped everywhere his gaze could follow, dying spider legs kicking the poison out.

Walking towards them was a no-longer green frame, spasming hands and eyes bulging out of her skull.

“After all I’ve done,” Komako whispered, somehow louder than the chaos, “After all I’ve done for my freedom, you think you can just rip it off me?” Her laughter was tense; bloodthirsty as it was, Rashomon’s claws landed everywhere but near her. “Do you, Yoko?”

Painfully, Dazai climbed to his feet.

“Now, Chuuya,” he called.

He passed by him like a bullet, faster than any eye could catch, appearing from an imprecise point his brain had registered the moment he had awoken. His hat landed somewhere at Dazai’s feet; the distant echo of a familiar chant pulsed through the blood pooling from his ears, screeching.

When the sky exploded again, its shades were red, and the edges of Chuuya’s dress shirt were torn over spiral scars.

In a single throw, violent enough to rattle the earth, Corruption led Chuuya through the flames and let him sink his claws into Komako — then, feet only touching the water to speed up, he raced through the lake, disappearing underneath.

Akutagawa was shaking from head to toe, when he got his hands on him.

“Listen to me,” Dazai thundered, sinking his fingers in his shoulders until he could feel them deep, watching the flagging limbs of Rashomon disappear. In his arms, Gin’s eyes were barely open; Komako had left hands’ shaped burns on her cheeks. A sharp corner of the roof had pierced her side; her blood was staining the hem of her brother’s shirt. “I need you to do what I tell you.”

“She needs help,” Akutagawa croaked out. He looked unrecognizably angry; looked familiarly lost. “She needs help —”

“Chuuya’s Ability will not work effectively under water,” he continued, pragmatic, “Which means he will use the little of it he can to drown Komako, and to get out of the water. I need Rashomon to drag him out, so I can nullify him.”

Gin whimpered. Her brother tried to cup her face; his fingers landed on melting skin, and she shrieked so loud the valley shakes with it.

Dazai clenched his teeth.

Before he could insist, a whiff of wind hit his nape.

It raised the hair there — tickled him down his spine. The hiss of the ring of fire had died down almost staggeringly easily; the vapor rising from the lake was growing less and less blurred.

[“Worse,” Komako said. “He needs an act of love.”]

Akutagawa’s voice was a whisper: “Ice?”

Every thought in Dazai’s mind scratched to a halt.

He sunk his nails in the sleeves of the boy’s coat — he dragged him close, until he choked with it, hands uselessly holding onto Gin’s body.

“Listen to me,” Dazai spelled out. There was a shake in his hands that was entirely too angry for mindfulness; Mori would burn him alive, he thought, Mori would — “You’ll see him. You have to. When you do, use Rashomon.”

After Dazai sprinted to the lake, all he heard was the rustle of blood-soaked fabric — and Gin, whispering her brother’s name.

Crystal tiles were spreading from the edges of the lake, curling in shapeless waves of freezing glass, racing towards the center of the lake. Dazai didn’t test its stability — the freezing process was faster than his legs could catch up with. By the first crack his shoes left on that ice coverage, the lake was entirely frozen as far as his eyes could reach.

He knew it when Komako stopped breathing.

It freed the air from that warmer breath they had barely tasted; the vicious smell of fire clogging his nostrils. All he felt was cold; it seeped into his bones with more viciousness than it ever had, settling in the hollowness like a material thing.

“Chuuya?” he said — more to himself than anything. Louder: “Chuuya?”

Dazai’s eyes searched the sky, frantic, for a crimson dot that wouldn’t be there. Somewhere around the third crack caused by his shoe, sinking into waters so cold they burned, the wind-whipped silence was shattered.

A scream — familiar, unmistakable, less than human and more than him — crawled across the freezing water — trapped under the ice.

He stilled.

The world was made of snapshots — Dazai turned to find the snowy ground framing the lake, searching for Rashomon’s lighting strikes. Dazai felt the groundbreaking cold of the ice carve numb bruises on his knees, though he did not remember falling on them. Dazai felt the blood stick to his eyelashes, and his fingers clawed at his bandages — just enough to free that almost useless eye of his, almost — just good enough to search through the opaque surface of the lake, a kid playing treasure hunt, and Dazai searched for red, red —

Thirty seconds, the notebook he had kept during their training sessions reported. Chuuya would shake with it, any longer than that — would lay his head in his lap; would rebuild himself on his own, where the Mafia couldn’t see and couldn’t live and wouldn’t help and wouldn’t care.

A full minute. Two minutes.

Then: do not let him.

“Akutagawa,” he called, pragmatic. Mori would have punished him for this. Dazai would have to kill him. The Mafia would let them die in a field near an Onsen town. “Akutagawa!”

Frost got stuck under his nails. There was nothing to carve; when his fingers began to bleed, he clenched them into fists, fighting premature rigor mortis and settling hypothermia — he hit the lake, again and again, again and again, thinking back to a fighting ring under the Libelula and the sound of Corruption breaking bones and the face Mori would have made looking at Chuuya’s torn apart corpse, he is your responsibility —

He recalled a roof, and an old conversation. Wonder if he sat on the walls of Suribachi, scared the passersby, he had thought. And then, a bit less mocking — I’m not letting you fall.

“Sir!”

Rashomon was a mirage of poisoned black and crimson spears; it attacked the ice, settling in a makeshift birdcage around Dazai’s limbs. His legs flew to his chest; he made himself smaller — just small enough to make sure not to cause troubles; you can’t look, she’d said, but you can touch — he watched Akutagawa strike the surface, again and again, again and again —

“Why isn’t it working?” he asked, calmly.

Akutagawa was paler than the snow gently falling around them. Gin’s blood was splattered on his face; Rashomon uncurled from his limbs like unpeeling skin. “I — I’ve never — the Ability, I —“

His brain couldn’t follow. His palms were spread on the glass, slowly losing their feeling — his heartbeat is, Chuuya had said.

“I don’t care,” he struggled to say. The one person Dazai wanted to kill for a reason and not for a means to an end was a thousand waves under his feet. No one in the Mafia ever listened. “Do it.”

“Sir —“

“Akutagawa,” he said. He could feel the edges of his bandages brush his jaw. He crawled forward, nails bleeding and air coming out in clouds — sealed his hands over the boy’s collar, pulling him close enough to study the terror in his pupils. So childish it burned him to the bone — so childish Mori would give him another framed picture of him in the hallway for it, he swore: “Do it. Right now.”

Akutagawa’s eyes burned.

After — all was the crack of the crust of the earth, vanishing from under his feet, rumbling louder than thunder — all was the merciless, limb-tearing embrace of cold, unforgiving waters.

[On a day their car wasn't coming and it was raining, Dazai watched Chuuya self-destruct for a minute and fifty seconds — and then opened an umbrella and stood over his bleeding body.

“For me,” he'd let him know — to be sure. It wasn't even a lie. “Never for you.”

Chuuya, born to bleed, hadn't answered.

The car came, eventually. The driver kept his eyes forward as Dazai fixed the worst of the mess of bones and flesh in the backseats; when he asked for a tissue — blood trailing down the tips of his nails, all the way to his elbows — he gave it to him without turning around.

Seen and not heard, Mori liked to say to the small, famished children who did commissions for the Mafia. Seen and not heard and successful.

A rainless space came, eventually. There was no bed and no futon in that safehouse; Dazai settled the boy on the naked floor and forced him to gulp enough alcohol that his fingers clung numbly to nothing at all.

At one point, while Dazai threw the empty bottles out, he called, in a broken tone: “— Mama?”

There wasn't much to do at all, on the other end of the world from a home that would have left them alone all the same. Dazai laid next to him.

Chuuya breathed in and out. Was he more human or less, Dazai wondered, watching him keep himself awake by tracing his Port Mafia tattoo, for loving the machine he was built for?

Too much, all the same, he concluded — when a shattered, intoxicated: “Can you —” came from the shaking shoulder settled against his own. Dazai had curled up his sleeve until it had cut his circulation off. “Can you touch me?”

“I am,” he let him know.

A pause. Small; horribly not-him: “Please?” he attempted, like he wasn’t sure of the intonation of those foreign syllables.

Dazai knew he was a bit of a fool. Cruel, even more. It was staggering on its own. “Chuuya.”

Harsh — crueler than the tip tap of the rain right on his open wounds; and what a sight it had been — he snapped: “Don’t make me fucking beg.”

Something in Dazai’s ribcage beat. A fluke, he thought. Rain-caused hallucinations. Some kind of infection; you need to keep away from his blood, Mori had suggested, medical and analytic, it might cause infections — in the same breath as he’d told them they weren’t allowed any doctor but the other.

A fluke, he thought. Chuuya would die all the same, one day, and Dazai wouldn’t be there to see it. Infection.

Chuuya inhaled around a closing spiral in his chest. Dazai sunk his bare nails so deep in it — rain wet and untouched; always, and in any viscera’s warmth — he felt his heart beat in his palm.]

Chapter End Notes

kenji, roughly five years later: yeah and i never saw those weirdos again... they made grandma mad though! :)

dazai, three ada desks away: :)

the town of yuzawa, and all the characters named (apart from furata yoko, who’s from the first arc) come from kawabata yasunari’s “snow country” (and there are quite a lot of sneak peeks about their role in there, so i may go into more depth about it some other chapter!!)

standard island: from the 55 minutes novel!

the maihime project: in case you don't remember, i talked about in the first arc — it's a project mori came up with kan kikuchi: his novel revolved around a father and son's relationship.

hi there!! i've got to run (exam literally in ten, so wish me luck) but thank you guys so much for reading, and thank you for all the comments and all the support! i hope you'll like this chapter, and i hope you have a wonderful day!

keep warm, and see you <3 p.s..... something something ability users working for "Someone" who apparently wants all ability users gone/resorting to methods that don't care about ability users themselves... the difference between believing abilities are a curse and what the port mafia does (take ability users in and USE THEM but at the same time giving them purpose... something something chuuya and dazai feeling inhuman and both of them initially joining the pm because they think they could find Something there ((a reason to live or a family)))..... something.

ABANDONED

Chapter Notes

see you at the end ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xv.

---

Case number: 62770097

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

---

*On the **/** of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [Code Name: Double Black] commenced what would be known, in the underworld and among the highest ranks of the Government, as “The Yokohama Cleanse.”*

Under mysterious circumstances, each of them set up a strictly unconnected and masterfully covered up plan, and in a parenthesis of time ending on the first days of October of that same year — twenty seven members of the Yokohama City Council were brutally murdered, along with an entire wing of the Special Division for Unusual Powers [estimated count: 45 members].

The so-called Cleanse effectively eliminated all the then-known allies to the then-unknown organization behind the Ballerinas' abruptly changed mission — momentarily loosening the Decay of Angels' grip over Yokohama. It is uncertain just how much the Port Mafia knew of their mission, back then; we can say with the uttermost certainty that Dazai O. [...]

[continue reading]

Special Ability Department Agent

Intelligence Archivist 061, Sakaguchi Ango.

---

...

---

A fist was rattled against the cell bars. With hectic precision, Dazai's eyes snapped open.

"Here's your prodigal sons," Detective Machida said, dryly, to the deadly silent silhouette beside him. "Maybe tie a bell on them while you carry them out, yeah?"

It took him a single, eerily vacant moment to realize that he had no idea of what was happening.

"Yes," a familiar voice agreed, and his brain decided it was blank. Something hard was pressed against his back; his bed was uncomfortably small for his frame. "I really should."

The ceiling was white, and littered in humidity stains. Yellowish, blinding spots floated near the center of it, telltale of a headache he was too limbless to feel. He tried to turn his head away from that single panorama; his burning neck might as well have been broken. A cacophony floated in his ears, widening the cracks of his skull; phones and creaking radios, and paperwork and —

A police station, his brain concluded. Then, before he could move forward from that point — mouth too sticky to even yelp, he rolled off his bench, landing face first into —

“Fucking hell,” Chuuya’s unmistakable hangover-grunt managed to pierce even through his eyes, sending waves of hurt down his nervous system. “Turn the fucking sun off.”

That’s impossible, his brain informed him, refusing to offer aid on more pressing questions. The last thing he remembered, he thought —

A scoff came from the thousands of feet that had to be separating them from the real world; Dazai leaned his weight on his hands, blinking at the spinning floor underneath him, doing his very best to straighten his eyes before they could cross again.

Somewhere through the haze, Chuuya warned, “If you throw up on me — oh, fuck — “

With more effort than even stakeouts had ever taken from him, they sat up. His foot had fallen asleep, trapped under the other boy’s thigh; he rubbed his face, wincing at the gruff texture of bandages against his sensitive eyelid. Chuuya was little more than a blurry mixture of red and black; even then, he saw him stare at his own hands with a distinctively lost face.

“Fingers,” he said, eventually. “I have them.”

Then he turned around, and threw up mere inches from Dazai’s leg.

He moaned, curling on the floor again.

The bustle outside the cell got clearer with every breath he took against that cold ground: busy officers and old furniture illuminated by dim sunlight; the exhausted glances Detective Machida kept directing them from his desk, which he had crawled back to, seemingly done. And then, at last, standing still at the threshold of their cell —

Quick enough to split his head open, the Commander of the Black Lizards dropped on one knee.

“What the — “ Chuuya spluttered, holding his head between his hands. His hair was a bird’s nest; his hat had ended up on Dazai’s head.

“Executive,” Hirotsu started, outrageously respectful. “Vice-Executive. I have a request.”

“Great,” Dazai attempted, pressing his forehead on that cool floor, considering the pros of rattling his skull against it until it all stopped pulsing. “That’s great. Go on.”

The man bowed even deeper. “Humbly, however bold I might appear,” his voice boomed, just low enough no one but them would notice, “I ask you to show mercifulness, and allow me to act and speak freely — with no care for rank, for the next hour.”

On the verge of tears, Chuuya stared at the man. He begged: “Could you repeat that — a bit slower — “

“I ask,” he thundered, again. Bile gathered under the bridge of his tongue. “To — “

The boy stumbled forward, almost landing on his own vomit. “I’m seeing fucking double.”

“— be allowed —“

“Yes!” Dazai swatted at the unseen world behind him, almost screaming, “Yes, yes, do what you want, take one hour, seven — just shut up —“

Hirotsu’s gratitude lowered his head once more; he climbed to his feet. “Your leniency will not be forgotten.”

More vicious than any torture tool he had ever been put under, a thumb and a forefinger pinched Dazai’s earlobe in a near skin-tearing grip — and then hauled.

“Ouch!” he shrieked, deafening to his own aching head, as he stumbled to his feet — too utterly defeated by that pain to notice the echo of his horrified whines, coming from the victim of the Commander’s other merciless hand. “Ouch, ouch, ouch, ouch — Hirotsu! Ouch!”

Both their shoulders bumped against the cellbars on their way out; a false step almost landed Chuuya against one of the wide-eyed officers at the desks closest the entrance. But the man’s grasp was infallible and chin-up, and he didn’t even pause to fix his hold — too busy dragging their convulsing bodies out of the station.

“Two times, ” the man hissed, the moment their feet touched the sidewalk. Blinded by the sunlight, Dazai groaned, as blood rushed to his ears. “In one night?”

“I have withstood many things, boys,” he continued, pulling them as if they weighed nothing. Car horns blared; Chuuya let out what could only be called a scream. “Two years since we met, I can confidently say — I have withstood many things. Much more than another man might have taken in stride. For the sake of my role, and of my respect towards our Boss, I have taken every last drop of it — have I not?”

“Grandpa!” Chuuya growled. His body glowed red — intermittently; unable to focus enough to have his Ability tear him from the man’s grasp. “Let go!”

“Quietly, and without complaining, ” His face grew a bit more scarlet with each declaration. “I have done it all. Replaced my car all seventeen times you put some sort of bomb under it, fixed my office whenever you decided to tape the furniture to the ceiling, ran up and down every inch of this city, in every kind of weather, to chase after both of you —“

“That’s not —“

“— I didn’t say a word when I had to drag you around for missions Boss didn’t trust you not to kill each other on the way to — and when I got caught in that innate violence of yours because of it. I ate poisoned food,” he breathed, “Had paint and grenades thrown on me, had bullets fired at me, had lowly pieces of paper stuck to my back, clothes dyed hot pink while in the communal showers. I have never, ” His fingers tightened their grip, almost sending them flying forward.

“Told Mori a single word about the times you two have disrupted extremely easy missions for the mere sake of arguing, and graffitied everything me and my squad own. I haven’t complained about your borderline assassination attempts. I have never mentioned the times I had to bring my own lawyers around for the property damages you two cause with the efficiency of a damn clockwork —“

“But,” Hirotzu concluded, his chest rising faster with each ounce of strength he added to his pinches, “But, getting arrested two times in a single night, after two days of radio silence on the most important deal of the year — and nothing but two bloodied heads delivered on our damn porch? Boss made us prepare troops to send to Standard Island. Executive Ace activated the Black Widow Protocol.”

“And for what?” he snapped. “Do you guys have any idea of the list of reparations our contact at the police station sent us? How in God’s name did you even manage to cause such a widespread destruction in a little more than a day? You have offended every gang in Yokohama. We owe money to half of the damn city, for fuck’s sake!”

Despite the anguish, that unusual profanity snapped their gazes to each other. Dazai couldn’t remember if he’d ever heard Hirotzu curse.

“Uhm,” he spoke up, right as his ear grew too numb to bother with pain. “Old man, not to anger you even further —“

”That is nearly impossible.”

”— what are you talking about?”

Hell could have been frozen by the sheer rage to appear on the man’s wrinkled features. “Do not test me right now, Dazai,” he spat, tossing all honorifics down the drain for the first time in months. “With your position, your influence — You should be ashamed of yourselves —“

Red flashed in the corner of his vision.

The bundle of limbs was too much for his dried mind to understand; by the time he managed to open his eyes again without falling forward, Hirotzu stood in a makeshift crater, staring down Chuuya’s figure, perched upon a stop sign.

“That’s enough, Gramps,” he snapped. From his new seat on the ground, Dazai almost admired his attempts to not sway to the side. “What the hell are you talking about?”

This time around, the man’s anger had a short life — growing weaker and weaker the longer their stare off went on, as he slowly realized the confusion in their eyes was genuine. “How much did you two even drink?”

“Boys!”

Detective Matsuda’s voice appeared long before his breathless silhouette, stalking towards them with an evidence bag in his hands. His expression was hardly any less stern; memories of his voice were somewhere in his skull, but he couldn’t quite —

“You forgot these in the cell,” he explained, right as Chuuya pretended to have always been on the ground. “Don’t think you’ll get out of this mess as easily as before. A court date will be demanded. And a new police car, for what's worth."

"We stole a police car?" Chuuya hissed.

A pitiful glance. "Whatever the hell they put in your veins really did a trick on you, didn't it?"

Dazai grabbed the envelope. Inside was an absurd number of photographs, the clear product of Kouyou's camera; underneath those, a piece of paper with his unmistakable handwriting, reading —

"When did we even go to the Sparkling Twilight?" Chuuya was insisting, roaming through the photographs. His eyes bugged out a bit more at each of them: blurred, colorful snaps of their faces, mostly, in the most improbable places he could think of. "What the — why would you climb the Ferris Wheel? Is that a dog —"

"We can talk about that later," he cut through. His tone was enough to call the others' attention on him; even Hirotsu's anger seemed to vanish. "We need to call a meeting."

On the crumpled up paper he showed them, Dazai's handwriting read: Komako is alive. Shimamura will come for her.

---

...

---

Twelve days before.

As unaffected by morphine as his body tended to be, Chuuya's eyes snapped open in the middle of his operation.

"Tsuchiya," he rasped, deliriously, "Tsu—"

"Stay still," Dazai advised, meeting his fight instinct through the metal railing of the hospital bed. The naked fingers he was holding tightened around his own — recognizance, uncertainty, and the materiality of the hiss escaping his mouth, right as Mori extracted a hand-wide shard of ice from the bleeding gash between his shoulder blades.

The low-cost lights of the Boss' secret Infirmary — a square with no windows and no furniture; only the choking smell of antiseptics and a collection of pills that Mori never let him steal — flickered. Needles and pins danced quietly upon a chasm of ruined skin. Mori's eyes were focused — and Dazai was fourteen and bored, watching him stitch up a terrorist and his victims, and asking if he could touch.

Not unless you wash your hands, he would say.

It had always seemed an unreasonable request. Bodies were bodies, and blood was blood.

Laid on his stomach amongst ghostly white sheets and pillows, Chuuya croaked out, “Dazai.”

His entire spine seemed to jolt forward — reaching for that barely-breath with unplanned urgency; stretching and molding and pulling, air shaping around the trace of that latest poisonous road — accepting pollution as a condition of quiet existence.

Mori’s eyes followed the motion.

Dazai settled more comfortably on the hard floor, legs crossed, and leaned his forehead on the cold metal. “With that useless intellect of yours, you couldn’t find a better way to get rid of your tacky scars?”

A lingering stutter inside his bones couldn’t quit getting terribly annoyed whenever Chuuya happened to get hurt — a mixture of delay on schedules he only intermittently cared about, and the bother of having to drag him into a safe location by the blood-sticky sides of his skin. Something slightly less familiar, too — pulling his lips the way tantrums did, when he wanted Mori’s amusement.

“Now, now,” the doctor tutted. He didn’t ask if Chuuya wanted to be put under again; you made your bed, you sleep in it. “Our Chuuya’s scars aren’t tacky at all. In fact, I have heard some people put ink over it these days. Youngsters think it’s sick.”

His hair fell on his eyes; mere seconds, Dazai thought, before he was asked to pull them back for him. Apprentice and patient, all in one. His gloved hands were crimson; it went all the way to his old lab coat.

He barfed, just a bit. “Boss, don’t use words you don’t understand.”

A wet cough. “No one’s —” Chuuya’s tongue searched for strength; he didn’t flinch as the doctor sealed one of the holes on his back, “Call’d it ink in decades.”

Mori paused, the latest removed shard clanging into the container on the bedside table. Their texture was as much of a mystery as the sheets of snow littering the streets; it stuck to the boy’s skin like pieces of chandeliers, and it refused to melt. “Dear God, haven’t they?”

A particularly small shard had to be removed with a bit of digging, steel moving under freckled flesh — tensing the grip around Dazai’s knuckles. He doubted it was classified as pain; the cheek Chuuya laid on the pillow hid half of a blank gaze.

“habaki?” he managed to mumble, as pissed off by his slowness as the fading morphine would allow him to.

“No other reason for me to be here,” Dazai reminded him, quiet enough not to ruffle the sweat-sticky hair on his forehead. “I could be making dog-shaped snowmen outside, right now — or gulping down snow until it freezes my lungs. You’re as much of a bother as always.”

“Snow dogs,” Mori considered, wiggling an eyebrow. “No need to worry, Chuuya. Just the usual Corruption side effects — plus the impact of Rashoumon pulling you out of the ice. And —“

A glance.

Wordlessly, Dazai raised their hands until the edges of Chuuya’s fingers entered his field of vision. The blackening edges stretched his sluggish eyelids apart — he attempted to sit up, automatically, and choked on a half groan when it stuck Mori’s blades too deep into his wounds.

“Stay still,” the doctor echoed, vowels dragging concern along. All powerful men had their favorites; all drops of affection guaranteed something in exchange. He settled a blood-dirty gloved finger on his temple; an half-fond gesture, only meant to push him down. “Don’t break yourself over the untouchable. You’re safe.”

“I’m fine, Boss,” Chuuya slurred.

A smile.

“You’re rotting like stinky vegetables,” Dazai noted, as obnoxious as possible. He intertwined their fingers; brought the Stygian knuckles to his lips and bit them, inspired, for the sake of watching him stutter through a don’t fuckin’ touch me. “You even taste disgusting. Mori, wouldn’t it be better to just terminate?”

“Not quite,” the doctor replied. He fixed the IV on the boy’s outstretched arm, and Dazai had the vague thought of stealing his morphine. “He still has a chance or two. Better than that time you threw your whole body through the Hall’s windows, yes, Dazai?”

“Don’t listen to him,” he whispered, conspiratorially, leaning in until his nose fit between the bars, almost brushing against Chuuya’s own. Blue and burned-amber followed his every motion; imperceptibly, the boy shifted closer. “It was stained-glass windows. I would have been the most outrageously beautiful corpse in existence.”

“You’re ugly as sh t,” Chuuya slobbered. “lways .”

“And you look like a zombie’s thrown-up child.”

“Sit on a stick and spin. ”

“Step on a crowbar.”

“Boys,” Mori called.

Chuuya muttered some more.

Insults, undoubtedly — Dazai failed to understand most of them, and hid his grin behind those decaying fingers of his when he registered the ones they were trying to tap on his chin. And then, amongst them —

“Have you checked —“ Chuuya asked, stupidly, under Mori’s never uninterested gaze.

““Was too bored.”

Every IV and blood bag and door, he would probably interpret it as.

Chuuya hummed.

“Don’t fuck wit’ kutagawa,” he ordered, eventually, “‘t’s fine.” And then he passed out again, hand still on his own, but only after pinching him between the eyebrows. Too used to the pain not to be lulled by it.

Two lines of vaguely teeth-shaped indents decorated his bicep; Dazai’s least dignified memoir from a particularly bad stitch-up session.

“How stubborn,” Mori commented, some eons later. All the ice had been removed; bandages were being wrapped around him, and Dazai’s help was fundamental — was smearing Chuuya’s blood all over his ungloved hands. “Didn’t even cry out once. Sort of underwhelming.”

All doctors are sadists, Odasaku had once sworn.

Hands on the boy’s naked ribs, his fingers brushed the bandages around them — matching, he thought, stupidly, and saw Mori grin about it, as if he knew. “Nothing as undoing.”

“As stubbornness?” he asked. “As him?”

Dazai wrapped him up. “Don’t be stupid.”

“Don’t get our most powerful asset killed, then.”

“I fear I may have prior engagements. I promised I would, mere moments after meeting him.”

Mori met his eyes, and there was no glint.

Justifications would not be appreciated, so he didn’t offer them. The only thing the former doctor enjoyed less than excuses was apologies — the one thing more astringent than responsibility was a failed plan that had worked just fine. Dazai extracted Chuuya’s gloves from his pockets and put them back on his hands.

“Was it Akutagawa who slowed down the process?”

Mori hadn’t been there to watch Chuuya get torn apart. Supposedly, he shouldn’t have been able to know when Corruption had gone on for too long. “No.”

The man removed his own plastic gloves; they made a wet, squelching sound as they landed in the trash. Ango had a tendency to smack things around when he got mad — glasses, doors. Mori drowned in pretend class, though.

Then, “Passcode of the Port Mafia’s emergency armed vault?”

“I’m not lying,” Dazai huffed.

“Could have fooled me,” He offered him a smile, a bit clumsy. Dazai’s thumb itched — he scrubbed away the blood left on Chuuya’s temple, and pretended not to see Mori’s eyes land right there. “Tell the boy I’ll personally oversee his sister’s surgery.”

Dazai stilled.

[Gin’s bloodied palm had left a handprint on his cheek. When Dazai had punched him, he had made sure to match].

Under his knuckles, a vein throbbed near Chuuya’s eye.

“As a reward,” Mori specified, patting his head. He had grown shorter — or Dazai’s skeleton had missed the memo of unchanging carcasses. “For correct action under imprecise orders.”

Unimpressed, Dazai noted, “You’ll scar her to spite him — to spite me?” He didn’t blink. “Do as you want. Too much effort for the irrelevant. You used to be better at knowing where to pinch.”

“I know where to pinch,” Mori chuckled. Mori, he recalled, from his dreams — walking down the stairs of Bar Lupin. He’d step on every creaking tile, and Dazai would screech like a child. “You haven’t given me any reason to.”

Halved, he thought. Not even good enough to deserve proper consequentialism.

“If I kill him,” he offered, “Will you kill me?”

“Of course not.”

“Of course,” he echoed. He hadn’t shaken it all out of his oldest gold-tree; not yet.

Mori rummaged through the one cabinet in the room. A bottle of pills was put on his hands, with a hum. Chuuya murmured something; some name Dazai did not have a right to recognize and did, still — he tried to shift, to lay on his back, and his occupied fingers, stuck in Dazai’s hands, didn’t move.

“For Chuuya,” Mori said, nodding towards the pills. His eyes ranked down the blood stains on Dazai’s own shirt, the torn apart skin of his hands; will you die from it?, he’d asked, only, watching him arrive; and then, let it scar then — before ordering him to put Chuuya on the bed. “Just for him, yes?”

Dazai stared.

“Yes, Mori,” he concluded.

He nodded. “Standard Island has sent another invite. I need you to analyze it.”

“Bring it to me here.”

“No,” Mori replied, “I don’t think so.”

“I have to scribble at least one dog on his face,” Dazai insisted, waving his marker towards Chuuya’s sleeping form. “I have oaths to fulfill. You know the importance of deals.”

“I know Chuuya doesn’t like doctors.”

“You aren’t a doctor,” Countless ideas fluttered behind his eyelids, and there was urgency, there was some kind of emergency he wasn’t seeing — the same tension stuck to his shoulders since that sound, bones and ice and the heartbeat monitor. “I’m familiar with how comforting you can be to a waking patient.”

“I doubt you to be someone he would want at his death bed,” Mori observed, a bit mocking, a bit patronizing.

“Chuuya doesn’t deserve that much. What he deserves — is to wake up to a scribbled face.”

“And you don’t care.”

“No,” Dazai confirmed.

“Let go of his hand.”

He did.

No darkened traces of skin resurfaced; Mori nodded, satisfied. “You’ll find the invitation in my office,” he told him, as good of a dismissal as he would ever receive. “Tell me what you think about it. How to proceed.”

“Don’t you already know?” Dazai asked.

He grinned. “Let’s play the guessing game.”

Chuuya twitched. Red bloomed on his own bandages, hiding tauntingly between knotted strands. Mori sat at the feet of his bed, reading his file — the endless lists of failing organs and broken bones and chasms wrecking Chuuya’s skin open. The dog silhouette he had tattooed under his foot was still unnoticed.

Stupid and blind, he thought, and, blind and stupid, and his fingers were reaching —

[“Gin agreed to be wounded. She’s smarter than you are, at the very least,” he let him know. Akutagawa’s knuckles were white; sealed around a bonsai branch, still. “And if I ever wanted to execute her, I would have you tear her apart with that pathetic Ability of yours.”].

Dazai didn't bow when he left, because he hardly ever got blamed for it.

---

...

---

Three days before.

Standard Island smelled of gasoline and seaweed.

“Minors are not usually allowed on the island without a representative,” the Gentlemen Bank's guide — an old, white man in small glasses and a three piece suit, whose eyes had yet to show anything but composed, polite dislike — informed them. “Granting them golden coins for free passage is unheard of.”

“You're the one who gave them to us,” Chuuya made him notice, hands in his pockets, doing his best to pretend not to be gawking at the Western-style buildings embracing them. “Were those prickly retina scans and the fingerprints not enough? Want a piss sample?”

“No take-backs!” Dazai warned, skipping along the stone railings of the sidewalks.

The sea was exceptionally close and sweetly azure; whenever his foot took a step too far, the other boy would yank at his coat belt like a leash. It took some effort to talk, that day — the words left his mouth as if torn from the skin.

“The checks at the ferry are meant to ward off any sort of threat,” the guide replied, without missing a beat. His smile was a beacon of civility; his eyes traced their clothes like he could see crimson stains. Pointless effort: Mori had printed Standard Island's etiquette under their eyelids, and seized every knife in the redhead's collection.

“Society and man are meant to prosper here. To atone,” the man continued, “Untouched by whatever mistake the world might have made in its tremendously bloody history, and developed a taste for. Weapons wouldn't allow that.”

Chuuya tilted his head to the side.

The last Dazai had seen of him had been in a hospital bed. All that he had left of that room was a certain tension to his limbs. “Ever heard of a punch?”

Concrete between his teeth, and yet — “I haven't,” Dazai raised his hand.

“You will, very soon, if you don't get off that railing —“

“I’m promenading — “

The guide’s smile creaked.

Odasaku, he considered, would have called that Island a, living competition. Dazai knew, because they had gotten drunk at Lupin, and the man had been open to offering all tales of his days as an assassin. They were always fascinating stories; the more he heard of them, the less he could find a good reason to make them only memories.

It wasn’t guilt, Odasaku would shrug. I found something to look forward to. Something less... vacant.

That’s beautiful, Dazai had wanted to say. That’s unreachable. That’s a waste of time. Tell me more; tell me all of it.

But Standard Island truly looked like an endlessly polite cold war — built in marble and cobblestone roads. The three way division stood out like a bruise — the passage from English-like tight brick buildings and horse-pulled carriages; to flowered-balconies and glass-painted houses in the French district; to the geometrical balance of the German one.

The Gentlemen Bank rested in the British quarters; Chuuya made sure to loudly lament the choice, offering a middle finger to every horse that attempted to cross the street when they did.

“Be nicer,” Dazai tutted, watching their guide clench his jaw as he fixed his nearly bitten off toupee. “I hear the big bad horses are afraid of mice. Your presence is probably disorientating.”

“That’s elephants, you miscreant,” Chuuya slapped his nape. His fingers lingered; he listened to the tip-tap like one would to the rain, and he offered him his widest smile and emptiest eyes. “Is that an actual fucking reproduction of the Big Ben?”

“You —“ the guide called, as they sprinted towards the square, “Hey! We cannot be late to the — Sirs! “

Their passage went all but unnoticed; the man’s voice appeared and disappeared, depending on how close he would manage to get — before they climbed over some innocent bystander, or pushed through the crowd to gawk at the replicas, or mildly inconvenienced a souvenir stand.

Flamethrowers and contortionists occupied the streets, playing along to the falling sun, gathering coins inside old hats.

Dazai only managed to abandon Chuuya’s own on the ground for a few seconds, before he was noticed — he got chased to a crowded street-market, the boy armed with a stolen flaming stick that had the guide stop and apologize for a good half-hour.

“The latest trend from the West!” some stand-vendor let them know, waving towards the colorful, sealed glass containers in front of him. Inside it was some sort of bread — but in vibrant shades of pink. “A bite of these beauties, and your worries will disappear! Only a few coins, for a few hours of regained youth — These beauties will be gone by the night! Approach!”

“Reminds me of Kajii’s Secret Lemon Brownies, back in France,” Chuuya shuddered. “Koda tried to eat horse shit from the ground when he ate those.”

Dazai hummed. He watched the name fall from his lips, and thought about being mean.

A lot to see; not much to be impressed by. It was all too clean; all a bit too well constructed, insistently perfect to the eye. Snow didn’t cover the streets, saved by the island’s system — the cold was enough to get the tourists muttering, though. If he squinted, he could see the edges of Yokohama, over the shore.

“Why didn’t we go to England?” Chuuya questioned, at some point, playing lonesome catch with the guide’s stolen toupee. “Or France. No money to stash there?”

“Europe is complicated,” Dazai replied, curtly, splashing the water of the square fountain towards his shoes.

The boy settled one foot on the marble, much to Kouyou’s non-present eyebrow-twitch; leaned on his knee to get a good look at his face. He hummed his tune through it, as if being studied wasn’t enough of an irritation. Dazai met his eyes, undeterred, as nearby tourists happily threw coins into the fountain. Some alleys away, the guide’s breathless calls echoed.

“Oh,” Chuuya said.

“Sirs!” the guide screeched, redder than a traffic light, “Sirs, if you could — Director Winston is surely expecting us by now —“

“Yes, yes,” the boy huffed, wiping invisible dust off his clothes. “Let’s go see the star. You guys get no tourism points, though.”

One of the man’s eyes spasmed. Outsider to his own bones, Dazai saw Chuuya’s fingers wrap around his wrist — pointedly over the suit jacket; over the shirt and the bandages — and pull.

The Gentlemen Bank was a greyish brick building like all the other brick buildings in those streets, its entrance framed by vertiginous columns and statues of a blindfolded Justice. At the sides of the curling gates, was a row of Royal-like guards.

The guide, genuinely concerned that they might get too distracted by the men’s hats, — or steal your swords to duel, he heard him murmur — decided to skip the entrance controls, dragging them to the depths of the paintings-filled hallways.

“Wait here,” he told them, when they reached the heaviest set of doors yet. The bustle of workers had stopped some floors down, where the offices and the smell of drying ink rested.

“Don’t take too long. Otherwise he —“ Chuuya nodded towards him, “Will start eating the candles.”

“I will,” Dazai confirmed.

The guide stared.

Whatever he wanted to ask was sealed. “Of course.”

When the doors closed behind him, Dazai kicked a pencil — stolen from the offices; dragged under his sole — forward, leaving the entrance imperceptibly ajar.

“— brats, ” the guide was hissing, from the slot of the doors. “Lack of — Is this how — Respect? Are they aware of the importance of — Send kids to deal with their matters? They’re far more interested in stealing candy from the stands than in concluding a deal!”

They exchanged a glance.

This is why Schoolgirl is the perfect operation name, he noted, tapping his foot on the moquette.

Offense scrunched up Chuuya’s nose. It’s stereotypical.

Don’t get all technical on me.

In that brusque way he had learned to associate with stitches, the boy began to ask, are you —

“Don’t be stupid,” Dazai answered, staring forward. “An impossible trial, I know.”

“Let them in,” a high-pitched voice said.

“Ma’am,” the guide insisted. “With all due respect, they are offending us—“

“I would like to be offended personally, then.”

Chuuya kicked the pencil away, sending it flying to the other end of the hallway. The guide opened the doors, eyes hostile, and welcomed them in.

Director Winston was an exceptionally delicate sight. Her office was a storm of pastel colors, assembled in a way that somehow maintained the antique taste of the entire building. Her sunflower attire gave her wrinkled, stern face a welcoming look to it — like silk pillows on a bed of thorns. She sat at the head of a meeting table, with two guards at her shoulders; framed by white men and women in much more funerary suits.

Seemingly untouched, she offered them a nod and a well-used speck of Japanese: “Sit, please. It’s an honor to meet you. Welcome to Standard Island. ”

Dazai bowed — morphing into the picture of Kouyou’s teachings. “Thank you for inviting us, Director.”

“Oh, I like when their men do that,” a voice murmured, in an unconcernedly loud English. “The bow thing. Very old-fashioned. Western men wouldn’t know about it.”

“Ah, thank you very much, Miss!” he intervened, brilliantly, in the same language. “Truth to be told, all the Western men I have met have tried to kill me.”

Tight-lipped, shoulders shaking, Chuuya stared at the ceiling.

“Would your friend like us to bring another seat?” Winston asked, once Dazai had settled on one of the chairs at the other end of the table, eyeing the boy perched on his armrest. “If the other one isn’t to his liking?”

“My partner is a rather protective guy,” Dazai brushed the matter away, relishing in the sound of the boy’s teeth creaking. “He prefers to watch my back while I do the talking.”

The Director smiled. “Nothing to watch your back from. Weapons are not allowed on the island.”

“Do swords count as kitchen knives?” Chuuya asked, unimpressed, nodding towards her guards.

A glint haunted her eyes, over the edge of yellow rimmed glasses. While yet unsheathed, her men’s swords had a clear aim — and her gaze a searching whisper to it. Schoolgirl, he thought, might only work to a certain point.

“As long as they aren’t used,” she offered, “Yes.”

“Do forgive him,” Dazai concluded. “Better if he doesn’t sit. We don’t want him to look even shorter.”

Some scattered laughter. Chuuya sat up a bit, and pressed his heel against the healing wound on his shin.

Documents were passed down the table, touched by every hand, until they reached their side — a thick dossier of familiar contracts, like lighting on his slow visual comprehension and a clear object of pride to Chuuya’s lessons-acquired one. The Director talked in circles; her men and women did the same, naming accounts and savings and some English terminology they were sure they wouldn’t quite grasp.

“I hope you will know — our reticence to work with Mori Corporations was never borne out of any animosity,” the woman informed them, smile stuck to her face. “Weapon manufacturers are a complicated subject. Moreso, on an Island attempting to step away from all that leftover conflict. We tend to refuse those clients.”

“You have accounts for GND, though,” Dazai noted, eyes running down the lines. “And Le Directeur. And Missile. I’m assuming those vows of peace are polite enough not to restrain the countries that created the Island?”

“Precisely,” a man intervened. “Creating Standard Island was a complex, delicate balance of interests — many concessions were made by the founding countries. The International Council did not believe demanding more would be fair.”

“Japan had a — certain role in the Great War,” the Director added. “I will not hide it — we feared that granting economic support could be misinterpreted.”

“Mori Corps prides itself in autonomy,” Dazai reassured. “Our clientele is not limited to Japan. We are all but a Governmental agency, as our prior — chairman often informed you of.”

“We hear your latest head is superior to him in all ways,” she commented, carefully. “Great things have been said about him. We might be disconnected — if you’ll allow me the play on words — from the world, but we know all relevant pieces of information on the international scene.”

“Yes,” His lips curled. “You know who we are.”

All murmurs waned down.

It was imperceptible — not a bird stopped soaring through the darkening sky outside the windows; the grandfather clock at the end of the room kept ticking. The guards at the Director’s side tightened their grips on the blades; Chuuya lowered the papers in his hands, meeting their eyes with an open, welcoming stance.

Winston cleared her throat. “It’s certainly an unusual choice — sending someone so young to take care of the most important deal of the year.”

“We might have more important deals,” Dazai replied, “What do you know?”

“Do you two function as interns?”

“Not quite.”

“Ambassadors, then.”

“Clean-up duties,” Chuuya replied, eyes still on the papers. “Mostly.”

Glances were exchanged. The Director’s smile died down, slower than the sunset.

“Shall we speak freely, then?” she said. “If I am correct in my assumption of your acceptance, you might wish to discuss what we want in exchange for this — leap of faith.”

Dazai blinked. “Are we not speaking freely? Hatrack, have I been cautious?”

Chuuya considered it. “I’d say you’re the usual amount of condescending.”

“You’re free to drop pretenses,” Winston insisted, under the uncomfortably held breaths of her subordinates. All eyes but theirs were on the table — she held her spine with the grace of someone who had been at gunpoint. “Our clients are granted the utmost privacy. Nothing that enters my rooms is allowed to leave them.”

“Must be why every door was locked behind us,” Dazai said.

The Director stood up.

Chuuya's shoulders loosened.

"Discreet causes call for discrete measures. I have no trouble understanding," she observed, once again serene. "Your Boss should be proud of your leniency. Signing those papers is more than a formality, though; it's an alliance."

"And your first act of alliance will be to ask the Mafia to get rid of the Ballerinas, correct?"

Murmurs. The Director's smile widened.

"A mutually beneficial deal, I'd say," she confirmed. "Standard Island will remain near the Yokohama Bay for the rest of the season. Our Council scheduled it as such many years ago, and we wouldn't offend the Island spirit by changing its tides. This climatic mess, though —" She tilted her head to the side. "I must admit, I was surprised to hear the Port Mafia might be at fault for it."

"Haven't you read the news?" Chuuya scoffed. "The police are slowly beginning to reconsider their stance," Not fast enough, Dazai considered, thinking back to the News service insisting on the Ballerinas being, too old of an enemy. "A member of the Ballerinas was caught attacking a child from a nearby town, admitting to the syndicate's faults."

She hummed. "The Government must have believed that wholeheartedly, then."

"You know how powerful men are," Dazai shrugged. "Much like dogs, actually. They will scratch and scratch at the wound until it's infected, and then they'll begin to whine."

"And be put down?"

He crossed his legs on the seat. "Depends. Sometimes they learn to sit on command."

"Were that not to be the case, though," the woman continued, circling the table to approach their seat, despite the whispers of her subordinates, "Since the Government is still demanding irksome investigations — I'm sure your Boss understands how useful a testimony of continued good conduct from Standard Island could be."

"He's considering it."

"And his Demon Prodigy?" she asked. "Did he?"

Be it the rope around his throat, too absent and too there, from the moment his eyes had opened that morning — Dazai suddenly began to find the whole parade less funny.

The Director reached their chair. Wordlessly, without missing a beat, eyes stuck on hers — Chuuya's dangled a leg over Dazai's sat frame.

Her smile froze.

Taking a single step back seemed all but a conscious decision; it snapped her subordinates' gazes up, and her guards' attention to her. Dazai didn't know what kind of picture they made; what straw had shifted their age into a mindless void to fear, for the sake of emptiness. He knew what their reflection looked like in most blown out pupils — two lines, and the quiet cage of inevitability.

"I'd have to ask," he answered, all hilarity wiped off. "I could, if convinced of its necessity."

"No," the Director replied, in a thin voice. A theory, in the back of her eyes. "No need."

Dazai tapped his fingers on his knees. "You know," he started, "The Mafia has been offering deals for more than a decade, as of today. Standard Island has had enemies. A good number of them threatened you much more than some snowy nuisance. I don't quite believe you couldn't simply move the island, if the necessity came."

"Which means there's more to it," he continued. "You either want the Ballerinas gone for other reasons, or you think they're important enough to be worth going against a clear order of non-collaboration. What do you say?"

Winston worked her jaw.

"We offered you a deal," she spelled out. "Which will certainly require a good amount of deception to higher ups, on our side. Keeping our motivations hidden doesn't seem too extravagant."

"You might have to do better than that, if you want us to kill terrorists for you," Chuuya replied.

"The Mafia wouldn't let them live after they dragged them into this mess," the woman insisted. "We have followed the News closely — your weapon trading cover-up has lost millions, in only a few weeks. Your credibility is stumbling. The Special Division surrounds your base day and night."

"Maybe," Chuuya agreed. "But you're willing to pay for it. Why do the job for free?"

"So what," the Director said, disbelieving, "You would keep them alive out of spite?"

Dazai curled an eyebrow. "Should have thought about it before you expressed your desire to have them gone. For you to go as far as to ask us — it must mean you already tried and failed. Must mean you need us."

Silence draped across the room like the lid of a coffin.

It used to be more interesting, he considered. The feeling of having men under his thumb. These days — it was deaf; distant like a hopeful thought. These days they feared, and he sat, and he waited.

"So," Chuuya allowed his face to show all his bone-deep, hot-blooded boredom. "'You going to tell us what it is you want, or should we ask that guide of yours to bring us back to the ferry?"

---

...

---

Two days ago.

That same night, they were invited to a charity event hosted by the Gentlemen Bank.

“We should be fashionably late, or whatever Ane-san would say,” Chuuya planned, gathering water from the overflowing bathtub in his cupped hands. He tilted it back on his own head, raining it on reddened cheeks and amused eyes — and Dazai followed. “How in hell did you even know we had to bring suits, anyway?”

He opened his mouth to retort — something sharp, he thought; something cutting, where he couldn’t scratch. He wasn’t quite willing to hear what kind of sounds his exhausted mouth would have made, though; so he shrugged.

Chuuya hadn’t expected an answer. “Yeah,” he scoffed, mildly disgusted. His lips had been cobalt blue, when Dazai had finally managed to crawl to him through the ice — they’d stayed blue through the whole car ride back home. “As usual.”

The bathroom of the suite the Bank had given them was as pricey as every inch of that apartment — the lights didn’t flicker for a breath, and the porcelain was lined in what might have been gold. Heavy curtains and spacious beds and a wall-long TV — Dazai’s eyes had run across it all with the gloomy breathlessness of a prey, and then he’d key-locked himself in another bathroom and worn his clean suit.

Chuuya hadn’t questioned the sudden need for hard walls and overly covered skin. He hadn’t asked when Dazai had walked in his bathroom, tie choking him and jacket buttoned, and sat on the ground.

Wet fingers tapped the edge of the bathtub. Every inch of this place is bugged, isn’t it?

Dazai studied a wedge of his reflection from the mirror. The floor was cold; vapor rose from the water hiding the boy’s body. He tried to imagine peeling his skin off; wearing it backwards. He thought of Mori, and of Odasaku’s kids — never quite holding his hands if they could not.

I destroyed the one in the living room, he traced on the condensation of the porcelain. They’ll think we know if I destroy the others.

Chuuya hummed.

He poured some more water over himself. Dazai leaned his temple on the edge of the tub until it pounded, watching drops chase each other down the angles of his face. He blinked whenever they framed a freckle — breathed out whenever they landed in the water again.

She thinks she has the upper hand, he said.

Ripples in the water. The boy scrubbed his shoulders, and he watched his muscles move with it, pulse and burn. His Mafia tattoo, refusing to be washed away. She seemed pretty scared to me.

He shook his head. She wanted us trapped in our own power trip. She expected everything we said. She wants to distract us.

From what?

Dazai turned his head, just enough to settle his eyes on the dossier they had abandoned on one of the master beds. The fact that these documents masterfully hide our permission to gain free reign over all of our accounts — included the Ability archives.

Chuuya's eyes snapped up. "But that's —"

What the Ballerinas want.

They're with them? Then why send us after them?

She knows we wouldn't win, as of now. The Special Division is waiting for us to attack. They're expecting us to come at them. Taunting us.

"So what," he huffed, "We just leave winter in the city?"

No, Dazai tapped. We act smart about it.

His expression turned skeptical. Not exactly towards him — Dazai had yet to watch him doubt one of his plans, usual protests left aside. He munched on his lower lip, staring at the water as if it could be blamed for traitorous usurers.

From the bedroom, the grandfather clock ticked.

Clearly unconcerned about the possibility of cameras, Chuuya went back to his bath.

"Why didn't you wash?" he asked, at some point, wearing a soap beard. "All those snotty Englishmen will smell your oriental sweat from miles," A sharp grin. "Unless Westerners don't wash either, other than not bowing."

Dazai snorted, low. He didn't think it was heard. With some consideration, he offered: you don't want me in any water, right now.

A glance — darting, un-lingering; unwilling to become another one of the layers suffocating him. But Chuuya was alive in ways that he wasn't — noncommittally, one of his scarred hands reached for the towels on the toilet. He dried his fingers; reached forward and pinched the space between Dazai's eyebrows.

Peeved, Dazai gestured to his unwrinkled forehead.

"Maybe not," Chuuya admitted. "But we gotta make sure you don't swallow your tongue."

The edge of the bathtub carved his cranium. It was a quiet suite — the windows hadn't been locked when they had arrived, but they were, by the time Dazai had reappeared from the bathroom. Mori would have called it unprofessional. Or maybe he would have played chess with him over it — because he was smart, and he knew longing when he saw it. Would have offered him a needle, in case you want to sew it shut.

A plan — a plan he could fix. A body, he could put a bullet in. Torture it until it sang. Dazai didn't know what to do with himself.

The rush of water; the scar on Chuuya's arm, from their first fight. "Boss will kill you if you do this on a mission."

Harsh, maybe, to kinder ears. Dazai would have told him the same; had, before — not one offered hand to the wrecked body on the concrete, because lateness was only funny when it wasn't a furrow on Mori's forehead.

Finally, he tapped.

Chuuya pushed his body forward, breaking ripples of water. Vivid crimson webs were stuck to his cheeks and neck, knotted in a way he knew to be more resolvable than his own. He leaned his chin mere inches from Dazai's abandoned cheek. The hand he'd dried tucked a strand of hair behind his ear, and it did not touch an ounce of skin, and Dazai's silence was there — in the shell and the vein pulsing at the side of his eye.

For a moment, it got stuck in his throat like an ache.

"Can you wait 'till we're home?" Chuuya asked, very professionally. His touch wasn't a 9 to 5, though — just a touch. When the predictable hum out of his mouth began, Dazai only felt the vibrations of it through the marble. Strangely comforting. "Mori's still fixing the cameras in my old neighborhood."

A gas leak, he listed off, pages of a book so well loved it was yellow. A poisoned drink. A jump from the roof. A river deep enough. Two knots on the underside and three around the circle. A car — the floor; the ceiling; a drink in a bar; a man who won't kill but might if you beg him, a doctor, his hands, his hands, his hands.

A costume maker rented the next room, Dazai tapped.

Chuuya curled an eyebrow. "Operation Villan's Wife?" He nodded. A huff. "After you got all fucking dressed up already?"

I want to give Kouyou an aneurysm.

His lips curled up. He searched his sole eye, deep and deeper, breaching through and foolishly missing one or two turns. Dazai wondered if asking him to tear his bandages off would be unwelcome — just to watch him face some ruined part of him he wouldn't be able to just scoff and move past.

“All right,” Chuuya stood up, dripping water all over, missing him with purpose. “Alright, you bastard. Just snap out of it.”

Dazai's gaze followed him. When he walked out of the tub and around the apartment, chin up and dripping, still, he could have laughed, almost.

He assumed Chuuya got dressed before leaving the room, but he didn't bet on it. The grandfather clock ticked some more, as he dragged his bones into the living room, two pairs of socks on, because the moquette made his fingers twitch. The windows were all still locked. The chandelier was too fragile. All the knives in the drawer had been stuck to the kitchen wall, in a phallic shape.

It was funny. Then it made him mad.

He checked all the windows again, and he thought about stealing a knife, but thought Chuuya would say, told you the dicks drawn on my face aren't funny — and then he couldn't.

The tie brushed against his neck bandages. Intolerable as it was, he widened the knot. He walked to the bathroom again, faced the mirror to untie it and re-do it again, the way Mori had taught him to — hands around his shoulders and the clinic mirror. Don't you look nice and respectful, now.

He stood in the middle of the bedroom and stared up at one of the bugs. Added another pair of socks. The grandfather clock ticked, and they were officially late.

The sound of the door opening was distant — muffled by the pillow of the living room couch, and Dazai's attempt to see stars on scratched eyelids. Bustle of overly long fabric and half-assed curses — all of them abandoned at the entrance. Steps, unmindful and known.

“Move,” Chuuya said, no matter the other couch, and then climbed over his curled up frame like it wasn't against every promise number they had not numbered.

Dazai had had to pull up his legs a bit to even fit — the boy had no such problems, and he deserved to be reminded of his lacks, in another lifetime.

“Fashionably late has a deadline in an hour,” he informed him, situating himself where he could watch the room in Dazai's stead. He'd been under the ice, two weeks ago. Dazai didn't even remember nullifying him. “If you're not up by then, I'm dragging you by a sleeping bag.”

His cheek landed on his same pillow. It hadn't been like that — not during the missions. Their knees knocked against each other, and that he knew — the hit and run of bones, inevitable by purpose of motion, quickly corrected by the wide beds they always selected, the sea of space granted by a line of pillows they didn't own. Dazai was used to the idea of something he wouldn't get, and wouldn't ask, and didn't want.

The ricochet went nowhere. The couch was a tomb and no one ever got buried in pairs, not in the Mafia. His hands knocked against the boy's chest, and their legs could not swim back, and the grandfather clock ticked, and Dazai —

He only managed to meet his eyes because there was a plastic god behind them. Not quite permission and not quite longing — he recalled waking with Chuuya's soaked, bleeding, pale body on a snowy grounds, and wondering —

Wondering —

He wrapped his arms around him, over and under and through — obsessive in that way Mori found transactional and Odasaku real and Ango reason enough to — plastering himself against him, pressing until his ribcage was rattled, and whatever was left inside it did the same.

He sunk his nose half in the pillow and half in the leather of the choker he didn't know when he had worn again, and shut his eyes, and saw stars.

An ooof left Chuuya's mouth, ripped off his chest, and he wondered, for a moment — and then arms sneaked around his shoulders. Between them he had always been stronger, the brawn and the god and the dog and the first thing in his awoken field of vision and Chuuya — and he strangled him back, legs and arms, breathless and possessive; and how nauseating it was to be reminded only the real could be owned.

"You owe me a favor, asshole," he let him know, and Dazai knew he didn't.

Nothing you want, he tapped between his shoulders, or maybe traced it, or bit, or whatever would allow him not to let go, to hold on the way Kazuko did, strangle the life out of him, bash his skull in and steal whatever was inside it.

"We're going to a pompous aristocrats' ball," Chuuya reminded him, smelling of soap and the night and teenage boy; fingers digging into his clothes like stitches on flesh. His lips had been blue and he'd bled out so profusely in the backseat, his men had had to burn the car. He wasn't humming anymore. He kinda wanted him to. "I take the blood and you take the blame."

Dazai dropped his mouth on his shoulder. Fabric and bone, and bone and fabric, and the tie around his throat. Don't you look nice. "Sounds mutually advantageous," he spoke — in the name of a cleaner suicide, away from Mori's hands.

A pause.

A tightened grip; an apology, perhaps, if either of them had been naive enough to demand it — lips tracing the side of his face by mistake, settling on his ear, pressing, taunt and promise and the confidence of a webbed glass, towering upon the shards of a clock.

“There’s my prodigy,” he whispered, like an insult.

His bones creaked, rusty and too weak for the trial. His heard his heartbeat inside them, and he couldn’t breathe, so he didn’t; not until it got his neck nail-pinched — yes, Chuuya, he thought.

The grandfather clock ticked.

---

...

---

Two days before.

“Mr. Nakahara,” the Director was wearing azure satin from head to toe. She gestured towards the circle of suited men she’d been exchanging plastic pleasantries with. “Just in time for the intermission show. And —“

Her eyes landed on Dazai. The idea of words abruptly disappeared from her face.

Chuuya stared back, waiting.

“Ah,” Winston blinked. “And you are —“

“Miss Tsushima,” Dazai offered a lace-gloved hand, all the high-pitch from his voice-cracks days out. He secured the grip of his other hand around the shorter boy’s elbow; he felt him choke. “What a wonderful ballroom. Is that man on stage about to perform a suicide for us all?”

“That’s,” she stuttered, “That’s an aerial dancer—“

“Shame.”

“That’s a fucking wine fountain,” Chuuya gasped, eyes brighter than the chandeliers dangling from the frescoed ceiling. “Director — we’ll be back in a moment. Chuuya’s fine, by the way.”

“But what about Mr. Da—“

The crowd was quick to engulf them — hiding them from the woman’s speechless gaze with silk and papillons, between the clank! of champagne-filled glasses, fake laughter and dancing couples. The challenge of not getting shoes to step on his vibrantly red gown never got much easier — by the time they reached the fountain table, only a quarter of the eyes were hesitating on his wig.

Do try not to get drunk, Dazai tapped on his shoulder, as Chuuya dragged his glass in the wine waterfall.

“Don’t ruin all the fun, dipshit,” Chuuya huffed. “You get to dress up — I get to drink a hundred-yen worth of wine. We all win,” He savored the taste. “Apart from the assassins at every corner of this room, I guess.”

He hummed, twirling a bit in the men's shoes he had preferred not to drop, studying the sturdier sets of shoulders near the floor-to-ceiling windows. On the stage at the end of the ballroom, a Japanese man and woman in skin-toned clothing were acting out some sort of two-way monologue.

“They’re from Yokohama,” Chuuya noted, cheeks red by the second glass. The table was filled by strangely colorful Western food, along with some variations Dazai had never heard of. “She’s an Opera singer, too. I was at their opening night with Kajii.”

“Fate or threat, is the question,” he murmured, blowing a strand of fake hair from his forehead. The wig was heavy and vaguely itchy, but similar enough to his own hair to fool the more distracted gazes.

He fixed the small tiara on top of it, curling an eyebrow in the face of Chuuya’s horrified stare.

“Your efforts to show me what a nightmare is meant to be are appreciated,” he said, simply.

I think I look ravishing, he tapped. He stole a piece of neon-pink food of sorts from the table, plastering it into his face.

“It’s the concept of it that’s terrifying,” Chuuya insisted, muffled through his furious munching. Dazai stole a piece for himself, gulping it down to try and open up his throat. “You. As a girl. You, and all your — shit. But a chick.”

But, Dazai insisted, tilting forward the way Kouyou’s girls did, showing off cleavage he didn’t have. I do look ravishing.

You don’t, he mouthed.

You’re just jealous that every girl you know is taller than you.

On the stage, the man fell to his knees, holding onto the woman’s gowns. Tears fell from her face — she begged, and begged again, but he wasn’t close enough to hear for what. On the other side of the ballroom, the Director had her eyes on them, and her lips on one of her guard’s ear.

Neither one of their gazes touched her; wordlessly aware, they moved towards the dancing circle of couples near the center, Chuuya’s hands unsightly — and much to the guests’ double-take stupor — holding onto his heavy gowns.

“Hey,” the boy hissed, as they walked a tad too close to the spinning duos, “What are you — No — don’t you dare —”

At the edge of his memories, before the red of a scarf and the neon sign of Bar Lupin, were old ballrooms and dimly lit living rooms — a harsh voice, hands fixing his posture, clammy fingers on his own. He had never enjoyed it much; the lack of finesse from his partner didn’t help.

“Why are you leading,” Chuuya hissed, over the quiet curse of his stepped-on feet, doing his best not to trip over his dress. “You’re the girl, you’re not supposed to—”

Because you suck at it. He slapped his hands away, and his hands were slapped back, and the other duos offered them their most politely disturbed glances. It was an uncomfortable deal; they stood too far, and they kept trying to hide behind moving frames, and Chuuya’s enviable learning curve had no time to flourish with Dazai’s purposefully confusing steps.

The Director’s eyes were still on them; her guard was nowhere to be seen.

“Does she actually want us dead, or just scared?” Chuuya questioned.

He shrugged. “Irrelevant,” he croaked out, close enough to his ear to stay tentative, “But she needs those documents to be signed by Mori. I’m assuming the Ballerinas might be holding something over the Bank.”

“I thought the Mafia being targeted was against what the Ballerinas’ latest eye-opener or whatever demanded.”

On stage, the man hugged the woman to his chest, howling in what might have been passion or pain. He thought he met her eyes, when he spun — her cheeks squished against his good cashmere, her gaze strangely vacant — but it was gone by the next set of words flooding from her mouth.

“Just because they don’t want us destroyed yet,” he replied, and traced, doesn’t mean we wouldn’t be one bother less. “Try not to step on the sweetheart’s feet, yes?”

Chuuya blinked. “What?”

When the next spin arrived, Dazai gracefully slipped away — hands grasping the wrist of a woman in red, around Tanaki’s age and his height, throwing her in the boy’s embrace.

He didn’t stay to observe his awkward politeness; he gathered his gowns and ran towards the rows of balconies on one side of the room, wondering if the dramatics of it all were the reason why Kouyou never wore pants.

The Director’s eyes stayed on the twirling duo — he slipped the elbow-length gloves off his bandages, abandoning them in the lap of some sleeping man by the balcony doors. Closing the curtains behind him, he threw the wig somewhere into the empty street not too far under the balcony — and then himself, after it.

Mere steps away from his landing point, a smoking tourist stared, speechless.

Dazai sighed.

Director Winston's office was still a storm of pastels and unlit chandeliers, but it stretched into the darkness with a ghastly sort of precision — table-seat distance measured by the inch. It was a familiar sight — Elise's dollhouses were always somewhat haunted.

Pulling up the three piece suit he had stolen from the now dead tourist, Dazai made a beeline for the computer behind one of the previously locked doors, carving his way in with every hairpin from his abandoned attire. The sound of distant classical music and steps knocked against the roof, too muffled to do more than rattle the windows.

You might be the best hacker in the syndicate, Ango had often noted, following a mission he had been meant to do on his own. I don't know if leaving smiley faces is the standard procedure, though. Dazai. Dazai —

[The next day, Odasaku had ended up having to ring him up for help with a commission. All his client's National Security-level documents, it seemed, had been erased — nothing but smiley faces and tongue twisters left in their place].

A copy of the contract the Director had woven for the Port Mafia rested in the depths of her archives; his eyes ran down pages and pages of nauseating lines, until he reached the paragraphs he had memorized.

He set to work.

The smell of smoke only reached his nostrils halfway through the printing of the corrected document.

An intermittent beep tickled his ears, over the red of the fire sprinkler systems. The printer stared back at him, unconcerned, unhurriedly moving through the last dozen lines. The sounds of steps on the roof quietened down — then, all at once, they grew into a desperate roar.

Something shifted in the air behind him, right as the printer vomited out the last paper. He grabbed the gun he had stolen from the guide, and —

The guard's eyes blew up, settled on him.

They rained down her cheeks in wet, pulposus coagulations, framed by the blood drooling from her nostrils and ears, as her skull bent to squash her brain into a void. She fell to her knees before Chuuya's hands could abandon her temples; the moment she landed on the wooden tiles, the fire alarms started ringing, raining water into the pastel furniture.

"Miss Elizabeth sends her regards," the boy panted, inefficiently wiping trails of blood off his face. "'Said I'm the best dance partner she's had in decades."

Dazai tilted his head, blinking at the water drops that landed in his eyes. "So good you set the ballroom on fire to escape?"

“That wasn’t me!” Chuuya replied, ripping the papers off his hands and exchanging them with the copy of the dossier they’d been given during the meeting. He floated to the sprinkler system on the roof, drowning those other papers until they were intelligible. “There. Can we go now, before I get arrested on foreign territory for snapping all of the Director’s spies’ necks?”

“What do you mean it wasn’t you?” His legs stumbled, forcing him to cross the threshold with none of his usual lightness; a wave of nausea tightened his grip around the edge of the Director’s seat.

“Skin-Clothes actors decided to give a spin to their performance,” The boy searched around the room, blinking a tad too insistently, until his eyes landed on the closest window. A well aimed kick freed the way to unlock it; already halfway out, he called: “Come on!”

Dazai curled his fingers on the keyboard, typing a quick and probably slightly miswritten, offer accepted — PM at the end of the modified contract. The Director wouldn’t check it again, he knew; she had made the mistake of pre-signing it. “You do know there are no ferries at night, yes?”

Horror dawned upon his face. “We have to swim?”

Dazai felt his lips tingle. The resinous slumber sticking to his bones protested the snort ripped out of his throat — distantly, he munched on a sweet taste, stuck to the roof of his mouth.

“Fuck!” Chuuya’s voice lamented, as they clumsily crawled out of the window, flames engulfing the upper floors of the building. A small crowd had gathered at the entrance; the distant sound of sirens was growing closer by the second. “I told Albatross I would never swim home again! I told him — “

Before Dazai’s hands could let go of the window seal, feet dropping on the cobblestoned road, a piece of paper hung on the bulletin board caught his attention.

The foreign alphabet winked at his memory; the elegant handwriting he had only seen once grasped it by the throat, choking recognitional out of him. A letter on a grave. A nickname; a wish of good luck in the city’s latest game.

From demon to demon, the paper read, in neat Russian. I will see you soon.

---

...

---

Two days ago.

Despite the borderline knee-high roads of snow spreading through Yokohama, the Sparkling Twilight had been stubbornly kept in plannings.

It brings almost a quarter of the season's gainings, Ace had explained, sufficiently, the last time he had trapped Dazai in a room for a counsel of sorts. Who knows — the novelty of a summer festival in a makeshift winter might just bring more tourists in. Given how more than a quarter of the payments for public events in the Mafia's territory ended up in their pockets, it was clear Mori had no intention of pressuring his contacts to move the festival up.

All that it meant, currently, was that when Dazai and Chuuya managed to crawl out of the Bay, their breathless bodies landed on snow and fallen decorations, surrounded by the pulsing roar of traditional music and screaming children — a small group of which seemed convinced they were part of the ship parade.

Fireworks lit up the sky, painting the white ground in bright shadows. They walked on all fours, until they managed to hide behind a half abandoned tourist stand to catch their breath.

"I'm telling Iceman," Chuuya panted, face in the snow, seemingly too tired to tear him apart — as he had sworn he'd do when Dazai had clung to him in the water, keeping him from floating away. "I'm so telling him, he'll bust your ass —"

"Albatross is six feet underground," Dazai informed him, blinking at the sky. The fireworks had shapes, he knew — things his blurred vision couldn't quite grasp. Colors pulsed against his eyeballs, material like knocking fingers.

Frogs, he thought, leap leap leap.

"Something's wrong," he concluded.

"I think I just swallowed my tongue," the other boy moaned, reaching forward to grasp at the edge of the stand. He tried to sit up; the thud! his face made as it flopped back into the snow painted the world in shades of hot pink. "No, I did for sure —"

Dazai climbed to his feet — attempted to. His feet slipped on snow; he crashed against the stall, shattering the glass containers overflowing in candies on the ground.

"The fuckin' Jiggly Man is back," Chuuya whispered, horrified.

The intertwining threads of lights connecting the buildings danced under his eyelids; Dazai thought of Mori, and of days spent learning how to be awake before his mind was — and then he thought of Elise, her red dress; the dress he had left on the Island, and wasn't that a damn shame — Odasaku would have said something nice about it, and then asked if he could give it to Sakura for her future teenage school events.

No, Dazai would have told him, but I can wear it and go to her dances with her.

That's nice of you, Odasaku would have said. Odasaku was nice.

The marine rescue demonstration pretended to set their ship on fire. The crowd was wearing coats over their kimonos.

“We gotta —“ He sunk his nails in the wooden stand until it hurt. “The Ballerinas. ‘Gotta get rid of them. Winston will not re-read the contract, and we’ll have most of the shares of the bank. Plus — Leverage against them,” His mouth was pasty. “They hired sycaries. And no more winter.”

Chuuya’s hands grasped the nearest glass container, catapulting a good number of them to the ground in his haste. He threw up his weight inside it, pupils blown out.

“Fuck’n,” he muttered, “Kenta and his bubbles.”

Sweetness stuck to his teeth.

Dazai stilled.

“The street vendor,” he breathed out. “The latest trend from the West.”

Emptiness crowded the other boy’s gaze, as he did his very best to give a meaning to the sounds out of his mouth. A limited offert, he recalled, they’ll be gone by the evening — and then the tables in the ballroom, with the strangely colorful sweets, and the tourist traps —

“Are we fucking high right now?” Chuuya snapped.

“Hey!” a low growl breached through the silence. “What the fuck did you two do to my stand?”

Any true thread holding his limbs and mind together seemed to have been snapped by the buzz in his bones; Dazai only realized he had a gun in hand when the small crowd near the stand shrieked — and the beast of a man stalking towards them paused, eyes on his swaying, unstable legs and well-held weapon.

“A gun!” someone from the crowd shouted.

“It’s from the clay shooting stand —“

“Call the —“

“No!” Chuuya arms wrapped under his armpits, his terrified tone contrasting with his weak attempts to activate his Ability, immediately nullified. “Assface, why would you shoot Gramps — Boss is gonna hang us from our asses —“

“Shooting him at some point was promise thirty seven!” he screeched, fighting against his grip, legs kicking out. A bullet was fired; more screams ensued. “You simpleton liar!”

The vendor pushed through the crowd, festival clothes dragging onto the snow, seemingly uncaring of the bullets. “Fuck Gramps, where in god’s name are your brats’ parents —“

Both their heads snapped in his direction.

“Watch your mouth,” Chuuya snarled.

“Take that back, good sir,” Dazai whined, through the concrete-heavy cotton in his mouth, “So what if Hirotsu’s a bother? So what if he collects too many A Gentleman’s Guide magazines and sleeps in a nightgown?

“At least he doesn’t look like an acrobat’s shit!”

He eyed his hot pink sash. “Ever heard of color coordination?”

The pulsing in his skull got louder. It took some uncertain breaths and the added screams of the stubborn crowd, unwilling to leave, to realize the vendor had slammed him against one of the stone columns of the port, filling his vision with a visibly dark expression.

“We’re going to the Station,” he growled, close enough for his spit to land on him. “But not before I get some more fucking bandages on your sorry ass —”

One of the survived candy glass containers was smashed on the man’s head.

He fell to his knees with a curse, releasing the captive air in Dazai’s heaving lungs; Chuuya stood upon him with the bloodied remnants of the bottle, held like a baseball bat — expression downright murderous.

“I’m telling Miranda,” Dazai informed the vendor, face deep into the snow again, hand raised.

“They’re here!” someone from the crowd called out. “Agent, they’re —”

They ran.

They staggered. Stumbled and tripped, ripping off the hems of bystanders’ kimonos with their shoes, dragging entire rows of tourists down with their uncollaborative legs, losing sight of each other every three stands and painfully bumping into each other by the next exit. People knew better than to expect tranquillity during the drunkest night of the season — it hardly saved them from nasty glances and attempted fights.

“Get down!” some carriers hissed, watching Chuuya climb over the golden linings of the mikoshi, precariously balancing on the little space. One of the men set his eyes on Dazai, standing right in front of the carriage, and shrieked: “Move, kid! Now!”

“There’s a dragon,” he informed his partner, some undefined eternity later, perched on top of a streetlight. He’d had to climb with his arms and his legs — Chuuya could have floated up there, but he’d forgotten. “There,” He pointed a finger. “Kill it for me. Good dog. Arf.”

Chuuya squinted, eyes attempting to observe his own nose.

He swayed a bit with his search; ended up standing in a parallel line to the ground, feet on the pole. “That’s a cow costume, you umbrella,” he informed him. A gasp. “Elise wanted a stupid cow. What — how the fuck did the camera even survive the river?”

“Elise wanted a pony, silly,” Dazai raised said camera, snapping pictures in quick succession: the kaleidoscopic sky, the suffocating crowd, the vomit-pale face of the boy, “And it’s Ane-san’s. Of course it lived. Did you know the earth is flat?”

“No, it isn’t. I would have pushed you off the edge already. Is — no,” He frowned. Some kids in costume waved at them, pulling at their parents’ kimonos to get them to look at the monkey men; fireworks echoed in the sky, sparkles falling. Dazai offered his tongue, trying to taste. “Weren’t we meant to — kill someone?”

“Yes,” He sunk his nails in the rusty metal; tried to focus. “Yes, we need to — But we’re always killing someone,” Dazai whined. “Can’t we buy shaved ice? I bet they have,” He burped. “Crab! I like crab. Hatrack, the sky is falling —”

“I kind of want to kill someone.”

“Kill me — “

Chuuya opened his mouth. The yelp out of Dazai’s own cut him off — as a hand wrapped around his calf, pulling him down from the pole.

“Child kidnapper!” he screeched, convulsing in the embrace of arms around him. “Child kidnapper — he’s kidnapping me, I’m a minor, he’s kidnapping a minor —!”

“Dazai!” Detective Matsuda thundered, eyes wet from the kicks he angled between his legs. When he managed to land on the floor and ram his fists against the snow, crying out nonsense from the temper tantrums Mori had hated the most — a flash of red appeared out of nowhere, wrapping itself around the detective like a death embrace. “What the — Chuuya, let go right now —!”

“Stand down!” some woman in uniform called, laying one foot on Dazai’s shin to keep him on the ground, pulling at the back of Chuuya’s drenched coat. At the edge of the crowd was the colorful vendor, and his bleeding temple. “Are you two in possession of a weapon?”

“I’m in possession of your mother — “

Matsuda crashed Chuuya against the street light, keeping him in a headlock that might have appeared playful, almost — if not for his uniform.

Through the haze, he saw him take a look at the boy’s eyes and widen his own, “Are you — “

“That’s thievery!” Dazai protested, as the other Agent grabbed his gun from his coat, loudly ordering the crowd to make space. “That’s a crime! Taxes-eaters! State’s slaves! The working syndicates were right about you — “

“Vive la révolution!” Chuuya chanted.

“That’s the law! I read it! Up to ten years of imprisonment or a 500,000 yen fine are to be issued against the crime of— “

“Vive la révolution!”

Over the next fireworks to bloom in the sky, handcuffs were snapped around their hands.

---

...

---

Two days before.

No interrogation was attempted.

Dazai thought so, at least. The Yokohama PD was as empty as ever, almost all the agents on field — ensuring the unusually candid festival would not bring more victims than the unpredictable weather already had. Stained walls and monotone voices asking for Security Numbers all looked the same.

Plus, he had yet to stop giggling.

“You’re going to give yourself a stomach ache from another dimension,” Matsuda informed him, sitting sideways on a chair he’d dragged all the way to their cell. “Agent Todoroki suffers from a very mild case of Essential Tremor — stop laughing. No need to be mean because the cell keys fell once. How about —“

They stared, waiting.

“Alright,” His eyes searched the ceiling for a sky — and a god — who wasn’t there. “How about this: get out from under the bench, and I’ll ask Marco to bring you guys a pizza.”

“We can’t get pizza,” Chuuya wailed.

His voice echoed in his skull like a tin can down the empty trash. Dazai had yet to tell Ango where he had hidden his second favorite watch. He would need to search through the Bar Lupin trash, like those raccoons that skirted around the dumping site. Unopposable thumbs.

“Shitty Daz’i will lick all the slices to claim them,” A whine. “We can never get fuckin’ pizza,”

He choked on a chuckle, inconsequential and sweet, down his throat. Every thread linking his mind to his body was snapped, uncaring of the lingering panic such lightness would never cease giving his muscle.

The motion bumped his head against Chuuya’s own, but he decided not to kill him for it — space was already slightly problematic. Their curled up legs barely fit underneath the rusty bench; the pressure of his cheek against the floor would probably give him a toothache.

Toothaches, unfortunately, meant that boring dentist Boss was obsessed with. They would only stuff him up with laughing gas if he behaved, which was nice — but then Elise would drag him to her room and dress him up — green wasn't his color, he kept telling her — while he could do nothing more than giggle at the pictures of corpses she had hung over her bed and try to bash his head against her doll house.

“All that considered,” the Detective said, and oh, had he been speaking out loud? “Wouldn’t it be better if you guys sat on the damn bench?”

“We can't!” Chuuya snarled, huddling closer to the wall. “The streetlights are coming.”

“Chuuya, what does that mean —“

“It’s too late for you.”

Dazai wailed. “Poor Matsuda!”

The man dragged two hands down his face. Distantly, fireworks tickled his ears, crystal sounds through the white noises and the buzz. The clinic table was much harder than usual. Chuuya wasn’t usually there, either.

“Breaks me, breaks me apart,” the boy hummed, his fingers drawing shapes on the dirt. “The wind and all of the sky’s stars — Police-san, do you like Hirose Fumiko?”

“I’m not a big fan,” Matsuda admitted. He threw a few cautious glances to both sides of the hallway; leaned closer. Dazai offered him his best finger guns.

The abhorrence abandoning their mouths in a gasp crashed both their skulls against the bench — the resounding thud almost startling the officer off of his chair. “Are you —“

“How can you not be?”

“She revolutionized Japan’s musical scene!”

“She’s the most awarded Asian woman in —“

“Is that why your wife fucking divorced you?”

“Alright,” Matsuda said. “There’s no need for—“

Dazai sucked his teeth in. “I think it is.”

“It’s most definitely not —“

“Shit,” Chuuya snickered. “That’s embarrassing.”

“That’s so embarrassing.”

“That’s super embarrassing.”

“For the last time,” the Detective snapped, voice just shy of a whisper. “My divorce has nothing to do — Why would it have something to do with a singer?”

“Oh,” Chuuya’s eyes lowered. “Was it actually because of your dick? That thing in your pocket is actually your gun?”

“I thought it would be because he smokes so much! Everyone knows women hate men who smell. I tested it —“

The man spluttered: “I don’t smoke —“

“He quit smoking after a thief tried to burn his eyes with the cig,” Chuuya explained. “Then restarted when some guy evaded the cell he was guarding right under his eyes. I saw him. You think the receding hairline might have something to do with it?”

“Now, don’t be rude,” Dazai tutted, “Bald men have a certain — je ne sais quoi to them. The kind of gruff appeal that blinds women.”

“Oh,” Matsuda reached for his head. “Well, I’m not — It’s kind of you to —“

“The clear skin must reflect the sun like a bitch.”

Chuuya snorted, a deep growl of sorts born from the depths of his chest. Dazai’s cheeks hurt; he giggled, aided by the gasping sounds coming out of the delirious boy, as his hands uselessly flagged around to beat the ground and avenge his hilarity. He laughed harder, painfully crashing his nose in his shoulder; Chuuya choked, eyes on the officer.

“Moon-san,” he whispered, except it was too loud, somewhere around his ear.

“Cool-roof-san, ” he agreed.

“Short-hand-21-san, ”

“Bowling-ball-san. ”

“Boys,” Matsuda sighed, “Listen.”

“His-wife-took-the-kids-san. ”

Chuuya screeched, tears in his eyes.

Lower, the man insisted: “Listen. I know enough about the Mafia code. You guys don’t deal in drugs. Is this seriously a teenage whim?”

“That’s just sugar, Officer,” Dazai swore.

“You pointed a gun at a street vendor,” His tone was severe. Chuuya was chewing on a strand of his hair. “Swam in the Port — do you even know how dirty those waters are? And the engines of the show ships — you caused a commotion. Permanently broke the system of three different ships from the parade. Got no less than a dozen people walked over by the paper dragons — What are you looking at?”

He nodded to the space behind the man’s shoulder. “Is that a raccoon?”

A breath. “That’s our Employer of the Month plaque.”

“Your Employer of the Month is a *raco*on?”

Chuuya burped.

“That’s so cool,” Dazai continued, doing his best to clap his hands. “That is so cool. I have a dog partner. You guys have a raccoon. Senator Miyoshi has his brother’s corpse in his basement. The world is so omnifarious!”

“What — what did you say —“

“You’re a fucking omnivorous for sure, ” the other boy nodded, approvingly. Then, he frowned. Reached forward to poke at his cheek. “You eat shit, actually. Have you eaten? No? Shame. Maybe you’d have choked on some of it.”

Dazai thought about retorting. The food-mention had brought something to mind, though — something distant and floaty, as ephemeral as a failed sneeze. Mori would have —

“Matsuda,” an officer called. “The brats’ contact is here.”

The man blinked. “We didn’t call yet —“

“She says she received a call from them.”

Accusing eyes were turned on them. Chuuya widened his own, poking two fingers in Dazai’s uncovered eye in his attempt to point. “Asshole stole your phone.”

“You told me to —“

“I told you to call Tanaki. ”

“How am I supposed,” He hiccuped, “To call Tanaki without a phone? Ask your little fairies-cousins?”

“I’m an orphan!”

“You have a brother!”

“A white man! He blew the fuck up!”

The Detective stood up, sighing. “Just wait here.”

The snow, he thought, through the veil of numbness. The glass from the old interrogation room, at the end of the corridor — fogged up. Chuuya’s brother; the sound of music from the street, children laughing, wearing coats.

He crawled out of the bench.

Slapped his face.

“What the fuck, ” Chuuya groaned, face on the ground. “I wanted to do that.”

Dazai stumbled around, leaning on anything at reach to stand straighter. Balance is more than body, Mori would have warned; and, no student of mine will trip, Kouyou would have said—and he would have tutted, not yours, and she would have leaned down and whispered, mine enough.

He grasped Chuuya’s ankle and pulled. Through his yelps, Dazai clasped his hands on his cheeks, and forced his wandering gaze to settle on him.

“Listen to me,” he said, “The Ballerinas. ”

Chuuya’s eyes popped out of their sockets. “Oh my God. Mackerel.”

“Slug. ”

“We’re in the Mafia. ”

Slapping one hand on his mouth, he hissed: “Don’t say it that loud —“

“Say what?”

“That we’re mafiosi —“

“Shush!” A violent enough slap to crash his lips against his teeth landed on his mouth.

“That’s a secret,” He frowned. “You still have lipstick on,” Diligently, he smeared it off his mouth, uncaring of his various noises of protest, “You’ll never be a ballerina, when you look like a koala —“

“The Ballerinas, ” Dazai insisted, muffled, “We need to find them. Remember? Bank.”

Haze battled with stubbornness, spreading through the unmatching eclipses someone had dropped on the roads of his face, and then never picked up. If he focused, Dazai could hear Tanaki’s voice, distantly, making up excuses and sending looks their way, and wondering.

“Yeah,” Chuuya squinted. “They brought winter.”

“They did. ”

“But how do we find them?”

“I don’t know.” He deflated, immediately. “Let’s just give up and die.”

“Fuck no. They turned me into a glass porcupine.”

“That’s what I said,” His brain curled around itself. Plans, he thought, hard, plans, you’re so very good at those. “If they’re against the Mafia,” he drawled, eventually, “They must have at least one contact in the city. One syndicate.”

“There’s so many, ” Chuuya noted, swaying along to him, carried by his anchoring hands, “The world is spinning. Did you stick yourself in Ane-san’s washing machine again? Are we dying?”

“I’m not. Not with you,” Dazai snapped, immediately. “Get a grip. How are you going to kill the Ballerinas for me in these conditions? You’re a beetle. A slug.”

“I’ve got enough to make you choke on your spine.”

“Enough what?”

“Enough —“ A pause. Frustration painted his whole face red; he rammed his fists against the bars, flapping his arms around. “Enough. Boss said we had a job. Let’s fucking job. We never,” He hiccuped, “Fail any stupid jobs. Double Black and shit.”

“So what?” Dazai whined. “Do we just go and knock on the door of every organization in Yokohama?”

From the entrance, came Madame Tanaki’s voice — something about the night of the festival. From the doors, the roar of engines.

Wordlessly, their eyes met.

---

...

---

Two days ago.

“If Matsuda isn’t around,” Chuuya roared, dragging the police car radio close to his mouth, his free hand clutching the wheel like an Arcade tool, “Tell him to drag his sorry ass to a seat! This one’s for that poor wife of his!”

Dazai flapped his arm until it landed on the horn. Right as the car swerved out of the Station’s parking lot, pointlessly hoarded by a small number of officers, screaming at them to get out right now — he pressed on it, long and hard, just to beat the lingering thunder of the festival music.

From the radio, a mess of questioning voices came from every channel. Chuuya backed, crashing against the nearest parked car, activating its alarms. A trash bin fell; judging by the screech at their right, one of the wheels took a trip over an officer's feet.

Hirose Fumiko's Bonnie & Clyde started playing, shaking the whole car.

"Get the getaway car," Dazai dragged Chuuya's wrist to his mouth to shout into the Station radio, "I'll get every last of them out of our way —"

"To hell to their handcuffs, and to hell with my blues —" the boy continued.

"So fuck the police, and fuck you too!"

Through one of the channels, Matsuda screamed something. With a whoop!, under the sound of Dazai's mismatching singing — Chuuya pressed on the accelerator, crashing into the street so violently the road shrieked. Uncaring of the warning bullets fired to the side of the car, they flew down the street.

The first stop was the Hounds.

"We ain't got no terrorists around, kid," one of their women — an imposing silhouette in black; barely distinguishable from the jumping crowd around the metal fence, screaming their throats rough to cheer on the quarter of dogs tearing each other apart. "You think any of us is stupid enough to ally against the Mafia again, after the Nine Rings disaster?"

"You have three infiltrates in our shipment unit," Dazai drawled, hanging upside down from one of the pipes. The woman paled. "And you're responsible for the territory breach from two weeks ago. I assume — yes. How much for those dogs to eat my partner?"

Fingers knotted through the fence, shaking it with viciousness, Chuuya cried out: "I'll get you out, gorgeous! Do you hear me?" The closest dog attempted to bite his middle finger off. "I'll kill everyone in this damn place, I will!"

He shone crimson.

The crowd gasped — the woman extracted a gun, gaping when Dazai jumped to the floor, disgracefully punching it out of her grasp.

"We didn't do shit," she growled, but caution littered every inch of her frame, her hands raised. He didn't quite have the presence of mind to verify if she had recognized them before that little show; the eyes tracing his bandages, though, were unmistakable. "We want no trouble with the Port Mafia. We don't know anything about the Ballerinas — Just that they're causing this mess."

He leaned the barrel of the gun to the wall, abandoning all his weight on it. It didn't quite work; with the next roar of the crowd and curse out of Chuuya's mouth, he slipped.

"How about the transports you stole?" he said, half smushed against the stone, "And that little shootout near Yamashita Park? And the fact that you're fucking your Boss' sister —"

Three of the six guards who had subtly been watching the woman's back stepped forward at the mere stiffening of her shoulders. Dazai pointed the gun to her face, unamused and unbalanced — and rather unsure of the reason for both those things.

Then, “Chuuya, this is boring —“

The sound of metal tearing apart arose a terrified wave of screams from the crowd. Barking and growling and the echo of fear in his own bones — the Hound woman’s eyes had barely time to widen, before the quartet of fighting dogs set their unforgiving gazes on her.

A savage grin of sorts broke Chuuya’s face in two, as the crowd walked all over each other. Stalking to the woman, uncaring of the shoulders bumping against his, he drawled: “Now,” and stepped on the wrist of a gravity-crushed guard.

Empty-handed and neon-visioned, they abandoned the alley and its wet-squelching gnarls, stumbling back to the dented police car as one of the dogs jumped on her.

For good measure, they turned on the lights.

Next came Hirose’s I Heard You Talk About Me, since Dazai’s uncoordinated fingers had managed to remove the car’s microchip from the Station’s GPS.

While the Mafia held control over 80% of the clubs in Yokohama, more than a half of them — for the sake of good relations, Mori would say, with a smile — were considered neutral territory, and were freely swarmed by high and low names from all over the underground.

“Good relations, ” Dazai stuttered, leaning heavily into Chuuya’s side, as they stumbled down the entrance of some bar downtown. Bright lights in every color his eyes could not withstand flashed against his skull. “We need to keep — good relations. Chuuya, there’s karaoke —“

Some bouncer at the entrance of the VIP section got ready to tense his arms, the closer they tottered to the curtains — until the lights hit just right, and he took a good look at their faces.

His spine snapped up.

“Executive Dazai,” He bowed deeply. “Vice-Executive Nakahara. Welcome to the —“

“Bless you,” the boy sniffed, “My friend. Chuuya’s fine.”

“You didn’t reserve a box —“ the man muttered, as he scrolled down the list in his hands. Hesitant glances were sent to their silhouettes, unapologetically stepping on each other’s feet. A cough. “That’s fine, of course. We’ll free something for you immediately. Please, go in.”

“Thanks!” Dazai nodded, sternly, “I’ll dedicate a song to you at the karaoke machine.”

Had his brain been able to connect information more swiftly, the wave of silence that seemed to drool down the walls of the interior — claggy and colder than the corrupted season; unimportant , in the grand scheme of things, when framed by the dancing bodies and bright drinks; the rush of money on the counter and the ash of every man in that room and their hidden gun — might have ripped a smile off his face.

Devotees to saints, he thought. And then — prisoners to the executioner.

Given the circumstances, they easily mingled with the crowd, not quite dancing and not quite hearing their own conversation over the thunder of the music.

“Ballerinas?” a member of the Spiders asked, both his hands where they could see it, eyes settled on the knife Chuuya had begun playing with after the karaoke machine had been declared occupied. “No one in the city is daring enough to not just — sit and watch where this is going. The underground swears trying to frame the Mafia will get them killed.”

Dazai snapped his tongue against the roof of his mouth. Three of the four couches had been freed, no matter if their bodies had casually spread out at the center of only one of them — the small circle of Spiders had reunited around their self-elected Boss.

Three traitors, his mind informed him, as he settled on his heels. And she’s in line for the karaoke.

“I’m not asking where your loyalties lie,” he managed to say. “I’m asking if you have any information on the whereabouts of two of them specifically.”

A scoff. “We don’t look for whispers that will only bring us trouble. We’re not about to fuck ourselves up, kids.”

Chuuya paused his fidgeting. Tip of the blade pointed towards the man and his entourage, he curled an eyebrow.

The Boss straightened.

Then, he cleared his voice. “We have nothing to withhold,” he promised, tone painfully more respectful. “And nothing to gain. The unplanned season has ruined many of our deals. We could promise assistance in — investigating. At the right price.”

Dazai’s lips quivered. Some of the armed men behind the speaker physically recoiled.

At the edge of the room, right behind a naked woman curling around a shimmering pole, the karaoke room line lost another client.

“The right price,” he echoed.

“The Government is involved,” the man insisted, eyes still stuck to the blade. Two of his lackeys kept their gazes on Dazai, though; a smart enough move. It’s not polite to keep your gun where everyone can see it, Mori would have said, hands on both of their shoulders, never teaching and never not. “We won’t put our necks out with nothing to gain.”

“No, I think you will,” Dazai replied.

His next scoff was more guarded. “I have no care for threats,” he swore. “Double Black or not Double Black — attacking another syndicate unprovoked is no gain. Not right now. Your Boss will have your heads.”

“I think our Boss knows about our gains more than you will ever do, asshole,” Chuuya intervened. “And I think it would do you better than to think we have time to waste with threats.”

“Warnings,” Dazai picked up, seamlessly, “I think you should call them.”

“Warnings?” the man bared his teeth. His two lackeys reached forward, only shy of touching him.

“Somewhat,” he nodded, absorbed. The lights were starting to give him a headache; It was all terribly funny. It was all terribly bright. “The Port Mafia has never paid for information before. It surely won’t start now. No sensible man would ever pay for what it’s already his.”

“It hasn’t,” he continued, before someone could add anything, leaning clammy palms on the table between their couches, “I’m rather good at my job — and my partner here hates small talk. He can make your windpipe one with that dirty thing in your spine you will probably call bravery, when you tell the story to your little lackeys. I’ve seen the inside of most throats of the underground, and let me tell you — Yours is no different. Just less bloodied, as of now.”

The man paled. “You — You dare —“

“See,” Dazai sighed, “Most people want to live. I don’t get it either, but it’s irrelevant,” He tilted his head to the side. “Do you?”

If asked later, he wouldn’t be able to pinpoint who had started the fight.

Perhaps a drunken Spider had gotten tired of waiting out on that tension; perhaps the karaoke queue had freed, and Chuuya had gotten his priorities straight. Face pressed against the glass of the counter, Dazai couldn’t say he cared much for it — he smashed a Jack Daniels in the man’s face, and stuck the broken neck of it between his legs.

Eventually, he starfished on the sweaty ground, watching Chuuya slam Spiders into tables and over neon chandeliers with the glee of a child.

By the time the bouncers arrived, they had slipped away from the VIP area. The karaoke room there was, blessedly, free. Given the Hirose Fumiko catalogue, they got distracted.

“You crank up the echo —” Dazai groaned, face on the ground, as Chuuya jumped on his back to the rhythm of Night and Day, “— so high! Your voice is in my skull!”

Hours passed in a blur.

The Red Set had nothing to offer but stutters and bows and whispers about a god — they ended up stealing a good number of the briefcases in the secret warehouse base they had erupted in, spreading the money through the wind as they raced down the outskirts.

“See, Matsuda,” Chuuya screamed into the radio, “Helping out the poor and stuff!”

The Sword of Shadow only admitted to having met Kawabata after Chuuya dug the heel of his shoe through the skull of their boss’ second hand in command. They had offered information on a woman who might have known how to get him inside the Mafia.

The Three of Spades brought them to another bar; but apart from betting a jump in the pot on who would manage to steal more sips out of their Boss' drink while she was distracted —

[“Concerning the rationale I spoke of earlier and how it manifests itself in the world,” Chuuya begun rambling, at one point, only to keep her eyes on him, “One’s thoughts are, at their core, composed of what we see, what surprises us —” Dazai sipped under the table, landing some of the drink the boy’s shoes, “— and how we regulate and control these surprises in a natural manner.”

“But these thoughts are mere formulations within our minds — so the social animal we call a human can only take these abstract formulations and reform them into words that encapsulate them and give them life,” Dazai confirmed, leaning on his elbows on the table, face brushing with the woman’s speechless own, “Which means it is precisely because we express our individualities as social animals in this way that the world is so awash in anachronisms —”]

— and having to crush her entourage to the ground when they pointed all their rifles at them, they gained nothing.

Eventually, window shops accidentally destroyed and several festival stands turned upside down by the unsteady police car, Chuuya started driving with his door open, one leg outstretched to crash into every street lamp they encountered.

The peace wasn't long lasting — the Blood Heretics, did not take well to the invasion of their territory.

The sight of the police car scared the group of gamblers with almost too-efficient emergency; the moment Dazai leaned out of his window, and slobbered, “Has any of you gentlemen seen a former prostitute and her icy lover, or were you too busy trying to find a way inside the Port Mafia’s secret vault?” — their men jumped into the first free cars, and raised their rifles.

“You always have a fucking way with words, don’t you?” Chuuya screamed, dashing up and down the suburbs.

When the bullets began to tear holes in the back windshield, the haze in his mind subdued, then grew again, then —

“Get off the roof!” Chuuya shouted, doing his best to pull him back into the car by the window. “Boss will kill me if you break your fish neck, get off the roof right now —“

Confidently and uncoordinatedly kneeling behind the police lights, Dazai looked into the sight of the rifle, uncaring of the swerving of that untrustable floor — and sunk a quick sequence of bullets between one of the three drivers’ eyes.

The two cars exploded.

He saw it in a blurred corner of his gaze, tumbling down the concrete until his hands bled, watching their police car do an impossible turn on the now two punctured wheels.

It was a matter of mere, blinding seconds: the last car of the Heretics had already sped up to the limit, and had no time to attempt to step on the brake — the collision was only faintly louder than the fireworks filling up the sky, as both cars blew up in a column of vibrant gold.

Chuuya's polished shoes landed on the roof of a nearby parked car, cracking it. Hands in his pockets and body crunched down, he sent a wild grin in Dazai's direction.

"Well?" he asked. "What next?"

Dazai started laughing.

It wasn't quite a controlled reaction — he rolled through the abandoned pieces of cars spreading along to the dying fire, stomach hurting and nose sagged with the smell of smoke. The ship parade was right under the overpass they were on. Firemen in traditional clothing were climbing up a pretend-drowning ship, littered in fallen snow — bowing to the cheers of the amazed crowd.

"I'm gonna drown myself," he declared.

Chuuya nodded, like it was reasonable. His next jump landed him right next to him. "Let's check if the Ballerinas are at the shaved ice stand, first."

The idea tore a giggle out of him.

He didn't quite know how they walked there; didn't know if the explosion died down — if Chuuya was the shoulder knocking against his own as they stumbled forward or the stain of scarlet doing cartwheels at the edge of his vision. The crowd engulfed them before his eyes could catch up.

The hems of the colorful kimonos were deep in the calf-high snow; the women had no posture, the men no reservations about wrapping around them and spinning. He thought he heard someone laugh.

People being people, Odasaku had told him, once. Dazai couldn't quite remember what his question had been. What do you want to write about, maybe. Why am I here, why do I breathe, why don't they say my name?

He grasped Chuuya's gloved hand. His lips had been blue — when? He couldn't recall. "Let's see what you learned."

He hiccuped: "Not again —"

There were fireworks in the sky. He tilted his head to watch them, uncaring of stepping on his feet as they danced — knowing that he wouldn't, because manners were beaten and manners were learned. He didn't know if they fought for the lead; his hands were on the creases of Chuuya's coat, and then the scratchy fabric of his vest — and then the velvet of his gloves, the pulsing skin of his wrists, the hat he stole and wore, the hair he pulled, the fingers pushing his face away when he crashed his forehead against his and inhaled.

They twirled and stumbled. He didn't know the song, and his feet kept sinking into the snow and then dragging, and Dazai could have cried, he thought, could have screamed and could have never spoken again.

"If you slip, I'm not catching you," Chuuya warned him, half a growl and half an unwanted snort, as he did his best to dip him.

"Some trust in your partner," Dazai spat back, rising to cling to his shoulders again.

"In the next," A hiccup, "Lifetime."

"I'll calculate the landing," he swore, "You weigh less than a paperclip. A dog-shaped one. Microscopes all around the world are cursing your birth — you showed the need for technological development."

Chuuya squinted, lost. His eyes were glazed; his cheeks red and his lips bitten to blood. "I genuinely didn't get a word."

"Unsurprising. I'll get it for you."

"Fuckin' right you will," he drawled, feet slipping on an ice sheet. "We're in this goddamn mess because of you."

His head tilted back and back, until his neck creaked. "What mess?"

"I can taste colors —"

"That's just your design flaw."

"That's so funny," Chuuya swore, delirious and a bit desperate. "That's so fucking funny and I don't know why."

His bones sang. Mori said something; Odasaku said something else. He mused he should have worn more bandages; hidden his eyes until there was nothing for Chuuya too look into — no glint of hunger to anchor that needy loyalty of his to — because he had learned where Dazai was less knocked on, and had broken his knuckles over it in an effort to learn words that would have an effect on him.

Mori said something about that.

He always did — and then Chuuya threw his head back in hilarity when he began to chant one-two-three-and-one-two-three in Mori's voice and he laughed, and Dazai —

A woman's corpse landed on the concrete of the quay, mere feet from their dancing steps — and Dazai tried, tried to recall a single piece of dialogue she had recited in the Gentleman's Bank ballroom; but couldn't — cracking on impact.

One day before.

They split up, at some point between the ambulances and the police cars. Chuuya stumbled towards the cemetery — towards any place, but he knew. Dazai, haunted and habitual like a curse, dragged himself at Odasaku's door.

It was locked, though — and breaking in seemed mean. He sat on his porch and spread his legs on the floor, and he thought about the last conversation they had had at Bar Lupin, the three of them — what does smartly shaped even mean, in the context of a woman?

He thought about knocking.

Too proud, he considered. Maybe dragging his nails down the door, wailing like an abandoned stray; maybe whining like a child some rifle had left in a pool of his parents' blood — maybe ringing the doorbell and offering a drink.

But Dazai hated dogs and was no orphan and wasn't quite brave enough to ask for more than what he was given. No one could blame him for losing what he had not taken.

Elise stole jewels from every woman she watched get executed. Then, she assigned one of them to all of her favorites. Dazai's necklace was golden and tight around the neck; its jewel black. At least you could give me a color, he hadn't said, because Mori hated it when he was mean to her. But the next time she had whined about him not playing with her, he had told her — you're not even real.

The heaters activated. The system over Odasaku's door buzzed and rumbled. He thought of the man's careful eyes, watching Dazai do tricks with the cards that were the one thing he couldn't understand about him.

He wondered what he would say at his funeral.

He climbed to his feet. Laid a hand on the doorknob and didn't pull; thought the man had probably heard it anyway. You're my friend, too, he would say, one day, because Mori had said he had to work on knowing more than his interlocutors, and there was no time, there was never enough time. You're my friend, you're my friend.

The door to Chuuya's first apartment opened with a single kick.

The boy's — nearly satirical — WORKS IN PROCESS sign was still stuck on it, forgotten and blurred. Albatross' apartment was still above them, and still empty. Sheets covered every wall and every piece of furniture; faded lines of highlighters and criminals' sheets were still printed on the ceiling; the two knife-carved lines of their heights slept next to the doorframe.

He thought he smelled blood — he knew there wasn't any. Just grief.

Odasaku's door. Mori's clinic; the bed he had given to him. The actress' corpse on the floor, and the look her burned features had worn. The letter in the Director's office. The old gunpowder stuck to his hands; the calluses from holding a gun. Chuuya's file, somewhere in the Archives. Dazai hadn't even read it.

Inhuman, he thought. She'd told him. You don't know how to be anything else.

The click of a camera.

He blinked, watching Chuuya dangle the developing picture with distracted motions.

When it unblurred, he snorted. How are you here, he wanted to ask — he didn't. "I'm printing a thousand copies of this," he swore.

Dazai's tongue was marble. The boy barked at him to remove his shoes, and he did, probably — his socks were still soaked in melted snow, and the floor was unbearably cold underneath them. Chuuya floated around — skipped and cursed as he fell and walked all over the walls, fixing the invisible but never taking the sheets off.

Halved, he recalled, locking the bathroom door. Halved.

He unbuttoned his shirt. It was too hot, at last; maybe they had truly solved the problem. It fell — his pants followed, and then those damned socks, and air came from a slot in the door, cold on his skin and gentle on his bones.

He took off his bandages, and they landed on the floor right as fireworks lit up the sky from behind the window.

Halved, he thought, because unseen, halved because Mori had said so — because Odasaku's door had been locked and he had woken up that morning and he'd wanted to die — wanted to be less seventeen and more of a killer and an organism — whichever would make him bleed faster.

Bleed, he thought. Double Black missions always went too well. Chuuya's arm was always outstretched. His hand on his nape, pulling him along, baring his teeth in the face of any and all that might just be merciful enough, and he hated him, at last, hated him truly, easily, the easiest thing he had ever done —

A hand knocking on the door. "Don't you dare use all the warm water," Chuuya called.

[“I don't want you to die,” Odasaku said, once. It was either a reassurance or new information; it seemed obvious, when Dazai stopped and thought about it, flipping a collection coin he had stolen from Ango's coat.

“Of course,” he conceded. “But it happens anyway, doesn't it?”

“From what I've seen, yes.”

He sighed. “Isn’t life such a wonder?”

Odasaku tilted his head to the side. “Not quite,” he replied. “If it was, there would be no good reason to lose it.

“Is there?”

“I assume,” he shrugged. “Isn’t it kind of sad, otherwise?”]

The ground was ice.

“I’m not looking,” Chuuya promised, in that honest way of his, between aching clenched teeth and misplaced understanding. There was a sound — a tear-and-snap, familiar; the smell of antiseptics and of rust, the feeling of watching his body from the outside. “Hell fucking curse you — I’m not looking.”

Dazai opened his mouth. There was a hum in the boy’s tone — the usual, but more frantic; as if hurrying through it would slow down the world.

He thought about opening his mouth — nothing seemed to change. His throat was on fire and his skin was freezing; the floor was stickier than drool. Water was being sucked in somewhere near; he recalled floating in waves less deep than he would have needed, and —

Chuuyas was wrapping bandages around him.

“Got,” he was mumbling, still, and if Dazai could have raised his head a bit he would have seen the top of his, red hair and sweat, hands working. Would have seen vapor on the walls, the fogged up mirror — the result of hasty splashes, he assumed; hands dragging his body out of the filled tub. “Got my damn eyes on it, but I’m not looking.”

“That’s not humanly possible,” he informed him, helpful until his last breath.

“Humanity is the last of my concerns,” Chuuya snapped, and his hands stayed gentle, stayed wrapping — they clenched around his cheeks, and his vision was all freckles, suddenly, all unmatching eyes and strands of hair, beautiful in the way that everything had to be, at the end. “Stop shaking.”

He attempted. Courteously, because it was nice of him to dirty those tacky clothes of his he oh — so liked. “I can’t,” he let him know. “Sorry,” he added, belatedly. He bit his tongue as he did it; his teeth were chattering. “You are.”

“I’m what?”

Rationality, amongst the delirium. Human. Some things were like the sun in the sky — a given. “What are you doing here?”

“Shut up,” The hands left, which wasn’t nice, not nice at all — the sound of a shower head, then, water drops on ceramic, and that hissing quality the pipes of that apartment had always had. “Hey. Eyes open.”

“Only have one,” he reminded him, vague. The ceiling was a thousand miles away; his shoulder blades were freezing. “I think. Chuuya.”

“Present.”

“I don’t,” The sound of his hands around him had stopped. Every inch of him was buzzing. “What are you doing? Chuuya.”

He undressed, jaw clenched. He saw him sink his teeth on the tips of his gloves, to remove those too; he felt resentful, for a moment — either of the sting of teeth, or of the squelch with which they landed on the floor — or of him. He heard his steps and stared at the ceiling, and didn’t quite know how to ask him not to leave.

“Oh,” he noted, surprised, when he felt arms shift under his armpits. “You’re here.”

“I don’t live here anymore,” Chuuya reminded him, and shouldered all of his weight, groaning under the ephemeral attempts of his heels to touch the ground. The curve of Dazai’s feet on the tiles was painful. “They’ll have my head if I leave a corpse on the floor.”

“Yes,” Dazai nodded, because that made sense. The boy’s hands were spread between his shoulder blades, dragging him into the shower on ever-so stable steps, and he thought that made less sense. “Why are you touching me?”

“Because you swallowed your own bones, idiot,” he reminded him. Ceramic under his heels; the shower rained down on his head and got stuck in his eyelids — he thought of Chuuya’s fingers, cupping warm water and pouring it down, and wondered if he could ask him to do the same to him. “I’d leave,” He said, and that, too, made sense; if I could, “I’m not watching.”

“I know you aren’t.”

“Good,” Good, he thought, brilliantly, that was good. People didn’t like touching Dazai. They wouldn’t have even if he hadn’t taken something away whenever they did it. Chuuya let go of his shoulders, tentatively, but not quite disgusted, which was new, and said: “Give me your arms.”

“They’re mine,” he replied. But the request seemed reasonable enough, so he offered them, good, very good — fell. “Sorry.”

“Hey,” Chuuya cursed, slipping on wet tiles, grasping at him the moment his legs gave out. “Hey. Fuck — Hey,” Dazai knees went to the floor, and then they were pulled up again, and Mori had colors for these kind of situations, for the valleys of skin that were red and the ones that were baby blue, “Dazai, hey,” and Chuuya’s hands trying to be keep him up, Dazai’s fingers leaving dentures on the scarred mosaics of his back.

“Sorry,” he attempted, his nose landing painfully on that old building-shaped scar on the boy’s shoulder, his own spine bumping against the cold walls, “I can’t,” he tried, throat dry, eyes pulsing, “You said—“

He slipped again — hurt his elbow on a rack, no shampoos or anchors, and Chuuya's arm tightened painfully across his back, fingers carving his ribs, "Shh," he hushed, almost coarse, and his free hand pushed drenched hair off his eyelashes — which was nice and good and unnecessary, but it plastered his clammy forehead on the boy's cooler one.

"Come on, I'm —" It let him watch water drops land on his lips much more closely, chapped and pursued, and he thought about killing him, right there, "— here, I'm —" with the nails he had stuck on his spine, but that would have been a child's whim and a wasted investment, and Mori had taught him better, hold it until there is nothing left to grasp onto, "Dazai. Hey."

He started laughing.

His hollow chest couldn't take it — neither could his throat, scratched to raw skin, the water rushing over them, good — he hadn't even meant to, would have stopped if he had had enough mind to remind himself that not breathing hurt, and pain wasn't worth it.

You're naked, he told himself, helpfully. That seemed important. Air was breathing over portions of skin he had carefully sealed away; and Chuuya wasn't looking, which was nice and was good and confusing, just like him — the Mafia's most loyal and the Mafia's most dangerous; Dazai's least and most chess piece of all of them.

"You're my partner," he mocked, mean, just in case Chuuya was being mean, too — but not too much, just in case he wasn't. Unprovoked meanness was a tell, and Dazai had none of those, too much, none, and Chuuya knew them all, "You should know me."

Through the curtains of water, his eyes hardened.

Good, he thought, and nice. "Fuck you," Chuuya said, and he was still holding him, had not even noticed; had known it would happen from the bleeding gash on his side underneath a cave facing the sea, because Dazai had brought him in, dragged him from martyrdom to a glorified cancer, and no dog would ever forget, "I do know you."

His mouth wrecked itself in a grin. Dazai thought about biting him, five seconds older and six times meaner. "Do you?"

He searched his eyes, both uncovered and both a bit useless, as if he could burn his truth into them. "I know you."

"I'm sure you believe so."

"Better than you think," Chuuya challenged, chin up, like his blood wasn't trailing down both their bodies. Nothing between them had ever managed not to be a tug o'war, and Dazai had rope burns on his hands to prove it, had his heartbeat memorized. "Better than I care for."

Stupid, he thought, amazed, stupid, you're so stupid. He laughed about it, maybe; or maybe his throat hurt just because. Stupid, you're so stupid.

"Look at them," he dared.

"No."

“Touching them is fine, but looking isn’t?”

“I’m not touching them,” the boy replied, stubborn, and manouvered him around, until his hands were on his ribs only — ticklish, barely enough to keep him standing.

“At least buy me dinner first,” he complained, sharp and empty, and the other didn’t lower his gaze; said: “I always buy you dinner.” His breath smelled of wine, just faintly, because Mori hated smoking — so Chuuya drowned his sorrows in revered water and new friends’ still beating hearts, and Dazai drowned him in his own.

“Look at them.”

“You can’t use me,” he snapped, not quite as unkind as he had probably wanted to, “Find you a sadist.”

Dazai waited. The thud of the shower was distant and close. “Look at them.”

Chuuya set his jaw. “Tell me to.”

He searched. Pitied what he found, but not really; pity and envy and confusion, nice and good and deadly. “Look at me,” he murmured.

His eyes fell on his skin.

No thunder and no gasping crowds; Dazai hadn’t been expecting them, but he thought his hollow bones might have. Empty they remained; they moved, questioning, and settled again, and he breathed out. Dazai could have laughed, that voice of deliriousness in his brain suggested — he could have screamed, just for the fun of it. Chuuya wouldn’t remember a thing in the morning.

His gaze roamed down candid lines, pinker at the edges, laying on a necessarily-paler layer of skin. They were a collar around his throat; then mazes of symbols down his arms, and occasional hills where his calves began. Rope burns and faded kanjis and surgical lines and his own fingers. Quiet.

He grabbed Chuuya’s wrists, rough and aimless, and settled his palms on the marred fields of his neck.

“Coward,” he said, easily.

Chuuya’s eyes hardened.

He snapped his teeth shut; set his shoulders in that way — the one that meant that if he didn’t get angry, he wouldn’t know what else to do with him. All at once, he spread his fingers across his throat, covering every inch of it; thumbs digging into the pulse point at the dead center of it.

Dazai stared back. Imperceptibly, he exhaled.

A switch was turned off — Chuuya's shoulders fell, and lips parted, and his hands grew magnetic. Nails down the furrows of older scars — digits fitting around the rope burns on his neck — fingertips running up and down the lines on his arms, turning them around, dragging them closer, pressing on it until the skin turned white.

He knew touch meant silence; he could see it in the overly relaxed and endlessly tense line of his shoulders, the fear of a void he didn't know and longed for. Touch meant silence, and he let him, even as the shower turned off, and nothing but the ricochet of drops and their stuttered breathing remained.

"There are words," Chuuya said, at some point.

His nails were carving a specific furrow down his left arm, holding it tightly, all business. Looking was a different kind of touch. "Yes," he confirmed, blinking at the redundancy.

His clear pause was filled with expectancy. His thumb ran down the carved kanjis like it could wipe them away — it was the softer touch he could recall, and he didn't quite understand, and Mori wasn't around, so Dazai said, "I don't understand."

"Did you do it?"

"No," he answered, honestly, because yes or no was always easier. "Why would I?"

Chuuya didn't quite glance at him, but almost. "Why words?" he insisted.

"She never ran out of paper," Dazai said. His flesh was amnesiac, and the memory of touch was nauseating or an obsession. "She thought I would understand, if I saw it from up close."

The boy stilled, again — as much as either of them could, bodies rattled by involuntary shivers, standing soaked in the unfavorable air of that bathroom. He felt the urge to blow air into one of his eyes, to see him blink — he did.

"What," Chuuya said, untouched and yet gripping, "What, 'cause of the reading thing?"

He thought about it. "Not just that. Different kind of understanding."

"Bullshit."

"How judgemental."

"Of bullshit?" His hands, bruised and calloused, dropped his arm. One of his thumbs rubbed at the corner of his lips; he wondered if the lipstick stain lingered. "Always."

Then, he asked: "Paper from the Book?"

"Chuuya," Dazai chirped. "Hush."

A flash of fury flared. He didn't let it reach the sky; join the fireworks he could hear, distantly, somewhere behind those sheeted walls, outside his rotting skin. He dropped to the ground, as polite as the draining water under his uncomfortably soaked boxers would let him — and he could have grinned when Chuuya mirrored him, slowly, but didn't.

"It's just scars," he reminded him.

"You hate pain."

"I do."

"I don't," get it, Chuuya almost insisted, but seemed to think better of it. Intermittently intuitive, Dazai had described him as, once, to Mori's interested hands. He was naked and he had to make him pay for it, somehow. Not entirely un-cruelly, then, he asked, "Why do you hate when people call you Nakahara?"

His own adored devil in a white lab coat, he would have guessed — but Chuuya had been kicking honorifics away since the very first moment.

A huff. "I'm Chuuya."

"Nakahara Chuuya."

"Etiquette is aristocratic nonsense," he insisted — with sports cars and penthouses and foreign accounts to his name; and the tilt of his vowels that felt like the Suribachi sun. "In Suribachi, you were lucky if the city didn't know you as Fat Butt Katsuki. How are you meant to decide who's worthy of calling you what, anyway?"

"Average societal expectations," Dazai offered. His head was still heavy. "Desire to spite. Lack of shame. The short joy of having snotty adults kiss your shoes."

"First names are fine," A pause. A glance at his scars; his fingers spread, again, and it was almost gentle. "Might not even be mine, anyway."

"You licked all the slices," he said. "It's yours."

"There were no slices to lick," Chuuya rolled his eyes. "Only a brat melting in my arms."

You're alive, he wanted to say, but it would have made his face look puzzled, he knew, and that was too much honesty. You're alive and you're breathing and you're eating and you're loved.

"Did that hurt?" Dazai asked.

He glanced up. Met his eyes; disliked, clearly, what he saw as he roamed through them. "A part of me," Chuuya said, endlessly, as if he could spell it out forever and never have to hear the end of it. Dazai hadn't seen his clone. He couldn't quite imagine it. "Was relieved when I saw him die."

"Why?"

"Don't buy a casket until you see the corpse," he parroted. "Mori's words."

“Always one for economizing.”

“For blood, too.”

“You had to be sure,” Dazai pressured — because sometimes being a bundle of unanswered questions was safe, and sometimes it was entertaining to watch them all scramble for his clues. “Had to see it happen. Do it yourself, even. Or you’d never believe it.”

Chuuya’s lips parted.

“Oh,” he said.

That red-rimmed disgust that had been a constant, since the sun of Suribachi — he watched it straighten his shoulders and pull his lips down, as he rewarded Dazai with that sharp difference between them no one could quite describe.

“That’s bullshit,” he decided.

“You would think so,” Dazai conceded.

“With that fucking scrawny ass you have,” Chuuya insisted, pupils still blown and lips still curling, like the urge to laugh and start a war was still there, behind his teeth. “You should find the strenght to stand up and look the fuck around. Dead bodies don’t bleed.”

“Yes,” he confirmed, “They don’t.”

“So?”

“So,” Dazai continued, “You should become a seaside Gramps, just out of spite.”

Water drops fell from the rusty shower head. Chuuya stared. “What?”

“You could fish crabs and mackerels. Tip your hat to old ladies. Bark at the waves.”

An overwhelming amount of answers seemed ready to flow down; all that he managed to mumble was: “You don’t get to be there.”

“That’s mean.”

“You’ll act like a child even at eighty,” Chuuya made a face — something between terror and damnation. “Try to push grenades into old women’s purses with your cane. Break your fake femur in an effort to kneel and propose double suicide to some poor woman.”

Dazai scoffed. “Have some faith in my fake femur.”

“You’ll probably grow deaf, and refuse to wear shit for it — so you can make people repeat the same thing thirty times,” he continued, undeterred, and Dazai laid his nape on the cold edge of the tub and closed his eyes. “And you’ll be old and wrinkly and you’ll stink, and lazy like a mule, and I’ll have to cut your nails even with my fake femur.”

“Oh,” He wanted to smile; reprimand him, the way Mori did when he was particularly hopeful — particularly blind. “You have a fake femur too?”

“I’m old. Don’t they all do?”

“If you think names are stupid,” he asked. “Why do you call me Dazai?”

Chuuya’s eyebrow curled. “What,” he said, half a chuckle and half the voice that got mesmerized subordinates to stare, “Want me to call you,” A hiccup, “Fuckin’ ‘Samu?’ ”

He snorted, not truly affected and not truly haunted. The other boy did too, until his body swayed to the side — then forward, cheek on the tiles, by the bruises blooming on Dazai’s knees from his failed attempts at standing.

Dazai planted his chin on the edge of his rib. He looked down at his flushed face, hazed and revolting and familiar — pressed his lips on the bone and said, very quiet: “Shuuji.”

A frown. Two fingers pinched his chin. “Who the hell is Shuuji?”

A flower shaped firework bloomed right in the center of the window.

His blood on the floor. Mori’s hands on his shoulders. Odasaku’s door. The snow ground, outside. The woman’s eyes, lifeless, pointed at him. His body, bare and watched. Touching is an act of violence, Mori would say — but then again, so is living.

Abruptly, the pieces fell together.

“Chuuya,” he said, blinking. “We need to get arrested.”

---

...

---

“You,” was the snarl out of Ace’s mouth, the moment they walked through the doors of the meeting room, “Oh, you two, I will end you —“

“Chuuya?” Kouyou breathed out, urgently, scratching the floor with her seat to stand — a sight as rare as the end of the world. Worry morphed into confusion — morphed into an ire so blatantly deadly Dazai felt the need to take a step back. “Where in God’s name have you two —“

“Respectfully, Ane-san,” Dazai interrupted, making a beeline for his seat. He slammed the envelope Matsuda had given them on the table; Chuuya grabbed the nearest paperweight and threw it to the door, its reddish light allowing it to slam it shut. He crashed his hand on the button to lower the walls of the windows. “Can we move the calligraphy hours to after we keep the Ballerinas from unleashing the Special Division on us?”

Her eyes widened.

Mori’s smiled. “Wonderful to have you back, boys.”

“Same here, Boss,” Chuuya assured, with a half bow. He had certainly smelled the threat lining his every vowel; because Dazai was a bad influence, he did his best to pretend he hadn’t. “Where did you put our supposed decapitated heads? I’d like to use Dazai’s as a centerpiece.”

“Elise asked to put them up in her room,” the man explained. “What’s this about the Special Division, then?”

Dazai offered them the crumpled up piece of paper. In the midst of their barely contained perplexity, he spread out the photographs he had taken on the table, connecting their most blurred edges by trial and error. Chuuya pointedly refused to meet Kouyou’s gaze — the longer her own lingered on the less than ideal situations pictured on paper.

“I thought you’d said Komako had been dealt with,” Ace said, eventually. “And Shimamura — our intel wasn’t even able to confirm if he was the glacial Ability User. What does the Special Division have to do with it?”

“You disappear for two days,” Kouyou highlighted, “With no memory of it, if Hirotsu’s word is to be trusted — and reappear out of nowhere with unexplained information?”

“We were drugged,” Chuuya hissed. “All thanks to this bastard right here.”

“Toxic substances from the West. I threw up at least three times on the way here,” Dazai swore. He turned to him. “What the hell do you mean thanks to me?”

“You mean to tell me someone got a needle in you?”

“It was —” A blush of sorts spread through the boy’s cheeks; he stomped his feet, “It was in the bread, alright? This stupid bread at the stupid ball — It was an accident, and — We solved this thing, anyway, so —“

“How did you get arrested the second time, anyway?” Mori asked, conversationally.

“It’s a bit blurry,” Dazai admitted. He fixed the last of the photographs in place — then began to turn them around, face down. “I think — I needed us to get to the station. Check on their archives for survivors from the fire near Yuzawa. Komako was there. I climbed the Ferris Wheel.”

“No, your ass tried to jump from the Ferris Wheel,” Chuuya replied. He squinted, rubbing his forehead. “And then — You made me stick you into a toy crane? I think you had someone at gun-point. No. Was that before? Did I try to throw the Ferris Wheel into the Bay?”

Kouyou stared. “Again?”

“Tried to!”

“Questions are pointless,” Dazai informed. “We don’t remember anything,” At his side, Chuuya twitched; he stored that information for later. “You can torture it out of us, maybe, Ane-san. For now,” He leaned back, studying his handiwork. “I think you might be interested in just who the mysterious aider of Ballerinas is.”

Dried drops of blood — the result of a cut from Dazai’s own teeth to his fingers, he assumed; his hazed mind’s last resort to call his attention on something it had noticed on Standard Island — stained the back of every picture.

Once joined, a shaky outline appeared — a cartoon-like design of a rat’s head, hollow eyes and big ears taking up most of its shape.

At once, it was silence.

“The Rats in the House of Dead,” Mori recited. His grin had subdued, at last; when he stood and leaned over the table, all that his eyes had place for was a cunning taste for strategy. “They’re among the blacklisted syndicates from the Order of the Clock Tower,” He glanced at Dazai. “Why?”

“The Gentlemen Bank,” he said, “Did you sign and send the contract? I must have forwarded it to you.”

“I did.”

“I had to modify it,” he added. “They were trying to grant themselves access to our Ability Archives. They had assassins in the room for Chuuya and I. They had two performers on stage, purely to spy on us,” He tapped his fingers. “It was Yoko and Shimamura.”

“What?” Kouyou demanded. “How do you know?”

“Yoko jumped off one of the rescue ships at the festival,” Chuuya intervened. “I can’t really — I saw her face. I remember that. Thing is — the ships weren’t on fire. The demonstrations are only climbing shows.”

“Director Winston was trying to manipulate both of her supposed allies,” Dazai explained. “She promised the Ballerinas she would help them gain access to our Archive, presumably to sell us to the Special Division. At the same time, she asked us to get rid of Shimamura and Yoko — Thinking she would get to be the one to sell us out, at that point.”

“The Special Division would probably feel indebted enough to join the Bank,” Ace muttered, stealing the paper from Kouyou’s hands. “The French Special Division is already their client. Having two of them would grant them even more influence than they need.”

“But the Director wasn’t acting alone,” Dazai nodded towards the pictures. “I saw a letter in her office. It had the Rats’ symbol. They’re the ones who want us busy and surrounded.”

“With no Ability Permit, the Division could act on most of our properties, if they discovered we are using even a single Ability User,” Mori agreed. He reached forward, stealing one of the pictures; Dazai saw Chuuya’s vague outline, head thrown back in laughter. “We have good support from the Government, but even they have to be mindful of the Division. If they got the Hunting Dogs involved...”

Chuuya tightened his lips.

Kouyou met his eyes. Two fingers under her chin.

He set his jaw; straightened. “The ship caught fire because of Komako,” he said. “It was her power. Those flames weren’t natural. I don’t know if she pushed Yoko — she did seem to harbor hostility. She said her love for Shimamura is what brought this winter.”

“But you drowned Komako,” Ace insisted.

“Kawabata made sure she wouldn’t die.”

All eyes turned on Dazai.

“You put a bullet in that spy’s head,” Mori said.

“I did,” he confirmed. “And he used his own life as the bargaining chip to use his Ability on someone else. Our Intel had no knowledge about this possibility — we thought it would only work on Kawabata himself.”

“Wasn’t Sakaguchi tasked with his examination?” Kouyou intervened, surprised. “He’s the best of the team.”

“It was well-concealed,” Dazai replied — perhaps just a tad too defensive. Mori’s gaze was a weight. “It’s — rare, I admit, but Abilities tend to linger when they’re aided by resentment. It’s why some effects survive even after the User has been eliminated; they search for something to attach their power to.”

“They knew we would go to the town,” Chuuya added. “They knew Komako had no chance against me. So they made sure she could be saved. As for Yoko killing herself —“

“An act of violence,” Mori concluded. “Isn’t that what Komako’s Ability demands?”

“Are they getting rid of the glacial air?” Ace gasped. “A suicide must gather an incredible amount of violence. And by the same person who gave Shimamura the power to freeze the city —“ He reached for the remote control, clicking the button to remove the walls from the windows.

“But why,” Dazai muttered, frowning at the pictures. “The Special Division could still find a way to blame us for the weather Ability. Our alibi entirely relies on Komako’s footage — if she's alive, she could change the narrative. If they simply wave the season away, how are they going to frame us?"

"The Rats have never openly shown interest in any of the organizations in Yokohama," Mori considered. "Even at the height of the Dragon Head Conflict, our Intel only registered their observance — not intervention. Perhaps this is their attempt to disconcert us."

"A scare-technique," Kouyou agreed. "Let us know they have the power to act whenever they wish."

Chuuya scoffed. "Rats in a cage."

The windows were freed.

Light bathed one side of the Boss' face; the wrinkles on the sides of his eyes. He knew what had happened wouldn't be forgotten; knew there were a thousand possibilities. Mori had always enjoyed playing in attack.

Waiting to be wounded might be peaceful, at times, he would say, two chess pieces between his fingers. But wars — you can start and end those when you like. Sustain your people in blood, rather than in fear.

Fear of what?, Dazai would ask.

He would tilt his head to the side. It was a shared habit. Dazai didn't know who had picked it up from whom. Of the strike, of course.

"Ace," he called, in a voice barely his own. "Get those walls down right —"

The glass shattered in a single breath — louder than any of the fireworks at the edge of his memories. His feet were stuck to the ground; he saw the glint of Kouyou's sword, and the blink of Mori's eyes, always too dry — always forgetting to take his drops if Dazai wasn't there.

Before all of it, he saw Chuuya jump to the table, his hands crimson, throwing himself in front of the man without an ounce of hesitation.

It was pointless.

The bullet pierced right through the red scarf, right where Mori's pocket and his pen rested, the habit of a doctor — touching the tiled floors in a crystal plink!, stained and sticky, after it went cleanly through his heart.

Mori, Dazai thought he might have called.

Before he landed on the floor, the relentless thud of it never ending, he met Dazai's eyes, as if he'd heard nonetheless — surprised, almost, in that split second of conscience.

His lips, divided by blood-stained teeth, shaped his name. Then he fell.

end of act two, part one.

---

Chapter End Notes

chuuya: its not hard dealing with dazai's Bad Days x: oh what do you do to help :((

chuuya:

chuuya: i mean homoeroticism and ballgowns usually help

“concerning the rationale [...]” is an actual nakahara chuuya speech, one that asagiri himself framed (in some journal bsd interview, i think) as proof of irl nakahara being a guy who really liked using big words to say not very much. fun fact!

sapphirestormout when it's about the Yearning. when it's about the Do You See Me Touch Me Then. anyway.

hey there!! nice to see you again if you're still reading, and wonderful to meet you if this is the first time you read a comment. uni is still following me like the ghost of past christmases and work wants me dead, but here's another chapter! fun fact for you guys i almost got ran over this morning. anyway! we are fine. not dazai but. yk.

i hope you liked this chapter, and thank you so so so much again for all the nice comments and the kudos! i hope you have a wonderful day, and a great week, and the best life. see you soon! <333 keep warm, and see you with the (very particular; you'll see) interlude!!

DOG

Chapter Notes

see you at the end!! :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

interlude.

---

“She’s beautiful,” Dazai said. “Did you kill her?”

The framed picture had never truly been hidden; Mori only hid the things he wanted him to find. It stood, faintly dusty, abandoned on the left corner of the third shelf — the one with the pinned butterflies, and the plastic bones.

A teacher’s equipment; Mori had never had a penchant for learning, though.

“Hm?” the doctor asked, seemingly distracted by some vials — which meant, inevitably, that he didn’t quite have the answer to that question. He knew Dazai disliked his humming.

And his pondering. And his smiling. And his weighting, his watching, his assessing, his making, that red scarf that meant something more than a statement, the locks on his cabinets, the polystyrene from a box left outside he had stuck to every sharp corner of the clinic, the brand of canned crab he bought, the stick he pushed on his tongue whenever his throat hurt, that he won at chess, that he lost, that he said good morning, that he wasn’t there in the evenings and —

“Elise was prettier as an adult,” he insisted, studying the second subject of the picture.

“Less adorable, though,” Mori replied.

The cabin of some rusty ship, Dazai assumed, studying the background of the photograph. Pipes and wet blankets; that greyish, filthy, texture that lumped all of the man’s wartime stories together. Elise, taller than even Dazai himself had ever presumed to be, cheeks unrounded and lipstick stained smile — hands on a child's shoulders.

She looked like Mori, he thought. All the way to the smile.

"If you didn't kill her," he presumed, moving from the most rational into the least probable. "Then why did she leave?"

Another hum. Mori smiled, as if he knew.

He laid his tools down, leaning back into his seat. Pulling an all nighter was both endlessly tedious and overwhelmingly exciting — Dazai had never gotten permission to stay up so late, before. If he was lucky, they might play chess. Maybe Mori would even leave before sunrise, and he would get to snoop around his most lethal potions.

"I believe," Mori decided, not glancing at the picture once, "That the little angel began to fear death."

He blinked. Felt like reprimanding that pretty picture. I trusted you, and you're just like everyone else? "That's stupid."

"It made sense," Mori replied, "For the circumstances. She was a close acquaintance to it. Despising friends is infinitely easier than despising enemies. You end up knowing them much deeper."

Dazai gathered his conclusions. He dragged slightly numb legs forward, sat on the hospital bed, squashed his cheek on the pillow to keep his eyes on the doctor. Said: "Are you death?"

His grin widened. A laugh of sorts escaped his mouth — a graceless sound, like a dying goose or a breaking glass; one those subordinates of his were certainly not allowed to hear. Laughing made him look older — it dug the chasms of his face deeper. Dazai thought he had to have laughed tons, at some point of his life, before deciding it was undignified.

I laugh, he'd said, offended, the one time he had offered him his considerations.

No, Dazai had muttered, rubbing the spot of his forehead the man had pinched. No, you chuckle evilly.

Dear. How do I fix that?

"I wouldn't presume," Mori answered, hands intertwined. "But it would certainly explain why you came here and stayed."

He frowned. "Don't try and be mean."

"Sorry," he offered, easily. "Oh. It's later than I thought."

Dazai waited, holding his breath.

Mori tilted his head to the side. "Want to play chess?"

He hummed — because when they lived in the same room, it was inevitable they would end up hating the same things. “As you wish, Boss.”

They played, holed up in that rusty desk of his. Mori offered unwanted advice on his hair — in need of a cut — whenever Dazai got too close to winning. That one busker that always came around with his trumpet played, outside. We’re not locked here, Mori liked to say, whenever they were. A Mafia Boss was never locked anywhere; his right hand man had it slightly more complicated. But want to play?

“This move,” the man illustrated, helpfully, under Dazai’s most uninterested gaze, “Is called Zugzwang. No matter what you do, it will end in your adversary’s checkmate.”

“I know,” he said.

Surprise made him blink. “Then why let me?”

“I thought you deserved to win at least one game,” Dazai shrugged. “You always knew the angel would leave, didn’t you?”

Untouched by the abrupt change of subject, Mori went on with his strategy. “She had that light in her.”

“That light?”

“Hard to recognize when you don’t have it,” He stole one of his black pieces; settled it on top of the pile of weapon-supply deals he kept procrastinating looking at. “I knew a man just like that. She was a good student; a mouthwatering Ability User. She could have saved this nation with her own hands, during the Great War.”

Dazai tilted his head. “Saved?”

“Does that surprise you?”

“She was with you.”

“Everyone wants to save something,” Mori reminded him. “Changes with the season, though. Her priorities shifted with the death of a man she cared much for. Diesel to a fire already there. I could not take the risk of it burning everything surrounding us, too.”

“But you knew she would leave, at some point,” he insisted. He had always liked Mori’s war stories; perhaps that was why the man never offered them. “So why take her in?”

“Is a starving man in the habit of demanding a meal, instead of crumbs?”

“I’m not in the habit of talking with the starving.”

“Liar,” the man chirped. “I saw you sneak in during our Ozaki’s interrogation.”

His fingers curled around his queen, not an inch of hurry. As planned, he won. Dazai tried to find a common ground. Steal it, he considered. Steal it all, and then some more.

“Some research is better than no research,” the man concluded, at last. Then he blinked at the board, genuinely startled. “How unusual. Checkmate.”

---

...

---

Mori’s oxygen max had a star-shaped sticker on it.

It’s what Elise would have done, Dazai would have said, had the nurses questioned it. Many of the staff had wondered about the absence of the adorable little girl, who the Boss had never forfeited bringing along. He would rather she doesn’t see him like this, Dazai had said.

Because an Hospital didn’t associate itself with the Mafia by asking too many questions, they’d only said — Understandable. She is his child.

Dazai stood from the plastic chair, and got to work.

The door of the room slipped open — creaking with the precision of a swift-footed grace that could do nothing about rust. As white as the low-quality sheets of his bed, connected to more tubes than Dazai swore were needed, Mori didn’t even twitch.

“Ace locked himself up again,” Kouyou informed him, closing the door. He could have told her that there was no need; cleaning services came by ten sharp, everyday. “He’s playing the part of the comatose puppet rather well, I must say. Perhaps we should consider leaving him there.”

They saw a bullet pierce through, had been the general consensus regarding the mafiosi — or the crowd of uneasy, confrontational bunch they had turned into in the last few weeks — in the hurried, half hostile meetings the three of them had had. They know it hit someone.

The idea to hospitalize Ace as a cover up had been, surprisingly enough, not Kouyou’s own.

He had thought the man would refuse any and all strategies coming from his dearly detested Double Black — but he had complied, obediently enough. I keep telling you he’s good at being loyal, Dazai had said, in the face of Chuuya’s skepticism.

He would stab Boss himself for a dime. He’s not reliable.

Perhaps he had withered under the perspective of the Boss’ eventual praise. Perhaps he had been inebriated by the idea of bearing the burden of a wound meant for the most powerful man in the city — at least in name. Perhaps the paradoxical sight of Mori's body on the floor had startled him.

That's not what I said.

Kouyou walked to the bed, unassumingly light. He kept his eyes on his current endeavors.

"They might put another stent in, this afternoon," she said, after a drop of water or two had spread ripples in the nearby basin. "The bullet grazed the aorta. They don't want to take any risks. He's lucky to be alive, as of now," A pause. Then, "You missed a spot."

He blinked, searching through the layers of foam on the man's impossibly still face. A small uncovered area, at the edge of the oxygen mask — where he had skirted around, not interested in the nurses' reaction if he were to move the mask.

A hum. He gathered some more foam from the basin counter; then he gripped the razor, leaned his knee on the side of the bed, and began dragging it down.

"That's a terrible performance," Kouyou commented, at last, not unkindly. She circled the bed, leaning over Mori's other side. "Straighter. Start from the top."

"I think," he said, pretending not to see her fingers hesitate at the unused texture of his voice, "I might know what to do better than you."

"One would doubt it. Did he teach you?"

"Tried to," A square of shaved skin appeared under the blade, only faintly reddened. Someone had spread the man's hair on the pillow, moving them away from the scars he had on his forehead — torture, he had told him, once, but not much else. "He's not very good at doing to others what he does to himself. Hirotsu had to come to the rescue."

Kouyou made a face. Her kimono was among the most colorful ones he had ever seen her wear — a clear violation of Mafia etiquette, only gently saved by the black underdress he saw peek from her shoulder. "Certainly a crowded bathroom."

Dazai cleaned another layer. "My condolences, Ane-san."

Her grip around the railing painted her knuckles white. "Hush, now, lad. He is no corpse."

"No healthy thing, either. I know you care for him."

"Selfishly," She glanced to the basin as he washed the blade, as if waiting for the water to turn red. "I wish I could say the same for you."

He thought he smiled. Outside the window, the sun was at its most blinding; if he had turned the small television on, he would have heard stuttering reports of the warmest weather Yokohama had experienced in almost five years.

Mori's breath fogged up the mask.

[“Help me press on the wound,” someone barked. Chuuya, he thought. Kouyou’s Demon was warding off upcoming bullets, and Ace had run off somewhere, and Mori was nowhere to be seen — which was unusual; eyes and ears in every corner in this world. There was blood on his shoes. “Press fucking harder —”]

“You truly have no loyalty.”

“Do I not?” he asked, distractedly.

“It matters next to nothing to me,” Kouyou insisted, eyes searching his gaze in a way that said the opposite. But the Port Mafia was a starved feast, and it would have made no sense not to eat the biteable. “He might not appreciate it, one day. Not at the price of success.”

“Success,” Whatever his tone did, it got her shoulders to harden. “I would know about that. And you?”

She worked her jaw, surprise muffled. “If you already know, no point in me telling.”

“Tell me anyway.”

Her hesitancy was short lived — two strikes of razor, and then: “The News and the Cabinet are aware that someone from the company has been hit. A helicopter News service was passing by, directing a service on the melting, and — they’re calling it the latest of the terroristic attacks plaguing our city,” A scoff. “The Police is half convinced we might have staged this one ourselves. They’re still wary of believing the Ballerinas have hands in it.”

“And?”

“They found Komako and Shimamura’s corpses.”

Dazai’s razor paused. The more of Mori’s face appeared, the less vacant he seemed — blame, nonetheless, was a too convenient expression for a nearby-corpse to wear. “Where?”

Kouyou sighed. “On the stairs of Building One. Three bullets in their chests, jaw broken against the curb.”

He considered. Washed the blade into the basin one last time; let it float in the dirty water, grabbing a fairy patterned blanket of Elise’s — one of the items in Mori’s serious emergencies bags, which only Dazai knew where to find — and dried his face. “Chuuya,” he concluded.

She seemed genuinely taken aback — which was incredibly stupid.

[His hands pressed. Chuuya’s cheek bled — the bullets had only managed to graze him.]

“That’s good,” Dazai said. “For everyone. No one wanted terrorists roaming free, correct?”

“No,” Her hands intertwined on the handle of her umbrella. He had the weird mental image of someone at the entrance attempting to put it in the drying basket. “Problem is, more than a quarter of our supporters at the City Council are growing — handsy. Saying we're not being careful enough. The Special Division is on our tails."

"I didn't think the Government had to answer to the Special Division."

"Not once, no," Very gently, she tapped one of Mori's abandoned hands. Ozaki, dear, if you could kill him for me? "Then, our valiant Boss decided to create a project to get Users involved in the war, and now Abilities are — valued."

Dazai settled back on the guest chair. Mori slept — grazed aorta and unnatural bullet and Ability-affected wound and Elise, he presumed, somewhere in his dreams. Or nightmares. If it was fair.

"So what?" he asked. "Are we to expect the Hunting Dogs at our doors?"

"They hardly have enough proof for that," Kouyou shook her head. "They could, on the other hand, act on many of our assets. If the Special Division got permission to open an investigation on us, or an inquiry — If they found a single business connected to Abilities —"

"I doubt anyone in this city is stupid enough not to know."

"Not legally. We could be ordered to get tested. We're resourceful, but not enough to hide every Ability User in our ranks," She munched on her lip, pensive. The lipstick stayed right where it was. "Our facade is weapon manufacture. The last time Abilities were involved in that field, the Great War was at its worst. There are armies of lawyers all over the Prefecture waiting for us to slip up."

"This isn't us slipping," Dazai let her know, helpful in that way that always got guns in men's hands. "This is Mori getting shot in the chest, in an effort to take him out of this game. The Special Division knows he's the heart of it all."

Kouyou's head snapped up. "Are you saying —"

"They have collaborated with terrorists in an effort to protect this city, before," He shrugged. "I hardly doubt they wouldn't do it again. If they genuinely believe whoever had the Ballerinas change their ideology could get rid of us once and for all — I don't see why they wouldn't risk it all to cut the head off."

"Which means you're the head, now."

Dazai stared at the floor.

[A hand in his hair — pushing his face closer. A bubbling sound, like blood down a drying throat or viscera squashing around a bullet. Words, in between — codes he already knew and places he remembered how to find, and secrets only the head of a crimson empire had a right to know, "I know," he tried to say, pushing Mori down, "I know, Mori, don't be boring —"].

"Please, Ane-san," he attempted, offering half a bow. "You're his second in command, aren't you?"

“I am,” Kouyou said. “Always have been. He appeared from a massacre of the former Boss’ supporters, coat still lined in blood, and asked — Do you want power, or do you want life?”

“How come not the second? Last I checked, you lost it all in an attempt to gain it.”

It was mean, in a disgustingly teenagerish way. She took it all in stride, though — and he recalled their first meeting, her fingers under his chin, her smile frozen on her face. It certainly has been a while, little demon.

“Lad,” she started, “If I told you to leave this room and go wherever you wanted — would you do it?”

He settled his chin on his hand. “I don’t care for the Mafia,” he reminded her, “Not the way you do.”

“I’m not talking about the Mafia,” she insisted. “I’m talking about this room. I’m talking about him.”

Of course, Dazai said. It was only when the sun from the window hit the sleeping man’s hand just right, painting his veins cobalt, that he realized his mouth was closed. The woman leaned over the railing, with purpose — the reminder that he had once been as tall as her shoulder, and he still was missing that inch to be as tall as her.

“You’re all but stupid, little demon,” Kouyou said. “I know you know what he’s doing with you.”

“Ah,” He laughed, low and unamused, “Well. Picking an heir amongst the so-rare crowd of suicidal children doesn’t seem as wise as Mori is known for. Forgive me the skepticism.”

She didn’t falter. “Talk with that friend of yours, the one from Intel. Sakaguchi. Tell him to find a way to get us a meeting with the Special Division.”

Eyes obnoxiously wide, he gasped: “You want us to talk with the enemy?”

“It was already your plan,” Kouyou squinted. “I know it was. I don’t know if it was Mori’s, also — or if you two are just more similar than you will ever be willing to admit. Frankly, it hardly matters,” She wore her solemnity with the ease of a statue; used to the touches of believers and rusting a bit more under each one.

Dazai remembered longing, once. Not quite for her. Maybe for her sword; that Demon Ability of hers, something so flashy and separate — not intertwined with her very veins. She had seemed nice, until she had tortured a man in front of him. Then she had just looked like all the damned he had met.

“I’m sorry,” she said, and he almost believed her, “But you are going to have to get us out of this bother, lad. No one else Mori would want to.”

On the heart monitor, the rhythmic beep seemed to falter.

Stand up and go, he thought. She would let you.

Go where?

“Ane-san.”

He kept his eyes on Mori; felt the way her body tilted to him, immediate and instinctive, curling around those syllables. She had hated them from the moment Chuuya had first uttered them — then Dazai had joined in, and she had hated them a bit more. Then nothing. “Yes?”

Somewhat a waste, not quite curious, he questioned: “Do you hate me because of him, or is that irrelevant?”

Her breath caught. Dazai watched Mori’s hand, pale and wrinkled and ungloved. Wondered, this one time, just this one time, as useless as it was, could it be the blood’s fault and not mine?

He watched her walk around the bed, lithe steps and the drag of her kimono on the floor. She crouched down in front of his seat, balancing on the ball of her feet. No inch of them came into contact — and yet he had to lower his eyes to meet hers, and that was a burst of youth he did not have a place for.

She’d let her hair down — quiet mourning, subtle enough no subordinate would murmur. When she spoke, the strands fell on one of her eyes, and he thought about saying, look who talked.

“Everytime I see blood on your hands,” Kouyou said, “I see his face.” Her fingers tightened around the fabric of her clothes, near her knee — the one she had broken, when he was fourteen. She had been stuck in a wheelchair for a while, and he had carried her, only once, while she threatened to call Mori. “Calling me a traitor,” she spat, one side of her lips curling up.

“I’m thankful for him, at times,” she added, once she realized Dazai would only keep staring.

“A character defect,” he commented. “A sign of early senile delirium.”

“The truth,” she corrected him, simply. “I’m thankful to him. For showing me how foolish I was being. Blinded, he called me. Thinking I could ever —“

Her jaw set. He thought of Beatrice’s face, bloodied and frowned up in despise, staring up at the last person to ever hold her.

“You know,” she added. “Not of — you actually remind me of Kanechi a bit more.”

Dazai twitched.

Ah, he thought. That he hadn’t expected.

“The truth,” Kouyou repeated, “Is that every person in this world is born to be content. I doubt it, at times, until I end up stumbling on a sunrise,” She sighed. “I don’t know if I was happy, before — or if I could have been happier. But I am content now. Here.”

Her gaze laid on Mori, a blink; then him again. “Here,” she insisted, as if he could learn, “Surrounded by blood and by demons.”

“How flattering,” Dazai commented, and didn’t point out that her shadow was golden and sword-wielding.

“What would the world make of me, if I climbed out of these shadows?” Kouyou asked, and it didn’t require an answer — not with the sunlight streaming from the window, and the traces of dried blood on a spot behind her ear. “Do you think I would be welcomed? That I would walk through a crowd and feel like anything but an intruder?”

He hummed. “Did that speech have our Chuuya starry eyed when you gave it to him?”

“I’m thankful to the old Boss,” she concluded, undeterred. “If he ever were to return, to haunt all of us from whatever Hell we will one day meet him in again — I would rip his heart out with my hands. You?” She didn’t move; if she had ever dared to touch him, Dazai thought she might have seized him in a grip tight enough to bruise. “You are your mistakes. Not your best intentions.”

“That’s not an answer,” Dazai noted. “And I have none of those.”

“Aren’t you a prodigy?”

“Don’t be blind.”

“Occasionally, I believe it a wonderful endeavor,” She raised one hand, torturously slow; tapped the bundle of bandages on his face with a single finger, right where his shut eye rested. “The demon who goes around all bandaged must know something about it.”

Vacantly, he stared back.

[No, he said. Perhaps he just thought about it. There was blood on his shoes, still, and the room was empty. No, what would it be of him if —]

Kouyou shifted. Not quite kneeling; not with the body next to them still warm. Not quite anything else.

“If you need to be like him,” she told him, still defiant in that threat of loyalty, unwanted and undecided, but owed — because Mori had locked the door in her room of shadows when she would have never managed to be brave enough to leave, and she owed him everything. “Then take every ounce of bloodthirst he tried to drown us into, and use it to keep us afloat.”

The door of the Hospital room opened with a screech. Dazai sat on the guest seat; Mori slept. He waited.

---

...

---

The Dining Hall was almost empty, by the time the evening rolled in. When Dazai dropped his tray in front of the two occupants of one of the endless tables — he did so loudly enough to startle every anxiously silent soul.

“Ango!” he exclaimed, smiling — only faintly genuine, but more than another face would have painted on his own. “And Tanaki! Why wasn’t I invited to the Round Glasses Meeting? I’m hurt.”

Halfway through a meal as bland as ever, the woman offered him some warmth — brighter than the diamond of the engagement ring on her finger. “Might have something to do with your lack of glasses.”

“She doesn’t have them either,” Ango replied, meekly professional, tracing aimless codes with his chopsticks and the leftover sauce. A trace of ink stained his face; he prayed Odasaku had been around, just to get a photograph out of it. “This is the Saltless Noodles Meeting, at best.”

“I have complained to the kitchens,” the woman said, with the tone of someone who had had that discussion a bit too often. “Everybody is in a frenzy, with Executive Ace’s situation. They have no time to raise the quality.”

“Did the Executive’s blood end up in the damn soup, or what?” the man grunted.

Dazai hadn’t seen him this drained out since the Dragon Head Conflict; chances were, the grateful look he sent his way meant Tanaki had sat next to him in an effort to cheer him up — as she had steadily been attempting to do with every gray-faced mafioso crossing her desk.

He sank his teeth in his food with more enthusiasm than either his body or the situation demanded. “How very hypocritical of them. I know at least ten people in this room who would have gladly torn him apart for a promotion.”

“That’s how the syndicate has always worked,” Tanaki replied, pensive. “Last time I saw our men celebrate a new Executive with sincerity in their hearts was — Well.”

With a pointed tone doing its best not to appear so, Ango said: “They seemed pretty glad when Vice-Executive Nakahara was promoted.”

“He had to deal with five assassination attempts in two months,” Dazai perked up, excitedly. “So that’s only partially true. And I only sent two of them his way. According to my Chuuya’s Sore Loser Newsletter’s responses, it’s just the right amount to —” He toppled the pike of his rice mountain with his chopsticks. “Tip the scale very easily.”

“Did you just say you sent assassins to —“

“No one here is in dismay because Executive Ace got hurt,” Ango fixed up his glasses. “They fear that information might be being withheld. Someone would have attempted an insurrection for the seat already, otherwise,” His mouth tilted down. “It’s the whispers we must fear.”

Dazai widened his eyes, wooah-ing. “You’re so very smart, Ango. I did hear whispers that Tomura from Intel will attempt to shoot you, so that she may become my new favorite informant.” Wiggling his eyebrows towards his friend, he asked, loudly: “So, Tanaki! How are the wedding preparations going?”

Ango’s expression grew horrified. The woman lit up.

Given the urgent circumstances, and the fading afternoon behind the floor-to-ceiling windows, he only let her enthusiastically ramble about flower arrangements for twenty five minutes longer, after the first twitch of Ango’s eye.

Pointed glances were sent in their direction, each of them settled on Dazai’s coat. They searched his hands, too. He had been waiting for terrified hope for weeks — voices of coups, of celebration, of the former Boss’s supporters. All he had seen had been loyal, knee-sunk worry.

How boring, he had thought. How predictable.

“You’ll forgive me,” he said, eventually, kissing both of Tanaki’s tattooed knuckles, “Ango and I have to discuss some matters. I’m still waiting on my formal best man invite, by the way.”

“You and Chuuya both,” she sighed, seemingly having given up on convincing either of them the role would be given to someone else. “Let’s watch some more Spider Eyes when this hellish time is over, yes? The three of us.”

Fireworks in the sky, he thought. The delirious ecstasy in his lungs and in his brain, a wall he couldn’t scratch hard enough to stop his traitorous hands from reaching. Unmatching eyes, far too close and far too real, dripping down carefully tucked corners of his flesh, only —

Kind. Chuuya had put his bandages back on in silence. Unneeded. Fruitless; and as such — “We’ll see,” he offered.

They walked their way to the underground parking lot of the building, and Dazai didn’t nod to each body that bowed at his passage — didn’t listen to the pointed whispers he had not heard in two years, because he knew better.

Ango had a dossier in his hands; he didn’t protest when Dazai linked their arms, nor did he immediately call out the too cheerful skip in his steps.

“You’re good,” he told him, though, as they slipped into one of the cars. The parking lot was empty; Dazai knew where every visible and secret camera was situated — as he had been in charge of putting them up. “But not every grunt in this syndicate is overwhelmingly stupid.”

“No,” he agreed, “Just a good half.”

“You need to calm down.”

“I am.”

A man passing by bowed. Dazai offered them a smile so wide he paled. “Calm down.”

“And settle your heart, my firefly,” he sang. “Is firefly tragic or comic?”

“Tragic,” Ango said. “Odasaku says that wrapping you up in a blanket and waiting it out works. Would you like me to find you a blanket?”

Something in the absolute vacancy of his tone — prepared, he thought, for efficiency, no matter the intricacies his jobs would demand — made him laugh. “I missed one day at the Bar, and you nasty guys started exchanging handling Dazai tips?”

“You’re not a thing, Dazai,” the man scoffed, “There’s no handling involved.”

That was most certainly a lie, but Dazai liked him and the shimmering wrist watch he wore — similar to Hirotsu’s one, still around his wrist. He kept quiet. “How long would it take you to organize a meeting with the Special Division?”

Ango’s face fell.

“I know it’s somewhat unwise,” he assured, reclining his seat until it was parallel to the ground. “As long as we don’t search for them, we’re not openly giving them excuses to intervene. But they know Mori was the one hit; no doubt about it. We have reasons to believe a small part of them might have allied with the governmental quarter that supports whoever helped the Ballerinas.”

The man was quiet for a long time. Tapping his fingers on the steering wheel, he said: “You think there might be factions inside the Special Division?”

Dazai shrugged. “Boss always acted like receiving a Permit was a necessity — but not receiving it not a death sentence. There must be some deal at work; someone at the head of the Division who understands that the Port Mafia helps keep the underground in check,” He thought of a basin; bloodless water. “Whoever did it must have done it for their own benefit.”

“Is that related to the researches on the Rats in the House of the Dead you had us doing?” Ango questioned.

“Partly,” he replied. “I think that’s a lead — but the true syndicate the Government is supporting, the one who gave the Ballerinas the idea to simply get rid of Abilities all together... Connected to the Rats, but not the same.”

“It makes no sense,” the man observed. “What would the Special Division do without Abilities?”

He offered him a smile, faint. “Some ideals are more important than a job, Ango. I’m sure Odasaku would tell you the same thing.”

A glint went through his eyes; something just slightly unprofessional. “Have you been to the Hospital?” Ango asked, eventually.

“Ah, everyday,” Dazai put two fingers to his forehead, saluting. “Assiduous like a first born.”

He gave him a strange look.

“What?”

“I don’t know,” he admitted. Then, “You know, some sincerely believe you put that bullet in him.”

He rolled his eyes. “Have been since the first day.”

“Would you?”

“Too boring,” he replied. Then, because Ango was one of two friends, he added: “Not a point in it. It might bring his supporters’ guns on me, but —” He shrugged. “Being haunted by that old man’s ghost doesn’t sound painless at all. Once was one time too many.”

Ango frowned. “What does that mean?”

Dazai winked. “Fun story of a man and his dog. Check it out in the Double Black file, when you have time.”

A car left the parking lot, blasting Opera music from the stereos. He considered giving Kajii a scare, just to make sure that project he had him working on would actually come to a conclusion — reconsidered it, recalling the glance he had sent his way the last time he had requested a painless bomb.

If our most essential Executive truly has to snap his own neck, he had heard him mumble, half drunk, the last time he had been asked to go drag Chuuya away from a bar — and wasn’t it fun, he had thought, that a man so enamoured with death would never meet his eyes? — could he not at least make sure the blood doesn't stain our shoes?

“Boss,” Ango asked, very quiet, staring right over the steering wheel. “Will he recover?”

Dazai paused. “Hey,” he said, just to call his attention. The man was hardly one to take badly to corrections; but he was one of two friends he had had his whole life — so he waited, patient and tidy, gently willing him to correct his own mistake.

“We will send an invitation,” Ango said, then, some eternity later. Clever man he was; came to conclusions all on his own. “I’m assuming you want it to be all out in the open? No Mori Corp?”

Dazai yawned. “We will refrain from belittling the little intellect they have, yes.”

“And if they say they want to speak to the Boss?”

A spider dangled from a thread on the window, unconcernedly light. Dazai recalled Kazuko’s dirt-stained scales, as she intertwined up his leg and laid her chin on his knee.

Affection was too human of a sentiment; perhaps it was why the lack of it kept them both warm; soiling the ground with the scratches her fangs had given him and the times he had opened the door again after casting her out. He could never leave her out when it rained.

[“To care is not to weaken,” Mori reminded him. His shoe was covered in blood. The leather of it was Italian, he thought, or maybe Indian. Pressed against Kazuko’s throat, it was just dark. “But to care is to be weakened,” Then, “I did tell you two to stay away from doctors.”

Odasaku isn’t a doctor, he could have said, and Chuuya was dying. Instead, mildly curious, he asked: “Are you disappointed?”

“No,” A wet squelch; lifeless eyes and thirteen panels and grasshoppers under Elise’s shoes. Mori did always think the two of them similar. “Never.”]

“Tell them he’s busy,” Dazai concluded, straightening the seat again. “But they can have a chat with a Demon, if it fits them.”

---

...

---

The door of the Hospital room opened with a screech. Dazai sat on the guest seat; Mori slept.

He waited.

---

...

---

Two halves of a bonsai laid side by side, rained on by the sunlight burning the window.

“Look at that poor thing,” Dazai mused, woodenly, as his fingers patted the lifeless leaves. Back to the door, Akutagawa didn’t say a word. “And right as the warm season started, too. It would have certainly enjoyed it more than any of us,” The little branch was thrown aside, rootless — unnecessary, as such. “Such a clean cut, too. Sort of reminds me of Rashomon.”

“It wasn’t me —“

“Quiet.”

The hard press of his teeth could have shattered even the concrete. Dazai ran his hands across the window seal, shoulders straight the way Mori liked them. He hummed again.

“Unfastened,” He snapped the seals of the window on. “A bit surprising, for someone who grew up in the streets. One would assume you would take better care of the things you own.”

Akutagawa didn’t breathe.

“So,” Dazai’s inspection had woken him up; the bundle of clothing underneath his ever-present coat was too large on his starved-raised bones. His mind rarely lingered on him — when it did, Dazai couldn’t quite decide if he looked young or grey for his age. “What happened?”

“I don’t know, sir,” he breathed out, all in one go, like holding it behind his teeth had been cutting his tongue. “I’ve been keeping my eyes on it every waking moment — I entered the room and it was — I’ve been looking for the culprit. No one but me and my sister knows of this room —“

“Your sister,” Dazai echoed.

Whatever he heard in his tone trailed the rest of his explanations off, disappearing with the echoes from the traffic outside. The sheer quantity of melted snow had left the streets wet.

Both summer and winter are dead, he had commented, pupils blown and a grin, as his men carried the two corpses off the stairs. Shimamura had been an unremarkable man; Dazai had never even gotten to hear him talk. The gods are grieving, for sure.

“Her surgery went well.”

Dazai stared at the bug-littered glass of the chandelier, nape tilted back.

“No side effects,” Akutagawa added, with that ancient desperation of his, crawling on his knees like that Ability of his couldn’t shatter space. “Not even a scar. She’s as good as new.”

Imperceptibly — knowing it was so, because when had it ever not been — he stilled. “Is that so?”

Akutagawa stared at the floor, breathing shallowly. “Boss said I was to show my gratitude to you for that,” was his confirmation. “He said you personally asked him to take part in her surgery, to ensure its success. It was — kind of you. No matter my failures. I deeply appreciate it,” Dazai felt a giggle bubble up in his throat. “We owe you much.”

His teeth breached in his lower lip; then his cheek, then his tongue. The urge to laugh shook his spine all the way to the smallest bones of his hands; he thought of a red scarf and hospital beds, the glint in a man’s eyes whenever he was about to take a wrong turn on the chessboard.

I’m still winning, he would note, each time. With a blink, Mori had turned Akutagawa into an ever even more grateful — devoted — fool than before.

Certainly. Maybe I simply enjoy watching you trip, once in a while, Mori would wink.

“For someone so attentive over the last relative he has left,” Dazai said, eventually, “You surely take some time to recognize her handiwork.”

Confusion kept his head down for endless instants; understanding snapped it up, a fire in his gaze that he had been hopelessly waiting to see at its most vicious for months. “Gin would never —“ “Gin wants you out of my grasp,” Dazai interrupted, too easy and too complicated and too fruitless but not quite — not enough to waste it. “I won’t pretend not to understand. Nonetheless, it is a dangerous obsession for her to have.”

“Sir —“

“You know, this isn’t a school,” He widened his eyes, blinking owlshly. He stood from the desk; pretended not to see the half step back Akutagawa almost took. “Everyday she learns how to survive with the best assassin in the syndicate — a man so very priceless, she is amongst the few to meet him. Everyday, he teaches her exactly how to escape —“

“She’s not going to,” the boy swore. “We talked. The Executive talked to her —“

“Akutagawa.”

It was impossible to discern which made the lines of his face tense up further — the notion of his name leaving Dazai's mouth, or the hand he put on his shoulder.

"Listen to me," he ordered, unnecessarily, attuned to every movement of his mouth as the boy looked, "You do not leave the Port Mafia, if not in a casket."

"And if you do," he continued, easily, because some things had to be clear — victory was only so if everyone knew what to do. Victory is only so if you win, Odasaku might have replied. "With the way things work around here, I'm the one who buys the belated casket and puts you in it."

His chin moved, as if to nod. He didn't.

Dazai did, though; he motioned towards the shattered plant. "Don't you trust me?" His lips parted; he insisted: "That's your sister's work. She hopes I will end up disapproving of you — enough to throw you aside. What she doesn't understand — is that there is no throwing aside. Not here. You should understand it as well, and maybe begin to put some effort in the orders I give you, because — all gods' forbid, Akutagawa," He tightened his grip on his shoulder, "I do not bring useless assets in."

The boy's body seemed to shake. Rage peeked where ancient fear always slept — Rashomon slept, pliant under his touch. Pointless blood, as it went — but blood was blood, and hunger was hunger, and children needed to feast.

"I'm not useless," Akutagawa whispered, through his teeth.

He curled an eyebrow. "And what have you and your Ability done until now?"

"You promised you would teach me —"

"I have been teaching you," Dazai scoffed. He let go of him; the ricochet sent him against the door, the thud of it soft. "Don't be so naive. You think I spend all this time with you because I somehow enjoy your insufferably whiny presence? You think I brought you along to a Double Black mission to have you stand around and grieve your sister —"

"I heard you talk with Boss," he accused, high on some suicidal sort of adrenaline, "You said you needed more Ability Users — weren't sure if Chuuya would manage to —"

"Swallow whatever rubbish you're about to spit out before I make you regret it," he warned, unimpressed, stepping close enough to tear a gasp out of his throat. "Spill a quarter of the pathetic amount of blood Chuuya has spilled in the name of this organization, and then I might allow you to think about his name in relation to the likes of you. Address your superiors with their titles or I'll make you."

Harsh breathing climbed up and down his chest. He didn't speak.

Dazai let go. Cleaned his hands on his coat. "Do you even know why Gin was hit?"

"It was —" Akutagawa licked his lips, shoulders stuck to the door, "She said you ordered her to attack the woman — get herself hurt, so we could bring proof to the police —"

“Orders,” he confirmed. “Orders, yes, but she’s a clever one. She understands bargaining better than you will ever do. I told her to risk her life. She told me she would be allowed to join the Black Lizards — and you to train with me — with no need for siblingly duels.”

He stared.

In a dull voice, he asked: “What?”

“See, that’s the thing,” Dazai walked aimlessly in that hole of a room, wondering how people could sleep on a warm bed and then stand in front of a gun with no fear. “You think you’re protecting her, but so far — she’s done a lot more than you have to protect the both of you. A clever girl. We just need to get her by the throat of that faulty loyalty of hers, and then she’ll be powerful.”

“Hirotzu is a good starting point. She will learn,” He tilted his head. “As I see it, you are her only obstacle. Considering she has proved herself a much better investment than you, for all but your Ability — we do live in a classist world, after all — it’s not long before I get asked why I should hold her back.”

“I do wonder,” he added, “If the same reasoning would work backwards for you.”

Akutagawa’s jaw settled.

He waited; he waited some more. Rebuttal or attack or a tantrum; he couldn’t pinpoint how he would react to any of them, so he waited to find out — he thought of a hospital room and files on his desk and Odasaku’s kids, drawing him a city in flames and a man who didn’t want to kill saving it.

Unrealistic, the man had shrugged. I might want to be a good man, but the world wouldn’t last if they all were.

He waited; nothing came.

Dazai nodded. Circled over him until he moved away from the door.

His fists were clenched so hard his knuckles took the place of the melted snow, rattling his shoulders just so, quivering in anticipation and the nearby ire of the last passing train. He didn’t move.

Behind the door was Hirotzu, cigarette in hand and a politely curious expression.

Dazai waved, and said: “Formal training will begin as soon as this bother of a situation is over. Good news for you too, Commander! You get a new recruit. Congratulations —“

“Make us duel anyway.”

Hirotzu cigarette got stuck inches from his mouth.

One foot out of the room, nose brushing the chilling air of the hallway — Dazai moved a piece forward, met Mori’s eyes and said, I’ll let you know when I trip, then.

“What?” he asked, feigning confusion. He could feel the man’s eyes on him; the accusation in them, neither kind nor mean — simply there.

“Make us duel anyway,” Akutagawa’s expression was borderline fervent. “I can — I can prove myself to you.”

Can you, he didn’t ask. Odasaku would have thought it mean; Ango would have sneered at the waste if it.

“As you said — I have an Ability. I can beat her. I know I can. Your orders aren’t pointless — If you demanded a duel, there must be something you can take away from it. Something to evaluate,” He gulped, frantically, knees bent as if to drop to the floor, body hardwired for a fight he wouldn’t get. “We can’t take that right away from you.”

Dazai crossed his arms. “After all she did, just to ensure you wouldn’t have to fight?”

“I appreciate her efforts,” he snapped. His eyes darted over his shoulder; whatever he saw in Hirotsu’s quietly observing own, only made him angrier. “She was not required to waste them, though. She should have asked me.”

“She won’t accept.”

“I’ll convince her. I can. And,” He raised his chin. “If it’s a direct order, she can’t refuse to obey. Not here.”

“Not here,” Dazai echoed. Then, because Odasaku would have thought it was nice, and Chuuya would have shattered his nose into pieces for it, “Don’t you think she might end up harboring some animosity, after she went through all that trouble for you? Risked her life?”

A flare of hesitation passed through his eyes. It was gone with the passing clouds, and a distant glance to the fallen branch of that bonsai of his.

“There’s no place for familiar affection in the Mafia,” Akutagawa concluded, each syllable stolen. “The Mafia is our family. That’s where our loyalties should lay, before than to each other. To you,” He met his gaze, nearly fumbling, intense, “I would have no life or purpose without you. It’s time we — set our personal feelings aside, and act for the best of the syndicate. Earn this existence.”

Dazai watched.

Gulped down a bitter taste — wondered, a bit distantly, if spitting at his feet would be too mean on that nice lady that came to clean those rooms everyday.

“Very well,” he said, at last. “We’ll prepare a duel.”

Akutagawa stood his ground. He thought he ought to praise him for it, and to kill him for a thousand reasons more, and decided doing neither would be enough for that day.

---

...

---

The door of the Hospital room opened with a screech. Dazai sat on the guest seat; Mori slept. He waited.

---

...

---

He was in the hospital room, cheek sunk in a space of the mattress Mori's hand had not stolen, when Chuuya's entered through the window.

It was with startling, unavoidable certainty — not unfamiliar, not ever; but maybe dormant, as a leftover of drugged hysteria and the way his eyes had looked underneath fireworks — that Dazai realized he didn't want to see him.

“Do you remember anything from the shit we pulled after we decided to get arrested a second time?” Chuuya asked, as he perched on the railing at the foot of the bed, like a bird of ill omen.

He didn't have to turn to feel the poignancy of the gaze he laid on Mori. Mercifully, Dazai didn't point out, promise forty seven.

It had hardly been discussed, after all — apart from the glances Chuuya refused to send to his bandaged limbs and the hum Dazai did not let out whenever a Vice-Executive Nakahara escaped some lips. Avoidance would imply relevance. They sat next to each other at Boss-less Executive meetings and walked out of different doors. They watched Spider Eyes at different turns. Dazai wore one layer more of bandages for a single day — then he took it off, as if the boy would somehow know.

He wondered if Chuuya had dared to look at the pictures, or if he knew Corruption marks peeked through the blurred ink — his eyes a tad too bright.

“Some guy at the konbini near the HQ fell to his knees the moment he saw me,” Chuuya continued, undeterred. His voice was as grating as a creaking door; not one to demand silence for the resting, Dazai wondered if he could demand it for the dying. “Gave me free cigarettes, if I just promised not to debate the benefits of parking machines with, that bandaged buddy of yours in front of him ever again.”

Nothing truly came to mind — the sticky screech of cart wheels, maybe, and sticking his head in the fridges of the frozen food aisle.

“We’ll need to add it to the list,” Dazai commented, some eternity later. Mori’s breath fogged up his oxygen mask. “The lawyers keep saying the Court date is getting closer.”

[“Car theft,” they had recited, under Hirotzu’s watchful gaze and Kouyou’s barely contained hysteria, “Destruction of property, breaking and entering, armed robbery, assault, public indecency and disturbance, assault on numerous police officers — If we want to go deeper and into simpler terms, though, it becomes somewhat more — unusual.”]

“You joined an illegal fighting ring,” the other lawyer had picked up. “Which explains your bruises, Executive Dazai. Graffitied the City Hall, shattered four windows of the Armed Detective Agency building — one of the Detective claims you landed on his desk during his night shifts, and broke his glasses — rode a motorcycle over the walls of the Kanagawa Arts Theatre — “

“Smashed some more street lamps — not the ones from before — stole a koala from the Zoo and then returned it wearing some jewels from a jewelry of our property — luckily — rode a shopping cart on the highway — stole a karaoke machine and projected it on the wall of the local prison, offering the neighborhood an almost hour long show — spray painted an enormous graffiti of — I think it’s supposed to be Hirose Fumiko?”

“You ought to return the streetlight you stole, by the way.”

They exchanged a glance.

“Tell me you know where you hid it,” Kouyou begged.

Dazai shook his head. “I did get this picture from the guy who swore we tried to steal the Arcade sign, though.”

Like all the photographs from the woman’s camera, it was somewhat blurred at the edges — the road it portrayed barely brightened by street lamps. At the center of it were — presumably — Dazai and Chuuya themselves, wearing street cones as either hats or weapons, throwing themselves at each other in a blur.]

The heart monitor beeped.

He wondered if Mori could hear. At the very least — he knew — Mori had never left him alone in a room full of blades. Courtesy was to be repaid; wills to be left empty.

While he was in surgery, Dazai had sat by the vending machine, playing shadow games in the blue light, and he had pointlessly waited for Elise to whine about it. Eventually, they had dragged him away. Next of kin, the nurses had sworn. Only name in his registers. You're not an adult yet, though, are you?

“The closed eyes freak me the fuck out,” Chuuya said, stupidly, “I don’t think I’ve ever seen the man blink.”

Not even peeking at the silhouette — quite literally parked on the wall next to their window, defying all laws of gravity — he asked: “Did you park your bike outside so that he would break the coma to roll his eyes?”

I had his life in my hands at fourteen, Dazai hadn’t told the nurses, because they wouldn’t have cared about the dried blood on a bedroom wall. It’s mine. You can’t have it.

“Will you ever quit asking questions in response to other questions?” he noted.

“I’m all but inconsistent, Chuuya.”

“I wouldn’t let you.”

“You couldn’t stop me.”

Chuuya scoffed.

He stepped to the other side of the bed. Gloved fingers tapped Mori’s knuckles; he felt ugly, whimsical jealousy up every inch of his bones — and then he felt that they were nothing more than two boys breaking visiting hours, and then he felt nothing at all.

The stone-like quality of his unmatching eyes was as pained as it was severe. Loyalty, he thought, because always — and something else.

“Be careful,” Dazai advised. “Your outrageous lack of a father figure is showing.”

His recoil was physical; revolted. “Says the one who is two merry fucking hops from sleeping in his bed.”

“I’m merely waiting to give him an earful,” He pushed himself off the scratchy sheets, crossing his legs on the guest seat. “The fool spends all these years promising to find me a peaceful way to die, only to walk steps from death himself? Irresponsible.”

“You make me vomit.”

“What are the highest success rates in the shortest times from your Guerrilla?”

Chuuya’s eyebrows fluttered. He fixed up a petal from Madame Tanaki’s flower vase on the night table. “You know them already.”

He did. “Humor me.”

He rattled them off, efficient to the bone; they didn't change from the never ending lines of ink Dazai had forced his eye to memorize.

He listened. Tapped two fingers on his knee. Traced the crooked line of Mori's nose, broken once before. Some of the soldiers on board thought they could bully me into giving them more drugs than necessary, he had explained, flippantly. Then he'd chuckled. Remind you of something?

I haven't touched you, Dazai hadn't reminded him, just as flippant. He rose from the seat, and stuck his arms in the sleeves of his coat.

"Tell the nurses to put salt in his IV," he chirped, with his most obnoxious pat to the man's forehead. "You know how he hates bland food. One would think the Army would have made him less picky," He sighed. "Try not to get lost in the faucet. I have a meeting with the Special Division."

Impossible as it was, Chuuya stiffened a bit further. "Just you?"

"Why? My dog wants to come along?" He blinked. "It's no walk to the park, Slug. Literally."

"Cut it off. You can't meet the assholes one on one."

"I have my men."

"Your men," he pointed out, "Aren't me."

"No," Dazai agreed. "They all reach the national average height."

The boy stepped over the bed — walked right up to his face. How very expected of him, not to bother the sick; how very expected of him to want a front line while every soul in the syndicate dug bunkers in the tension-shaken air.

"Mori wouldn't bring Kouyou," he made him notice.

"I'm not your second," Chuuya reminded him. Leave, he thought, as if it would be rational — as if Mori would not shake his head, gently chide, if you had to silence all who saw you bare you may need to kill God first. "I'm your partner."

"And dangling you, their lost prize, right in their face might just make the meeting more tense than it needs to be. That is, if the smell of dog doesn't throw them off first —"

Hands wrapped around the sides of his coat. The floor of the Hospital room was too clean — the soles of his shoes screeched against it, as he was pulled forward.

"I'm not a prize," Chuuya snarled, and there it was — the spark of ire he had seen pass him by all those weeks, too busy and too concerned to linger. Dazai didn't think there was any real reason to — was sure he did a better job at hiding the discomfort of his own bones at the sight of him.

Despite his skin's nauseous protests, he raised two fingers, and tapped them on his temple. "Whatever telltale they left in your skin when they put liquified destruction inside it is, though."

It only took three beeps from the heart monitor for him to hiss, "Fuck you." His grip tightened; close enough for the sunlight streaming from the window to paint his eyes almost the same color, he spat: "Want to talk about what happened when Mori was hit —"

"Be very careful, Chuuya," He blinked, very fast and very innocent, because he wasn't surprised and yet his face had almost twitched. "Haven't you heard? Flies everywhere."

"You couldn't care less if he dies," he snapped. The quiet quality of his voice was at odds with the rigid lines of his frame. "He almost bled out on that damn floor — and you froze. You. Want me to believe it's out of some sort of loyalty? You don't have shit like that. I know you don't."

"You know," Dazai echoed, amused.

"Personal entertainment is the only reason why you keep stepping away from the edge at the last minute. Nothing else."

"I don't know," he mused, tilting his head to the side. "Isn't it somewhat jarring — watching someone like him die? Makes you stop and believe there truly isn't any way out."

Confusion only existed for a moment — he barked a humorless laugh. "What, you thought if he was gone no one would do you the favor of killing you?"

"Irrelevant," Dazai smiled. "It doesn't matter, Chuuya, does it? We have you — to effortlessly jump in front of him and take a bullet to your chest with zest and enthusiasm," The corner of his mouth pulled; the stretch burned. "No matter that no one would attempt to murder the Boss of the Port Mafia without an Ability-enchanted bullet. No matter if it would make us lose the greatest asset of the organization —"

"Boss is the organization —"

"No, no, we," Dazai put his hands on his shoulders and shook, rattled that empty skull of his, lips trembling with amusement, "We, every man under his thumb — We're the organization. And Mori is comatose in a Hospital bed. The bullets were governmental weapons. From the War! I know you realized it too — that a part of them is behind the Ballerinas."

Chuuya's set his jaw. His eyes fluttered in the man's direction.

"You wouldn't have done a thing if you had been hit that bullet," he insisted, mocking. "Except die. Instead — you stayed alive and you killed Komako and Shimamura. Kajii has been studying the weapon archives from the Great War; Sergeant Maresuke's Ability-made bullets — they always find their target," He sighed, so very fake. "How come I'm the suicidal one between us?"

“I was trying, ” he spelled out, pulling him close enough he could see drool and hatred seethe between his teeth, “To save my superior.”

“Why?” Dazai dared. “Because he gave you a new life? People to love? To lose?”

The monitor beeped.

The grip grew nearly unbearable; circling his throat until he couldn’t breathe, suffocating between fabric almost as familiar as his bandages, and Dazai thought, you don’t know a thing and you’ll never know a thing and I will never let you and you will never know, and how to explain, truly, that doctors were for the sick and the sick were for the doctors, the two of them in a clinic and in an attic and in a tombstone —

Chuuya said: “Lie to my face when it isn’t the first time you wear that damn coat.”

His smile fell.

You don’t know a thing, he thought, as devoid as a page. “You —“

With a painful screech, the door opened.

“Oh,” one of the nurses said. Blond hair and a distracted smile; Dazai had memorized each of them, because they fumbled with Mori’s overly whiny bones, and he didn’t want to deal with the aftermath of his age pains when he woke up. “Oh, I — Doctor Komoto is coming up for his daily checks.”

Dazai bowed slightly, stepping back from his grasp. Chuuya let him; didn’t do anything but watch as he grinned, utmost polite. “We’ll leave, then. We wouldn’t want to breathe on her neck. Just let us tidy up.”

“Sure thing,” then, she reprimanded: “As long as you don’t steal the poor man’s flowers to offer them to the nurses again.”

Brilliantly, he bowed again. “If you wanted one more than your friends, all you had to do was ask.”

She closed the door again, maybe; he didn’t check — didn’t listen to any sound by the rush of thoughts in his ears, louder than any door, as stable as the ripples through the water.

He leaned over to pick up the dossiers he had brought over from the Boss’ office, biting down a glare of irritation when the other boy didn’t move — allowing him to brush his lips on his ear.

“I want every single friend of the Ballerinas in the City Hall to bear the crux of a slit throat,” Dazai whispered, easily. “Every single one. I don’t care what hole you have to infiltrate to get them, or how long it will take. Your Guerrilla is the most valuable armed team of the syndicate, right? Mori said so,” He moved away, just enough to meet his gaze. “Prove it, or I’ll ask you to pull the old man’s plug out.”

A feral kind of warning lined the sharp line of his mouth. “Get down from your fucking high horse. You don’t have the authority to do that.”

“I’m the only one who does, currently, actually,” he let him know. He felt himself smile; knew it was one of those ugly, not quite human sights, because Chuuya didn’t falter a bit — just raised his chin until their noses almost brushed, uncaring of the inches that had grown between them, or of the fabric weight on his shoulders, or Mori, sleeping and listening and dying.

“What?” Dazai purred, with the eyes that would get him a bloodied nose. “You know me, better than you care for,” he quoted. “And you’re not willing to kneel at my feet?”

You already did, his lips traced, still as his spine, you already did, I saw it, I saw it first so it’s mine. Something about rage had to be human, he could swear — no other reason for it to feel like a stranger on well-loved flesh.

“I’d rather tear my heart out myself,” Chuuya replied, untouched. “And you would too. So stop lying to me.”

“Why,” he insisted, “Because you know me?”

“Yes,” No hesitation faltered his breath of an answer; if only Dazai had dangled forward, he could have bitten him until he bled. “You can fool them all you want. You’re not fooling me,” he said. Snow to his calves as they danced; his laughter against the explosion of a car; his hands — scarred by a thing who hated it all but Dazai the most — on the shattered skin he did not care for and did not want him to see and who else if not him and anyone but. “Let me know when you get tired of pretending you’re even whole enough to want any of this.”

Imperceptibly, Mori’s fingers seemed to twitch.

His own followed.

“You get a month to kill them all,” Dazai ordered, when he heard him reach the window. “I’m sure you’ll do a good job. You hardly have any other way of giving Boss a reason to let you stay.”

His sigh could have been a chuckle; his chuckle could have been disgust spat on the ground. The latest firefly to get caught in the net — the latest bruised knees on the ground at a doctor’s feet, walking all over the ash of the fools to come before him.

“Sure thing,” Chuuya mocked back, frame bathed in liquified scarlet. “Partner.”

The door of the Hospital room opened with a screech. Dazai sat on the guest seat; Mori slept. He waited.

---

...

---

The moment the four-people embassy got a good look at him — under the flickering lights of a parking lot — all of their guards' rifles were raised.

“Well,” Dazai commented. The suited silhouettes of the Unit were a glint at the edge of his vision, shouldered by the less usual one of a Black Lizards' wing; their own weapons carefully hidden. “That's not very polite.”

“Sending the Demon Prodigy to an alleged peaceful meeting isn't, either,” Agent Minami replied, eyes set in an unforgivable line. Ango had provided general info on the Agents flaunting her sides; just enough to know she was the only one worthy of attention. “I thought the Port Mafia wanted to plead innocence.”

He smiled, just a bit — enough for their fingers to settle more firmly on the trigger, and for Hirotsu to grow more cautious at his back. “Don't I elicit trust?”

“You've made yourself a name.”

“And I'm sure you have it in your archives,” he agreed, hands crossed at the small of his back. The faint sway of his bored frame gathered some gazes from the other side. “Some numbers, some letters. Question marks in my alleged Ability section? You're stubborn, not to leave it empty.”

“Most of you people may lack proper registration,” Minami said, standing in that way of good men — a confidence of sorts, well-earned, only mean. “But that cannot change open secrets.”

“I've never met someone with an Ability. Are they as cool as you guys?”

“That redhead of yours might tell you.”

“You mean your daughter’s saviour?” Her face was devoid in a second; Dazai felt his grin sharpen. “Wonder what she would think of the torture your perfectly lawful group put him through, just some months ago.”

“Torture,” the woman scoffed, carefully contained. “We aren’t criminals. We’re not you.”

“No,” he agreed — and because confessions would be damning on the thousands of bugs he could bet they were wearing, he added: “Criminals usually don’t have that easy of an access to Ability bullets of Governmental origin.”

Minami paused.

“I stand in the settling sun,” Dazai recited, as he took a step forward. The Division’s weapons rose with him; Hirotsu’s eyes flickered to him, as if willing to pull him back. “Sergeant Maresuke Ability. The Gentlemen Bank is in possession of all of his enchanted projectiles — that was the peace deal that was made with the Japanese Government.”

“And how would you know?” she asked.

“I had a chance to take a look at the Bank’s archives,” He shrugged. “All begs the question: how did one of those bullets, willingly given up by the now-Senator — end up in my Boss’ chest?”

In a collective breath, air left every man’s lungs. If Hirotsu could have pulled his ear again — he guessed he would have. Behind his outstretched arm the Black Lizards’ nostrils flared; even Dazai’s men seemed not to know how to act in the face of that information.

No one is to know he has fallen, Kouyou had said, when the man’s body was still warm and soaked in blood — and Dazai’s shoes were dirty, but his ears never quite unlistening. Especially not outside of these walls.

To a kinder eye, Minami’s gelid stillness might have been plain surprise.

“The seat is vacant?” she questioned.

“Ah, no,” He offered his most apologetic look. “As you know, Ability-inflicted wounds tend to be conundrums. It means that until we find whoever shot that stolen bullet — the Sergeant and his people, we assume — he lives in his limbo,” Her gaze filled with understanding. “Which is precisely why we’re here.”

“And why would we help you?” the woman noted. “Cut off the head, and the body might not find a way to stand up again. It’s an opportunity.”

Dazai chuckled. “How inhuman of you.”

“My Commander believes in the safety of thousands at the price of few,” Minami corrected. She had never looked much like a fighter; more like someone who belonged behind a desk, maybe — who let others dip their hands in blood and wrote it down in endlessly lifeless numbers. “After many years ensuring the safety of Yokohama, I tend to agree.”

He hummed. “And what would happen to your Commander, were the Government were to find out he has been funding a whole faction of his Division into collaborating with the Ballerinas, and the foreign terrorists behind them?”

A flare of shocked hesitation rattled their weapons in their hands — even Minami’s facade seemed to tremble, soaked in genuine confusion. Her colleagues snapped: “The Special Division has protected Abilities since its first day —“

“How dare you accuse Commander Taneda —“

“I’m not saying your Commander wasn’t fooled as well,” Dazai hurried to correct, waving his hands around, “No, no, no — You see, whoever was aiding the Ballerinas is very, very smart. Much smarter than even your saint Taneda! Yokohama is clearly a center of some importance for them; Abilities are something they don’t particularly like. So, what do they do? Plant a seed in the place with the most control over Abilities in Yokohama.”

“You’re weaving a trap for yourself,” Minami said — interest unignorable in her tone. “If, as you said, we were to find a mole faction in the Special Division, the Government wouldn’t blame the Commander. They would just ask him to eradicate them.”

“Yes,” He sucked air between his teeth; elbowed the still-stiffened side of Hirotsu’s frame, pretending to whisper: “Except the Government doesn’t really like you guys, does it?”

Her eyes squinted. “You —“

“Oh, it needs you, of course it does. You’re more than necessary. Unregulated Abilities would drown the city into its deepest despair since they were first aided for the War,” He put his hands on his hips. “But does that mean they would really be so unwilling to start over, should it come out what your egregious Commander was blind enough to let fester? I mean,” Dazai blinked. “With the gelid weeks, do you know how many of those Senators had to give up on their summer crusades?”

“Many of them,” Hirotsu answered, once Dazai psst-ed. Blank-faced, he added: “The Division is inevitably connected to the Government. Were it to come out either one of you was the cause for this attack — the other would go down as well.”

“And a new wave of anti-Ability propaganda would probably begin,” he sighed. “Which might just demand the dismantlement of you guys’ towers.”

Minami set her jaw. “This isn’t simply a matter of this or that organization. Should Abilities be restricted more severely again, all Users would all take the fall —“

Dazai shrugged. “That’s fine, then. It’s not like Mori Corp employs people with Abilities, don’t you know? It’s illegal, or something,” He tilted his head to the side. “Ah, it’s about Abilities and weapons, I believe. They’re not meant to go together; that’s what the high floors say.”

“Nothing would change for you,” the woman hissed, slowly, as pieces settled into place in front of her eyes. “You were in the shadows before — you will be once again.”

“Personally, I much prefer sunny days.”

“What is it that you want?”

“That’s very easy,” He swayed forward, uncaring of the ocean between them. “We want a free pass to take care of that traitorous faction of yours.”

Distantly, came the rumble of a car’s engine. It did not shatter the silence that had fallen — for the first time since they had entered the parking lot, Dazai saw nothing but honesty on Agent Minami’s face.

Deadly calm, she asked: “You want us to look away as you murder our men?”

“You could call it an execution.”

“We have better methods,” she snapped, brusque. “We have more than enough proof that the Ballerinas and their aider have received help from the Government itself — we could bargain. You think we will allow you to go on a murder spree on this city’s pillars?”

“It was about time this city got rid of some lingering germs, wasn’t it?” Dazai commented. “We all want the same thing: for Yokohama to stand. As long as its roots are steadily being poisoned, that will not happen,” He clicked his tongue. “I can’t say I particularly care about this matter, but my Boss seemed concerned. And so do you. Not that you will be able to protect anything, once you get dismantled.”

Minami’s eyes searched through him.

Her chests did not rise and fall; her gaze roamed up and down the black silhouettes in front of her, unharmed — and Dazai had long learned to recognize a caged prey.

“Why,” she questioned, — cautiously quiet, breaking each syllable, studying the darkness underneath. “Ask for this, and not a Permit?”

“Because we don’t need one,” Dazai offered — and he saw it, as clear as an arrow breaking through bone; heard the wet squelch of viscera around the tip, as Minami looked at the world decided her own truth — that the Port Mafia was a careless, vainglorious hydra, and that even while regrowing heads it would get distracted, at some point. “Not more than we need our Boss.”

“Plus,” He smiled again. “Isn’t it better if you owe us two favors, instead of one?”

Her shoulders molded themselves into a new shape. He heard the hitch in Hirotsu’s breath — the instinctive violence, the unwillingness to see the imperceptible glint of victory. Minami wore the mask of a loser; Dazai saw her plan behind it, as her men’s grasp on their weapons grew steadier.

“Alright then,” she conceded, nodding. “You have it. As for the Sergeant — he works in close proximity with our higher ups. We won’t be able to close the Government’s eyes, too. And then no deus ex machina will save you.”

“No, need,” Dazai waved the matter away. From the distance, a car engine. “I’ve got my own gods to pray to for a cleanse.”

---

...

---

The door of the Hospital room opened with a screech. Dazai sat on the guest seat; Mori slept. He waited.

---

...

---

Odasaku’s car was waiting.

“Ango will get super super mad if you keep hot wiring his baby,” Dazai let him know, fidgeting on the passenger seat. “He says it upsets her stomach, whatever that means.”

“Engine metaphors,” the man replied, keeping a calm pace as they roamed down the Port. Heat and darkness were an unhealthy mixture through the lowered window, threatening to split his chapped lips and bite off the hand he was dangling out. “And that’s why I slipped his keys off at the Bar, last night.”

“Ah,” He nodded. “That will certainly make him more amendable.”

“Is amendable —“

“Comic,” he answered, immediately.

“Would the poets agree?”

“I haven’t got the faintest,” he admitted. “We can ask, the next time Pops is feeling up for it.”

He rolled his window up and down; set his feet on the dashboard and lowered them again. He'd worn three pairs of socks today, and the gathering sweat on the soles made his eyes twitch intermittently. Odasaku graciously allowed him to take his watch to compare it with Hirotsu's own, and move its time back and forward.

"Why did you ask me to come with you, anyway?"

Dazai gave him a funny look. "Who else?"

"I'm not going to help you kill anyone," Odasaku reminded him. "Anyone but me would have sufficed."

"No one as talented as you," he corrected. "Remember what I told you? Would you rather eat from a cook who put too many spices in their curry by mistake, or one who put them in because they know just the right amount to kill a man?"

"Why is a man dying, in this metaphor?"

"The cook works for the Government. Or it's me."

"Oh," He paused. "Your Unit could have helped more, still. I don't think there's anything remarkable about eating curry."

Dazai toasted an invisible glass in his direction. "Everyone is remarkable in their own way."

"Are you?"

"Most certainly," He nodded. "And when the author of The Complete Guide To Suicide features me in his sequel, you will know it as well."

"That doesn't seem like the kind of book that would warrant a sequel," Odasaku noted.

"You write it for me, then!"

"I'm afraid I've got other stories in mind."

"Ones where I don't die?" he whined.

A glance. "I don't think that's the point."

He sighed. "It never is."

"And Chuuya?"

And Chuuya, what?, Dazai could have said. He didn't. And Chuuya? All they seemed to ask. The swelling of him was a curse down his throat, insisting he said his name, sometimes, to an uninterested audience or an empty room. Vocalize the itch in his lungs; exorcise the urge to. Dazzling and distracting and good and unkeepable, for it. And Chuuya.

"Is he remarkable?" the man clarified.

Something about his tone made him grunt. He slipped down his seat, watching the city lights blur behind the dirty windshield. Ango was always too busy to tidy up after himself; Odasaku always got his car washed after he stole it.

“Remarkable,” he spelled out. “Intuitive awareness, I suppose, might tell you so. He would make the gold on the ground remarkable by commutative property of him having touched it,” He put on the stolen watch; tightened the leather around his bony wrist, next to Hirotsu’s broken one. “Mori’s greatest investment.”

Something about the look he sent his way made him smile — almost, but he didn’t. He was a good man, before he was many things — cunning men could hardly be good, but Odasaku did his best. He knew Dazai had cards and had tricks.

Better me using him than Mori, Dazai would rationalize, when Chuuya was involuntarily kind — shared a snack, shared Arcade tickets, shared his bed. But he couldn’t quite say why.

“Isn’t that you?” Odasaku commented.

He laughed. “I’m not an investment.”

“What are you, then?”

The flickering, weak lights of a neon sign appeared at the edge of the road — a building of bricks and rotten ivy, as there was at the every end of the Port area; a lair of overworked shadows and dead-eyed women, soaking the air in a smell of alcohol so thick it was suffocating.

Dazai set his hands on the door; winked. “A bet.”

Inside, the bar was just as unassumingly rudimental as the outside — old tables and creaking seats; empty bottles in the wall behind the counter; the low hum of undirnesible music; the unmistakable toasts of the most drunk men around, sluggish and ear-piercing.

He sighed, leaning into the doorframe. “Can’t we go do literally anything else? Anything. We could sneak into the movies and watch that one biopic Ango wanted to see — and then go to watch it again, and make him wonder how we’re so good at guessing all the plot twists.”

“You’re the one who said this was important, though,” Odasaku replied.

“Or, or — you said your Katsumi wants to learn how to skateboard, didn’t you? We could teach him!”

A curious blink. “You know how to skate?”

“Well, no. But how hard can it be? What if — Let’s use your Ability at one of Ace’s Casinos. We can make enough money to dig a hole in the ground.”

“That’s not how my Ability works,” the man informed him. “Couldn’t we dig it even with no money?”

“We could, but what’s the fun in that?”

He hummed, conceding. “What do we do with it?”

Dazai tapped his chin. “Bury me?”

Odasaku surveyed the intoxicated crowd, hands in his pockets. He had the shoulders of someone who had never quite lost a fight if he hadn’t asked for it; sometimes, Dazai wanted to pry. He never did. He was content, most days, with that layer of certainty — that before being light, Odasaku had looked at blood and marveled as much as Dazai did.

“How do you know the men who shot Boss are in here?”

Warmth vanished with the breeze; the door closed behind them. Dazai swallowed a smile — intertwined his fingers behind his back, attempting not to flinch at his inability to put his arms under the coat. Blood on his shoes.

“One of the guards of the Division’s embassy from today was a mole from the traitor faction,” he explained. “I let him know Mori is currently in an unstable condition. He’s the one I asked you to track, before you came to get me. You know what moles and Governmental traitors do after a job well done?”

The man tilted his head like an owl. He still had to crank his neck to meet his eyes; but he was getting closer and closer everyday.

“What all men do,” Dazai shrugged, at his questioning eyebrows. “Get drunk.”

He extracted his gun from the back of his pants, and fired three bullets to the ceiling.

The resounding bang! startled shoulders out of their seats, tearing screams out of unfocused throats. Only him and Odasaku stayed still, watching eyes struggle to settle on the silhouettes disturbing their fun.

“Good evening,” he greeted. “This sure is a tasteless location to bring estimated men of the Special Division to, Sergeant.”

Very subtly, Odasaku licked his lips — always dry after he saw, with Flawless — and he pulled him a bit to the side. Less than five seconds later, a stray glass shattered on the wall next to his face.

Senator Maresuke was a tall man, bearing the features of someone who might have been attractive, before he had started to try too hard. A mixture of the distracted eyes he could remember seeing the Colonel wear, and a dangerous lack of sobetry, made his steps through the tables a mere staggering forward.

He raised a clumsy hand; tried to point at him, specifically, accusing.

“Put that shit down, brat,” he warned, a curl of gulped letters, barely understandable. “We don’t wan’ troubles.”

“I’m sure,” He nodded.

“If you know me, you know better than to annoy me on such a great night.”

“Ah,” Dazai lowered his arm; considered, for some inexplicable reason, shooting his own foot to see if it really hurt. He was brought back on track by the subtly — or attempting at subtlety — rising bodies from the tables. “Because you’re someone, or because of your Ability?”

The man squinted. “You want to know which one could get you arrested if you don’t put that gun down?”

As a game, for the sake of entertainment — he imagined him on some leather seat, polished nails and a collection of medals, a whole wing of Senators and of the Division willing to follow him. Throwing bullets in the air; watching the clear windows of the Headquarters, humming.

Then blood on his shoes.

A squeak escaped Dazai’s throat.

He thought, distantly, that it had been meant to be a laugh. It was more of a gasp for air, though — a wave of hot, burning hilarity that made his teeth ache for the sake of sinking into something. Odasaku’s eyes, in his peripheral; a hospital bed and a bonsai tree and the smoke rising from Hirotsu’s cigarette —

[“He bought me these,” he said. He thought he did. His mouth was anesthetized; the idea of speaking was blasphemous.

Mori’s eyes were open, eyelashes sticking to the pool of blood that had reached his neck. Dazai felt it all through the haze of confusion — at why he wouldn’t stand up, or blink, or move a bit to the left, or stop looking at Elise like that, or stop putting him back together just because doctors could never leave well enough alone — or why he was on the ground, dying, as if Yokohama could stand without him, as if he could die in a world where Dazai didn’t sink his nails in his skull and laughed as he killed him, killed him just like he had killed —

“He’ll get mad I got blood on them,” he swore.]

“No,” Dazai said. “I don’t really care.”

A blur — a choked sound and a hand around a throat and knees hitting the ground. Dazai wondered if Senator Maresuke had liked the Great War more than Mori had — and then he smashed his shoe in his windpipe.

The after was red and clammy; loud like particularly bad video games. The smell of gunpowder reached his nostrils; the sticky texture of blood stuck to his fingers, to his chin, to his teeth — Dazai pushed and he pulled and he fired and he settled on top of a man and he grabbed his skull and smashed it against the ground, once, twice, thrice —

“Stop,” the man between his hands begged, voice a thread, drool pooling down his chin, one eye shaking against the barrel of the gun he had pressed into it, “Stop, stop,” Drunkenly, he swayed, “Stop, I know — Powerful friends, they — I know the Port Mafia —”

“That’s nice,” he offered, polite until the very end, and shot a hole through his eyeball, and said, as he shrieked, “I am the Port Mafia.”

Blood rained from the ceiling; he tore hair out and smashed jaws open against the counter, because there was no curb — charged his gun with a flick of the wrist, and he fired and fired and fired again, empty glass bottles imploding, windows shattering, wet squelch of flesh entering his ear and forgetting to leave.

They’ll make a story about this, too, he considered, in some distant world — and then they would come up with a name — they came up with names for everything in the shadows — and Dazai would be greeted with bows and Mori would die in a Hospital room — and Dazai would wear a red scarf and he’d never get to take it off, never get to leave, never get to understand, never get to die, never get to leave, and what would change even if he did, what difference was there between good and bad, never get to leave, never get to —

A hand closed around his gun, and Dazai fired a bullet straight through Odasaku’s palm.

There wasn’t air in his lungs; he panted, his chest raising and falling so fast it was numbing — the silence utterly devastating. The weapon landed on the ground with a sharp clank!

“Ah,” he started. Odasaku’s hand bled; the drops landed on the floor without a sound.

A bleeding hand grasped his nape and slammed his forehead to the ground, none the gentler, knotted into his hair to keep his chest against the floor — and then something warm, warm, pressing onto his back, holding him.

“Breathe,” the voice ordered. “You can’t get up until you breathe.”

I am, he attempted to let the voice know, but it was pushed back by the next bark of whistling air climbing up his throat, drool pooling on the ground, mere inches from the rest of his face, and that was disgusting, he said, offered his greatest temper tantrum — forehead pulsing, body convulsing, and Dazai was doomed, was doomed, couldn’t let them see him like this, they couldn’t know, Mori couldn’t know —

“That’s fine,” Odasaku said, easily. “I won’t tell him.”

Abruptly, he felt nothing.

“Oh,” Dazai blinked. “Thank you, then.”

A pause. The hand on his back slid down; enough to listen to the rise and fall between his shoulders, trustful but never too much — and how he loved being trusted, the way people did.

Another pause. “You’re welcome.”

A wet trail pooled down his throat. “You’re bleeding,” he said. Ignoring the corpses all around them, the horrifying sight of blood splattered all over every wall and ceiling, he echoed: “You’re bleeding.”

Odasaku was a canva waiting to be filled; nothing like the thirteen tiles he had painted and Mori had made him wash off, least the colors got to his brain. Paper and possibility; he blinked at his wounded hand with the tranquility of the sea, and Dazai ached with the desire to keep him.

Sorry, he thought about saying, but he didn’t. Sorry, sorry, I touched it and —

“It’s fine,” Odasaku said, still. If the pool of blood he was sitting on bothered him, he didn’t show it. “Barely grazed me.”

The back of his skull hit the ground. It was damp and too hot; there were runaway intestines on the floor, mere feet from him, and not nearly enough space to climb into one of the twenty, thirty, forty carcasses he had carved.

He said: “I’m bothering you, Odasaku, aren’t I?”

The man thought about it. Eventually, he shook his head. “You never do.”

“You’re too kind,” Dazai decided, because he did not believe him one bit. “To everyone. To all things — halved things. I just had to go and stumble on you, didn’t I?”

“Dazai.”

“I don’t even believe in fate all that much,” He licked his lips and winced at the burn, staring at the ceiling. “More than I used to. Someone I knew used to tell me it was a cat.”

Old pants on a stained floor; Odasaku’s eyes on him — a man who didn’t want to kill sitting in blood for him. “Why a cat?”

“Just a cat,” he replied. “It would like you. It never says a word when I beg it to talk. I don’t know why.”

He stayed quiet.

Blood rained from the ceiling. He didn’t watch it land on a crimson puddle on the ground, because memory was to be crowded by more precious things than the habitual.

“I want to be like you, sometimes.”

Odasaku made a funny face. “Me?”

“Feel like,” Words escaped; he tried to give them a meaning, because he owed it to him — something realer than the flare in his chest whenever he walked down the stairs of Bar Lupin; the timid, desperate feeling that he wouldn’t mind living the little time he had left. “Feel like I’m making up for it. I’ll die, someday. I know I will. It sounds like the most human thing this world will ever get out of me.”

“I want, ” he insisted, “I want to — what if this is it? I’m so rarely scared. Mori said even he is scared of the dark, but I never was. Dogs are scary, but — what if this is it, Odasaku — what if this is it? Isn’t that terrifying?” The shuffle of fabric on the ground; the man’s knees against the side of his ribcage. “I’m not scared of dying at all, how is that fair?” Hands on his chest — callused fingers down the blood stains of his jacket, expression emptily focused. “What are you doing?”

Odasaku’s blinks were slow — and he thought he saw it, perched on a shattered window, that old cat that always curled his tail where Dazai could see. Odasaku paused the finger he had been running down his chest; nodded towards his own.

“It’s twenty four,” he informed him.

There was blood stuck to his hair; his eye could not see through it. “Twenty four what?”

“Ribs,” A shrug. “You don’t seem halved to me.”

Dazai stared.

“Oh,” he said, a bit lost, centuries later.

Very seriously, Odasaku nodded.

Dazai’s lips quivered.

“Ah,” he echoed. Cleared his throat; felt smaller than any room and any sky, and then too wide to keep silent. “Do you want to play Guess The Card?”

Odasaku ripped a cloth off the nearest table, dragging a corpse’s brains down with it. He laid it on the river under their legs; threw the deck he always brought along on it. “You might want to keep a finger on my calf,” he told him, as easy as the road outside, the few pieces of furniture in his shipping container. As quiet as a beggar, Dazai ached. “Or I’m afraid I will definitely cheat.”

---

...

---

The door of the Hospital room opened with a screech. Dazai sat on the guest seat; Mori slept. He waited.

---

...

---

The door of the Hospital room opened with a screech. Dazai sat on the guest seat; Mori slept.
He waited.

---

...

---

The door of the Hospital room opened with a screech. Dazai sat on the guest seat; Mori slept.
He waited.

---

...

---

The door of the Hospital room opened with a screech. Dazai sat on the guest seat; Mori —

---

The moment Dazai entered the room, Elise ran like she wanted to strangle him — she stopped right before their shoes touched.

“There you are,” she whined. Attempted to; her voice had a strange quality to it — something like a vinyl spinning on the wrong side; echoing at the wrong parts and splitting in two tones near the end of a verse. Her eyes, settled on his face with the viciousness of a thief, had never been as vacant. “Tell those stupid nurses to bring me my dolls. I’m so bored.”

“I don’t think the nurses are supposed to know you’re here,” he replied. “And comatose men are unlikely to play with dolls.”

“I know,” she grunted. “That’s what Master said.”

A pause.

From the bed he had refused to lay his eyes on, Mori chided, strangely brusque: “Elise.”

She blinked — once, twice. Clarity broke through the marbles-like haze in her eyes — Dazai thought he could see the pieces rearranging themselves, subtly, in every muscle of her face and every straightening bone of her spine, obeying the mere idea of the doctor’s wishes.

High-pitched and bratty, she snapped: “What do you want, Rintarou? I’m trying to get myself my dolls, like you didn’t manage to!”

The first time Dazai met Mori’s open eyes in a month, he saw him nod, approving.

“Be glad I didn’t dye your hair red,” were the words out of his mouth. The sight of his back, more or less leaning on the pillows — of the fingers running down the pages of his own clinical record, unavoidably weak from a month of immobility — was disorientating. “The nurses insisted on being the ones to wash you.”

A smile stretched Mori’s face. It closed his eyes, too, and Dazai had no chance to see if it reached them. “I truly don’t know if Kouyou would appreciate the hairstyle competition.”

Last time they had talked, the Executive was as busy as a business woman — jumping from right to left to fix up things for the Boss’ return; organizing alibis for the cleanse Chuuya and his squad were methodically going through.

“Come here.”

Dazai did.

The man's eyes raked down his coat — taking notice of it being worn properly with a pointedly empty expression. Someone had raised the hospital bed; even half sat and with ruffled hair, Mori managed to imperceptibly tower upon his standing frame.

Seventeen seems like a good time to hit a growth spurt, he had told him, some time ago.

Mori studied his face, as if time had passed for him, too. He hummed.

“By the way,” the man said. Cuddled up near his feet was Elise, braiding strands of her own hair with a distracted, confused gaze. “I forgot to wish you a happy birthday, back in June.”

Dazai raised his shoulders in a half shrug; intertwined his hands behind his back. “Don’t tell me the coma fumbled with your memories. You never do.”

“You’ve never been a birthday party guy,” His sigh was almost sincere. Outside the windows, the sun was falling, and the room was golden with it. “Elise gave up on the party hats by the time you were fifteen. Is that why you don’t tell people?”

Dazai sighed back, deep. “I wouldn’t mind a gift or two. But why would I want people to make a big deal about the life I can’t leave?”

“When you reach my age — you’ll regret not having had some more fun with functioning limbs.”

“Don’t start talking like an old man,” he huffed. “You can make cartwheels in the Hall of Light and Darkness, if you want, as soon as you’re out. It would certainly make Elise laugh.”

The man made a face. “You truly have no idea what my joints look like right now.”

“Well, obviously,” Dazai nudged the bed. “You’ve been lazing around for almost a month now.”

“Oh, they’ll trap me into physical therapy,” Mori tapped his own cheeks, staring at the ceiling. “What will the men think of me? Having to leave meetings early because I can’t move my knees?”

“I’m sure the men will rejoy when they see you.”

A hopeful look. “Are you?”

“Sure. They all think you’ve been ignoring them. Got all whiny about it, too.”

“That won’t do.”

“No,” he agreed, “I suppose it won’t.”

He nodded, mechanically, once; then again.

“Then,” Mori intertwined his hands. “Is the Special Division where it’s supposed to be?”

“At the bottom of underestimation, yes,” he answered, imperceptibly late to a cunning eye — felt the instinct to take a step back, and then didn’t. “For someone who isn’t you to show up to their first unofficial meeting with the thorn in their side — they’ve made their own conclusions. And Agent Minami has witnessed us pass up the opportunity to gain a Permit twice, now.”

“If they believe we’re minimizing how viciously the lack of a Permit could hit us, they will certainly focus all of their efforts into catching us without it,” the man mused, picking at the dirt under his nails. He had a vague, slumber-traced memory of seeing Chuuya sit next to him and clean them. “Which means we must focus all of our efforts into trapping them where they won’t have a choice but to give the key out to us.”

“The Guerrilla squad is currently taking care of the mole faction in the City Hall,” Dazai offered. “My plans are on the table.”

“Ever so reliable, you Double Black.”

“It should take a little over a month to make them all disappear. And a bit more to blame it on the Ballerinas — though we’re not sure of the other members yet,” He scrunched his nose up. “Which means we’ll need to put new people in the empty place.”

“I’ll read some resumes,” Mori waved the matter away. “Elections are coming soon, anyway. One powerful man is worth the other, as long as he doesn’t speak too much. You can take care of teaching them where loyalty is meant to lay, yes?”

“That sounds boring.”

“That’s just how power is,” The man reached forward again, and he fixed up the collar of his jacket. “Have you been keeping my seat warm?”

“You know I prefer the floor under a desk.”

“I haven’t seen you perched under there in a while, now that I think about it.”

“Come back,” Dazai replied, “And I will.”

Your walls are your skeleton, Mori had said, once, and he’d believed him — because he would always be pinned butterflies in a glass cabinet, and the flickering medical lights upon the bed Dazai slept tied to.

“Maybe it’s time we start worrying about the future,” the man said, eventually, like the old-as-time foundations of his own personal decay. Dazai swore to walk out of that room and take his arms out of that coat. “Give you some clearer direction.”

“That would be inconvenient,” Dazai let him know.

“Why?”

“Plant where you can reap,” he recited. Perched on the window seal was a cat; Dazai watched it blink at him. “Invest in the durable. Don’t feed a dead man walking. How many metaphors do you need?”

“I think they will suffice,” Mori replied, easily, in that tone that only meant being ignored where it mattered. “Say. You planned for Chuuya to get hurt at the lake, didn’t you?”

He picked at the bandages on his wrist — kept his eyes on the cat’s tail, swaying gently.

“Part of it was Akutagawa, I’m assuming,” the doctor continued, undeterred, still focused on his nails. “You had been expecting me to act upon him in some way, so you created a situation where you would be able to gain both his contempt and desire to push harder. You expected me to scar his sister, adding to the reasons why he should despise you,” He tilted his head to the side. “Do you expect him to hate himself less, if he focuses all of his loathing on you?”

“You’re overestimating the situation,” Dazai replied. “I just wish for my weapons to be sharp. Unfortunately, you only made him more sticky, with that saving stunt of yours.”

“Then why let Chuuya get hurt?”

Chuuya had sat at Mori’s death bed like a person would have — Mori had no space for affection that could not be soil. His lips had been blue and his Corruption scars covered in frost — and Dazai had known he’d get him out. Dazai could not imagine not — “To verify something.”

“Verify,” he repeated.

“I needed him to end up under your blades,” he explained. “But you never treat him personally if it’s something non-life threatening.”

“And why did you need that?”

Dazai made a sound. Something petty; something unfit, but escaping his mouth all the same.

A smile spread through the man’s face, slower than that cursed season. “Ah,” he guessed, “You wanted to see if I would let him die.”

A hum.

“And if I had?”

A shrug.

“You know better than to lie to me.”

“Careful,” Dazai nodded towards the IV — dripping in carelessness; in something Mori would not want to linger on. “You don’t have enough iron in your body to threaten silly little me.”

“Not a threat,” he replied. “A conclusion.”

“Fascination is good as long as it is selfless,” he recited, undeterred. “Despite your best efforts to pair us up, I have no particularly personal care for his existence. He’s the one who was stupid enough to lay it in my hands.”

His eyes searched. Dazai held them.

“That,” he added, tilting his head to the side. “Or I just know you.”

“He’s the strongest User in our ranks, Dazai,” the man reminded him, tone obnoxiously patronizing. “I’m not a fool.”

“We were powerful before him, too,” he insisted. “And I know you’re growing desperate about that Permit. I’ve seen the plans in your office. The letters, the favors — you aren’t willing to wait anymore.”

“You broke in, you mean.”

“Should have thought about it before making me the brain of every security item in your syndicate,” He shrugged. “If he had died by the hands of an unregistered Ability User like Komako, we could have pinned it on the Division’s incapacity — could have used his old testimony on what they did to him as an ulterior motive. To get a Permit. He won’t let us, as long as Yuan is safe with Minami.”

“Loyalty is not worthy of punishment.”

“When it’s to you.”

“It is,” Mori’s smile grew kind. “He threw himself in front of a bullet for me, didn’t he?”

Dazai removed his coat.

He sat on the guest seat, abandoning it on its back; pretended not to see the amusement on Mori features. I know I lie, he thought, but don’t you lie too?

“Listen to me,” the doctor said. “Some losses make you gain more than a victory would, in the long run. As long as Chuuya feels the weight of a Permit lost in his name, he will die for the sake of granting us another.”

“You really don’t have to teach me how to make my dog roll.”

“But,” Mori admitted, “I still don’t quite know if you’d make for a good leader.”

Dazai paused.

He recalled being younger, hand on a bloodied chest — shaking it and whining until he passed out, insistent and spoiled. The cat on the window had waited, patiently, because cats had too many lives not to grow attuned to the sound of a child losing it all. And then there had been the men in the white clothes, and the room with the rusted metal bed — and they kept telling him to cry, if he wanted to; to be more human about the blood on his too young hands.

There's a man who needs to die, the cat had explained, hands on his cane, as Dazai burned his white clothes. Not yet. I will tell you when. You will see me.

I don't know if I want to kill him, he had replied.

You won't have to, had been his promise. His fingers twitched — he thought about a letter, hidden under his desk. Only to witness it.

Mori clasped his hands. “Well. Why don't you go grab a chess board? No better place to start a lesson.”

Dear Dazai Osamu,

I beg you to forgive my Japanese, however lacking. I have been learning the language since I was very young, under the proper encouragement of a shared acquaintance of ours. Of course, my little knowledge of her is nothing compared to your own — but I did bear some semblance of curiosity regarding her, along to a never ending interest in the boy she always talked about. In a way, I truly feel like we already met.

I have heard they call me the “Demon of the North”, in those lands of yours. You may use this title, however funny it sounds to me. Perhaps talking from one demon to another would make this more fascinating to you, and convince you not to burn this letter the moment you see my organization’s seal. You should be sixteen, when you receive this, if my calculations are correct. Still so very young. The perfect age to burn.

Before I forget my manners: Merry Christmas.

Or Happy New Year? I have been told Japanese people are much more interested in the beginning of a new time. You may send your well wishes back to me, once you decide answering this letter is worth the effort. In the time I have had to study you, I have come to the conclusion that we are rather similar: I give you a few months.

Ten, I will say. That's how old you were when you killed her, correct?

It surely turned your life around. In my lands, some dare to call you the backbone of that syndicate of yours. And your Ability — I hear you need touch, to use it. Another thing the two of us have in common.

Here's another: aren't you bored, Dazai?

You must be. Your life seems terribly boring: a procession led by the most hidebound, uninteresting ants this world has to offer — and then you, trailing behind them, ten feet taller and with more eyes than you would even need, watching them crawl towards the unreachable and the unnecessary. Even that little redhead I hear you enjoy dragging around — he's rather blind. But powerful. I will give you that. Incredibly so.

Your life seems terribly boring; but more than that, it seems terribly lonely.

You don't need to worry. I am here now.

As a show of trust, I will give you this: when the summer comes to your city, it will come with unlikely candor. We're moving to the city more permanently, after my short visit during that conflict of yours. We are going to look for — it. Given the circumstances, I am sure no one but you or me would be able to find it.

A race of sorts. Something to make days lighter.

Your Boss will be our first target.

I do not presume to shoot him down with a single hit. Yet, I have found interesting allies who might just know how to attempt to. I am giving you this knowledge as a token; I am quite interested in seeing if you will attempt to save him — or simply stand and watch.

I truly do feel like I know you, Dazai. I cannot wait for us to sit in a room and talk, finally, about it all. Perhaps we can exchange tips. Perhaps we can meet in Hell, if you do not have prior engagements.

I will await your response with great enthusiasm. I know it will come. I am as patient as they come. For what is worth, know that I would gladly keep Yokohama from burning — if ashes did not tend to be very useful.

But do not worry. It is nothing blood won't warm up.

Respectfully,

Fyodor Dostoyevsky.

Chapter End Notes

dazai: fate is actually a cat

odasaku, just got shot and dealt with the dazai version of a panic attack all in the span of 3 minutes: man it might as well be nice to see you again guys! thank you so much for reading and i hope you enjoyed this! going back to chuuya next chapter... also i’m slowly realizing just how close we’re kinda getting to the end of this fic and ? wow. just the work of four years of my life. that’s cool. that’s fine. i can’t thank you guys enough for all the love you’ve given this until now!!

“as long as Chuuya feels the weight of a Permit lost in his name, he will die for the sake of granting us another.” i’m just saying u guys might want to remember that..... anyway.

i hope you’re having the best day and i hope you stay warm, and i hope to see you soon! much love <33 see you!!

TRULY

Chapter Notes

see you at the end ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

act two

[mais il s'agit de se faire l'âme monstrueuse]

---

The Haunted Floors — because Dazai said things, and they tended to stick — were unusually quiet. It was bound to happen, Chuuya mused, twirling the crimson scarf abandoned on the desk — being that their most usual ghost was nothing but a barely breathing thing in a Hospital bed.

He had never quite learned the mourning etiquette for the undead, but he knew snooping around their possessions was probably not it.

Kouyou would box his ears, he considered, tapping the drawers Elise had filled in stickers. Tanaki had been too busy — dealing with the worrying amount of commercial contacts demanding their alliances to be called off immediately, given Mori Corp's, rather worrying accusations, lately — to notice him sneaking through her wall passages. Chuuya vowed to to lay off with the, stepping on her fiancé's foot with heightened gravity, as a reward.

Stillness was a veil of dust on every piece of furniture in the sunbathed room, lined in gold; no one, though, would have allowed any inch of that place to grow dirty.

“Correct me if I’m wrong,” a voice peeked, terribly polite, “But shouldn’t the Guerrilla squad be all the way to Senator Takagi’s house, by now?”

Knives made an unmistakably peculiar sound when they sank in the fortified walls of the Headquarters; Kouyou, through sagacious training sessions and calligraphy lessons, had efficiently proved so.

Hirotsu didn't even flinch.

"You always put a spin on traditional methods," the man commented, not bothering with extracting the knife from the wall. "Throwing weapons is somewhat barbaric, but using your Ability to do so bestows innovation."

"You goin' give me a zero to ten rate too, Gramps?" he muttered, closing the drawers.

"If you'd like. Dazai gave you orders."

"Dazai can sit on a cactus and spin, as far as I'm concerned. I'm Ane-san's vice, until Boss decides otherwise. Not his," A pause. "Shouldn't you be guarding the Hospital?"

"Boss will survive my men's turnations," Hirotsu tilted his head to the side. "I'm hardly the only competent man around. Insubordination, on the other hand —"

"Hey," Chuuya warned. "I'm still your superior."

"Which is why I would expect you to know better."

"Elise has this cookie recipe that would make a cow shit rainbows," He waved his hands around, obnoxiously. "I'm sure looking for doses of flour is not an insubordination."

The Commander made a face. It was a familiar face, as most pieces of existence in the Headquarters tended to be — the drag of Kouyou's umbrella on the carpet; the indent of Mori's hand on his shoulder; the nose-raised glance Ace used as a greeting; the Opera from Kajii's laboratory; the lionel around Tanaki's arms from a new tattoo; the pain of a neck bent back to fully meet Dazai's eyes — the realization that the space next to him seemed taller everyday — wider, emptier, blacker.

Perhaps it was a character defect, he considered. He had never been one for unnecessary feelings. He had never been one for homesickness, either.

Homesick, he munched, through the hum of a song he didn't quite know. Shirase would have laughed at him; then he would have asked, were we not home? Albatross would have understood, with that secret tattoo of the outline of Yokohama he had gotten done on a drunken night, on his left thigh. Noguchi had been fidgety and irritated for the entirety of their mission in France.

He attempted to recall the last time he had visited Rimbaud's grave, and couldn't.

Hirotsu was the first to get tired of the stare-off. "You know, Boss never valued pointless cruelty."

"He's too clever for that."

"He is," he agreed. "Keeping us on a leash is all but pointless. I know you understand."

"I'm not trying to steal leverage," Chuuya reminded him. The papers in the drawers had all been boring; economic balances and scribbles Elise called drawings. The belief he would find what he was looking for had been a fragile thing. “My life is not leverage. It’s just mine.”

A step forward. Then another, and another — the road of a crimson carpet every dead man walking would walk, at least once in their life. Even Hirotsu, with his wrinkled hands and his endless towering frame, seemed small on the other side of that desk.

Abruptly, he felt violently out of place.

“Everything is leverage, Chuuya,” Hirotsu reminded him, not unkindly, “If it burns at the touch.”

Once, he’d made a bet with Tanaki that the Commander went around with a broom tied to his back. He always smelled of smoke; his monocle was never fogged up and never stained with blood. The first time he had invited him to drink with him, the man’s motivation had been: perhaps I would like to know who you are when destruction isn’t involved.

“If he dies,” Chuuya said, very slowly, very brusquely, “I lose it all.”

Under the knocking sunlight — a recent victory, the warmth; not that it truly felt so — Hirotsu’s eyes grew gentler.

There was something insisting under Chuuya’s nails — not the brains and the viscera he had washed off in the communal bathrooms, from the latest of the high floors’ extermination he had been ordered. He had bitten his tongue to blood not to smash Dazai’s skull against the Hospital bed frame — and then he had eaten the food he always forced himself to make, in the too-fancy stove of Albatross’ apartment, where he wasn’t supposed to be, because someone has to smack some sense into you, Iceman would have said — and then he had tried to understand why he felt so —

“Chuuya,” Hirotsu called. “It’s not your fault.”

He stilled.

I’m not angry, he swore, lips shut. I’m not angry. He truly wasn’t. They looked at him and swore that he was, and Chuuya thought he ought to be, and he wasn’t.

Anger was supposed to be louder, he knew — was meant to fill up any four-walls space and leave it emptier than before. Not necessarily something to be proud of. Rotten, but his to have.

Virgil would have snorted — because he despised the kind of poetry Chuuya read in secret, like a shameful thing of a quality a boy who had eaten cockroaches didn’t deserve. Lippman would have written it down. Chuuya had never quite intended to grow himself a chorus of tombstones — unwanted commentary and background hum, too rusted to be grief and too sharp to be a memory — but, still —

Useful, he reminded himself. Not real, but useful.

He threw the drawers’ key on the table. “Dazai knew Mori was going to be targeted.”

Hirotsu straightened — a cautious glint in his eyes.

“He knew,” Chuuya echoed. “And I figured it out too late. I know how he works. If I had —“

“Do you truly believe,” the man mused, “That Dazai would allow something Mori hadn’t planned for?”

“Do you hear what they’re saying?” he hissed. “It’s in every damn corner of the syndicate — History repeating itself. They think the bastard has his eyes on the throne, and with the fucked up way he’s been acting — I’m not surprised.”

“And you believe them?”

Chuuya stared at the floor, jaw clenched.

Rinse and repeat. Teenager and killer was a strange enough combination. On blurred days, the lights of the Arcade were everything like blood set on fire. Every other night, Dazai Osamu was the closest thing to a focus that Chuuya had the luxury of carrying around.

Your loyalty, the Colonel had asked, once — before he was debris in the sea. The Mafia’s Demon’s hands were abandoned on his lap, splintered and ruined from his constant hold on a gun; his back was to him, as was his blindside, as was his sleep, and Chuuya had never been anything more than a hoarder. Is it worth your flesh? You cannot have both.

“No,” he admitted. Then, more to himself than any ear: “I know how he works.”

Hirotsu’s finger moved one of the lined up pens on the desk. He fixed it immediately, quiet. “Better than us.”

“Not enough.”

“Chuuya.”

“I’m tired —“ he insisted, “— of having masterminds do their bindings with the ones of us who are just trying to live. I have bled for this organization, haven’t I? The least it could it’s trust me back. I’m not going to run off the moment I get an inkling of what happened before Suribachi —“

“And if it’s people, you find?”

“What?”

“A family,” the Commander leaned forward. Sunlight reflected off his monocle; his features had a certain softness to them, like molded clay — too ancient to pretend there was pride in impenetrableness. “Parents, who were robbed of a child. Loved ones ready to welcome you with open arms. If you find people, will you choose them?”

“No,” he scoffed. “No, why would I —“

Why would they choose me?, he didn’t ask.

There was no lingering desire; only the guilt — the cowardly inability to look strangers in the eyes and exist. To let them know he might be their child, or the puppet made out of his corpse. The only ones who wouldn't care — the ones who had sacrificed Ability Users, men, and everything just to keep him from Verlaine — “Hirotsu, the Mafia is my people.”

“Then trust it,” the man said. “You believe Mori’s too clever for pointlessness — trust that belief. Trust him. He chose you. Chuuya, he will not take his word away only because you failed to save him once.”

It already happened, he thought. What if it happens again?

“He gave up on an Ability Permit for me,” Papers had been abandoned on that desk for a month; maps of the building, take-out orders, lists of men who did not deserve protection any longer. If he breathed slowly enough, he could feel Elise’s hand around his fingers — could see a glint in the darkest eyes of the city. He is, frankly, invaluable.

“You have a lifetime to repay him,” Hirotsu said. “We all do.”

Not enough. He had targets to kill; a squad to lead; the ephemeral hope of keeping all their pulses afloat. He had something to prove — to the scratches down his arms, and the hum in the back of his skull — never words and never feelings and never anything but a promise. Chuuya wasn’t even meant to be alive, and someone had to be blamed for it. Not enough.

Your birth was a mistake. As was mine.

He sank his nails in the wood. Fuck you.

“Yeah,” Chuuya cleared his voice; stood up straighter. “I guess. Good speech — or whatever. Miranda would be proud.”

“I don’t know about that,” Hirotsu replied, an imperceptible pause later. His shoulders had deflated; the old broom of his lost bet was still there, though. Chuuya wondered if he would tell him where he’d found it, some day — the longing of a child, stretching on his tiptoes to reach the adult table. “She dislikes words vividly. A creature of action.”

“Too good for you.”

“Certainly,” A hand on his shoulder. He flinched. He pressed his heels on the ground until the crimson edge of his silhouette disappeared, and met the man’s eyes, and did not ask himself how many people were too many to be willing to die for. “Chuuya,” he said, “It’s not your fault.”

“I know.”

“Chuuya,” His fingers printed themselves on his flesh. He didn’t even know how old the man was. Had they been two years younger and three times meaner, he might have killed him. “Listen to me.”

“I am.”

“It’s not,” he spelled out. “Your fault.”

Chuuya set his jaw — violent, because instinct was a given. Who are you when destruction is not involved?

I don’t know, he thought. I don’t need to.

He nodded.

Hirotsu did, too. Chuuya shrugged the grip off, not unkindly — and was not surprised when the man acquiesced. He set his eyes on the desk again; studied the Corruption scar at the beginning of his left wrist until his teeth didn’t ache.

Frowned. “Old man.”

A blink. “Yes?”

“The Secret Executive,” he asked, picking up one of the documents. Hirotsu’s eyes roamed through the lines of ink; landed on the signature, and widened. “Why did he present a request to leave his training grounds?”

---

TWO MONTHS LATER

---

---

chapter xvi.

---

Case number: 89826788

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [Code Name: Double Black] brought the Cleanse to [...]*

---

The Yokohama Northern Juvenile Prison was only unlike every other penal institution in the state by a dot — no one was meant to know it existed.

“A private school in the Alps,” Taguchi, one of the inmates — among the few to meet Chuuya’s eyes and understand that trying to scare him off wouldn’t be wise; consequently, among the few not to sport black eyes three weeks later — told him. “A musical institute upon some British hill. You pick. As long as every senator to birth one of us fuckers gets to preen with every other senator whose kid set a cop car on fire.”

“Did you set a cop car on fire?” Chuuya asked.

“No,” He made a face. “I’m fourteen. I tried to set my math teacher on fire.”

It took him the entirety of his first week there to conclude that the kids weren’t all that bad. Not as bad as the food. They had certainly never experienced anything graver than their own stunts — Chuuya had watched one of them pass out at the sight of their own blood.

When the guy in the cell next to his was brought a violin for his weekly lessons, he truly cannot miss them — he nodded at his apologetical smile, covering his ears, and reminded himself that blaming the luckier, *posh*ier ones was senseless.

Worthy of a Sheep, though, Shirase would have rebutted.

“Dude,” Koyama — the guy who had asked him his father’s name on his first day, and recoiled when Chuuya had offered his cover — gasped, whenever they bumped against each other. “How do you even heal that fast? Is it a skin routine?”

He had started a fight in the cafeteria on his second day, not bothering with making his way to the snickering group of boys who had made sure he would wake up in a bed full of cockroaches — they had been the ones to come to him.

It was how Chuuya had known none of them were bad kids in the way that Murase and Matsuda would have enjoyed — not one person who had grown up on the street and met his eyes would have kept walking towards him.

(The kids weren’t that bad, no. They weren’t that good either — their eyes were sticky, in the way of the warmest days, when plastically good-willed adults brought snotty children who had never eaten dirt to the slums, for the sake of a good action to add on their guaranteed resume and never ending bank accounts.

One of them had offered him an apple, once; he had been stunned at the punch Chuuya had cracked his nose with, when faced with the scientifically interested expression staining his perfect, unmarred face — the way his fingers had almost, almost reached for the camera hanging from his neck, as if nothing could fit a research paper on generosity more than a child who had not eaten in days.

So he had punched him. And he'd taken the apple.

“This place isn't that bad,” one of the inmates said, once — a lost comment between lost comments, unaccented voices that always made a face when Chuuya got rougher and his own larger vowels slipped out. Something he learned to ignore, no matter if it felt like betrayal, because he lived in a penthouse and had more bank accounts than any Sheep would have trusted him for. “Imagine if they had sent us to live with the Suribachi trash.”

So, Chuuya had punched him.].

He was sent in solitary for three days for the number of sprained wrists he left behind — and Chuuya didn't want to fight brats, not really, but he knew better than to let them believe so. By the time he came out of that room with no windows and a strangely-sticky Bible, he had to find a way to decline offers to sit on some guy's back during push-ups, and he always got one apple more than deserved at lunch.

“You know,” Araya, his roommate — a guy with a blond buzzcut, a tendency to sleepwalk, and his side of the room littered in chalk drawings of dicks — let him know, as his second week there rolled around. “They've given you a nickname.”

“Have they?” Chuuya wondered, using the side of his bed as a chin-up bar. The rooms weren't all that bad either, if small; he was used to sharing, and Araya was too busy scribbling to bother him.

Still, the toilets were a proper disgrace — he had written three different complaints since he had arrived, and where threats had not gone forward, that efficiency had gathered the other boys' starry eyes.

It was just toilets, he considered. It didn't justify their enthusiasm or hero-worship, but he had mistakenly created a haze of interest around himself — the straight spine that Kouyou had beaten into him; the knife he had stolen from the kitchen in a purposefully noticeable way, so that an Ability wouldn't pass through their minds.

But Chuuya had been nothing at all before he had been needed. He would be nothing again once there was no one left to need him.

Most of the group thinks you're damn cool, Taguchi had explained, after he had saved him from some guys' petty revenge for a stolen pack of cigarettes. It pisses them off, of course. They've never received a burp in the face after challenging someone to a spelling game.

Wait, they were serious about that?

A weird look. It was strange, Chuuya couldn't help but think — being perceived as both exceedingly commoner-like, and yet mysteriously posh. He had never been anything but Suribachi trash; after, he'd been —

You're really not from here, are you?

"The Dog," Araya sighed, adding hair to his latest phallic masterpiece. "You know what they called me when I first came? The Cocksucker," A pause; he stared at the wall. "That might have been my fault. Hey, what are you doing on the ground?"

While it was sometimes easy to forget, between one bully dealt with and one official complaint to make the lives of those fools a bit less miserable — Chuuya sneaked out from the grey stone walls every night, offering lines over lines of information on the next generation of the city's elite to the Port Mafia-bought guard.

"You will be out of here soon, sir," the woman never failed to tell him — after pocketing the thesis on those rich kids and the spiders they kept asking Chuuya to kill for them. "According to Executive Dazai, phase one of the Cleanse will be over before you know it."

He wasn't aware they had given it a name.

When he'd stormed out of Mori's Hospital room and gathered the Guerrilla squad, he had spent an endlessly busy month murdering every big name they could afford to bleed out without too many suspicions — and then, along to the latest number of the Chuuya Is A Sore Loser newsletter, had come the order of infiltration.

"Executive Dazai," he echoed. "Do you communicate with him personally?"

"No, sir."

Chuuya stuck his hands in the pockets he had sewn in the inmate suit, making his way down the abandoned corridor of the secret wing. "Then tell whoever does that his partner said — revenge method 123."

Being on field was hardly ever something he didn't enjoy; the more days passed with nothing to sink his teeth into, though — the more restless he grew. The juvie kids had no qualms whatsoever about boasting their hearts out — be it about their possessions, their parents' power, or the number of things one could see through and grasp, if armed with a malice they clearly weren't considering.

It wouldn't last long. Chuuya let them.

Loyalty is a bit like a tumor, Kouyou had said, when they'd bumped into each other on their way to the Hospital. He'd offered her an arm, because he was grown now, and the sight of her loose hair was nothing short of a funeral. The former Boss used to say so. It festers. If the body falls, it falls with it.

“Have you heard?” Taguchi hissed, the morning that began his fourth week in that place. “The new kid got locked on suicide watch not even ten minutes in.”

He had stopped giving him weird looks for the morning paper Chuuya always requested at breakfast — perhaps assuming they had something to do with the formal complaints he kept directing to the guards; being on the quality of the food or on the broken beds of the kids in the cell next to his. You’re efficient, he would say, I’ll give you that.

When Chuuya only hummed, he stole one of his pens, balancing it on his upper lip, and then added: “They said he tried to stick his head right through a corner of his bed.”

“Sucks to be him.”

“I know. The metal in that stuff probably carries the bubonic plague,” A pause. “Hey, could you maybe write a complaint about that, too?”

Another matter was the guards themselves — locked between the obligation to respect the sons of high society, and the unmissable chance to torment people whose network was higher than what they would make in their entire lives. Chuuya, luckily, was used to bullying adults.

“You’re so cool, nii-san, ” a small circle of kids, twelve at most, let him know, the first time he kicked the shit out of a guard who had torn their drawings into pieces. “You’re our age, but you’re so much braver!”

His eye twitched. “I’m seventeen, brats.”

Genuine confusion made them exchange gazes. One of them tightened his hands around the waist of his suit, muttering: “But he said —“

The guard woke up. Chuuya was locked up in solitary again.

If there existed a time limit on fame — it seemed it would be around three and a half weeks. On his fourth cycle, voices began to shift from the Dog to a new phenomena haunting the piss-smelly halls of the institution: the Weirdo.

“How can you get locked up in solitary so often without ever showing your face around?” Araya mused, by the time the new kid got himself thrust into solitary for the fifth consecutive time. It seemed he was unable to wait more than a few hours before doing something that warranted a new damnation; the voices were dying to know what could be worth the struggle. “They said he was caught with Miss Emi in the Infirmary.”

He curled an eyebrow. “Shouldn’t they throw her in solitary, then?”

“It’s probably a lie,” Araya shrugged. He had sleep-talked the whole previous night — some convo on the importance of toads for the ecosystem. “The new batch of porn magazines must have started going around. Most agree that it was the, sticking a stapler in Guard Takagi’s crotch that did it, this time around.”

Chuuya would have gladly taken advantage of that saving grace — The Dog’s nickname dying out, the kids’ starry eyes blurring when he entered the cafeteria. If the Weirdo was so eager to switch the suicide watch to the the solitary confinement, creating myths around a face no one had seen, he could gladly devour his days away.

Until he began to be targeted.

“I’m sorry, Dog,” Guard Sunada said, one morning, handing the formal complaint on the severe lack of hygienic products in the communal baths back. “We received a conflicting complaint. Very well worded, too! The higher ups believe you might be asking for rations to waste on a prank.”

“Want to let them take a shit in the bathrooms?” Chuuya replied, unimpressed. “I caught Haru wiping his ass with one of the Violin Brat’s music sheets the other day.”

A shrug. “That’s not what the other report said.”

It happened with overwhelming insistence — every complaint was sent back, framed by the assurance that conflicting, more convincing information had been sent the minute Chuuya had done the same.

The food grew barely withstandable to the boys’ delicate tongues, again; the water left the sink in vaguely brownish shades. Chuuya was gawked at again; this time, for his easy acceptance of those living conditions.

“This is masochism,” he snapped, by the end of the week, pacing back and forth in the small square of his room. Some guys in the sports room had offered him their backs again, as they worked through push-ups; he had been stressed enough to almost accept. “I get that the asshole is constantly locked in solitary, but I’m pretty sure we all shit in the same hole —”

“You think it’s the Weirdo?” Araya blinked.

“Who else? Everyone else in this place is a spineless coward in cashmere.”

“But why?”

That, he didn’t know. Nor would he have concerned himself with it — hadn’t it been for the boredom of a job no one was telling him when it would be over. There was hardly anything else to suck out of the rich kids — they were too busy crying over salt-less rice and two-layers toilet paper.

Chuuya didn’t enjoy being targeted. He barely had time to reach that conclusion — before the pranks started.

It was innocent enough, at first — the few belongings he had gathered from admiring brats and the guards’ pockets began to disappear, and to suddenly turn up in the most unlikely places. His night walks were interrupted; with no explanation, the guards reorganized their turns in a way that made it impossible for him to step a foot out and reach the Mafia informant.

That’s bad, the part of his mind that could never quite forget his duty made him notice. Then the Weirdo started leaving dog doodles on the toilets he somehow always knew Chuuya would pick, and he got distracted again.

Vanished shoes, he lamented, in his letters to Kouyou. Words scribbled on his face, Araya swearing he hadn't seen a thing; his complaints reaching the guards as nonsensical dissertations on the benefits of dog sitters; a strange perfume sprayed all over his clothes — so that Violin Brat, who was allergic to most things, would endlessly sneeze in his direction.

“Well,” Taguchi concluded, when he woke up with his feet glued to his blanket, “You can’t say he didn’t earn his nickname.”

When it stopped, it did so with no warning — only a monotone, short announcement in the canteen, by that one guard who was particularly obsessed with curfew, sloppily rattling off details of the Weirdo’s successful hanging attempt.

“Oh,” one of the boys commented, with a nearly perplexed blink. “I didn’t know you could actually do that.”

The guard left the makeshift podium with no particular care, stealing an apple from one of the boys’ trays. On the ancient television over the buffet, over the murmurs, a News reporter waved his arms behind the colorful static lines, pointing to the familiar end of a bridge.

“ — protests have been continuing steadily for the past few weeks, ” he explained, with the tone of someone endlessly impatient for lunch time. The cameras switched from him to pre-registered compilations of a familiar overview; plastic roofs and trash-lined roads. Hiding behind a column, a Suribachi City child stared right at the camera, face dirty and wide eyes uncomprehending.

“The authorities seem to be considering the most appropriate solution to the wave of demands by the local associations, ” he continued. “Foundings for the reconstruction of Suribachi City have long been a topic of contrasting opinions — though no optimal solutions have been offered by — “

“Just change the channel,” Araya groaned, face inside his rice. “Something interesting, yeah?”

Staring forward, Chuuya cleaned the dirt from under his nails.

That night, the disguised Mafia guard only walked by his cell to direct him an unmistakably heavy glance. She turned the keys to their lock with undoubtable professionalism; Chuuya stared at the ajar, rusted metal until midnight struck.

Distant, muffled by the humidity-soaked walls, sneaking between snores and conversations between guards, he heard the creaks of the pipes, and the whining of the boys locked in solitary. It was all too far to visualize — if allowed to, though, he suspected Arahaki would have gladly let him hear the death of all stars.

He never forgot that it all came with blood. He never walked away far enough not to smell it.

Chuuya stood, and sneaked his way to the electrical equipment room in the basement.

The rows of metal lockers buzzed quietly in the utter darkness; he used the glow of Tainted to find the heart of those cables, absently playing with one of the tennis balls Taguchi had gotten his parents to send in with the mail. I can hardly ever sit still, he'd sighed. And they're amenable. I think they sort of want me to stay good and quiet here — away from the chaos at home.

Chaos?, Chuuya had questioned.

He'd shrugged. They're among the mental cases convinced the Ballerinas are actually back. It's not like Yokohama isn't dangerous normally — but Ability supremacist terrorists are a bit much for my father's heart.

He used the stolen kitchen knife to cut off a particular connection; then he extracted Violin's Kid's stolen violin from a secret hiding spot under one of the control desks, and made it heavier than it was — laying it on a particular inflammable knot of cables. And what do you think?, he'd asked.

That the Ballerinas were arrested years ago, Taguchi had replied. And if anyone's gonna die in a big boom in Yokohama, it will be the Mafia's fault.

There was a post-it on the back of the vest of the guard Chuuya had to knock out to make his way to the entrance.

“Jay-e—” Chuuya attempted to read, voice echoing off the empty hallway. They were never brought to that wing; only the kids dubbed safe enough to spend time outside could be dragged over the metal detectors. “Shomà — why can't you just write it in — Kalh? Khälist?”

The circle of a flashlight surrounded him. “Kid, what the hell are you —”

He didn't even look up; throwing the knife in the air with a hiss of Tainted, he waited until he heard a choked gasp and the thump! of a falling body, and pushed his way through the glass doors.

They closed behind him with a sharp click!, and Chuuya thought briefly about Araya landing on his bed by mistake, sleepily murmuring about the nature of societal bias. Cold, pungent November wind hit the portions of skin the inmate suit wasn't made to protect — his naked feet drowned in the dirty concrete of the Facility's parking lot, and Chuuya felt his presence before he raised his eyes.

“I can't believe I finally managed to land you in jail, and still came to get you out,” Dazai — the Weirdo — lamented, watching him march in his direction. “I've been poisoning the food, by the way. Should Chuuya really want the antidote, he'll find it with the yellow elf.”

The phrasing deserved some hesitation. It was clear the boy was expecting it — all coat and all blankly obnoxious face, like a curious bat against the firmament; studying him like it hadn't been months since they'd last talked, while Mori slept his way to death next to them.

Chuuya made sure to ram his shoulder with his own when he passed by him, silent. His mocking, patronizing grin stuck.

You're the reason why the heating system smells of eggs, he considered snapping. You're the reason why Taguchi has been complaining nonstop about an ant infestation. You turned the water in the showers into fucking soy sauce.

Instead, undeterred, he settled on: "You better have brought a car."

"Ah, yes," Dazai confirmed, not bothering with catching up, no matter the necessity to raise his tone. "That one! Ace gifted it to me while you were gone. Well, I threatened to tell Mori about his financial scam — and he offered one. How nice of him. Isn't it fancy, or something? It's a —"

Despite it all, Chuuya couldn't help but stop in his tracks, following the line of his pointing finger. "Jewel Bastard got you a fucking Maserati?"

He didn't seem to care. "Oh, that's what it's called?"

"You can't even drive."

"I drove here," Dazai replied, offended. At their backs, the entire Facility structure seemed to creak, vaguely — the hissed whisper of a hair tie about to snap. "And I only hit two people. And the paramedics said they'll be fine. Mostly."

Chuuya turned to look at him.

He'd grown taller — again. His coat was only laid on his shoulders; the bruises under his eyes seemed painful to the touch. Dazai never quite seemed older; just a tad more rotten.

The rush of his own heartbeat was too loud in his ears — he thought it awfully sick, that he might enjoy the feeling of his own anger enough not to kill the boy on sight. Better than nothing, he would argue, then. Better than another grave.

"Great," he said, tonelessly.

Wordlessly, Dazai slipped something from the back of his pants — handed him a pair of gloves.

Chuuya looked at them.

His fault, his mind liked to remind him, sometimes — Arahaki, who hated him, and the blood at his feet who hated him a bit more, and his fingers at night that only wanted to sleep. Koda's brother and the dead kids of the orphanage; the men wearing the Port Mafia tattoo. His fault, his fault, all his fault.

His to keep safe, his mind reminded him. Nothing but a hoarder — not quite human, he considered, that urge to set it all on fire for the sake of what Chuuya considered his.

His to kill.

He slipped the gloves on. Then, refusing to linger on the kind of face Taguchi would make as his skin burned to the bone — he tapped one foot on the ground, and felt the violin he'd abandoned grow a thousand pounds heavier.

The air turned golden.

His ears rang madly, brain sizzling between them, broken by familiar white noises. A column of fire shattered the sky — projectiles of concrete and stone flew to the stars in bright scarlet flares, as the Juvenile Facility blew up in a thousand pieces. The smoke arising took a distinctively white shade; the Ballerinas' trademark, glaringly obvious over the useless alarms ringing from what was left of the structure.

"Oh, well," Dazai said, raising a hand to cover his shield eyes. After some consideration, he raised the other to shield Chuuya's own. "I expect the upper class will experience a growing demand for adoption procedures."

His coat was painted like a sunrise by the reflection of the flames. Chuuya thought he could hear the distant shrill of screams, for a moment — and then nothing at all.

It was utterly quiet in the car.

"To be clear," the Executive questioned, over the irritatingly loud buzz of his console. He'd highly protested not being allowed to drive his own car; Chuuya had silenced him with a blankly recited list of his road-related crimes. "Are you mad at me, or are you entering a grieving period?"

"They were stuck up brats who would have hung me by the boxers if they'd known where I'm from," Chuuya replied, unconcerned. The inmate suit smelled of gasoline. "Grieving isn't going to be a concern."

"I don't think you would have let them."

Blood felt the same under velvet gloves — no matter the age; no matter the blame. Chuuya had come to the world with a crack in the earth, and he'd stolen every parent and siblings the Sheep didn't remember anymore.

"Boss," he asked. "How is he?"

Dazai glanced his way.

He refused to meet his gaze; refused to feel anything about the anatomically deep analysis he felt him graze across his entire self.

"You are mad," he concluded. Then, with the sort of superior, distantly suicidal nonchalance he wore when he'd won, he commented: "You're going to be even madder when you figure out the next part of the plan, then."

Despite himself — despite the widening cloud of flames and smoke he could still see in the rearview mirror — Chuuya threw a questioning look in his direction.

Dazai threw his head back; winked. “How would you like getting married?”

---

...

---

“I can’t believe you didn’t tell Tanaki,” Chuuya muttered, hopping around the bathroom stall to slip into the tailored pants of a penguin suit. “What if my mission hadn’t been over? She would have just thought I was casually missing her wedding?”

“It’s not like she could move dates at the last moment,” Kouyou reminded him, perched on top of the marble counter of the faucets.

The Champagne glass in her hands was a probably unplanned match to the cream dress she was wearing; the shock of red of her hair against it reminded him of blood, for a moment. There was a shadow of tiredness over her shoulders; when she allowed Golden Demon to fluctuate over the tiles, she subtly leaned her leg against the katana the ghost had stuck to the floor.

“May the gods forgive you,” she added, “I would have entered from the back, had I known you planned to wear pajamas at her wedding.”

“I really don’t want to talk about it,” he mumbled, stealing her Champagne to down what was left of it. Her nasty glare didn’t register, even as he tightened his tie to the point of suffocation; the bathroom was just as shiny and sophisticated as the rest of the Sea Jewel, and Chuuya hadn’t worn silk in more than a month. “How pissed off is she?”

“That both you and Dazai missed the ceremony?” Her eyes twitched; at least, they did the closest thing her porcelain face would allow. “Nothing too severe. I could only hear the sound of her heart shattering this,” Her thumb and index flew away from each other. “Much, from my row.”

The Champagne tasted sour.

Kouyou pulled him close by the lapels; she removed his hat — which she’d brought with some foresight he had long since learned not to question — and fixed his hair, needing to look up at him. It was an uncomfortable feeling.

“One word,” she offered.

Chuuya studied his reflection. No scars and no skin-splitting grin; no decaying fingers. There was a strange disconnect, nonetheless — the urge of swearing a distorted mirror looked nothing like yourself. Dogs can't recognize their reflection, Dazai had casually dropped, once, don't you know?

His body, he reminded himself. His to share — his, nonetheless.

“Change,” Chuuya offered.

Her jaw set. She offered a tight smile. “As inevitable as sunrise, little god.”

He shrugged, because it was true. Then he wrapped his jacket around her naked shoulders, and led her to the decorated garden of the Sea Jewel, where the celebration was blooming.

At the center of the enthusiastic circle of guests — hanging off the arm of that horse-faced husband of hers — Tanaki hadn't noticed him yet. She was a snowflake amongst the lights painting the gazebos in candid shades, her dress less like silk and more like a waterfall — surely, worth more than a woman who hadn't been in the Mafia longer than Chuuya had been alive could have afforded.

Silver hair and scars; happiness had always looked good on her, as stubborn as spring over pain-dug caves all over her face. She went with him to the cemetery every week.

“ — understand,” Kouyou was saying, through the parted lips of her most pleasant smile. Mafia events tended to demand a facade; when Chuuya was distracted, he found himself mimicking her in a slightly distorted way.

She patted his nose with her fan, and while graceful, it left his head ringing. “You and the little demon went through all that trouble to have a part in the wedding, what with your insistence to walk her to the altar — She was just telling me about Dazai stealing the invitation papers to remake them himself! And then you go and miss it, for —“

“I was on a mission, Ane-san,” he reminded her. “One that I would have gladly returned from sooner, had that stupid fucking son of a — Kajii, did you add lemonade to the wine stand? This stuff is turning my teeth into a granny's last shit.”

“You always have a way with words,” the scientist sighed, wrapping a sweaty arm over his shoulders.

He'd cut his hair again — an intricate ritual that involved a bowl, a lemon bomb, and the to-be exploded room Boss allowed him once every six months. “Nice pajamas, by the way. Grey brings out your eye color. Uh. Both of them. Weirdly cool, by the way. You made Madame Tanaki cry, though, so you suck.”

“She cried?”

“Over the good Champagne, too,” Kouyou offered.

“Where's your worse half?” Kajii insisted, head turning around wildly. “I thought I'd seen him asking one of the waiters to commit a double suicide with him, but — Oh, there he is. Oh, no. Tanaki is crying again.”

Horror filtered into his veins. He dropped the glass on the table so fast he almost broke it.

“No, no, wait, that bastard’s going to —” Chuuya took off faster than the snowy ground should have allowed for.

“ — tried to tell him!” Dazai was whining, by the time he managed to make his way through the crowd, reaching the newlyweds’ table. His hands were tight around Tanaki’s, clothes stained with wine the waiter had, hopefully, emptied on him.

“He kept insisting the mission was more important! I told him, listen here — Chibi, Tanaki is the woman of my life! No mission will ever matter as much as she does! I begged him to come back sooner, so that we could make it — but he barked and spat, the way he does, nasty dog he is — he had me add three days! And he told me he thinks your dress makes you look fat! Like a pregnant walrus deluded by love. It doesn’t. You look like rising sun itself, my —”

Tanaki’s husband scowled his features into something endlessly polite when Chuuya slammed the boy’s face into the tempura in front of him.

Some of the sauce reached his own chin; he felt it drool, slowly and securely, into a groaning Dazai’s hair, as he lowered himself to meet Tanaki’s puzzled expression and swore: “Do forgive him for making us late.”

“Boys,” the woman sighed — and the bone deep tiredness of her tone settled guilt between his ribs, heavier than the ocean. “It’s fine.”

“I picked my suit three months ago,” Chuuya snapped, pressing harder on Dazai’s nape, shaking the whole table. “No, it’s not fine. I was supposed to walk you to the altar —”

“Hirotzu was courteous enough to do it,” Tanaki cut him off, gently.

The flicker of disappointment in her eyes was as stable as the fairy lights hanging over the tables — still, much to his stubborn shame, they roamed them between their faces with something like exasperated fondness.

“I understand,” she added. “Alright? Work is work. I promise you, it’s alright — It’s good enough that you two are here now.”

“He’s drowning me in sauce!” Dazai whined, mostly muffled, “I won’t be here at all, soon!”

“Then die, you piece of shit —”

“This isn’t a good method of suicide at all —”

“I don’t fucking care!”

“So,” Tanaki intervened, raising her voice. She stood up, gathering lace-sleeved arms around both of them, pulling Dazai out of the bowl. Her heels were taller than ever; while she finally reached Chuuya, she still lost to the other boy. “It would be even better if you could be civil for the ceremony you managed to show up to, how about that?”

They exchanged a glance.

Sauce and tempura dripped from Dazai's face — Tanaki had to sink her nails on Chuuya's shoulder to keep him from attacking, when he slapped the hand he used to wipe it off on his face.

"Fine," Dazai muttered, eventually. "He's so small, so very imperceptible — I'm sure I can stand to ignore his presence for a few hours."

"Revenge method 123."

"You're too late. I already asked the taxi outside to walk over my foot."

"I don't see you limping."

"I'm taking your first dance, by the way!" A wide, too wide smile was offered to The Husband, still staring at that scene in defeated silence. Chuuya didn't think he had ever talked to them willingly — not after the first time they had spent twenty, endless minutes glaring daggers at him from under the woman's desk. "I'm sure your sweetheart won't mind. You should share it with the man of your life, anyway. If not a double suicide —"

Tanaki sighed, ruffling Dazai's hair. If she cared about the sauce ending up on her dress, she didn't show it. Biting down a smile — something a bit too resigned — she said: "I suppose it can't be helped."

Satisfied, Dazai stalked off — predictably, to reach that Intelligence friend of his, his arms open wide and his expression lighting up instantly.

A shiver crawled up Chuuya's spine — a whisper as soft as the staggeringly, intermittently falling snow; the kind of instinct that told him there was something to burn in his immediate field of vision. Someone had cleaned ash off Dazai's coat; it dragged on the ground as he walked, and the crowd — almost entirely consisting of mafiosi, given Tanaki's limited circle — parted to let him pass.

Their whispers were too far to be heard.

The shape of their lips was too familiar; the cruel, empty tilt it gave to Dazai's own was a sight tattooed under his eyelids.

"God," Tanaki shook her head, watching one of the closest guests pale when the boy stole his drink out of his hand. "He'll scare off even the snow, if it goes on like this."

Something complicatedly sharp settled at the base of his throat. "They can probably sense his clammy ass from afar."

"I believe it might have more to do with the lingering belief that he is going to sneak into Boss' Hospital room and stick a knife in his chest," she replied, a bit crudely.

Chuuya stared.

From the other side of the pavilion, Dazai laughed loudly at something out of Sakaguchi's unimpressed mouth — the sound startling some women almost out of their seats. He watched them clench their fingers around their cutlery. "Still?"

She gathered her gowns. "You've been away for a while," she offered. "Ever since the syndicate found out it wasn't actually Ace who got hurt, things became — a bit tense."

The urge to ask more almost suffocated him — to find Kouyou's eyes and demand why political balance hadn't come before the hour long tirade on just how horribly his pajama-wearing behavior reflected on her.

Madame Tanaki's shoulders were curved, though. He sunk his hands in his pockets, because it was easier than grasping her own. "Tanaki, I'm sorry."

"Chuuya —"

"No," he insisted, eyes on the floor. "I've gone against the bastard's plans for much less. I should have been more mindful of the time. This is your special day, and I —"

"And it was not made any less special by circumstances you could not avoid," Tanaki interrupted, laying her tattooed fingers on his shoulders. The swirling lines of colors were a sight under the flower-patterned lace; something painfully her. "This is all I wanted — A day of uninterrupted joy. You're here now. You can walk me down all the aisles you want for as long as we're alive."

"It's not the same, though," he mumbled.

"We'll make it convincing," Her smile was certainly brighter — the spark of hidden disappointment weaker, rubbed clean with her insistence to make the most out of everything. "Did you think I wouldn't notice more than half of the wedding was already paid for?"

Chuuya's ears caught fire. "That wasn't —"

"You want to make it up to me?" Tanaki leaned down, hiding the lights behind the silver crown of her hair — settling sweetly severe eyes on him. "Stop feeling like you owe me. You don't. You never will."

He searched her gaze, unconvinced, feeling his own face morph through the stages — instinctual insistence; the lingering embarrassment of being caught; fondness that settled all wrong in his chest, unwanted because unsharp.

He cleared his throat. "Tanaki, is there — A, ah, yellow elf, around this wedding?"

She stared. "A what?"

"A yellow elf."

"A yellow —" A confused glance was directed to the only other occupant of her table — sporting naturally pointed ears they had long insulted, and a golden tie. Right as he realized, her jaw dropped. "Nakahara Chuuya, are you calling my husband a —"

The ground under his feet, unfortunately, did not swallow him whole. The sauce from the tempura still dripped from the edge of the table — the newly weds could not do anything more than stare when Chuuya sunk his hand into the mess and licked it clean.

With his other hand, he grasped Tanaki's arm and led her to crowded dance floor, declaring: "Don't worry about it. Come on. Let's get this first dance over with."

"But Dazai said —"

"Six weeks after we met, after I smashed his first console against the wall, Dazai promised he would never talk to me again, ever," Chuuya cut her off, positioning his hand on her waist, dragging her to the true center of the garden. "'Wasn't even that mad about the fallen tooth. Point is — we all get disappointed, once in a while.'"

She laughed — freely and fondly.

The music was a vaguely sung hum that he couldn't place. Perhaps the Mafia had a pendrive for events and occasions — as Tanaki recounted unimportant tales from the days he had missed, he attempted his best not to step on her feet where Kouyou would see.

"Boss sent over countless bouquets and gifts," she told him, between swirls. "He wasn't in any condition to join, and I assured him it was alright — you should have seen how red he was!"

Chuuya munched on her words — roamed subtle eyes over the crowd of mafiosi — before daring: "Is he feeling better?"

"As if a wound to that iron heart of his could stop him," Tanaki tutted — pretending she had not hesitated. "I don't know much. Seniority is all that allows me information. But Executive Kouyou will bring you to him, if you ask."

I don't know if I want to.

He forced a smile. "As long as he comes back before I'm subjected to some more rumors."

The woman's gaze fled to some undefined part of the garden — he didn't need to turn to imagine a bandaged eye, and the mischievousness he would wink at Tanaki's clear concern with. "Hopefully."

She talked more, as if the moonlight could only wake her up further — light her eyes up with unbridled excitement, framed by the flirty waves she sent to her husband when she thought Chuuya wasn't looking, and the way she spun in her dress.

She told him about the matching tattoo she was doing her best to convince her husband to get, a sort of ring that could not be thrown away — pray for us, my dear, she said, I'm getting too old to organize weddings. Gin Akutagawa had developed a taste for masks and masculine clothing — she'd accepted Tanaki's help only after she had caught her in the middle of putting eyeliner with a knife.

“I invited the siblings,” she told him. “Apparently, they were too busy training. Dazai’s little hope sent a vase, though. Why a vase?”

Dazai’s little hope. A black silhouette; a pale face, and a tissue stained in blood. He tried to picture Akutagawa in the middle of that dancing crowd — he couldn’t.

“Those little paper bats you made them hang at the entrance are all the black you need,” he concluded, shaking his head.

“Is that judgement I hear, Chuuya?”

“Not at all. I just think you should have stuck to the Halloween theme a bit more.”

“Do tell,” Tanaki encouraged.

“The Groom And His Corpse style, maybe,” he offered. “But make it The Bride and Her Corpse. I’d have helped, had you asked —“

“Can you leave my dear alone for a second —“

“He said he thought I was ten years old —“

Fingers pulled ends of his hair.

“At last, we’ve found a positive quality in Tanaki’s beloved,” Dazai announced, dragging him off her grasp, wincing when he purposefully slammed his feet into his — and then tripping him, stepping over his fallen body. “Common sense.”

He fumed. “You —“

“Let us dance, Madame!” he announced, dipping Tanaki’s laughter-shaken body, “Your first dance had a right to be a peerless opportunity, but a slimy slug took it away. No fear. I am here now.”

“What a relief,” she breathed out, upside down, offering Chuuya her most apologetic grin.

“Play us something!” Dazai called, pulling her back on her feet, grinning like a child. If he cared about the glances thrown his way, he did not show it. “Something fancier than before. Maybe a song without words?”

Chuuya froze.

He was still climbing to his feet — to throw himself at the disruptor, perhaps; tug his hair until he cried and made a scene, fighting not to step on the edges of Tanaki’s dress, lest it muffled the smile he had managed to carve into her face.

Trapped inside his veins, where it was sticky and it was tight and it was quiet, the thing that smelled blood before it bled sang.

[It was well past midnight, and they were sixteen, and someone should have been mad about that breach of curfew, but they had none of it — time limits or adults to get worried. Chuuya's only blanket was a veil on both their heads; when his kanjis were too precise on the paper, Dazai scribbled them off, as to remind him of the unstableness of progress. Or just to be mean.

“We’ve run out of Hirose Fumiko references,” the boy huffed, disappointed. “Let’s go with —”]

Dazai and Tanaki danced; it took several twirls for the boy to feign him worthy of meeting his gaze. There, not a flare of amusement in his own — he tilted his head to the side.

Everyone here is a traitor.

---

...

---

Chuuya moved.

He mingled. He hummed that tune he didn’t know, just to keep hysterical curses behind his teeth. Alcohol and food always got tongues loose — if only for the sake of filling the awkwardness. Most mafiosi recognized him at a single glance, and the battle of his reputations was a clear glint behind their eyes — one that got their shoulders to imperceptibly relax, and then tense all over again.

While there were mostly faces he had never even caught a glimpse of — no one from the Guerrilla squad, and no one from the ground floor security, which was unusual for Tanaki; and gently, Kouyou’s voice reminded him, Dazai insisted to remake the guest lists — it didn’t take long to realize a good half of them were simply strangers.

Names and pricey ties from the groom’s side, he assumed — tassels of the Cleanse.

“Chuuya,” Kouyou called, at some point, barely brushing his shoulders. She had always been wise; she had always seen through him too easily. “Are you alright?”

Tanaki danced with her husband. The moonlight was kind and cruel to the scars on her face. Her hand on his at the cemetery, he thought — always leaving a flower on his fake graves as well.

Standard procedure —

“If I was still fifteen, you’d ground me for this,” he offered, shaking the hand of some suited woman who had praised his operations in Beijing.

“Don’t be ridiculous,” Her eyes had begun to study the crowd as well, if with less animosity; she had needed no code words. “I can still ground you whenever I want.”

A song without words.

Standard procedure —

“My feet hurt,” Dazai whined, high-pitched and loud, sitting down with a twirl. “There are too many ladies to dance with! Chuuya, be a good dog and give me a massage.”

He’d appropriated a table at the edge of the garden, moving abandoned purses and cigarettes away to lay his legs near the glasses. The cold wind whipped his skin, as he scrolled down his phone to check news of emergency helicopters reaching the Juvenile Facility.

The man sitting next to him was trapped in a fire-red jacket, a good way to black-out drunk — he had been steadily narrating about stolen sums from the defense-fee owned by the Government to the Mafia for the last half hour.

Standard procedure —

“Choke and die,” Chuuya argued, raising his eyes to the party. Tanaki was still at the center of the dance floor; the tables were all empty. He didn’t know the song — the words, though, were a slightly accented French that got Kajii to scream along. On his screen, the title of the article read: The Ballerinas Strike Again?

“That’s not very nice,” Dazai said.

“I wasn’t trying to be. Choke and die.”

“I’m telling Ane-san.”

“She doesn’t want to talk with your bitch ass —“

“You youngsters,” the man hiccuped, head swaying back and forth — along to the music, perhaps. “You should be having fun! This is a once in a life opportunity, you — know? Dancing with this godforsaken city’s mud.”

Chairs divided by the man’s slumped form, they exchanged a glance.

Dazai seemed to be basking in the rare joy of not being recognized — Chuuya studied the bright lipstick stain on his cheek. “Mackerel, this is Hirayama.”

“From Hira&Sana Corporations?” he guessed, offering his arm for a sloppy handshake. The man grunted, clearly satisfied — as enchanted with Dazai’s wide-eyed respect as every other high-name they ever met. “An enviable name, if only for those who wish the best for our city.” A polite, outrightly disgusted glance was directed at the dancing crowd. “Certainly, one deserving of something much better than mud.”

“What I said,” the man mumbled.

“Why would you be meddling with it, then, sir?”

“Look at it,” Hirayama scoffed, attempting to nod towards the guests. “The cause of every problem in this city, under the guise of our protectors — Partying. Half of our Cabinet has been emptied out — and they will refill it as they prefer. ‘You think it was those terrorists? Ha!’ Ge gulped down his glass. “No one will do anything about it. How would they? How could they?”

“If they weren’t cowards,” Chuuya offered.

“If the Port Mafia was less mighty, maybe,” Dazai agreed, not sparing him a glance. At the utter of that name, uncaring of his own stumbling tongue, the man flinched. “We should say things as they are, shouldn’t we? Take off the edge shadows grant them. Who knows, perhaps it would lower those cocky mafiosi from their high horses.”

Hirayama burped. Even sober, he wouldn’t have doubted the animosity in Dazai’s tone; even Chuuya had a hard time discerning his insincerity. “Wouldn’t that be a sight.”

The music changed into something sweeter — a braided mess of violins and cellos that always got Dazai’s fingers to spasm, whether he noticed it or not. Chuuya watched the crowd spin faster, and passed another glass to the CEO.

There was an unbearable calm on the sharp points of Dazai’s face — a relaxment that got him to tighten his grip around his own glass.

Standard procedure —

“So many faces I’ve only seen in police tapes,” he was whispering, in a haze — a spat locked between hatred and a fearful kind of awe. The way Doc had talked about death, Chuuya thought. The way Noguchi had spoken of him. “That’s the Lady of the Port, is she not? She’s as beautiful as they say.”

“Redheads aren’t my type,” Dazai shrugged.

“Is their Boss here?”

“No one would know,” Chuuya answered. “Few have seen his face.”

“How brutish.”

“Cautious, too.”

“I hear the Mafia’s deadliest ones are younger than one would assume,” Hirayama added, sliding down his seat, lower and lower. In the middle of the dance floor, Tanaki laughed some more, throwing her head back into the lights — scarlet, brighter than a wound. “Heard they can kill a man just by looking at him.”

“Fancy,” Chuuya commented, sipping his wine.

“Unrealistic,” Dazai replied, cleaning his nails.

“I know men in the City Hall who would murder their families in cold blood for a chance to get them,” he added. “To make them pay, maybe. If they were braver. No, it’s — hic! — I know. It’s only to make sure they can personally kill them in a way they won’t come back from.”

The man licked his lips. They were chapped — a dot of blood, or wine, was stuck at the edge of his mouth. He nodded towards Kajii, and the drunken twenty something years old he was sharing a toast with. “Is that Double Black?”

“No, no,” Dazai corrected him, very polite. He nodded his glass towards Chuuya, courteous. “We’re Double Black. ”

The fog in his eyes lingered, as he squinted, fast and tentative enough to seem nothing but a glitch. Violins sang — Hirayama turned to study his face, waiting for the echo of an announcement his brain had blinked too soon to catch.

Chuuya watched understanding settle on the caves of his face like a chasm in the ground; he only waited long enough to see the spark of terror in his gaze crawl out.

He settled his hand on the man’s nape, and squeezed the air around it.

It was a slow-motion of sorts. The crowd turned to their direction, casually and lightly, eyes passing — before their minds pushed them to do a double take. Brains and wet, squelching remnants of imploded eyeballs pooled down the headless body slipping down the seat, soundlessly landing on the moonlight-washed grass.

Over the honey-lined ballad, silence fell.

Song without words. Standard procedure: eliminate all.

Tanaki’s eyes landed on them.

[“Do you think there’s a limit?” Virgil asked him, once. Sometimes he talked about faith the way someone who didn’t write would have about gold. “A point where we can’t really be forgiven?”

Chuuya didn’t mind the question much. The man’s life had been a growing vine between the claws of a man who talked about justice and a woman who had lived too long to believe in it — perhaps, he thought, Virgil couldn’t quite forget his own Limbo. Couldn’t quite pretend he had no fear anymore.

“Is there a point you’re not willing to go to?” he shrugged, not particularly concerned. “If you have to go to Hell for something, might as well be ‘cause you didn’t believe it to be worth it anymore.”

“Worthy of what?”

The weight his own body had been between his hands wasn't easily forgotten. The other him's skin had been all wrinkled up; the effects of a prolonged stay in the water — and he had been soft, and he had been dead, and Chuuya wasn't. Chuuya had taken his life, or maybe he hadn't at all. Chuuya had things, and he couldn't bear to lose them.

"Something," he replied. He had looked Rimbaud in the eye — had told him it was a good thing, giving it all up for a friend. Had lived to regret it. Rimbaud, though — he'd just died. "Anything. If you do it for nothing — then I wouldn't forgive you either." ]

The remnants of his breakfast at juvie were still stuck under his nails. Chuuya stood up.

"You better have a good reason," he said, not turning.

Dazai's curled eyebrow was an audible thing — not unlike the click! of the safety of his gun. Chuuya felt hungry, all of the sudden — for something realer than the rapidly approaching conclusion fogging up the guests' eyes. Beasts barking at the sky — too obsessed by the blue to notice the bars.

"When do I not?"

---

...

---

Chuuya only managed to catch a glimpse of his clone's face in the dossier, before Mori shut it between his IV-connected hands.

"Mean!" Elise shrieked, throwing herself at him with enough might to crush someone less adept to training to have cars thrown to his face. "You boring, stupid hat-wearing traitor! You said we could go shopping, and you disappeared —"

Despite the momentary shock — despite the startling, skin-tattooed vision of the drawing he couldn't imagine who would have managed to make of his clone — laughter was ripped out of his chest, muffled by her dragging weight. All four of her limbs wrapped around his middle, her mouth whining right in the shell of his ear.

She only conceded to lower her laments when he tightened his grip and spun her around.

"Elise, darling," Mori called, as he tilted her body back as far as it would go before falling, smirking as she scaredly held on tighter. "What did I tell you about waiting for people to come in?"

“But he’s been gone for so long!” she cried, taking his hat off to pull at his hair.

“You’ve been gone longer,” he reminded her, still holding her upside down.

“And you’ve been gone uglier!”

“That doesn’t mean anything.”

“You don’t mean anything!”

“Do I have to tell Hirotsu to get you in on the Akutagawa siblings’ lessons?”

She whined. He rotated her body around easily, not questioning whether she was lighter than air because of age or unreality. Stalling; until Kouyou’s invisible fingers tapped his chin. He put her on the ground — turned to the bed, falling to one knee with an ease that would have nauseated him, some autumns ago.

What was that, his mouth begged to ask. Why were you looking at him. What was — “Boss,” he greeted.

Mori chuckled. “Chuuya.”

The sound got stuck in his own throat.

There was ease in loyalty, he thought; in being acknowledged, even in its most elementary form. Buried by debris, Chuuya had screamed for weeks before being found.

Mori was not an unknown piece of bread — good on his tired tongue, but a bit too much; so he had vomited it out, and then asked for more — but the urgency he sparked in Chuuya’s veins was the very same. Satiated and stupid. Eager to know more. To repay.

He climbed to his feet because the order was silent — looked at the man who he had almost taken a bullet for, because it felt cowardly not to.

“It’s good to see you awake,” he offered, at last. Wanted to say more, and didn’t.

The Boss of the Port Mafia was pale. Not in a sickly way — more like a caged bird. His scarf was folded on the nightstand, as precise as every inch of that non descriptive room he doubted was his own. Chuuya knew not to expect the shock of crimson around his neck — its absence left him confused all the same.

The man grinned. “If you had come any later, I fear you would haven’t had the misfortune. I have medically mandated naps these days, can you believe that?”

“He snores,” Elise attempted to whisper, through her quest to climb on his shoulders. “So loud.”

“Why are you always so mean to me?”

“Because you’re a perverted old man.”

“Elise,” he lamented.

She blew a raspberry.

Then, she settled on his back. Chuuya bit his cheek not to smile — or roll his eyes, or drown into the familiarity with the ease of a trust fall.

“I hear Tanaki’s wedding was — eventful,” Mori offered. His voice was nails on sandpaper; nonetheless, there was a hint of humor in his eyes — something weirdly unfit with the IVs connected to his arms, but that began to scratch at the weight Chuuya had carved in his own chest. “Typical of Dazai, to find the worst occasion possible to gather all traitors in one place.”

He attempted to step into remembrance — the blood down the fairy-lights decorated trees; the viscera next to Tanaki’s heels; the never-ending rumble of Dazai’s gun. He gulped it down; said, like it did not matter, “As long as the threat was neutralized.”

“You don’t have to hide your disapproval.”

“His plans always work,” Chuuya replied, measured. “That’s enough for me.”

“But you’re the one who deals with the aftermath,” Mori insisted. “Going door to door to apologize to families of men you had no choice but to sacrifice.”

He shrugged. It rattled his spine — he had never quite enjoyed participating in Mori’s mind games. He never did grasp where they were looking to land.

“Partnerships have roles,” he said. “If he has no soul to spare, I will do my best to clean up after his messes.”

“Certainly a vow.”

“He trapped me with a jam oath.”

He blinked. “What?”

A sigh. “Long story.”

“I hate jam,” Elise commented.

“I also hear that your mission was successful,” Mori added, with a lighter tone. “Not that I expected anything different. Did you have fun in juvie?”

He must have made a face of some kind; the former doctor laughed so hard it wrecked his chest with coughs — but he waved Chuuya away when he attempted to help him sit up, and did it on his own. He watched him drink from the glass of water next to his scarf. Elise whined. He scratched his feet on the pricey floor, and didn’t speak.

“That, too, was to be expected,” The man smiled. “I bet you had a fair share of people tell you that’s where you would end up one day, correct?”

Chuuya tilted his head. “Wonder why.”

“Including that policeman of yours, I’m assuming. What was his name? Matsuda?”

I didn’t know you knew that, he almost said, before good sense found his tongue again. “Old man tried to drag me to this or that facility more times than I care to count.”

Mori hummed. “He and his station have been giving us some trouble. As you must know — most are still unconvinced by the Ballerinas’ lead. The death of so many heirs of high society has certainly helped — the upper floors are filled with outrage towards a police that refuses to investigate the — rightful assassins,” He smiled. “You might want to look into that. And into your friend.”

He paused. “Trouble?”

“We’re never been as under scrutiny as we are now, Chuuya,” the man explained, after a pause. “The Cleanse was necessary. We’re losing support from assets we cannot afford to hand over. It will need to continue. The police investigating our affairs hardly makes the situation more ideal. Especially while I’m out of commission,” He sighed. “And, thanks to Dazai’s — proactive decision making, the entire syndicate and every possible spy inside it is well aware of it.”

“But you’re,” He tightened his grip around Elise’s legs, looking for something to grasp and not destroy. “But you’re cool now. You’ll recover, sir.”

He regretted his tone the moment it was out. He could almost see Kouyou cringe at his word choice — all Mori did was widen his grin, only a bit humorous.

“I will be more than cool, Chuuya,” he assured. It wasn’t physical; it wasn’t the reassuring hands Kouyou would have cupped his face with, or the shoulder-pats Hirotsu had begun to indulge with when he wasn’t threatened — a distant sort of appreciation, still, warmer than breath. “And as soon as I’m out of this hellhole, you and I will begin some lessons of our own.”

Chuuya frowned. Elise’s cheek was a cold weight on his own, pressing and mumbling, as she knotted her fingers through the X of his harness. “Lessons?”

“If Kouyou will allow it,” Mori winked. “I made you a promise, when you joined, didn’t I? That you would learn what it meant to be a good leader,” His eyes settled on some old stain on the wall; cracks in the stained glass windows. “Recent circumstances made me realize I might be slacking off on that oath.”

His mouth moved, soundlessly.

Why were you looking at that, he insisted. He wanted to defend himself — there was no one accusing him.

“I thought,” he spoke up, eventually, as careful as a walk on glass — because some things were meant to be known, and some replies were meant not to be wanted. Why were you looking at that? “Command was more of Dazai’s thing.”

Mori made a face. “Perhaps that’s what he wants you to believe.”

He snorted. Surprise widened the man’s eyes — Chuuya cleared his voice, hurrying to say: “The bastard is not that open in his manipulations. His whines and whims are hardly a relevant source of information.”

The man studied him. “I suppose you would know,” He tapped his fingers on the dossier on his lap; Chuuya felt his fingers curve into claws; and felt Elise tense up — and nothing. “But you would be amenable to some lessons, all the same?” he insisted. “Strategy, perhaps. Executions. Some... Possible future endeavors.”

It took him a moment to recognize the swirl in his chest — the distant thud! of it, like a fruit falling from a tree; rolling all the way to a street kid’s wrecked shoes. Chuuya hadn’t felt excitement in a while. “It would be an honor, sir.”

“It might turn out to be a frustrating trial,” Mori let him know, cautious. “Information you won’t be privy to. Some necessary secrecy. Long, boring matters with even more boring people. There are machinations we cannot escape, if we want the machine to keep moving.”

His lips quirked. “I know a man who would love that metaphor,” He bowed his head. “I understand that empires need secrets, sir. I’ll just climb my way to a place where I’m allowed to know.”

The former doctor sighed, not quite exasperated. “I should certainly learn to expect resiliency from the Mafia’s most stubborn. Do pray for my recovery, then. The sooner I’m up, the sooner we will start.”

“Prayers are all but efficient, in my experience,” Chuuya replied. “They tend to make people too hopeful. I could ask them to bring Elise some more toys, though.”

“Yes!” she rejoiced, strangling his neck in her best embrace. “Yes, yes, Rintarou, ask them to bring me —“

“I must admit, I’ve never been the religious type either,” Mori commented, studying the harsh motions of his Abilities tantrum. “I had some interesting conversations on the matter of faith — with the Secret Executive, actually.”

Chuuya perked up. Attempted to keep it subtle — to mold his face into that irritating mask of unreadable intransigence he hated to see on Dazai’s face.

“Yes,” the man answered, long before he could ask, “Hirotsu let me know about his request. Unusual, I will say. He has been — insistent about being left to his grief and his waiting. He only trains his students with their eyes covered, did you know?”

He ran his words back. “Waiting, sir?”

“And grief,” Mori nodded. “The same thing, under some very tormented circumstances. He swears so, at least. I have a hard time imagining what sort of conclusion an interim towards the dead might show him — but we all have our obsessions.”

“You said you two have talked of faith,” Chuuya echoed, after some stealthy moments of silence — as if it would appear as mere interest, and not the intrusion he had been planning since reading that request. “Are his values the reason why he refuses to face the Mafia?”

“Hardly. The only god he hates is himself.”

He paused.

It struck something deep, embedded inside bones that were not meant to be hollow — Elise pulled at his hair, and the jolt of it screeched like tires halting at the very last moment. For some reason, Chuuya thought of graves.

“Our last chat involved a pretty interesting idea,” the Boss continued — blind to his pause, or satisfied with it. “Kouyou must have taught you tons of creation myths, correct? The Executive finds the Christian one particularly perplexing. If eating the apple would make the humans know all that God knew — he asked me — why, when they ate it, was shame the first thing they learned?”

Rising from the white lace of Elise’s hems, Mori’s eyes landed on him — the irises sprinkled in crimson, like blood stains on a wall; like a crime he was not allowed to mourn. He wondered if this was a lesson, too. “What do you think?”

Chuuya shut his lips. He had never liked riddles; had lamented every, imagine this, Kouyou had put on his desk, swearing that training the mind was more than mere calligraphy strokes — that understanding the world was more than the ability to destroy it.

But I’m good at it.

A gentle pat, with her fan. You can be good at more than one thing — or you can be easily replaceable. Pick your poison and die with it.

Eventually, he shrugged. “I think it’s stupid to assume gods don’t have their secrets, too.”

A beat.

Mori smiled; it widened and it widened.

“I was looking at some data the Intelligence gathered from the Verlaine’s accident,” he offered, pulling the dossier open again. Chuuya tried his very best to stay put; planted his feet until he swore he could feel the wood cut naked skin. “We have no information from the laboratory itself — not anymore, of course. But the resemblance helped.”

He studied the drawing he had only caught a glimpse of; when the man raised the picture to compare it with his face, Chuuya tasted rust and tasted rage and tasted something that would have granted him a traitor’s death.

Don't look at that, he wanted to say. Don't look at that. It isn't real. Aren't I real?

“You know,” Mori mused, lowering it again — right before Chuuya could look at it, “Dazai told them to just draw you, as if you'd never learned how to kill someone who did not deserve it.”

He stared at the wall. His fingers twitched.

Elise jumped down from his back with a quiet, unspoken hiss; when he stared down at his gloves, they were thick with sweat.

Ought to be angry, Chuuya thought. Ought to be angry. Ought to be human about it.

“Of course he did,” he concluded.

“Still,” the former concluded, shutting the dossier again. He smiled at him as if he had no idea of the obsessive beating of his heart; he smiled at him as if he'd wanted it. As long as he doesn't look at it, Chuuya reminded himself, eyes on the dossier. “It's nothing to concern yourself with, is it? Give it a few years and some more scars, and you won't even look like him anymore.”

The stained glass windows painted squares of colors on the floor. When the afternoon sun was hidden behind passing clouds, they changed shapes — Chuuya studied the frame of shoulders in those curling kaleidoscopes, and knew it, and didn't.

One day, Mori had said.

Something settled between his ribs — as starved as he had been under debris and blood; as desperate as he'd screamed under the shocks of N's electricity. It isn't hard, Albatross had said, when he had taught him to stay afloat. He wondered what he would have thought of it all; he wondered if he deserved to long for wrinkles and grey hair, when his friend had died young and being lied to. You just have to want to breathe tomorrow too.

“Yes,” he said, a bit dazed. Perhaps it was selfish. All that was left of those kind eyes that had died in his arms was himself, and Chuuya, at his very root — had only ever been a thief.

“Yes, sir.”

Mori smiled. “How good it is to have you back, Chuuya,” he said. “Do me a favor. Don't tell Dazai about our future lessons. Not yet,” A wink; as secretive as they went. “We wouldn't want him to throw a tantrum, would we?”

Despite the unignorable hum of change, cracking Yokohama like roots breaking the concrete, the Port Mafia stayed the same.

Chuuya belonged to those halls as much as he did to the sky; sometimes he traced his fingers through the cold glass of the stained glass windows and recalled the voice of some unimportant cop reprimanding him on public property damage — recalled breathing in, feet deep into the chasm he had opened in the ground, and saying, this city is mine.

The Guerrilla squad greeted him with bows that were a dance between going deeper than necessary and a simple nod.

He asked after the families he hoped he would never have to meet, and still couldn't keep from memorizing — a courtesy Kouyou had tutted into his brain. The mental image of his own doorbell ringing at night, and some seventeen years old not even knowing his name before delivering a son, a husband's, a mother's corpse.

"Who are they bringing to you?" Kouyou asked, the one time he offered that possibility.

Chuuya wondered.

He had hardly ever not been the one who found the bodies — had dragged himself off any and all beds for the sake of fighting along to people that he knew — despite his efforts — would not last the fight.

"Tanaki," he answered. "She seems like she would die alone."

She hadn't talked to him since the wedding. Since he was always the one carrying the corpses — he let her.

He roamed, instead.

Nights were for the murders that required more blinding scenography than the work a bullet could do; for senators' villas that required to be left bloodied and haunted — when the whispers of a Port Mafia who had grown more lenient than it had been under an old man's craze needed to fill the silences. It filled the newspapers, too.

Mori grew less pale every day.

Days were for different kinds of tidying up. Kajii dragged him to some tailor of his knowledge right as the days grew icier, and sat on an armchair as he put on fancy suit after fancy suit, surrounded by tape and needles and clothes that fit better than his skin.

"I have Executive Kouyou's blessing," he made sure to let him know, between his requests for some Opera. "She promised to maim me if we go back with less than twenty pieces. Twenty! As if you don't wear the same thing every day!"

Emptying a seat meant needing to refill it; meant smiling and sharing cheap Sake with the most cunning — and easily influenceable, and rich enough to make his head spin, and stupid enough to be played like a fiddle — men and women of Yokohama, promising power in exchange of shut lips and unwavering support.

The galas were the least entertaining.

“I preferred it when we were at war,” he grunted — the third week in a row he had to show up at Kouyou’s door, asking her to fix the tie he could never do straight. “These assholes had their asses wiped clean long after they learned what shit was.”

Kouyou smiled.

But not really; she wouldn’t have dared. He saw it all the same — because he had come to her snarling and dripping mud and hating the cage he had let himself be locked inside, and she had liked him from the first moment. “At war against whose army?”

He thought about it. “Who was your favorite?”

“Oh,” Her hands fell to his gloves; she fixed them, and brushed against scars Chuuya couldn’t recall if she had ever seen. “Beatrice was sort of fun, was she not?”

Replacements meant discussions — the top of Hirotsu’s head as he bowed, offering his Lizards for any and all services before leaving the room.

Executive meetings had been a boring novelty on their own. The excitement of granted responsibility disappeared faster than the scratches down his arms ever did. Soon, Chuuya learned to associate the crimson lights of the meeting room with the feeling of Dazai’s ankle hooked onto his, for the sake of sweating him to death — the brush of his fingertips under one of his gloves, tracing mindless chats and insulting Ace’s hairstyles as he bit his lips to raw skin.

“Always so cheerful, sir!” Hamamoto called, when he stopped by the training grounds with steps heavy enough to crack the floor. “Big-names-san meetings kicking your ass?”

“That pear shaped thing you call a head would like it, wouldn’t it?” Chuuya barked back — unexpected and unbridled in the way the Sheep used to roughhouse; because half of the Guerrilla squad had been picked off the streets.

Hamamoto had been twenty when Chuuya was eleven — but biting tourists’ wrists for food all the same.

They rolled around the dried blood on the floor, play-fighting, soon attracting a small circle of the squad — abandoning their targets to whistle and bet on that badly-rendered version of a duel. Some of their shoes landed on his knuckles, when they scurried too close — he sunk his fingers in own flesh until it all felt less violent than his veins were trying to convince him it was.

Once he got bored and pressed Hamamoto on the ground, Osaki, the sharpshooter, counted to three and whooped.

Demands for a rematch were fired.

“Give it up, To-to, ” one of the tallest women Chuuya had ever met — who only went by X — cooed, wrapping herself over his shoulders. “Your fault for taking that bet. As if anyone could put the local god in a chokehold.”

“Uuh, ” The twin girls pretended to pass out, “Fear the local god!”

“Before he eats you alive!”

“Before he blows your house down!”

“Will you two — “ Chuuya swatted at them.

“I was drunk when I took that bet,” Hamomoto was complaining, “And you still let me make a fool of myself, as if I didn’t ask you to —“ “Irrelevant,” X replied.

“Everyone,” Chuuya called, as he did every time he wandered down there — an attempt, perhaps, at learning from past mistakes. At making men who were meant to die for each other not hate each other. “Move your asses. Back to training.”

A chorus — something devastatingly deferential, and yet lined by a clear predilection that would have burned his fifteen years old self’s ears to the point of an ache. He was getting better at that, he thought. Better at watching kindness in the eyes, before it was swept from his hold and never recovered — before he forgot the exact shade of the irises.

Chuuya stopped by the training room everyday. If it was colder, behind the windows — he looked at the men, and wondered what smell their rotting corpses would carry.

You cannot think of them as cattle to the slaughter, Mori had explained, on what might have been the first of their lessons. You cannot meet their eyes and let them see that you cannot shoulder any more graves on your shoulders.

He had thought of the strange whispers he could not escape — had thought about asking Mori what he thought of the buzzing gossip, swearing the boy he had entrusted the everything of his organization to would put a knife to his throat.

It had seemed foolish; the delirium of a child not allowed at the adults’ table.

The whispers did not stop, still, no matter how unconcerned a healing Mori appeared about them. Chuuya looked out for the shaping faction no one was brave enough to admit was forming; Chuuya began to slip his finger in Dazai’s palm as well, during Executive meetings, to ask — are you going to call them the Dazaists? Demonists? The Unite Mackerels Defense Front?

Why, the boy would blink, wide and annoying — in that way that meant he found something Chuuya had said extremely funny, and would die before admitting it. Want to join?

On a day that was a bit warmer than the others, Kouyou let him pour tea in their cups, caressing Hikari’s aging fur with a distant sort of smile — and after checking every door, she asked: “Should he kill him, would you support him?”

She asked as if she knew Chuuya wouldn’t answer. So he didn’t.

So he roamed.

“Sir,” Hamomoto called, on an utterly cold day, settling next to him on the bleachers. The skin under his eyes resembled a stormy sky; tired or not, Chuuya could still see smoke rise from his target. “I wanted to thank you.”

He’d been laying with his head tilted back, eyes on the lack of humidity stains on the ceiling. Building One was newer than the other — it had been wounded, like all of them. “Don’t be stupid.”

“I’m not.”

“I executed your friend,” he insisted, a bit more brusque than he’d intended. “Despite the circumstances, offer yourself and him the respect not to say stupid shit.”

Chuuya enjoyed the Guerrilla’s loosened behavior — had fought for it.

It didn’t mean he was willing to let it go further. A night out drinking after a good mission; shared laughter and inside jokes as they fought on the floor — the basic courtesy of calling them by name when he assigned them to possibly death. Chuuya rejoiced in their presence and breathed out in the silence of his home and would have died for them. Chuuya had no more space for —

“You tried to vouch for him,” Hamamoto insisted. “It’s more than Katsuki deserved, after —“ A pause. A slight redness in the corner of his eyes. He wondered what Tanaki was doing; if it hurt her to leave the breakfast he kept bringing her always untouched, two weeks in a row. “No one else tried to help him. They all agreed he simply couldn’t — keep up. You tried.”

Keep up.

It had been an unstoppable melody out of Kouyou’s mouth, during his first weeks in the Mafia. Every calligraphy meeting, every training session, every cleaned drop of blood from Golden Demon’s sword, every smile — keep up, Chuuya.

The Port Mafia was an ecosystem of its own; it had its own laws and its own gravity. Calling it natural selection felt too cruel to the skull he had crushed under his shoe — the sight of teeth falling against the concrete, the resounding echo of bullets. Traitors and slackers-off and pebbles in the syndicate’s shoe and countless faces he had forgotten — it was all a matter of survival.

And luck, Iceman would have said, cynical. It would all be easier if people were more willing to admit that.

And money, Chuuya would have replied. And blood.

“When’s the funeral?” he asked. Because that man hadn’t been worthy of being Mafia — so he would, most certainly, get one.

---

...

---

Apart from all the private funerals, a public service was held to commemorate the victims of the Yokohama Juvenile Prison.

It came with scandal, of course — Taguchi had explained it far and deep: no one had known a structure like that even existed. How very lucky, a particularly mean-spirited gossip channel had long discussed, that such a discovery would come afloat on such a grievous time. No gossipy aristocrat and no views-catching television channel had the nerve to count the crimes the children the open coffins had committed.

Give it six weeks, Hirotsu told him. Precise to the dot; probably correct, too.

He went to the public service all the same.

“Is this how you spend your paid leave?” Officer Matsuda questioned, appearing next to the Church entrance Chuuya was leaning against. “I think I almost preferred it when you used to break into state-owned Arcades.”

Chuuya scoffed. “Don’t lie. Breaking and entering are so much paperwork.”

“You know, in another life — you would have made for a great lawyer.”

In this, he didn’t add. In this —

The coffins had been set in endless rows. He had shared three meals for more than a month with the barely recomposed bodies inside them; he hadn’t realized there were so many of them. It has to mean something, he thought, nonsensically. A rise in underage criminality. A fault in the system. A growing number of insufferable rich kids.

A woman draped herself across one of the graves. She wailed.

“Yuan’s fine, by the way.”

He tilted his head, quiet.

“She did catch me, once,” Matsuda added. “She was — strangely happy to see me. Invited me to dinner with her and that woman she’s staying with. She seemed desperate for stories,” The glance he threw his way was heavier than the persisting autumn wind. “She asked if I’d seen you.”

“And what did you say?”

He shrugged. “That you knew better than to let me find you.”

Mildly mollified, Chuuya nodded.

“You know,” Matsuda added, with a distant look in his eyes that he knew exactly where — when — to place. “Sometimes I wonder.”

“Wonder what?”

“If back then, you’d had the certainty that we would have been able to help,” he explained. He never really said Murase’s name in front of him, if he could help it. Chuuya thought he was getting that courtesy backwards. “Would you have let us?”

He was looking at him with strange, badly placed intensity. It doesn’t matter anymore, he had the temptation to tell him. It doesn’t matter. Why do you act like it does?

“I don’t know,” he offered. “I don’t care.”

The cameras took a few close pictures of the coffins. Matsuda nodded, frowning.

Rolling his hat between his hands, Chuuya then asked: ““You gonna help out with the Ballerinas now, or do we have to keep bumping into Police cars on the sidewalk of the Headquarters?”

A beat. A faraway reporter was narrating the scene inside the Church. Matsuda’s expression was complicated.

“We did figure out some of the late victims are from the Special Division, too,” the man said, at last. “An entire wing of it, actually.”

He kept his eyes on the coffins. “Really?”

“I believe the Mafia doesn’t exactly have the cards to risk a crusade like this,” he confirmed. “It certainly gives a basis to the Ballerinas’ theory. But the corpses of the only three names in our database from the Ballerinas’ days have already been found. We’d have to start from an empty page.”

“Then start it,” Chuuya replied. “What else was it for, otherwise?”

“What was it?”

All in one go, as per tradition, the coffins were sealed shut. The coordinated thud! echoed all across the room; some shoulders jumped, startled, and some shoulders stayed crying.

“What wasn’t?” he replied.

---

...

---

Three weeks after the replacement process had begun, and unassumingly colorful billboards of candidates for the upcoming elections sprouted all over the skyscrapers — Chuuya wore the grey suit that was too tight around his neck. Then, he rang the doorbell of some private party that officially hadn’t been thrown, and the woman who let him in said: “Oh. You’re Lippman’s kid.”

It was a harder hit than he had thought it could be, seasons later.

Liquifying. Chuuya didn’t know what his face made of it — if the melted wax of a face he had sculpted, looking inside a mirror he didn’t recognize, took too long to drip onto the floor; if grief ever stopped hurting; if that woman was looking for a fight and if he would be blamed for it.

“You don’t remember me, do you?” She shook her head, amused.

Her hair was a cascade of dyed gold, just pale enough to seem white, pooling down her same colored dress until they meddled. Behind her was the attic of one of the highest skyscrapers in Yokohama — a fog of smoke and drugs blurring the sparkly dresses of the most well-known actors of the nation.

The higher you are, Mori would have said, the easier it is to fall.

“Understandable,” she continued. “The one time we met, you and those friends of yours were too busy graffitizing the fucker’s billboard.”

Chuuya stared. “Oh.”

Memories flooded into his skull, rattling it harder than bolts of lightning would have managed to. A night of eons; snow clinging to the hems of his pants as he cursed and cursed Albatross again for convincing him to tag along — Pianoman’s too polite giggles; Iceman’s apparent disinterest; the cold metal of Doc’s IV pole as Chuuya helped him climb to the roof.

Chuuya had been the one to bring spray paint with him. They had all agreed he seemed like the best option for who would know where to find some — what is that supposed to mean, assholes?

Lippman had laughed to the point of tears, watching the fake mustache on his face — some dramatic poster for some romcom, the lead actress' hair flying into his eyes.

A woman had dragged them back inside, at some point. If you guys get a bit more drunk and fall off, I will be blamed for it, she'd sighed.

"So," the actress had to scream, to be heard over the music, as she led him through couches of intertwined bodies and unappealing beverages. She had to be older than thirty, but something in the sway of her hips made her seem younger. "You're the one they sent to negotiate the Mafia's fame facade? You must have climbed up the ladder, since Lip died."

No one Chuuya knew had called Lippman Lip.

He felt the urge to dislike her; pushed it down, stole a glass of wine from a table and said: "There's nothing to discuss. You and your group have already accepted."

A snort. "With all that money on the table, we would have been stupid not to."

"I'm here for your opening nights' schedules."

"Got some urgent meetings to organize where no one will peek?" At his unimpressed gaze, she huffed. "Are you going to be a stable figure for these matters? I would like to request a change. Lip was tons funnier. No need to be all business in a room with la crème de la crème of this city, kid. You could stand to have some fun."

"We have different definitions of what an elite is," Chuuya replied, studying a wall of shelves — littered in prizes, their fake gold almost blinding when hit by the kaleidoscopic lights.

He had read that some acting association was thinking of opening a museum in Lippman's old mansion; a tribute to his movies.

That's fine, he liked to tell himself. He had taken to sleeping in the bathtub, sometimes. The porcelain was always cold on his arms — almost enough not to need to be scratched. Sometimes he woke up with eyes already open, no need to blink, chest heaving, and he didn't remember anything at all. That's fine. You don't own the dead.

"And Lip is dead, anyway," he added.

Something in her gaze shifted — a glint of undyed hair, perhaps; a face less untouched by the lights. She had a peculiar tattoo — a bruise-like line, shaping itself into a half moon, right at the juncture between her shoulder and neck.

She sighed — held his chin between two fingers and leaned down to plant her lips on his.

"Dear," The woman sighed, uncaring of his spluttering. "That's how you know the fucker was good, uh? Come on. I'll show you the wine cellar."

For reasons Chuuya wouldn't have known how to explain, he followed.

He stayed most of the night, too; swirled around those bodies he assumed most people his age would have freaked out to see from up close — thought about the poster he had seen in Yuan's room, the last time he had floated near her window. It had been hanging weakly, as if unsure such frivolity was allowed to her.

Something about him — the novelty of a newcomer, perhaps; a bit too young and bearing slightly unusual colors — called the crowd to him.

Chuuya tried to drink his wine one sip at the time, unwilling to deal with the mess he would leave behind if unrestrained — Chuuya sat by the daughter of some filmmaker and let her study his eyes with her hazed own.

“You know,” she told him, “My mother used to tell me stories about people with those eyes.”

Mine didn't, he thought he might have told her, with a hint of cruelty. Instead, he offered her his inner jacket when she began to shake, and let her disappear through the crowd.

He pocketed her stolen phone in his coat, and left the room.

[“You're too beautiful to waste it away in passivity,” the women at the Pomegranate loved to tell him, whenever he and Kouyou were in too much of a hurry for her to complain about his presence there. “Learn to welcome their touches, and get what you want back.”

“I'm not the ideal choice for the Rose-blush Tactic,” he would reply, each time — because he wasn't. Older women and careful men at the most luscious Mafia events loved to fawn over him — still, they tended to pick a safer target as soon as he opened his mouth.

More often than not, that target tended to be Dazai — with his suicide offers and endlessly charming eyes, and the way he pretended not to feel Chuuya's gaze on himself, as he walked to some private corner with a pearls-bearing woman.

Sometimes it was just flirting. Sometimes it was a kiss or two — sometimes, the way Dazai would tilt his head back on his seat, exposing the crooked line of his throat. He had been a beautiful kid, if a bit somber, dark under the eyes — as far as the voices went. The more his lines sharpened, the more their fingers trembled.

Sometimes, more rarely, only enough to fit the fingers of a hand —

Did you fuck her?, Chuuya would ask him, sometimes, when they shared a cigarette on the sidewalk, waiting for a car to come pick them up.

Dazai was a pale, thin thing under the moon — not really attractive. Sickly looking; all Chuuya felt was the instinct to hold his hand when they crossed the street, and then slap his nape when he started to run.

No double suicide, unfortunately, Dazai would sigh, each time. Twirling until his coat was liquid air — having to look down to meet his gaze, and doing so with a childish glee that was the most captivating he could be, in Chuuya's eyes. Maybe next time.

It wasn't an answer.

The subject was better dropped. Dazai would get whiny if he didn't; would start asking awkward questions for the sake of watching rage paint him red.

Miri from Intelligence said you'd look great between her thighs, he would chant, pulling on his choker; and, I heard that guy from the Black Lizards say he would want us both at the same time, while he abandoned his head on his shoulder in the back of the car, the bumpy ride knocking them closer; and, the first time I fucked someone I was —

I lied, he would say, days later. He always lied, but not quite. You didn't believe me, silly Hatrack, did you?]

The actors' schedule was given to him, at one point — wrapped with a bow and a formal letter Mori would find meaning into. Blondie told him she would wait for him at her premiere, to discuss protection; Chuuya thought about asking from what, and didn't.

"You'd do very good on the big screen," she told him, holding his chin still — studying his eyes. "Lippman must have told you at least once. They like freaks like us."

Chuuya's mouth opened to snarl — the sight of her unmatched eyes, watching him with a twinkle that spoke of nothing but trouble, made him pause.

"Learn to enjoy what you're given," Blondie said, as she ruffled his hair, and kissed him again — a wet smack on both his cheeks and then his lips, emptily affectionate. How French of you, Kajii would have said. "Do it mercilessly. A smack in the face, to all of them. Lippman came from the streets too, you know? Mommy took him in," Her voice turned into a sly whisper. "And he killed her for it."

He watched her. "I didn't know."

A wink. "Come around more, and I'll give you some stories my little brother might have failed to mention."

She shut the door in his face without a care. Chuuya hadn't even asked her name.

---

...

---

"Oi, don't run off," Chuuya called, climbing up the snowy grounds of the cemetery. Q's silhouette was a dot in the slightly dirtier white of their school uniform, disappearing up and down the tombstones. "If you fall in one of the open graves, I'm not saving you!"

The season was starkly familiar against wind-swept eyes — if less plastic, compared to the Ballerinas’ mess; more authentic under his shoes, as the fallen leaves crunched and the bright stain of the child’s yellow scarf whipped the air. Kouyou had given it to them.

We punish them for smearing blood all over the floor, she had shaken her head about, once, in the privacy of her room. We praise them for the exact same thing. Seems unwise.

Perhaps it wasn’t compassion, Chuuya considered. Perhaps it was just carefulness; stained mindfulness of consequences. Perhaps most of them had stopped visiting Q’s cell — the clearer it became they had been the one to choose to put blades in their own arms.

How long until they forget which one is their duty?

“I know her,” Q let him know, when he managed to catch up, pointing to a nameless grave. It bore some graffiti of a monster. “She stole kids from the Institute.”

Chuuya crouched down. “How would you know?”

“She stepped on my foot, once.”

He sighed.

He offered them his hand to hold because, doll or not doll — there were only so many times Mori would accept not to execute them all for losing the local ill omen. He settled his eyes on the curling strands of candid and ashy hair, and he thought of the slight pause Koda always inhaled right from the space next to him, before launching in a speech.

They walked by the small bundle of graves dedicated to the Wild Geese Orphanage. Koda’s brother, he knew, was somewhere there.

Q nudged his side.

They had grown taller, at some point — had made sure to point it out the moment Chuuya had showed up at the metal doors of the army base, pushed by Kouyou’s cleared-throat; as if it was a less heartbreaking, more childish way of saying, I haven’t seen you in almost a year.

“Are those your friends?” they asked, nodding to the graves in front of them.

Abandoned graves came in pairs; Chuuya had mentally situated his squad’s own only a few steps from where the Flags’ own resided. “Yeah. Looking fancy and all, aren’t they?”

The kid squinted, pulling on the hems of their shirt. They stared at what they couldn’t know was Koda’s own, and Chuuya tried not to feel particularly touched by it.

Very quietly, Q kicked a pebble. It bounced off Rin’s grave; landed on the wet grass.

“Don’t worry,” they said, then. “God likes them.”

He slipped his hands in his pockets. “I don’t see the use in that, but it’s nice to know.”

“It means they don’t need to hurt anyone anymore,” the kid insisted. They looked up at him with strangely shaped pupils, scarlet veins at the edges of their eyes. Their bandages peeked from the shirt — Chuuya thought of Dazai’s most distracted glances, and he thought of the way he laughed when under Corruption; and then he didn’t think at all. “It’s good.”

The cemetery quickly got on Q’s nerves — either that, or they decided to test his fishing out of graves threat. They began playing Hopscotch between the tombstones, climbing over the angelic statues — unbothered by the offended stares of the little crowd.

“Maybe I should get them a console, too,” Chuuya mused, through munches of food he had bought more out of obligation than anything else. “Is that a thing psycho brats dig? I sure would have,” A huff; a kick to Albatross’ grave. “Don’t look at me like that, assholes. ‘S not my fault I keep getting roped into babysitting.”

Chuuya was hardly looking for hobbies; for silence, perhaps. “I know I messed up,” he mumbled, once he was done with his half-assed rendition of the events of Tanaki’s wedding.

Summarizing stories to the Flags always felt a bit silly, but efficiently soothing to the swells in his throats one or two missions wouldn’t sink — he wouldn’t have indulged, had he felt a fully developed presence in the near vicinity.

“It’s not like she doesn’t understand. We’re in a bad situation, yeah? It’s that bastard’s fault, anyway — and her husband didn’t even divorce her or anything,” His tone seemed plastic to his own ears. “I made sure to pay for her laundry too, for the wedding dress — I know blood is hard to clean off from the whites. Ane-san’s been gifting me detergents, lately. Fuck knows why.”

He gulped down his bite; threw some fries to Albatross’ grave. “Of course she’s mad. It was her big day. A chance at something normal, once in a while — I suppose that’s why she’s had so many weddings. Who needs that many weddings, anyway? She’s a beautiful woman. She should escape commitment.”

The wedding was a confused bundle of flares he had refused to linger on — table cloths stained in blood and viscera; the repeating ricochet of bullets where his steps were not fast enough to reach.

“This whole Cleanse situation, you would have loved it,” he added, some undefined eternity later, nodding towards Pianoman’s grave. “Bet you’d have found a way to get yourself a comfy seat in the City Hall. And Doc would have forced you to make monthly blood draws mandatory.”

He vaguely longed for a cigarette, but he suspected it had more to do with the motion, than the action itself. Thinking of Iceman always came with the smell of smoke; thinking of graves always came with a strange urge to set something on fire.

Seated on the shoulders of some general’s statue, Q waved their arms to the sky.

Not a cigarette, he let himself consider. He yearned for something more physical; for the way Albatross would always pick the priciest option of anything if Pianoman was paying, maybe.

One of Noguchi's insults. For the City Hall not to burn the skeleton of the Wild Geese to the ground — to build a supermarket or a clothing shop over it.

"I'm gonna get that Permit," he let them know. "And I'm gonna wave that fucking thing it in your stupid faces until you feel it. And you will."

"Chuuya nii-san!" Q roared, laughing so loud it startled some crowd off a nearby statue. Chuuya ought to clean leaves off Albatross' grave; take his motorcycle for a ride and remind himself of what being left behind felt like. No need to hurt anyone anymore. "Chuuya, look! It's snowing!"

---

...

---

He recognized his shoes well before his guest bent in a half and stuck his nose under the desk. Dazai did always pick the least ideal leather.

"That's my spot," he noted, annoyed.

"Then you should have been faster," Chuuya spat, eyes on the commercials popping up in the laptop carefully balanced on his knees, as he attempted to set an episode. He huddled closer to one side of the secretary corner at Building One — not quite an invitation, given he followed it with some well-aimed kicks to the boy's shins. "This was my idea."

Dazai settled next to him. "How was this your idea, if we didn't even plan to meet?"

"Well," he hissed, "Well — you should have known I would do something like this."

Dazai's elbow landed somewhere between his ribs and his ankles, smacking one corner of the laptop against the desk so hard it cracked. "Maybe you should have known I'd do something like this."

"You've never apologized to anyone in this world. Not once."

"Who says I'm here to apologize?" He sniffed. A small group from the Guerrilla squad had been muttering about Dazai all day, during their visit to some Senator's warehouse — talking about factions and possibilities and history. About time someone put a bullet in his head, Hamamoto had said. Perhaps threatening the Boss will give us just that. "I need to catch up on Spider Eyes, and this place has the best Internet reception."

Chuuya frowned, pulling the laptop closer to his chest. “Could you pretend not to be living and breathing shit for, like, thirty seconds?”

Dazai blinked. “Can you pretend to reach the national height average for thirty seconds, or is floating too tedious?”

“Shut the fuck up. And Floor Seven has free Wi-Fi.”

“We’re banned from Floor Seven, Slug,” A sigh. “Not that I care, but Mori is already galling enough these days without adding on it.”

He opened his mouth — closed it again, because he had been about to suggest Floor Thirty-Three instead. Keeping count was tedious and necessary, unless Chuuya wanted to be faced with the shrieking security system — and Double Black were banned from a good quarter of floors, for reasons that ranged from property damage to hours-long debates in the ears of innocent workers, boys, truly —

Sonoko-chan says I can go wherever I want, Dazai would then say, usually. But Sonoko-chan had tried to kneel and propose marriage to the Demon Prodigy, months ago, so she didn’t count.

Find someone better, Chuuya had told her, once — because almost all the girls Dazai’s shifting moods left behind tended to inevitably fall next to the closest shadow tailing his crooked frame. That includes almost anyone in this God forsaken earth.

She had sniffed. No one’s like him.

On that, he had shivered, we can certainly agree.

Chuuya paused, gasping. “Wait, was Sonoko the one who sent a bomb to your office?”

The desk chair was moved away, swift and gentle on the marble floors.

Heels and flower-patterned stockings filled their vision — a sight as familiar as every free afternoon he had ever been granted, softening the edges of his shoulders.

“Boys,” Tanaki called, very quiet. “Get up.”

Dazai’s expression did something complicated. It dragged goosebumps from under Chuuya’s skin, pulsing strangely against his shirt — instinctive horror, perhaps. Chuuya was too distracted to wonder about his own features; the ache of his fingers, clenched too tightly around the laptop, startled him.

With a shared glance that meant nothing at all, they climbed out of the under-desk refuge.

Honeymoons are outdated, Tanaki had said, when Boss had presented his congratulations and offered a few days off service as a gift. Not while the season is so busy, sir. Perhaps one day, if you will still allow me.

Mori's nod had been unsurprised. Always proving yourself sooner than one can test, aren't you, dear Tanaki?

Honeymoon or not, a glow of sorts was still stuck all around her frame — something as elegant as her dress had been. She made sure to place her chair at a certain distance from them, and said: “You're too old to crank up under there. No need to get all stiff before a mission.”

To call her tone ungentle would have been a disservice. She took the laptop from his hands with incredible kindness, not touching a inch of him — made sure to shut the Spider Eyes page, before closing it.

“Hey,” he protested. “Do you know how long it took me to get past the viruses?”

“Perhaps we should pick a less obscure soap opera for our next watch,” Dazai suggested. “Something easier to find. We don't want Chuuya to accidentally land us under the Government's eyes, do we?” A pause. “Not again.”

“What the fuck is that supposed —“

“Boys,” Tanaki echoed, eyes on some place of her twinned hands. The engagement ring, maybe — the wedding band. The scar one of the guests had left on her wrists, trying to hold onto her as Chuuya sunk his shoe in his skull. “I have work to do. Maybe later?”

They stared. She sat on her chair — typed away on her laptop, offering gentle nods to the entering mafiosi.

A bit lost, only realizing their own dejected steps by the final stairs of the Building, they left.

The next day, unprompted, they were back.

Unsuccessful results followed.

“She's never going to forgive us,” Chuuya had no choice but to observe, one week into that parade. His spine was permanently rearranged; the sight of Tanaki's unimpressed, disappointed gaze was burned under his eyelids, itching in a way that made him madder than some more maturity would have justified. “She even refused the Italian takeout. She never refuses Italian takeout.”

“I'm not here to apologize for doing my duty,” Dazai insisted, every day. “Tanaki's been in the Mafia for longer than we have. She should know things don't always go as planned.”

Nonetheless, he failed to keep the whiny edge out of his tone.

Favorite pastries were left on her counter; the little commissions her job demanded were taken care of before she could; they spent a whole morning, still rubbing Senator blood from under their shoes, running around the city in search of the agency that owned her wedding location — and Dazai stole his wallet to pay for all damages.

“You have my same salary, jackass, ” Chuuya could only snap, raining kicks on his back, as they walked out, “It’s probably higher! You’re a fucking Executive!”

“I keep telling Mori I don’t need money,” Dazai replied, confused. “I’ve got yours.”

Favors seemed the best solution to their perplexion. Kouyou had been mad at the two of them more often than Chuuya could comfortably recall — Mori’s exasperation was hardly cause for intervention, as long as it didn’t grow sharp. Hirotsu’s frustration was a daily sigh behind their running feet.

Tanaki had never truly avoided them.

Chuuya had pulled away, during the Nine Rings’ Conflict — had made sure to step into rooms she would not find, to be quiet and polite and a good fighter, as if it could fill a void he had helped tear into her.

Stop feeling like you owe me, she’d said.

“Odasaku says women like flowers,” Dazai came to the point of murmuring — breaching even his oath not to mention his best friend in Chuuya’s vicinity. “The florist near the park has a daughter that goes to the local University. I could threaten her — do you think a whole flower shop would make her less prissy?”

“I get that you wanted to make the traitors an example, or whatever turns your torturer mastermind ass on,” he snapped, watching the woman laugh along to some faceless subordinate through the vents’ slots. “Good job, or whatever. The whole Mafia hasn’t talked about anything but Tanaki’s slaughterhouse wedding in a month. You want me to believe you couldn’t have organized a public execution in the training grounds?”

Stubbornly, he kept quiet. Tanaki laughed some more. Chuuya watched him frown about it.

Gifts turned out to be the worst method; they all turned her expression more sour than it already was, and she was quicker to hush them out from under the desk. She was more likely to hear out whatever starting point they were attempting to build up — if they didn’t immediately start fighting in front of her.

The one time Chuuya had gone alone — asking if she wanted to join him to the cemetery — she had only shaken her head.

“I’m not here to apologize,” Dazai swore.

On a cloudy afternoon, Chuuya watched him climb out of the desk, drape himself over Tanaki’s chair and moan: “Tanaki, the Hatrack is so very sorry, why can’t you just forgive him and let us move on?”

Chuuya kicked him right in the face. Tanaki threw them out. When her husband came by to bring her a packed dinner — he met Dazai’s eyes through the ice pack Chuuya had annoyedly pressed on it, and didn’t say anything.

Slowly, like all corpses tended to do around there, the smell grew intolerable. And the worms came to eat.

Managing to get her to sit on the floor, laptop on her stockings, and Chuuya and Dazai on either side of her — should have felt more like a victory. But she spent that whole afternoon silent — watching Spider Eyes pass in front of her and under their commentary with a hint of tiredness.

“Give her three days,” Dazai swore, confidently, as if dealing with a body in the dungeons. “She’ll start talking.”

She did.

Clipped sentences and quivering smiles in the face of their wittiest remarks to the characters; she ate the breakfast Chuuya brought her, and she didn’t join him in his visits to the Cemetery — but he found flowers on his graves all the same.

“Sorry,” Chuuya offered, one evening, like a second thought, while Dazai pretended to sleep on the floor — hoping he would piggyback ride him to that container of his, probably. Or to Albatross’ place, given he kept breaking in at weird hours — and Chuuya kept waking up on the floor.

“It’s alright,” she replied, eyes on the screen. “It will not matter anymore, soon.”

One week later, she let her head drop on his shoulder as she watched; some days after, she fixed Dazai’s tie before a meeting. Her husband came by to bring her lunch.

On the last night that tension between them lingered so openly — the last night before it turned into a deaf hum of sorts, ever present but less cruel; easy to ignore, if Chuuya closed his eyes and thought of the fear most eyes in the Mafia reserved for their roaming through the halls — she set up the laptop herself, and asked: “What is it that your boys feel so apologetic for?”

They exchanged a glance, perplexed.

“Well,” Dazai dared, eventually. “Blood is hard to get off wedding dresses.”

“For ruining your special day,” Chuuya replied, as he reached behind her to slap his nape — hard. “Not letting you know.”

Tanaki studied them.

Imperscrutable, in some way — the way some weathers were; the shape some bodies left on the ground when burned. Dazai was playing with the hems of her skirt, ripping loose threads off. Chuuya wasn’t sure of why he felt like they had failed some sort of test.

[Once, he recalled, when they were younger, she had asked them what the missions that involved Chuuya’s body destroying itself — as she lacked a name; as they all did, and no one was brave enough to ask — felt like.]

“Uh,” Dazai had blinked, realizing the expression on Chuuya’s face probably meant no answers for a while. “Like any other, I’d say.”]

“I suppose,” Tanaki concluded, only barely louder than the voices coming from the screen — somewhat quizzical; a hint of empty wonder.

And that was the last of it.

---

...

---

The presenter wore a somber expression during the first commercial break they bumped on.

“ — only mere weeks from the anniversary of the beloved actor’s passing,” she was saying, eyes on the notes, “ Despite requests for privacy, sources seem to agree the death of the actress is unable to be ruled off as a mere suicide, with numerous evidence pointing towards a violent altercation that might have instigated the —“

Chuuya met the woman’s eyes in an old picture right as Tanaki’s lips parted — her make up and grin lighting up the entire screen.

Breaking through some old videotape clip — a last dedication put together in too little time, from movies he hadn’t seen — Lippman’s sister offered them a wink, and did not move until her screen turned black and white, buzzing.

Chapter End Notes

skk: my emotional support secretary is mad at me. hope i die from the note in the juvie's control room: 'jay-e shomà khālist' which means "your place is empty" (a persian way of saying "i miss you") hey there! nice to see you again. life update for those who remember that one "almost got run over note"... apparently i broke one of my toes. but! it doesn't hurt at all so that's very surprising to me. anyway. i'm fine and alive and thinking about skk, and that alone will certainly heal me.

thank you so much for reading, and for leaving comments and kudos. i hope you liked this just as much. stay warm and have a beautiful day week and everything!!

see you soon! ;)

THAT'S

Chapter Notes

see you at the end! ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xvii.

---

Case number: 37837888

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [Code Name: Double Black] were tasked with [...]*

---

Ten days before Christmas, the first of the assassins broke into the Boss' room.

Roughly five hours later, as a somber group of mafiosi reunited in the interior garden of Building Three — the blood parking lot, Chuuya had heard them call it, when he was still young and in need of directions — waiting for the execution of seven guards.

“Please,” the one still breathing choked out, attempting to crawl away from the rising foot of some faceless executioner — one of Dazai’s men; because they always were. “Please, please, I — I will be more careful, I promise, my loyalty is —“

“Your loyalty to the Boss is pointless,” Hirotsu cut through, vacantly, “If you can’t even guard his rooms. ”

A cry. His jaw was forced open on the curb. With a sick crunch, the shoe was smashed against his skull.

“What a bother,” Dazai sighed, sitting in front of him. A few seats had been brought to the circle, as they always were — Executives tended not to stand; not when the cockroaches who couldn’t do their job got exterminated. Chuuya thought it sort of disrespectful, in a distant way; he usually stood, arms on the closest chair. “They only waste so much time because they want to hear them cry. A bunch of sadists.”

“Says the only fucker to graduate from the school of torture,” Chuuya muttered, pinching his nape. His arm was straining a bit; mostly, to pull on his hair whenever his gaze grew too distracted — the look of upcoming jumps in the river.

“It’s not a school if I’m the only one.”

“You wrote entire papers on it,” he hissed. “I saw you bring them to the Intelligence.”

A woman choked on her spat tooth. Before the coughing fits could be over, her jaw had been cracked open by the sidewalk.

Three bullets followed.

As the corpses got dragged away with little delicacy, ignoring the heavy gazes slithering all over them, Chuuya let him know: “They think you sent the assassin.”

Dazai hummed, just as still. “Do they think I turned Mori’s personal guards into incompetent fools, too?” They had to be making for a sight, he supposed; lazily, Chuuya tried to remind his angling body that proximity with the Port Mafia’s latest conundrum was anything but wise.

Let them call you by name as much as you want, the boy had told him, once. Haven’t you heard our title? You’re as Mafia black as I am.

Not like you, Chuuya had to have said. He couldn’t recall.

When the last assassin was made to kneel, she escaped. An unreasonable suicide; she only did so to fall to her knees on her stubborn, desperate own — kissing the blood-dirty tip of Dazai’s shoe.

Chuuya crushed her head before any of the mafiosi could get a grip on their gun.

They had to be making for a sight, he thought, distracted — there were brains on their pants and utter silence over their skin. Hamamoto was standing on the other side of the room, face a void. Mori had almost been killed, and Chuuya was standing too close to a man who people would die swearing loyalty to.

“Clean that up,” Dazai ordered, bored.

The men turned to Chuuya.

Not much to do. He nodded.

It was the first execution of the season. Without any fussle, under a bandaged gaze, more followed.

---

...

---

The Old World tasted like more like copper the further one sat down the counter.

No scientific explanation to it, Doc had shrugged, when one of them had mentioned it. Chuuya had no idea of how the smell had even survived the reconstruction; being cocooned in it was easy, though, and it slipped down his throat like wine. Perhaps our brains are permanently altered. Could be a toxins issue. Oh, that could make for an interesting —

The brush of fabric on the floor tickled his ears. He didn't look up; only nodded once towards the sole bartender already working that early in the afternoon, watching her leave a glass in front of the seat Kouyou hovered upon.

“Am I meant to take offense?” the woman asked, with a small smile. She pointed to her glass. “You know I'm not a red woman, do you not?”

“You'll like this one,” Chuuya replied.

“You don't say,” Her amusement made sure not to knock too loudly on his tensed shoulders; still, he breathed it in. “Good to know all those wine tasteries I dragged you to were of some use.”

They sipped in silence. The bar was empty; the low hum of music pressed against the walls like a caress, framing the passersby behind the windows in a strangely rose-tinge. It had stopped raining, at some point between the funeral he had followed behind a tree and his stubborn walk to the bar — the smell of rain lingered, mixing with the Old World's more traditional scent.

Eventually, Kouyou said: "I'm sorry."

"Didn't know her," Chuuya shrugged.

"Ace's police squadron was assigned the investigation. They're convinced an Ability User is involved in her death," She glanced his way. "She and Lippman had been estranged for — a long time. They saw each other rarely; they first met when she was already out of their mother's house. Her death worsened the drift —"

"Why are you telling me this?"

"Because, eventually," she insisted, "Once you've crawled your way out of those silly, guilty ideas in your head, I know you would have looked for her. She would have given you these stories — I'm merely fixing an issue of timing."

"Timing," Chuuya echoed, tracing the rim of his glass. He thought about asking the woman's name — thought better of it. "Why kill her?"

Kouyou's next glance was dirtier — made it clear she had seen through his attempt at a change of topic. "The most popular theory is a message."

"What kind of message?"

"Keep your Cleanse to the political side," she mimicked. "They don't want us to control public opinion too, and our — the fame front is a road straight into that kind of power. I have a different theory."

He curled an eyebrow. "Then, what's our theory?"

Lipstick-red lips curled up; she tapped her nails on the wood, blind eyes roaming through the bottles lined up on the wall behind the counter. She extracted a thin file from the back of her sash — offered it to him with as much nonchalance as she had displayed the last time she had gifted him a collector revolver.

"The Cleanse demands a rebranding from our inner rows as well," she explained, as Chuuya squinted at the papers in his hands — pages after pages of identification forms, all of them belonging to somewhat-known rogue Ability Users. "Boss wishes for us to recruit — particularly in the Users department. The Special Division must have caught a whiff of our intentions. It already angers them enough, not having enough evidence to frame us for illegal hire of Users — Adding to our numbers?" Kouyou scoffed. "Question is — how did they even find out?"

"For every ten men you get, two spies fly in," Chuuya said.

"Awfully rude of you to quote me."

“Or awfully right,” He downed the last of his wine. “So what — the Special Division killed a well-known name just to ward us off building an Users’ network? It’s useless. If the Intelligence has already gathered this much on these people, they’re basically ours.”

“Except — killing civilians isn’t their style,” Kouyou commented. “Plus, we have detailed lists on almost every User who works at the Division — no one whose Ability matches what was found on the woman.”

Chuuya frowned. “What was found?”

She nodded towards the file, again. Making sure the bartender was too far to sneak a look, he moved all forms to the side — landing on the pile of pictures at the very end of the dossier.

“My subordinates stole those from that officer friend of yours,” Kouyou explained, with no more than a distracted gaze to the crime scene printed on the photos — Lippman’s sister body sprawled on the floor in a eerily cinematic pose, whole chunks of her skin and hair missing; as if ripped off by her own blood-struck fingers. “The police are scratching their heads — given the woman’s fame, they will go as far as possible not to give up the case to the Division.”

Scarlet blood stained every inch of surface the camera had captured — pooled on the floor, splattered on the walls, dripping from the pricey furniture. A crazed rat in a cage, he thought, but couldn’t quite pinpoint why.

He traced the half-moon tattoo on her neck — the trace of nails over it was barbaric, and clearly self inflicted. “Matsuda deals with children.”

“Apparently, he requested to be involved in this case personally,” Kouyou made a face. “Any theories on that?”

Chuuya munched on his lip. “If he knew about the connection between her, Lippman, and the Mafia — perhaps. But he doesn’t. You think the Special Division might have hired some rogue Ability User to take care of this mess?”

“Might even have offered them an Ability Permit deal,” she confirmed. “It goes against their morals, but after Dazai forced their hand to get our hands on the Government, and their own traitorous faction — I’m assuming they’re not willing to play any longer. The upcoming year will decide this tug o’war. No side will relent.”

He stared at his refilled glass, uncertain at when it had happened. Distantly, he recalled Agent Minami’s voice — the disbelieving expression she had worn, through the slot of the door, when Mori had refused the best deal the Mafia had received in decades.

The Mafia comes first, Mori had told him — lesson or warning, he wasn’t sure.

Chuuya straightened; then, he pushed the glass away. “So it’s all the bastard’s fault. Good to know. I’m unsurprised.”

A snort was quickly hidden behind her sleeve. Kouyou failed at looking truly reproachful. “Not exactly what I meant, little god.”

“Why not?” he mumbled. “His fake delusions of grandeur are what landed us in this mess. Do you know how many people I’ve caught furtively offering him Boss-deep bows? They think he’s gonna start a revolution.”

Very casually — attempting to sound so, at the very least — she questioned: “Do you not?”

“Dazai?” Chuuya gulped down the urge to laugh hysterically. “All he’s good for is sleeping in my office.”

“How trusting of you.”

“Ane-san,” he insisted. “It’s Dazai.”

“Mori’s successor, Dazai,” she pointed out.

“You don’t believe this shit either. Why are you even trying to make me rethink it?”

Kouyou pulled on her cheek, distracted. One of those less-than-statuary tics she couldn’t always avoid — a blooming garden of youth all over her crystal frame. “You know,” she continued, eventually — with a twinkle in her tone that said she was not willing to be honest again, for the rest of that conversation. “The two of you used to be much cuter a few years ago.”

He stared. “Cute?”

“Yes, sort of. Now you’re all — Executive that and Vice-Executive this, and reverently feared Double Black that, and dealing with the Mafia’s upper machinations this —“

“Didn’t you try to have Dazai permanently banned from my near vicinity?”

“Hardly relevant,” Kouyou waved the matter away. “Caution is never immoderate. I briefly made the mistake of doubting your ability to — well. All the same, you two are so — intense, these days. I miss seeing you run through the halls with those strange games of yours —“

“You’re like, twenty,” he reminded. “You know what a console is.“

“ — holding hands and whispering in the corners, like schoolboys —“

“I do not,” Chuuya snapped, “Hold hands with Dazai Osamu —“

“This alleged rogue Ability User is going to hit the Mafia next. They’re from the Ballerinas — whether the Division knows it or not.”

He paused.

Kouyou’s smile was still in place; to any eye peeking from behind the windows — to the perhaps not distracted enough bartender — she might have as well been talking about the weather. “Are they?”

“They buried her at the very edge of our territory,” she clarified. Chuuya recalled the sniffs of the crowd, drowned by the winter rain — the Christmas lights over the street, welcoming a new grief the gossip radio stations would not keep quiet about. “We need to understand what this Ability does.”

“I’ll take care of it,” he assured her.

“After the New Year,” she offered. “If you want. That’s when the official recruitment will start,” A tinge of sourness painted her white teeth; she knocked the sides of their abandoned glasses together, very softly. “I know this time of the year is — complicated, for you.”

The Old Bar tasted of copper — on his tongue; on his teeth; under the edge of nails that he had sunk into Albatross’ skin not to scream at his face. If he stared at the pool table in the deepest corner — rebuilt in the exact same place; either one of Mori’s miracles or some bad joke from fate — he thought he could hear breathing lungs.

Why grieve when you can rage?, something had said, the first time Verlaine had touched him.

But Arahabaki did not talk.

“No time like the present,” Chuuya said, getting off his stool. “It’s just Christmas, anyway.”

---

...

---

There was a locked door, on the way to the dungeons.

Shrieking to-be tortured souls were too busy to pay any mind to it, as blank-faced men in suits led them down the dried-blood-and-stone stairs. The men had higher concerns — or too low of a status to assume the information would be given. Death was too busy to pass by.

Chuuya didn’t care about doors.

[“What does it feel like?” Albatross asked, one day.

The Old World was almost empty — only the buzz of the heating system and a half-heartedly turned on TV laid next to their sprawled out bodies. Chuuya tilted his head until he could kick a pool ball into a hole, and curled an eyebrow. “What does what feel like?”

Arriving first to the bar — given Chuuya and Albatross shared an apartment complex, and the man refused to let him cross the front doors without him in tow — was nothing short of a miracle. He had a tendency to get distracted by anything the streets could offer — to decide a detour by some rival gang would be a great way to pass the time.

It's not, Pianoman usually ended up saying, patting Albatross' shoulder helpfully. Not quite his to-be Executive voice, but almost. Please stop trying to cause a conflict.

Chuuya would then raise his hand. Iceman tried to kill me when I was thirteen.

Can't we move past that?, Iceman would reply.

"Tainted," Albatross nodded towards his hands. "Is it like when you have a cold?"

"The hell you mean, a cold?"

"You know," he insisted. Chuuya didn't, but that consideration would hardly stop him. He had once broken into his apartment at three A.M., only to discuss the mythology surrounding Ōmu's race of birds. "I hate having colds. Wait — you said you don't get those."

"I don't, no."

"Can you feel people?" Albatross questioned, through the cartwheel he was attempting on top of the longest table. Chuuya bet ten minutes before the owner reprimanded him — seven until Lippman appeared and threw a knife at his kneecaps. "We are all subjected to gravity, right? Can you feel any of it? Are you like — constantly aware of the existence of everything?"

Chuuya stared at him. "No," he replied. His tone sounded unconvincing.

A shrug. "You should try it out. No point in having such a cool Ability if all you can do with it is stomp around."

"Stomp —" he spluttered. "I don't stomp around —"

"My apartment floors had to be renovated because of your stomping around. On the ceiling."

"You —"

The door opened, startling the bell. Lippman threw a knife towards Albatross' rolling body; he stopped it, but only barely. Doc dragged his IV pole all the way to Chuuya's seat — Iceman sat in the furthest corner, where he knew Chuuya would join him when things got too messy. Pianoman winked at him, twirling a still-bloodied piano chord between his fingers.

On his way home, later that night, as he and Albatross slobbered insults on each other's stumbling frames, he planted his feet on the ground, and he breathed. Breathed, and tried — ]

"Chuuya."

His hand fell from the door.

“Boss,” he exclaimed. “You’re up.”

“Somewhat,” Mori sighed, leaning onto the wall in a rather pointed way — a show of unfinished recovery Chuuya was sure he wouldn’t have offered to a crowd. A concession; a gift shiny enough for his eyes to be captured. “I should begin showing myself around, should I not? We don’t want the men to grow too complacent.”

The stairs, too, were weird — they made a strangely ruvid sound when shoes touched them; they were irregular to the eye. The relevant names in the syndicate looked at them as if truly haunted; he always got the feeling to be missing something.

“The men are loyal,” Chuuya replied.

A smile. “They are.”

You don’t know how it was before, Hamamoto had said, low, some time ago. His eyes had been set on Dazai. He had sounded angrier than Chuuya had ever assumed he could be.

“I believe a new analysis on our deals with the CSS has been delivered to my desk,” Mori said, once the note of quiet had been nurtured in the steps between them. Chuuya’s fingertips tingled; the door seemed to radiate a sick sort of warmth, on his back. “Are you up for a boring lesson with an old man?”

He bowed his head. “Hirotsu might take offense to that comment.”

You should try it out, Albatross had said. He pressed his shoulder against the door, subtle and bored — and frowned.

“What he doesn’t know won’t hurt him,” A wink. A lingering look to the door. A concession, he thought. Either that, or Chuuya was growing too observant for safe survival. “And some secrets are better kept.”

---

...

---

They were two alleys from the traitor Mori had almost lost his head to, when Dazai got shot.

“News flash, Coat,” Chuuya snapped, as he landed on his knees next to the fallen body — on the opposite side of Akutagawa and his blood soaked hands, hovering over the disgusting mess of liquids from the breathing crater in Dazai's chest. "He is made of flesh. You can touch him just fine."

"Don't spread insidious lies," the Executive murmured, halfway to hysterical.

His whining head lolled back and forth on the concrete, painted red and blue by distant police cars uselessly attempting to surround the street block the Port Mafia had locked in. He was pale — but Dazai was always pale. Bleeding, too, Chuuya had the vague thought of.

With wide eyes barely hidden behind a veil of unfitting mafia-suaveness, Akutagawa replied: "He ordered not to touch him. He said this could be a potentially satisfying end —"

"And you listened to him?"

"I change my mind," Dazai moaned, as he childishly fought off Chuuya's hands removing his jacket. "This is too painful. I changed —"

"Shut up," Chuuya snapped, ripping his tie open brutally enough to make him moan higher. "This isn't the worst you've gotten by a mile. And this is your fault. Maybe one hole or two will teach you not to sit on your ass playing on that console during a criminal chase —"

Drool and blood bubbled up between his lips. Akutagawa turned horridly pale. "We are the criminals —"

He looked up at the subordinate. Behind the black shoulders of his coat, blurry silhouettes of running mafiosi roamed the locked down streets. Traitors weren't allowed to leave — the assassin would not be allowed either.

He snapped his fingers to call Akutagawa's eyes off Dazai's blood. "'You ever extracted a bullet from someone?'"

Hesitatingly, he shook his head.

"Good," Chuuya tore Dazai's dress shirt open, removing one of his gloves with his mouth. Through the haze of pain, the boy's eyes widened with realization. "Eyes on me, then."

The kid stared. "Wait, you —"

Right as distant police sirens began blaring, and some faraway building got partly blown up to pieces — Chuuya stuck his gloved hand between Dazai's teeth, buried his naked fingers in the scarlet cleft between his ribs, and mercilessly dug for the bullet.

The screech out of Dazai's mouth, muffled by the unrestrained bite he tore into his skin, was decidedly more of a reaction than someone with his pain tolerance should have offered — it got a wide eyed Akutagawa to jump back, though; and Chuuya mentally knew.

"Oh, you're fine. Don't be a baby, now. You — hold him still," Chuuya ordered, dragging his gaze away from Dazai's pained face. When no movement immediately appeared in the corner of his gaze, he snapped: "Hold him still!"

Akutagawa flew forward again, clenching a death grip around Dazai's bandaged limbs. Moments passed in a blurred mixture of sickly wet noises; by the time Chuuya managed to clean the extracted bullet with the side of his jacket and pocket it, the wounded boy was muttering nonsensical laments on the nature of firearms.

Breathless, temples pulsing with irritation, Chuuya dropped forward on the boy's frantically beating heart, groaning.

"You're — sick," Dazai whined, delirious; filled with accusations. "You're — why are you keeping that —"

"No bullets wasted," Chuuya painfully sat up again, slapping his cheek to keep him awake. Akutagawa's already pale hands had turned white at the knuckles from his grip on Dazai's wrists — right as he was about to speak, his eyes found a new silhouette as it landed by the car they were hiding behind. "Gin. 'They take the jerk yet?'"

Her late style change had been startling, considering the only memories Chuuya had of her included candid dresses and waist-long hair — but it fit her, in a strange way Tanaki had clearly been very proud of. She was all sharp angles; the glint of the cross of her choker threatened the air itself.

She shook her head. "Not yet."

Bloodied hands twitching, Akutagawa stood and walked up to her — to hiss something, he assumed; to reach for her and stop a few inches off her skin. All she did was look back at him — a painfully familiar light in her gaze; a quiet that rattled Akutagawa's shoulders — and step away.

The kid's hand fell. His eyes hardened.

"Do you gain any sort of freakish pleasure out of demolishing their relationship," Chuuya asked, a tad lower, knotting the bandages. "Or are your sadistic urges mostly unwilling?"

Dazai's eyes were still somewhat glazed; as Chuuya slapped his hand away from picking at the wound, he kept them on the siblings, nonetheless. "Stop blaming me for others' unsuccessful familiar counseling. I don't have a license."

"You could just stay out of it."

His eye squinted; obnoxious, he insisted: "What's so bad about a healthy sibling rivalry?" he insisted, fixing up his own tie, flat on the ground. "I'd assume you'd find some perverted enjoyment in simply watching, this time around."

Chuuya clenched his jaw.

Another explosion shook the ground. With a sharp grunt, Dazai raised one arm — just enough to call Akutagawa's eyes to him.

"What a nice coincidence," the Executive commented, eyes closed, as if he couldn't quite be bothered to do more. "We should not waste it. You two can start."

Silence echoed across the concrete.

“Start,” Chuuya echoed. “Start what?”

He looked at him with unbound pity. “The duel,” he spelled out, pointedly slow. “Obviously. Whoever kills the traitor first wins.”

A beat.

Akutagawa let out a sound; next to him, a twitch of her fingers was Gin’s only sign of pure, unfiltered — anger. Chuuya got the feeling he was missing something.

“Seriously?” he questioned. Bubbling in the blue of his veins was a tickling urge to punch him in the face — he tried to remind himself that Mori wouldn’t enjoy having to stitch someone up in his conditions. “Is this a game to you?”

“More than so. Children?”

Another beat. Shockingly enough, with one last bow in their direction — Gin was the first to fled the scene, jumping over cars with a kind of athleticism only growing up in the slums gave a fragile child. With starvation dripping from ink eyes, Rashomon surrounded Akutagawa like spider legs, and the boy vanished after her.

The moment he was gone, Chuuya threw his least impressed look to Dazai’s closed-eyes. Then, he punched his shoulder.

“Ouch,” he went, noncommittal.

“Kid’s dying inside,” he noted. “Can you stop being an asshole for three seconds?”

“I’m not doing anything.”

“Did you even tell him a word before you decided to make this into thee competition?”

“No,” Dazai said. “I was busy thinking of ways not to have Mori witness it.”

He frowned. “But why —” The words died in his throat, winding down as his mind tried to make sense of the neon green stains around the boy’s wrists. “Are those rubber bands?”

The way his face lit up made him want to take a step back. “They are!” he preened — only to fall back with a cough when blood began to stain his bandages. “You see, Ango has been dealing with this suicide case — This woman slept with rubber bands around her wrists and calves for two days straight, and the third day — ah. She didn’t wake up, obviously. Autopsy results are still pending, but it’s been confirmed that her dying expression was more than joyous!”

Chuuya stared.

Pointedly, he reached for one of his wrists. Dazai batted his hand away.

He tried again — similar results. “Don’t — Are you delirious?” Chuuya hissed. “You’re trying to kill yourself with rubber bands?”

“Results may vary,” he conceded. There was a drunken haze in his eyes that told him the bullet had hurt. “That beautiful, poor lady and I might be the only souls on this earth to brave this quest. Does that sound like a double suicide, to you? I agree. But I suppose we’ll know it for sure in — oh, about two hours,” Dazai blinked; then, he threw a look at his chest. He groaned. “Ah, great. I got myself shot and incapacitated during the chase for Mori’s assassins.”

“Sure you did.”

“Surely that will help tons with the general belief that I want to assassinate him.”

Vacantly, Chuuya asked: “Don’t you?”

Easily, Dazai offered: “Of course. Oh, hello there. You must be one of my dogs’ dogs.”

He turned just in time to catch the light of the ricochet from Hamamoto’s rifle; the man’s old shoes slipped down the concrete, as he hid behind their same car and he fired in quick succession — taking down a good number of police officers who had missed the memo about the locked street.

“Nice aim,” Chuuya complimented.

The man threw a look at the blood pooling under both their soles. A complicated expression crossed his face. “Thank you, sir.”

“Such a fascinating phenomenon,” Dazai insisted, stubbornly fighting Chuuya’s attempts at keeping him from bleeding out. It didn’t seem like there was any rationality to his train of thought — Hamamoto’s jaw, next to the boy’s upside down head, was tight. “Don’t you agree? I think so. Like a pet taking itself out for a walk.”

“Shithead,” he warned. “Give it up.”

“I’m just saying hi,” Dazai replied, too loud for a stakeout. “You know the Secret Unit so well. It’s only fair that I get to know my partner’s squad. What if one day I require their aid to look for you down whatever straw you got lost in?”

“Oi — “

“We’ve met,” Hamamoto reminded him.

“Did we,” he replied, uninterested.

His face hardened. “Yes, we — “ “Never mind,” Dazai replied. He wiggled his arms. “Chuuya, help me stand up. I want to see how high of a property damage our youngest ones can inflict,” Snapping a rubber band against his wrist, he added, gleefully: “I’m going to die very soon, anyway.”

The echo of falling debris came all in one go — it was utterly silent for a blink, right after. It was the sole reason why Chuuya managed to hear the scoff out of Hamamoto's mouth.

Then: "Can't come quick enough."

Chuuya's tongue grew heavy.

Not a sound came out of his lips; his mind got stuck on a vivid juxtaposition of Dazai's blood on the floor of his bathroom — his own knuckles wrapped around his neck, incapable of a gentleness his mind swore was the least he could give. The whistle-y note of his breathing pattern when he was pretending his wounds didn't burn.

Dazai's laughter was a child's. The upside down look he threw at Hamamoto — less so.

"Ah," he sighed. "You're right about that."

The man didn't answer. He shot another officer right in the chest — a strangely close spot to the one marked red on Dazai's own ribs.

Abruptly, Chuuya wanted to leave.

"Finally. How slow can slugs even — what are you doing?" From teasingly casual, Dazai's tone turned stone cold — swiftly interrupted by a less than untouched yelp, as Chuuya snuck his arms under his back and knees, picking him up the way firefighters did with damsels in Tanaki's dramas. "I — Chuuya, this is undignified — with your stupid noodle arms? You'll drop me. You heard that? You will drop me, and then I'll bleed out, and it will be so painful — Are you listening? Mori will lock you in the dog house —"

The boy's approximate weight was that of a particularly well-carved table chair. The moment he picked him up fully — only vaguely nodding to Hamamoto, before beginning to make his way to more better hidden alleys — the boy fell so utterly silent he seemed to shake with it.

"Don't make this weirder than it needs to be," Chuuya ordered, staring forward.

A beat. "Ah," Dazai said, only.

Somewhere around the point when the partially destroyed office building where the traitor had hid appeared into view, he lowered his cheek in the crook of his shoulder — letting out an exhale that was imperceptible in its sincerity. Vaguely, Chuuya came to the conclusion that it might have been the one, honest demonstration of pain from that entire mess of an evening.

The lightning-quick arrow of a black body flying right past them — landing into a building wall so heavily it cracked with it — cut that careful balance right in the middle.

"Oh, well," Dazai blinked.

Crawling from the debris with red tentacles of empty space around him, Akutagawa's eyes glared like an angry bull's. Chuuya abandoned the weight in his arms somewhere behind a flipped car in the middle of the building's parking lot — right as he stepped past another flying car, the deafening screech of fire being opened painted the air golden.

Standing protectively with her legs over what could only be the corpse of the assassin — Gin threw her knives in the air, directing merciless eyes to the shooters until they backed off. Then — she set them on her brother.

“Hamamoto Hitashi,” Dazai spoke up. “Is he competent?”

“Not now!” Chuuya screamed, as another small truck was thrown directly to his face — he trapped it mere inches from his nose, feet digging backwards lines into the concrete from the effort of holding it back, before Tainted managed to turn it into a metallic feather he could toss somewhere over his shoulder.

A swirl of black and white and blood red was all he caught — over the slowly rising sun, the Akutagawa siblings’ embraced. Flashes of poisoned Ability and the silver of blades — limbs moving with the familiarity of known bones.

It wasn’t graceful — not enough to steal the breath out of the mafiosi hiding behind the dust stained maceries. But it lit a fire in the siblings’ eyes — a deadly, unwanted focus over Gin’s mask, and nauseating determination between Akutagawa’s burned eyebrows. Rashomon sunk its claws on the ground with no hesitation, attempting to slip past Gin’s guard and grab the assassin’s corpse; knives swirled, blood blooming on the floor and the white crests of the boy’s neck handkerchief.

“Dazai,” Chuuya called.

“Yes, that is my name.”

“Your brat is fighting.”

“Yes, I can hear those coughy groans of his just fine,” He waved the matter away. “He refuses to use the full potential of Rashomon against his sister — given, he refuses to use Rashomon where it’s actually needed at all — so the game’s already decided. Boring. To think he’s bound to be one of the greatest forces in our rows. About Hamamoto —”

Gin jumped — her blades left a scarlet line on her brother’s cheekbone. The strength of her kick sent Akutagawa flying — and he should have beaten her already; Chuuya knew — as Rashomon’s teeth used the ground as a hook to land him to his feet.

Avidly, he searched for Dazai’s gaze.

“He used to be in Noguchi Tooru’s faction, right? During the Nine Rings Conflict,” Dazai insisted, uninterested in Chuuya’s skipping effort to kick Rashomon-destroyed debris away from their men and themselves. “One of those fools who kept voicing their disapproval when Boss gave us two temporary sovereignty.”

As Rashomon slashed Gin’s jacket in two, Chuuya stilled.

A distant memory crowded behind his eyelashes — a circle of distrustful men, patting Noguchi’s back after an attempt at landing the two of them between the flames of an explosion. They had taken care of every assassination attempt — they hadn't had the time to care about mere hefty, venomous glances.

"Your loyalties sure have changed, yes?" Dazai hummed, a tad too loud.

Feet stuck to the wall of a nearby shop, he barely had to lower his eyes to find Hamamoto's silhouette — rifle frantically following the sloppily fast movements of the Akutagawa siblings; as if not entirely certain he could let them drag this out.

Clearly, he'd heard every word. Eventually, eyes stuck on his weapon, he said: "Vice-Executive Nakahara has proved his worth more times than any of us could count. He saved my life, during the Dragon Head Conflict. He saved many lives."

His eyes flickered to him.

They seemed unshaken. Chuuya frowned.

Dazai crawled forward — just enough to lay his elbows on a partly destroyed car, enjoying the duel from a better perspective. "And I haven't."

"Is that a question, sir?"

"What an insincere, sir," A yawn. "No, it was more of an affirmation. A point, if you would. Observation with a cause. If I had, you and your friends wouldn't be plotting to slit my throat."

"Hey," Chuuya snapped, brusque. "Don't go making accusations you can't —"

"Don't go and be blind."

His tone made him pause. The edge of the sky was turning the color of fallen leaves; its light painted the sweat on the siblings' faces into pieces of diamonds, and emptied Hamamoto's eyes.

"Chuuya always picks mirror shards, does he not?" Dazai said. If he cared about discussing his own death with a bleeding hole in his chest — one that would give him a fever, Chuuya knew — it didn't show. "Loyal to the bone. Boss appreciates your fire greatly. We don't grant medals here, but I'm sure the Hatrack will pamper you in praise and free drinks the more you scratch behind his ears."

"Some respect wouldn't be unfit, sir," Hamamoto reminded him, before Chuuya could say anything. "Double Black occupy the same place in the hierarchy."

"Mmh," the boy nodded, interested. "And when I kill the Boss, where will that leave him?"

The man's gun shook from his grasp.

Chuuya landed on his feet so ungracefully — that some dozen streets away, Kouyou flinched. He stalked towards Dazai's vacantly cheerful face, and pulled his tie to snarl: "Shut the fuck —"

The hiss of knives pinning Akutagawa's coat to a fallen column rattled the whole area.

His eyes refused to part from the pale rage spreading through the boy's face, as he struggled to extract himself. It was utterly humiliating; the low murmurs of the unwanted audience said so with clarity. Chuuya saw bloodied flesh, over the red face of a child who had been made to cry in front of a crowd of well meaning cruelty — realized that the knife had gone deeper than cloth.

Gin realized it too.

Her grip faltered; her knees weakened over the assassin's corpse. Akutagawa slipped off.

His gaze searched Dazai.

"Akutagawa," Chuuya heard himself say — too quiet. It would have been easy, he thought, to mistake the thing stuck in the broken veins of his eyes. All at once, he realized he knew. Urgently, he called: "Akutaga—"

The uncertain touch of his sister's feet on the ground, hesitating to reach out, was the only reason why she did not see one of Rashomon's tails emerge from the ground at her back — and clench, unthought and burning, around her shoulders.

Horridly loud against dawn, she screamed.

A blur passed by Chuuya's peripheral; too fast to follow, too hurried for his wound to not stain his bandages red, Dazai dashed by — the grip of his fingers around the boy's shaking nape was a distracted thing, seemingly.

He saw his nails sink in.

Rashomon disappeared without a murmur — Chuuya ran, grasping the girl in his arms before she could tumble to the ground.

"That's enough," he warned, dragging a shockingly still vigorous Gin away before she could jump her brother. There was a distant sort of ire in the sweat lines over her squinting eyes; something distant and heartbreaking. "That's enough, I said!"

"Come at me," the girl whispered, right as Dazai dragged Akutagawa even further. The two had yet to stop staring at each other. It was too low — but he saw it haunt her brother's eyes. "This is what you wanted, right, come at me —"

He clenched his arms tighter around her. She was shaking like a leaf. The assassin's body was still on the ground — limbs spread; martoriated by the way they had fought over him like a doll.

It ought to be revolting, Chuuya thought — with the same distance he'd felt for the dried blood under his nails, the first time someone had opened fire at him. He hadn't known he wasn't about to die until Tainted hadn't let him. He had asked the Sheep to each grab a gun from the corpses Chuuya hadn't quite meant to make, and told those nine years old to point them at him. He had wanted to train it.

All at once, Gin deflated.

Three burning cars away, Akutagawa kept his eyes right on her — and began coughing.

Dazai let go of him at the first wet squelch. With an endlessly lethargic expression, he watched him kneel and press his handkerchief to his mouth until blood wetted it. Then, he sighed.

“How disappointing,” he concluded. With a squinting look to the dozens of hidden mafiosi in the area, he clapped his hands, calling: “Well? Did you, or did you not notice the police cars doing their best to trap us in? Hop-hop! Someone take the body — the sun’s about to rise. Time to go home.”

With a wave of uneasy murmurs, and a good amount of unmistakable glances, the men did as told.

“You’re not staying?”

The words — the first out of Akutagawa’s blood-smeared lips; cracked and ruined, as if his throat had been nothing but a rusty engine — were only barely enough to stop Dazai from just turning and leaving. Gin’s head turned to him so fast it almost creaked; but her brother’s eyes, mercilessly and echoing and empty, were all on Dazai.

Chuuya got the unsettling feeling of never truly having looked at him.

“Ah, no,” Dazai said, hardly bothered. His smile was strangely wobbly; as his lips stretched, he stared right into Chuuya’s eyes — and that was the only reason why his feet moved. “I’m about to be a bit busy.”

With one last nod, and a clever wave of his purple fingers — asphyxiating all the way to the rubber bands on his wrists, and bleeding from the gap in his chest — Dazai’s eyes rolled to the back of his head, and he dropped.

---

...

---

Yokohama took Christmas rather seriously.

“You’re supposed to fight me,” Akutagawa snarled, right in his ear, at the last traffic light they encountered. “You told Executive Dazai you would take care of me — are you underestimating me? Gin didn’t win the duel —“

“Neither did you,” Chuuya informed him.

The roads were a sickeningly bright white as far as his eyes could reach; lights and decorations jumped from one corner to the other, bouncing off in a deadly challenge of ostentatiousness and celebration. An early morning choir was singing familiar hymns, amongst the crowd of hurrying workers; he’d left them all the coins in his pockets, just because they sounded terrible.

The billboards were the least festive parts, what with the faces of men and women the Mafia had put there — along to the building-tall screens framing the square, looping the newest head of the City Hall’s election speech in a monotonous hum.

Occasionally, a mourning montage for a recently deceased actress appeared.

We look forward to a peaceful new year, the man on the screen had yet to stop promising. Chuuya had found him neck deep in one of Ace’s casinos two weeks ago. This city is in good hands.

“I’ll win against you,” he insisted — which was a clear testament that the frozen peas held on his still bleeding forehead weren’t working. The passersby kept ogling his fresh bruises — Chuuya hadn’t really been thinking when he had dragged him away. “Was Executive Dazai alright? Shouldn’t we have carried him to the Headquarters ourselves? Why are we at a High School —“

Chuuya, hands in his pockets, leaned on the column of the bus stop — not hiding; but carefully staying where the school entrance would not frame him.

A crowd was beginning to gather near the gates — last-day students huddling close to find warmth.

“The bastard will be fine,” he replied. “Despite his hopes, that chick didn’t actually die because of rubber bands. He did wear a fuck ton of them on his ankles, though, and the wound didn’t help,” He glanced his way. “It would do you good to remember this: Dazai would never die in front of so many eyes.”

Akutagawa made a face. He was several shades paler than all the kids his age exiting the building. Choking in that black coat Chuuya could swear had belonged to Dazai, once, he looked like a crack in an ice lake.

“He has no care for reputation.”

“That’s not what I said,” he replied.

“But then —“

“I know you think his word is the next best thing to gospel, but I can assure you: it’s not. Most of it is bullshit,” A spark of dyed red appeared near the gates; Chuuya leaned a bit forward, squinting. “Let’s start from the obvious — even if you had beaten your sister, he wouldn’t have patted you on the back and given you a position.”

“That’s —“ Akutagawa snapped. He had yet to say Gin’s name. “That’s not why — how dare you presume I —“

“Shut your mouth. I know. I was teasing. The last thing those lungs of yours need is cold air,” He nodded towards the silhouette crossing the street, backpack bumping against her thigh at every step. She had always favored her right leg; the result of a fall, when she was eleven. “See that girl?”

Akutagawa frowned, confused. “Do I have to kill her?”

“No. Relax,” Chuuya scoffed. “God. Not even my instincts are that bad. Her name’s Yuan, and she’s cooler than you’ll ever be — what with that brooding muzzle.”

“That’s great. About training —“

“You know, I may not exactly be Dazai, but some respect would still be appreciated .”

He glanced away. “Respect is to be earned.”

“Yeah?” he challenged. “What’s Dazai done to earn it?”

His spine straightened so abruptly Chuuya heard it creak. “Watch your mouth.”

“Oh, trust me —“

“He saved my life. If it wasn’t for him, I —“ He threw the peas bag to the ground. “I’m not stupid. It’s clearly what Gin and everybody else is convinced of but —“

A cough — softer than the claws that had wrecked his chest in the training grounds, but just as violent as the winters Chuuya had watched drag the weaker Sheep away. Some of us are made to die young, one of the older kids had shrugged, when he’d started asking too many questions. She had ruffled his hair with something like pity. You won’t be like that.

“If the best of me is what’s needed to earn this life,” Akutagawa spelled out, eventually, “I just have to give it. I can’t — I won’t go back to before. The slums — not knowing what I was living for —” he spat, eyes on the disappearing rows of students; their unbroken skins. “I owe him my ability to survive this, and I will give it to him.”

Chuuya crouched down, making sure Yuan would not catch sight of him.

Still leaning on the car she had dropped her off on, Minami said something. The girl laughed.

I have lost countless people, Kouyou had told him, once — near the grave she would walk right past, but breathe in the direction of. If we weren’t allowed to mourn the living, we would sit on the ground and grow roots.

He stood up. “Pick up the peas.”

A pause. Akutagawa looked at him as if he had lost it. “What?”

“The peas,” Chuuya repeated. “Pick them up. No need to pollute the city with your distress.”

The boy stared.

Unimpressed, he stared back.

He picked up the peas.

Chuuya turned on his heel, skipping over the bus stop with an unnatural jump; he made his way down the road without checking if Akutagawa was following.

“You know, Yuan,” he started, sure he would be, “She used to be convinced I was nothing short of invincible. Not exactly a matter of faith in me, either — it was just something she had grown up believing. Sky’s blue, say hi before you rob someone, Chuuya will win.”

The boy grunted. “And you aren’t?”

“No, I am,” Chuuya scoffed. The crowd was tight and cheerful around them; the higher the sun rose, the brighter the streets shone — lights and Christmas trees warming them up. “It’s part of why we aren’t fighting. I would have crushed you, your ego would have taken a hit, Dazai would have found out — a whole mess. Better not.”

“You don’t know if — my Ability —“

“The day you stop using your Ability like you hate the sight of it, let me know,” he cut him off. “I’ll duel you, then. You’ve got great potential — it would be fun. Pinky promise.”

Speechless, Akutagawa’s steps faltered. The golden and crimson lights gave his sickly skin a curiously festive appearance; a plastic skeleton in the middle of a fireworks show. We come from the same place, you and I, he could have told him. He doubted he would have appreciated the notion.

“I’ve seen your mission reports, you know? You are good. You’re exactly the kind of brutality this syndicate needs. Dazai knows it too. Want to know your problem?”

A stare. Not by you, he could almost hear.

“Casualties,” Chuuya offered, nonetheless. “On both sides. Too many of them. You wave that Ability of yours around like a bat. You don’t care who gets in its way, as long as it sinks its teeth in at least one enemy.”

Akutagawa made a face. Studying the ground, he looked younger than his age — pettily quiet; childish in a way that did not feel the blood still staining the corner of his mouth.

“I’m not going to tell you the Mafia won’t burn you alive, if you can’t give back more than what they spend on you,” he said. Hamamoto’s friend had been the latest of weekly occasions — while drowning in funds, the Port Mafia was all but fond of wastes. While even fonder of Ability users, it had no need for dead weights.

If it’s not real, Pianoman had said. It might as well be useful.

“What I’m trying to say, is: as honorable as your loyalty is — Dazai is not the Mafia.”

Unconvinced, the boy studied the concrete.

“I don’t think that’s true,” he muttered.

A memory pressed against his eyelids — the last of the Executive meetings Mori had not taken part to, before he’d left for juvie. The uncanny sight of an empty seat next to Chuuya’s own, no shoe pressed against his calf.

Dazai, blank-faced and shattered, lunging on Mori’s seat.

[Chuuya had been eight years old the first time someone had uttered the words Port Mafia where he could hear them. It had left an impression — and so an unburnable spark had been set ablaze in his spine, pushing and pulling and dragging, making him into the child who had decided to turn the Sheep into a group that would be feared — not just ignored.

Three weeks later, he had stolen a whole cargo of weapons belonging to the Mafia. When they came for revenge, he left only skeletons — to tell the tale of a new Ability User in Suribachi City.

Don’t attack unless they attack first, he’d spent his childhood ordering, smaller and shorter than the older kids — more necessary than they would ever manage to be. And they will attack first. That’s just who the Mafia is.]

“The idiot is Port Mafia black from blood to bones,” Chuuya told him, eyes on a particularly crooked old woman turning on the lights of her shop. “At one point, he’ll need to get kicked in the head hard enough to realize he isn’t the syndicate — it’s the opposite,” A running bunch of kids gasped, clapping. “It will always be.”

Akutagawa seemed unimpressed. “Does being his partner spare you from respecting him?”

“Sure. Find yourself a partner, and you’ll see.”

“No,” he spat, too quick. “Dazai said — I work alone.”

“How edgy.”

“Executive Kouyou said —“

“So you still aren’t calling her Ane-san?”

“ — that’s what you used to say, too,” Akutagawa insisted. “That you work better alone.”

“Sure thing,” Chuuya kicked an abandoned decoration off the sidewalk, watching a family flinch when it made a noise. On the screens, a collage of the new heads of the city built itself in quick motions. He imagined telling a younger self that he would be dabbling in politics. “I’m the very soul of solitude.”

A distasteful glare brushed him.

Unsure of where it came from, Chuuya ruffled the boy's hair. His whole body seemed to short circuit — lips parting and shoulders growing stiffer than unmolded stone.

Very slowly — keeping every part of him where Akutagawa could easily see it — he lowered his hand, adding a step of space between them.

“Sorry,” he said.

“What?”

“You know, you’ll have to talk to your sister,” Chuuya swiped an apple off the nearest stand, biting into it as he abandoned an outrageous amount of bills on the paper bags at its edge.

“She wants to tear you apart. I’m assuming it’s lovingly. I don’t have any siblings.”

His lips curled. He tasted poison; felt like Dazai would have laughed. “Well,” he conceded.

Akutagawa blinked. That conversation had been more useless than he had hoped; nonetheless, he was sure to have settled the belief of Chuuya being downright bizarre between his burned off eyebrows. “It’s he.”

It was his turn to blink. “What?”

“When Gin wears those clothes,” he said, voice carefully devoid. “With the Lizards. It’s he.”

“Cool,” Chuuya bit again. “Good to know. Hey.”

He put his foot in front of Akutagawa’s legs at the very last moment — when he tripped, spluttering, he grasped a part of his coat that did not touch his skin and pushed him into the closest alley, away from the crowd.

“Listen to me very carefully,” he started, endlessly calm, the moment the two of them were pressed against one of the snow-ridden walls — close enough for the rattled edge of the boy’s lungs to be felt. Akutagawa was shorter than him, if only barely — Chuuya could not escape the trembling spasm of his body, as his eyes stuck to his own.

“Don’t you ever,” he spelled out, “Let me catch you attempting to bleed your sibling out in Dazai’s name again. To hell with his orders and to hell with his tutelage — I will make sure you’re thrown out of this organization faster than you can whisper the shithead’s name. Whatever he’s told you — debts come first in the Mafia. And you owe the only family you have left more than you’ll ever be able to give them.”

Akutagawa’s eyes dimmed out, all at once — a severed branch.

Rage imploded through the shards of it, sudden enough to startle him; an unfiltered, savage kind of starvation, as deafening as the hum in the back of his skull grew at night.

I’ve heard them refer to him as the Mafia Hound in training, Hirotsu had said, fleetingly. One wonders what is it with Dazai and dogs.

“Gin doesn’t get it,” he spat out, through the ire.

“Gin doesn’t want to see you kill yourself for the sake of orders,” Chuuya replied. “Dazai saw something in you. I doubt it has anything to do with lashing out during training — all in hope shit will get vicious enough he’ll turn around and grant you a look.”

“What do you know of —“

“You want him to acknowledge you?” Chuuya pushed. “Impress him. Train even when he isn’t around to see it; learn how to treat Rashomon as a part of you — and not a shiny toy to wave around until the bastard gasps. Survive for yourself, and not for him — or he will not care.”

A breath passed, panting and obstinate.

He saw it in the passing glint in his irises, blinding in a way the sun had yet to accomplish. Chuuya’s feet landed on the opposite wall, ten feet taller than clenched fists disappearing under Akutagawa’s coat — as Rashomon shattered the crackling air and attempted to decapitate him.

“Not exactly what I meant,” he said, “But at least that Coat-demon’s as pissed off as you are. Unfortunately —“

Chuuya landed on the ground with enough strength to crack it, muffling the surprised gasps of the crowd outside. Akutagawa shook on his feet, surprised — faster than he could recover, Chuuya touched the belt of his coat, and sent him flying into the wall; the graffitied surface behind him falling under his weight.

He was still laying there, coughing and climbing to his feet, when Chuuya walked to him — eyes wet with bare frustration, as he attempted to slow the coughs down.

Hostility lit up the outline of his body in a poisoned, dark crimson — before it could worsen, he nudged his knee with his shoe, gently.

“Come on,” Chuuya offered him his hand. “Our Abilities don’t match very well, see? Your devours through space. Mine erases the need for it. That’s why training with me would be pointless.”

“Then fight me for real!” he snarled.

“I’m no one’s punching bag,” he replied. He pushed his hand, again. “Come on. Gramps said Gin is all fixed up. Who knows, maybe you two can come up with a training schedule.”

He crouched down; took notice of his bony frame, under the coat, and the asymmetric strands of his hair. He thought of Yuan’s laughter; of the low hum of the slums, ever present.

“Be angry, if it helps,” Chuuya concluded. “But don’t be angry because you have nothing else to be. If anything — be angry at him.”

It’s what he wants, he didn’t add. Can’t you see?

Akutagawa's chest rose and fell — did a rather job at it, too; damaged goods wheeling along, adamant. He stared at his hand; stared at the chasms he had left on the ground.

Predictably enough that Chuuya barely had the will to sigh and drop his head — he stood, kicking his hand away, and stuck Rashomon's claws in the wall to plunge himself out of the alley.

Tried to.

A wet kind of squelch echoed off the space — a tear through the Christmas hymns and the noises of the crowd, just outside their bubble. Not the sound of an Ability touching concrete; it was unmistakably flesh-like.

Akutagawa landed on the ground, barely balancing on his heels. When he called Rashomon's back, he was dripping blood on the ground. “What —“ Chuuya surrounded himself in the blanket of his Ability, running towards the end of the alley. Amongst old boxes and rusty pipes, the first thing he saw was the puddle of dried blood, stained by the fresh one Rashomon had accidentally torn out.

Then he saw the body.

“That's not —“ Akutagawa stuttered, taking a step back. His eyes were wide; he stared at the fallen man, frowning a bit more at every nail scratch and mark he found. “Rashomon can't — That wasn't me.”

“I know,” Chuuya said. He thought back to the actress' photographs in Kouyou's folder; stepped into the blood to lean down, searching through the battered skin. There was no obvious lethal last hit to find; the rust-stains on the side of the man's head matched the wrecked pipes on the wall — as if he had crashed into it willingly.

A bruise caught his attention. He held up the corpse's left hand, skidding over the teeth marks — to land on a line at the center of his palm.

A half moon.

“Call the disposal team,” he ordered. “Tell them to bring Executive Kouyou.”

“But —“

“Akutagawa.”

Chuuya turned to look at him. He didn't know what the boy saw — only that it rubbed any desire to be stubborn out of his face. He nodded; moved to grab his phone from his pocket.

The police sirens stopped them both.

Chuuya barely had time to remove his gloves and stick them inside the boy's coat, startling Rashomon into awareness with a clear hit of gravity to the knees — flinging him out of that rottin space — before Matsuda's disbelieving face appeared at the end of the alley.

---

...

---

Given he hadn't committed any crimes, this time around — after giving unwilling testimony, Matsuda locked him in his office with a cup of noodles, and told him to wait.

It left Chuuya with endless, boring minutes to let Kouyou know her squad would have to intervene with the city obituary, if they wanted to analyze the body — then, to snoop around, until he found a pair of rifle-handling gloves to cover his naked hands with.

Then, he got to searching.

The room was as bare as usual, with only pictures of his children on the desk — the few from his Academy years, with a wide-eyed Murase, that were the liveliest part of the gritty papers and bloodied photographs. And then piles and piles of research on the underground's most well-kept sins.

P.M. — Case 255, was the incipit on most of the thicker files.

They hid blurry photographs of familiar crime scenes and people Chuuya knew by name; while nothing new — he was surprised by the amount of details gathered in one place. As far as he knew, Dazai was tasked with spreading clues in a variety of hands — never close enough to pile up.

Give them something to search, Mori would say, if what they want is a hunt. Still — the amount of information Matsuda had managed to gather was slightly worrying.

“Clever mutt,” Chuuya murmured, with a frown. “Too clever for your own good.”

A yellowish file on the bottom of the lowest drawer, edges frail with time and insistence, caught his attention. Fiddling with the twine thread that held it in one piece, he read the word scribbled on the dark green cover: Sheep.

Shirase's face was the first thing he saw.

He shut the file and threw it in the paper shredder underneath the desk.

Before he could kick the drawer to focus on the absurd amount of Mafia-related investigations, the shiny texture of a photograph peeked from the darkened depths of that Sheep bundle. The sound of his ribs creaking came in tandem to that of the doorknob bruising the wall, as Matsuda opened the door to the office.

Ire flashed in his eyes. “Are you trying to get —“

He stared. “What do you know about Paul Verlaine?”

The distant buzz of ancient computers and drowsy voices scrambled up the officer’s shoulders, drooling down the crinkles of his dress shirt. Chuuya could only hear the rush of white noises in his ears — the view from a tombstone he had not dared to visit, once he’d learned what its insistence had not been able to save.

Chuuya breathed. His brother’s eyes stared back at him from the photograph.

“I don’t care if the Mafia encouraged your sense of overindulgence,” Matsuda said, eventually, very slowly — his arm almost raised, as if Chuuya had been growling. “You keep your nose out of our efforts, Chuuya. Including the attempt at taking the corpse out of our jurisdiction I just witnessed at the obitorium —“

“I’m not asking,” he snapped, waving the picture from the other side of the desk. “You’re not supposed to know about him. All the information here —“ His eyes widened. “That’s why you asked to handle the actress’ case, isn’t it? You know of the connection to — you do realize you can’t just hold this much over the syndicate with no consequences —“ He paused. “You’re — investigating Murase’s death.”

The man’s face emptied itself. “Chuuya.”

“Are you insane?”

“He had friends, you know? People who might want to understand what —“

“The investigation was already closed,” he snarled, lost in his own frantic train of thought. “There’s no way you would have found any kind information on it, unless you —“ He could see the end of the tunnel — a blinding light framed by ivy; the blurred photographs in the Mafia files and the too-similar eyes of his brother in the one stuck in his hands; beckoning him forward, whispering —

“The clues are — minimal,” Matsuda admitted, with a resigned sigh. “They always have been. You don’t expect me to believe he truly died in some random street shootout, do you?”

Chuuya’s fingers twitched, relentless. “But why would you associate him with the Port Mafia’s investigations?” He squinted at the tape marks left on the corners — a clear match to the ripped-off pictures from the Mafia files. “How did you even find a picture of his face?”

Guilt pulled the corners of his face down.

He stiffened. “What?”

“Listen, I —“

“Matsuda.”

He exhaled, all in one go. It seemed to steal the air from his limbs, too — he fell into one of the guest chairs, elbows on spread knees, rubbing his temples like an overworked sinner.

Chuuya felt the urge to move — circle that desk and escape; like he was nothing more than a twelve years old who had promised the Sheep to be back home before dark.

“What did you do?” Chuuya heard himself whisper.

“I’m still the detective assigned to you and the Sheep’s case,” the man explained, staring at the floor. “It’s technically closed, but — I do have the Court’s permission to access all documents that may contain relevant information on you. Ever since you got involved with the Port Mafia —“

“I’m not involved with the —“

“Chuuya,” Matsuda interrupted. “You know you’re unofficially filed as an Unregistered to the Special Division. Children who have Abilities have a different sort of legislation —“ His hands intertwined; the pen he always changed hung from his shirt pocket like it was about to fall. “And so it was me they called. They thought I could help, get you to talk with them —“

Chuuya’s mouth dried up. “What did you do?”

He dragged his hands down his dreary face. “I know about Verlaine, kid. All that the Division gathered about him, at least — I know about his connection to the accident, back in December. I know he targeted Murase, for some reason. And I —“ He pressed his lips together. “I’ve been helping the Division out. Letting them know what — what you’re up to.”

It all seemed eons away — the buzz of loud voices behind the door; the computers and the old Christmas hymns; the mumbling laughter. Even the texture of his stolen gloves against his palms — Chuuya felt incorporeal; distinct from that body that knew how to be controlled by something that wasn’t him.

How much could he claim of it, then?, he had wondered. If he could give it up so easily, how could he call that breathing bundle his?

His jaw ached. “How long?”

“Chuuya —“

“How long?”

The officer looked at him.

“Since he died,” he admitted.

Chuuya nodded once, mechanically, fixing his hat in place. Nodded again and again, until he was biting the inside of his lip to raw skin, muffling laughter — eyes on the dangling chain he had taken from Albatross.

He threw the picture on the desk, invisible filaments creaking — uncertain of what the dead silence in his skull meant. It was never quiet. “So much for keeping an eye out for me.”

It rammed against Matsuda like a storm.

“That’s not —” he attempted. He had been rendered speechless. “It wasn’t one or the other.”

“Save it.”

“Listen to — Hey. Hey — Chuuya, listen to me,” He leaped off his chair right as Chuuya made his way to the door; his hands clenched around the upper sides of his arms — an easily escapable grip, because all of it was. He stayed, though, because he was as much of a fool as ever. “Chuuya. That’s not it. Are you listening to me? That’s not it.”

He fixed his eyes elsewhere; Matsuda’s head followed frantically, jerking him. “That’s enough.”

“Why do you think I’ve been working with them?” Murase and I, we — we promised you kids we’d get you out. Didn’t we? I’ve had to resort to different methods, since your emancipation and — the Special Division is legal, at the very least —“

Chuuya met his gaze.

It was untouching — remote and strangled. He recalled the pressure of cold water on his face; the soft tune of Agent Minami’s voice, right in his ears. Questions he wouldn’t answer; files and files and files on him, never an end to them, never a period to the lines of information one could gather from a body that had been injected with infinity.

Legality never gave me a bed, he thought about saying. Legality never called me one of their own. Legality only ever sold me out for —

“I’m only going to say this once,” Chuuya offered.

“Chuuya.”

“I don’t care about what you were trying to accomplish,” he continued, unflagging. “I don’t care about your ghosts, and I don’t care if you think I could rid you of them. I don’t care about your atonement,” He shrugged the man’s grip off; spelled out: “You keep your nose out of the Mafia’s business, and I don’t punch your face in for all the troubles you’ve caused.”

“This isn’t about the Mafia —” Matsuda hissed. “This is about you — why don’t you get it?”

Chuuya thought of a knife in his side — of Murase’s fingers growing still in his grasp. A numb cognition — known — pooled down his throat.

“It’s the same thing,” he offered, blankly. “And neither of us is going to go down, no matter how much you prod.”

Matsuda’s flinch rattled his entire spine. Stupid, he thought. Stupid — to still linger. Believe that cutting Chuuya open wouldn’t have stained the floor black. “Chuuya —“

“I called Madame Tanaki to come pick me up,” he insisted, making his way to the door. “We don’t want to make her wait.”

“She isn’t here.”

He paused. “Not yet?”

“Not at all,” The Officer stood up, unsure of where to put his hands. “The Station called her — she couldn’t come. She told us to apologize to you on her behalf.”

Something uncomfortable scratched at the back of his skull. Chuuya cleared his throat. “All the same — have I done something that warrants my legal stay here? I already gave my recollection of the events to one of your Agents. I was alone there. The witnesses confirmed I had just arrived.”

Matsuda’s hand flexed, helpless. “Listen.”

“Have I?”

He deflated. “No.”

“Great,” Chuuya opened the door, fingers spasming with repressed energy and something that always sketched Professor N’s face underneath his eyelids. At times, he realized — he couldn’t quite recall his face either. “Want some friendly advice? Give up on the actress’ case. It’s nothing your band of gossip fools will solve.”

With the nauseated tone of something he hadn’t quite meant to say, Matsuda asked: “Is there any possibility Verlaine is involved?”

He only saw him in his peripheral.

It was merely a pump of his blood through his veins — drops nobody would care to spill and too many would kill to study. Leaning against the wall, his side torn and his skull showing, bleeding onto the dirty tiles of the station — his brother curled an eyebrow.

A spear wrecked his chest — the pole that had been stuck between Chuuya’s fifth and sixth rib, freezing cold and wet like mud between nails and never, never, never ending. It had been the closest thing at reach. He had driven it in Verlaine’s chest — because they had shared no blood before he’d forced it into him. Because he had killed his family, and he kept calling him his brother.

I would find comfort in the familiar, perhaps, he’d written, in those diaries Chuuya had read out of some sort of petty, useless revenge. But how do I lay my head in the empty air?

“No,” Chuuya said. He blinked, and he was alone. The gloves still itched. “None at all.”

---

Murasaki Shikibu had had an entire page of a Human Studies & Social Perception magazine dedicated to her, when the Ballerinas' had been frantic news in Yokohama.

"I'm afraid I don't know much about her," Tanaki explained, rather tonelessly, as she kneeled next to the chalk and little red flags left from the corpse. It was the fourth one they had found in those conditions, since Lippman's sister — people had yet to grow weary; despite the police tape their contacts had set up in the area for them, no one had shut down the Christmas theme park one caramelized-apples' stand away.

"Murasaki was the eldest member of the Ballerinas," she added, holding her scarf against the evening wind. "She was more speculation than reality — most thought someone that frail and ancient had to be a distracting technique of sorts."

"And was she?" Chuuya asked, around his cigarette.

"The old Boss asked her to join us," Tanaki replied. "I doubt so."

He conceded, eyes stuck to his phone. The bundle of phone charms never grew any heavier anymore; but the threads were slowly beginning to unfold. Over the bright lights of the Ferris Wheel, the laughter of unaware children, and the blood stained mud under his soles — Chuuya studied the half-moon mark on the pictures, and frowned.

"And this Murasaki's Ability left no visible marks," he questioned.

"No," Tanaki confirmed, standing. "I don't know why they would leave a trail for her —" Her fingers brushed one of the files the officers had left for them on the ground; on the arm of one of the park workers, the name MURASAKI SHIKUBU had been carved with an abandoned knife. "— but it isn't her. She was a clean kill — apart from that goodbye mark. The half moon, the wounds; this is someone else."

Chuuya squinted at the tattoo-like stain on the body's cheek, batting his smoke away from the woman. "And you never heard of someone who did something like this, back then?"

She stuck her hands in her pockets; shook her head.

Tanaki was one of the few who'd been in the Mafia long enough to have dealt with the oldest generations of Ballerinas — not the most famous, from the attack that had given them their name; but the ones that had begun planning for it.

"Most people who were mafiosi when the Ballerinas were starting out have long left," he mused, selecting a hated contact information. "In a casket, or by refusing to join Mori's reign," He made a face. "So — a casket, again."

“The Mafia is much different than it was when I first joined,” the woman said, after a pause — perhaps perceiving he wouldn’t formulate a real question.

The Ferris Wheel had lit up in greens and reds, for the festivities; the game stands and the rides were equally blinding, painting the pensive caves of her face in eerie shades. To an outsider, Tanaki was as she had always been.

She wasn’t.

It’s not like her ugly husband died, Dazai had huffed, some days before, as she politely — but distantly — indulged their antics. It had been a bad day; Dazai had been quiet enough for even Akutagawa to glance strangely at him; and when he’d talked, it had been to cut. I made sure of it. It’s nothing like when the Nine —

Don’t, Chuuya had warned.

”Is it ever lonely?”

It took Tanaki’s eyes a moment to focus on him. For some reason, she made him think of her sister — the one from her grief-stricken stories. Virgil’s relentless curiosity. The children she never saw anymore.

“No,” she offered. “Just — it itches.”

It struck something. Chuuya tapped his cigarette, raining some ash over the scars he had given himself by scratching his arms. “I get it.”

Nearing his phone to his ear, he missed the expression she laid on him. Her words sounded corroded when she said them, though.

“Yeah,” she decided. “I think so.”

“You’re calling Dazai Osamu, dog owner extraordinaire,” the mechanical voice in his ear let him know.

“We refuse to deal in temporary adoptions — so if that’s why you called, I’m afraid you’ll have no luck. If you’re looking for me, don’t. Thanks. If you’re looking for Chuuya — why? His unideal dimensions certainly make the job harder, but why would you want to succeed? Oh — we do, however, endorse the employment of goons for the permanent erasure of all our four legged friends. I will not call you back. Unless you’re Odasaku. Are you Odasaku? Hi, Odasaku. Bye!”

“Where the fuck are you,” he grunted, after withstanding the parade. “They enhanced the corpse. No trace of the Werewolf Killer.”

”Werewolf?” Tanaki mouthed.

“You know,” he explained. “Because of the half moon?”

Her expression turned pained. “I’m not sure the Intelligence would appreciate such a title in the reports —“

Chuuya wasn’t listening anymore. In the midst of their irritated roaming, and the unlistened requests to his phone, his eyes had found an unmistakable dot of black and bandages — much, much higher than it should have been.

Far, he considered, fuming, far too high for his phone to have no reception.

“That shitty bastard,” he snapped, hastily throwing the files the woman had passed him on the ground. “Be right back, Tanaki —“

Before he could run, her hand clenched in a gentle grip around his wrist. “Chuuya.”

He paused, allowing his shoulders to fall — just enough to observe the way her scarf whipped the wind; bright yellow lines against a polluted sky. He had missed the anniversary of her accident, the year before — had been somewhere in Greece, eyes open the entire night, remembering the dripping blood of a scripture on a wall, damning him. He wondered if she would let him walk her to the cemetery, the upcoming. If she would ever look any of them in the eyes again.

“It’s mortifying,” Tanaki said, at last. Her grip was twitching; it seemed her fingers couldn’t bear not to have his naked skin understand. “Being the only one left. The only one who remembers.”

The wind curled on his bitten lips, pulling at the falling skin. It burned.

He tried to speak. The words weren’t even barely enough — they wouldn’t have fit in the grass between the Flags’ fake graves, and the knife Shirase had struck him with wouldn’t have been able to trace them entirely in seven lifetimes.

“I know,” he concluded.

“You can cover it up,” she insisted, eyes too intense to be lingering on bloodied weddings or on bloodied scriptures. “You can wear a title. You can fill the space. But a corpse is a corpse, and they will smell it from miles away.”

The Ferris Wheel spun, languidly. Over the caramelized-apple stand, some kid who knew nothing of files filled with corpse pictures laughed so hard Chuuya’s own stomach began to hurt.

[The graves were all covered in snow.

“Bet you’re coughing,” Chuuya said, kicking the lingering flakes off Doc’s. He hadn’t bothered tidying up his squad’s ones; they were too in the open, and slightly newer — just enough to make him suspect someone might actually use them for the people they were meant for. Pieces of rocks with no worth; all their ashes had mingled with the waves, lining the salted air with copper. “You know, I was looking for the picture you guys gave me. Couldn’t find it anywhere.”

“Not that I’d want N’s face around,” he added, a beat later. “I’m just over the, are you thirteen? jokes. Having proof of what I looked like as a kid might ward them off. Should I just carry it around? Hand it over like those agents’ IDs in that one show of Lippman’s?”

No answer. An habitual flavor.

Come around more, the actress had said. He thought of the weight of fragile, tortured bones in his arms; his own face, kind in a way he had never dared. Of a floating possibility, drowning in liquid Singularities and the sea-calm gaze of a man whose name he carried, still. And I might tell you —

He imagined growing all the way to a weakness that came with age — still remembering the sound his borrowed lungs had made as he watched him die.

It always tasted icier when December came.

“Anyway,” Hands in his pockets; blood under his nails. It would be warmer, eventually. “You guys won’t believe the stunt Hamamoto pulled —”]

“I know,” Chuuya concluded. There was flesh on his knuckles and it wasn’t his. There were scars on his chest — never on his spine, he’d vowed; never a runaway; only haunted away — and they would only ever belong to him. “I know, Tanaki.”

---

...

---

“Why that fancy, asshole?” Chuuya called, barely louder than the rush of wind from the small platform on top of the Ferris Wheel. “You want to jump to your death in prom clothes?”

Laying on his back, head dangling over the edge of the makeshift podium, Dazai — one hand scratching the spot where a bullet had hit him in front of Akutagawa — wasn’t even wincing against the repetitive Christmas jingle shrieking from the ride.

He had scared one or two families on his way up — had landed his feet on one of the cabins’ glass that a couple had been making out against. Eventually, fingers reaching for a good shake he knew he wouldn’t be granted — a Dazai that climbed Ferris Wheels, he mused, was not a Dazai that could be touched — he laid down on the thin space next to him, dangling his own head off the platform.

“Those weeks at Baltimore High damaged you severely,” Dazai said, barely sparing him a glance, in his three-piece suit. His eye was studying the midnight-deep ocean upside down; the festive lights had turned his bandages into a ruvid kaleidoscope. “I have to go to a gala.”

He carried a bizarrely familiar scent — the rust and malodour of the shipping container.

Chuuya hated the shipping container.

It smells, he’d told Kouyou, the one time she had asked him. All the Demon Prodigy touched was bound to grow poisonous — no one dared to walk even the perimeter of the dumping site. As grace-lined as she always was, even the Lady of the Port’s ears rose when myths were told. And it’s disgusting. Like its owner.

Hedonism was a character defect Chuuya had been steadily nurturing into a quality — it wasn’t quite enough to make him judge a place purely because it reeked of struggle.

But — it reeked.

“What kind of gala?” He extracted what little was left of his own cigarette from his pocket, stuffing it between Dazai’s lips.

“Special Division’s pre-Christmas Eve gala.”

His eyebrows flew to the sky.

“Ane-san’s theory appealed to Mori,” the boy explained, sounding as if nothing could have been more disappointing. “Now he needs me to figure out what kind of fool they’ve employed for this moon-symbolism quest. The Ballerinas are so boring these days — haven’t you heard?”

“Their name keeps the general public away from ours,” Chuuya said. “I’m fine with boring.”

“You are?”

“Aren’t you?”

“No,” Dazai concluded, nonsensically. “I’m gonna jump.”

“I know,” The wind was a gentle thing, for once. All the blood was torturously making its way to his head, twirling with the tilted skyscrapers and the sweaty press of Dazai’s arm against his. “It’ll be very pathetic, by the way. You’ll splatter on the water like a saltless pancake, and sink like the dead fish you are. Orcas will eat you.”

A hum.

Consideration, maybe. Most probably, he wasn’t even listening.

“Pancakes are good,” he specified.

“You would taste like shit.”

“You don’t know that.”

“I’ve bitten you before,” he reminded him.

A nod. “Dog.”

“Bastard.”

Dazai moved one arm until it was dangling over the circling cabins under them. A remote sort of longing dropped from his eyelashes like tears; he saw him gulp. The Ferris Wheel rose higher. He thought of scars under his hands — the constant pounding of things he hadn’t been quick enough to grab before they shattered.

Caring will get you killed, Kouyou had told him, some Christmases ago. He hadn’t spoken for a week after Adam had left for England. Caring will get them killed, he hadn’t replied.

Caring is very selfish, Iceman had said, once. Chuuya didn’t want blood in his bathroom.

He kept his eyes on the barely visible stars — the trace of smoke curling from the cigarette. “I’m gonna knock you out.”

It wasn’t a threat; he had no time for those. Dazai’s lips parted. “Sing instead,” he proposed.

“I don’t sing.”

“No,” he accepted. “Just hum. You’re stage shy, maybe. Should,” He licked his lips. “Should get you in a compressor and turn you into a jukebox. Or a carillon. Can you even be compressed more than this?”

Chuuya smacked him.

Air left in cold puffs, embracing the smoke; it painted Dazai’s cheeks a sickly red, one he was cursed with no matter the season. Sunburn or wind-scratched skin; he never looked anything but distracted.

There existed a brief moment — between the ivy in Dazai’s mind knotting and braiding to think something, and his lips parting to deliver something else. When the pain medications were the good kind, and his scarred skin remembered how unattainable and detested it felt to know silence, Chuuya wanted to nest there.

Eventually, he threw the cigarette away.

“Come on,” Dazai declared, sitting up. “You’re coming with me.”

Chuuya curled an eyebrow. “Am I?”

“It’s a Special Division gala,” Dazai insisted. “If I’m lucky enough, one of them will ask for your identification papers and arrest you again.”

“Hilarious,” he grunted, using Tainted to somersault over the Ferris Wheel, chasing warmth. “I’m not fancy enough for a governmental gala.”

Glinting mercilessly, the Executive’s eye fell on a passing cabin under their feet. Inside it, the couple Chuuya had interrupted was still having a hard time enjoying their love ride — the woman’s traditional clothing was all mussed; their faces pale.

Leisurely, Dazai looked at him again.

His brain disconnected. “No,” he hissed, floating a good stone throw away. “No. No. No, this is your shit, no and no again —“

---

...

---

“Tsushima,” Dazai said, politely nodding to the valet at the entrance of the Horizon Line — one of the showiest, gaudiest ballroom locations in the whole of Yokohama; tasteless cave, Kouyou would have shivered, horrified. Just as posed, Dazai tapped the hand clenched in a claw-grip around his elbow. “And his fiancée. Naka — uh. Kashimura.”

“Please,” the valet bowed, motioning to the golden chandelier-lit ballroom.

His eyes stuck to Chuuya as he entered; he met his gaze right as he blew a strand of hair Dazai had done his best to style off his jaw — showing off a too-sharp line. The man stuttered.

Clearly, the other boy was feeling slightly more solid. “Do you need me to tap your chin?” he questioned, voice obnoxiously low.

Stepping on his shoe with the poor girl’s wooden sandals — horribly small for his own foot — Chuuya raised his head until his neck burned, like Kouyou would have liked, stalking through the crowd of good society.

See, Ane-san?, he felt the urge to scoff, just as fucking cute.

A crimson carpet divided the infinite room in two, separating dancing couples from mingling men with nauseatingly serious looks and women with worse ones. High society looked the same in every place, from the perspective of slums’ roofs; it was probably mere bias, but Chuuya thought the shining pearls and live instruments of that place tasted bloodier than the Mafia’s own.

“Who’s Tsushima, anyway?” he asked. “You always use that.”

“I like how it sounds,” Dazai replied, easily, zooming to the refreshments table immediately. “Could you at least pretend to possess some sort of feminine grace, you elephant?”

“I am graceful, you two-faced asshole. You try to walk with this sash —” Chuuya tried to take a deep breath; failed. “And who’s Kashimura?”

His smile turned gently mocking — some far away joke he wasn’t meant to catch. “You’d like it.”

“What?”

A passing waiter waved a tray full of glasses in their faces; Chuuya grabbed one glass for each hand, subtly raising a middle finger over the neck of the left one when Dazai made a face.

The dancing bodies seemed to be having the least fun out of anyone in the room; high heels and distracted gazes twirled along to some classical piece Kajii would have recognized, kimonos and the secret conversations only violins could muffle. He swayed along to a mind game Dazai had started playing with a guest who knew tons about the last hires at the Division, and subtly searched for Agent Minami’s familiar traits between his own swerving blue sleeves.

Eventually, indignantly hooking his hand in the crook of Dazai’s elbow — do mind appearances, Slug — Chuuya unimpressedly watched him spin a married couple of Division’s investors, doing his very best to appear fiancée-y.

“ — what I tell her,” Dazai was saying, through fake fits of laughter. His suits were always tailored — all the same, he couldn’t shake off the impression that they never fit him. “We have great hopes for future endeavors. Despite its... slightly suspicious nature, change was definitely needed — wouldn’t you agree?”

“If it lowers the taxes,” the man sighed.

“Oh,” Chuuya sighed, too, trying to mimic Kouyou’s most mocking cadence, “Don’t they love to raise those.”

His wife’s smile sharpened. “The Division had great plans for the upcoming year. If all goes as it should, some of the annual payments will easily be moved elsewhere,” She tilted her head, studying her yawning husband with a grim smile. “It would be nice not to obsessively fund a police that can’t even catch two measly criminals from the port.”

“More than nice,” the man agreed. “More than nice.”

Head thrown back, Dazai laughed. She did, too. It was all very pleasant.

Chuuya smushed his cheek against the side of Dazai’s arm, muttering, behind a bright smile: “Isn’t this obligatory two-people invite thing outdated, by the way? Are we really to assume every rich fuck is getting snatched up?”

“Money is a good thing to snatch up,”

He looked around, sizing up lonely men in desperate want of conversation. Christmas party or not — men who spent their days behind a desk and their nights interrogating, or not — match-up flares could be found near every pearl-wearing lady. “Then why are Bachelors Lists a thing?”

“Precisely to get snatched up,” Dazai said, turning just enough that the imperceptible shadow of a teenage beard brushed against Chuuya’s nose. He pulled on the back of his kimono. “My dear.”

He retched.

“Not on board with the engagement?” the boy guessed, subtly leading him towards the stairs, half hidden behind a chocolate fountain. “You dislike the silverware picked for the celebration?”

Chuuya shuddered, cheek rubbing against the good fabric of his jacket like a whim. If one of you had been a girl, and old traditions had still been intact, Kouyou had warned, you two would have probably — “An hypothetical wedding of ours would wind up worse than Tanaki’s,” he judged, with a distinctively unfeminine snort. “And that’s saying something, considering we gave her seasonal depression.”

Laughter escaped Dazai like a surprise — he seemed taken aback himself; a bit annoyed.

“Blood fountain,” he theorized.

He glared at him. “You do not get a blood fountain at our wedding. Which isn’t happening,” he added, in a jarred hurry. “Because ugh.”

“More than so.”

“Ane-san would have an aneurysm.”

“Oh, but I’m sure you get a — dog to carry the rings or something,” Dazai muttered.

He felt his back tremble. The boy threw a look at his blurred, excited eyes and stepped on his foot. “No beasts at our wedding.”

“Listen.”

“No. You’re enough dogs for a lifetime. You can carry the rings.”

“It’s my wedding.”

“Embrace new traditions. In fact, let’s both say no when they ask,” he suggested.

“I wouldn’t say yes if they paid me.”

“Objectively,” Dazai observed, “We do have rather high standards of what a tempting bribe is. Or I do, at least. You might sell out for a dog that carries rings, apparently.”

“Well, it won’t be a problem when I drown the other groom in his blood fountain.”

“So we do get a blood fountain —“

“Congratulations!” A passing trio called, as they bowed their heads respectfully.

Chuuya stared, horrified. “No, no — you’ve got it all — “

With habitual pettiness, Dazai pulled his sash again. He smiled charmingly at the trio, with a much deeper bow than they’d offered. “Thank you to bits, my beautiful companions!”

The girls giggled. He retched again.

The wide ribbon holding the sash was far too suffocating; Chuuya was still convinced the makeshift bun Dazai had savagely pulled his hair in wouldn’t sell his face as feminine. But the crowd’s gazes passed them like water — and no one paused on him, eyes lighting up with the memory of files and waterboarding sessions.

“How did you even get an invitation here?” he questioned, when Dazai dragged him to the first floor — a wooden, ghostly set of hallways whose doors had golden plaques and secret offices.

“Ango had one in his bag.”

Chuuya stared. “Glasses just had one?”

“Ango always has everything,” he insisted, clicking a hairpin stolen from his hair into a lock — opening the doors to a certain A.K.’s office. “He collects charms from Odasaku’s jobs.”

There was an obscene amount of receipts from mercenary acquisitions, locked behind the metal door of a makeshift cabinet; yellowish papers filled with pictures of faces Chuuya recognized — from their own Intelligences’ researches on all the worst of the worst of possible aces. The Port Mafia had a tendency to call Ability Users — tempting them with the promise of support on endeavors they were already forced to commit — but some of them preferred to go rogue.

“Anything on half moons?” he asked.

Dazai’s nose was hidden between dossiers. “No. But here’s something interesting.”

The open file that landed on the desk was particularly new; on it, amidst blurred pictures of an wrinkly old woman in a peach-colored kimono, was a red stamped word: DECEASED.

“Suicide,” Dazai added, with some envy. “A clean jump from the bay. It happened more than four years ago, though — the body was carried to the Special Division, and never seen again.”

A shrill went up and down his spine. “But why would someone try to frame her?”

“Maybe the killer doesn’t know she’s dead,” he shrugged. “Or maybe the Special Division is now on board with our plan to move the attention from the Mafia to the Ballerinas.”

Chuuya frowned. “Why would they be?”

He tilted his head to the side — picked up a good amount of the thinner files, and stuffed them behind his jacket. Possibly for the Intelligence; the recruitment process, bound to start next year. “To make sure no one else gets to us before them.”

A key turned in the door; behind it, the low murmur of all but festive voices.

They didn’t even exchange a glance — they flew to opposite sides of the suite, Dazai vanishing behind one of the locked doors, Chuuya dragging his body on the wall outside the window. It was mere seconds before the door was opened; the lines of stiff shoulders and motioning hands were all he caught, before he disappeared.

He was halfway to the window that would lead him to the ballroom again, when the moving silhouette from another first floor window caught his attention.

“—there,” the man was mumbling, madly. The slot carried his fragile tone along with the cold wind, fragmenting it like a spasm; his hands flew to his hair, pulling — holding on. “Not there, you’re not there, you’re not there, I know you aren’t —“

Frowning, Chuuya plastered himself by the window, making sure not to reflect the red glow of Tainted on the glass. It didn’t seem like the man would notice — he was too busy pacing, his spine curving a bit more with each hit to the desk in his way he didn’t seem to notice. His voice grew lower and lower, stretching into a hysterical sort of cry; he hauled his hair until some tufts were left in his palms, shoulders shaking with laughter.

“You’re not there,” he insisted. His fists were on his chest, suddenly — punching and pinching and sinking the nails in the skin; the man hugged himself until his fingertips were tattooed on the skin. “You’re not there! You’re not!” He screeched, contorting wildly against a straitjacket that wasn’t there, breathing in desperately.

Blood began pooling from the holes his nails had dug effortlessly on his arms; his laughter grew strained.

“You’re not there,” the man swore, begged, hiding his head between his arms, and Chuuya moved — “You’re not, you’re not, you’re not, you’re not, you’re not, you’re not, you’re not —“

Abruptly — far too fast for him to break the glass — the man spun on unstable feet, his mouth open on a shriek, and slammed his forehead on the sharpest corner of the desk.

He heard the thud! of his body on the moquette like a gunshot.

“Chuuya should know better than to drink on a job,” Dazai commented, a bunch of minutes later — seemingly untouched by the fast escape — appearing next to him at the refreshments table. His fingers skimmed over his waist, imperceptible through the thick fabric. He had studied enough high-names couples to know stickiness was a sign of something; he wasn't kind enough to assume the touches weren't just Dazai's whims. "What if he throws up on the gentlemen he's meant to spy?"

The wine was steadily getting to his head — uncomfortable warmth drizzled down his arms. The natural tattoo of a half moon on the back of the man's hand was stuck under his eyelids.

Dazai's frame hid the brighter lights; the dancing silhouettes of men who wanted Chuuya dead or in a tube filled with water — and which one was worse, he wondered, and wondered, and knew — and men who had no idea of the blood on their ceiling. The boy peered down at him, wearing a pout that made him look younger than the age on their invitation.

"You should be scamming the bourgeoisie, right now," he informed him, gulping down wine. "I'm not pulling an all-nighter in enemy territory."

"These are just underpaid interns," Dazai let him know. "The adult table doesn't party."

The man's nails. The half moon. His brain squeezed itself for a conclusion. "If I have to hang around here with no bones to break any longer, I might just decide to snap your neck."

"Of course the dog wants a bone," Dazai smiled at some women walking by, face morphing so easily it made his head spin. "I'm unsurprised."

"Of course mackerels catch the stupidest baits," he replied. "I'm unsurprised."

He hummed. The orchestra bowed their heads in gratitude to the raised glass to the end of a song; the violinists straightened again — chins low on their instrument, as a new melody deftly started blooming between their fingers. Dazai's head tilted in a way that was pure instinct — Chuuya saw him listen to that starting, high-pitched note with an interest that was bizarrely academic.

"Mmh," he concluded.

His hand ended somewhere on the side of his neck, cold fingers curling where his choker was missing; hidden in the back of Dazai's shoe. He leaned down — right as one of the men who had suspiciously commented on, how young they were, to be so high-placed in society already, glanced their way — thumb on an old scar by Chuuya's jaw; then, he set his lips at the very corner where Chuuya's own ended.

The pressure was a tickling, nonexistent tap of raindrops. He made a face; pinched the space between his eyebrows as soon as he moved.

"Madame Momo insists I show her the muscles I hide under my bandages," Dazai sighed, still bent in his breathing space. "Do me a favor?"

"Not quite on my to-do list. Did she say alleged muscles, or is she stupid?"

He wiggled his eyebrows. He should have cleaned up more often, he considered, distantly. It was only proper for him to look good next to Chuuya. Double Black and all. "Come on. We're dancing."

We can't, Chuuya thought about saying, a bit lost — agonizingly so. He didn't want to dance with him in a woman kimono, with names that weren't even their own; he didn't want to dance at all. He grasped the barely-peeking edge of Dazai's wrist bandage, and pulled. There's a corpse upstairs.

[The day after he got shot and Akutagawa's face was sprayed with the blood, Chuuya found Dazai face down on the futon by Albatross' bed.

It wasn't anything new — they came back home at different hours, when their missions weren't Double Black- assigned; he didn't always catch him washing half the dishes or resetting his results on the gaming console, but he always saw the signs of it. The unmade futon; the used DOG OWNER #1 mud; occasionally, the smell of blood.

Whenever Chuuya did catch him coming in, he did what he'd always done: attacked him — for the sake of training, he would have explained Mori; only he never would, because he didn't want to know what Mori thought of the shipping container — and then let him in, anyway.

“Oi,” he snapped, still. “The fuck you think you're doing?”

Having dived face first into the futon, the boy's voice came out somewhat muffled: “Drowning your insufferable voice out through forced slumber.”

“The hell you are. Go home.”

“Can't hear you,” Dazai replied. He stole a pillow, strangling it close as he shut his eyes. There was no blooming blood at the center of his chest; Chuuya's fingers spasmed a bit at the memory, all the same. “Can't see you either. Too small. Buy a megaphone and try again. Hey — You didn't tell me you'd kept the microscope from the Dragon Head Conflict. I saw it in your bathroom.”

“That's — you're not sleeping in my bed — Dazai. Dazai.”

A rather fake snore.

Chuuya stole the other pillow; smashed it on his back with little restraint, watching him bounce. “You've got your own bed!”

“The container is too far,” he groaned, under the unstoppable hits. “Even average-length legs get tired, you know? Buy a dog house. Ouch!”

The container is too — He tightened his grip around the pillow; hammered it on his head again, mercilessly. “Oi! Sleep on the couch if you've got to stay! There's three of them!”

Dazai curled his legs close. He was all legs and all bony spine, peeking even from his shirt — he was wretchedly good at making himself smaller. Through sleepless glances thrown over their months out of Yokohama, he'd learned the machinations of his face disappearing in his arms, and his pulled-up legs getting hidden inside his shirt.

He was hardly the kind of person to wish to occupy as little space as possible, Chuuya knew. Loud and boisterous in his every violation; purposeful in all his noticeability. And yet —

An open palm landed on his face.

“You fucker —”

“Make yourself useful and take them off,” he whined, through the pillow, on the verge of kicking his feet. “I want to sleep. Do you always talk so much before sleeping? Your neighbors must hate you even more than I’d already guessed.”

Chuuya kicked him. “Take what off, asshole, your big ass head — ?”

The arm Dazai had disembled from the embrace of the pillow was waved, half heartedly, again. The sleeve of the shirt he had stolen from his own wardrobe — and how unlikely it was, still, to see him in blues and reds and normality — barely reached his wrist. Under the faded azure fabric, his bandages peeked.

He stilled.

Despite the closed eyes, he knew Dazai felt it. Didn’t care as much as he should have, Chuuya considered. Cared more than he would have liked.

He wondered if the reluctance was human — if it was one of the sourly-lined tricks of the thing inside him that was not a god, but wished to be treated as such. Do not touch him, it would say. Sometimes — do not let him go. As crazy as the former Boss, the whispers among the Guerrilla said. A hundred times smarter. Inhuman.

The truth, Chuuya could have told them, was much simpler — Dazai Osamu was always too far away to reach.

Chuuya sighed. “Whatever.”

He crawled on the futon, feeling the gaze of a fakely sleeping lump on him. He climbed over his abandoned body, caging him in — and then flopped down, stomach pressed into his wind-cold dress shirt and the sweaty skin underneath.

A groan; only sincere by the end, where the futon grazed the bullet wound. An attempt to act whiny about nakedness. Chuuya sunk his cheek on his shoulder blade, keeping thoughts of growth at bay — the difference in size of their settling bones; the puzzling familiarity of a skeleton that he’d watched change, always too connected to his own for it to matter.

“Promise 189,” he recited.

“I didn’t mention the Standard Island Accident,” Dazai complained, into the pillow. His bandaged arm was still in his periphery; Chuuya’s fingers itched. “No one was saying a thing about it until you did.”

You sent me a thousand miles away the day after I saw underneath the bandages, he could have told him. A blessing gone too soon, he would have then added — because it was true, the way most things out of his mouth tended to be. Crooked, but honest.

Chuuya could hear his heartbeat. His body was rattled by occasional shivers — warm enough to make his own eyelids feel drowsy. Knowing Dazai, he would sneeze in his face to pointlessly try to pass it to him. Knowing Dazai, he hadn't wanted to be sick and locked in a container.

Or maybe not. Some kind of greediness, he thought. Ugly and mean and unwanted. The rules of the playground; of the streets. Gluttony; only, sour under his tongue. Only I will bleed you out.

He pressed closer.

Hoarder, Arahabaki spat.

"I'm no one's punching bag," he echoed.

Dazai sighed until his cheek sank in the pillow — offered him the distant gaze of his eye. "I'll tell you a story if you do it."

Chuuya ran his hand up a particular point of his side — not tickling yet, but threatening. There, he traced: don't use me as transactional gain either.

"You're not a gain," he insisted, as if obvious. "You're a given."

"And you're not vain," he challenged. "Being seen does nothing to you."

A pause. "It's a very good story, though."

He dragged his hand up — hauled the hair on the boy's nape, gently enough. "Is it?"

A note of pleasurable distraction muffled his words. "Mm-mh. Q told me some of it. About people exchanging bodies."

"Yeah?" he encouraged, with a sigh. "And then what happens?"

"One of the guys was about to start a war," Dazai choked on a yawn, all of him a whisper — a mere suggestion. "A personal revenge against those who killed his family."

"Does the guy who steals his body start the war?"

"Can't decide. It depends," His finger traced a half moon on the sheets, absorbed. "Is your anger yours or your body's?"

Chuuya watched the wrinkles of the futon come into shape. In a distant corner of his mind, his arms itched. He turned his head; pressed his mouth to Dazai's shoulder blade, hard enough for his teeth to ache — waited, patiently, for the taste of blood.

All he felt was the shiver underneath him.

“Come on, then,” Chuuya sighed. He sat up — let his fingers land on the abandoned bandaged arm, and linger. “It better be a good story.”]

“Fine,” he concluded, eyes to the ceiling and its invisible blood stains. He’d have to mention the man’s crazed state, eventually. He’d have to mention Matsuda. “But I’m leading.”

For that, Dazai made sure to step on his feet through the entire waltzer.

---

...

---

Chuuya only managed to escape the board games by accidentally spilling juice on Elise — and because of the corpses.

“She’ll get over it,” he assured Kouyou, the moment he joined her in the hall of Building Five, where two dozen grey body bags were lined on the floor. “Don’t act as if you didn’t immediately lose the first round just to escape.”

Her festive kimono was a firework show; she curled untied hair between pale fingers. “Maybe board games aren’t amongst my strengths.”

“Sure,” He removed his hat. “And you didn’t make Hirotsu swim in your artificial river after you beat him seventy rounds on seventy one, last Christmas.”

New Year celebrations echoed from the far away windows of the other buildings; Building Five was still utterly silent, though.

“Who?” Chuuya asked.

Outside, it thundered. The uncomfortably wet weather was predicted to last all the way to the first week of the new year; the sky had been stuck in a perpetual layer of ash, uncaring of sun or stars. He’d found himself missing the red raincoat he used to be forced into — at the very least, though, his kimono was a male model. Corpses looked the same under sunlight or storms.

He wiped some raindrops off the nearest body bag. The next stroke of lighting painted Kouyou’s face a crepuscular sort of golden. “That eccentric bomb maker of yours.”

He flinched. “This is Kajii’s squad?”

“The second one he was ever assigned,” she confirmed. “I can’t imagine he will be particularly thrilled about this failure.”

Distantly, he thought he could hear music — all the way from the ballroom at Building One, where he’d watched the scientist scream at Elise’s rampant cheating. “I thought the job was just to handle the lack of payments from the Port side.”

“It was,” Kouyou confirmed. “He said they bumped against an Ability User of sorts — stayed in the shadows,” Her gaze grew pointed. “His men acted out because of it. He was already throwing his bombs out to hit the invisible threat. He wasn’t fast enough to stop.”

Starkly bright against the body bags, New Year’s choirs filtered in from the outside. Adam had gone out of his way to send both an eerily grammatically correct email of good wishes and a new Jack-in-a-Box — only this time, he’d added a little toy in a black suit and a red mop of hair next to his own doll.

I painted it myself!, his letter assured him. I hope you will appreciate it. I used every stored memory of your face in my database. It is, of course, incredibly small.

Chuuya winced.

“Actually,” The woman glanced around — they were the only ones in the Hall. She crouched down, her sandals beating the marble of the floor. “I wanted you to take a look at this.”

Burned on the left shoulder of the nearest corpse was a mark, red and angry near the center — fading off into a bluish sort of dead skin at the edges. The shape could have been vague enough, partially ruined by bruises and familiarly torn apart skin; Chuuya recognized it immediately.

“A half moon,” he echoed. He settled his fingers on the stain, biting his tongue against the familiar taste of dead flesh. “Again.”

“More than seven corpses, now.”

“Any new voices about an Ability User with that side effect?”

“None at all,” she answered. “I searched. I’ve been dealing with that married couple I told you about — the woman’s Ability is quite similar to my own. A few years ago, they started building a system of research on rogue Abilities — something sharper than even our Intelligence.”

“Nothing?”

“Nothing.”

“So they’re a golden league rogue,” Chuuya concluded.

“Don’t use video game metaphors with me, dear. I’m not that silly demon of yours.”

“They’re someone powerful enough the Division might have accepted to leave free reign,” he insisted. “And — I told you about Matsuda’s suspicions. If they’re taking Verlaine as a model of sorts — the half moons could be like the crosses he left on his victims.”

A complicated expression bloomed on Kouyou’s face. “They’re to be reeled in before they cause more issues,” she ordered. The corners of her lips climbed up cold-rose cheeks — she nudged his side with her foot. “What do you say? Do you feel up for a more — official, let’s say, bounty hunt?”

“Ane-san,” he tutted, not unlike she had a penchant for. “When do I not?”

She parted her grinning mouth, on the verge of adding something — then set her eyes on the glass doors, and paled so quickly he might have mistaken her for one of the bodies on the floor.

“Oi,” He blinked at the emptiness in front of him; set a hand on her shoulder. “Hey. Ane-san. What’s wrong?”

“I thought —“ Kouyou trailed off.

The silence had a strange tinge to it — the absent steps of mourning subordinates around the corpses; the murmurs of holidays they couldn’t afford to enjoy fully. Her lips were still parted; for a single, disconcerting moment, Chuuya thought he knew what word was about to leave her mouth.

She cleared her throat; leaned down to zip up the marked body’s bag.

“It’s alright,” she concluded. “It’s alright, I — momentary distraction. I thought I saw —“

Nothing concluded the sentence. Slowly, still looking somewhat lost, the woman led him back to the ballroom.

Decorations were impeccable down to the last notch; despite the stubborn rain attempting to crack the floor-to-ceiling windows behind heavy curtains, the room was drowned in a warm golden wave, swarmed by bodies in overpriced kimonos. Classy, of course, all of it — the Port Mafia had fought too hard for its spot not to show off when it could. A different sort of snottiness than the one dripping from the Division’s ballroom walls — but still snottiness.

“You lose!” Elise screeched, jumping on top of the table she had forced countless mafiosi to sit around.

The games hadn’t stopped in hours. Mori seemed on the verge of using sharp cutlery against anyone who offered the girl one compliment too many. A group from the Guerrilla squad blinked pleading gazes at him, one eye abandoned to their precious cards. Elise laughed, again.

Snotty, he considered, fond. But warm.

Kouyou sipped on her glass. “And what do you want in exchange for not letting Elise know about my...” She scrambled for a better term than, losing in the first round to run from her.

“Fortified humbleness?”

Chuuya hummed, leaning back against the column they had claimed. “I read this one pamphlet in Hirotsu’s office,” he offered. “There’s this Bugatti — only five or six were produced in the entire world. Costs an eye.”

“Imported cars as a favor,” she summed up. She ruffled his hair; he dangled his hat from two fingers as it fell. “I’m almost proud. Deal.”

From the chair next to Elise’s own, Hirotsu laid empty eyes on the ribbon the girl was offering him. In a hushed wave of terror, framed by the widening eyes of his Black Lizards — he hooked it to the top of his head. At his right, Tanaki laughed so hard her face grew redder than the wine.

“Voices say she’s forgiven the two of you,” the Executive dared, as the chuckles faded through the music and the unwilling competitiveness of the mafiosi.

He glared. “Calling your spies voices doesn’t make them more bodacious.”

She shrugged. “Pretending that she won’t bear resentment as long as you make her normalcy repetitive is foolish.”

“Or maybe not everyone is as attached to their resentment as you are,” Chuuya replied, as carefully as possible. His doubts were his and his alone. “Respectfully. I see no —” He glanced her way. “Just what are you looking at?”

Kouyou didn’t answer. Her grasp on her glass was paling her knuckles; nothing but the rain was pooling on the window she’d set her uncannily vicious attention to.

He straightened. “Ane-san.”

“Do you —” She frowned. “Excuse me.”

“Ane-san —”

He watched her stalk to the other side of the room, hastily leaving her glass in his free hand. No time was given for him to follow — thin, pale fingers stole her drink from his confused fingers. Still masked and surprisingly close — compared to diffident habit — Gin Akutagawa’s face appeared in front of him.

“Kid,” Chuuya offered, forcing himself to look away. “Happy New Year. Looking slick.”

He had opted out of a kimono, not unlike most Black Lizards — the suit he wore fit him too well not to be tailored, and it had Hirotsu’s posh touch all over it. The spiky ponytail was still there, if a bit higher — experimenting, Chuuya assumed.

He nodded. His fingers curled in the air, indecisive. He eyed the stolen alcohol in his other hand.

“Don’t you dare,” Chuuya was quick to take it back, abandoning both of the glasses on the nearest table. “Think about it again in six years or something.”

His eyebrow curled, speechless.

“Age limitations are there for a reason.”

Hesitantly, his fingers shaped out a syllable — then two; uncertain of being understood or glanced blankly at. I’ve killed people.

Did you kill them with alcohol poisoning?, Chuuya replied. Gin’s eyes widened, stuck on his hands. He grinned, leaning into the space between their bodies. The Mackerel and I had to learn the standard, to make our own. So make sure not to tell him to fuck off like this.

I don’t think he would care.

Ah. A shrug. If you don’t want your brother to get overprotective, then.

Quickly, he muffled his snort. Chuuya waited for him to be done with his unsubtle search, and asked: “Did your brother talk to you?”

He made a face.

Somewhat, he signed.

Chuuya couldn’t say he was sure of why Gin had decided to initiate a conversation with him; they had never done more than coexist in the same space. He was clearly a silent kid; he only ever willingly interacted with Hirotsu, it seemed — allowing occasional fawning from Madame Tanaki, and the brawls he had no hesitation to win against Black Lizards too keen on underestimating him.

He said you’re the one told him to apologize, Gin accused.

“I didn’t,” Chuuya replied. Akutagawa had left his gloves on the floor, in front of the door of his office, after the alley escape — it had sparked some kind of stubbornness to look for him, but he had failed. “I told him to look up from his own ass and realize there are things that matter more than what smelly fish think of him.”

It won’t work, he considered.

“Then don’t give up,” he tilted his head to the side. In the corner of his gaze, a black void with his eyes set on them caught his attention — Dazai’s coat over his kimono; face judging the festivities around him with glee. “Not if you care. Right?”

Gin crossed his arms.

He had a tendency to crawl into himself; hug his shoulders until the shadows swallowed the few glimpses of skin. Street-sticky, Shirase would have said. He liked to make up words.

“Black Lizards stand tall,” Chuuya let him know, voice low, tapping his under chin. As if electrocuted, he straightened his spine all in one blink. “And they don’t let brothers be assholes,” he added. “Try to talk some sense into him, but don’t ever let yourself get hurt for the sake of waking him up — not again.”

He stared at the floor.

“Clear?” he insisted.

A small nod. Yes, Vice-Executive.

“I go by Chuuya. None of that,” Chuuya warned. “Not when Akutagawa is two words from calling me a son of a bitch.”

His eyes crinkled — he thought his smile might be less than a curved line under the mask; but a good enough price. Studying his face, Gin traced, very slowly: You sound a lot like him.

Chuuya frowned. “Him?”

He shook his head, eyes low.

Eventually, he shrugged. “Wanna dance?”

Surprise widened his eyes. He glanced at the few couples rubbing their feet near the center of the room, heads thrown back in laughter — a tad less solemn than the high society the Division ballroom had waved around. With an avid glint in his eyes, mostly subdued, he signed: I’m not...

He trailed off — fiddled with his tie, like it might have signaled some sort of statement.

“...an adequate dance partner?” Chuuya concluded. He hooked the chain of his hat on his sash; reached forward and gently took Gin’s wrist, leading him to the swaying crowd. “You should have seen the waltzers the bandaged fool’s forced on me. Come on. I’ll even let you lead.”

The boy lit up. Failing at non-eagerness, he dragged Chuuya to the floor.

As the music changed into something both classical and upbeat, Gin’s alleged grin was hidden behind his mask — but he accepted to hold onto his tentative steps, occasionally being glared at by Kouyou for bad posture, and danced along.

Elise screamed a bit more — mafiosi and seats were exchanged; money was taken and given up on. Ace’s mouse eyes shone in that dangerously hyper aware way of his, whenever a card game was in the works. Some of the younger Lizards — a small group of subordinates who hadn’t burned in jealousy at his rapid climb to fame — ended up stealing Gin from his embrace, poking at him.

Hamamoto, X and some of the Guerrilla squad waved their entire bodies at him, begging for him to join the death match. Chuuya shook his own head very pointedly, dragging one thumb over his neck.

At some indefinite point, he ended up over the back of Mori's chair, studying the dots the IV had left on the edge of his wrists.

"Not too fond of table games, Chuuya?" the man questioned, tilting his head back to offer him a placid smile.

"I get a bit too competitive," he replied, as Elise waved the bingo blower over her head. "And I have a thing for game rules."

The man winced. "I've been trying to figure out the right sequence of these passages for a bit — I do hope Elise hasn't noticed."

"Too slow!" the girl barked. Subordinates all around jumped three feet in the air. "Hurry up!"

The glances directed to the man were few and far in between — the festive crowd preferred to murmur; as if they could have escaped his eyes by pretending they weren't there. No one had quite dared to wonder after his health; they had only welcomed him back with bowed heads and a questioning line in their eyes. Of course he's here, one of the snipers had mumbled. Where else?

"So," the Boss started, graciously pulling at the bow on top of the child's hair to keep her near. "Have you been enjoying our lessons, Chuuya?"

Lessons. An unfit terminology. He lived with the lingering possibility that every word out of Mori's mouth might be one of those lessons.

"Certainly, sir," he offered. He knew more about daedal, deeply convoluted mechanitions of the Mafia's nervous system than he had thought he would ever need. It sat weirdly on his shoulders. "It has been very — surprising."

"One tends to take greatness for granted, until they see what is built behind it," the doctor confirmed. "To keep it afloat. To keep everyone standing inside it safe."

And it was true. Connections and threats and deals and stolen secrets — all of it creased on the base of the syndicate to create walls so high, even Chuuya had to fly up a bit to see over them. And with the elections — "The executions are a bit repetitive, though."

A chuckle. "We live in times of change."

Eyes to the liquid in his glass, he insisted, low: "Those time of change are forming a wing of supporters to the one suicidal maniac in town."

"Chuuya," Mori's hands, which had been rolling dice from the table road, came to a halt. All around them, music and drinks flooded; no one paid them any mind, and everybody watched. "Do you believe I will be dethroned?"

It was surreal to hear that question in any place but a locked room. He thought it belonged to secret meetings in rooms of the Five Towers that might escape Mori's spies for a minute or two — maybe to the distant gaze in Dazai's eyes. It was disturbing to have the man look at him with genuine curiosity, as if his input on what would be the eleventh — the last — assassination attempt was indispensable.

Chuuya shrugged. “I believe they think you can be.”

“Who is they?”

Elise had plastered her nose to Tanaki’s chest; her begging, whining, grew and grew in the background of his thoughts. “The whispers.”

Mori intertwined his hands, pressing them against the table. The man hardly ever fit into that storm of people; but suddenly, it was his eyes that did not fit on the celebratory smile on his face.

“A cleanse goes two ways, Chuuya,” he said. A lesson, probably; because he straightened, and his hands spasmed — the thievery of a street kid, who knew when gold was being dangled. Stealing words from Pianoman’s speeches — stealing moves from Ability Users set on tearing the Sheep into pieces. “If cockroaches smell revolution, they will crawl out. It’ll make it easier to step on them. I only need people I can trust, as of now.”

He frowned at the chandeliers. “Why now, specifically?”

“The Ability Permit,” Quicker than he could muffle, Chuuya’s shoulders stiffened. “I believe I might have found a clear road to it.”

Neither side can afford to waste more time, Kouyou had said. “That’s good, right?”

“It’ll be arduous, undoubtedly. Might take a year or two to plan.”

He set his jaw. “That’s why we’re fortifying our defenses, then.”

“Exactly.”

“So — Dazai’s the flame to the moths?”

Mori smiled. He drank his Champagne; evaded Tanaki’s warning look — she’d berated his drinking during healing times. “You were always smarter than most first assumed.”

His ears burned. “Good to know, Boss.”

“Or maybe — people should begin to see a threat in the trust you put in your partner.”

“It’s not about trust,” he scoffed, because it was easier than meeting the man’s eyes about the curse he had placed on both of them. “It’s about observance. This whole parade, the people falling to their knees, the assassination attempts — that’s not how the bastard kills.”

He could feel his gaze on him. His skin prickled — a careful, ingrained instinct; something that almost lit up his hands in liquid crimson.

“And how does he kill?” Mori asked.

Blood on the ground — on the walls of bathtubs in every motel the world had to offer; on the side of a stolen car; on his shoes; on his face; under his bandages. Always on his blind side; and Dazai, always bloodied in his periphery. “Fast.”

“Fast?”

Hands in his pockets, he shrugged.

“And you?”

“Me?”

“How fast would he kill you?”

Chuuya snorted.

The man’s smile widened; he ruffled Elise’s hair as she sat next to him again. “I suppose you’re right. You are faster than most,” A pause; with some petulance, he whispered: “Or perhaps, you two have decided to send Kouyou to an early grave. Time and closeness do tend to develop fondness, in my experience.”

“He’d leave my corpse to be eaten by the dogs,” he replied, nonplussed.

Elise crashed her fist against the game board, calling for attention. She was perfectly real, Chuuya knew; she sometimes felt ignorable, like a stain on a rear view mirror. A solid, bored piece of wind. Mori wondered: “But?”

Chuuya tilted his head. “But he will not let me die. So there’ll be no dogs.”

Imperceptibly, something passed through the doctor’s gaze. It itched where his hungry skin had crawled to stick to his bones, Corruption after Corruption — told him he had made a mistake, at some point, between one breath and the other.

“No,” he echoed. “I suppose he won’t.”

“Rintarou!” Elise called, eyes shimmering along to the lights. “Rintarou, look here — “

Some wine glasses away, after Kouyou had deadly-smilingly dragged him to dance, rain-soaked arms leaned on his shoulders. Tickling wet hair stuck on his temple, as whine-lined lips brushed the shell of his ear. “Looking for entertainment?”

“If you jumped in the river again, I will gut you,” Chuuya let him know, unbothered, keeping his gaze on the festivities. Secretive and hidden as it was, he had always thought the Mafia was made to be watched — a captivating dance of normalcy and blood; the echoing hum of laughter, as suffocating anxiety lingered in the air.

“It’s pouring outside.”

“Does that mean you didn’t jump in the river?”

“No, I did,” he huffed. “Odasaku and Ango won’t be free until so late. I was trying to pass the time in a way that would give Mori an aneurysm.”

Contempt curled on his scratched lips. “By not showing up to the most awaited event of the syndicate?”

“And telling Elise nothing would bother him more than seeing all these subordinates fawn over her blindsiding talent in board games.”

“You suck so bad.”

“That’s what he said.”

“Why don’t you go bother those two fools you’ve brainwashed into appreciating you?”

“Hey,” Dazai insisted. Shrugging him off was a pointless attempt — he stuck close enough they must have been one, to the more distant eyes. Chuuya could feel the bandages on his neck tickle his nape. “I told you, that’s later. Where’s my ring, by the way?”

His eyebrows flew to his hairline. “Beg your pardon?”

“Yes, do beg.”

Chuuya stepped on his foot.

“My ring,” the boy whined, attempting to knee him on the inside of his legs as revenge. “You committed, at the Division’s ball. Went around all evening calling me your fiance —“

“That was your idea —“

“And I kinda want to show it to Tanaki,” he insisted. “I think she might get aggravated enough that her brain will reboot into appreciating both of us again. Trust the process.”

He stared at the chandeliers, sighing. When a drunken Lizard woman passed by, he slipped a silver band from her finger — utterly simple, but carved like a braid on the upper side. Offering it to the hands crossed under his chin, Chuuya wasted no time watching Dazai satisfyingly slip it on his band aid covered finger.

“Wonderful,” he concluded, with a sigh. “This is so ugly it makes me want to die. Tacky is truly your go-to. You didn’t answer my question.”

“You know,” Chuuya let him know, “Some people actually enjoy syndicate events.”

“I’m sure that’s the case. ‘You met any?’”

“Ace.”

In lieu of a response, Dazai pulled his earlobe, disgusted. “Mori’s thinking of turning Executive meetings into yearly occasions,” He hummed. “Less meetings is a good thing. There’s a reason I used to lock myself up in the bathrooms when Mori was being annoying.”

“Thank fuck he is,” he grunted. “If you start another fight in the meeting room, I’ll end up in the dungeons for high treason.”

Dazai sighed. A bit too long — his breath smelled of alcohol, if faintly. He would have never let himself show up drunk to any location Mori was at, he knew — but still. “Here comes my ruthless, merciless Chuuya.”

His head pulsed. “I hate you.”

“It’s mutual.”

“So, then — Mori isn’t annoying anymore? That’s why you do it, these days?”

“Of course he is,” he scoffed. “He just paid to paint all the bathroom stalls olive green.”

What’s wrong with olive green?, Chuuya didn’t waste time questioning — the sky was blue; the Guerrilla had lost thirty seven members since Chuuya had been elected as their head; and Dazai was weird about things. He wouldn’t play a video game if the characters on the cover were placed weirdly, whatever it meant — wouldn’t wear any bandages but this old brand that a single pharmacy in the city sold.

“Again — looking for entertainment?”

“Why?” he challenged, turning his head to meet his eyes. “Offering some?”

“Depends,” Dazai said — all eyebags and a dangerous, magnetic edge to his cracked lips.

“On?”

“Would you accept?”

Before he could attempt to answer, the weight laying on him vanished, and three familiar faces appeared in front of him.

“Hey, Boss,” Hamamoto said, breathless — his escape from the table slowing to a halt, hands on his knees. “Enjoying the festivities?”

“More than you will once Elise finds out someone’s left mid game,” Chuuya replied. Dazai’s wet clothes had left imprints on his own, drooling shivers down his spine. He was laughing right in Hirotsu’s face, a few tables away; the man looked at him as he always — endlessly posed; unbearably fond. He doubted Dazai even felt it. “If you’re here to beg for paid holidays, you should know we have a mission on the —“

“The recruitment rumors are actually true, then?” X huffed, hanging off Hamamoto’s arm in a lilac Western-cut dress. “How many Ability Users can this city hold?”

“It’s Yokohama,” Sugita reminded her.

“That’s why I’m saying it.”

“Recruitment will be passed on to another Unit, I believe,” Chuuya interrupted. “We have to deal with one User in particular, now.”

The trio exchanged a glance. “Any details you can spare, Boss?” Hamamoto asked.

“The countdown!” some Lizard called, as she plastered her hands on the nearby windows — the enormous billboard towering over the center of the city had begun to change, dazzling numbers vanishing between sparkles and computer lines. “Come on, it’s starting!”

X pulled him by the wrist, respectful to the bone — they ran, crowding and mumbling, as the louder voices counted down from ten. Chuuya felt a hand on his hair; the end of Kouyou’s nails — the glimmer of Hirotsu’s monocle — Tanaki, in a corner, waiting with baited breath.

“...7...6...5...!”

He turned, holding onto his glass. Dazai was a dot, miles away from the crowd — head tilted to study the furthest of the windows.

There was something boundlessly vacant in his outline — an absence that was material on too long eyelashes and the dangling band aid only half stuck to his cheek. Fake candles from chandeliers painted his hair in dots of caged sunlight; the dark blue of his kimono fit him like an Hospital vest. He was seven steps away — he could not be reached.

All at once, Chuuya thought — he looked painstakingly sad.

“4...3...2...!”

He freed himself from Hamamoto’s grasp — walked through the crowd, heart pounding with irritation, reaching out to grab him by the collar and claw his face off. “Mackerel!” he called, a tad louder than the countdown, only a few bodies away. His glass was shouldered out of his grasp; it landed on the ground with a golden sound, and Chuuya laughed, uncannily drunk with the reality of it all. Dazai raised his head, startled — he found his eyes with instinctual ease, and the cruel thing in Chuuya’s veins longed to keep him there until he wasn’t unreachable. Hoarder, it spat, hoarder — “You gonna move, or —“

All seemed to grow still.

Crystal-clear; ear splitting — the windows closest to the game table shattered so promptly it did not have any time to be webbed in cracks. The distant thunder roared — the unmistakable pierce of bullets through the air came like a shriek.

Chuuya blinked.

It seemed to take eons for his eyelashes to tear from each other — his body was spread in front of his subordinates, glimmering scarlet; more than a thousand shards of glass floated mere inches from his face, trembling frantically over Tainted’s old. The crowd had parted in an unprepared chaos — the weapons they had hid under festive clothes were in their hands, Abilities lighting up some of the frames. All their eyes were on Mori.

The man in front of him was soaked — red to the very bone; ruined clothes and the gun he had held onto as he pierced the window still locked in shaking fingers. Golden Demon floated upon the Boss' head, her katana glinting with gunpowder from the bullets she had cut in halves.

They landed on the ground in a tin-tin — deafening in its simplicity. The purple-lined ripped armrest Hirotsu had struck through the assassin's chest made a strange sound when he inhaled — a wet, horrendously choking squelch that dropped coagulated blood onto the carpet.

“You,” the assassin tried. “You will —“

His knees cracked the ground.

Almost — the man turned, barely floating on his feet; stumbling heavy steps in the opposite direction, uncaring of the weight drifting viscera apart from his flesh. He dropped anyway, halfway to his arrival — crawled on his elbows until his lungs were no more, forehead flat to the ground.

Chuuya felt him die just like that; in a bowed stance, laying in a growing pool of crimson — right in front of Dazai's casual, blinking frame.

The sound of gritting teeth bumped on the shell of his ear; Hamamoto breathed shallowly.

Frame nauseatingly blurred behind Golden Demon's outlines, Mori's face didn't even twitch. Steadily, blood reached Dazai's shoes.

He took a step back.

“Dear,” Dazai lamented. His voice did not pause the storm outside; Chuuya could still hear every rusty mechanism in every mind in the room spin madly — thinking. When his single eye landed on him, the sheer hilarity in it was a trembling bridge on an abyss of delirium. “Could someone clean that up, please? Must the smell of corpses always ruin the New Year's dinner?”

Through the wrecked windows, fireworks bloomed in unstoppable waves of blinding flares — apocalyptic, midnight struck the clock hand.

kouyou: i miss when you and dazai were cute. now you're just doomed yaoi i'm the very soul of solitude: actual nakahara chuuya quote.

"you sound a lot like him": wonder who gin might be getting trained by... who resembles chuuya... anyway.

unfortunately i have to run (once again) since i'm posting this in between classes, so this is where i thank you guys for all the love and comments and kudos and go away. i hope you enjoyed the chapter and i hope you'll enjoy the next ones even more, and i hope everything is going great in your life. see you soon and keep warm!!!

p. s. toe update i now have a funny pseudo cast. i'll write skk on it.

HOW

Chapter Notes

see you at the end!! ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xviii.

---

Case number: 73837882

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi Ango

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [Code Name: Double Black] began the process of recruitment on [...]*

---

Kajii enjoyed studying the prisoners in the dungeons.

Despite his skepticism on the man's reasoning — how to better understand God than near the dying ones? — it was the first place where Chuuya began his search. On his way down the stairs, he heard nothing but tired sobs and the occasional prayer, soaked in winterish air and the sticky dust always dripping from the steps.

The door was still there. Kajii wasn't.

He dragged his nails over it as he passed, gathering rust under his gloves; he wondered about the hum in his bones, a thing as constant as the sky — the urgency to separate his feet from any law, to remind himself of the nonexistent idea of being crushed.

Gravity had been an eyelash out of place since he had first breathed in. Sometimes, Chuuya still shook its hand like a stranger.

“Oh, hey, Almost-Executive!” Kajii roared, stuck under the largest table of the loft reserved to his lab. “Been waiting for you. Viens ici, viens ici. Guess what — I was wrong all along.”

“What do you mean —“ The man's fingers wrapped around his wrist, dragging him to the end of the laboratory — no care for his startled yelp or the post-mission blood stuck to his gloves. “Kajii, are you —“

“I was asking all the wrong questions,” he insisted, halting in front of a building station — endless metal pieces and unmade lemon bombs occupying every corner of the space, put together and then set apart again in some kind of crazed frenzy. “It's not about how death works, it's about what death is. God doesn't make things work — he just makes them.”

Chuuya stared.

The buzz of his small television was a rush of slightly perplexed waves in his ears, moving from one channel to the other with no command. “Are you feeling alright?”

“I've never been better!” Kajii laughed. He took off his goggles, throwing them to the side; the sound of glass shattering was as loud as a gunshot. The man leaned over the table, fiddling with toy renditions of atoms until he found the ones he was looking for. “See this?” he encouraged, lifting two spheres in front of their eyes. The plastic skeletons around the room stared at him. “You're the only other Physics nerd in this beautiful hellhole. Help me out here.”

“I'm not a nerd,” Chuuya said. His lab coat was still dripping blood and bomb ash. “Atoms, you freak. And?”

He leaned ever further, pupils blown out. “How many of these beauties are in our bodies?”

“Around 6,5 octillion — well, it's debated, but —“

“And how often do they change?”

“About 98% of them are gone by the end of the — Kajii, what's this about?”

“See!” Kajii exclaimed, waving his arms. He hit a scale; it broke on the ground. “We are made of science. Or God's will — I would argue they are the same thing, but that's another conversation. Some deities they are, numbers — look at the things they can do to our bodies; to the things surrounding us. But death?” When he widened his eyes, they were bloodshot — a shattered vein on each side, framed by eyebags. “Even they cannot do a thing to it.”

Ah, Chuuya considered, slowly, watching as the man chuckled — taking off in a small run around his lab; muttering under his breath with every notebook he picked up from the mess on the floor. He’s lost it.

“And it makes sense!” he continued — as he climbed his table in a frantic haste. “Of course death would escape from life’s creations. Creations made specifically for the purpose of understanding its end — no way it would be that easy. It’s not about what death does. Death simply kills you. But why? What is it?”

“You know — when your heartbeat slows down,” Chuuya spelled out, after a pause. “Like, real slow. Gone, even. And your lungs don’t get air and all that stuff? Should be familiar.”

He waved him off. “That’s oversimplifying it.”

“Why over-complicate it?”

“Because that’s how you understand,” Kajii said. “What is life? A web. Weaved and weaved all over, unconquerable and phantasmal. Lemons! And numbers and atoms and every step someone takes in a direction instead of the other. You think your beloved poets have ever thought life simple?”

The television brightened up with a cereal spot of sorts, singing a jingle that fell in a strange rhythm with the snowstorm outside the windows. “Are you getting to a point?” he asked. “Perhaps one that pertains to your failed mission?”

“Didn’t fail,” the man replied, distractedly, through the scribbled pages. “Losses are bad for business, though. I understand that. Strength is in numbers. Numbers — again! I’m profoundly thankful for their sacrifice, still, and the help it will bring to my newly begun research. They gave me a perspective I had completely bypassed. A shame their death was such a blinding mess. I would have gladly welcomed a closer look —“

Lighting struck with deadly precision, muffling the hiss of Kajii’s body crashing forward — pulled down by the hand Chuuya fisted around his scarf, lowering him until their eyes met.

“Kajii,” he snapped, wearing the tone that got frozen subordinates to move during shootouts. “Watch your mouth. Your subordinates’ bodies are still warm downstairs.”

“I keep telling Boss I’m not cut for squad work —“

“Kajii.”

His eyes twitched.

All at once, he deflated.

Chuuya felt himself rattled by it; then still, stone-like — stuck between the reminder that he actually liked Kajii, and everything else.

“Since you think you’re allowed to wash away people who died by your hand,” he ordered, eventually, “You’ll be the one to inform their next of kins of their demise. Are we clear on that?”

Whatever Kajii saw in his eyes — a glint of the title he enjoyed mocking him with; something more similar to his avoided reflections — rubbed the maniac glint off his own. “Yes, sir.”

He let go of him.

The man rubbed his throat over the scarf, a distant sort of confusion making him frown. He waited for Chuuya to move a few steps back before he spoke again, eyes on the floor. “Anyway, I knew you wouldn’t get it.”

Chuuya watched a few of the toy atoms float in his hand, red with Tainted — they spun and spun, and he was not angry. “What the fuck is that supposed to mean?”

“You mourn people,” Kajii shrugged. With a softer, less careless movement — his eyes set on the page he had ripped from the sudden scare. The broken goggles had left scratches on his cheeks; he patted them. “Everyday. I’ve seen it. All I mourn is heartbeats.”

“And you’re proud of that?”

Kajii abandoned the papers on the desk. Scratches down his hands, too; bruises and lines, nails ripped off — the unmistakable signs of struggle. My bombs cannot touch me, he had told him, once, after Chuuya had almost been caught in an explosion. And yet he had tried to stop them from exploding anyway — to save them. Would you ask God to remember that the fools who pray to him can die?

“And you’re not jealous?” the man asked.

Behind the windows, soaked to the bone from the unforgiving rain, Chuuya saw the glint of a grin — flesh and blood and a missing lung, and a wheezing last wish he could not allow more than pretense. Help Doc, he’d said, I managed to —

The television changed channels again.

“ — marathon,” the festive News anchor was saying, his smile bright. “The end of this service will be followed by our yearly tribute to the late beloved actor, and the inauguration of the special channel dedicated solely to his projects. As we were recently saddened by the news of his adopted sister’s own demise — “

“Fine,” Chuuya concluded.

“Hey,” Kajii called, awkward in that way of his — more familiar with equations and the smell left by explosions than with things that could still breathe. “Man. Listen—“

Chuuya walked to the only seat in the room — a cranky, faded beanbag abandoned to the side. Dragging it by the edge, he settled it in front of the old television, kicking the remote to float it in his hands. He raised the volume right as the pale, familiar lines of Lippman’s face shaped themselves in front of him — make-up and winning smile; living and breathing and being.

“I’ll sit with it if you don’t.”

Kajii hesitated. “With what?”

“Your grief,” he clarified, leaning down, as The Killer And His Moon began playing. “From my experience, at some point, it’ll just be an itch.”

Where he could not see him, Kajii paused.

Oh, I don’t know, good sir, Lippman sighed. They had always put too much gel on his hair. They had always gone too far for a man none of them had known — ugly, ugly jealousy. Chuuya knew he had been mourned, with a fake name and a fake story, and Chuuya wanted all of it anyway. Are there not worse things to do than live?

He thought about his sister — how she had grasped his chin between two fingers. They like freaks like us on a screen.

Halfway through the second movie of the marathon, the scientist abandoned his unfinished bomb — and quietly, he sat on the ground next to him.

---

...

---

[Pianoman got shot, once.

He dragged himself to the Old World, as the Flags all tended to do when the Hospital was too crowded — when their shared penchant for, our business is our business, was stronger than the sting. The bartender knew all their numbers — and with enough prodding, she could be talked into not mumbling about the blood on the floor, and into calling the first number on her notebook.

Three weeks after he’d first been introduced to the group, the man who had dragged him there was shot — and Chuuya’s number was picked.

“I don’t believe for a second you didn’t fuck it up so she would call me,” Chuuya let him know, as they crammed up in the backroom — a small space with a tiny couch and just enough floor to spread the emergency kit.

He had not yet learned how to stitch people up; all Pianoman wanted, it seemed, was someone to pinch him — to make sure he wouldn't pass out; to clean blood and pass alcohol. All very professional; Chuuya studied the black and white of his blood soaked shirt and knew, with the certainty of a street kid, that he had been captured.

"I hope you'll find it in your heart to forgive such manipulation," Pianoman admitted, cheerful in that gentle way of his. The wound was minor; but the beads of sweat rolling down his temples were relentless. "I would rather the group didn't see me in this condition."

Chuuya's eyebrows flew to his hairline. The man snorted. "You're new. Might as well stain your perception of me while it's fresh."

"I thought I wasn't part of your little band yet."

"You will be," he replied, unwavering.

He hated the certainty in his tone with bitter vitriol. I already have my own, he almost said — except it had been three weeks and two days, and Shirase hadn't shown up, and Chuuya knew better.

He kept his eyes on the bleeding flesh — the squelch of the needle; the fingers pinching the skin close; the trails of sticky red sliding down the heaving side of the man's ribs. His fingers seemed too delicate for the job — he had seen them wrap a piano cord around a woman's throat only yesterday.

(He hadn't kicked the head when it had landed on the floor. Albatross had, though; and Doc had grabbed it with scientific joy. Lippman had pulled Pianoman closer by the same bloodied wire, laughing; Iceman had drawn something with the blood on the floor.

Chuuya had watched them, machine and connected and friends, and for the first time since the underside of a precipice near the sea, poison in his body, he'd thought —)

"You seem skeptical," Pianoman said.

He knew better than to expect pillars to be unwoundable — knew better than to call Pianoman anything but a pillar, too. As rowdy and untamable as the other Flags might have been, he saw the way their heads turned at the mere idea of words out of the man's mouth. Youngest candidate to the Executive seat, the voices said — and Chuuya replied, if he kills me first.

"Why wouldn't you want them to see you like this?" he asked.

"You were a leader too," The man blinked. "Don't tell me you don't understand."

"I wasn't —" Chuuya caught a drop of blood before it could stain the couch. He thought of children standing next to the GSS, eyes widening only so, when he — gravity child and local roof roamer and their unbeatable Chuuya — for the first time, had stumbled. "You've bled in front of them before. No groundbreaking discovery on their side."

"Ah," Pianoman made a face. "Not the wound. That isn't the problem."

“Then what is?”

“The woman who shot me happened to use the same kind of weapon my mother used to kill my brothers,” he explained, conversationally, as the needle pierced him again. “I believe it might have — petrified me, for a moment. Doc would have heard my unstable heartbeat in a blink.”

Chuuya stared at him.

Tha man erupted in fits of laughter; his face tensed up at the bubbling blood. “I apologize. I didn’t mean to make you uncomfortable.”

“I’m not uncomfortable,” he snapped.

“You look terribly uncomfortable though —“

“Well, I’m not,” He crossed his arms. “It’s — so what. You didn’t want them to see you freak out over shit that happened to you?”

“Basically,” Pianoman confirmed. “I believe it could have destabilized them a bit.”

“You don’t look like you’re freaking out.”

“Oh, I am,” He blinked again, very slowly, eyes on the ceiling. “But I only let myself show it for — ah, roughly thirty seconds?”

Chuuya scoffed. “You got a timer or what?”

“A mental one, yes.”

“That’s the stupidest thing I’ve ever heard.”

“Is it, though?” he questioned. “Experience has taught me that forcing your body to gulp back instinctive reactions will do nothing but add to your weight. You know what Lippman’s publicist would say about that.”

“So what,” he echoed, “Better to let it all out where no one can see?”

Pianoman smiled — a softer thing. One that wouldn’t tear his stitches; one that Chuuya always felt on himself like a strangely sharp blanket. The Flags were good — the Flags were too good. The Port Mafia was holding him hostage, and Chuuya had put the chains on himself. The Flags were kind and he —

“Better to let it out,” Pianoman specified. A wink; he put the last stitch, and Chuuya snapped the thread. “And better to only entrust it to one person.”]

---

For no apparent reason, near the middle of January, the bathrooms of Building One were painted olive green. Absent-mindedly, Chuuya wondered if Dazai knew just how terrible the color looked under drying blood.

The circling movement of his hands under the faucet stole his attention from the drooling lines of crimson — he hadn't bothered to turn on the lights, but old instincts had had him kick all the stalls doors open, checking for intruders. The mirrors were all fogged up. He drew a window into them with the wet palm of his hand.

In it, he met Albatross' eyes.

Something got stuck in his throat. He leaned down to gulp it with the freezing water; held onto the cold porcelain until the image was erased from his brain — the exact shade of his eyes, never captured in pictures; the blood around them, turning the braid-escaped strands into something akin to his own color.

Chuuya turned to leave, and tripped on the upper part of Doc's body.

No, he thought, efficiently — it was Koda's brother, abandoned in his arms with his viscera all ripped out, surrounded by the children sacrificed for a cause he had no choice but to call real. It was whatever had been left of his squad's corpses after he had destroyed the building — not an ounce of respect for their tired spines; only focused on an excuse to scream until his throat was torn and have no one blame him for it.

"Hey," he protested, rough. "Hey, no —"

"Chuuya," someone called. "Chuuya —"

There were flies abandoning the caves where Detective Matsuda's eyes had been, empty and soggy — buzzing and shushing and crowding and devouring, uncaring of the blood dripping down his face faster than they could drink from.

It was a miracle that his body was standing — Chuuya could see bones peek all over his flesh; could see the layers of skin open and crack and pool all over each other — as the flies ate and the spiders crawled out of his failing lungs, the viscera landing on the floor with a squelch, the tear in his chest just as familiar as —

"Chuuya!" Matsuda snapped, hands on his arms — his eyes there and his skin unmarred. "What the hell is the matter with you?"

— gravity.

His lips parted.

He thought some sound was supposed to leave them; when it didn't, he sunk his nails in his palms and croaked: "What?"

"Why did you look like —" he trailed off.

Police sirens. Matsuda's hands on him. The concern slipping off his expression the more shut off Chuuya's own grew, as he forced his body into a frostbite of reality — to snap out of it.

He kept his eyes on the fogged up mirror until the man dragged him out of the bathroom — searched for the dead's eyes, and saw nothing but his own reflection.

"What," he managed to question, when the pain of his own scratches began to clear his mind. "What the hell are you doing here?"

Something like regret pooled in the man's face.

Abruptly, Chuuya was awake.

A commotion of police officers had gathered at the entrance of the building — police cars were parked all around the HQs perimeter, their blaring lights and sirens turned on, as they waited for the agents roaming through the main Hall and the corridors, defiant expressions on.

"Boss," Ace said, from Tanaki's desk, when the man made his way out of the elevator. The chaos had clearly called him back from some event; the smell of good Champagne was strong, and the glint of jewelry on him was fancier than usual. "Here you are. I was just about to call for you."

"These gentlemen are certainly virtuosos," Mori's grin could have melted the snow on the streets. He offered a hand to the most unimpressed of the uniformed bunch, as if untouched by the red-and-blue lights up in his face. "Head of Mori Corporations. What brings you to your job on one of the least snowy weekends of the season? Surely there are better ways to spend the night."

"We have a warrant," Matsuda spoke up, appearing from the bathroom doors Chuuya had stalked out of. "Sakura&Co claims to possess photographic evidence of plagiarism by your hand. Unfortunate timing, yes. Justice doesn't quite go on holidays, though, does it?"

The Boss' eyes sharpened.

He offered the officer his hand to shake — granted Chuuya a reassuring smile, when he made a beeline for his side. "Neither do oaths, Officer."

His tongue didn't manage to fight instinct. "What the hell are you doing here, Matsuda?"

Clouded, half-concerned eyes laid on him again — searching for whatever he had seen in the bathrooms; frowning when he found none of the discomfort Chuuya could still feel in his toes.

“Kid,” he greeted, carefully — as if Chuuya hadn’t all but ordered him to stay out of it. “You didn’t look in great shape just now. Not getting enough days off?”

“I don’t need them,” he brushed the matter off. “Plagiarism? Are you for real?”

“Chuuya.”

He insisted: “On manufacture? Why didn’t Sakura&Co contact our lawyers?”

Matsuda shrugged, accepting an evidence bag from one of his passing colleagues. It was still empty, but he fiddled with it as if meant to make Mori squirm. “The claim was brought to a judge; we were given a warrant. We have a right to check your database, if you don’t mind.”

From a few steps back, Ace scoffed.

Mori remained as pleasant as ever; moved an arm towards the stairs, his eyes dark enough to blind. “After you, then. Let’s hurry, shall we? I’m sure all of you boys want to go back to your nights as soon as possible.”

Grunts and murmurs glided through the group; Chuuya watched them all walk through the doors — unable to discern whether the pounding in his skull came from the police cars lights or his own head. Among the last ones to enter, Mori glanced in Chuuya’s direction.

Atrociously slow, he curled an eyebrow.

Chuuya stilled.

The doctor and some of the officers made their way to the stairs. He rushed forward; gripped Matsuda’s arm before he could follow them.

“What the fuck are you doing?” he snarled. “Didn’t you listen to a word I —“

“This is the second appeal we receive from Sakura&Co, ” the officer replied, blinking at their point of contact. He’d grown more of a beard, since the time Chuuya had stumbled on him — he’d saved some kid who would be lost again soon enough, if the street voices had any truth to them. “The first one regarded child labour.”

“And selling my information the Division isn’t —“

“The Division is trying to help you —“

“You know you won’t find shit, Matsuda,” Chuuya hissed. Tanaki and Ace were whispering among themselves, eyes forward — humoring some hopeless officer searching through the datas in the woman’s computer.

The man paused. “Chuuya.”

“You’ll never have enough evidence.”

“Are you warning me, or threatening me?”

He let go of him; watched the ricochet land him into the back of one of the velvet couches. “I told you to give up on the Mafia investigations,” he spelled out. “Don’t you fucking blame me when you realize I wasn’t playing.”

Matsuda clenched his jaw.

“You don’t get to burn this city down to remake it as it fits you, Chuuya,” he called, eyes on him as he walked to the secretary desk — no care for the listening ears; no mind for anything but his goddamn complex. “No one does. I won’t let you.”

Chuuya didn’t turn, eyes on the odd face Tanaki was offering him. “I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

The officers were roaming the few doors on the ground floor; Mori directed them towards the elevators without a blink. Chuuya knew there was nothing to find; just as it happened during Social Services Day — a quiet, boring affair, that year; the workers barely interested in learning either Dazai or Chuuya’s names, and quick to run once they set itching powder into their dossiers — Ability Users had already rendered the building nothing short of a masterpiece of illusions.

Door held open, Matsuda stared at the place where the stairs that led to the dungeons should have been — pinched eyebrows studying the shelves of old archives appearing instead.

“Is that what your Ability does?” Chuuya asked, low, jumping on the marble of Tanaki’s desk. “You said it helps with our protection, but you never told me.”

“Something subtler,” the woman replied, vaguely. There was barely a twitching muscle in her face; her smile could have cracked her face in two. She nodded towards Matsuda. “Isn’t that the cop you and Dazai always complain about?”

“He’s obsessed with me,” he scoffed. One of the officers asked a question to Ace — the man laughed in her face. ““Thinks he can dismantle a whole empire just to put me into foster care.”

“That’s nice of him.”

“What?”

Tanaki kept his eyes on his uniform; her tone was almost what she’d worn before gazes got more complicated — when reproaching them was a soft thing. “I don’t know,” she admired. “I think we ought to be grateful for every soul who wishes to save us, shouldn’t we?”

“I didn’t ask for shit,” Chuuya pointed out. “And I don’t need to be saved from my people.”

“Me neither. And yet — isn’t it nice, even just a bit?” she insisted. Her hands ripped a loose thread in his jacket — the nostalgia in her eyes was a rock on his ribs, and he couldn’t figure out which part he was to blame for. “That you don’t have to ask?”

He frowned. “I don’t accept offerings just because they’re good-intentioned. I never have.”

She threw the thread to the ground. “No need to worry, anyway. Boss is going to make sure you don’t have the option.”

“Chuuya?” Executive Ace called, shoulders still trembling with hilarity. “Do you mind helping this gentleman to the prototype room?”

By the time the dejected officers were led to the doors, the sky had turned into a bottomless pit, rotund with snow and pollution-erased stars. Mori hadn’t stopped smiling in hours; Matsuda’s hands were spasming at his sides. Chuuya was quite ready to throttle any uniformed man that made the bad choice of landing in front of him.

“Sakura&Co will be more than glad to know their evidence has been falsified,” Mori was shaking every policeman’s hand. “You might want to look into that. While I know very little about it, it certainly appears to be the work of an Ability.”

Peeking from behind his back, Chuuya gave his best obnoxious blink. “But Sakura&Co doesn’t have an Ability Permit, sir — do they?”

Mori met his eyes with his widened own — amused, clearly, but with a sharpness that planted his heels to the ground. Even if it’s not you the arrow is aiming for, Albatross used to say, never stand too close to an angry archer.

“What a troubling possibility,” he sighed.

The officers exchanged glances.

Chuuya wondered if any of them had truly believed in a possible success — if they had entered any of the rooms with the lingering hope of seeing cargoes of human organs, or counterfeit money, or hitmen ready to be sold.

Unnecessary bother. He could have raised his foot and offered them the dried blood under his soles.

“We might be back,” Matsuda concluded, with one last heavy, frustrated glance around. “The precinct has three open investigations on its hands. I’m afraid they all involve accusations regarding your — work ethics.”

“We shall be waiting for you, then,” Mori shook his hand; didn’t bow a single inch. “If I may, though,” he added — innocent in a way that reminded him of Dazai’s most obnoxious blinks; pointed gun and round cheeks. “I would suggest you and your men keep some distance between yourself and my subordinates. I truly don’t see any reason why an officer should be so interested in the children,” His voice raised, just an inch; enough to harden Matsuda’s expression, and turn a few heads, “Who I have been providing for — for years now. Unless Social Services has granted a warranty as well?”

The officer set his jaw, untouched by the low murmurs. “Chuuya and I go way back.”

“Curious,” Mori laid his hands on his shoulders; Chuuya’s gulped down the instability of standing between two players. Feeling like a pawn was never an enjoyable thrill; the man’s hold was a known, trusted thing — cold. “He always seems to get in so much trouble when you two stumble on each other, doesn’t he?”

The officer didn’t speak. He looked at him.

Chuuya kept his face carefully vacant.

“Alright, then,” Matsuda said, a bit tiredly. “Hope your new year will be prosperous, sir.”

The Boss nodded. “Officer.”

Nobody in the Hall moved — not until the red-and-blue lights grew into blurred dots down the road. Mori’s grasp on his shoulders had relaxed; he leaned down to ask: “You stole their warranties information as you showed them around, yes?”

He bowed his head. “Boss.”

An amused chuckle. The man ruffled his hair; Ace said something about an interrupted game of Poker — high stakes, Boss; you understand — and flew out of the Headquarters as soon as he was done bending his spine in two. Tanaki turned on her TV again; the subordinates vanished. Elise appeared out of nowhere, attacking herself to his legs, demanding a game of hide and seek.

Mori’s lips brushed the shell of his ear — behind the snow-lined doors, the last of the cars disappeared. When Chuuya studied the bathroom door, on the other end of the Hall — blood pooled from the slot of it.

“Keep an eye on the Police Station,” Mori ordered, just as cheerily. Chuuya realized, with a startled breath, that his hands on his shoulders and Elise’s fingers on his legs were a sole, mingled taste. “If he steps out some more, I want that Matsuda of yours’ insides on the concrete, next to his shredded skull.”

A quick tap; an encouraging grin. “You can take care of it, can’t you?”

---

...

---

[On the first day of the new year, Mori sat him down in his office.]

“Say, Chuuya,” he began, eyes on the moon behind the windows. “What did you feel when the Sheep betrayed you?”

Anger, he almost offered.

The doctor was against immediate answers, though — he disliked instincts vividly. Rationality makes us unlike beasts, he had once said, so why waste it on our mind’s first colors?

“Kinda stupid,” Chuuya answered.

His eyebrows rose. “Stupid?”

The day had pooled at his feet like sweat, lined by what he could feel becoming a tradition — Kouyou had dragged every mafioso in the upper circle to the local shrine, to ring the bell and clap their hands and have their fate handed over. Chuuya — much to Dazai’s vocal scorn — enjoyed being stuck in traditional clothing. It satisfied some muffled part of his stubborn self — perhaps the one that watched Kouyou strut among more-sensibly dressed bodies each day, confident and untouched by the eyes slipping down her spine.

And the sandals were always heavy; perfect to leave bruises on the vocal-scorn-bearer’s knees — always too busy dragging him by the elbow to light his lanterns right.

He dipped his nose into the glass of wine he had been offered, in an effort to make his shrug look polite “Like I should have expected it,” he elaborated. “Like someone else would have seen it coming, and I had refused to.”

“Refused,” Mori echoed, again — savoring each letter with care. “And the Flags. How did you feel when you found out I had asked Pianoman to keep an eye on you?”

“Orders are orders, sir.”

“Chuuya.”

The new year had begun with a soft layer of snow; Chuuya tried to recall if he had ever stuck his tongue out to taste it. “Stupid.”

“And when you found out you had been too late to save your squad,” the man continued, hands behind his back, step after step. “When Beatrice put you under the effect of her Ability? When the Wild Geese Orphanage got attacked? When Yuan —”

“Stupid,” He bit down his snarl a moment too late — the rustiness tightened his grip on the glass, calling Mori’s vacant gaze on him. Chuuya stared at the floor. “Angry.”

“Why?”

He almost shrugged again.

Mori noticed — he smiled. “Caring is not something to be ashamed of, you know?”

It wasn't hard not to doubt it, out of his lips — Chuuya had seen it on the stubbornly loyal face of every subordinate unwilling to murmur about revolution. Mori's men were tied by more than fear — he wouldn't have sinned by calling a man in that crimson scarf gentle; but his presence was not the terror in the Mafia's alleys.

How unstrategic, something whispered in his ear. Verlaine's picture, gathering dust in the bottom drawer of a foolish officer. How are you meant to keep what you aren't willing to bleed out?

"There's a point to what I'm saying," Mori promised. "I'd like you to reach it on your own. Tell me this — what do all the people whose losses you've suffered have in common?"

Chuuya sank back into his seat, resisting the urge to cross his legs. He tried to think the way he saw Mori do — tried to hold his breath and calmly roam his eyes through invisible lines, like Dazai did when they had no time to plan out.

He thought of the Sheep's safe house, with the blanket-forts and the nights he had spent playing guard — until it hadn't been a game anymore. The haze of the Old World when the only clients left were too tired to be drunk, and the Flags' rumbles of victory were the only thing around. The feeling of the asphalt when the races landed him on the ground — still laughing, nonetheless.

Warmth, he thought. "Protection."

"They protected you?" He nodded, frowning. "They protected you, so you considered them yours. Until they were taken from you."

Hoarder.

Chuuya fought against that construction of words — the shaping of something that hadn't felt quite so selfish, when deep in his chest. "It's not about being robbed," he tried to explain. "It's about not giving them what I owed."

"Debt," Mori spelled out, bathed in silver.

"Yeah."

He watched him take a few steps — wander aimlessly, pensive. The Boss always looked somewhat unbalanced when Elise was not around — like he had given her too much, and then allowed her to hide it in whatever part of his skeleton she took refuge in when unneeded.

If you were like her, Dazai had asked, once, when there were still braces in his teeth, when would you choose to disappear?

Never, jerk, he had replied. But she's only gone when Mori doesn't need her, isn't she?

He had looked at him for a while, after.

"Chuuya," Mori called, squinting at some indefinite dot behind the snow-lined windows — one of the other Towers, perhaps; the sea that held their dead. "If you had a thorn in your side, and it was tearing you from the inside out — would you care if the one to extract it was the one who put it there?”

A blink; then another. The wine had turned just the right kind of warm on his tongue; Chuuya tilted his head to the side. Rich men speak in metaphors, Yuan had said, once. That’s how you know they want you to give them an answer.

“I think,” he dared, eventually, “That I’d just want the damn thorn out.”

Mori’s smile was slow to bloom, this time. “Yes,” he agreed. His desk was full of documents; Chuuya had only managed to read the beginning of a double Mi — kanji before the man had opened the doors. “That’s what I believe, too.”

He met his grin with a friendly expression of his own — a confused attempt at it, at least; the question of why there had been a need to talk about regrets to mention thorns.

“Sir —“ he attempted.

A bullet pierced through the glass, wrecking a hole through Mori’s forehead — one temple to the other.

“Chuuya?” a voice called, somewhere behind the rush in his ears — Chuuya was standing, he registered, was cracking the tiles under his feet, a curse out of his mouth — “Chuuya, is everything —“

Raw bones settled around his upper arms — the little shreds of flesh still attached to them dangling with a nauseating squelch. Chuuya settled his eyes on the destroyed face looking down at him, ruined muscles tensing in concern — and when he breathed in the copper-flavored air, only Mori was standing in front of him.

“Chuuya,” the man called, again. His eyes wore concern over liquified curiosity; he looked down, and saw no cracks on the floor. No glass webs on the window. “Is everything alright?”

Clouds covered the moon; the candid glint washing the man’s office disappeared, leaving them in an uncannily vivid darkness.

“Yes,” he said, as if his voice wasn’t his own. “Yes, I — Yes, sir.” He cleared his voice, taking a step back — watched the man’s hands fall, unprompted, offering him space he wouldn’t ask for. The smell of blood was stuck to his nose. Graves, at the very least, did not make it linger.

The moon, he mused. Verlaine had written a page on that too; Rimbaud had never answered. He hummed, just to keep that train of thought in the same road. What about the — ]

---

Three hours after an assassin — the third, since January had rolled in; the fourteenth in total — was executed, Chuuya sunk his knuckles in the newbie from Ace's fighting rings' face, and when he raised his head, he met Hamamoto's eyes.

"Betting on you, sir!" the man yelled, from the bruising crowd — barely understandable, given the chaos echoing off the walls of the underground bar. "Try not to lose me the paycheck!"

Chuuya raised both middle fingers.

His adversary attempted to crash him into the ground by the knees, kicking around him in a death grip — he buried an unmerciful heel in his thigh, and focused on the shriek out of his mouth, instead of on the neon lights on the ceiling.

Hirotsu had a tendency to describe his visits to the fighting rings as power trips. Chuuya knew that the men and women on the training grounds would have been more of a challenge; there would have been more tactic in the flagging of their limbs — a blood-thirstiness that the Mafia refined like a paycheck.

He was also aware — as per his explanations to the Commander — that sparring with men whose backs had developed a Pavlovian response to his presence wouldn't match the thrill of fighting with the underground who wanted Double Black dead.

I always win either way, he had shrugged. It had seemed like a good day; one where the man's eye wouldn't squint behind his monocle to ask, is it blood you're looking for, then?, with that pensive air of his. Might as well break the nose of someone who tried to put a bomb under my car.

Hirotsu had made a face. Please don't break Dazai's nose.

"You know, I've definitely heard some of the Executive's girls talk about your thighs before," Hamamoto welcomed him, when he dropped on the table he had managed to claim. "Didn't think I'd have to take it literally."

"Hilarious," Chuuya said, making a face at the taste of the beer some over-excited bettor had bought him. Two new fighters were sizing each other up on the ring; he slipped his arms through the holes of his shirt. "'Got your money?'"

"Despite those stingy fuckers!" He waved the cash in his face. "How many rounds have you even played? I've caught some of them using bucks as tissues, with how much you won them."

He squinted, thinking about it. "Eight?"

"Yesterday's stakeout wasn't enough?"

“Missions are missions,” Chuuya waved the words away. The stakeout had lasted sixteen hours in total; most of the Guerrilla had been ordered to lay low and wait, while he tickled the sleeping dragon — namely, the secret hideout of six Ability Users who had recently escaped a yakuza group from Tokyo.

Only one of them had refused to be convinced to anchor himself to a new name. The other six had tired themselves out against gravity, before deciding the Mafia sounded more appealing than breathing through crushed lungs.

Hamamoto scoffed, leaning so far back into his seat Chuuya saw him on the ground — an habit no amount of nape-slaps from X ever erased. “Are you aware that only three people in the entire bar bet against you?”

“The underground develops brain cells, at last.”

“And one of those fools is not even around. They said he just opened a — permanent bet-tab of sorts, against you? Sucks to be him. You must be draining his account.”

“Doubt that,” Chuuya scoffed, licking his teeth in irritation as he downed the beer in a single gulp. Disgusting. “You ever read an Executive’s paycheck? Whatever number you’re thinking — double it. No, triple it. Worse.”

Confusion bloomed in Hamamoto’s face — it was short-lived, though; quickly drowned by the neon lights and the whistles of the crowd, as his lips turned downward. “Ah,” he offered, failing to sound blank. “Executive Dazai?”

He grunted. “Who the fuck else.”

Hamamoto inhaled. Didn’t add anything.

Chuuya did it in his stead. “Son of a bitch acting as if I couldn’t fold him in a half — as if I haven’t? He’s been spreading voices about stuff I supposedly did to the most brick-built bastards in the entire city — as if that’s supposed to make them able to beat me? He told Skull Dude — You know, that psycho from the Hounds? He told him I keyed his car. I don’t fucking key cars,” A pause. “Well, not anymore. But that’s irrelevant —“

“Doesn’t it bother you, sir?”

“Huh?” He blinked. “Of course. That’s the whole point, I’m assuming.”

“No,” Hamamoto clarified, landing his chair on the ground. “I meant — Dazai. Isn’t it hard? Being disrespected?”

Chuuya felt his eyebrow curl out of its own accord. “I believe being disrespected would be aggravating coming from anyone. Executive Dazai is certainly included.”

The subordinate took the jab with a simple pause. Clearly too fired up with having managed to bring the topic onto the table, he insisted: “I’m just saying, sir —“

“I know what you’re saying.”

“It’s admirable, truly — he’s your partner. No one is as aware of his motivations as you are, I understand — but there are things he might be hiding from you, too.”

“Yeah,” he agreed, sliding down his chair until his nape was pressed against the edge of the backrest. His shoulder burned; the first woman he had sparred with had almost managed to pull it out of the socket. “Like where the fuck he put my reports from last week.”

“Sir.”

His tone warped some indistinct bundle of muscle — he couldn’t place it; he only felt it creak against his bones. Flame to the moths, he thought, what’s the opposite?

“There was another assassination attempt while we were gone,” Hamamoto hissed. His eyes would have been frantic, had he felt any desire to meet them. “You know what the asshole did? Got herself shot by a Lizard and crawled all the way to Dazai’s office to die in front of his door. Marie has heard — there’s a whole wing trying to find a way to organize a secret meeting of sorts —“

“Let’s hope they offer Executive Dazai a ticket. If we catch him in his own net, maybe Boss will let me strangle him for real this time. A good enough revenge for the girls sagging my phone to demand I convince him to date them,” A sigh. “But how the fuck do I find my reports, then?”

“How can you take this so lightly?” the man snapped, finally. “After all that he’s —“

“Hamamoto,” Chuuya cut through, blank gaze on some leaking pipe on the ceiling. He thought of the executions in the garden — the last time someone had mentioned the Nine Rings and Kouyou’s name in the same sentence. “I really do like you. You’re fun. A great shot, too. Do try not to be a fucking moron.”

Silence answered him.

Inside the fighting ring, a bone got broken. The crowd cheered; banknotes flew out of too impulsive hands. Chuuya grabbed the one floating closer, rolling it up and hiding it in his belt hoop — Sheep style.

“I came on Executive Kouyou’s orders,” Hamamoto said, eventually, barrenly. “She asked to meet you at the Intelligence quarters.”

Chuuya’s head snapped up. He slapped the man’s nape, if only to watch him curse out in a familiar — less dangerous — way. “Dude, what the — Maybe mention that a bit sooner?”

Kouyou’s You’re-Grounded sandal wasn’t beating the ground rhythmically yet, when Chuuya managed to turn the corner of the fifty-seventh floor of Building Two — but only barely so. She took his disheveled appearance in and scrunched her nose up.

“Tell me you weren’t rolling around in the dirt with the enemy again,” she sighed.

“Tell your subordinates to stop calling me sir when they land one on me,” Chuuya tucked his shirt into his pants as quickly as possible. He left the waistcoat open; fixed the harness until it wasn't choking the air out of his lungs and pressed: "Well? Why are we here?"

The metal doors that signaled the start of the Intelligence quarters opened — a grey-haired woman Chuuya remembered handing his reports to, in the past, was quick to bow. "Executives."

"Is he free yet?" Kouyou questioned.

"Not quite," she admitted. She glanced at them; cleared her throat. "But I'm sure he'll make time for your requests. Please, follow me."

Chuuya had never given much thought to what the Intelligence quarters would look like — rows and rows of computers, perhaps, framed by floor-to-ceiling libraries and people wearing glasses; all of it cocooned by a distinctive smell of drying ink and recyclable paper.

The reality wasn't much different. The woman led them through desks over desks of distressed mafiosi, their crooked spines and attentive eyes exorcising any form of disarray. Most of them spared a bowed head to Kouyou; Chuuya met the eyes of a particularly tired man, scribbling something on a file dubbed as Double Black — and had to clear his throat against the open animosity foaming at the subordinate's mouth.

"Was the trip any good to that subordinate of yours? The feisty one?"

"Hamamoto?" Chuuya frowned. "What do you mean by feisty?"

"I had to give him something to do, or he might have set fire to the demon's office," Kouyou kept her eyes forward and the tilt of her mouth serene — her words of little importance to any distracted glance. "You heard about the attempt?" He nodded. "Dazai had no further reaction than whining about the blood on his door. Hamamoto seemed ready to do something — unwise."

"He's not that crazy," Chuuya insisted, hands in his pockets. "Just — very loyal. Boss kept him alive despite the executions during the Nine Rings mess, with the people contesting our reign — he's grateful. With the way the bastard has been acting —"

"Loyalty is a powerful thing, Chuuya," the woman reminded him. The golden pearls of her kanzashi dangled with every step. Chuuya recalled being fifteen, sitting in a corner — watching her clean blood off the spot he had bitten in his effort to escape her grasp. "A treacherous one, too."

He stared at the ground.

"You care a lot about the men under your command. I understand. But the demon is one of Mori's Executives — an attack against him is an attack against all we represent."

Chuuya squinted at her. "So what?"

"So," she insisted, posed, "If Hamamoto keeps stepping out of line —"

She trailed off.

Realization struck him like a blow from the stronger adversaries at the fighting ring; he bit back a disbelieving laugh. “I’m not punishing a good man for the sake of that bastard and his crazy plans,” he spluttered. “He put himself into this mess, you know? He can deal with the assassinations and —“

“Chuuya,” Kouyou tutted. “Far from me to remind you, but he is, technically, your superior —“

“He’s my partner,” he reminded her. “And — you don’t even like Dazai, anyway,” The words felt stupid on his own tongue; a stubborn clinging to a truth too complex to be grasped — memories of watching her study his frame with something in her eyes, and then refusing to look back on it again.

“Neither do you,” she sighed; a distant, bitten note of fondness in it. “And look at us.”

“Here we are,” their guide said, pushing the last door open. “Executives.”

She left in a hurry. Chuuya barely had time to take the most hidden room of the Intelligence quarters in — dusty bookshelves everywhere he could look, towering upon a mahogany desk absolutely flooded in documents; an absurd lack of windows as far as he could search — that the only man occupying it snapped, eyes still on his papers: “I said, I wish not to be disturbed —“

“Have you had any luck with the research I asked of you, Sakaguchi?” Kouyou asked, smiling.

The man’s seat screeched in his hurry to raise his eyes on them. He stood, eyes wide behind round glasses, and bowed. “I, ah, — my apologies, Executive Kouyou. Vice-Executive Nakahara —“

“Chuuya’s fine.”

The wince hitting his shoulders told him he shouldn’t expect the nominative any time soon. “Between the Cleanse and the recruitment process — my apologies.”

“Nothing to worry about,” she assured. “As long as you have good news for me?”

Chuuya nodded. ““Sup, Glasses.””

A hint of irritation flashed behind his lens; given that Sakaguchi Ango had made the willing choice to befriend Dazai, it was expectedly quick to disappear. “You’re here for the Ability User you believe the Division might have hired to sabotage Plan The Courier, correct?”

“Found anything on half moon marks and people flipping out?” Chuuya asked, dropping on the closest of the two — horribly uncomfortable; perhaps, he considered, as a willing technique to keep visitors fast and ready to leave — guest seats, as he pulled Kouyou’s own back for her.

“Not quite,” Sakaguchi admitted, searching for some specific dossier underneath his desk, as Kouyou laid her umbrella next to her chair — always in her interlocutor’s visual. “We received word from our men's autopsy — since we had no access to the actress' body, we focused on the one Nakahara and Akutagawa found in the alley, and the men from Kajii' team — for similarities."

"And?"

"Their wounds match. Not in dimensions or shape — but in purpose."

Kouyou frowned, eyes on the photographs the man was spreading on his desk — rotting corpses under white lights, wounds already grown grey. "Purpose?"

The man fixed his glasses. "They were all trying to kill themselves."

An awkward sort of silence cocooned them. After waiting a few moments — for dramatic effect, Chuuya assumed, because there were only so many differences Dazai and his friends could have — Sakaguchi continued: "Kajii's men were killed by his bombs, yes.

Nonetheless, the signs on their bodies show a struggle that was self inflicted — as if they were trying to rip their own flesh off."

"So the Ability, whatever it is," Kouyou concluded, "It's supposed to cause a — feral state, of sorts?"

"How does that relate to the moon mark?" Chuuya asked. "Is that just a sign that the Ability is influencing them? Why would it stay after they're dead, then?"

"It's complicated," the man sighed. He extracted a specific paper from his file; passed it to them. "See this? His name is Ueda Akinari."

From a strangely aware corner of his brain, he saw Kouyou's eyes roam down the scarcely filled information page of the Ability User — a man not older than thirty, with hair so black they seemed blue, and an assortment of corsets and trinkets shaping into something like clothes.

Chuuya tried to focus as well. The sight of the woman's bare skull, dripping fresh blood and viscid brains and ripped flesh right onto the paper made him pause.

"We only gathered data on him recently," the man continued, unaware of the single strands of red hair dangling on his careful ink, swarmed by flies. "Some of the recruits talked about him as an underground secret of sorts. We don't even know what his Ability is called — only that, supposedly, it targets people who are..."

Kouyou's skull moved — her tongue blue and ashy, blood seeping from what had been lips, once; and was now a single path of frail skin all the way to the throat someone had torn apart. "Who are what?"

He felt something too liquid — something sticky — inside his gloves, and he knew —

The archivist said: "Particularly receptive to past grievances, let's say."

The woman froze.

Chuuya cleared his throat — again and again, until the air in his lungs tasted less rotten, and there was no decay in the corner of his gaze. “What’s that supposed to mean? What does this guy do?”

Sakaguchi took the paper back; frowned at it, clearly aggravated by his lack of answers. “The most sensible theory, that we haven’t proved — is that his Ability sort of works like Q’s.”

With an hesitant voice, Kouyou wondered: “Hallucinations?”

“Something deeper,” He shook his head. “Q can manipulate the way someone perceives reality — Make them think the people around them are enemies. According to the recruits, Ueda might go as far as to steal material for his visions from his victim’s psyche.”

“And that’s why they kill themselves?”

A shrug. “I’m assuming there are stages to it. If guilt is truly to be taken into account — well. I’ve seen less deadly things send stronger men into an early grave.”

The contemplative silence lasted less, this time. “And the half moon mark?” Chuuya asked.

“That’s the thing,” Sakaguchi said. “The stories and the wounds match — but the recruits who have met him or his victims swear the Ability left no visible signs. It was part of his power — no one but the person could notice what was going on, and in most cases, they feared saying so.”

Chuuya thought of olive green bathrooms. “Why fear?”

“It seems talking about the visions worsens the condition exponentially,” over his slow tone, Kouyou’s fingers closed around the handle of her umbrella. “That is — if it is Ueda Akinari’s Ability. As I said, the mark makes no sense.”

“What if —” He squinted; thought back to what he had assumed was a tattoo on Lippman’s sister’s neck. “Could it be two Abilities?”

The sound of Sakaguchi’s pen scribbling paused, right as Kouyou quickly turned to stare at him. “What?”

“You know,” Chuuya insisted, embarrassed by the sudden attention — then, speaking more forcefully because of it. “Like during the Nine Rings Conflict? Two Abilities on the same body. Maybe the moon is a mark for someone’s else’s influence, and it does — something.”

“Very eloquent,” Sakaguchi blinked.

“You wanna fight or —“

“Spreading,” Kouyou murmured, pensive. She set her eyes on the archivist. “Do we have any idea of how Ueda’s Ability spreads? It can’t be just by coming into contact with him. How would it have managed to hit the entirety of Kajii’s squad in one go?”

Understanding crowded behind the man's glasses, along to something slightly less appreciative — something Chuuya didn't manage to catch, before Sakaguchi's eyes were on the documents on his desk again, hands searching. "It could," he said, under his breath, "It could be an Epidemic level Ability. Something to make sure it has a wider reach — a way to slow the organization down."

"Especially right now," Chuuya continued. "With the last steps of the Cleanse and with the recruitment, and the whole revolution bullshit — a destructive Ability spreading so easily could be a real issue."

The windowless room felt suffocating, all of the sudden — soaked to the bone by the turning gears in the archivist's brain. Chuuya stuck a finger under his glove.

It came back red.

"Chuuya," the woman said, eventually. "I'd like you to go talk to Q."

"You think they know something about this man?"

"They did spend some time in places the worst Ability Users flock to like moths," Kouyou explained. "Maybe they've heard whispers, if their Abilities are so similar — it could tell us something about whoever they might be collaborating with."

"Moon mark," Sakaguchi was muttering, on his feet, searching through the bookshelves with a humiliating skip in his steps. "Moon mark, moon —"

"You're not coming?" Chuuya asked.

"No," He thought he wasn't supposed to notice the lightning-quick glance she threw to a corner of the office — a lingering gaze, forcefully removed and laid on the documents again. "I will try and see if the Kyouka family can help me. They know more about Rogue Users than I do. They may be refusing to give up on their freelance state — but perhaps a collaboration well done might convince them to give up on their hesitation."

Chuuya gulped back the question on the tip of his lips — pretended not to see the knowing gaze she dragged up and down his body. Calming breaths pressed against his teeth — he told himself to hum where Glasses couldn't watch him descend into unavoidable madness.

"We will talk," Kouyou offered. Her smile was her best attempt at encouragement — the bitter corners of it spoke of a sense of déjàvu. The two of them; hands tied again. "It will be fine."

He laid his gaze elsewhere before he dared to nod. "Of course, Ane-san."

---

Of all the mafiosi Chuuya could have bumped against on his hurried way out of the Intelligence quarters — it was the least likely of them to almost step on his foot.

“What are you doing here, Curry?” Chuuya said, eyebrows bruising his hairline.

Oda Sakunosuke blinked. “It’s you.”

For unexplainable reasons — perhaps depending on the memories of their last and only meeting; curling around the cramped need to be grateful Chuuya’s healing scars felt, and the lack of trust he was able to offer to that man — the words made him stiffen.

From the little he had seen, Oda sometimes gave off the impression of a stray cat — most times he had managed to bump into him, despite Dazai’s best efforts, judgemental had always seemed too strong of a word for the honest flatness of his eyes, completely devoid of interest.

Nevertheless — Chuuya knew the man was always observing all of them.

“I had some documents to bring over to the archivists,” the man explained. His hands dangled next to the pockets of his coat; Chuuya got the feeling weapons should have been there, between his fingers. “Mind if we share the elevator?”

He didn’t have a good enough reason to say no; didn’t care quite enough to do it either. “After you.”

Too quiet, he considered, listening to his steps. Assassins’ feet — too light for a sniper, too heavy for a spy. A tad too good at pretending he didn’t care about every moving inch of the world around him. A tad too innocent, for a man who had been knocking on the chosen walls of Dazai’s reclusion — closer than any of them could reach.

“You might want to know,” Oda said, once they passed the fiftieth floor, standing resolutely in front of the elevator’s glass doors. “Dazai asked us to egg your bike, the other night. I believe he might attempt to do it again.”

His teeth creaked against each other.

So endlessly awkward Chuuya had — for his own sanity — to believe that the absolute lack of awareness on his face was genuine, Odasaku added: “I believed you might not appreciate the idea.”

“You’re the smart one, ain’t you,” Chuuya commented, voice dull.

“Don’t take it to heart,” Oda specified, a beat later. “He once begged me to lock Ango in the tiger cage at the Zoo and throw away the key. I’m pretty sure it’s how he shows appreciation.”

He retched, holding onto his mouth.

Like it was nothing more than a judgement on the weather behind the glass, the man studied him and concluded: “You two really have issues with verbalization.”

“We, ” Chuuya pointed out, “Have no shared issues,” The doors dinged; the moment they opened, he breathed in a less socially inept oxygen. “Thank you for the ride, Coat. Go find your other two lost bears. Be mindful of golden curls trying to steal your bed and soup.”

Oda blinked. “I — wasn't that a fairytale?”

“See? Told you — smart one. See you the next time his esteemed Demon Prodiginess deems it acceptable.”

Chuuya was already halfway down the stairs of the entrance, scrolling down half-drunk emails from the Guerrilla — when the man's voice broke the traffic-lined silence again.

“That's a lot of phone charms.”

He dangled his phone by a good half of them, barely looking back to curl his eyebrow in his direction. “Yeah.”

“That Officer,” Oda asked, then. Chuuya stiffened. “The one that directed the raid the other morning.”

“You were there?” Chuuya tried to keep the mistrust out of his voice; he thought he might have failed.

“Commission.”

“Ah, ” He frowned. “What about him?”

“I've seen him around our territory more often, these last few months,” Oda explained. “He's been gathering eyewitnesses from most of the local neighborhoods.”

“Matsuda has big ideas and a small nose,” He shrugged, noncommittal — because it sounded better on his tired ears than, Matsuda is ready to sell anyone out for an ideal. “Perfect for snooping around. I've warned him off his investigations more often than not. If he's smart, and if he holds his life to any regard — he'll listen to me.”

“And if he doesn't?”

Borderlining exasperation, he turned.

Worms crawled out of the bleeding caves of Oda Sakunosuke's eyes, gathering at the edge of his concrete-colored lips and the dirt-crimson hole in the middle of his throat — a crater that began there and ended somewhere on his waist, showing off munched-on ribs and falling organs.

“Vice-Executive?” the corpse called.

He cleared his throat — settled his eyes somewhere over the man's decaying shoulder, blinking. "If he doesn't, standard Mafia procedure will begin. What else?"

"You seem to know him."

"He probably aspires to be as good of a samaritan as you are with your orphans," Chuuya replied. He dared one glance more; wondered just how real the smell of rotting in his nostrils could be. "Fails at it, clearly. Unless you've got plans to sell that brats of yours out to —" He clenched his jaw, shocked by himself. "Doesn't matter."

He could feel the man's gaze on him — a different kind of skin-deep attention than he had been granted during the Dragon Head Conflict. He knew more about him than Chuuya did about the untouchable mask on his face; the idea made the leather of his gloves creak.

"Either way," Oda said, his grey tongue swarmed by mindlessly hungry flies. "I hope you won't have to kill your friend, Vice-Executive."

"A paragon of manners," he complimented, aware there wasn't a real reason for his bitterness — aware that he had sat near dirtier dead, and yet was keeping his eyes on the sky for the talking one in front of him. "Bet the bastard would kill you if you dared to refer to him as Executive."

I only care about the ones I can save, he had said.

Chuuya hadn't cared — except for the split second where he had. He thought, if he focused, that he could overhear Sakaguchi's bored voice, at the end of a shift — Dazai's laughter, as unstrained as it never was. Could see the eyes he always laid on those friends of his — human.

"I don't know," the man offered. "Better than Demon Prodigy, I'm assuming."

"As if it's not true?"

"You don't say it like it is."

He jeered.

Cockroaches were climbing out of the man's shoes, making their way to his drenched own. He wanted to take a step back; wanted to give a final, merciful hit to the ghost in front of him. He set his eyes on the street lights; tried to pretend he couldn't recognize the faces of the corpses he saw hanging by the neck from them.

He wondered if Oda Sakunosuke knew — if he was cunning all the way to his heart, enough to see the bone deep devotion shattering Dazai's face into unsharp pieces at the mere mention of his name. If he took pride in it; in being the resident Mafia jewel's most focused reflection in the water — untouched by ripples of a soul-sick coldness he wore with deadly precision.

Unfair; Chuuya thought, sometimes, when his graves were more silent than usual to his aimless stories for them. Unfair. Unfair. I had a family too.

“He’s no prodigy,” he mocked.

“And demon?”

“A piece of shit,” Chuuya snapped. No way he doesn’t want something from him, Kouyou had mused, about Oda, once. He had thought about the delicate quality of his motions around Dazai’s frame; the understanding drooling down his face when he looked at him. “An insufferable, know it all, annoying piece of crap. That’s what he is.”

Oda studied him some more. He stared at him until the colors blurred; until the sick color of his skin returned to a pale kind of lividity — something breathing. He could still hear Dazai laugh — he wondered if he would have pretended to care, at the very least, if he’d seen his best friend bleed.

“Alright,” he concluded. Like Judgement Day, he thought — like having failed it. “Have a good day, then, Vice Executive.”

“Yeah,” Chuuya turned again, willing himself not to follow the escaping cockroaches on the ground, all the way to the dead suburbs of the city. Blood dripped from the lifeless feet of one of the hanging bodies; he felt it land on his forehead, and dig. “You too, Odasaku.”

It was the second — and the last, as far as the stars knew — conversation they ever shared.

---

...

---

“Q,” Chuuya called, arms crossed, refusing to move from the wall he was leaning on. “Stop that, or I’m telling the guards.”

The child offered him their dirtiest glance — and, promptly, they continued to munch on the bars of the only window their little cell offered.

The square was a good distance from the floor; to reach it, Q had mounted an assortment of their bed, an absurd number of pillows that could not have been there from the beginning, and pieces of dried blood stuck to the wall — handholds of sorts. Chuuya didn’t know why they had gone through the effort. The window didn’t even face the outside; the cell was too secure for that.

“I told you already, nii-san, ” Q whined, still tight in their monkey grasp. “I don’t know this guy at all. Not all Ability Users know each other, you know.”

“That’s not my question anymore, I told you,” he replied, sinking a bit down the wall. “I’m saying — your Abilities are similar, allegedly. You could help me understand what the reasoning behind his attacks is.”

“You said,” the child accused, “That he attacks people whose guilt he can use.”

“Grief. Yeah. But how does he know that?”

Q blinked, very slow, eyes wide and oddly shaped. Then, noncommittal, they shrugged.

He took a deep breath. “How do you decide who to bump against?”

“Boss says so,” They nodded, brightening with the knowledge of a correct answer. “I do what Boss says. Boss says to stay here — so I stay here. Even if the guards are mean.”

Chuuya paused.

Despite the new trail of theories — collaboration between two Ability Users among them — no answers had yet been offered to their prodding, and no half-moon maker had yet been found among the whispers of the underground. The possibility of a mastermind from the shadows wasn’t improbable — the question of how they selected their victims still stood.

Q’s feet dangled from where they were hanging. They’d hardly grown an inch since Chuuya had first met them. They were always too much — too pale, too tiny, too bloodthirsty; too saddened by themselves.

“Alright,” He stood and stalked forward — held on to the sides of Q’s body, despite their yelp, pulling them off. “Let’s do this a bit differently.”

“Hey — oh!” Their protests faded into something more of a giggle, as Chuuya wrapped an arm around their middle and raised Q at eye level from their armpits. “That’s — help!” The giggles grew more firm; by the time Chuuya was twirling them around in a makeshift dance — something he’d seen Dazai humor them with since forever — they were laughing.

There was no music; if he focused, he could hear the distant roar of drills. It didn’t seem to matter to Q; they kicked their feet again, bumping against his knees with something less malicious — they grinned.

““Calmed down yet?” Chuuya muttered, making sure the hold wouldn’t press on the bandages around the kid’s arm. “Let’s put it like this, then — how do you decide who’s most likely to cause more damage with your Ability?”

Q blinked — once, twice. “That’s easy.”

“Do tell.”

“They’re all —” They hummed; spread their arms. “They kind of look like you.”

The invisible soundtrack his feet had been dancing to slowed down to a halt.

“Not like you,” Q added, unconcerned, nesting their cheek between his shoulder and neck. Their skin was always clammy. “You’re pretty. And your eyes are weird. Like mine, kinda. But they’re like you — very strong. They’re the threat.”

“Oh,” Chuuya frowned. “You just pick the biggest fish?”

“I know they have ghosts,” Q insisted. “I have them too. We walk the same way.”

“Ghosts.”

“Yes. I can see them,” In a show of agility, they let go of him with one hand — tapping under their star-shaped eye. “It’s like a cloud. Boss says I don’t really see it, but I do. People with ghosts are much easier to use. They already see things that aren’t there.”

He set Q on the ground.

They protested: “What did I do wrong?”

“Nothing,” Chuuya said, distantly. January had been cold all around — he stared at the shut door, and reminded himself he had never been claustrophobic a day in his life. “I — You didn’t do anything wrong. But you better not be lying about not knowing anything else about this guy.”

“I’m not lying,” The kid stomped his foot. Then, a bit more tentative: “But I could help you look, if you want.”

Chuuya momentarily let go of the bundle of things in his chest to stare them down. “Q.”

Their face fell. “I know.”

“Can you look me in the eyes and tell me that, if we let you free, you won’t cause troubles?” he insisted. Silence answered him — the child kept their gaze to the naked ground. “You’re part of the syndicate. It’s not like Boss enjoys keeping you here.”

“You guys have caused troubles too,” Q murmured, pulling at the edges of their bandages. “Why am I the only one that’s locked up?”

Because you enjoyed it, Chuuya almost said. Because I saw you smile while they died. Because Boss said so. Because you’re —

“Different,” he concluded. “It’s different.”

“It’s unfair!” they protested. “I helped you. I told you what I know. What do I get out of it?”

“An hour of playtime with Elise, maybe,” Chuuya said, knocking the usual signal on the door. The persistent need to leave that room was all but unfamiliar; the urge to sit on Koda’s grave was a bit louder. “I’ll talk with Boss — try to make it two. If you stop attacking the guards, I can make it three, but you need to collaborate —“

“Chuuya —“

“Chuuya,” Hirotsu’s voice washed over the hellish creak of the door — a man in uniform was very careful not to brush either of their shoulders as he surged into the room, grasping Q right before they could attempt to cling to the back of his coat. “Are we done here?”

“Unfortunately,” he confirmed, making his way down the hallway. Q’s screeches grew more and more distant — louder, too. His own name disappeared amongst desperate prayers and insults. “Nothing new. Almost.”

“Almost?”

“Yeah. Give me a second.”

They turned the corner. Chuuya wrapped his hands around the waiting General’s collar — crashing him so violently against the other wall, he heard it crack near the center.

“Listen to me very carefully,” he warned, low, pressing until his nose was brushing the man’s own.

“Sir,” he attempted.

“Listen,” Chuuya snapped. He could feel his body stiffen under his own — not shaking, either a matter of pride or some spine; but petrified in a way that meant he knew exactly who Chuuya was. “Not a visit goes by without the brat telling me your men treat them like shit. I was inclined to believe them to be whines — now I’m tired.”

Protest crowded on his face. “Orders are — the Ability User must be reigned in at all costs —“

“They’re nine,” he snarled. “And they don’t have a way to activate their Ability. You’re telling me your best men can’t fucking handle a brat that stopped wearing diapers seven minutes ago with no violence?”

“No, sir.”

“I didn’t quite hear that.”

“No, sir,” the General repeated. A bead of sweat rolled down his temple — Chuuya only saw it because of its reddish reflection, stained by the glow he hadn’t even realized he was wearing. “I will — I’ll talk with the men. We will make sure to be gentler.”

“Do that,” Chuuya confirmed, pushing himself off — watching the man half slide down the wall in return. “If I hear complaints from them again, I’ll make sure to tell Mori a new holding cell would be a wonderful idea for the new year.” He curled an eyebrow. “That would be terrible for your reputation with the Black Market, right?”

The man clenched his jaw.

They left him there.

The only reason he turned to look at him, mere steps from the exit, was a blow of wind. When he saw him bloodied and destroyed from the inside, wretched on the floor like a melted candle — Chuuya did nothing but breathe.

---

...

---

“Psst,” a voice over his body whispered. The slumber fixed to his bones made it sound miles and miles away. “Psst. Chuuya. Chuuya. Chuuya. Wake up. You need to help me bury a body.”

“Go ‘way,” he mumbled, vaguely.

He burrowed his face deep into the padded fabric of his futon, eyes forcibly shut. The world was a blur; vaguely, he could remember not having had time to sleep in a good two days. Everything was warmer than it had been in a while; Chuuya let it wash over him like melted concrete, waiting for it to solidify over his muscles.

Then, he registered.

“What?” he snapped, pushing Dazai — a creepy, nightmarish sight; eye bright like a demon’s and on all fours over his resting body — off hard enough for him to land against the wall. “Bury it yourself! Why the fuck are you asking me!”

“But it’s so much work,” he whined.

Grabbing a pillow from Albatross’ bed, he slammed it on his face.

“Hey!” Dazai’s eye was black and swollen — it hadn’t been the pillow, but he prepared himself to be blamed for it anyway. “Bad dog!”

He flopped back into his futon. “You’ve got ten seconds to leave, before I turn your spine into a yo-yo,” Chuuya let him know, voice muffled by the pillow.

“It’s not like there aren’t a thousand places I would rather be than here,” the replied.

“Nine.”

“Unfortunately, someone has to check on the dog — lest he accidentally chokes on his own drool as he sleeps —“

“Eight,” he groaned. “Seven.”

“Good job at the fighting ring, by the way! You’ve lost me a good amount of yen. Sucks that it was your money I bet, though.”

“Si — you did what?”

The spare pillow was thrown on his back. The impact was nearly nonexistent. “You useless slug. Help me bury a body.”

“No.”

“I heard you visited Q,” Dazai offered, undeterred — rolling on the floor; kicking stuff off shelves like a misbehaving cat. “How were they?”

“How do you even know all this stuff?”

“I know everything that concerns you,” the boy replied, easily waving the matter away. Chuuya peeked from underneath his pillow, studying the somehow irritating way his bandages had become the brightest thing in the moon-bathed room. In a deeply, horribly shameful pang — Chuuya realized he was wearing one of the shirts the boy had left behind. “And I’m head of security, so I’m aware of this stuff.”

He frowned — subtly hiding behind the blanket. “That’s a lie. You’re head of the Escape and Recruit Department, not security.”

“That too,” Dazai conceded. “And head strategist. And head of the backup. And of the executions — you’ve seen how that’s going.”

Chuuya’s lips curled around nothing — uncertain, and slightly uncomfortable with the twist in his gut. Not even Kouyou had more than one department; the secret Executive and Ace even mostly divided the training process.

Jealousy, he decided, searching through the viscera and the mocking breaths in the back of his skull. It had to be, because otherwise —

Silence.

It startled him. A cold bucket of water straight in the face; the most familiar burn an old stove in the house of a lifetime could give. The echoes in his skull were something he would never describe aloud, not at the risk of falling victim to empty-headed jokes — and yet there was no other way to put into words the abyss of nothing left between each particle of his body; suddenly held by no more than a less haunted blood.

The Guivre isn’t a god, Verlaine had written in his diaries. And neither is this Arahabaki I have heard of. They are merely codes — their words are nothing but ours, and we are nothing but them.

The issue is this: to convince them of it.

Dazai kept his eyes on his forehead, tracing lines from a scar Chuuya had gotten that morning — debris from a falling building. “Q was no use at all,” he said, eventually. “They’ve heard nothing of Ueda. Seemed pretty excited about him, though — maybe they could bond over all the mind control fuckery.”

“How mean,” Dazai mused. “Why are you so scared of a nine year old?”

“I’m not scared, jackass. Last I checked, you don’t enjoy spending time around them either.”

A hum; the feeling of a blunt nail, down a line wrinkles. “Yes, but at least I know why.”

And Chuuya — he didn’t need a reason. He looked at them and saw Koda’s hand tight around their smaller own; eyes absent and shoulders low. Do me a favor and don’t die. He looked at them and saw a kid sinking his teeth in cockroaches, and in the vomit they would cause him — a child haunted and used as far as the ghosts would concede; and then locked up again.

“Chuuya.”

“Hmm?”

“Why are you wearing your gloves?”

Chuuya didn’t want to be locked up again.

All-encompassing, he thought — that was the kind of feeling the unnatural silence strangled him with. “My fingers are cold.”

A pause. Weirdly, agonizingly not unkindly, Dazai tapped the center of his forehead — loud and purposeful; a reminder of the one thing that wasn’t fabric and wasn’t death that could make it all a bit more corporeal — and murmured: “That’s pathetic even for you.”

Chuuya basked in self-illusion — strived to convince himself of the nonexistence of venom in the deepest parts of his skeleton; begging him to tear the layers of Dazai’s mind apart with his own hands, until he could hammer the idea of Chuuya and safety close enough inside it he would never doubt their inevitable burrowment.

It had worked flawlessly with the Sheep; it had worked, until —

Make him trust you, the thing inside him has always insisted. Make him come close enough to kill.

He sighed, sitting up.

Dazai’s hand fell at his side; the absence of silence felt like the presence of it — overwhelming. “Fine,” he concluded. “Who did you murder by accident when you slipped on a banana peel?”

Pure, unfiltered contempt spread through Dazai’s face, faster than he could muffle it — it gave a distinctively childish curve to his mouth. Dazai was always too far to be reached —

Chuuya thought him stupid, still, for not assuming that he would find the same glee in being the thorn in his side as he did.

Sock-wearing feet roaming through the rooms of his apartment, as if they owned it, as if they could leave it whenever they wished — no bloody footprints on the crime scene; not for the Mafia's prodigy. Chuuya couldn't recall when he had started falling asleep in his bed.

"You'll be glad to know," Dazai replied, climbing to his feet. "He was already dead. We are merely returning him to his grave."

Hirotsu was waiting with one of the more inconspicuous Mafia vehicles — a black, enormous beast with a trunk big enough to hold bodies.

"If he's here, why am I coming?" Chuuya questioned, climbing onto the passenger seat — kicking the other boy away from it. "I get that he's like, a bazillion years old, but the Lizards regiment is widely appreciated. If he managed to carry your ass back from that time you got knocked out by the Hounds, he can carry a body."

"I didn't get knocked out by the Hounds," Dazai grunted, pettily, crawling on the backseats on all fours. Starting the car, Hirotsu winced at the sole-shaped dust stains left on the leather. "I was getting tortured for informational gain."

"Potato," Chuuya said. "Poh-tay-toh."

"For your information," Hirotsu said. "I'm not even fifty yet."

Dragging up the notebook some archivist had left on the floor, Dazai shoved it in between the front seats, offering wide eyes and a bad drawing of what was probably meant to be the Big Bang. "Did you witness this?" he asked.

The Commander ripped the page off — with the slightest of chances he would hang it on his fridge.

The car swerved through empty streets, as Dazai laid on his stomach on the backseats, kicking his feet in the air as he discussed executions for the next day on the phone. Flickering street lights flew by; occasional stray roamed the sidewalks, as the borderline soundless engine of the van lulled him into tempting slumber.

When the car clock ticked at 3:00 A.M, the Commander asked: "Are you alright, sir?"

Something like electricity curled around his shoulders. Chuuya threw a look at the rear view mirror, following Dazai's distracted eyes — felt the real, unexplainable need to jump out of the car.

"Dazai keeps falling asleep under the desk in my office," he rattled off, eventually. "The Intelligence seems to find seven new Ability Users every half an hour, and none of them are particularly enthusiastic about joining. I had to bring Elise to shop for underwear the other day and she asked me how to understand bra sizes," He offered Hirotsu his best blink. "And Kajii keeps waking up late for the funerals I have to drag him to."

“That seems stressful,” Hirotsu admitted.

“Standard procedure. How’s Miranda?”

“As lively as ever,” Then, swiftly: “Why do you keep showing up to every execution we put in place?”

Chuuya directed him his dirtiest glance.

The man stared back, undeterred.

“Dazai directs those, you know,” he insisted — familiarly casual, now that the Executive was too distracted to hear him. Privately, he sometimes wondered if Hirotsu had the same tendency to drop formality regarding Chuuya as well, when he wasn’t around. “You could refrain from worrying about it. It sure takes a lot of time out of your day, considering —“

He trailed off.

“Considering how many people we kill on a daily basis, lately?” Chuuya encouraged, scoffing. “That’s kind of the point, Gramps. ‘You missed Ace’s thirty minute speech on the, importance of showing compactness among our ranks, in these traitorous times — blah blah blah?’”

“Is that enough reason to check on Mori’s new guards every hour?”

“Well, someone —“

“And the training regime you’ve put up for the entire syndicate,” Hirotsu added. “Plastered on the training grounds’ wall with all of Executive Kouyou’s punctuality — even Gin was breathless by the end of it.”

Chuuya huffed. “The Flags’ training regime was way worse. I was going easy on them — and Mori told me I could —“

“Chuuya.”

The rusted gates of the Cemetery appeared in the distance; a bundle of that sight and of the ancient, carved touch of Hirotsu’s tone made him feel unbearably younger — paper thin; too thin for a body that was only his in blinks. He hated the feeling enough to sit up straighter, offering a look to the driver next to him.

Pointedly quiet, Hirotsu asked: “What is it, exactly, that you’re scared of?”

[He was eight years old the first time a Sheep died from something other than a battle wound.

Concept like sickness evaded Chuuya — it was a well known truth amongst the group, and a hopeful addition to the plans he could sometimes see in the older kid’s eyes. He was powerful and he was fearless and he was healthy — and when he saw Kazuo’s body on the ground, he didn’t get it.

“Like the bread,” he told Shirase, pulling the sleeve of his overgrown shirt.

He watched him blink with those big, slightly stupid eyes of him. They were always very warm — and he didn’t waste a second to drag him closer and whisper, with a nod towards Kazuo’s pale skin and the lines of vomit some of the kids were cleaning up: “He’s sick.”

It was his turn to blink. “And?”

“Momo thinks he will die.”

Chuuya frowned. “But there’s no red.”

“Blood,” Shirase reminded him. He spelled out the word a few times; made sure he learned it well. Sometimes he felt like that old blanket Yuan always clung to; tens and dozens of pieces of fabric sewn up together. Ugly, but made. “He didn’t get hit. He’s just dying. Natural causes.”

He didn’t quite understand. He didn’t ask. He detested the strange look the Sheep got when he was slow at grasping a concept — not pity, but something distinctly worried. A silent prayer, maybe — catch up, for our sake.

He spent Kazuo’s last two days at his makeshift bedside, night and day, only leaving to hunt for territory — a lonely search; but fun, sometimes, because the men’s faces were always a bit funny when they were terrified.

“Aren’t you sad?” he asked him.

Kazuo’s lips had long since lost all their vigor; the Sheep wetted them every once in a while, but they kept losing skin. Chuuya had proposed using the lip balm Yuan had stolen from a passing tourist — they hadn’t really listened.

“Sad?” he replied. “About what?”

He was the oldest of the group, at thirteen years old — and three months, he always added. The Council took his opinion very seriously. Chuuya suspected it was the reason why he was constantly out there stopping thieves and intruders. “Dying.”

“I don’t think that’s sad,” Kazuo answered, with all the severity of a quiet child. “I’m a bit scared, though.”

“Scared,” Chuuya echoed. A strange feeling; he had been explained its concept, and decided he didn’t much enjoy it — had decided not to tell the Sheep if he ever felt it. “Of what?”

“Being alone,” the boy said, after a fit of coughs. His eyes had a yellowish tone to them — pus and bubbles were spread on his skin like a particularly smelly sunburn. Chuuya ought to kill whoever had caused this to him, but none of the other kids were good at explaining it. “Don’t you think it’s scary?”

Chuuya thought there were scarier things — the face Katsuki made when a bullet grazed him; the moments when he was tired and he was hungry and the gravity didn’t answer as it should have, no matter the snow attempting to blow their safe house into pieces; having to guard the crater on the nights when it thundered. Sitting next to the smell Kazuo's decay emitted.

Chuuya thought there were scarier things, but he didn't tell him. It felt mean, when his lips were all chapped.

"Do me a favor," Kazuo told him.

"Yes?"

"Take care of them," he said. Mechanical and wet; Chuuya didn't know if his terror made sense, but he saw it in his eyes all the same. "And don't let them lose you."

The Sheep were all so complicated. Chuuya didn't think it could get any simpler than the sky and the ground and the red — blood. Care was a senseless idea; Chuuya would die for them. "Alright, Kazuo."

"And," A fit of coughing. "Another thing."

"Yes?"

"Stay with me," Kazuo laid his cheek on the blankets they had offered him — a chaotic bundle that wasn't a bed; but Chuuya had never seen a bed, so he believed it just fine. "And if you see me cry, don't let the others see it too."

Chuuya did as told. Kazuo died seven hours and thirty-seven minutes later; he knew, because he spent the time sitting next to him counting. His hand grew warmer between his own; then, absurdly cold. Strange fluids left his lips, no matter how much he wiped them. When he stopped moving, his eyes stayed on the sky.

There were tears on his cheeks, though. He made sure to get rid of them. In the morning, they found him sleeping on a corpse].

"I'm not scared," he echoed.

His voice seemed to ricochet against the endless trees of the Cemetery, as they parked. He tasted the sounds in his mouth as if strangers.

Scared?, his mind insisted. Chuuya had lived seventeen years — none of them had been as hopeful as the one behind him. He was young; he was alive; he was next in line for an Executive seat. He had a roof and he had food and the beings he cared for were safe — he had the means and the strength to make that a certainty.

He thought of floating in darkness; of a child eating cockroaches — thought, could he ever be that ungrateful?

Hirotsu studied him. A familiar sight: a man who refused to change with the passing years — the Mafia's ever-standing pillar. Despite the unfruitfulness of it — despite the proof of its inconvenience — someone who cared for him.

Could he ever —

“Here we are, finally!” Dazai exclaimed, nonchalantly shutting the call in some poor fool’s face. “Hop-hop, Chuuya. Hirotsu, you wait here in the car. You have official orders to strike whoever attempts to enter the Cemetery, yes?”

He didn’t recognize the corpse when they opened the malodorous trunk for Tainted to float him out; he didn’t recognize it as he stalked behind Dazai’s too-cheerful skips through graves either, the hems of the pants he used as pajamas sinking in the low snow; he didn’t recognize it when Dazai declared a random spot underneath a tree The Location, and began moving autumn leaves — until a dug-up hole and a new stone appeared.

When he read the name on the tomb, and finally squinted at the face they had laid on the snow — he paused.

“This is the guy from the theme park,” he gasped. “With Tanaki. The worker with Murasaki Shikibu’s name carved on his arm.”

Shovel in hand — merely taking aim to throw it in Chuuya’s own grasp with maximal added bruises — Dazai nodded. “And we’re lucky he wasn’t one for cremation. Come on, dig.”

He stopped the shovel inches from his nose; then glared at him, attempted to swing at his feet with the bar, and began to remove some of the muddy ground — the sooner this was over, he let himself know, the sooner he would get to sleep again. “Why did you dig him up? The police already gave us the corpse pictures.”

“I needed to check if he had a mole,” Dazai replied, flopping down on a bundle of snow — right next to the corpse, and entirely uninterested in helping him dig. “The pictures didn’t show it.”

Chuuya imagined the earth to be his face. He sank the shovel. “Why?”

“To check if he was Murasaki’s nephew.”

He paused, raising an eyebrow.

“The one who gave the Division everything they needed to stage her fake suicide,” Dazai said, with that intonation that meant, why aren’t you reading my mind right now? “Amazing how fast the Ballerinas have become their own chess piece, don’t you think? Anyway — he had strong ideas about his family’s terroristic inheritance. He wasn’t described as having any remorse over the trap, but he did die with her name carved on his arm.”

Chuuya studied the rotting, greenish lines of the corpse’s eyebags. “You think he carved it on himself. Not that the Division was trying to take us away from Ueda’s trail.”

“I think he saw his grandma,” he replied. “I think he saw her until he went crazy enough to cut his skin open. Given that we don’t know the full scope of Ueda’s Ability, and that all of you mafiosi have some semblance of grieving guilt stuck to you — it seemed a relevant theory to confirm.”

If Dazai noted how utterly quiet he'd gone, he didn't outrightly state it. Chuuya traced the mud and the snow; traced the darkness at the end of that hole, and the wooden roof of a casket.

At the very least, he considered, calmly, his arms were already carved out.

"Us mafiosi," he echoed, eventually.

"Yes," Dazai nodded. Something he was fiddling with was glistening, occasionally struck by moonlight. With a perplexed sigh, he recognized the ring Chuuya had stolen for him on New Year's day. "I don't have much time left in my life. I can hardly waste it with unnecessary grievances."

He threw the shovel to the side; lifted one finger, beckoning the corpse' flagging limbs to the open coffin six feet underneath. "I think the point is that you can't really avoid it."

"I have nothing to avoid."

"You have nothing to blame yourself for?" Chuuya scoffed.

"I know I do," the boy corrected him. His gaze was avidly following the slow descent of the dead body. One of his hands was under his chin; the other, by his calf, twitched intermittently. "But what am I meant to do about it?"

Something was stuck in his throat.

Sharp tongue and cruel teeth and the moon in the sky; maybe there existed a wall hard enough in this world Chuuya could crush his skull against — until he learned what it felt to actually hold the weight of something. "I'm not —" he gulped down the too loud tone of his voice. Kouyou was always talking about being too easy to read. The man landed inside the coffin, and he shut it — and that was it. "I don't feel guilty."

Dazai's sole eye always seemed to overflow — forcing itself to bear a weight meant for two; piercing, because of it. He twirled one finger in the air; traced, suffocatingly focused on every inch of him — what do you feel?

There was nothing ephemerally rotten in that place. Only a corpse, and a boy who wanted to be. The smell, if real — was under his nails.

Offhandedly, he threw a glance behind his back. The Flags' stolen graves were only a few trees away; for a moment, he could have sworn he'd seen a severed silhouette crawl on his elbows between the stones. Could have sworn he wasn't crazy at all — only cursed.

"All of it," Chuuya concluded, shrugging. He threw the shovel in Dazai's lap — given he had no Tainted, all he could do was howl when it hit him between the legs. "Hop-hop. Switch."

---

Of the rows of newcomers from the Ability Users scouting process, Chuuya managed to only get saddled with testing three of them.

“These are Kobo, Fumiko, and Mishima,” Hirotzu introduced, fiddling with his latest wrist watch — his old, cracked one still fixed around Dazai’s wrist. “Some of Ace’s men recruited them from a mercenary underground group.”

The trio was waiting for them, sprawled on the couch of Tanaki’s Entrance Hall. A small woman in a vibrantly red attire and a pensive face, and two men — a brunette with incredibly thick glasses and a blond with an amazingly long beard — each of them much taller than Chuuya would ever comfortably meet the eyes of.

“I must say, I much prefer the term begged to join,” Fumiko tutted, offering him a bow. Her hair was an unnatural crimson rainfall; if it hadn’t been braided as severely as it was, he thought it might have brushed the ground. “Makes me feel important.”

Kobe coughed, fixing his glasses. “Or makes our new organization seem desperate.”

“Did you even see the bloodbath they left at our meeting spot?” Mishima pointed out, barely raising his nose from the book between his hands — a collection of depictions of what looked like Christian saints. “Desperation would have been much messier. That was pure purpose.”

“Yes. The purpose to cause a bloodbath.”

“Guys,” Tanaki called, a bit distractedly, from her desk. She nodded towards Chuuya, both a warning and a point — smiling as unassumingly sweetly as she always did with recruits. “Perhaps discuss it elsewhere?”

“If the heads of the pack aren’t aware of their issues, no one should be,” Fumiko replied, with no hesitation. “Come on, now, Tanaki. Some bravery. Some shamelessness.”

“You used to be so polite.”

“You know each other?” Chuuya asked.

“Sure thing,” Fumiko winked, bowing once more. “She once hired me to get rid of her — what was it, Madame? Third? Fourth husband?”

Tanaki tapped away on her computer — offered Chuuya a clever glance that almost tasted of old times’ complicity. “Who knows.”

“Ah, whatever. I’m sure she’s happy to have me here, now. I insist on my point!” the woman offered him her hand. “Who else are we meant to complain to?”

Chuuya shook it — was unsurprised when her grip lingered. “I hear diaries are a thing.”

“But if we want change?”

“Then we should stop wasting time and begin complaining to the revolutionists,” he offered, holding onto her fingers as insistently as she was. He refused to lower his gaze. “And see if we want it badly enough to bleed for it.”

Fumiko grinned. “I like you.”

“You like all things red,” Kobe huffed.

“Well, his red is particularly fascinating,” she insisted, annoyed. “Unlike that fur of yours.”

Before Chuuya could ask what that meant, the air in front of him seemed to shatter into pieces — a blink and a strange sense of nausea later, a fox with remarkably intelligent eyes was jumping right into his arms, laying its muzzle on his elbow to tilt its head back and study him from up close.

“Oh,” Chuuya grinning — the excitement he’d felt at eight, figuring out he could fly. The animal preened; from behind his book, Mishima sniffed. “That’s cool.”

“Sir,” Hirotsu intervened, clearing his throat. Lower, he explained: “These three are our main witnesses on the search for Ueda Akinari.”

He straightened.

“He hired us for a job, last summer,” Fumiko elaborated, eyes set on Kobe’s frame in his arms. “He needed a small group for the transport of Black Market goods outside of the state — the goods being Ability Users. He said his Ability alone would be too — messy, for it.”

Chuuya tightened his grip around the man’s fur, unaware — offered his clever, little eyes a grimace when he snapped his teeth near his wrist. “You saw him use it?”

“Indescribable,” Mishima murmured — gaze still on the book, but lost somewhere much further. “I’d never seen such a conspicuous group of beings hate itself so viciously — so unwillingly.”

“So it is him? You can confirm it?”

“I had my doubts,” Fumiko admitted, throwing her head back. Her voice came out both muffled and strained. “Until yesterday’s attacks at Yamashita Park. A TV crew managed to film it all live — I would recognize that bubbling insanity in their eyes everywhere.”

He frowned. “He’s targeting civilians too, now?”

Hirotsu offered him a glance that matched his own to the dot — pure understanding. The Special Division wouldn’t have gone that far, not to slow down the Mafia’s recruiting attempts — the protection of the city had always been their priority. “The User has to have been granted some freedom over personal attacks,” the man theorized.

“And the half-moon mark,” Chuuya asked? after a beat. “Is it on all the victims?”

“Not one missing,” Mishima shrugged himself out of his remembrance — made a face. “I said it to that man in glasses, I’ll say it again: Ueda’s Ability left no visible sign. You don’t force a sick man to wear a red scarf around his neck — not if you’re going for a whispered epidemic.”

Fumiko scoffed. “A suicidal one.”

Hirotsu cleared his throat. “And your time underground never brought you into contact with some — spreading Ability of sorts?”

“We’d remember it,” the woman assured. She nodded towards the fox in his arms. “Kobe has never forgotten an Ability he’s seen. Not once. It’s why we’ve been helping out your archivists.”

“Be mindful, Vice Executive,” Mishima insisted. “Keep searching — as we will. But it’s imperative for Ueda to be found and eliminated, first and foremost. You —” His knuckles grew white around his book; only slightly relaxing under Fumiko’s subtle hip check. Chuuya thought of the man behind the Division’s window; the trails of fresh blood leaking from the claw-holes in his arms. “You don’t want to face this Ability.”

Kobe chirped, a bit sad. Ever so posed, he felt Hirotsu’s eyes pierce his temple. He raised his chin. “We’ll worry about that problem when it comes,” he concluded. “About your Abilities —”

The three — four-legged exceptions, too — exchanged a devilishly intense gaze.

They challenged him to an oddly vicious, pseudo-training session. Chuuya, who knew the fire in his veins just enough to call it excitement, dropped his coat in Hirotsu’s amused arms and eagerly joined them at the training grounds — eyes squinted and mind alert to grasp what, exactly, their Abilities could do.

“It’s hardly entertaining against me,” Kobe sighed, by the third time Chuuya had pinned him to the ground with a clever flick of the wrist. “The Face of Another is a pretty intuitive Ability. Great trick on the first try, though.”

He had changed four times for each round — uncanny birds, growling dogs; animals strange enough Chuuya was half sure they were meant to have gone extinct; on the harshest of the rounds, a camouflaging butterfly.

Don’t step on him, Mishima had groaned, or you are never gonna hear the end of it.

The man only agreed to put his beloved book down and fight him when Kobe went down for the fifth time — lamenting cracked glasses.

“Does the beard ever get in the way?” Chuuya asked, squatting in preparation — eyeing the endless, golden mass of hair dangling from his chin like a somewhat grim clock hand.

“Not really,” Mishima replied, blankly. “Do you hit from the left or from the right, first?”

He blinked, perplexed. “The right.”

It was only when his jump already had him in the air, and the man was swiftly moving to the left to miss him, that his words hit him. “Why the fuck did I say that,” he demanded.

“I don’t know,” the man shrugged, turning to watch him roll a good stone-throw from him — immediately climbing back to his feet. “Is your hair a choice or a consequence?”

“They were cut all shitty last year and never regrew correctly,” Chuuya answered — the words morphing on the tip of his tongue, mere seconds after he had considered telling a lie. “Hey!”

Fumiko laughed hard enough to shake all four walls.

Confessions of a Mask, the man explained, as they rolled back and forth around the mostly empty training room, was a delicate power — while it could force the truth out of any mouth, it could only do so under the specific condition that the interlocutor had been trying to lie.

“Which means my questions must be carefully planned,” Mishima added. “I have to ask things nobody would wish to offer sincerity to.”

“What happens if you don’t?”

The User shivered. “I’m the one forced to tell the truth.”

“And it’s always so amusing,” Kobe sighed. He elbowed Hirotsu in a friendly manner; took a step back when the man curled an eyebrow in direction. “Ah — just ask the Commander here. Mishima made the mistake of asking about his love life, thinking he would never answer — and he had to spend a day telling Fumiko and I all his nasty, embarrassing little secrets.”

“Beard products’ rants aren’t truly what I was looking for, though,” Fumiko sighed.

Fighting against them turned the slumber in his muscles into something distinctly bright — Chuuya hadn’t even realized how much he longed for a squabble with someone who didn’t just have strength and stubbornness on their side. Their past as mercenaries peeked through every deadly move, unrefined but purposeful; they rotated their knives like missing limbs, and twirled on their feet like the ground itself would move along.

“We started selling ourselves when you were still a thought in your Mama’s brain,” Fumiko let him know, when she almost — almost, though — managed to drag her knife down his cheekbone.

“Men may have nothing on gods — if the voices are true,” Mishima was quick to add, going for his legs mere instants before Tainted stuck him to the ceiling — horrendously, offensively precise. Just for that declaration, he made sure to crack the ground under his feet — trapping him abruptly enough to make him land on his knees. “But desperate people get pretty close.”

Chuuya won — Chuuya always won, and Chuuya always won with breath-catching ease; be it a curse or be it a boast, never too shaky on his feet. But the feeling of his lungs heaving made him grin wide enough it burned.

“And what about you?” he questioned. He nodded in Fumiko’s direction, watching her tie the edges of her red skirt around her thighs. “I doubt I simply haven’t noticed it. What’s your Ability?”

It was subtle — unignorable, because of it. From the wooden bleachers, Hirotsu played with his second cigarette of the afternoon, and leaned a bit forward. “Mmh,” Kobe tapped two fingers on his chin, exhaustedly star-sprawled on the ground. “This could be interesting, actually. I wonder what you would look like to him.”

Chuuya curled. “Look like?”

“And here she goes,” Mishima sat on the ground again, book open — failing at pretending not to be regarding Fumiko’s panther-like advance in his direction.

“You’re a shapeshifter, too?”

“Not quite,” she hummed. Mere steps from him, she twinned her hands behind her back and smiled. Her braid swayed with her, hypnotic. “The Waiting Years deals with shifting, but it has more to do with you than with me. May I, sir?”

Hesitation rusted the muscles of his back; he rolled his shoulders back nonetheless, throwing one last look to Hirotsu’s interested gaze. “Go on.”

Her teeth glistened like blades.

It defeated all rationality — she did not fly to him, and she did not curl her fingers into a fist to attempt to tear a hole in his chest. Chuuya only blinked once, and found her a mere breath away from his face — Tainted already drooling from his pores. Nonetheless, she raised one forefinger — and peacefully laid it in the middle of his forehead.

Chuuya stared at the bittersweet curve of her cherry lips. “What are you —“

His mouth dried.

Thunder struck some corner of his gaze — he saw nothing but liquified shadows. The ground vanished underneath his feet. He raised the arms he couldn’t feel, attempting to fight back — instead, he fell.

---

...

---

Black.

It was deep enough to make his head pound, its weight physical — a never ending valley of a nothingness. Everywhere his eyes searched, it grew a bit deeper, sucking the air out of anything that might dare lay underneath it. It took his arms flagging through what could only be called water, for him to realize he couldn't breathe.

His lungs burned; their flesh-wet screech was audible. He attempted to look at his hands — he saw nothing but the thin material of the medical vest floating around his kicking legs — a tag with a number that scratched his brain, that did not soak and did not tear off.

He screamed. His lips stayed shut.

The water stayed black.

He tilted his head up, searching for a roof to break — was overwhelmed by a sense of nausea, legs and eyes and hands pulsing, no roof and no ground and nothing at all — until there was.

White, he thought, and bright — a trick of a light that wasn't there. He forced his body to find a direction and swam down; blinked uselessly against the itch of his eyes, his throat; the bubbles out of his lips and his nose, the weight on his chest.

The boy was wearing an oxygen mask, its plastic shaping bubbles into that not-quite-water. The band of it got lost through reddish curls, shorter than he could ever remember keeping his own — the vest danced around his numb limbs like curtains in the summer, framing a deadly pale skin.

His eyes were closed. When he cupped his cheeks and forced the eyelids apart, he met two blue irises.

He dragged his hands down the warmth of his body — sleeping, he thought; sleeping, but alive and breathing. He limbs fought the clenching water, the lack of air, and a voice thundered —

Take the mask.

It came from nowhere at all — it split his skull in two, a headache laced in poison. He held the boy's cheeks so hard he tasted their bones rubbing; wondered if bruises could form underwater. He listened to his heart, racing faster and faster and faster, ears ringing and tongue swirling around white noises.

Take the —

He let go of the boy, and swam to the other direction — swam and swam and swam, until the rush of a last burst of energy reached the tips of his fingers, and his body shut down — floated to depths that did not exist, falling, falling, and —

He was on his elbows and knees.

The landing hurt — it rattled his skeleton, as he rolled down the strangely dusty ground. Sand, he realized, as he coughed it out — an endless beach, spreading to faraway horizons in every direction, caging a calm sea in. He rubbed his eyes; breathed in gulps of air, desperate and hungry and cursing with words he could not hear. He resisted the urge to tear the white vest off his skin — and saw a corpse on the sand.

She stained that golden bed in a relentlessly flowing waterfall of scarlet, pooling from a wound in the middle of her abdomen — a hole clawed at the edges, offering lines of tissue and slowly rotting viscera to the sea-salty air.

He tore her dress apart, removing the fabric from the bleeding gash as delicately as he could, eyes frantically searching for something that was not sand and salt — the woman shrieked, choking on the blood clawing up her throat.

He dragged his eyes to her pained face — had to search through sticky strands of red hair, losing themselves amongst the blood; through the tears in her gently lost eyes. He couldn't focus on her traits — couldn't see the color of her irises.

For the first time since the maceries and the sun — every bubbling cell in his body was quiet.

He was a sandcastle to the wind. “Mama?”

She smiled. The wound seemed to spread like a tumor; her hand dropped from his face, leaving it wet and breathlessly cold — she gasped.

Save her, the voice thundered.

“How?” he asked. No answer came; he held onto the layers of her dress — something familiar and something never seen before, her eyes drinking in every inch of him — “Tell me how!”

Her hands climbed the heavy air — shushed his protests, lips trembling, to tap a gentle index to the middle of his bloodstained vest.

He glanced down, and saw his body split in two — a void of a red so utterly dark it was black, bleeding him out into the sand, into his mother's own blood.

It was a strange thing — knowing where to reach and where to dig to get to your heart, through the viscera and through the bones. His body was numb to the feeling; his body was screaming, and when he clenched his fingers around the beating organ and pulled, his whole being burned.

He stuck the bleeding, fleshy heart into the woman's wound — watched her eyes widen and sob, felt her nails sink into his chest, her lips trace a word he knew, something he could not recall, something he knew —

A house in the countryside.

He'd never been there. Nonetheless, studying the warm yellows of its walls, he got the feeling he would have known how to reach every room behind the wooden porch. The sky was crowded by clouds — gently threatening to drown the field of flowers he was standing knee-deep in.

The promise of a storm didn't scare him. He caressed the flowers with a palm, and felt the urge to smile.

A cross stood in the middle of the field — an old, rusted piece of metal, covered in flower crowns and unfamiliar trinkets. The man sitting under the porch was looking at it — dangling along to the little wind on a carved hanging couch.

He walked up the two steps of the porch, and sat next to him. It rattled the couch — they waited quietly for its rhythm to return, soft; listening as the creaking screws muffled the distant thunder.

"Isn't it nice?" Verlaine asked.

He breathed in.

The air tasted faintly of metal, like all rain did; but if he closed his eyes, he could taste a warm meal on his tongue — the heart-wrenchingly sweet smell of well-worn clothes; the too-well-known tickle of blades being washed after a bloodbath.

There were no houses to be seen in miles — nothing but that little square, drowning in nature and an absence of sounds. He knew, somehow, that in that place fireflies could be seen every night. He knew it was always that silent — a quiet that reminded him of familiar fingers wrapped around his wrists; only it was his to have; never to ask, never to live without.

The quietness of not being torn apart — of having his head just for him.

“It’s nice,” he concluded.

“I was stuck, back then,” Verlaine explained, distractedly. His pale-grain braid was longer than he remembered it; his clothes less elegant, lined by sewn flowers. He kept his eyes on the cross. “You were so young — I could imagine it. Teaching you a new language wouldn’t have been hard. There was no need to stay in Japan, where they might have found you.”

“France, then?” he guessed.

“No,” He frowned. “No, they would have found me. If not them, then —“

He studied the cross.

Trailed off.

“Where’s this, then?” he questioned.

“Who knows,” Verlaine blinked. At last, he turned his head, just a bit — enough to offer him a curled up corner of his mouth. The complicity in that gaze was a soft piece of clothing that had to have been his, some realities away. “Does it matter? We are safe here. No gods and no men.”

He tilted his head back until the edge of the backrest was digging into his nape; hummed along to the next push-forward of the couch. “And what are we?”

A chuckle. Verlaine’s Japanese was accented in a somewhat entertaining way — he knew, some realities away, that he had spent hours and hours and lifetimes making fun of him for it, and that no one had died for it. “The unlucky two in-between.”

Stay, the voice offered. Stay.

A scream broke through his ears.

He flinched; turned wildly, until his eyes set on the window behind his back. Inside, instead of a living room, he saw the road at the end of the Port Mafia Headquarters’ stairs; saw the blood puddles and the torn apart bodies on the ground — the light of fighting Abilities; the wide-eyes corpses of people he knew, the people he loved, the people —

“Chuuya?”

Verlaine’s eyes weren’t kind; but the honesty in them was soothing enough to feel just the same. He had scars too, he noticed, for the first time — circular lines of white and pink, staining his neck and his cheeks and his hands and every part of him; like locked gates to a being larger than life.

I know, he longed to say, abruptly — longed for it so desperately his throat seemed to constrict, robbing his lungs. Longed for it so vividly his eyes stung, as his every scar pulsed in understanding — I know, I know, I know —

“I can’t,” he heard himself say. “I won’t.”

“You could,” Verlaine swore.

“No,” Battle raged behind the window — the storm thundered some more, and he wondered if it ever rained, in that place. “No, you know I —”

“You’ll lose it anyway,” the man reminded him. His clothes were the color of the clouds; Chuuya was still in that white vest, still in his mother’s blood, still drowning with the other him — still haunted by the noise inside his skull, and the cross in the grass. “How many times can you bleed for the vanishing air?”

“As many as it’s needed,” he said. He climbed to his feet — rushed to the door next to the window and pulled, rattled, and fought against a locked thing. “Let me out.”

“It will never stop being needed,” he mused, eyes on his cross. “Haven’t you learned it yet? Gains are temporary. Only what we feel is eternal — that burning edge you detest; that loudness that haunts you. They’re the only things that cannot be taken away from you.”

“It was you,” he snapped. “I had them, and they would have stayed. You took them away from me.”

“And I was kind. I did it fast and clean and when they hadn’t festered inside you yet,” Verlaine confirmed. “I am not your losses, Chuuya. I am merely a piece of something that has claimed you as his. And if it hadn’t been me — it would have been something else.”

“I would have stopped it. I would have —”

“If it hadn’t been me,” he swore, still gentle and elegant; still as similar to him as Kouyou had sworn; still dead. “It would have been you.”

The doorknob left a bleeding cut on his palm. He choked on a sound — a horrible thing; a gasp and a breath and a sob; something pooling from the hole in his chest, the one eye Arahabaki had stained and stolen and never returned.

“Chuuya,” he asked — Verlaine; the voice; his mouth; his mother’s bleeding tongue. The door stayed shut. “Chuuya, aren’t you terrified?”

---

...

---

“— but lies on our name,” one of the Mori Corporations’ public representatives was insisting, on some News interview the manufacturing side of their business had demanded.

“We have nothing to hide, and no developments to defend. The Special Division is a noble, fundamental branch of the trusted Government that holds our country together — if they wish to make certain we won’t cause issues to our city, they’re welcome to. After all, with Ability Users on the line, doubts can never be enough. I’ll say — given the wretched results the mixture of weapons and Users brought during the Great War, I can’t see any reason why anyone would dare mix the two again —”

Sunset came when the village appeared at the edge of the windshield, lined in a golden frame.

Chuuya turned the radio off.

“How old were you when they took you?” he asked, studying the makeshift houses and the rusty wells; the woods surrounding the living areas and the distant silhouettes of some women stretching under the falling sun. If the village had a name, he didn’t know it — Kouyou never called it anything but, the place I came from.

“Five, the old Boss estimated,” she offered. “I couldn’t quite remember if my birthday had yet come or not. He didn’t care to linger.”

“Damn. What an asshole.”

A snort. She cleared her voice. “Language.”

He huffed. “He’s dead and cursed.”

“You can never know.”

“Trust me,” He thought of candid strands and a bloodied scythe — the sound of Rimbaud’s bones digging the earth. “I know.”

She made for an odd sight in the driver seat. Despite average driving ability, Kouyou was made for tightlipped Mafia-paid drivers and blacked-out windows — for rattling off the torture schedule of the day, and cleaning her blade on her inner gowns while the others took her where she’d requested.

He curled up on the passenger seat, in that way she found undignified; laid his cheek on the headrest and studied the delicate grip of her fingers around the steering wheel — as she rounded the village, never quite going in.

“— continues the protests,” the other News channel buzzed, via the utterly bored voice of a man. “Suribachi City has infamously appropriated an astonishing number of our city’s funds — and for what? Despite the protestors’ — frankly idealistic — insistence, there is virtually no proof that investing in the settlement would bring better results than a massive loss of sources by the hands of gangs. There’s been no minimal sign of betterment, and certainly nothing auspicious enough to demand a project of the might of —”

“But what about the children?” the second interlocutor from the radio insisted. Despite the protest, it all sounded strangely detached — as if the home Chuuya had abandoned to the dust and the bedbugs were a particularly entrancing piece of media. “Are we just meant to assume they cannot be rescued? According to the S.R.A. — the Suribachi Renovation Association, for our viewers at home — more than seventy percent of the inhabitants are under fifteen years of age. If we can't stop the gangs before they can be created, how are we meant to —

He rubbed his shoes against the car floor. The leather did not stain; it cost more than the car itself.

“Why aren’t you talking to Hirotsu?” Kouyou asked, eventually, when the car swerved into a thin, particularly rough street.

The bumps of it knocked his knees against the dashboard. Chuuya scratched the scar on his hip, faded and still soaked in rat poison — recalled empty training grounds, and the way Hirotsu’s steel-made eye had looked through the monocle he had shattered on mere waking-up instinct.

I know Ueda Akinari got you, he’d said, low and unaffected by his bubbling rage. Do you?

“I am,” Chuuya replied, blankly. “It’s not his fault if he’s got a thing for orders.”

Kouyou threw him a look — like she knew; like they both knew she did. “Whose orders?”

Who else, he could have scoffed. Disrespect was more rarely punished, these days; perhaps she could perceive it as the blunted blade it was. There was bone deep frustration in all corners that weren’t immediately receptive to what Chuuya had learned through blood and sweat — curled on a rock, wondering if his blood would dry under that cliff for the Sheep to find; realizing, with ease and repulsion, that Dazai Osamu would drown who he needed and save who he wanted.

He found Fumiko and introduced her to Hirotsu’s bleeding heart, he could have explained. Intuition kept children alive, and he had given the local demon more than what was intuitively clever — and it still wasn’t enough. He found Hirotsu’s bleeding heart, and he found me.

Chuuya still wasn’t sure about what he had wanted to prove.

“One of the new girls,” he offered, instead, eventually. “Fumiko.”

“The redhead?”

“Her Ability could help out tons with your Torture Department —”

Kouyou winced. “You ought to quit calling it something so distasteful.”

“So,” he concluded, tracing the cut she had managed to trace on his cheekbone, while he was in that trance-like state — the only one; because Chuuya didn’t lose, and Chuuya had no time to waste in hallucinations. “You might want to try and steal it from Ace’s grasp.”

The village appeared fully in front of them — sprouting homes and running children; wood and leaves and something so un-Kouyou-like it was a wonder she hadn’t yet disappeared from the sheer discrepancy of that reality. It all seemed awfully warm to the touch — seemed like the kind of fire Golden Demon would put out with no command.

The Executive's eyes were dead set on the rear view mirror, though — staring at the allegedly empty space in the backseats.

“Hey,” Chuuya called. “It’s not real.”

Her profile was a stain on his eyelids — a flower blooming in pinks and blood red; familiar to all the corners of himself he has reshaped to fit people he’d die for. Her hair was untied, whipped by the wind from the car window — blood-lined waves. When she turned, he saw something akin to heartbreak in her eyes.

When she turned, she was a corpse.

He recalled the first time she had brushed hair off his forehead — how it had felt like being burnt alive; recalled the first time she’d looked him in the eyes and called him one of hers.

“Little god,” she said, simply, through wet bones and peeling off flesh. One of her hands left the steering wheel; tipping off his hat, she tucked a strand of hair behind his ear. “You know, I really like that tune you’re always humming.”

Chuuya blinked against the touch, unable to focus on anything but her sharp nails and the sound her skin was making against the leather of the car as it got ripped off — feeling bitterly short and suffocatingly small and loved, loved, Chuuya was so, so, so loved — how could he ever waste any drop of it, undeserving and still rewarded — how could he ever bleed for anything but it —

He blinked, and she was alive again.

She offered him a smile. “Must we always match, when aggravating Abilities are involved?”

With a snort — quiet, as to not disturb the bleeding sunset — he reached for the edge of her sleeve, pinching it. Sticky, she would tut. “At least this time we’re aware of it.”

“I do prefer the horrific hallucinations to the traitorous mind control,” Kouyou sighed. “But I would rather not deal with my people’s blood.”

They got out of the car.

Some carved benches stood through grass and abandoned fishing hooks; they sat, studying the village at the end of the valley. Chuuya vaguely wondered if someone would come ask them who they were — if his village had looked anything like that. If anybody had heard him scream when he’d been taken; if he’d screamed at all.

“So,” he started, again. “Any idea of how to not watch people decay as you talk to them?”

A pause. She tapped on his knuckles. “You already see that much?”

“You don’t?”

She shook her head. “Just the corpses. And — people from my past. I never saw them die, but they would follow me with enviable vigor.”

He blinked. “Saw?”

Kouyou straightened. She let go of him; gathered her hair on one shoulder, freeing her nape for him to study. “I came here this weekend, too. I went to my old house. It was abandoned,” If she felt anything in particular about it, it didn’t show — she talked about the village the way one would have about a particularly blurry dream. “I needed some silence to — reflect. When I came back, it was like this, and the visions were mostly gone.”

The half moon mark on her nape was skin deep — heavy like a tattoo, shaded in a gentle blue. It was more faded than any of the corpses’ own had been; if he didn’t squint, only Kouyou’s pale skin remained.

“Where’s yours?” she asked.

“I didn’t check,” he admitted, leaning back on his palms. Chuuya wasn’t the type to try and convince himself something wasn’t real because he couldn’t see it; he just didn’t want to bother with one more scar. “Probably on my back. You mean all you had to do to get rid of it was go through a free discount self-discovery trip?”

“I wish,” Kouyou sighed, tilting her head back to bask in the falling sunlight. “I made the mistake of mentioning my condition to Boss — it worsened my condition exponentially. Going back to my roots helped getting back under control — at the very least, I don’t have to fear it happening again.”

He frowned. “It?”

The collar of her kimono was moved to the side; she lowered it down her arms, holding it close to her chest for modesty — much to Chuuya’s spluttered, red-eared protests. At last, he laid his eyes on the porcelain skin of the higher part of her back.

“Those are —” Chuuyas stiffened. “Those are from Golden Demon’s blade.”

“Which she seemed very apologetic about,” Kouyou confirmed. The blade lines were clean and uncrooked, and not particularly vivid — but they had clearly been deep, and they showed an effort to cut the shoulder blades out of the woman’s body. “There is nothing to blame. I ordered her to do it.”

“You,” he started.

Felt the words leave, along to the next whiff of sea-tasting wind; felt the bench pierce through his gloves and his tailored pants and his skin.

“I saw...” Kouyou cleared her throat, fixing her kimono in place. “I saw things. I was convinced — it was difficult. The relief of a wound helped me clear my head, but —” She reached for his hand again; traced a meaningless kanji on his knuckles, her complicated expression shattered in pieces by strands of hair. “Chuuya, you need to reign it in. Or to kill Ueda. It would be better — “Her face did something; the unwanted crisps on waters that were meant to rule over nameless heads, to suggest the most efficient solution at all times. “I’d rather you didn’t have to put yourself through that.”

He stared at their joined hands. “It’s just an Ability, Ane-san. I’ll try to deal with it, but — Boss needs all the help he can get, right now.”

“Ueda Akinari is targeting civilians, too,” the woman insisted. “The Port Mafia was born to keep bloodthirsty Ability Users under check — if the city is forced to denounce more Ability-related emergencies, the Special Division will tighten its control, and we will be caged in like rats.”

“But he is one of their puppets?”

“No way of guaranteeing,” she admitted. “But we do know the actress’ murder came from their orders. Whether Ueda has now run free from their guidance matters very little — the Mafia will not be taunted by a single Ability User.”

Huffing, he tucked a strand of hair behind Kouyou’s ear, stopping it from ending up into his mouth. “Like that hasn’t happened before.”

“Let us not let it happen again, then,” She glanced his way. “I think this might help.”

She extracted a notebook from her sleeve; a square of leather, its pages vigorously rubbed clean of pencil notes — something like the annotations Virgil used to carry around, just in case inspiration for his book struck. “I wrote down every vision I got,” she explained, placing it in his hands. “Every single one. It helped remind me they weren’t real; going back and re-reading them turned the worst moments into something less — tangible.”

Chuuya dragged one nail down the first page; tried to identify the erased kanjis. “You want me to journal my slow descent into being nuts?”

“Quite,” Kouyou smiled. “Like old times. You can consider it a calligraphy test.”

“I’m not showing these to you.”

“No,” Something in her tone raised his eyes — she clenched a sour grip around his fingers again, and swore: “No one should have to know a thing about what you saw. Ueda Akinari is —” She set her jaw. “No mercy should be shown.”

He didn’t ask.

He pocketed the notebook.

“I’ll worry about Mori, Chuuya,” Kouyou started again, with a deep breath. “As I always have. You know that. The earth will end before that man willingly creates chaos for any outcome that is not the best possible for the organization.”

That’s what I thought of myself, too, he said — almost; bit his tongue at the very last second.

Lately, Mori tended to be decaying in some way whenever he laid his eyes on him. Mori Ougai, who he had kneeled in front of — who had given up an Ability Permit not to lay another betrayal on his shoulders. Mori Ougai — who had watched him ruin the only people he had ever led, and still called him invaluable.

If he dies, the wind told him. If he dies, then who do you think will —

“You worry about yourself,” Kouyou said — like she didn’t trust he would. He wished he could vocalize the lump stuck in his throat — explain that he wasn’t half as good as she believed, and didn’t deserve half the love she had to give.

How many times will you bleed?

As many as are needed, he swore.

Her side was a warm reminder against his body; Chuuya had never leaned on anything the world had to offer but its gravity. Loved. Starved for it like a child in the slums; hungry for it like a starless sky. Loved.

“And the next time you see me in any state of distasteful rot — please, do let me know,” she added — seemingly genuinely pressed by the idea. “I’ll fix my lipstick just for you.”

Chuuya laughed like it was ripped out of him. She held his hand tighter.

Over the benches spot, the valley bloomed in shades of the darkest crimson. Quiet and dead, the Sheep’s corpses laid all over its grass, asking and abandoning — their absent eyes set on him.

Chapter End Notes

ango: you are cursed when you’re mentally unwell kouyou and chuuya: is it cause we’re redheads. is that it

ango: i am an archivist

“If you had a thorn in your side, and it was tearing you from the inside out — would you care if the one to extract it was the one who put it there?” what do yall know about mori literally bringing mimic in yokohama just to destroy them... i hate that man.

hey there guys!! i need to run home immediately, so posting this before i disappear! i'm gonna answer to all comments soon, hope i manage to catch up by today!! thank you so much for all the love and for reading, and hope to see you soon!!

keep warm and have a wonderful day!

IT

Chapter Notes

see you at the end! ;))

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xxix.

---

Case number: 67862344

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [Code Name: Double Black] were tasked with the [...]*

---

Notebook extract — [Page 13]

Dead people.

More dead people.

Ane-san. Strangled?

Am I supposed to make this discursive? Hirotsu's brain splattered on the floor. Seriously, am I — blood on my hands. Guerrilla squad hanging from their necks. Is that better? Hirotsu again. Elise torn apart.

Mori with blood on his coat. It might have been the latest assassination attempt, though. The underground gets too cocky the moment things get nasty. As if we don't already hold control over the damn — off topic. The Guerrilla squad all over the ballroom. Voice in my ear in the shower? Might be the piping system. Call landlord.

Albatross.

Albatross. Is this really supposed to —

Albatross. With Doc.

Lippman, head ripped off. Call landlord. It's for sure the piping system.

Tsuchiya's eye on my nightstand. Noguchi hanging behind the window. Iceman burned alive on the desk. Kouyou torn apart. Blood on my hands.

The Flags.

The Flags.

The Flags. Pianoman in my trunk. Take the car to the washroom. The Flags. Am I supposed to go into details?

Ver —

Verlaine, for some fucking reason. He looks good with his skull blown up to pieces. Tried to step on him; passed out and woke up on the couch? Hope that one returns. Hope —

The kid.

---

...

---

It was raining when he opened his eyes.

It tickled, at first — it grew somewhat itchy, somewhat painful, the moment his skin managed to feel its impact fully. It sneaked and curled gently around freshly disinfected skin, and the sensation of being a living bruise wasn't new — but the ache poisoning his limbs was the tik tok of a clock.

Chuuya never recalled why he was hurting.

Calloused palms — known; a matching scar down the thumb; a ridge between the index and the middle finger; a constant coldness, unbothered by the tapping, nearly too-hot water — answered the question.

Blood came with the night streets — silence came with touch. Dazai came with sorrow.

“Up to two minutes and a half, this time around,” the boy commented, only barely louder than the rush of water landing on wet tiles. Drops of it stuck Chuuya's eyelashes together — through the blur, he recognized one of the showers of the HQ's spare bedrooms. “Keep it up, and you might even actually win the dog racing competition.”

The upward turn of his tone didn't grow into an exclamation. Chuuya didn't know if it was the rush of his dwindling heartbeat in his ears that muffled it, or the hands cupping his ears — an effort to tilt his head back, letting the water wash away the blood he could feel skin deep all over.

Corruption, he decided, rationally.

The cracks of his scars felt distinctively circular; the drops landing on his cheeks came from Dazai's hair, too — he hardly ever chose to shower, when he could bathe. Leave what you have destroyed clean, Kouyou used to tut.

There was responsibility in partnership, Chuuya assumed — either that, or Dazai couldn't refuse a chance to watch him breathe through his death so viciously.

He always looked somewhat taken aback.

“It's fine,” Chuuya managed to mumble, attempting to escape his grasp. Brusque. He did not remember his name fully; but he recalled the vacantly regretful look on Hirotsu's face — Fumiko's fingers on his forehead. The mixture of drowsiness — and how had that bag of weak bones even dragged and held him up in the shower? — and warmth slowed him down. “Get your fish skin off me. I'm awake.”

“Can't have you stumble near the drain,” Dazai replied, unbothered. “Small as you are, you'll be sucked in and you'll end up somewhere in rural China. And then Golden Demon will whip me.”

He stepped back, heels slipping. Distantly, he heard himself snarl. “You don't —“

Two thumbs traced the skin under his eyes.

It was an ungentle scrub — only delicate enough not to reopen recently stitched wounds; but merciless in its quest to get all the blood out. Chuuya tasted debris — a fallen building, maybe; Arahabaki stubbornness to crash his skull against the closest surface, as if gods and codes could bleed out of an open head. The hands dug through wet hair — they scratched sluggish, mnemonic circles on his scalp, until his legs' grip on reality wavered. Chuuya blinked at the ground; the scarlet shade of the dirty water.

"I don't," His tongue felt heavy. What's the point, he wanted to snap. Why do this and then — "What was the — mission?"

Dazai hummed. The hands had to be his — the lingering consideration in them was the ghost of something Chuuya suspected he would never be awake enough to feel. "Double Black mission."

Distant flashes. "And?"

"Four Ability Users we tried to recruit attempted to start an earthquake near the City Hall," His palms left his head; the drag of skin down his nape awoke goosebumps everywhere his mind could reach — scarred skin protesting and begging and falling quiet in a hush. "You stopped them before it could become wild enough to be a real emergency."

You knew what I'd see — his throat refused to shape it into words. Fumiko's Ability kept her from seeing what she was causing; Dazai had only wanted to know he was haunted. I know you knew.

Chuuya frowned.

Corruption wasn't a feeling, not quite — more like what he imagined dreams might be like. He was a permanent guest, and the body was his. This is my hand, he recalled. When he tried to flex his fingers, it didn't quite work.

"A building fell," He squinted, torturously slow, as if underwater.

Dazai nodded. "The Users got buried," A pause; imperceptible to someone a bit further from the heartbeat in his wrist, maybe — to a less attuned skeleton. His fingers found the strand of hair he'd burned for the Flags; they pulled, and he considered killing him for it. "So were ten men in my Unit."

He stilled.

Another pause. "It was inevitable," the boy added, like he knew it would make Chuuya mad. "They went in to get all civilians out — managed, too. And I stopped you before it could be thirty of them. Don't start."

Frustration bubbled up. "Don't st—"

"Chuuya."

He fumed, eyes on the ground.

Blinked hard against the water drops — studied the fading scars up his legs, the spirals and the scratches and the falls. He hung from the apathetic shade of Dazai's voice; not quite mean, not quite touched. Inevitable. "Give me their names," he concluded, curtly. "I'll let the families know."

"Your tiny brain might have forgotten, but that is actually not your —"

"Dazai."

Perhaps he felt some of the frustration that had stuck since waking up on the training rooms' floor — his mother's face a blur and Verlaine's grief a physical itch. He kept quiet.

The rush of water echoed off the walls. The rooms at the Headquarters were all painfully non-descriptive. Albatross had dragged him out in less than a week — he recalled the unbloodied back of his head with the longing of a fool.

A forehead knocked against his own, hard. He hissed; pinched the closest patch of skin, near a wetly bandaged clavicle. He settled curved fingers — still clawing, still sinking into flesh, still waiting — on Dazai's waist, and refused to lower his gaze as he let him back him into the shower wall.

It was freezing, despite the condensation — each inch of his spine was a needle dipped in snow, and Chuuya cursed out, softer than intended.

Energy rushed in, waking him up fully — it let him blink, free from the direct spray of the water; let him gather a less blurred understanding of the red hair stuck on the wet wall, and the flimsy curtain hiding the lightless bathroom.

Dazai took his turn to wash — kept a foot upon his own, obnoxious and only ever gentle when it was quiet. He shrugged his hair under the water like a wet dog — wasn't that something — and stuck his fingers under his bandages to throw them out of the bathtub, untouched by their landing flop.

Two eyes didn't quite fit him right, Chuuya thought. The scythe scar on his chest sneaked down his ribs like a tear out of a page — settled and old, but never faded. Mori wants me to keep them all, he had told him, once. So I will.

It was cold — his skin was abandoned to dry off to the air. Each water drop falling from his hair landed like a bullet. Chuuya leaned onto the wall until the ice stung, and watched.

Dazai met his eyes, innocent. "What?"

His hair curled at the ears, badly cut and rarely cured — boyish, somewhat; easy to tuck away to even gravitationally challenged fingers. "The mission was a success," Chuuya said, slowly. Nonetheless, he could have added. Mori might have, he thought. "Right?"

"When is it not?"

A beat.

He breathed, eyes forward. “You know, you could have just asked me to test Fumiko’s deal.”

Dazai’s shrug was utterly familiar. It grated against his nerves — all of him. He stepped on the toe of a sock with one foot to take it off the other, every single night, like a clockwork — left his shoes all over the entrance. He wouldn’t really eat food if it wasn’t off somebody’s plate, because it felt less like hunger and more like mischievousness — and clearly only one of those was allowed. Unlike the corpses who had bled under Chuuya’s eyelids in the last few weeks — he was alive.

He’d probably only brought him along to bury that body so that Hirotsu could take a look at him, and be reminded he was the prime subject for limits-testing.

“You don’t have a bright track record of admitting to weaknesses,” Dazai rebutted, as if it was utterly simple. “And the surprise element was relevant. If her Ability works that great on even you — what with your circumstantially uncommon self control to matters of mind invasion — then it’s powerful enough to keep around.”

“That’s all?” he pressed.

He had a new wound — something like the carving Pianoman’s chords left around his victim’s necks; only, it traced the middle of his sternum like an equalizer. He gazed at him, calmly. “That’s all.”

Anger bubbled near the outer layer of his skin. He reminded himself the bathroom walls had done nothing to him. Reminded himself it was the warm water stuck to Dazai’s palms that was the unusual part — not the mind games.

“Fuck you,” Chuuya said.

He took it in stride.

Then, studying the carved line. “Tell me.”

“You’re in no luck,” he replied, stretching further and further — until he was a sharp arc of muscles most didn’t expect and pointy bones, thin with malnutrition. “It wasn’t me, this time.”

He frowned. “That looks like a rope burn.”

“My book covers the art of hanging oneself in enviable depth — thank you very much. I know better than to wrap the rope around anything but my neck,” A sigh; long and dramatic. “Besides, that’s not how I want to go anymore.”

“Mmh?” Disgust gathered at his fingertips; Chuuya felt Dazai’s own wrap around his wrist before he saw them. He let himself be pulled closer by some distant haze — under the jet of water, he tilted his chin up until he could nudge the boy’s head away from the warmer current, and mocked: “And how do you want to go?”

“Licking an electric fence,” Dazai said, very seriously.

He glared, blinded with anger and gaping with ache — felt it get stuck somewhere up his throat, like a breath he couldn't take. Wanted to laugh, just a bit; suppressed it anyway. He didn't notice his fingers were shaking until the boy had to take the bath foam bottle off his hands, and open it in his stead.

Lips brushed the end of his cheek, where his ear started. He unclenched his jaw on pure instinct — felt his fist tighten too close to where he would bruise him. “Don't go and get mad, now,” Dazai rebutted, lowering his tone into something that would tickle. “It's the busy season, you know?”

Chuuya thought there ought to be sneakier ways to leave a kiss; gentler ways to bite. Something pooled in his guts — a mixture of urgency and warmth and frustration. He knocked his temple against the boy's own. “It's you. I ought to be,” he warned, only ending up with his teeth too close to his Adam's apple — close enough to feel him gulp, along with the grip of his nails on an old scar on Chuuya's thigh, slippery and warm.

Alive, he thought. He would hate him until the end of his days. Rotten, yes — but breathing. Alive and unchanging and stuck in time; there at the end of the world, too.

He winced against the thought.

“Convince Arahaki to stop flinging you off roofs,” Dazai dragged a finger down the tattoo between his clavicles. Chuuya waited for it to crawl upward, brushing his chin and tilting it up, before pretending to bite. “Or to bother me less when he does it. One of these days I'll pass out from the effort of chasing his whims, and you will explode. Imagine all those Chibi confetti falling down.”

Chuuya wanted to tear him apart. He'd never bring up Fumiko again, he knew. He was far too removed for it to be more than a step in a race. “I don't think exploding is the right verb.”

“I do,” he assured. “Trust me, I've seen it.”

The water crowded between his toes, scarlet. “What does it look like?”

Something passed by Dazai's eyes — a light too far away to pin down. It was gone too quickly — he grasped Chuuya's hands, kissed his knuckles with visible mock, and offered: “Like a remarkably ugly garden gnome self-detonating.”

“Says the glorified off-button.”

“Says the glorified bath bomb.”

Chuuya crashed the foam bottle against his head, and he screeched in pain.

It was a cue; he didn't watch him leave the bathroom. His face frowned the moment he was alone — he crouched down, dragging his fingers through the crimson water. It stuck to his nails.

When he looked up, blood was splattered to every corner of the walls — and a single heart, torn out with bare hands, beat weakly on the tiles on the other side of the shower. Dazai's corpse was a pale line at the edge of his vision — knees on the stained floor; back bent unnaturally over the tub. His head was under the knee-level water, dark hair floating in a void of fading blood and knots.

He dragged his feet across the water. Just get him out of there, something suggested.

And Chuuya didn't move.

If it hadn't been me, Verlaine had promised. Then it would have been you.

He found Dazai breathing and unbleeding, lazily planting bullets into a human-shaped target at the shooting range on the sixth floor— hitting every part of the silhouette except its vital points.

“If it wasn't you,” he started, not bothering with hushing his step, “Then who was it?”

Dazai hummed, cheerful, holding his gun in all the wrong ways. He shot one more sequence; left a smoking hole right over the target's shoulder. He'd worn new bandages, but left his shirt and tie on the ground — the silver ring Chuuya couldn't believe he hadn't thrown away yet was between his lips, like a biteable pacifier.

When Chuuya wrapped his arms around his waist, chin on his shoulder — seemingly for no purpose; stiffening his shoulders with mistrust because of it — water drops from his hair landed on his nose. “Lise got your tongue?”

No answer.

Dazai shot again.

Subtly — temporarily; he knew he would be discovered — he used his encircling grasp to try and figure out how fresh the new scar was.

“Fell into the tiger cage at the Zoo again?” he insisted, tracing it with a nail. The aim for his next bullet was only a bit off — Chuuya hid an undignified, mean snort in his shoulder blade. Dazai stepped on his feet, teeth gritting around the ring until they made an audible sound. “Elise tried to cut you in half to match with those half bust creepy dolls of hers?”

A shrug. I find them artistic, Dazai signed, with the bullets he fired.

“Disturbed jealousy?”

A dirty glance.

“Don't fucking look at me like that,” He sunk his chin deeper, eyes on the board on the wall — the scribbles from the training men; points and jokes and tallies. A name caught his attention; his hands dropped from his skin. “I get to ask.”

“Do you?” he replied, vacantly.

His jaw ached with the insistence. “You get to peek,” he spelled out. “I get to know.”

He felt his amusement slip — knew Dazai had felt it as well; his next bullet, while just as lazy, hit the target right where his own new scar rested.

Chuuya walked until he could sit on top of the closest supplies-table, hands in his pockets. You'll lose it anyway, Verlaine had said.

Unhesitatingly, he asked: “Which ones?”

The target kept all of Dazai's attention. He was pale; February was still far from his sunburned days. His frame was cursed to familiarity; Chuuya would recognize the lines of him in a sandstorm. And yet he looked different, somehow — a growth that he had missed. His knees were less sharp; his features more settled. “Failed attempts count as insubordinations,” he informed him, unimpressed. “Which you know damn well. And if my men try to kill the Boss' prodigal dearest, I have a right to know. Maybe I'll even shake their damn hand.”

Dazai lowered his gun. He ranked his eyes up and down Chuuya's open silhouette, never willing to show anything but a challenge. There was no reason to fight. Chuuya had no idea of how to revert to anything cleaner — not when the Mafia's dirtiest ones were involved. Nimble fingers traced kanjis in the air: wasn't yours.

Unwillingly, he felt his shoulders relax.

He tilted his neck back until he could stare at the ceiling; stretched the last of Corruption out of his legs, letting out a groan.

“What did I tell you about this scheme of yours?” Chuuya half mocked. “You're waving a red flag for the revolution bulls. As if the targets on Boss weren't enough —“

Care?, Dazai whistled — a hummingbird.

“As if,” he scoffed, laying down on the old wood of the table. “But it would definitely reflect on me if my partner was enough of a moron to get himself sliced in —“

The underside of designer shoes dangled from the ceiling, right where his eyes were set.

He checked the air — tried to understand if someone had offered a cursed chant to awaken the thing in his veins; to figure out if he had missed something — a better explanation for the way his entire body seemed to halt, ribs piercing his lungs until his exhale managed to crawl through.

Chuuya lowered his eyes, and saw nothing but a gun on the floor.

Hanging from the metal beams, Dazai's lifeless body swung gently along to the nonexistent wind. Chuuya studied the tips of his fingers — their blueish shade; turning grey with each second he spent staring at them, utterly quiet. Blood dripped from the corners of his mouth, hidden from his lowered chin. Chuuya, he considered, never leaned on anyone — he had Dazai's weight carved on his bones, nonetheless.

A drop of red landed upon his upper lip.

A bullet hit the target. Chuuya blinked; kept his eyes on new bandages and scarred skin. When Dazai curled an eyebrow, he pretended it wouldn't be enough for him to understand.

---

...

---

Notebook extract — [Page 18]

Him.

---

...

---

Senator Fukuhara Naoki opened the door of her hotel room with telltale exasperation.

“Yes, what?” she urged, cell phone in hand and eyes uninterested. “Get on with it, Makoto. It better not be more reports on the rivers deal — I’m already an hour late to the event, and —”

Chuuya struck his fist through her chest.

Her phone fell first; the woman barely had time to gape at her pulsing, squelching wound, before he retracted his arm — then she fell, crooked and lifeless, leaving a sliding crimson line down the door.

“Some party trick, sir,” Marie said, behind her rifle, as she and half a dozen of the Guerrilla kicked the door. “Is it a bitch on the knuckles?”

“Mostly tickles when I touch bones,” He shrugged; snapped his fingers. “Seven minutes. I want every piece of paper in this suit with the words Mafia on it gone — don’t really care if you have to blow up one or two pulp fiction DVDs.”

“How dramatic,” Hamamoto lamented, shoulder-checking him on his way through.

“Like your crime scene’ll be when I murder you,” Chuuya kicked the back of his knees. “Get on with it.”

A chorus: “Yes sir!”

He made his way through the suite — a temple of luxury and silk, boredly expected from one of the top Hotels in central Tokyo. Flower shaped lamps Tanaki would have loved framed every entrance; Chuuya stepped on top of the table in the living room, tapping the horse-shaped glass statue that acted as a centerpiece.

The Guerrilla squad roamed through beds and tables, burning files and ripping apart research photos gathered by the Yokohama PD. Chuuya caught X’s eyes as she made a subtle beeline for him, offering him one of the thicker files.

“And don’t steal anything,” he warned.

“But there’s golden bath soap holders —”

“No, Marie.”

A pile of dossiers abandoned on the couch behind the table — left open for later scrutiny; but highlighted and scribbled in a way that denounced exhausting insistence — caught his attention. He leaned down just enough to grab the closest; a set of photographs picturing familiar landscapes had him frowning. In a messy handwriting, on top of a blurred overview of the Suribachi settlement, the Senator had written: calculate yearly funds? 57% of loss in campaign.

Under the picture were papers of papers of statistics, results of protests, and testimonies from journalists Chuuya’s oldest memories were more than well acquainted with. He recalled their clean dress shirts and the way they used to point cameras right in his face; recalled the older kids shrugging.

Some of the Senators really do want to fix this place, they would say. But it’s not enough. And anyway — we’re probably just a pity project.

“Hey,” Hamamoto called, bent under the couch — searching through a briefcase. It put a pause to the familiar humming he hadn’t realized was slipping between his teeth. “All good, sir?”

Chuuya had been following the news far too closely — the governmental side that was sort of neutral to the idea of renovating Suribachi City was small; but the fraction that was actively asking for it was imperceptible. He snapped the dossier shut and threw it on the couch again. “Shame she had to die,” he offered, curtly.

Something like understanding lowered his shoulders. Chuuya waited for him to turn again to fold the more relevant sheets and stuff them down his pants.

“Thought you might be interested in just who has been giving her information for her appeal to the City Hall,” X intervened, jumping over the couch. Then, a bit lower, she wondered:

“Sir, has Executive Kouyou informed you of her request for us —“

“— to aid her on the Le Directeur deal?” he concluded. “Sure. As far as I’m concerned, obey her orders as if they were mine — though I doubt you need me to say it. She would crack you open in two if you dared not to.”

X sighed, seemingly enamoured.

Chuuya flipped the file she handed him, leaning his arm on the chandelier brushing his shoulders — he dragged his eyes down analysis over analysis, and he landed on a familiar signature over the Yokohama PD stamp.

He stared at it for a long time.

He sighed, ripping the paper into shreds. “Damn you, Matsuda.”

There was a click! in the air, right as the last piece of paper floated down the table. Quicker than his brain could follow, he ripped a spare gun off the pocket of the nearest Guerrilla member — and threw it right into the opposite wall, where it sank all the way to the hilt.

Among the alerted mafiosi, frozen in their stop — silence fell like a piece of roof.

The wall the gun was deeply embedded in trembled. Something like participles of light and smoke pooled from the thin cracks of the entrance; with a rumbling thud!, the grenade hidden inside the drywall died down in a muffled burp, drawing webs all over the pillar it was leaned on.

He clasped his hands. “You’re welcome.”

In the endless rose-tinted ballroom of the Black Lotus Hotel, a podium had been set up at the end of the rows of circular tables and dancing couples, framed by a live orchestra that periodically muffled yawns into their elbows. A man in a long mustache was on that stage, agitating his glass of tasteless Champagne around with glee.

“...the word to perhaps one of the most vital collaborators in this election campaign,” Senator Ikai exclaimed, raising his voice to speak louder than the impersonal claps around him. “I do recall Senator Fukuhara’s wished to introduce him herself — so if she could please make her way to the stage!”

A waiting hum passed through the crowd. A few gazes were exchanged; Ikai’s smile twitched.

Chuuya stole a glass of red wine from the refreshment table, and toasted in Kouyou’s direction — stealing her twinkling eyes from the undoubtedly charming convo she was dancing through with some handsome ally of theirs.

One word, she mouthed. Efficient.

As always, he mouthed back.

That's two.

“I’m afraid she might have gotten stuck in the queue for the party’s pins. Understandable. I do hope you’ll have picked one up too — they are handmade,” Ikai laughed, amiably, much to the crowd’s amusement. “I’ll do this myself — please, give a round of applause to the public relations head of Mori Corporations, Ace!”

As the blond man grinned widely into the microphone, barely hiding revulsion when the Senator vigorously shook his hand, a voice noted: “You should attempt to drill punctuality into your squad, Chuuya. I almost thought Fukuhara might step onto that stage.”

Mori leaned onto his same column, keeping one hand into Elise’s beautifully styled hair, and holding a glass of water back with the other.

He had dressed up for the occasion — his red scarf was nowhere to be seen. It was utterly disorientating. “I’m the one who tells them when to come in, sir,” he rebutted, clinking their glasses. “Ane-san’s the one with time management issues.”

“Of course,” Mori’s smile turned amused. “And you will let her ground you?”

Ace went on a spiel regarding the support their organization had given to the winning party; wished a prosperous future to the new heads of their beloved city — and a peaceful collaboration. From the other side of the room, Kouyou threw her head back to laugh.

Chuuya shivered. “As if anyone could stop her.”

After a moment of consideration, Mori shivered too. “This is wonderful news, isn’t it?” he started again, curling one finger around the red ribbon in Elise’s hair. “The Cleanse was certainly a busy deal, but it ended in the best way possible. If the archivists are to be trusted, the syndicate had never held such a satisfyingly spread influence on the political side of Yokohama.”

“It’s reassuring,” Chuuya offered, carefully. Dazai was nowhere to be seen — probably already back to Yokohama, dragging his friends into some trouble. Nonetheless, he thought he could feel his gaze on him — warning him about the words he decided to offer Mori. “Maybe this time around we will actually have a peaceful year.”

“Only a few bothers left,” he sighed — still smiling. “Hopefully, we’ll be able to say the same for those assassination attempts. I’m thinking of calling a meeting for those, at last — a particularly long one. Perhaps the last one for a good while.”

Chuuya blinked. “You truly want to cut back on the Executives meeting, sir?”

“It would send a strong message,” Mori explained. “Don’t you think?”

There was more than one question there — he weighed his words, studying his wine; dared: “If the Executives need to discuss the future of the syndicate only once in a while — then it probably means the syndicate is prospering efficiently.”

The Boss smiled. “Precisely,” he said. After sipping on his water, he added, only a bit coyly: “It might be a shame for any — new addition to the seats, of course. Unless they had already gotten to enjoy the thrilling experience the meetings offer.”

Excitement growled in his veins. He cleared his throat, trying to remember what Kouyou had said about appearing untouched. Pathetically, he landed on: “Yeah, that’d be cool.”

“Cool,” he repeated, like a foreign language. “Chuuya, forgive the change of topic — I wanted to talk to you about the Permit.”

He straightened.

Before he could add anything, Elise came alive like a particularly tall wind up toy — tearing herself from his grasp, and pulling on Chuuya’s jacket. “Dance!” she whined, pulling his hands to drag him towards the few couples swaying. “Dance with me! I’ve been — oh!”

The yelp out of her mouth morphed into high-pitched giggles — Chuuya wrapped an arm where where her thighs began, raising her to face level; with an apologetic look to Mori’s amused face, he waited for his permitting nod and twirled them around to the dancing high society — she laughed, holding onto the chain of his hat.

Ace was still talking the room’s ears off. He thought of Q’s cell — let Elise talk his ear off about the latest fight she’d started with a kid at a clothing shop.

It took him a while, through the genuine contentment running under his skin, to realize it was a hand of bones he was holding.

From the outlines of the dancing circle, two familiar frames — steadfastly dripping blood on the frescoed tiles — raised their glasses to him in a greeting. “What brings you guys to the least interesting part of the whole ordeal?” Chuuya questioned, doing his best to blink against the fake layer of reality, as Elise ran off to steal some cake.

Mishima exchanged a glance with the purring cat settled over his shoulders. “We ought to see just how good of a facade we’ll have to wear during our more — official jobs,” he explained, at last, as if Kobo’s feline nod had meant something to him.

“No Fumiko?”

“She’s got enough experience with pretense as it is,” the man huffed.

One of his little fingers spasmed in his grasp; Chuuya thought of a cross on a field — and then he didn’t. “And your conclusion?”

“That the Port Mafia is astonishingly good at playing high society,” the man admitted. “Even more at gathering allies.”

Kobe purred, settling too-clever eyes on the most observed silhouette of the evening — Mori’s satisfied face, hand subtly attempting to steal a strawberry from Elise’s cake. He thanked Senator Ikari — pretended not to care for the stargazed, terrified half-bow one of the most powerful men in Yokohama offered him.

“No place that can’t be reached with some polished words,” Chuuya recited. Privately — where Kouyou couldn’t hide a grin and punish him about it — he thought the same about fists. “And no good words that can’t reach any place.”

A nod. “He might be a devil, but I would probably have a worse time not being one of his damned. Wouldn’t want to see what he does to the angels in the sky.”

The flashy metaphor painted a grimace on his face, quickly hidden behind the wine. Kobe, in a similar spirit — pulled the man’s beard with his claws, making him squeak, undignified. On the ceiling, the chandeliers glistened a coagulated, dirty crimson.

“Mishima,” Chuuya heard himself say. “I have a favor to ask you.”

Kobe meowed his interest, in tandem to the man’s curling eyebrow. “I’m at your service, sir.”

Hesitation crowded in the space between his teeth — he breathed in the lingering scent of copper, pooling from every corner he had walked since he’d first heard of Ueda’s existence. He wiped it clean. “I need you to ask me a question.”

All of the high-nosed, slightly amused calm dissipated from Mishima’s face — his shoulders fell with abrupt caution, as his ashy face went through a large variety of complicated expressions. “Is that an order?”

“Is that a problem?” Chuuya frowned. “Is there a cost to your Ability?”

“No, that’s not —“ He exchanged a glance with Kobe, again — a strange sight, but clearly a motion they were well used to. If cats could shrug, that was what Chuuya saw. “Something about your tone just makes me think you’ll ask for more than I should reasonably get to be privy to. The Commander was in such a hurry to get us out of the training rooms when —“

“I asked for a reason,” he interrupted. “I need to know, so — it’s better to just get it over with. I need you to ask me what I’m —“ His lips curled downward. He thought of Hirotsu’s broken monocle; Dazai’s two eyes, studying him under the jet of water. “What it is that I’m scared of.”

On stage, some woman in pearls spoke into the microphone. The crowd laughed; Elise did her best to drag Mori to the dance floor — whiny and incorporeal and blinking between ephemeral flesh and hard bones dripping blood.

Chuuya refused to lower his eyes.

“Truth is a delicate thing, Vice-Executive,” Mishima said — studying, he realized, the hands he kept in his pockets. “I would know. I learned it when I was young. I can’t give perfect judgement — I cannot ask both a ripe priest and a newborn if God is real, and expect the same answer. Does that make them any different? Make one of them less valuable?”

He tightened his lips — thought of Q, for some reason; the way they fell quiet when scolded, and grew louder when called a liar.

“My Ability has its limits — whatever it is that you believe to be truth, that’s what I’ll be told. I cannot offer you more than what you already know — whether you’re aware of it or not.” The man studied him. “But since you asked —”

He held his breath.

A sigh. “I suppose it costs me nothing.”

Kobe purred, blinking oddly gentle eyes in his direction. He fixed himself around Mishima’s shoulders and, surprisingly, made sure his head and his tail would cover the man’s ears, hiding his own under his jacket — burying Chuuya’s answer under the music, the crowd, and his fur.

“That’s —” He cleared his throat, staring at the ground. “Nice. Thank you.”

The User’s nod was calm — a bit respectful, he thought. Uncannily so, for a feline.

Standing close enough that nobody else would hear, Mishima’s lips parted, and he asked: “What are you scared of, Nakahara Chuuya?”

He felt it, this time around — he had been too focused on the flow of Tainted in his veins, in the training room; too distracted to care about the surge of air climbing his throat with relentless insistence, reshaping lithe words into something sharper.

He’d make for a good torturer; Chuuya let himself think; didn’t consider whether that was a normal judgement for a new acquaintance or not.

Everything was scarlett when he blinked — a grumous, dirty coagulation, dripping from the chandeliers and glistening crimson from the shards of crystal, painting blinding squares on the corpses on the floor. Everyone was dead; everyone was crushed — the horrifying shrieks and the haunting smell and the whispers were a storm, and he was in the eye of the hurricane.

His arm was elbow-deep inside Mishima’s sternum.

Sorry, he tried to say.

His mouth tore itself into pieces, and under Kobe’s moon-shaped eyes, he answered.

---

...

---

Notebook extract — [Page 21]

A building falling. He's under it (???)

The twins. Yuan?

Yuan.

The Sheep. Brains on the floor. Chipped table; let Kouyou know. Skeletons.

Pianoman (???) — had that ugly dress shirt he wore whenever we had a mission together. Maybe Lippman? Debris. Fallen building? Mackerel.

All of them.

All of them.

---

...

---

Despite his usual over-awareness, Matsuda only saw him when the last batch of ambulances arrived.

“I thought mafiosi didn’t go back to the crime scene,” he commented, fiddling with the pen in his pocket — a bright yellow, that day, with a little cartoonish sheep on top; funny, Chuuya thought, distantly — sliding under the police tape to reach him.

Crunched down on top of his police car, Chuuya shrugged. “I wouldn’t know. But if that’s the case, how do they get rid of the bodies?”

“Abilities.”

“Abilities?”

“There must be at least one or two that can take care of it.”

“You’d know better than me — given your late best friends at the Special Division,” he noted. Before he could reply, he added: “That wouldn’t work, anyway. Abilities are regulated.”

“Yes, Chuuya,” Officer Matsuda exhaled an exasperated — not unkind — sigh. “I’m aware.”

He jumped down — landing roughly, as he'd never needed Tainted to be agile; and he had skipped through the roofs of Suribachi with or without the service of an Ability. Not waiting for an answer to make his way down the sidewalk, he called: "Come on. Let's promenade."

Matsuda scratched the bridge of his nose. "You're spending too much time with Dazai."

Mostly by accident, he cracked the road.

The port was quiet at that hour; the end of the festivities had long since chased tourists away, and the afternoon sun was framed by lonely birds and a few fishermen. Chuuya considered walking on the rusty railing, testing his balance — recalled the weight of Detective Murase's shoulder against his, inside his jail cell; the way he had sat next to him and talked about passersby mistaking them for father and son. Wouldn't that be funny?

"How are your kids?" he asked, once the man began to grow antsy.

The Officer's gaze was unimpressed.

He held it.

Matsuda sighed. "They're fine. On a trip with their mother, right now. America. Having loads of fun. Mina told me to see hi to you."

A vague memory — sitting in the man's cell, watching a woman in a tailleur bring lunch into Matsuda's open office. Winking, and secretly offering him a chicken wing between bars. "I never did get why you two divorced."

"You certainly seemed to have big ideas on why," Matsuda muttered.

He made a face. Standard Island Accident. "If you're referencing that night, you might want to know that I barely remember shit from —"

"You implied my," He cleared his throat, staring forward. "My hairstyle might be to blame."

A beat passed.

"Is —"

"Of course it isn't."

"Alright, alright," Chuuya raised his hands. "I was just wondering if —"

"We wanted different things," Matsuda cut through, defensive. "She needed someone who'd place her above anything else — it's not an unfair request. Just not what I would have been able to give her. My job has always come first."

Beyond the railing, ships dangled gently on the unmoving waves, painting the bay into shades of a metallic, discomforting grey. Chuuya curled his fingers around the loose threads inside his pockets, and offered: "I know."

Matsuda didn't say anything.

I know you've been in my office again, he imagined him accusing — thundering and yet insistent, like a man locked in a cage with some unknown, immature beast. I know you've gotten rid of my files. I know you know I won't stop.

“Chuuya,” he called.

“Present.”

A beat went by; silence carried by the wind. “You probably don't remember,” the man started. “But the first time Murase and I met you —“

“Are you about to go down the memory lane? Because I really don't have time for —“

“And what did you come here for?” he challenged, disbelieving. “To threaten me, maybe? To — to drag me to some shady alley corner and talk about how you're going to leave my ex wife's carved up body on my porch?”

“No,” Chuuya studied the trash floating in the bay; beer bottles with no messages inside.

“No, I'd do it with your kids.”

A speechless, insurmountable silence shut the Officer's lips with eerie efficiency.

He didn't let that wisdom last more than a breath go by. “The first thing you ever did, the first time we met, was attack us,” he recalled — chin too proud for a man with a family, Kouyou would have said. “We hadn't spoken a word to you. 'Couldn't have been older than ten — you were carrying two kids back to your base. You would have had to put them down to go through with the attack — only reason you didn't.”

Chuuya scoffed. “Must have made an impression if you wasted time remembering.”

“You broke my nose. So, yes. Kind of. I still have the scar,” Matsuda tapped the bridge of his nose, absent. Bit down a smile. “My ex wife — she always said that scars are a result of being touched, just a tad too kindly. That if you're given one, that person is bound to come back in your life.”

Over the sidewalk, the after-lunch traffic raced itself at a torturously slow pace. He counted car tires until it all felt a little less unimportant.

“I'm not coming back, old man,” Chuuya offered, finally. “You guys are the ones who always failed to give up on a lost cause.”

Something revolting settled on the man's face. “You're not a lost cause, Chuuya —“

“I'm not trying to sell you a sob story,” he cut through. “I'm telling you the truth. You're the lost cause here, Matsuda.”

The man's steps came to a halt.

“You’re doing all this — for what?” he insisted, kicking the dirt. You’ll ruin your shoes, he could hear Kouyou tut. “What do you figure is going to happen if you get me out of here? You put me in some orphanage for the next few years, and I make a life you’ll approve of for myself? You’re an idiot if you think someone could run and not end up dead,” He stepped closer; raised his chin. “And you’re an idiot if you think I want to run.”

A familiar sight caught his attention from the corner of his gaze — the entrance to the Cemetery, as quietly untouched as it always was, on this time of the day. He raised both eyebrows to the Officer’s face — made his way inside with a careless skip in his steps.

Matsuda caught up quickly. “How am I supposed to know, if I don’t try?”

“You have examples,” he nodded towards the first grave on their left — thirty tombstones over the entrance; then right, then left — not slowing down. “You have Murase. The case you’re so obsessed with — enough to make a deal with one of the most powerful pilasters in the city. He ended up dead, you know?” He felt the man stop and stare at the grave; didn’t bother to do the same. “You’re the only one who can’t accept it.”

It was quiet for a long time.

He was already halfway down the trail that would lead him as far from the Flags as possible — unwilling to lead the officer to that place — when he heard him ask, scornfully bitter: “Can you?”

Chuuya thought of the concrete under his knees — a cross that carried Verlaine’s name; the shape of Adam’s strangely comforting presence at his back. A dead man in his arms. “I have,” He shrugged, pointedly devoid. “I’ve accepted all of them. Did the best I could with it, too — learned a lesson from it. That’s how you survive, Matsuda — not by playing with fire the way you are.” A humorless laughter shook him. “The way I am — standing here, trying to fucking warn you —“

Matsuda eyes’ appeared in front of him. “Why are you doing that?”

He studied him; let out a frustrated sigh. “A friend told me I should think it very nice, that someone would be willing to try and save me — despite me not asking for it,” A pause. “This is my payment. And my demand for you to stop.”

“Chuuya —“

“Most of the PD has already given up on most investigations regarding the Mafia — you’re the only one with files still open.”

“The Special Division is still searching —“

“The Special Division is different,” Chuuya snapped, voice low. “And you know it. Otherwise, they would have left the investigation to you guys, and they didn’t — you stole the files from them, didn’t you? Sent them to the Senator?” A flash of guilt passed by the man’s face; Chuuya stared, lips trembling. “I could almost be proud. Look at you — little criminal in the making —“

“I am not, ” Matsuda hissed, “A criminal —“

“I am.”

Surprise bloomed all over the wrinkles of his face, with no subtlety at all.

“I am,” he insisted. “And, as my Boss told you, if you keep interfering with —“

“You want —” the Officer interrupted him, speechless, “The Boss mafioso you work for to call Social Services on me?”

“If it’s necessary. Not like I regard those fuckers as any particular entertainment. But if it gets you to stop, that’s all I ask for,” Chuuya waved his unconcerned, dizzying goodbye with his hand still in his pocket. “That’s all I had to say to you. Have fun. Whatever.”

Despite it all, at the very least — the Flags’ fake graves were the same as they always were.

Chuuya had stopped expecting them to change a long time ago — had accepted that the passage of time was more of a long term deal, and he wouldn’t be there to witness spider webs and growing grass on that play-pretend of his. Anyway — their ashes were probably already corals and fish food; sticking to the ground of the bay with the same laziness they reserved for quiet Saturdays.

Something inside his chest pounded. Bile, he thought — the nauseating realization that it never got better. Just duller.

“I’ll tell someone else to visit if I’m not around,” he promised them, inspired. Maybe he could convince little Akutagawa to develop a taste for respecting the dead. He imagined his dark silhouette, huddled up in his too big coat with a vividly displeased face — telling tales of Dazai’s worst moments to five graves he didn’t know.

Matsuda’s arrival wasn’t sneaky.

He considered screaming into his face until he left; tried to remember why he hadn’t wanted him near his friends. Stared down Albatross’ stone until he stopped laughing at him.

“Why did you bring me to the cemetery?” the man asked, eventually.

He stood at a respectful distance; Chuuya sat on Doc’s grave, dragging his nails up and down the Little Doctor set he had stolen from Elise and left there, and shrugged. “Don’t know. ‘You never walked aimlessly somewhere?’”

Matsuda’s face dropped so quickly it was startling. He got the unpleasant feeling of having said something wrong.

“Chuuya, you’re seventeen,” the man said. It was hard to place the note in his tone; too sharp not to be personal. Begging, perhaps. “You shouldn’t be aimlessly walking to the Cemetery.”

“Would you prefer I broke into the Arcade again?”

“You’ve memorized this place’s map — you didn’t even hesitate at any turns,” he insisted. “The guardian greeted you by name. How often do you even come here?”

Defensiveness crowded tightly in the spaces between his bones; Chuuya tasted poison. “You know, I’d be an orphan even if I wasn’t with them. So I really don’t know what you —“

Matsuda took a step forward. The tips of his fingers tickled. “Chuuya,” he echoed. Chuuya, Chuuya — always the same melody. “You want to tell me you haven’t lost more than you would have if you hadn’t —“

“I don’t know,” Chuuya snapped.

Every scar down his body seemed to sizzle. Graves and blood and destruction; buildings being torn from the ground and the sky clawing itself open. Stitching himself up; asking Kouyou to help him put a tie on for a funeral. Mori, calling him — “But I do know I have people, now, and I have no intention of losing them. I know what I’m doing is the best course action to make sure I can do that. And if you just listened to me —“

The words got stuck in his throat — a mixture of ire and frustration, and the crawling bad feeling he had felt on his nape ever since Mori had smiled in the Officer’s direction.

Chuuya had nothing left of Suribachi City. He had destroyed it all himself.

— I wouldn’t lose you either.

“This job is my whole life.” Matsuda had stepped just close enough to touch. His coat was swept by the gentle wind; he studied his badge, and recalled being ten, and sure no man that tall would ever be kind.

You don’t expect kindness, one of the Sheep had told him. Kazuo, maybe; he couldn’t recall if it was on his deathbed, though. If you do, you won’t be able to save everyone.

Years later, bleeding under a cliff, Chuuya had thought: you can’t save everyone either way.

“Murase was a partner,” Matsuda breathed — and the grief in his tone was a known beast; as rough and scratchy as the rock he was sitting on. “A friend who got caught in something bigger than him, and who died for it. And I bet he did it with no regret — because he died doing what he wanted to do.” His eyes roamed through the graves — all the way to the skyline, half devoured by the sea. “Making this city a better place.”

Chuuya bit down a scoff.

“You asked me what would change if I only saved you, or a handful of kids,” the man echoed. “This is my answer: something.”

The knot in his throat was a hated enemy — he recognized it all the same. Helplessness; well hidden under fortresses he didn’t remember building, but had never failed to dive behind. Something deeper, too — a revelation that took his mouth by surprise, but never his bones.

“I’m fine, Matsuda,” Chuuya concluded. “I don’t want it to change.”

A light in the man's eyes shifted. For the first time since they had met, he realized — he did believe him. The desperation he saw pool down the branches of his body was a stab in the chest.

“I’m sorry,” Matsuda said. Pity and loss and something so ugly he choked on it; felt as angry as everyone swore he always was, Tainted ticking like a bomb under his gloves. The honesty in his tone deserved to be trusted fully. “Chuuya, I’m sorry.”

“I don’t need your —“

He stilled.

“Chuuya,” he heard the man call, slow — muffled and roaring, like white noises and waves and buzzes, distant in the way of memories. “Are you —“

He didn’t hear a thing. His eyes stayed stuck on the arm he had waved aggressively in the man’s direction — the raised sleeve, the edge of his glove. In between, his skin, scarred and known.

Framed by Corruption marks.

Chuuya stood so fast he almost fell against the graves. “What the —“

He choked on the sentence; the painful burn of the corner of his mouth ripping itself was familiar like a deja vu — something his body knew, but his mind had always failed to remember. A mark tore itself apart on his cheek, pooling warm, poisonous blood into his mouth — he coughed a scream out, throat soaked in that bitter taste, hands tight around it to squeeze the air out as the ground cracked under his feet.

His knees hit the dirty grass — soaked in clotted blood, all the way to the five gravestones he knew so well — now nothing more than rubble and intelligible names. Heaving for oxygen was pointless; and yet Chuuya tried, gagging against the never ending magma in his veins, snapping his bones in two —

His hands grasped something fleshy.

Doc’s halvened body stared at him.

Something tore free from his shoulders — as if his skeleton had refused to fit his flesh, at last. There was someone laughing. Chuuya watched the towers behind the entrance of the cemetery — the skyscrapers and the building and the Ferris Wheel, as they were sucked away from the ground in a horrifying whirl, devoured by a sky redder than his own wounds.

“No,” he heard himself say. He had to stop his hands from grabbing; he was standing upon a sea of corpses, and each inch he touched of them cracked itself open like the crust of the earth. “No —“

“How marvelous.”

A man was standing near the cobblestoned road, seemingly untouched by the chaos — his clothes weren't even ruffled by the wind. Beads of sweat crowded his bald head; he wore traditional clothes in shades of grey, and a pair of glasses that had been taped back together countless times.

He offered him a small smile. "Not many minds are haunted enough to be creators. You should be proud of the masterpiece you store."

Chuuya crawled up the sea of corpses, rage blinding his torment — and cracked a chasm into the man's face, dragging the earth out of its roots.

"Wrong target — as always," Ueda Akinari informed him, having somehow moved behind the destroyed graves. "I've noticed you have quite the recurring issue with that —"

His fingers closed around the edge of one of the knives hidden in his shoes. Throwing it was more of a reflex than a decision; when he raised his eyes, something between a groan and a scream got stuck in his throat.

"— You hardly ever understand who the real enemy is," Ueda's voice concluded, through Iceman's lips — seemingly untouched by the knife stuck through the wet layers of his throat.

Chuuya was sinking. The intricate weaving of squelching bodies was pulling him in, lifeless and unmoving and slippery, faces he knew passing by with their vacant eyes and bloodied teeth — faces he had never seen and knew belonged under the rubble of the buildings caving around them.

He tried to snarl; no voice came out of the chasms in his jaw — only whiny screeches, nothing more than an animal's cry.

"Come on, now," the Ability User tutted — his voice deep inside his skull, carved into the sky, everywhere. "Don't tell me you never expected a god to get hungry, eventually."

Chuuya blinked — framed by lightning spears of a ache so blinding, N's torture had been nothing but a child's whims — and found both his hands around Ueda Akinari's throat, burning flesh plastered against his, pressed on the nearest tree.

"Look at you," he cooed, unimpressed by the fingers tearing into the flesh of his throat — he touched vocal chords and he touched wet, bloody tissue, and the man only breathed between his palms. Chuuya could feel himself snarl; could feel his mouth spread wider than possible, torn by the Corruption scars devouring his cheeks. He couldn't *spea*k; he couldn't — "What was the point of asking for the truth, if you refuse to accept it?"

I'm not scared of you, he thought. The world was blurred at the corners; what he believed to be blood, stuck to his eyelashes, soon revealed itself to be visions — a quick, nauseating sequence of them, dripping knowledge and details into his subconscious faster than he could see them. I'm not scared of —

"I know you aren't," Ueda promised. "I'm in your head. How could I not?" He tilted his head to the side; disgusting bundles of flesh dangled from his neck, where Chuuya had clawed his way through. “You fear loneliness. You fear to be seen exactly how you are, under this play pretend of yours,” He curled a finger in the bleeding tear under his eye; traced the spiral with a nail — pain so irrelevant, compared to it all, that it tickled. “Under this fragile, stolen skin of yours.”

“Most of all,” he mused. “You fear you’ll be the only cause for it.”

The Sheep’s viscera on the floor; Shirase and Yuan reaching for him — his hands through Kouyou’s sternum, watching her scream and scream — blood on Mori’s mahogany desk, the organization in revolt, shaking the doors to open them as his clawing hands waited — Hirotsu’s crushed skull under his sole — his old apartment building, Professor N hanging from the red thread on the ceiling with a grin — the rubbles of it, crashing Dazai’s skeleton into dust, as he blinked a code to Chuuya’s too far, too far, too far —

The glint of Iceman’s lighter blinded his eye. A piece of concrete fell on Dazai’s body. Pieces of his brain landed at Chuuya’s feet.

— told you it was a bad idea, Kouyou tutted, hanging off Mori’s arm. Her gaze on him attempted to be subtle — the curve of her lip was disgusted. Must you truly place a bomb near the innocents and call it responsibility?

A doorknob under his hand; something too different from the neck he was meant to hold. The call on his tongue — useless, and hopeless already before it got out. The Old World — its blood-stained pavement. Entering and entering and entering, and never changing a thing.

Your fault, Adam had said. Torn, but logical.

“The truth,” Ueda whispered, old lips too close to teeth that just wouldn’t bite. Chuuya was coming undone in a body that wasn’t his, and he had no place to go. “The one you know — is that it’s easier to give up.”

His limbs protested the motion; struggled against the notion of destruction inflicted on anything but himself, struggled against the notion of being killed and thus contained and thus never again — Arahabaki a whisper that was never helpful outside of selfishness.

Be selfish, then, he snarled, and hoped the man didn’t feel it. Eat shit and choke, he thought, then, and hoped the man heard.

“The truth, Chuuya,” Ueda insisted, one hand in his hair, his voice N’s, his voice Verlaine’s, his voice his own — pushing his face into the sea of rotting flesh, again and again, again and again — “Is that you’ll never stop opening doors, expecting to see a massacre on the floor — and every inch of its blood dripping from your hands.”

---

Notebook extract — [Page 13]

All of them.

---

...

---

Yuan was sleeping.

So was Kouyou, inelegantly slumped over documents on the couch of her office. Hirotsu wasn't — but Chuuya stayed long enough to watch him direct his Lizards to some suspicious activity near their shipment's freight location, and deemed it enough. Nobody knew where Mori rested — but Tanaki seemed content, cleaning her revolvers under the desk. Kajii had fallen asleep on his table, surrounded by scribbles of lemons.

Yuan slept — surrounded by an amount of stuffed animals and abandoned homework that had his head spinning; dyed red hair brushing the floor from her strange position, as she snored just as loudly as the Sheep Snorer Champion always had.

She breathed — so did all of them.

Chuuya hid a good number of banknotes he knew she'd think were from Shirase under her desk, and made his way to the dumping site.

Only a cat was there to welcome him to the mountains of trash and malfunctioning parts; it blinked at him with a lazy sort of intensity, as he floated towards the shipping container not to dirty his shoes — as if the idea of clawing his calves to raw skin was tempting, but not enough.

“Trust me,” Chuuya muttered, attempting to slide the door open quietly — since he was clearly going nuts; haunted Cemeteries uncounted for. “I don't fucking know why I'm here either.”

The container was just as eerie as it never stopped being — framed by confusingly placed shadows, crowding over the only three pieces of furniture, the empty alcohol bottles, and the boxes bandages on the floor. If he squinted, he could see the leftover traces of the messy art that had once decorated the walls.

He wondered, not for the first time, what had made him wash it all away — moods or whim; or something less childish.

On the bed, Dazai slept.

No debris from a fallen building that the one being who could stop gravity hadn't grabbed; no crushed lungs. He was curled up to the wall — only that mop he liked to call hair visible. Chuuya hadn't expected anything different — Chuuya had dissipated that irritating weight between his ribs by the third visit of the night, the further he walked from the Cemetery.

There's enough bad stuff in the world, he'd told one of the younger Sheep, once, when she'd cried about ghosts.

He leaned back onto the door frame until the pressure of metal on his skull didn't burn — he closed his eyes, exhaling.

It got creepy rather quickly.

His coat and waistcoat were shrugged off; Chuuya left them on the minifridge, their hems covering his kicked off shoes. Dazai tended to sleep as plastered to the wall as possible; slipping under the covers was easy and spacious. He settled his back against the boy's own, and moved his foot just right — until their naked ankles were the only parts of them touching.

It was quiet.

Warmth seeped from the body-print left on the squeaky mattress; Chuuya burrowed until only his eyes emerged from the blanket, glaring at the line of moonlight painted on the wall from the slot of the door. It took Dazai half an hour to stop pretending he'd been sleeping at all.

He turned, disruptive — one side and then the other, trying to kick the blanket off Chuuya. He only rolled more firmly on his side of it.

Dazai turned some more. He slid closer and closer, until even his icy veins heated up the flimsy sheets. He pressed his chest against Chuuya's back; flopped his arm around his waist like a particularly slimy snake, heavy and somewhat sweaty.

He settled.

Chuuya blinked, cocooned — surrounded like a cage, his instincts let him know. It was weird.

"This is weird," he spoke up.

"Maybe," Dazai replied, tone sleep-laced and genuinely irritated, "If you weren't moping so loudly, no part of this would be happening."

Somewhat comforted by the notion that he had managed to aggravate him, he tapped two of his nails on Dazai's forefinger — clicking until there was no flesh under the digit, but only the silver of the stolen ring. "I'm not moping."

His finger twitched under the motion. "I can hear the sound from all the way here."

"And how would you do that —"

"This is a small, empty space, Chuuya," He moved the arm around him very inefficiently, perhaps in an attempt to show off the container. "Things echo. You should certainly be familiar. It must happen in your skull all the time."

Chuuya slammed his foot between his legs. The boy's shriek was muffled by the bite he left on his arm; he gaped, attempting to pull the pillow off from under his head — before Dazai laid on it with all the might of his bony, stubborn body.

They caught their breath.

"Bastard," he hissed.

"Simpleton," Dazai bit.

Outside, the wind howled, rattling the flimsy walls of the container with the dedication of a particularly pissed ghost. The shattered lightbulb on the ceiling dangled with a hellish screech.

Chuuya sunk a bit further into the bed; lost his concentration amongst the erratic heartbeat in the arm pressing against his ribcage — the absurdly cold quality of Dazai's naked skin. He concluded: "I fucking hate this place."

"That's not very nice."

"I'm not nice."

"No, you kind of are. It's pathetic. You're only un- nice to people who call you short."

"Of course, I'm not nice to liars," Chuuya moved the ring slightly upward on his finger; when he traced the space underneath, he noted it had left a delicate bump. "It's a shithole that's gonna get picked up and shipped somewhere, someday —"

"You mean like you tried to do that time I put all your belts in the incinerator —"

"And I will laugh so hard about it — but if you had some rationality, you would just —" For some inexplicable reason, Chuuya was struck by a crystal clear image: Dazai's shoes, thrown in every direction of their safe-houses. The stupid mug he kept making jokes about. His blood on the tiles of the bathroom.

"— Get yourself a damn apartment."

Dazai scoffed. "That's stupid."

“Why would that be —“

“I can hear the sea from here,” he said, as if it was obvious. Chuuya courteously did not point out that with that howling wind, all one would hear was an upcoming headache. “And such bare living conditions assure me I’ll leave nothing of any value behind, when I kill myself.”

Briefly, he thought of the bloodied grass of the Cemetery — debris, falling like the first snow on an open, bandaged hand. “What about the food in that pint-sized fridge?”

“Recognizing the familiar?” he approved, shifting his legs — just enough for them to press against the back of his thighs. He shivered, slightly disapproving. “There’s no food in the fridge, Slug. It’s broken.”

He turned his head just enough to glare. “Why the fuck is it there, then?”

Seemingly very serious, Dazai offered: “I like to crawl on top of it, when Mori is annoying enough to come around — and hiss at him.”

Chuuya stared.

“It always freaks him out,” the boy added. “I turn the lights off for dramatic effect, too. Kind of like that phase I had where I sneaked around the vents over his office? Remember? Surely you do.”

He flapped back onto the bed, unwilling to face him. “But I’m the damn dog.”

“You’re reaching self-acceptance, at last. I’m glad. Have you seen the tattoo?”

“Tat — what tattoo?”

A beat. “Don’t worry about it.”

“Don’t worry about —“

“Maybe,” Dazai interrupted, speaking right into the shell of his ear, “I’m talking about the half moon one. Ueda’s.”

There was a line of rust, on the underside of the bed. He dragged one finger over it, tracing the sharp edges with the velvet of his gloves. With nothing in particular in his voice, he asked: “You saw it?”

Instead of answering, his hand — so cold it was startling; scraped and carved in scars Chuuya knew too well — moved away from his waist, and ventured under his ragged dress shirt. It trailed up and down his hip to land on a spot at the small of his back — there, all five of his fingers pressed.

Blood flashed behind his eyelids — copper filled his mouth. He’d bitten his tongue.

“Right here,” Dazai said, very quiet.

He fought against the urge to close his eyes — wasn't able to shake off the feeling of being watched, despite the known presence guarding his back. Silence was always a balm; touch was a needle through the upper layer of skin on a finger, like the prank Shirase used to pull on the younger kids.

It doesn't hurt, he would swear. As long as you don't take it out.

“Alright, no,” Chuuya snapped, sitting up to bodily turn the other boy around, deaf to his yelps. “This is so fucking uncomfortable —“

“What am I meant to — hey!”

The turn and twist made the bed screech to the point of a responding — annoyed — meow from the cat outside, muffling even the wind, as a wide variety of limbs bumped against the metal wall on the side of the mattress. Right when Chuuya was sure the bed frame would not survive, he managed to lay Dazai on his hip, facing the wall — and wrapped himself around him.

“There,” He hummed, satisfied, rattling his knuckles against the bandages peeking from the edge of his pants. Dazai's waist spasmed just so.

The boy let his discontentment be known with the efficiency of a soaked cat. “I'm too tall for this, you deranged fool.”

“Propaganda.”

“Pro — do you know what propaganda is?”

Slowly — dragging that night into a never ending itch — Chuuya's spine unveiled a calmer layer. Dazai was a bit too bony and a whole lot too cold — sharp in weird places; annoying to hold in others — but he was known, and he was breathing, and he was real, and most of the things Chuuya had ever held onto were buried in the Bay.

Real, he hummed. He wanted to trace it on his waist; didn't quite want him to understand. Things got stolen from his death grip so very often; tightening it was a fool's last march. He tried to taste those words without bitterness: real.

“The engine didn't sound like your car,” Dazai said, voice muffled into the pillow.

“Ane-san got me a new one.”

“Already? Hedonism will be the ruin of you,” A sniff. “What for, anyway?”

“Long story.”

The name of the car didn't seem to surge any sort of excitement; recognition, even less. Chuuya huffed. “You know, there are only five models of this car in the entire fucking world —“

“That is so redundant,” he replied. “Are you sure you aren't compensating for something?”

“For the bundle of teenage angst that calls himself my partner, maybe,” he muttered, sinking his fingers where he knew a bullet scar rested.

Dazai gasped. “Rude.”

His slap was too lazy — it barely raised his arm from the bed. When it fell against Chuuya’s knuckles, though, bandages mostly undone — he felt scars under the pads of his fingers, all of them too precise. Kanji strokes. He settled his bitten lips on the naked portion of his nape, pretending the ink of his Port Mafia tattoo would pool between his teeth.

You’re my partner, he recalled. And wasn’t that complicated — wasn’t that the point of it all. You should know me.

“Say,” Dazai continued, after pretending to snore for a good twenty minutes. “What has Ueda been showing you?”

Chuuya didn’t know if it was a naming matter — if it was the tightening grip around his lungs, out of nowhere; quickly pushed into the corner of his body reserved for panic and torture and Corruption. All he did was blink, registering — and Dazai’s body was soaked in blood.

Drenched, perhaps, would have been more correct — he could feel the sticky, nodulose liquid seep through the fabric of the old shirt he wore to sleep; seep into his skin with a hum, as sickly warm as ever — as sweet to the back of his skull as always. He knocked his forehead against the blood-matted hair, very quietly. The bone poking out of his skin was rough to the touch; the squelch of brains was known, but he couldn’t recall the first time he had heard it.

Chuuya knew, with strange certainty, that he had been the one to kill him.

“A lot of corpses, mostly,” he offered.

The hopeful texture of Dazai’s voice spread nausea where the smell of rotten hadn’t reached. “Am I one of them? What do I look like?”

“No,” he bit — too fast, too angry, too late to take it back. “No, it’s — the Ability is meant to make me lose my mind. It’s people whose death would mean something to me.”

“Oh,” Dazai said, as if rational. The motion drooled blood from his hair on his lips. “That makes sense. A feral dog is a dangerous thing.”

“Shut up,” The feeling of bones and viscera under his grip was unpleasant — Chuuya couldn’t allow himself to let go. He had let go of Albatross for a second — just enough to glance back at Doc, because he’d sworn he’d saved him — and he had been dead in his arms a moment later. He had told Koda to stay alive, and he hadn’t.

Dazai was always flinging himself off the higher ground, anyway — skydiving off his rocker and tumbling down between the urge to die and the urge to find something better. Chuuya had seen it all, like a particularly repetitive, undeniably seat-gripping movie. It was always learning. It was always mourning. It was always the same muscle ache — sinking its teeth where his flesh was tender from loss and blame.

He curled himself around Dazai's body — like a corpse could be kept warm — and thought, fuck you.

“Sleep,” the boy called, between a yawn.

He scoffed. “Maybe if you closed that trash can for a second —“ “Chuuya,” he echoed, and — that had to be a tone developed for him, sewn around edges he hadn't even realized he sported. It ran down his spine like No Longer Human did. Dazai burrowed himself further into the cave of his chest, the curve formed by his tense body — the two of them, cursed to a lifetime of surgically modified puzzle pieces; fitting even when left to the dogs and the vultures. Double Black until the end of their days.

“Sleep.”

Something was stuck in his throat.

Alive, he told himself. Yuan was snoring and Kouyou was sleeping and he was the only one left, still curled around a skeleton that wasn't even real. What did he even care? The bones were his as much as the flesh — Dazai's blood was his to spill and to stitch closed. He'd claimed it at fifteen.

I memorized the sound of Albatross' steps on my roof, he could have told him. I still know every poem Virgil ever wrote. I saw Yuan laugh the other day, and I realized I'd never seen her do that before.

A less cowardly route: you are mine to keep, and I will fail.

Instead, Chuuya pressed his head on the pillow until he saw stars, and ordered: “Don't tell me what to do.”

The corpse settled his thigh right by his hip. He bled on him all night.

---

...

---

All of them.

Rimbaud.

---

...

---

Chuuya was doing his best to force one of Tanaki's cough-repellent teas down Akutagawa throat, when a group of Lizards carrying a bloody bag made its way through the Entrance Hall.

Gin was with them; after an obscure nod to Hirotsu's hurrying frame, he made a beeline for his brother — still awkward, when he sat next to his stupefied frame, but decisive. "What was it this time?" Chuuya questioned, eyes on the pale hand appearing from an unsealed corner of the bag.

"Assassination attempt," Akutagawa said, after studying his sibling's hand motions. "They stopped him in the elevator."

Is this going to last forever?, Gin asked. He didn't flinch when his brother fixed a loose strand of hair from his ponytail; subtly, invisible to eyes that did not know — he settled his foot next to the boy's. What are they even hoping to accomplish?

"Causing Executive Dazai troubles," his brother huffed. It turned into a coughing fit.

"When is he not to blame," Just before Akutagawa could protest, Chuuya ruffled both of the kids' hair. "Stay here. Let's see if Tanaki knows something more. And drink your damn tea before I shove it down your throat."

A dirty glance. "I don't like you."

"I'm your superior," Chuuya noted.

"I still don't like you."

Gin hit his arm. Chuuya pulled his ear.

Thanks to the hushed whispers Tanaki had exchanged with Hirotsu before he left, leaning over her messy — as it always was, lately; through the storm of new seals and official matters that arrived at the Mori Corporations' doors — desk, she was able to sigh: "The lad slipped something in his tea, and then made his way to his office to watch him die with it,” Her expression was politely offended. “How foolish. Everyone knows Boss dislikes tea.”

“But he was drinking it today.”

“I know,” she lamented, peeved. “I brought it to him, along with Akutagawa’s — he’s been so worried these last few days. I only wanted to —“

“It’s cool,” Chuuya reassured her, tapping two fingers on the tattooed hand she’d abandoned upon a weapon deal file. She didn’t even act too weird about it. “Like hell he’s going to blame you. He’s got bigger fish to worry about.”

“Of course he isn’t,” Tanaki slumped into her seat, massaging the eyebags under her eyes. “Have you ever seen him blame someone? Openly, and for slightly less than apocalyptic mistakes? One wonders how he maintains an empire of terror, with that attitude.”

Chuuya shrugged, leaning against the counter — studying the uncharacteristically gentle texture of the whispers Akutagawa offered to his sibling. Some of the mafiosi who had no idea of who Gin was had been talking about them — surprised that Dazai’s feral mutt would be open to making friends.

I don’t think he quite knows how to do that, was all that Chuuya had offered.

They had all laughed, misunderstanding. He had made sure to order them a three hour long training session.

“Most of the syndicate likes him exactly for that attitude,” he commented. “It’s not like they don’t fear him to Hell, anyway. “

A new voice thundered mockingly between them, as Hamamoto jumped to sit on the counter. “To be acclaimed and to be cowered upon is a necessary contrast — and on, and on. Or whatever that guy said,” He offered Chuuya a wink. “What would you know about it?”

Chuuya got him in a headlock quicker than the man could yell about. “Some mighty words for the man who’s trying to get you guys paid holidays —“

“Owe you my life. Ouch, Boss —“

The sound of wheels slithered out of the elevator; one of the cleaners walked along with the water carrier, and didn’t meet anyone’s eyes before starting to mop the dried red stains on the elevator — possibly, drops from the hand that had been hanging out of the body bag.

A somewhat tenser current overtook the silence. Tanaki cleared her throat, studying some casual documents; Hamamoto extracted himself from his weakened grip, eyes hard.

“How many does that make it this month?” she asked, eventually.

“Six, I think,” Chuuya replied.

Hamamoto tsk-ed. “Seven.”

He frowned.

“You missed one of them, remember?”

“Oh,” Tanaki nodded, unaware of the bitter gaze the boy was directing to him. Chuuya stubbornly kept us eyes on the mopping. “That theatrical lady — the one who went to die in front of poor Dazai’s door.”

His subordinate scoffed. “Poor.”

“Hamamoto,” he called, without turning.

“I’m just saying that —“

“That’s easy, then,” he insisted, Kouyou’s words in his ears. “Don’t.”

Tanaki’s eyes roamed. “What’s this?”

Waiting for his neck to creak, Chuuya tilted his head from one side to the other. “Hamamoto here is genuinely convinced the shitty bastard is on the verge of a coup d’etat.”

The man’s mouth opened; closed again.

“Not like he’s the only one.”

“Tanaki.”

“Not me,” the woman tutted, frowning at the marble of her counter. “Not me, Chuuya. But the numbers are high anyway. It makes no sense to ignore it,” She rattled her nails on the surface. “Just yesterday, the Commander had to intervene and stop a suspected secret meeting in Building Three.” A wet smack echoed; the cleaner pushed the water-carrier inside the elevator. Before the doors could close entirely — Hamamoto jumped off the desk, hurrying to ask the man a question. “Let’s just say that some generally believe that if Dazai stuck a knife in Boss’ chest — everything might just turn out for the better.”

The perspective was horrifying. Chuuya still didn’t understand. “The Port Mafia has never been more powerful than it is right now. What is it that they want?”

Tanaki’s smile was a small thing; he got the feeling of having missed a joke.

“What is it that people want, Chuuya?” she encouraged, leaning her chin on her hand. The X of her scars glistened under the chandeliers; two lines of a child’s masterpiece in chalks. “Money. Freedom. Happiness — if you don’t know what you don’t have, you’re going to believe it to be the best thing in the world to gain. If you don’t know what it can be — it makes sense to imagine it as something wonderful. Doesn’t it?”

He tried to imagine it. When he wasted a few seconds wondering what a kid’s life had been like, before the tanks and the codes, he imagined it kinder than realism would have asked for.

He thought about Fumiko’s vision.

“Most of them are convinced Dazai’s touch was fundamental in most steps that brought us to this success,” Tanaki added. “So they’re sure that if he were given the freedom to actually rule more...”

He snorted. “As if he already doesn’t?”

“What?”

Chuuya hesitated — only for a moment. He leaned a bit further over the edge of the desk, lowering his tone. “Have you ever noticed just how many of our departments Dazai regulates?”

The woman paused. “Not really.”

“I was curious — I checked the archives. He deals with the defense squad. He came up with the security system. He helps Kouyou with the torture, regulates the executions, directs a branch of the Intelligence — and he’s Mori unofficial left hand.” He made a face. “Probably why I’m always doing his fucking reports — adding Double Black and Akutagawa’s training to the mix, that means there’s nothing in this syndicate that doesn’t pass by his hands. I mean — he should still do his damn reports, but — isn’t that a bit —“

“Too much responsibility?”

Chuuya didn’t like that wording, but he didn’t know how to find a better one. “Sort of.”

Concern? For the good of the organization in that weirdo’s hands, maybe. He still recalled the undeniable dread settling on his shoulders, as he snooped around — Dazai’s signature, everywhere. Despite what he wants you to believe, he recalled telling Akutagawa, he is not the Port Mafia.

“Maybe it’s jealousy,” Chuuya concluded, at last. “I mean — at least, I get why the fucker’s always taking naps in my office.”

Tanaki chuckled — nostalgic in a way that should haven’t sounded as heartbreaking as it did. “He still does that?”

“He slept in my vents the other day,” His eye ticked. “I thought I was getting haunted —“

“Surely a reliable person to lay most of the syndicates’ deals on.”

“He has his stupid slimy hands everywhere,” Chuuya shuddered. “But that’s only because Boss trusts him, so —“

“You don’t understand where this wave of rebellion is coming from?” she questioned.

“No, I get it,” Dazai had a certain charm to him — a honeycomb dripping a poisonous type of gold, maybe. Chuuya could understand the urge to trust him and his devilish plans; for a price. “I just don’t see why any rational being would want to be under Dazai’s guidance.”

“If that ever happens,” Hamamoto started, making his way back with a distinctively displeased curve to his mouth, “I’m leaving the Port Mafia. Even if they kill me for it.”

Chuuya rolled his eyes, tilting back to study the Akutagawa siblings’ whispers. “You’d still be under my command, you know.”

“And you’d be under his, sir. ”

“As if I’d ever obey the orders of a stinky mackerel with delusions of grandeur —“

“If he’s the Boss,” he insisted, “You’ll have no choice not to.”

“He’s not going to be,” he reminded him, at the very pulsing edge of his patience. “This isn’t happening. It’s all pointless discourse.”

“How do you know that?”

“Hamamoto.”

“Do you know what the last assassin did?” the subordinate hissed. Tanaki’s eyes laid on him, startled. His arm waved towards the elevator. “I asked. He carved Dazai’s name on his arm.”

“What a tasteless tattoo,” Chuuya mused, an eye left on Akutagawa’s reluctant tea-drinking.

“Do you really think this is something born out of nowhere?” Revulsion tightened his eyes. “That he’s done nothing to increment the desire for something different?”

The flame to the moths, Mori had explained. He always seemed to trust Dazai a bit more than Dazai gave back. “That’s not what I said.”

“Then what —“

“I’m saying that fanaticism is easy to arise,” Chuuya said. He recalled the graffiti on the walls of Suribachi; cartoonish depiction of the prisoner of war who had supposedly evoked Arahaki, and strange symbols narrating The End. Once, he had stolen a tourist’s camera, and taken a picture of himself under the scribble of one of the myth’s halos. “You think people have never started cults in the name of martyrs?”

“He’s not dead.”

“And he’s not a revolutionair. He’s not some psycho, plotting and rubbing his hands evilly behind Mori’s throne. He’s too lazy for that,” He spread his arms, a bit annoyed. “No matter how many assassinations you guys plan for him —“

Tanaki’s head snapped up. Hamamoto took a step back. “We didn’t —“

“Someone did,” Chuuya cut him off. “And it’s not going to work, by the way. I would know. Do you even have any idea of how many times I’ve tried to snap his neck? The jerk has the survival skills of a rat in the sewers — you people are worsening the issue.”

He laughed, disbelieving. “People willing to die for our Boss are worsening the issue?”

“His supporters feel strengthened by your fear that he might actually do it — it makes it real. It makes people perceive him as a real threat —“

Hamamoto’s voice raised — louder than anyone had dared against Chuuya in years. “And how do you know he isn’t?”

“He’s Dazai, for fuck’s sake. ”

He failed to realize just how loud he’d snarled those few words.

Akutagawa’s eyes were on him — stuck to that personalized siren’s call of his. Hamamoto seemed lost.

Chuuya didn’t know how to explain — would never willingly do it, and might never find a way to. Hating Dazai was the same as trusting him — inevitable as gravity. There was no despising him without the quiet, unshakeable truth of it — they walked the same lifeline, and Chuuya would be the only one to sever it.

Now don’t be a child, he could hear Kouyou tut.

How, he thought. Childishness and Dazai were as intertwined as the cables of a bomb; as the push and pull of the game stations at the Arcade. How?

“And you’ve been bordering insubordination a few times too many, lately, Hamamoto,” Chuuya warned, stepping close enough to fill his visual field. Instinctively, the man straightened. “I’m still your superior, and he’s still your Executive. If you’re as loyal to the syndicate as you say, you’re going to watch your tone when you talk about him. For your own good.”

“Sir —“

“For your own,” he spelled out, paying no mind to the way Tanaki had paused every motion, in the background. He needed him to get it — needed him to be far away from Kouyou’s rational observations. “Good, Hamamoto.”

A muscle in his jaw trembled. “Yes.”

“I didn’t hear that.”

“Yes, ” Hamamoto echoed. “Yes, sir.”

Chuuya held his gaze a bit longer. Let go.

Despite not having been touching him, the moment he stepped back, he saw him sag against Tanaki’s desk, knuckles white around its edge. From the couches, Akutagawa was halfway to his feet, Gin’s hand around his wrist. Their eyes met, lit in something too similar — Chuuya felt, out of nowhere, an unknown sense of shame.

“Well,” Tanaki cleared her throat. “Which one of you guys wants to do a little commission for me?”

---

...

---

Notebook extract — [Page 13]

Drowning? Someone.

The squad. Shibuwasa’s castle?

Kouyou. Blood. Is that supposed to be her — on the floor of the bathroom. Is that relevant?

---

...

---

“You —” he started, speechless, “What?”

“I don’t know the details, really,” Kajii shrugged, forcing Chuuya’s open hand to close around the report he’d handed him. The roar of conversations in the ballroom behind them was a rush of indistinct voices — he couldn’t focus on anything but those senseless words. “Executive Kouyou threatened to have my head if I asked too many questions. Said it was your business.”

“But you —” He trailed off. “I don’t get it.”

“What’s there to get? The Special Division now has nothing on you,” Kajii tilted his head to the side. “I tried to ask what they had on you, but Hirotsu sent me this nasty look — that Guerrilla squad of yours seemed ready to tear me apart. So I just collaborated quietly. How unfair. Such a noisy group of people coming together and you manage to make them subtle.”

There were a few blood stains on the file — a clear sign of a hurried handling. His eyes roamed through information and pictures of Division members — specifically, according to Kajii, the ones who had handled his information during his planned capture last year, before the Dragon Head Conflict.

All of them dead.

All the information they had on him — vitals and Ability datas and confused notes on the very little they knew about the Arahabaki project — now, in Mori's hands only.

“Executive Kouyou believed it unfair that most information on Port Mafia members had long been wiped off their archives, but not yours — especially since it seems to be so needlessly intricate. Why, dude, anyway?” Kajii continued. “She organized a mission — though she did ask for your Guerrilla to help. They were glad to, by the way, but I want to say that I did most of the work,” He made a face. “The old man, too. And I guess Golden Demon was important, and your squad took care of the left wing for the secret infiltration — whatever! ‘Took a whole week, you know?’”

A pause. “We can't exactly reach all the Governmental documents on you, and the Special Division is only one part, but isn't it better than — why are you looking at me like that?”

Chuuya was locked in a haze.

Memories pulsed painfully in the back of his skull, this time all but enchanted by an Ability — the Flags offering him a photograph; Albatross ruffling his hair; his ears catching fire. His squad, coming to rescue him from the Special Division Headquarters, even if they knew he could do it on his own.

Running off. Returning. Losing his chance to —

“You did that,” he insisted, slow. “For me?”

“No, for Elise,” Kajii snorted. A hint of embarrassment pooled on his cheeks. “I mean, I — I do owe you stuff, man. I know I act like — but I don't forget it. Ever. Second thought next to, you know — death, probably. You're always breaking that back of yours for us, so —”

Petrified as he felt, his eyes roamed through the crowd. Mori had invited every mafioso that would fit the room — he had something to say; a celebration of the official new city regime; maybe. The Guerrilla was mingling, laughing hard and familiar. Kouyou's eyes were easy to find, rolling amusedly in Hirotsu's face.

She winked at him.

“Dude? Are you listening to me? If you're so upset, I can try to ask them if there's any files left — I could un-explode them, maybe. What's even on those things? Is it your parents? Ugh. I get the distaste. You know, my —”

Chuuya wrapped one arm around Kajii's shoulders, forcibly dragging him into a half hug.

A squeak tumbled out of his mouth, as he choked through it. He blinked hard, jaw clenched so tight it hurt — held onto the shoulder of his coat until his knuckles turned white.

“Thank you,” he forced out. He tried to say more — still couldn’t.

Kajii was still blinking when he pushed him back. “Uh, I —“ He cleared his throat, scarlet. “No problem. Just a few bombs here and there — you know I like those. No problem at all. No —“

The sound of a spoon clicking a glass echoed — both from the open doors of the ballroom and into the in-ear Chuuya was wearing — along to the Black Lizards and the Guerrilla; the latest defensive move the assassination attempts had brought. Mori stood behind the head of the table, smile subtle and shoulders straight. “If I could have your attention for a minute?”

Kajii’s eyes widened. “Oh, God, I forgot to take my bombs off the banquet table —“

He watched him run off into the crowd with a sigh. Before he could step into the room and offer his whole attention to the Boss’ parting lips, a sight at the end of the hallway caught his attention.

He hesitated.

From the first rows of the audience — turned to offer all their attention to Mori, as if not forced to — he met a bandaged gaze. Dazai, one arm jokingly intertwined with Sakaguchi Ango’s own, turned his head imperceptibly. With one last glance to the ballroom, Chuuya made his way to the only silhouette left in the corridor — not fast enough to catch the one disappearing behind the elevator doors.

“Fumiko,” he called.

The woman flinched — rising from her crunched position; abandoning her half-tied heels to themselves. “Oh — hello there, Executive. You look absolutely slick, if I may — not as much as I do, though.”

He could concede that. Her kimono was the same shade as her overly long hair, this time tied in two braids — formal clothing made her look older than she probably was. More posed.

“Did I interrupt you guys?” he asked.

“Mmh? No, no — Madame Tanaki and I were just exchanging stories. She’s always such an entertaining person to talk to, isn’t she?”

Chuuya agreed with a nod. “Was you guys’ first meeting fun?”

“I wouldn’t quite say fun,” Fumiko replied, sucking on her teeth. “But I do always enjoy a love case and a murder intertwined.”

“A love case?” He frowned. “You killed her husband. Wasn’t it kind of the opposite?”

“Not if she asked me to do it to marry her next husband,” the woman chuckled. “In that case, it is somewhat romantic.”

“There are probably better ways to ask for a divorce.”

“Better than murder?” she insisted. “For a woman? How naive.”

The carefully timeless voice in his in-ear cleared its throat. Speaking with an absent smile that was tactile, Mori began his speech.

“Not all of you know me,” he said, as the hushed murmurs in the background faded. “Not by face, at least. It has always been a tradition in the Port Mafia to keep the man on the seat hidden — to make the name of the Boss an incorporeal thing. Something known, but not felt.”

Fumiko’s hand wrapped around his wrist, colder than he had expected it to be. “Come on,” She nodded towards the stairs. “Let’s take a walk.”

“But —” Chuuya pressed the in-ear closer, glancing towards the now-closed doors. At last, he resolved to miss whatever veiled announcement Mori was offering, and shrugged. “Alright.”

“I had a mentor before taking the seat,” he continued. “Among the many of the lessons he gave me, the most important has always been this — no cleverness can exist to the point of not having trust. And no amount of trust can blind the need for cleverness.”

“Where are we going?” Chuuya wondered, by the time they had skipped down the last step of the Building.

“I’ll tell you when the stage fright passes, if you don’t mind. For now, we’re just taking a walk,” Fumiko answered, twirling in circles in the opposite direction — so she could easily wiggle her eyebrows at him. “You know, Vice-Executive, I’m very curious about you.”

He tilted his head. “I’m somewhat curious about how you keep all that hair in place.”

“Takes some time. But it looks nice, doesn’t it?”

He nodded. “Dyed?”

“Bingo,” Fumiko made a face. “It used to be all brown. Didn’t quite like them,” A pause — she let out a humorless, dry chuckle. “Actually, my ex-husband didn’t.”

“You were married?” Chuuya blinked. “You’re very young.”

“And I got married even younger,” she confirmed. “Not my best choice. But I did. Things didn’t quite end up well. I believe it’s part of why I was so eager to help Tanaki.”

“So,” he said. The ballroom was drowned in attentive silence. “Consider my appearance here a sign of trust — and a smart move. I’m sure among us there are those who will think of me in good faith — as someone who desires to show that there is change happening, from the dark times this organization went through,” A paused; an amused tilt to it. “As I am sure some will not believe it.”

A lingering suspicion sneaked in. “Fumiko, did you kill him?”

“No need,” She offered him a smile. “His new wife did it for me.”

Confusion had to have shown on his face. Fumiko snorted, jumping over a bench in her way. The early evening crowd directed double glances to her appearance — but if it touched her, she didn’t react. “You know, when we divorced, he told me he had two lovers on the side. He asked me to pick which one I would rather he married — as a result on my good name in the underground scene,” she added, her sarcasm sharp: “You know, people rarely get married and let it be known, in our business. But we were — a duo, of sorts.”

Chuuya stared. “That’s the most asshole move I’ve ever heard in my life.”

“Right? But I picked anyway. And I picked right — she was just waiting for a chance to take his title. She did,” Her grin grew somewhat darker. “Then I fucked her, and went on my way.”

“Makes sense.”

“You think so? Thank you.”

Two twins in front of a nearby shop began to cry — un-soothed by their father’s awkward attempts at calming them down, under the crowd’s stares. People’s glances at them were less distracted than they might have been before; Chuuya had heard — from one passing, tired News channel to the other — that voices of an Ability User capable of targeting the mind were spreading.

Unlucky, Mori had commented, clearly displeased. That’s what we are here for. Probably a fluke, he considered, as he watched the man shush his boys. Children cried just to cry.

“Chuuya, I wanted to apologize.”

His steps slowed down. “Apologize?”

“My question to you,” Mori said. “Near the end of these renovating times the Port Mafia has gone through — of our best attempts to stand again from the hunger the previous Boss left us in — is this: while I don’t doubt everyone of you would gladly bleed for this organization — why would you?”

“Yes,” Fumiko insisted, hands pulling at each other’s fingers. “The other day — it was the Commander, who asked me to use my Ability. I tend to ask before subjecting anyone to —“

“Oh,” Chuuya interrupted her. “No, that’s fine. Really. Hirotsu told me. He was,” The pile of reports from Kouyou’s mission pressed against his back, where he’d hidden them. Nothing more than names of men who had dared to know too much about him — perhaps, not something he should have cared for as much as he did. “Convinced to ask you.”

The woman dared: “And did it help?”

Discomfort tightened his shoulders. “I’m not quite convinced there’s something I need help with,” Vivid Ability-induced hallucinations aside. “I’ve been trying to... I don’t know. Self-reflect and stuff.”

A snort. “That sounds boring.”

“It’s so boring,” He waited a breath — then asked, before he could regret it, “Do you really not see anything from the visions you send?”

“They’re not visions,” Fumiko corrected. The gentle motion of her swaying braids was hypnotic. He wondered if she had picked the red, or if her husband had. “Not quite. I extract things that are already there in your mind. Weave them together into possibilities that have not manifested in real life — but that might have.”

He Frowned. “I don’t know if I follow.”

Patiently, she insisted: “You know when you lay awake at night, and you keep thinking — oh, I could have done this in this situation. Or — if the choice came, I would do this. Saying that I see what I offer is not right — but I am sort of aware of what kind of choices I’m offering you.”

“For example?”

“I know I offered you the chance to save certain people — which you did. I know I offered you the chance to save yourself — which you never did,” Fumiko twirled once more, fixing the sash of her kimono with a content sigh. “All around, my conclusion is that you’re among the most peculiar, fascinatingly suicidal beings I’ve ever attacked. How nice,” She gasped. “An ice cream stand!”

He stared at the empty place she’d left.

Things crowded under his eyelids — the roar of his bike tilting and climbing up walls; the slippery ground when Madame Tanaki forgot to tell him they had mopped the floors; the way his fingers had curled when Kouyou had told him, he kind of looked like you.

“Because it is your only home?” Mori asked. “Because you’re loyal to the cause? Because you want money; because you’re scared of what might happen if you weren’t; because you care for the people inside it; because you’re scared of them? All of it has some worth. It means all of you are here for a reason. And that all of you will serve this organization in the best way possible — for a reason.”

Chuuya had to run to catch up with the woman, excitedly jumping up and down in front of an ice cream stand — directing the man in white behind it to build her a seven flavors cone.

“Hey,” he said, the moment he caught up, a bit breathless. “No — no. You got me all wrong.”

Fumiko vigorously bit her ice cream — cone and all. “Mmh? Did I?”

“The suicidal maniac?” he insisted, half in disbelief. “My partner? You might have seen him around. He looks like an escaped mummy, only uglier than even two thousand years in a box could make him.”

“I know Executive Dazai, silly,” the woman replied. “I meant sir. Sorry. But I’m talking about you. More than one person can be suicidal at the same time, you know?”

“Sure,” he said, “I’m not, though.”

“Alright. I believe it, if you say so.”

Chuuya kept his eyes on her, unconvinced.

“I will tell you mine, though. The reason I would kneel and have my head cut to make sure this organization lasts even just a day more — is because of this city. And because I believe no one can protect it as well as we can,” Through the murmurs, the doctor’s voice stayed the same. “I believe that if it wasn’t for us, chaos would have already stormed in — torn the towers down and destroyed everything Yokohama is.”

The option had never been there, truly — the Sheep had taken him in, and the least he could have done was deserve it. The Flags had given him a place to be safe and climb his way to his truth — Chuuya had failed them. His squad had entrusted their lives to him.

They keep giving, he wanted to say. They keep giving and giving and giving, and I’m undeserving and overflowing, and I have nothing to give back but my hands.

Take my hands, Q had told him, once, over bloodied fingers, I don’t want to look at them.

Fumiko’s smile was indulgent — not patronizing, but somewhat deeper. “Introspection is a complicated thing, Chuuya,” she offered, with a sour tone — devouring the last of her ice cream like someone would take it from her. “I think that’s why me and Mishima get along so well. With his truths — we understand that there’s something inside that people aren’t always ready to face.”

“Since we have the ability to make them face it, we are often disliked,” Her smile was critical. “The underground was never very friendly with us. They feared us. But Kobo was different — He’s always been so empathetic. The sensibility of his animal flesh, maybe. Animals are better than people, aren’t they? Like dogs. I love dog.”

“So do I,” he sighed.

“The Port Mafia doesn’t really allow pets, though, does it?”

Chuuya blinked. “I don’t think they care?”

“No, it would be too crowded,” Fumiko assured, with a skip in her steps. “Considering all the slobbering mutts calling themselves mafiosi.”

“Soon,” Mori said, with a tone that he could almost see him exchange a glance with Kouyou before using, “Very soon, this organization will be granted an Ability Permit. On that day, you will know and you will feel that Yokohama is ours. As it was always meant to be,” he insisted. “Protectors defend without looking for a gain, is what a better man might tell you — but I am no better man. And I believe protection earns something — a right, for those of us who would be shamed if they stepped out of the shadows, to call this place ours.”

He paused.

“Like that pathetic show that’s going on right now, back in the ballroom. Your in-ear is really loud, you know?” Fumiko sang, throwing the tissues left from her ice cream to the ground. She reached for her braids, absently pulling their ends. “Everyone obediently kneeling at the words of a single man promising them greatness.”

“What do you think got to them the most? The passion in his voice? The promise of having something?” Her scoff could have been a giggle, from how deeply unstable it sounded. Chuuya kept his eyes forward, gently directing both their steps to a less crowded area of the main street. “I’ll tell you what it is — it’s the promise of blood. Only a few weeks in the Mafia, and I’ve already come to the conclusion that it’s the greatest assortment of bloodthirsty people I’ve ever met in my entire life.”

A man appeared from the nearest alley. Chuuya registered a bald head and taped glasses.

He came to a halt.

“And?”

Fumiko shrugged, tilting back until she could stare at the appearing moon, huffing. “Who knows. I just think it’s kind of funny — the protectors of the city. The Special Division doesn’t believe that at all, you know?”

“For those of you who wish to share a piece of that protection and of that gain — I will be more than glad to accept your show of loyalty.”

His lips moved of its own accord. “What does the Special Division have to do with it?”

“For those of you who don’t,” he added, after a pause. “Who believe, perhaps,” The beat of a glance to the side — murmurs of a name Chuuya could have recognized even deaf. “That someone else might lead you to that target a bit more easily — Well. I certainly believe oaths are to be respected. The Port Mafia is not to be left — if not in a coffin in the bay.”

“Whether you wish those ashes to be cried or spat upon — do not fool yourself into believing I’m the one forcing you to make that choice,” A tactile smile. “The choice is always yours.”

“It’s weird,” Fumiko insisted. “Because they’re just as bloodthirsty — but they would never call it that. I’m pretty sure they call it, sense of honor or something. Look how far they went — all just to make sure you guys wouldn’t gain some influence that you gained anyway in the end.”

The sound of a raised glass pinged against his ear. “To the Port Mafia!”

A chuckle. “They’re pretty mad about that. Mad enough that they just — forgot a few locks or two in their cells,” The woman let go of her braids — leaned against the nearest bench, moving her hands in circles to make her wrists snap. “And so that nice, old Ability User they picked to get rid of the actress — it became a little bit of a problem. So did the others they wanted to use, of course.”

A wave of voices — blank and loyal and terrified. “To the Port Mafia!”

A rush of clothes — murmurs raising, and then that name, again and again, Demon or Dazai or just him — the hush of knees hitting the floor. Gasps and voices, tickling the shell of his ear. Chuuya could see it: an ocean of people waiting to show their loyalty. And Dazai Osamu, first in row, kneeling faster than any of them could move — offering his tattooed nape to Mori’s pleased smile.

The roar of the crowd’s whispers was a white noise in his skull. Chuuya decided he didn’t need to know more — that Dazai’s little spectacle had happened; that Mori was probably grinning so widely it was blinding. He took off the in-ear and crushed it under his shoe.

“You’re with Ueda Akinari,” Chuuya said, calmly. “Aren’t you?”

The man making his way to them paused, twinning his hands at the small of his back. He stared between the two of them like a referee at a sparring match, unhurried. Chuuya smelled grass soaked in blood.

Fumiko held a finger to her mouth. “I believe it’s nicer if you say that he is with me. I mean, I was picked first by the Division. One of the many, many moles they’ve sent to you guys —” She met his eyes, raising her eyebrows. “You sure don’t think I’m the only one? No, I’m just the one who was getting too — slow on the job.”

She leaned onto her knees; waved at Ueda’s quiet silhouette. “You guys just wouldn’t recruit us — you’ve been too suspicious of Users presenting themselves to the syndicate willingly. Which is why I had to convince Kobe and Mishima to get in tons of trouble, just to get you guys’ attention. And it worked!”

Chuuya understood. The organization had been in a frenzy to regroup ever since the Dragon Head Conflict had cost them too many lives. The Cleanse hadn’t helped; in their urge to get Ability Users into check, controls had been minimal — moving under the assumption that if forced to join, the men’s rage could be redirected.

And so they had slipped.

Unless —

“But it was taking too much time,” she jeered. “And so they decided they wanted someone else to help out. All to make sure you guys got the message — which you clearly didn’t, given most of the Hall of Fame of Japanese celebrities is in your hands. Now I get why youngsters make conspiracy theories. Come here, old man!” Fumiko called, then. ““You done staring at us like a creepy fuck? You already know Chuuya, don’t you?””

“Intimately,” Ueda Akinari said. His voice had him sinking his nails in his palm to hold back a flinch — Chuuya pressed his heels into the ground until he wasn’t sinking between corpses any longer. “No better way to know someone than to be in their head.”

He stubbornly kept his eyes on Fumiko. “Is it all three of you?”

She laughed. “God, no. Mishima and Kobe think they can jump from one place to the other unschated — I do believe they want the Post Mafia to last, though,” Her feet spread, lowering her over the backrest of the bench — as relaxed as she had been on their first meeting; bowing a bit too low. “I’m not that stupid.”

Distantly, cars honked. If he focused — if he let Arahabaki breathe — he thought he could hear the sound of steps; carefully redirected from that circle of pretense-polite conversation.

Something like pity tightened her face. “It’s nothing personal, sir. I really do like you. You and your pretty hair. But the Special Division promised to clear my records. I’m old, you know — I’m tired of this.”

She rose from the bench. Following, Ueda straightened.

Chuuya stayed leaning against the wall.

“I don’t want to fight for the rest of my life,” she swore, with the first flare of sincerity he could recall finding under all her glee. “If all I have to do is kill a bunch of high names in the Mafia — I’m going to do it.”

“Sounds fair,” Chuuya offered.

She smiled, apologetic. “For what’s worth, I really am sorry.”

With no further announcement, Ueda’s eyes rolled to the back of his head. A spot in Chuuya’s back pulsed so violently it began to feel like a limb would tear its way through it — in between the onyx dots in his burning vision, he saw Fumiko walk towards him.

Then, it was quiet.

---

...

---

There —

---

...

---

There was —

---

...

---

There was a —

---

...

---

There was a door in front of him.

“Don’t open it,” warned the bundle of old clothes and ash-covered hair, cuddled up at the end of the hallway. Chuuya couldn’t see his face — his temples were held between his arms. “Listen to me.”

His voice was strangely familiar.

But Chuuya knew that door — the doorknob was warm in the way of memorized crinkles next to dearest friends’ eyes; fitting between his lifeline and his thumb like it was meant to. The rust stain at the very left corner was still there — weird, considering they had redone the whole place.

Because it was burned to the ground, a whisper said.

Don’t be stupid, something thundered, is it not here?

“They’re using both of the Abilities,” the boy insisted, voice so steady it was dead. “A Singularity, but not quite — a choice to solve past regrets, and visions of all that torments you the most. All so that —”

Laughter echoed from behind the door — crystalline, squeaky and climbing the silence as if in a hurry not to be left behind — sweet and too loud and incessantly annoying, and all that Chuuya had longed for in two oxygen-less years.

He knew that voice.

“Don’t —”

The door was opened so fast he almost tore it off its hinges. “Albatr—”

Something creaked under his shoes — it shattered on impact from his too excited steps; too weighted down by the urgency in his disbelieving spine. Chuuya knew it was a bone long before he looked down.

The blood was so thick on the floor it might have reached his knees; dragging himself forward was the hardest thing his limbs had ever attempted. There was no gravity to manipulate; no ground to crack — everything was red and was black and was rotten, suffocating in its smell, corpses and alcohol and poisoned words.

“Fuck off,” Chuuya murmured, like a prayer, as his eyes searched for something — a body without its face too ruined, eyes wide open and not crimson skin. He knew all of them — he couldn’t recognize any. “Fuck off. I’m done with this!”

“Chuuya.”

The voice spoke through his foot, still stuck deep into the half shattered rib cage — muffled, because of it; pressing. From the ground, Doc’s eyes almost rolled to the back of his head, as trails of blood left his mouth in coughs.

His legs were still missing.

Doesn’t matter, it hushed. Doesn’t matter. Here’s your chance, doesn’t matter —

“Doc,” He kneeled next to him, untouched by that humming river of blood drowning him all the way to his sleeves — white sleeves, now; patterned like a Hospital vest; too large on his hips and too grandly unimportant the instant he put his hands to his friend’s gaping face.

“Doc, what do I have to do?”

The question tasted familiar. Hours and hours spent next to the man in some makeshift clinic at the HQs, helping him out with the Mafia’s almost-fallen — because he wanted to and because he’d been asked and because how could he not. He was good at reading medical papers, for reasons he did not know. He was good at sticking too close, and being venomous to the touch.

“Chuuya,” he echoed, unfocused. His IV pole was nowhere to be seen — maybe, it was the glinting thing stuck through one of Pianoman’s eyes, all the was inside his skull. “Why did you kill them?”

“I didn’t,” His jaw ached — he didn’t realize he was biting his tongue until blood wet his lips. “Doc, I didn’t — mean to —”

“We took you in, didn’t we?” His eyes grew darker and darker, as if the blood had managed to seep in even under his eyelids. “Why did you? We took you in, didn’t we?”

His hair faded into a familiar gray; his body grew too young and famished under his grasp — Chuuya refused to meet Shirase’s eyes. “We took you in,” he hissed. The voice of an eight years old boy. “How could we ever be so stupid?”

He snapped: “This isn’t even realistic —”

“How long until they realize it too?”

He stumbled to his feet under a roar of coward that he didn’t know where was coming from — cussed and kicked the reaching limbs away, appearing from the shadows with hungry claws, pulling at him like ivy. He walked through corpses and through waves of red and the strange symphony of screams in his head — something like the Under Port, only higher and scratchier and real; every single one of those voices somehow known.

“How long?” Shirase called, nowhere and in every corner — so deep in his skull it was his own heartbeat. “How long until you kill them too?”

“Change the topic!” he shouted back, fists clenched. “This is getting unoriginal!”

His hand grasped the doorknob moments before the thousands of hands could touch him, all the eyes floating inside it set on him — he pulled it open so fast he felt it scratch his palm to raw skin.

Chuuya fell to the floor.

His breathing sounded harsh even to his ears — the leftovers of Corruption, piercing his lungs and leaving him to cough out parts that kept him alive and that Arahabaki didn’t care for in the slightest. He studied his arm, waiting for spiral marks — all he saw was his spasming fingers.

He kicked the ground, frustrated — it didn’t stop any of it; not the trembling nor the gasping. Someone was pulling air out through his gritted teeth; he bit his tongue again and again, eyes on the floor, thinking and cursing. He recalled a time he didn’t know — the cold floor of a lab, him huddled up just like this; the wrinkles floating inside a dark liquid had left on his skin; and the eyes, the eyes staring behind the glass — knocking to scare him, to see if he was still breathing, lest their money got wasted, to ask, how are we feeling today, little —

A boy was standing in front of the door.

Chuuya sunk his nails on the floor.

A strange memory hit him — being in his place. Being in that place, on the floor. Again and again and again — a different carcass under his uncaring feet each time. A different accusation; a different burn under his fingers. Yuan's tears; Koda panicking as the sky blew up. A boy who looked just like him, melting in his arms.

How long had he been there?

"Don't open it," he warned. "Listen to me."

The boy —

---

...

---

There was blood under his shoes, and there was a hand plastered on his mouth, leaving finger shaped bruises on his jaw.

Chuuya's limbs stiffened long before he could order them to fight — he realized, a bit distantly, that he had been struggling already. The fog stuck between his eyelids stayed right where it was — the blood on the doorknob and the nails in his arms; the squelching crack! of bones under his skin and the vacant terror in the eyes of himself, curled up on the floor; Albatross' last words and the aching pain of Shirase's knife, stabbing and stabbing and stabbing and sticking, the arms that were going to tear him apart —

"— stop," someone was snapping. Reality was intermittent — whenever some part of his body crashed against a surface, the impact and the bruise catapulted him back to a world of chaos — of distant sirens and arms around him, as Chuuya struggled as if feral, slamming the flesh holding on him against the sharp corners of a kitchen.

"Stop," the voice insisted, tone unfamiliar. He was in front of the door; he was telling the boy who wore his face not to enter. The arms were going to reach him and they were going to rip him into pieces. "— Stop, Chuuya — you're — stop!"

A sound came out of his mouth; drool and bile and blood, curling around a scream he did not decide to make. Shirase's knife, again and again — Verlaine's finger on his forehead — Corruption, in a Cemetery, tearing his jaw off his skull so he could never speak again, could never own that skin that was stuck to bones made to be broken. Chuuya slammed his body forward, over a shaking ground and blood he could feel leave his body floaty and blurred — he cracked his head against the corner of a table, and screamed —

One of the hands grabbed his left arm, and dislocated it out of its socket.

The ache was blinding — the white blur to explode in his vision was brighter than any bar and any doorknob and any falling Yokohama; the white noises that carved the space between his ears had his limbs turn into jelly, knees landing painfully on the ground. Somewhere over that haze, he felt the roof fall, and the entire building shake.

“— breathe,” the voice swore. Chuuya was dragged across the floor like a corpse; his back was pressed against a rapidly breathing chest, and the hand returned, clenching around his mouth — so he would inhale through his nose instead. “— you just — over the — of course you can. You’d be unconscious if you couldn’t — breathe, Chuuya.”

Everything was buzzing. It began to fade by the corners — so ploddingly it was numbing, the rattled reality bloomed across his overstimulated eyes.

“Just breathe,” Lips on the shell of his ear; then pressed harder, barely exhaling the sound — so low it should have been inaudible over the chaos of what Chuuya could now see was a falling apart building around them. The hand stayed on his mouth through his gaping; the other arm clenched across his clavicles, squeezing him against a chest he couldn’t recall why was familiar. Legs bracketed him; the fire in his dislocated arm slowly rocked itself into a faraway, insistent hum. “Just breathe. This is real. Breathe.”

His heart was beating out of his chest. His eyes were blurred; he saw what was left of some apartment he had to have flown through, barely a circular interior balcony from what had once been a kitchen — and a crater, in the middle of it, wider than Albatross’ bathroom, tunneling all the way to several floors down.

Slower and slower breaths pulled his chest up and down — his limbs dropped like a doll’s, all the tensed muscles liquifying. The hand dropped from his sweat-matted jaw; Chuuya unclenched it, and tasted blood all over his cheeks and tongue.

“Alright?” Dazai asked.

Faraway police sirens; faraway screams — rumbling buildings, falling to an earthquake. Dazai had fallen on the floor, back digging the counter — he tried to recall the correct breathing rhythm; tried to steal it from the chest plastered to his back, heartbeat and all. The hand across his clavicles fell; it landed where his heart was, and it dug nails in — through the fabric and the skin.

Chuuya’s breath was cut short.

His hair was soaked with sweat; he closed his eyes, lighting-quick, gulping in the last ounce of air and soaking up the slight tremble in Dazai’s frame — he sat up, blood trailing down the wound the table corner had left on his forehead.

“Alright,” he concluded, curtly, standing.

There was no time to focus on any of it — he stumbled on his legs, and barely blinked at Dazai’s utterly blank face, body sprawled on the floor as he looked up at him. His skull was an empty hall, haunted by echoes — he realized, a bit hazed, that it hadn’t been that quiet in eons.

Chuuya studied the crater two steps from him — saw Fumiko and Ueda’s spines merge with the concrete of the ground floor, chins pushing pointlessly to keep their shrieking heads high.

He jumped down.

Drown, Chuuya thought. A doorknob and a wave of blood, again and again — he walked towards them, debris still falling from the hole on the roof, hands clenched in his pockets; kicked the ground with one foot only, somehow hearing the sound of their wrists and calves snapping —

“You thought some mind tricks could stop me?” he panted, meeting their bloodshot eyes. He was bent over the pulsing weight of the dislocated arm; over an exhaustion that had his lips curling in hysterical laughter. “Me? You thought I wouldn’t tear you apart for it?”

Chuuya couldn’t recall all of it — Dazai’s hand, appearing out of nowhere near that old ice cream stand; the images in his mind, blurring over whatever decision he’d made to activate Tainted and sink his nails in their throats, tearing hole after hole in the nearest apartment complex.

The familiar click of safeties being switched off surrounded the crater. A small crowd of mafiosi — a mixture of the Guerrilla squad and the Secret Unit gathered around the opening, across more and more floors, covered in debris from the only now-over earthquake — pointing their rifles at the threats being digested into the ground.

Seemingly unbothered, Dazai dived in, landing on the other side of the Ability Users.

“Look at that,” Chuuya heard him sigh, somewhere through the haze — through the gaze he couldn’t tear away from Fumiko’s crawling form, and Ueda’s pain-lined face. Still not enough, still not cursed — still lacking the ghosts that had been following him like footsteps. “Ma’am, sir — Does it hurt?”

The genuine curiosity in his tone registered as taunting. Chuuya felt the urge to laugh; instead, he crushed their ribs too.

“Well,” Dazai said, crouching next to their heads, “That’s enough.”

He touched their foreheads.

He’d missed the nullification when the boy had done it to snap him out of it, so that he could attack them — now that he was awake, Chuuya felt their Abilities slip off him like mud under the rain; pooling at his feet with the startled, nearly choked-up breath to leave his mouth.

And then it hit him like shards of glass — a strangling sensation of nothing at all.

“Excellent!” Dazai clasped his hands together, then waved cheerfully at their guards. He kept his eyes on Chuuya with rapturous insistence. “What are you waiting for, people? Come down here and get these friends of ours to the dungeons. My, do we have tons to study about that fancy trick you just did —”

A shadow jumped into the hole, showing off surprising agility. Hands materialized on his arms — familiar eyes studied him, concerned.

“Chuuya,” Tanaki called, out of breath from catching up. “Are you alright?”

“Of course he is,” Dazai called, from where he was boringly directing his men to the extraction of the bodies. “This was his plan, after all.”

Fancy wording — Chuuya would have been stupid not to make the connection, with the way her Ability had targeted the same spots Ueda had learned. It had been suspicious, mostly — when the woman had pulled him away from the ceremony, he’d known. Since that was how it went — so had Dazai.

“Explains why I’m all covered in dirt — given that I have the decency to plan ahead for these consequences —”

Sheer irritation crowded on tired limbs. “Last time we were on a mission, you dropped us into a can of sewer-remains —”

“How?”

A beat of silence.

It took Dazai a moment to turn towards the rough, exhaustion-lined voice — Chuuya’s eyes found Fumiko’s limp frame immediately, in the arms of two suited men. Blood and hair braids mixed and confused; the gaze she washed over him was just as careless as before.

“How,” Fumiko repeated. Ueda’s head lolled near her abandoned arm. “His Ability — Tales of Moonlight and Rain targeted you more than anyone else. The files at the Division — they assured you wouldn’t be able to —”

“To withstand it?”

She didn’t answer. The men murmured.

He stepped forward, a silent signal to the squads to pause the extraction. Fumiko didn’t flinch when he got closer. Chuuya ignored the eyes, and said, very quietly: “You’re a fool if you think I don’t know what everyone I care for will look like when they die.”

She exhaled.

“I’m like you,” he added, straightening. “I’ve been doing this a long time. I’ve got no need for you to show me what I’m capable of.”

“Anything,” she concluded, somewhat dazed — almost smiling. “Except put an end to the source of all your pain.”

“I can still crush you two, if you want me to.”

“I’m talking about yourself.”

Chuuya scoffed.

“That’s enough,” Dazai intervened — seemingly no longer entertained. A bit distractedly, he searched for dust on his pants. He nodded in the men’s direction. “Hurry up with these. The damages will cause a commotion, and we can’t be found here. Tanaki, if you don’t mind helping our wall-crusher here to walk —”

“I can walk, dumbass,” he snapped. There was a sweat stain on his shoulder; Chuuya knew it came from his own skull. “I’m fine.”

He let his sole eye run across his face until it seemed annoyed enough with the results. Stepping close, he lifted one finger — pressed it against the bloodied wound on Chuuya’s forehead.

“You know, I could have just looked at you to signal I was ditching,” he informed him.

“Maybe,” Dazai admitted, dropping his hand. “But you’re too interested in flattering Mori and his empty seats to miss the chance.”

Chuuya climbed out of the debris. “Says the one who was kneeling ten minutes ago.”

“Ah, yes,” he echoed, carelessly. He wondered how long it would take him to grow curious, this time — a new round of, what did Dante’s Ability show you? He studied the blood dripping from Chuuya’s fingers. “Flame to the moths, right?”

He scoffed.

They climbed out, Tanaki still hanging onto him as he easily floated them over the edge. The distant sound of car alarms and sirens hurried the mafiosi to the black vans they had arrived with; Chuuya noted the damaged buildings before the warehouse and sighed. “Kouyou will ground me.”

“Not if she doesn’t have to deal with that Ability any longer,” Tanaki encouraged. Dazai was rattling off orders to the squad; Hamamoto looked as if he had swallowed a lemon. Still, he nodded in his direction. “It was easier than I assumed it would be — though, with you two involved, things always go like that.”

“I’ll tell you when they add this to the Double Black Bedtime Stories, don’t worry.”

“Perhaps having an Ability that relies on the mind makes people foolish. Our limbs tend to know instinct more than reasoning,” the woman said, as she watched Fumiko disappear inside one of the vans. He couldn’t understand the grip on his arm fully; the blown out concern in her pupils, erasing most traces of the distant, long suppressed gloom she’d worn since the wedding. “She was a sweet girl. Only cocky.”

“Sir,” one of the Guerrilla called. He was pushing Ueda’s passed out body on the seats — the blood was getting everywhere. “Could you float him? It’s better if we don’t leave traces.”

Tanaki squeezed his arm one last time; he watched as she let him go, uncertain.

Chuuya reached the car; tapped his foot on the old man's calf, lighting him up in red amongst the wheezing breaths out of his lungs. The plan was to keep them alive and chained — he'd have to inform them all of the apparent army of moles the Division had sent. They still had no clues on what the tattoos meant. But Ueda looked fragile and pale; he didn't know if he'd survive the impact.

Good, he heard himself think. Kouyou's voice; maybe Arahaki.

It was still echoing — when Ueda's eyes snapped open, and he grabbed his wrist.

He couldn't recall what happened after — could vaguely remember Dazai's voice; the men who had called him around the corpse cowering under his barks. Extracted guns, seconds after the boy wrapped fingers around Ueda's arm, widening his eye when he saw whatever unchanging face was stuck on Chuuya's features. Fumiko laughing, somewhere — Tanaki's fingers; the lulling rhythm of a shootout Tainted automatically responded to.

One last one, Ueda mouthed, with blood-chapped lips, meeting his eyes. Chuuya knew he was watching him breathe his last breath — still, he didn't move.

Chapter End Notes

chuuya: i am dealing with the manmade horrors dazai, got showered with, cuddled with, and dealt with a panic attack in the course of like a week: of course you are king.

fun fact! fumiko's story about her ex husband and being asked to choose between two women comes from one of her irl's counterpart works.

other fun fact, my toe's pseudo cast got removed! cheer to not getting injured again, as i'm in the middle of exam season. posting shouldn't get affected, but if you see a chapter getting posted a day after the usual know what's to blame. thank you so much for all the support and the love and the kudos and the comments, seriously — i can't thank you enough. i hope you'll like this chapter and what's next just as much!!

stay warm and see you soon!!

SEEMS

Chapter Notes

see you at the end!! also, just to warn you again: chapters might get posted on different days, moving forward, as the exam session is entering its worst period and work is just. Works you know. i'll try to keep it two chapters a week, but should that not work, it'll just be one a week for a while!!

in any case, i promise to post. have a good read <333

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xxx.

---

Case number: 88665671

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [Code Name: Double Black] were tasked with [...]*

---

Excerpt from Chapter XVI: “The Rise & Dawn of the Post Great War Yokohama: The Tripartite Plan.”

Diary XII.

Natsume Soseki.

Special Division for Unusual Powers — *Archive.

Recovered & Analyzed by: Ango Sakaguchi.

[...] hardly cease to surprise me, in the following years, just how wide of a grasp Mori Ougai and his Port Mafia managed to sink in the deepest organs of our city in so little time. Three years of reign are hardly a remarkable chapter in any history book; despite this, they were just enough for the doctor’s grip on Yokohama to be called irredeemable — a root no man would manage to weed out. Not after it had flourished so proficiently under the moonlight.

The lack of an Ability Permit was an obstacle.

It lingered over their heads like a Damocles’ sword. The Special Division’s eyes grew more and more numerous, often walking right on the verge of sabotaging some rather important deal for the enterprising, stubborn syndicate. And yet, it wasn’t enough to stop them.

They grew tall and proud, like their towers — they filled the city with blood, but protected its civilians from any blade that wasn’t their own. They built their seats in high places — be it rich entertainers, be it CEOs, be it the men that kept the city afloat.

Control over the bay and its affairs was established with a tight enough grip, that not a force in the city could even dare to think about trading without dealing with the Mafia. Their presence in the Cabinet and the City Hall grew — if not entirely suffocating — pressing enough for their night affairs to be dealt with under the sun. The Black Market of the Kanto region belonged to them; the underground of Yokohama and the nearby cities responded to them first, then to themselves.

And as far as their superiority on the battlefield was concerned, of course, we cannot fail to mention their beloved weapon: Double Black. As they —

[keep reading] [?]

---

...

---

April ventured in with a gentler breeze.

“You guys came early this year,” Muramoto Kei commented, as he opened the door of his manor. He didn’t blink at the corpses they were dragging behind them, staining his porch with wet substances and coagulating blood. “So the mess I heard about from the city was true?”

“No,” Dazai replied, yawning. “Didn’t you know? The radio belongs to extremists.”

“No,” The man’s eyes ranked up and down his frame. “Must have missed it.”

His clothes were soaked in so much blood it was dripping — in spite of their hurried efforts to squeeze it out, when inside the trash bin they had hidden in. Chuuya was in no better state; at the very least, the other boy had simply pushed the bin around until they’d both gotten more bruised than helped — he’d only witnessed the massacre, instead of causing it.

I shot some guys, he had protested, amusing himself with rolling the trash can down the nearest slope.

Removing pieces of old food from his hair, he’d replied, very honestly: you should have shot yourself.

Dazai had nodded. In time.

“Well?” Chuuya raised his eyebrow. “Can we come in or not?”

Muramoto studied them a bit longer. With a sigh, he moved away from the doorframe.

They left the three bodies in the middle of his living room, and Chuuya made sure to flop one of them a bit too close onto a seemingly new couch. The men’s faces were stuck in a surprised terror — he hadn’t bothered with playing around with prey; but that had resulted in a swifter kill than their sleeping selves had ever expected to come.

Less prey than usual, too.

When he offered that observation to the farmer, he scoffed. “This year’s harvest has been shit. Nothing tempting enough to force the nasty cockroaches out to steal my business,” A long gaze was sent in Dazai’s direction, as the man watched him move his body back and forth along to the Swiss clock on the wall. “Good for you kids, ah?”

“Don’t call us that,” Chuuya ordered, a bit distracted, counting the money handed to him. “This is a bit less than last year.”

“Your syndicate has sent double the freight vehicles over my border. Balance is balance.”

“It isn’t your border,” he reminded him. “You’re a measly farmer bartering bloodthirst.”

“And you’re the most powerful syndicate in the Kanto region,” he considered, “And you need this measly farmer to free up your way.”

Chuuya quit counting the money.

Dazai kept dangling back and forth.

Do you think, Kajii had once commented, drunk and philosophical, that everyone recognizes you two because of the hat and the bandages? It’s not like they all know your faces. Maybe it’s the height difference? Or is it that you’re so noisy and youthful and bloodthirsty?

I think, Chuuya had replied, half distracted, that it’s probably because we’re the ones to kill them.

“What’s left on our to-do list?” he asked, as they made their way to the car — closing the door on Muramoto’s passed out, bloodied body. His knuckles ached; he decided not to voice it, lest Dazai went on a tirade about how, torture is better with tools, I keep telling you.

“We need to go into town,” the boy answered, intricately — unnecessarily — climbing into the passenger seat from the car window. “Some of the border’s workers have been late on their payments. Maybe, if you’re lucky, you’ll get to slice some more people in a half.”

“I didn’t slice them,” Chuuya said, backing the car out of the manor’s garden, running over as many plant pots as possible. “I put sharp things through their bodies.”

“That’s the same thing.”

“Technicality.”

The smell of the corpses lingered on the car’s leather — he briefly thanked the foresight to bring one of the less fancy vehicles he owned; not the only-five-in-the-world kind. He gave himself a blink to watch Dazai roam through radio stations.

He paused some more.

The worlds tumbled out of his mouth: “I still think he fucks the corpses.”

“Oh, my God, Chuuya —“

“One hundred percent, he fucks the corpses. You cannot change my mind, you bastard — he fucks the corpses.”

Dazai's glance called him stupid in all of the many languages he knew. "Hatrack. He doesn't fuck the corpses."

"He fucks the corpses."

"Chuuya."

"I bet he's fucking the corpses right now."

"Why would he be fucking the corpses —"

"Don't act all princess-y right now."

"What?"

"Some freaks are into it," Chuuya insisted, swerving down the barely paved road, framed by stalks of sunflowers. "Which is — hell. Poor assholes don't even get a say in it. God. If they had left it in their will or something —"

"You think anyone," Dazai cut through, staring at him as if genuinely concerned, "Would leave, fuck my corpse raw, in their will —"

"Tell me he doesn't look like a freak."

"He looks like whatever would come out if one of Kajii's lemon bombs and George Kingstain decided to procreate."

"That's exactly what I mean!" He frowned. "George Kingstain? I haven't thought about that man in years."

Dazai shrugged. "He had a creepy face."

"Well, yeah, but —"

"Maybe it's this whole pseudo-mind-control Ability business we dealt with," the boy continued, finally settling on a radio station that satisfied him — German folk music. Sprawling lower and lower into his seat, the belt half choking him, he added: "Brings back memories."

Sourness crowded the corner of Chuuya's mouth. In the distance, the scarlet roofs of the small town appeared in their line of vision.

It had been almost two months.

"Not quite the same," he commented, at last, eyes pointedly on the road. "Dante's Limbo was like being — stuck, I guess. One memory, one scenario. Ueda's Tales was more of a blockbuster parody of your life — only the director found out about his divorce by text ten minutes ago, and he strongly believes in method acting."

"Method acting," Dazai echoed.

“Lippman hated that shit,” Chuuya said. “Unless it helped to fuck with Albatross. Once he came to work in a bear suit. Come on. We would have been at the villa hours ago if you hadn’t —”

“Pot,” the boy yawned. “Kettle.”

He didn’t wait for him to leave the car, after he parked it in front of the only bar in town — and he made sure not to slam the door, pretending that spot on his back didn’t itch a bit more whenever the now-dead Ueda Akinari was mentioned.

We’re to assume you’ll be struck by another attack, at some point or another, Mori had said, tracing the pulsing, vividly red lines of the half moon tattoo in his makeshift clinic. These marks must have played a bigger part in the effects of that Ability than we believed. You’ll need to be careful.

Chuuya cared very little.

He hadn’t seen worms crawl out of his interloquutor’s eyes in a week — it was the longest he had gone without. His notebook had been hidden under his bed; his visits at the cemetery had been peaceful. Brace, the whispers kept insisting. Arahabaki was a voiceless storm, though. Brace for impact.

Gravity had stuck to him like a stray since the beginning. Chuuya had never quite figured out how to fall.

I will, he promised.

---

...

---

“Did you arrive late yesterday?” Kouyou asked, nudging his floating body, legs dangling over the freezing lake. “I didn’t hear you come in.”

An occasion to celebrate our latest, arduous accomplishments, the woman had said, when she’d managed to corner him to tell him about the gathering. The guest list had widened significantly since last year — Chuuya had taken it as a great occasion to understand just who Kouyou trusted through the mess of the new Mafia’s hierarchy.

“We had to drag the corpses to the grinding rolls at the warehouse,” he explained, through the rush of the lake in his ears. The sun was blinding — somewhere to his right, he could hear Kajii talk Madame Tanaki’s ear off. “Boss wanted us to leave a — visual warning.”

She hummed. “As long as you didn’t stain my carpets.”

Chuuya curled an eyebrow. “As if you’ve never redecorated with blood?”

“Do you want Golden Demon to skewer you?”

“As if,” he scoffed. “Scraped my knees with her one time too many for that to happen.”

A small commotion waited by the endless free space right outside the villa, half sprawled in the grass and half crowding the small wooden dock on the gently calm lake. Mori, skimming through medical records, was attempting to convince Elise not to drag him into the water; in a horrifying pair of swimsuits, Hirotsu was teaching a flower-dress and untied-hair sporting Gin how to weave a sailor knot with some old rope. All the way to the porch, Akutagawa was hiding his pale skin from the sun, wearing a pair of sunglasses he could have sworn he had seen in Dazai’s office at least once.

Kajii swan dove from the dock — Tanaki clapped, politely unimpressed. Some of Kouyou’s subordinates sunbathed, spreading conversation to gather their Executive gossip.

Chuuya breathed in so deeply it burned.

“Is Dazai still in his room?”

“If he crawled back there after climbing from the window,” He shrugged. The water was all-encompassing; he had viciously fought the instinct to fear it — and even more viciously the one to be lulled by it. “He wanted to set the ivy on the walls on fire.”

The woman’s face grew sour. “I should go check on him —“

“He’s probably admiring the beams on the roof and chanting about, how great it’d be to hang himself from there,” Chuuya interrupted. “Leave it. I’ll get this User from the Guerrilla to grow you more ivy. Didn’t you tell me you had someone you wanted me to meet?”

She studied him for a moment more.

“Come on,” she concluded, hooking the heart-shaped sunglasses Elise had forced on her to the clip of her bikini. “They’re just by the stables.”

The man and the woman fit like peculiarly painted puzzle pieces — there was something eerie about their frames, but inevitably matched. Under ink-tinged hair, they wore traditional clothing in cerulean shades that matched the lake mirror Kajii kept crashing. When they raised their heads from the horse they were grooming — he got the weird, familiar feeling of being watched by more eyes than first announced.

“Chuuya,” Kouyou started, as they bowed, “Allow me to introduce you to our newest recruits, the Kyoukas.”

“Possible recruits, my lady,” the woman pointed out — not unkindly. The merciless line of both hers and her husband’s spine was reminiscent of bodies Chuuya had crushed — assassins. “We are still considering your offer.”

“A lifetime as a freelancer is hard to give up on,” her husband agreed. He offered Chuuya a vacant smile. “May I assume this is the ward you wished to introduce to us?”

“My most successful,” Kouyou confirmed — a soft sound; a finger tapping under his chin. Her hands sneaked on his shoulders; Chuuya wondered if it was meant to feel so different from Mori’s brand of ownership. “You told me you know every bloodied name the Mafia has allowed to slither through the underground.”

“We do.”

“Can you guess his?”

Both their gazes lingered on him — their symbiosis somewhat distressing. Chuuya raised an eyebrow, unimpressed. Lady Kyouka’s eyes landed on his gloves.

Her unconcerned smile froze.

“Ah,” she said. No look was exchanged with her husband; nonetheless, when she bowed again, the man followed. “It is a pleasure to meet you.”

Chuuya studied the top of their heads; bowed only his head. “Likewise. Assuming we will be colleagues soon.”

“I have high hopes,” Kouyou assured. Over the doors of the stables, he caught Mackerel’s eyes, as he boredly neighed over some hay. “And you might just be the one to thank for it, little god.”

He frowned. “Me?”

“You captured Ueda Akinari,” Lord Kyouka explained, eyes squinting at him carefully. A sour taste sneaked through his teeth. “He was a detested name in our business. Unlikely alliances were formed in an attempt to get rid of him — many friends were lost.”

“If you dare to call anyone in our business a friend,” his wife piped in.

“It wasn’t just me,” Chuuya interrupted them — felt Kouyou’s eye twitch. On the small of his back, the unfading moon tattoo — that had been nothing but humming in the last weeks — seemed to pulse. “My shitty partner helped. Ability aside, he’s just a man. I’m good at breaking men.”

“Godly so, if the voices are to be trusted.” Something in her gaze seemed hungry. She had an Ability — Chuuya could bet on it.

“I don’t know if gods trust voices,” he said.

“We shall hope they don’t.”

“No,” he concurred. “But we can discuss that more when you get inked in our name.”

The couple exchanged a fondly exasperated glance. “He’s as stubborn as you are, my lady.”

Kouyou preened.

“Business matters aside — we certainly owe much to both of you, Gravity Manipulator,” lord Kyouka insisted. “We almost lost our lives to that crafty man. Our daughter could have been made an orphan.”

He tilted his head. “You have a daughter?”

“Almost ten,” His wife smiled — sincerely warm, for the first time. Something unreachable and unbloodied; enough to have Kouyou’s fingers twitch strangely at her side. “A clever girl. She is part of the reason why we wish to join.”

“The Port Mafia grants protection to all of its members’ relatives,” Kouyou tutted, with a tone that made it clear it wasn’t the first time. “And the pay is good — Great, for raising a child. You would love her, Chuuya. She’s a little flower.”

“I’ve got some idea of how curious brats can be at that age,” Chuuya considered, only somewhat surprised by the greed in the woman’s tone. “How long until she starts questioning your work trips?”

Slug and Mackerel neighed in harmony.

“Alright, alright,” Lady Kyouka chuckled. “You mafiosi are an insistent lot. You might wish to be careful — eagerness often signals weakness.”

“Defeating Ueda Akinari didn’t come without betrayal,” he replied, undeterred. “We’re past the need to pretend power isn’t in numbers. Anyway — most unregistered Ability Users need our protection more than we need their blades.”

Something passed by her eyes. Without a word, her husband let his shoulders fall an inch.

Kouyou cleared her throat. “Well —“

“Chuuya!”

Hanging off Hirotsu like a monkey in a pink swimsuit, Elise waved her arms madly. Once she managed to catch his attention, she screeched: “You haven’t played with me once! You promised you’d teach me how to swim. I’ll make Rintarou whip you!”

Chuuya sighed. “If you’ll forgive me.”

Despite feeling the trio’s gazes on him all the way to the dew-wet grass on the other side of the villa — he shrugged thoughts off his shoulder, arms automatically ready to catch Elise when she flung herself off the old man.

“These days, Dazai’s always in the stupid dungeons with those stupid prisoners of yours,” she lamented, hair brushing the ground. Chuuya secured his grip and spun them around, turning her voice in a half muffled twirl. “Q is in the stupid cell. And you’re always on missions. Who is a girl meant to play with?”

“Lise, we have jobs. ”

“I’m a job,” she insisted. “The prettiest one! Now let me draw on you.”

He was forced on his stomach and robbed of his shirt before he could protest. Hirotzu and Gin only allowed him near their well tied ropes after he had dried himself — Elise wasted no time extracting colors from the back of her swimsuit, and beginning to connect lines between the scars on his back.

“Thank you,” Hirotzu added nothing to that — apart from the endlessly tired gaze he sent in the child’s direction. Sitting close to him, Gin hid a giggle.

Leaning on his elbows to watch some of Kouyou’s subordinates splash in the lake, Chuuya asked: “So, how’s your search going?”

The two exchanged a glance.

It was somewhat comical — Gin looked younger than her age; the Spring sun had burned Hirotzu’s face to the point of adding wrinkles to his collection. They reminded him of some satirical drawing at the end of a newspaper; like there ought to be speech-bubbles about generational change and economic crises over their heads.

The man liked Gin — he knew. And the kid had a tendency to huddle by the Commander’s side on car journeys. Handler; Chuuya considered, a bit nostalgic, until the end of his days.

“Are you asking as an Executive, sir?” the old man questioned, eventually.

Chuuya rolled his eyes. “I’m asking because there’s a waiting line for lunch, and I might as well pass the time.”

“None of them are impressive,” Gin said. Her voice took him by surprise — while it fit with the lilac flowers sewn in her dress, it was at stark odds with the spiky parts of her fighting gear. He wondered if she didn’t talk out of knowledge her voice wouldn’t be taken for a man’s; or if she kept quiet for any other reason. “Good Lizards, but not good commanders. ”

“Mind your words,” Hirotzu warned. He moved her thin fingers away from a badly made knot, very gently — showed her the correct twists in slow motion. “You’re no Commander either.”

“I will be,” she retorted, unconcerned.

The gelid tip of one of Elise’s crayons dug in his clavicle. It wasn’t as cold as her own hands, though — a touch he was used to. Most of the syndicate felt permanently unsettled by her glass gaze — Chuuya had no true issues with her eyes. Sometimes, still, he got stuck studying the perfect segments of her palms — feeling the skin under his gloves itch.

Something blindingly pale caught his gaze. “Have you considered him?”

Hirotzu turned to follow his line of vision. Gin didn’t.

“Akutagawa?” the man echoed.

His tone fell familiarly on the grass. Most of the syndicate shared their attitude for the older brother of the youngest new arrivals. A general mistrust, arisen from the bodies he effortlessly left on both training grounds and moonlit streets — an harmless contempt of sorts, softened by the habitual sight of his silhouette, always hovering in the corners. Dazai spoke grandly of his potential; it was clear to most he did not do the same to him.

Chuuya watched him run his fingers through a shard of Rashomon, wrapped over his head like an umbrella. He was leaning against the shut doors of the villa — he couldn’t shake off the feeling of watching a guard dog.

The one shut window on the first floor only heightened the vision.

“He wouldn’t accept,” his sister answered, immediately, wrapping the rope around the bruises on her candid knuckles. “He’s not aiming for any consolation prize.”

He blinked: “The Black Lizards are the second biggest squadron in the syndicate.”

“Yours’ the biggest.”

Both Chuuya and Hirotsu paused.

“He wants the Guerrilla?” the Commander asked.

Through the unmerciful attacks Elise delivered on his spine, dot after dot, he scoffed — only briefly disbelieving. “You ought to shake some sense in that brooding head of his, Gin. Saying this to my face would be treason.”

“He’s certainly ambitious.”

“That’s my squad,” he reminded Hirotsu. He tried to imagine Hamamoto bowing in front of the black and white squirt; X’s towering frame over him. “He can’t have my squad.”

Unhesitantly, Gin met his eyes — a merit, certainly. “Executive Dazai promised it to him, if he performs well.”

A body landed in the water. The ricochet of cobalt drops made no sound; Chuuya set his jaw over it, instead. He shrugged off wet grass from his clenched fist — sitting up so quickly Elise rolled off his back with a yelp. “I’m gonna murder him.”

“Sir —“

“Who the fuck does he think he is —“

“Maybe you ought to be rational,” Hirotsu insisted, habitually hopeless. “You could ask —“

“Talk to you later, Grandpa,” he muttered, stalking towards the porch. “After I sicc Q on that bandaged piece of —“ “Who’s Q?” he heard Gin ask, a bit lower the further he marched. Both Hirotsu and Elise opened their mouths to answer, on very different pitches — Chuuya kept his eyes on Akutagawa’s form, swaying awkwardly in his seat, feet kicking. His eyes were on the bundle of papers in his lap.

The kid watched him approach, evidently startled. “Sir —“

“I don’t care what delusions that bastard is filling your head with,” Chuuya informed him, dropping his hip on the porch banister. “But if the Black Lizards offer you a spot, accept it. Executive or not Executive, that vagabond has no authority to sell out other people’s squads —“

Something distinctively childish set his jaw. “He said he will give it to me if I managed to satisfy him —“

“I genuinely don’t care.”

“— so he thinks I can satisfy him.”

“That’s what you’re focusing on?” Chuuya stared at him, disbelieving. He snapped his fingers in his face. “Kid, are you listening? You can’t have the Guerrilla. What the — I already have it.”

Akutagawa blinked, perplexed. “You won’t have it forever.”

“Excuse me?”

“That’s what Executive Dazai said,” the boy insisted, curling up on his seat a bit more — too gloomy to be a whine, but almost. “Don’t be dense. No way that lasts much longer, with how he’s been doing. Word for word.”

Chuuya felt his knuckles crack.

Hesitantly Akutagawa attempted: “Isn’t it promising that he said —“

“I have no time or strength of will to stand your hero worship, Akutagawa,” Chuuya cut him off, teeth clenched. “I would tell you to take that to someone who cares, but I doubt you’d find it.”

His expression darkened — behind it, the openness he’d dared to display fell abruptly fast.

A rattling feeling went through his bones. A discomforting familiarity was stuck in it — the tears-sticky cheeks of the kids in Suribachi City; haunted by ghosts and strays and bullets. Adam’s logically disapproving gaze, between it all.

Not his fault, Chuuya reminded himself. Or do you want to be like the bastard? ”

He sighed, squeezing his eyes to rub the space between them. Studying the flowers twinned with the beams the roof of the porch, he offered: “Sorry, kid. Didn’t mean that.”

Akutagawa's eyes snapped up to him, wide as moons.

Unhesitatingly, Chuuya flopped down on a wooden box abandoned by the swinging couch — and pretended not to see him move as far from him as possible. Stealing seconds of Tanaki's laughter to stabilize his heartbeat — he added: "You've got no place in the machinations of Dazai's contempt towards me."

A pause. "I know that."

"I don't think he was mocking you," he insisted, and saw something in the boy's shoulders relax because of it. "If he told you he believes you could get to the point of commanding a squadron — then he does. The bastard doesn't spew bullshit unless it's entertaining."

He's a bit of a distrusting cat, Tanaki had once said, about the Akutagawa eldest. Chuuya had disliked the oversimplifying description — the mental image of his slippery black frame roaming through the corners of the Headquarters, eyes on a long-since found target; only walking on the spots Dazai's feet had already touched. He disliked picturing Dazai's bandaged fingers holding him by the nape — dangling him over the edge between an honorable Mafia survival, and an appealing cruelty he believed effective.

"It took me a while to be given a squad," Chuuya offered, uncertain of the reason. "After the Dragon Head Conflict. Partly 'cause I kept refusing one."

Akutagawa glanced at him. His spine was bent like a shrimp's; Kouyou had beaten that same posture out of him in the first two months in the Mafia. There was a tilt to his head that said he was constantly prepared to turn away — but not quite disinterest, still. "Why?"

A bitter spasm went through his fingers. It had been weeks since he had watched Corruption scars bloom in the corner of his gaze. Ueda had promised one last meeting; Chuuya had told him to fuck off.

Distantly — a memory that belonged to his limbs, but not himself — he recalled the sound of concrete cracking under his feet. A man burning diamonds; six corpses under the debris — all of it destroyed by his own hunger for something already decaying.

"Didn't think I'd be fit to keep it alive," he concluded, shrugging.

Akutagawa flinched. Chuuya snorted.

"If you don't mind —" He knocked his knuckles against the wall. Over at the dock, Elise pulled Mori's scarf to drag him into the water. The man maintained his composure, and his too-large hand between her shoulder blades. "Before we consider any role switches, I would enjoy knowing you'll keep any squad on its feet for something more than Dazai's approval."

Akutagawa seethed. "Do you always have to —"

"Mind your tone."

"I'm striving for strenght, sir," he snapped. "Not for Executive Dazai's headpats."

“You’re saying you wouldn’t enjoy one?”

He moved to stand.

Chuuya grabbed his coat belt, pulling him back into his seat — successfully making him stumble, vanishing his makeshift Rashomon cape. At last, some sun touched his skin. “Now don’t go and be dramatic,” he tutted. “Just playing around. It’d do you good. Say, have you made any friends at all since you joined?”

“What does that have to do with —“

As he spluttered, Chuuya removed his hat, plopping it on his head. “You can’t expect to last much in the Port Mafia without alliances. Why are you holed up working in a corner during a good opportunity?”

“Executive Kouyou invited us for a work gathering —“

“There’s tactic in all and every breath out of the Executives’ mouths, Akutagawa,” Chuuya offered him his blankest smile. “Forgive me for overstepping — this is a lesson, whether you’ll accept it from me or not. Every person Ane-san has invited, every room she gave, every conversation she’s forcing between them — all of it has a reason. And you are here for a reason.”

He curled an eyebrow. “I’m just saying — you should take advantage. Not go over reports.”

“It’s not a report,” Akutagawa muttered. His eyes roamed over the crowd behind the railing with different intensity, though. “We’ve been sent patrolling near the edge of the settlement, these last few nights — it’s swarming with citizens all hours of the day. I asked the Intelligence to figure out what that was about.”

Chuuya frowned. “And?”

“Just the protesters,” The boy shrugged. “The activists are still looking for sponsors to restart the reconstruction in Suribachi City — but the project was abandoned years ago. At most they’ll get funds. According to the Archivists, it’ll all be over in two weeks — at most.”

An awfully vivid pounding took over the side of his cranium — an idea refusing to unsettle. The same obduracy Shirase had hated; as he called his name from the top of some crater-way Chuuya had decided to explore, no mind for bruises and dangers. What would we do if you —

“You’re from there too, aren’t you?”

Akutagawa’s eyebrows — the little left of it — curled into a frown. It made him look younger; the careful way he pulled the corners of the papers settled weirdly in Chuuya’s chest. “We were at the outskirts,” he admitted, gawky to the bone marrow of his stiff spine. “Sometimes people from Suribachi tried to rob us, though.”

He blinked. “Did I ever do that?”

“No,” he answered, with a nasty glance he probably ought to discipline. “But some of the other kids had heard the Sheep welcomed all children in need, so they wanted to try and explore the crater — look for you.”

“Why didn’t you?”

Over the edge of the chain of his hat, his jaw grew into a hard line. “I could protect them myself. There was no need.”

Ah, Chuuya thought.

The neck handkerchief Akutagawa always wore was never stained with blood when he happened to glance at it. He wondered how often he changed it — if he dared to remove something Dazai had given him. If he knew enough about his rattled lungs to understand death.

“That’s what I thought, too.”

A look. “And?”

“And look how we both ended up.”

The boy’s lips parted. He snapped them shut again less than a moment later — turned his head away from him, studying Gin’s profile. His eyes fell on the papers again. Chuuya thought about the men in the bar downtown — the words from the News; the dossiers in the Senator’s room.

An idea hummed along to the wind.

“There you are. How come you boys aren’t taking advantage of the warm water?”

Akutagawa jumped to his feet, bending into a bow faster than Chuuya could keep up with. From the lowest step of the wooden stairs, Mori — in his unusually casual clothes, and the surgical blade he knew he was hiding in his shoe — seemed almost impressed.

“I’m plotting for the smartest way to drop our Akutagawa in when he least expects it, Boss,” Chuuya offered, along with a head bow. “All that time locked in the training grounds is ruining his complexion.”

The doctor sighed. “It’s certainly ruining mine. I can hardly afford to get sunburned. Elise will slap me for mere amusement.”

“I’m sure she won’t,” he lied. He stood up, forcing Akutagawa to stand by the back of his coat. “As you said, sir — a great time for a bath. Come on, hop-hop —”

“Let go of me,” Akutagawa snapped, as he curled away from his grasp like a flower following the sun — protesting in that same monotone way of his, when Chuuya managed to get him in a headlock, pulling him down the porch.

“It’ll do you good,” he assured, dragging him through the grass as his heels dug the earth. For someone who had grown up in the streets, he didn’t seem particularly adept at raw play fighting. “The slums may have given you an enviable immune system, apart from that attitude — but that doesn’t mean you shouldn’t experience the wonders of the upper world.”

“I have witnessed tons of —“

“Remember that thing I told you about the ouija board? Showing you how it works and all? Somebody needs to intervene before you become the ghost. We do need to get you out of that coat for it.”

“You will not —“

“Wait, is water bad for your lungs?” He paused, arm flexing around his flagging limbs. “That’d be sad. Have you been drinking Tanaki’s tea? Should I go get you one of those breathing thingies? Or do you—“

“Let go of me!”

Chuuya saw Rashomon arrive from miles — laughing, he jumped away before the relatively small talon could draw a bloodied line down his chest, and watched Akutagawa sprint towards his sister, muttering. It didn’t take long for Mori to reach him, hands behind his back and a glint in his eyes that was distantly interested.

He watched the Akutagawa siblings hush among themselves, and offered: “A spirited young man, don’t you think?”

“Woefully stubborn brat,” Chuuya scoffed, lips curled. “But his heart is in the right place.”

“Certainly. It will be a shame to watch him die.”

His smile vanished.

The villa had never been silent — not a day Chuuya had spent there. It didn’t fall quiet that time either — it stayed framed by chuckles and protests and words, through the splashes of the lake and the sound of the dock creaking under overexcited feet. Mori kept smiling.

“So it is that bad,” he commented, at last.

“Did you think Dazai was kidding?”

Not quite. Perhaps he had assumed cruelty was a necessary badge on his tongue in any letter following Akutagawa’s name; perhaps he’d hoped for him to be lying.

“It’s part of why I was rather skeptical, when Dazai had him join us,” the Boss continued, unconcernedly. “While undoubtedly powerful, he’s an investment that will have to be squeezed to its maximum potential in the little time it has left. Great power — but short-lived. Dazai swears it will be more than worth it, though.”

The ivy from the side of the villa circled his lungs, affectionate like a purring cat. Chuuya tried to remember all the strays he had watched starve as a child; all the children he had heard breathe for the last time. He'd learned unfairness long ago.

The lesson never got old. "He's a kid."

"I know," Mori glanced at him. Despite his best efforts, he couldn't quite understand if there was any sort of human displeasure under the first layer of his skin. He didn't want Akutagawa dead; Chuuya couldn't decide if he cared about why he didn't. "Dazai has a tendency to drag wounded birds on the porch, though." He tilted his head. "I do wonder if he does it out of connection — or curiosity for the unknown."

He didn't answer.

Gin was frowning at something Hirotsu was explaining. She studied Elise with pensive eyes; then, for some reason — she studied Chuuya.

"Any progress on the tattoo matter?" he asked, once the silence got too heavy. It sounded better in his head than — is this a lesson too?

The man sighed. "Fumiko Enchi is one strong, stubborn woman. She would have been an ace to add to our lines — unfortunately, she's still convinced the Division will get her out."

"Through the moles?"

"Moles," Mori echoed. A bit taunting. "If there's one thing I have learned, it's that three people making a deal will each betray one another, once the deal gets boring," He offered him a smile — composed, but slightly unstable. "I have no care for strangers' eyes in our hallways, Chuuya. We will find them, as we always have. We'll crush them."

Dazai will, he didn't say. He had read the archives — had taken part in the executions. The searching techniques were his; the punishments were his. Infestation might have been inevitable — but it was Dazai who had piled up rat traps in every corner of the Haunted Floors.

He thought about the man's voice in his in-ear. The ballroom bowing at his feet.

"Sir, have you read them?"

Mori blinked at him.

"The files," he explained. "My files. Have you read them?"

The man's eyes roamed through his face. Chuuya held his gaze, unflinching.

He'd dug through his desk, when the man had been locked in the Hospital — grave robber and terrible student as he was, despite all of Kouyou's spilled sweat. He knew Mori was still gathering his blurred out traces; he also knew he had something.

You don't care, Chuuya had been reminding himself daily. You never have. So why do you care?

"I have," Mori answered. Nothing more — because the rules had long since been set. Chuuya knew just how long his chains were — knew it to the dot and the collateral. He had hammered them in place himself.

He wouldn't have unshackled them either, given the chance — so he took the hit quietly, as he always did. The need to know where you come from is proof of what I already know, Verlaine's diaries had warned him. I believe humans tend to take things for granted.

"Chuuya."

"Sir."

"Why were you mad at Akutagawa?"

He scrunched up his nose. "I wasn't — he didn't do anything. I lost my composure. Dazai has been spouting bullshit to him again — he's not to blame."

"Dazai," the Boss repeated. He glanced over to the one closed window upstairs; Chuuya felt an unexplainable urge to tear his eyes away from it. "What was it this time?"

"Bastard's going around promising the Guerrilla to his pupil," Chuuya rolled his eyes. "It's whatever. I'll let him throw a temper tantrum when he realizes he's delusional. It might even be mildly entertaining."

Mori kept quiet for long seconds. From the edge of the docks, Kajii jumped in the water again, laughing loud enough to startle every nesting bird in the woods framing the villa. Eventually — the man smiled again.

"Yes," he concluded. "I believe it will be."

Through the quiet between them — that stubborn shard of an idea settled.

"Boss," Chuuya started, slowly, pulling his spine upright. "About the search for enterprising wards Ace mentioned —"

---

...

---

By the time the mixture of chronic ache and the burn of genuine fun began straining his limbs, the sun had set.

Chuuya dragged himself out of the water through breathless laughter, watching Akutagawa direct Rashomon's talons to an approaching Kajii, both of them soaked from the gravity-push he had given them. The feat had brought Gin to tears — Hirotsu, locked in a serious convo with Kouyou and the Kyoukas, had almost lost his composure.

Wins and losses taken — namingly, the thirty seconds Tanaki had managed to keep him underwater for — he shrugged water off, wetting Kajii some more. Then, he made his way into the villa.

Dazai was where he'd expected him to be.

"Kouyou will change the binds in your room, if you hate the way it's lit so much," Chuuya let the bundle under his bedsheets know, shutting the door behind him. "She's too obsessed with her guests' stellar reviews. You know she'll do it."

Not an answer came.

He hadn't really expected it.

The room was drowned in a warm golden tinge — it turned the shut curtains yellow and carved squares of light over the furniture, guiding his naked feet on the cold floor. Chuuya changed out of his soaked clothes. He swore he could feel eyes on his back — but when he turned, only the pile of blankets from the wardrobe stared back.

"Aren't you suffocating under there?" he called, drying his hair with a loose shirt. "Kajii got a sunburn shaped like Kouyou's umbrella — he fell asleep with the thing on his back. And it's red. Like, shitty red."

He bent to search under the desk, pulling the cold surface of the laptop close. Hands twirling through cables, he added, like a second thought: "I told them you were too bored to join, not sick."

"I'm not sick."

"That's what makes you talk," Chuuya threw the laptop on the bed — then followed, swaying along to the rattled mattress; digging until he was cooconed under the warmth of the blanket. "I meant literally sick, bastard. You've spent a week sniffing like the crackheads hunters from Building Three. Bet you've been leaving your nasty snot all over my sheets."

A twitch.

With his gaze set on the cobalt liquid light of the computer, Dazai was into nothing more than a stain in the corner of his vision — distant enough to fit a corpse between them. He didn't speak again.

"This is my bed," Chuuya let him know. "I have stuff to research. If you've got a problem with that, go sleep in your room."

This time, when he turned, he met his less than impressed eyes.

Eye — and he wasn't sure he wanted to tackle the mythical beast; if whatever had fiddled with Dazai's mood had done it so badly, he had felt the need to stay covered up in a room Chuuya had needed to lock-pick his way inside.

He sort of hated that ingrained knowledge.

Chuuya hated in shades, though — in the way his shoulders did not tense and his feet moved accordingly to make space, when he felt Dazai scur minimally closer. Enough to get a taste of body warmth into that slimy skin of his, he assumed — enough to hook two fingers in a hole of his shirt, his cheek deep in the pillow until it disappeared.

Dazai had been lock-picking his way inside all of Chuuya's homes for years now. The mattress kept dipping, and Chuuya kept letting it.

Eyes on the screen, he said: "Got no stories to tell me?"

The cranky alarm on the nightstand ticked along to his breath. The walls were too sturdy — he couldn't hear a peep from the chaos outside.

"Perhaps on imperiously giving away other people's squads?"

No, the finger on his hip traced. And — you tell a story instead.

It should have been harder, knowing what Dazai was thinking when his face was hidden between sheets and — knots, he grimaced; recalling hours spent almost balding the other boy with a hairbrush from Kouyou's purse, after a mission had dropped them in the sewers. My hair is part of my charm, Dazai had protested, with that tone that said he only cared for the sake of doing something. He'd had pulled harder; had bitten down one or two comments on, if you stopped treating your body like a dumpster —

So much from the guy who refused to buy shampoo, he'd have said, though. So Chuuya had kept quiet. Damage control. He forced one hand off the keyboard, abandoning it in the boy's hair, and pretended not to feel him curve towards the familiar hum out of his mouth.

"Here's a story," he offered — as grainy pictures some photograph had taken of the alleys where Chuuya had learned to run lit up the screen. "Two weeks after I watched Koda hold his brother's corpse in his arms, Noguchi told me an Executive should save people."

Undeniable quietness had gone through Dazai's bones at the first touch of his fingers — his body plummeted through the mattress. He didn't stiffen. Chuuya drew circles behind his ear, shaped like the ripples in the lake downstairs — with his nails, because it ought to hurt.

"Felt kinda weird," he admitted. "I hadn't touched the kid, but I had my shoes in his blood. And you were upstairs — swearing the Orphanage couldn't have been saved. Neither of us was an Executive. I was glad for it. But Pianoman used to say that shrugging off responsibility is the, earliest sign of free will people will enact." He scoffed. "Pianoman loved talking bullshit."

A soundless video on the top of an article about the protests started playing on the screen. The cameras all roamed too close to untrusting children's faces — they followed the tired steps of women and men who lived behind plastic sheets and storm-ruined wood.

Blindingly white subtitles read — WHO, IF NOT YOU?

“Ueda’s Ability wasn’t about responsibility. It was about nonexistent ghosts,” Chuuya added. “But I’ve spent a month looking to make amends anyway. Isn’t that weird?”

Dazai moved a bit — just enough to settle at least a corner of his gaze to the screen. He was a blank canva; his press of two knuckles on Chuuya’s waist was sickly and cold. He wanted to protest — wanted to ask, why are my stories always mine and yours belong to a stranger?

Two children skipped on the screen. They were both crying; the camera followed, stubborn. Pressed against his overheated skin, the silver ring around Dazai’s forefinger was colder than ice.

“You know, it’s kind of fun downstairs,” Chuuya said.

Very quietly — very indulgently; though he did not know to which one of them — Dazai foot nudged his own, only once.

Chuuya felt like he’d somehow offered a disgustingly desperate sight — muffled behind a bloodied picture. One of lingering bandages and a lingering eye, rounder than the moon, in the middle of Chuuya’s most loved ones. Dazai fit nowhere but in the Mafia’s golden picture frames. Dazai didn’t fit at all.

Why do you want him to?

I don’t, he scoffed.

The camera razed the deepest depths of the crater. Chuuya recalled makeshift funerals; the warmth of Shirase’s palm — shaking his hand on the port deck to London, with no envy and no rage and no nothing. They were the same age. They had never been, before.

One last one, Ueda whispered.

Chuuya pulled his hand away, pretending not to feel blood under his nails.

“Try not to snore like a haunted tractor,” he concluded, turning on his side, offering him his shoulders. “I have shit to do.”

He jolted awake instants before Tanaki's hand could shake his shoulder.

"Hey," she whispered as he adjusted to his surroundings. The ajar door painted a golden line all the way to his face, forcing him to blink against the darkness of the room. Chuuya's neck hurt; his arm was asleep under the still-on laptop. "Sorry to wake you. They're asking if you can drag the piano outside. There's a bonfire."

Chuuya squeezed his eyes shut, attempting to wring the slumber out of himself. His body would hate him for that unideal sleeping position.

Madame Tanaki's words registered a bit late.

"The piano?"

"Kajii wants to sing us some Opera," In the dim light, the woman's excitement was brighter than it'd been in a while. "The Kyoukas know how to play, so. I tried to knock on Dazai's room, but he didn't answer. Should we —"

"He's out," Chuuya interrupted, crawling to his feet, shutting the computer. He pushed the blankets as subtly as possible — built their bundle over the other sleeping boy. "To chase fireflies and hanging ropes. No need to bother with him."

She seemed unsure. "Won't he be sad to miss the fun of the whole weekend?"

"Sad," Chuuya closed his fingers around her wrist, pulling her out of the room before her gaze could linger. "Shitty Dazai's never sad."

His appearance — under the star-filled sky garden of the villa, framed by the moon-reflected lake and the mafiosi sprawled on onyx grass — was welcomed with a roar of exasperation and Kajii's enthusiastic arm movements, as he was directed to the play-room where Kouyou's old piano laid. Tanaki did her best to guide him and his floating baggage; her carefulness came to an abrupt pause when she tapped the small of his back, and dared to whisper: "Any news from the cursed front?"

Chuuya didn't drop the piano on Hirotsu's head. Nonetheless, he landed it too harshly next to the Akutagawas' murmuring frames, startlingly Rashomon out of its slumber.

"Sorry," he called, tapping the instrument.

"Apologize to us, not the piano —"

As Kajii dragged a clearly confused lady Kyouka to the small bench, and Mori attempted to convince Elise to dance with him, he turned to Tanaki. "The cursed front?"

"I'm simply concerned," the woman replied — and oddly, he believed her.

Statics had electrified the air between them ever since her wedding. Despite the distant warmth she had never truly stopped displaying — it was the first time she looked him in the eyes in months.

“I heard Ueda’s last words,” Tanaki said. “And the torturers always talk — Fumiko has been endlessly taunting about that promised last curse. Her revenge on that redhead of yours, she calls it —“

He huffed. “Did she give any intel on how a dead man’s Ability could still act on the living?”

“She swears it has to do with the tattoos. But she doesn’t know anything about the User the Division paired with Ueda, so —“ Disappointment failed to show — Kouyou had kept him well informed on the investigation process on their latest prisoner, and her spiteful refusal to do more than lose bodily liquids on their grounds. Chuuya had survived worse than a ticking clock with nowhere to go — a part of him was convinced that the whole thing could simply be an ordeal to drive him to insanity.

Waiting.

“It’s fine,” he reassured her. Kajii was warming up his voice. Sitting on a regal throne of sorts someone had dragged outside, Kouyou hid an unprofessional snort behind her fan. “It’ll come. We have no way of knowing if there’s a trigger or a time limit — no point in worrying about it. I dealt with the visions for weeks. I can deal with this.”

“But —“ Tanaki attempted.

“It’s fine,” Lady Kyouka played a note, setting the tone. He intertwined his arm with the woman, overjoyed when she didn’t flinch. “I’ve dealt with worse. You know it,” He smiled. “Want to see if dancing under Kajii’s gargles is possible?”

The stars were too many to count — he attempted, though, pretending the lemon bomb maker’s long notes fit with the elegant way Tanaki moved around his hands.

It didn’t take long for the crowd to join in — Lady Kyouka did her best to play loud enough to suffocate Kajii’s strong attempts, with a rhythm feet could dance to. Kouyou dragged a blushing Hirotsu to the grass; the very moment Gin met his eyes from the other end of the circle, she pulled her brother up, uncaring about his splutters. By the third song, Elise demanded a duet — delighted, Mori clapped along, directing cold glances to Kajii whenever he seemed to wince against her screeches.

Chuuya whistled, as unsubtle as subtleness allowed — the moment his back bumped against Gin’s own, he switched their dancing partners.

“Oh, for God’s —“ Akutagawa snapped, the moment Chuuya clenched his hands around his wrists, trapping him in his breathing-space.

“Now move those feet!” he encouraged, kicking his petrified calves — every part of him seemingly frozen in that embrace’s awkwardness, and his face too sickly pale to grow red.

“Is forcing me into insubordination your aim?” the boy hissed, through creaking teeth. “Is this sabotage?”

“My aim is to rattle that stupid skeleton of yours. You’re very welcome. Fighting — that thing you love — is much like a dance, you know? Right, Ane-san?”

“The most graceful of them all,” she sang, eyes almost shut from the wrinkles of her grin — as she tried her best to force Hirotsu to casqué her — or the other way around.

“Should I kill you now, then? Will it count as battlefield loss?” Akutagawa insisted, eyes on the ground. “Some insubordinations can be forgiven, certainly.”

Chuuya stared.

He laughed so hard it cracked his ribs.

Kajii knew too many songs — Kyouka not nearly the same amount, so her husband took her place. Chuuya watched her bring an old phone to her ear and walk to the dock, smiling teasingly as she passed the stumbling couples of subordinates — half drunk on the same wine Chuuya had been chugging.

Much to Akutagawa’s relief, he offered him a bow and pushed him to sit down before he could begin to cough — and slithered away towards the lake.

Fireflies swarmed through the grass; he got distracted by the sight of a couple of them resting on his boots — he slowed down his steps, making sure he wouldn’t step on them when they decided to leave. By the time he reached the dock, Kyouka’s call was almost over.

She studied her reflection on the sapphire lake; then smiled gently, as she offered: “— back soon, my snowflake. I promise you.”

Once the last firefly had escaped his shoes, Chuuya said: “That’s a nice phone charm.”

The woman blinked. Nodding towards the little bunny toy hanging from her phone, Chuuya extracted his own, dangling it in front of her amazed eyes by a dozen of his own charms.

Lady Kyouka laughed. “You win this.”

“I had some friends with a particular sense of humor,” he replied, pocketing it again. “Some of the charms broke eons ago. I stitched them up. Might be why the phone keeps dropping around.”

“My daughter gave me mine,” By the villa, her husband played another song — someone, at last, dragged Kajii into a ball, leaving Elise’s high pitched tone alone. “She has a thing for bunnies. Most things in our house are bunny-themed.”

“But you call her snowflake.”

A glint appeared in her eyes. “That comes from a dear friend of mine,” She threw a glance to the people around the bonfire. “One your superior is very much interested in, I believe.”

Chuuya had no time to frown. Eyes set on the lake, he saw the familiar glow of a human-like silhouette appear right over Kyouka’s shoulders — long strands of cerulean hair floating over candid veils of light; and soulless eyes staring right back at him, as the woman’s Demon held onto her blade with a god’s ease.

A crystallized snowflake — one with a cruel gaze, but guiltless hands. “You’re the User she has been telling me about,” he gaped. “The one who’s like her.”

Kyouka smiled, bowing her head. “We have been looking for a connection in our family trees — we’ve been unsuccessful, though. At the end of the day, I suppose Abilities are more of a mystery than a strength. Fate is not to be forgotten.”

He laid his gaze on the Ability — the Demon regarded him with royal carelessness. None of the familiarity he could sometimes swear he saw in Golden Demon; only a similar coldness around it. “You’ll have time to understand this possible link. Once you join.”

While amused, her laughter was mostly. “The Port Mafia has a penchant for indoctrinating its members, I’m assuming?”

“It’s not indoctrination,” Chuuya pointed out. “It’s efficiency. Time is more than a resource. We have none of it to waste with people who don’t see the role we fill in the underground.”

“And what kind of role is that?”

“A safe house,” He watched Kouyou pick Elise up; twirl her around so fast that her outlines seemed to fade — vanishing among the fireflies and the stars. “A front line.”

The woman hooked a finger on the bunny charm; dangled her phone right over the lake, fearlessly quiet. “A good place to raise a child?”

“I’m seventeen,” Chuuya shrugged. “No judgement, but I’m too young to be given a brat.”

“Not too old to be one.”

He paused.

Kyouka cleared her voice. “I apologize,” she said. “I didn’t mean to overstep.”

He studied the ripples in the water — the way they broke Demon Snow’s veils into moonlit shards. “Whatever,” he reassured. “You’re not the first to think so. For what’s worth — I’m happy here. The job is a job. It’s not about that. You and your husband should know all about it.”

He felt her stare on the side of his face. “Are you? Happy?”

Gin tripped over her feet. Hirotsu laughed — it was a boisterous sound, somewhat rare in its relentlessness. Chuuya longed to be part of the crust of the earth itself — to spread his bones until they embraced that entire city, with its towers and its rivers and its blood; until his ribs could cage it where the sky and the stars could still be seen, but rain could not enter.

A golden birdcage, Verlaine had written in one of his diaries. He never referred to Chuuya by name; he got lost in endless descriptions of the life he wanted for him, still. Does realness matter more than safety? Than existence?

“I’m more content than I have ever been,” Chuuya said, meeting her eyes, unhesitant. “I have everything. I will bleed until my last breath to keep it.”

Lady Kyouka studied him.

When her gaze found the mirror of the lake again, she was biting down whatever words had first come to mind. “Nothing better to hope for one’s child, I suppose,” she concluded, instead.

He didn’t say anything.

Understanding crowded her face again; she laughed, a bit helplessly.

“Again,” the woman said, “I apologize.”

“Nothing to be sorry for.”

“Perhaps. But I didn’t mean to bring back bad memories.”

Chuuya snorted.

“Something funny?” Kyouka blinked.

“Memories aren’t —“ something I have, he thought about telling. He decided against it — lingering on pretentious tribulations was tasteless enough without cause. “I have no care for them. There are realer things to linger on.”

She frowned — right on the edge of polite. “Not what I would have guessed from looking at you.”

He stared. “What is that supposed to —“

“There you are!”

Kouyou’s sandals knocked rhythmically against the wooden dock as she skipped to them — her smile only a tad brighter than the rows of stars. She settled her palm between his shoulder blades; it felt familiarly warm against his outlines.

“I was looking for you,” she said, accepting the nod Kyouka offered to her with a gracious tilt of her chin. “You better hope my mood is less sour than the lemonade Kajii offered this morning. How dare you not offer me a single dance?”

Chuuya huffed. “That’s ‘cause you keep wanting to be the lead.”

“Perhaps I’m just better at it.”

“You’re not. Ma’am.”

“I was the lead when you were fifteen,” she tutted, tapping his under-chin. “I shall be the lead until we’re in a grave, little god.”

“Peculiar nickname,” Kyouka intervened, caressing the ears of her bunny phone charm. When she caught Chuuya’s gaze, she blinked in the name of an inside joke.

“Related to an enemy of mine,” he offered.

Her eyebrow curled imperceptibly. “Might want to work on that, then,” She bowed. “If you’ll excuse me. I’m sure my daughter would like to wish her father goodnight as well.”

Kouyou smiled. “Let’s go dancing, then.”

For the sake of her pleased hums — her roughly lined rose-tone, singing along to the notes of the piano; as a surprisingly adept Tanaki sang a chorus in a sweet sounding language — Chuuya waited until they were swaying among the dancing pairs, to ask: “So, what game are you playing at?”

The Executive settled her arm on his waist, clearly satisfied with the forced position. Fireflies lit up around the pearls of her kanzashi. “Game?”

“You know,” Chuuya curled an eyebrow. “Bringing two Governmental assassins into your home, I mean.”

Kouyou didn’t pause.

Prosperous assumption that she would, of course — the Lady of the Port didn’t pause. Taking her by surprise was a feat; he had been attempting since the one and only time he had put a street frog in her purse, and she hadn’t even blinked.

“How long did it take you?” she asked.

“Thirteen seconds, more or less.”

“Of course.”

“No underground assassin would mention a child,” Chuuya added — he knew she reveled in the process. “If someone’s a ghost, a disappointed client won’t be able to look for anything to take from them — as countermeasure, or revenge. And both of them walk just like every goody two shoes jerk from the Division.”

Her nod wasn’t particularly impressed — but she twirled them around with the lightness of a good job on her desk. “They came to me hoping to fool our desperate recruiters,” Kouyou’s smile was a blink. “They failed.”

The music grew more cheerful.

Kajii dragged a rather blank-faced Gin into a vault of sorts, too close to the bonfire — almost burning the hem of her white dress. “How come Golden Demon hasn’t slaughtered them yet?”

“I want the Lady’s Ability,” Kouyou said, flippantly, with the tone Elise sported in front of toy shops. Hunger was always too vicious to lay on her features — instead, there was bloodthirst. “Her Demon Snow is extremely similar to my Golden. It will make its training absurdly easy — and we are in severe need of attack-oriented Abilities.”

Perplexed, he questioned: “You think you can convince her to betray the Government?”

“Something subtler,” she corrected him. “I have a theory. Your friend Iceman helped me shape it.”

Chuuya’s eyes snapped up. “Iceman?”

Their feet danced through uncut grass; over the almost audible texture of Mori’s gaze on them — always too knowing; frustratingly so, if Chuuya hesitated on it — Kouyou explained: “He used to help out the Archivists, in his free time. You must know. His proficiency had brought him to many corners of the world, and his gift allowed us to update our Users lists with remarkable swiftness.”

“His gift,” Chuuya echoed. “You mean how he was always aware of the presence of an Ability around him?”

“Precisely. A mission of sorts — only a few weeks before he was first sent to kill you, I believe — brought him to the Kyoukas,” She waved a firefly away from her nose. “That’s how I came to know about the existence of an Ability so similar to mine. His notes were somewhat confusing. He insisted to have sensed an Ability in the Kyoukas’ home — but at the time, only their daughter was present.”

He squinted. “You think the brat might have not developed her Ability yet?”

“Oh, no,” Kouyou replied. “I believe she will inherit her mother’s.”

Chuuya stared.

Her smile stayed pleasant. She wrapped his arm around her waist — settling her chin on his shoulder, to keep her eyes on the piano. Lips on his ear, she whispered: “The child has no Ability. If she did, the Division’s Archives would have been informed — unless some of their most faithful assassins had taken the decision to keep it a secret.”

“And you don’t believe that’s possible?” he insisted. “She certainly seems very protective of the kid.”

“I know how these Government fools work,” the woman replied, shaking her head. “It’s in their best interest to let the Division know about their Ability User child. It would make for great protection, should anything happen to them — and in their line of work, it’s certainly possible.”

“Iceman’s gift is never wrong,” Chuuya resonated, to himself. Paused. “Was.”

Her chin hovered over his shoulder, for a breath — laid down again; this time, gentler. “No, it wasn’t. Which is why we might have something of a rarity on our hands — a situation not unlike Tsuchiya Mi’s one.”

“The doctor,” he recalled. It seemed like such a long time ago. “Tsuchiya said her sister’s Ability was passed down by the man who took the two of them in.”

“Rare,” Kouyou echoed. “But definitely possible. And if the parents’ loyalty to the lighter side is as firm as it seems — we shall simply take the easier route and get their daughter.”

Chuuya hesitated. “Meaning?”

Her cheek brushed his dress shirt; she looked up at him from that sideways cradle, eyes wide like a child’s. With no hesitation, she said: “Nothing is easier to morph than youth.”

It wasn’t exactly what he had meant. “So your intention was to lure them here, and figure out a way to get the woman’s Ability out of her?”

“That’s the second part of it,” Kouyou confirmed. “First and foremost — I meant to give them an open field for their attempt to assassinate Mori.”

His eyes glanced in the pair’s direction — sharing the piano bench; mumbling gently in the space between their noses. “During the trip?”

“Probably not. They’re only here to assess defense measures, I’m assuming. They might not even be the ones to do it, when the time comes.”

“But you want to kill them here?”

“I don’t want them dead. We cannot risk Snow Demon leaving with Lady Kyouka’s last breath,” She twirled him by the wrists. “I only want them scared.”

“Of us?”

Kouyou’s grin sharpened. “Terrified.”

He could see the logic behind it. Were the Kyoukas to attack, and were they to be left alive after it — against any and all Mafia procedures — with no knowledge of the Executive’s plans for Snow Demon — it would keep them on anxious, waiting toes. Make them careless — easier to study, away from the Division’s eyes.

“Does Boss know?”

“It depends,” The music slowed down to an end; they bowed. Kouyou winked. “Let’s see just how many comments he makes about Elise’s bathing suit this weekend, yes?”

Stolen, laying between their secretive bodies in the Executive’s palm — Chuuya wasn’t sure of when she’d done it; wasn’t sure of why, either, if he was foolish about it — the bunny on Kyouka's phone dangled softly, one ear slightly chipped.

"You'll be my best project," Kyouka said, a bit distantly, gentle as the fireflies' wings. "And she'll be just mine."

Her grin ran over the phone charm with something utterly devastating in it. He didn't quite manage to smile back.

---

...

---

The days flew by under a scorching sun.

Chuuya and Gin agreed on an unspoken alliance to get Akutagawa out of his coat, at least once — with a variety of results, and some bleeding gashes on all their knees. The sight of his soaked hair and clenched fists mostly made up for it; when his cough seemed to get worse in the afternoon, though, Chuuya manipulated his way into sticking the two of them in Kouyou's collection gallery.

"You like paintings?" he asked, by the time half an hour had passed, and Akutagawa had yet to move from a particular canva.

"No," Akutagawa said.

He didn't move, still.

It was midday when he and Tanaki stopped by the lake to let their horses drink — there, as he softly muttered insults into Mackerel's mane, the woman offered tales of her more adult children's recent accomplishments.

"They're never around much," she said. "I can't fault them for that. I had plenty of occasions to spend time with them in their childhood, and I hardly ever took them. I get their resentment. The world must be much more tempting."

"Because of the syndicate?" he guessed.

"It's a difficult line of work," she commented, eventually — once they had climbed on their horses again, and he no longer expected an answer. "I always knew. I joined out of necessity — hunger and thirst. There have been times when I have attempted to regret my choice, but — I find it impossible. People want to survive."

He thought of cockroaches and children in plastic bags. “That’s natural.”

“Nature is amongst the cruelest beings,” Tanaki didn’t falter. “I was watching men drag corpses in my Hall while my daughter had her first recital. Now she’s all grown,” The woman caressed her horse — pale, graffitied skin against light mane. He wondered if she would ever tell him how she’d gotten those scars on her face. “There are times,” she admitted, “When I wonder what else I will one day miss.”

Chuuya leaned forward, hanging off the horse’s neck. “Can’t say I understand.”

“Of course,” She half-smiled. “You’ve never been one to linger on the long lost.”

“You all say that,” he murmured.

“Isn’t it true?”

He didn’t know. His hands felt horribly sticky, at times — pulling spider webs from abandoned apartments; bleeding themselves to raw skin in an effort not to let go.

“Tanaki,” he asked, gruff. The sun looked nice where it rose against the lake — poetry was a thing, he assumed; because it lingered. “Where we came from, or whatever that is — do you think it matters?”

“I don’t think matter is the issue here,” she offered, after a pause. Her eyes were far past him; her hands were tracing her tattoos. “I think most of us care, and there’s nothing to do about it.”

The horses neighed, distraught.

Mori and Kouyou dragged him to a corner of the lake to discuss recent endeavors — and the long-solved issue of Lippman’s sister. They had found her substitute rather quickly; Chuuya still had no idea of where she had been buried.

Keep it like that, he could hear Lippman’s grave tut, sometimes. Chuuya thought it was a bit too mean for his voice.

“If we truly wish to make the Executives meetings more scarce, we will need to reorganize countless inspection methods,” Mori sighed, watching Elise soak his scarf through the floating lemon bombs Kajii was testing in the lake. “But I still believe it to be the better option.”

“Most organizations do limitate the reach the lower ranks have over the Heads,” Kouyou agreed. “The speech you gave last month certainly gathered some appreciation for you, Boss — but I do believe the old system had some fault.”

“Know the name, not the face?” Chuuya recited, studying old reports — documentation from the first years of the syndicate. “It’s not a bad idea. The underground does fear the ones of us they know the least about more significantly.”

“The shadows of the Port Mafia,” Mori smiled.

His eyes stayed on the yellowish papers — a purposeful choice; the best one not to glance over the only shut window of the villa.

As far as the guests knew, the Demon Prodigy was off on some mission. Or studying the supporting beams; or trying to convince the horses to walk all over him — or any sensible excuse Chuuya had painstakingly come up with. In truth, he had yet to speak a word — and Chuuya had yet to sleep in some place other than the edge of his sweaty, sick-lined bed.

“We were having such a nice conversation, Boss,” he scoffed. “Why mention him?”

Kouyou snorted. She was quick to clear her throat — offering Mori a new file. “How about this: we push some more paperwork on that lazy fool of the Secret Executive.”

His ears unwillingly perked up.

The Boss either didn’t notice or didn’t care — the Executive, on the other hand, made sure to subtly splash some water from over the dock in his face. “He will not accept,” the man replied, too distracted by the reports in his hands. “You know it, Ozaki. We cannot go back on the conditions he set.”

“If he wasn’t so dedicated to his primadonna act, perhaps,” she muttered. “How long can one man pretend the world stops along to his whims?”

Chuuya frowned, indecisive. Despite the pointed gaze he could feel the woman direct him, at last, he dared: “Conditions?”

Mori raised his eyes.

The hint of poison in them didn’t quite fit with the peaceful scenery around him — with the neon floatie Elise had abandoned on his lap, and the water at his back, reflecting a bloodless sky. But he could imagine him silencing some stuttering subordinate from the height of his desk, inevitable and quiet — so he did, and straightened.

“It took some effort,” the man offered, when the air around them grew easier to breathe. Chuuya didn’t know what he had found in his search; he contented himself with it having been satisfactory. “The Secret Executive had no desire to gain his position. He relented, eventually, but he brought some conditions to the table.” Mori got another look at his face; he laughed. “The idea seems to surprise you.”

“Quite,” Chuuya squinted at the words in his laps. “The Mafia doesn’t really negotiate.”

Most of the Mafia would have killed with no mind or morals to get even a single step closer to an Executive seat. To think someone could be begged to accept it certainly raised questions on their character — and their priceless worth.

“We don’t,” Mori agreed. “But his requests were of no real weight. He demanded anonymity. He demanded to be assigned to teach the aspiring assassins. And he demanded to be left alone.”

He blinked. “Verbatim?”

“Verbatim.”

“The problem stands,” Kouyou insisted — just the amount of ruffled that told him she would have some words for him, later. “There’s only so much space one can give one of the heads of the syndicate. If we are to regroup, he shall be plagued by the reminder that he is, at the end of the day — one of us.”

Unfortunately, she didn’t conclude.

Chuuya heard it strangely clear.

Confirmation about the suspicious steps of the Kyoukas made it frustratingly hard not to keep a too evident eye on them. They went out of their way to ask about the Demon Prodigy’s absence, are his duties holding him up?, and to ask questions on missions that were only rumored to have been solved by Chuuya. They shared stories about their little girl, Izumi — and Chuuya watched Kouyou’s eyes lit up a bit more with each word.

She’s always wanted a girl, Dazai tapped on the sharp bone of his wrist, one night.

He didn’t question how he had come to know about the matters of a soirée he wasn’t taking part in. “I would know,” he rumbled, tossing in his bed — in an effort to find a less suffocatingly warm corner of it. He could have slept in Dazai’s room, certainly — except that was his room, and Chuuya wasn’t going to let himself be thrown out. “I’m the miserable bastard she kept trying to put in women’s kimonos.”

Jealous?, he traced.

“Go back to dying under the pillows.”

When he got up, that night — Gin found him in the kitchen, forcing his way through a cold bowl of instant noodles, under the sole light of the moon.

“Hey, kid,” he greeted, very quietly. The rush of the lake and the songs of crickets were the only sounds around. “You eaten?”

She nodded. Her nightgown was a pale shade of blue — she was a stray ray of moonlight, climbing to the too tall stool on her tiptoes. If he searched, he could see the scars Rashomon had left on her back. Despite her confirmation, he threw the rest of the noodles in a new bowl. She eyed it for a moment — then, with a glint Chuuya knew all too well, she set to devouring the food.

Faster than anyone could steal, he thought.

“Executive,” she began.

“We’re doing 3:00 A.M. snacks,” he interrupted. “Chuuya is fine. And you can sign, if you want. I don’t mind.”

Gin blinked owlishly, cheeks reddening a bit. She fiddled with her chopsticks — then laid them on the table, and signed: what do you know about Y-U-M-E-N-O?

He stared. “Q? What about Q?”

She gulped, fingers bending. Chuuya had dirt under his nails — he’d gone to check on a nearby contact of theirs; had buried his corpse in the garden of his wife’s side of the house, so that she would stumble on it first thing in the morning. The burying was always persistent behind his eyelids — more than any final blow.

There is some responsibility in being the last face someone will see, Hirotsu had said, once.

“The Commander told me about them,” Gin said, after a bit. I don’t really understand, she added. Why are they imprisoned?

Chuuya leaned back onto his seat. He drew mindless shapes on the noodle contained, the tips of the chopsticks dragging along — stopped, once they started looking too much like bars.

“Q’s always been particularly bloodthirsty,” he answered, at last. “Accidents I’m not entirely privy to. They’ve killed a great deal of mafiosi,” He shrugged. “Dazai was tasked with finding them a place to stay when they weren’t needed — where they couldn’t put us all at risk.”

Some owl flew over the lake, shattering the silence. He watched Gin study it. The lack of a face made her face too open — too effortless to read.

She’ll learn, he considered. All of them had. The Port Mafia didn’t allow fall-backs.

“Aren’t we all?”

He curled an eyebrow. “All what?”

“A risk,” Gin insisted. “Aren’t we all a risk? Why are they the only one caged?”

He sighed. “Where’s this coming from?”

“I just — I knew a kid like them. Someone too powerful and too irrational — young. And —” She clenched her fingers until her knuckles were white; conflicted, she sighed — don’t you think their resentment might grow, if they’re caged away? Used only when necessary?

He observed her frame — a line of pearly white against a ceramic countertop. Her hair reminded him of Yuan, for some reason; the weeks when the air dye faded away, and the attacks were too close and vicious for him to sneak out and buy her some more.

“Gin,” he offered. “No one will cage your brother.”

“I know they won’t,” she replied. She bore the expression he had sometimes seen peek by the door of her vacancy — when her brother brought his handkerchief to his mouth. Inevitably

“Then what’s the issue?”

“I don’t know,” It wasn’t quite a snap or a snarl. “I don’t — thinking about it makes me sad. Not very ruthless of me, I suppose.”

Chuuya shrugged. “Ruthlessness has no point to it without something to lose. You’re not at fault for wishing there was a better solution for their situation — a kinder one,” He thought about Q’s screeches; the sound of their nails against the cell door, as he watched the guards shut it without looking back. “But Q caused their fate. Good men died because of them. They’re lucky they weren’t executed.”

Can’t they atone?, she pressed.

“Maybe,” he conceded. “If they complete enough missions — if they show their bloodthirst has an aim, and not an uncertain embrace for the entire world.”

“They sound like someone who has never known anything but the shadows,” Gin laid her chin on crossed arms, eyes lost somewhere Chuuya couldn’t see. The show of trust surprised him — lowered guard and naked shoulders. “How are we meant to blame them for hating the world?”

“We aren’t. That doesn’t change the fact that there is a light,” He tapped one finger in the middle of her forehead, watching her nose scrunch up. “And for the sake of our people, they should remember it’s not us.”

“Do you think that’s what they want?” Gin asked. To be brought to the light?

He stilled.

He dropped his shoulders before it could be seen — cleared both his throat and the image stuck under his eyelids. “I think they don’t want to be in pain any longer, and don’t know how to go about it,” he offered. “But if they believe the light has no suffering, they’re delusional.”

Hesitation slowed her words. “You think so?”

“As far as Ane-san puts it,” he mused. “The shadows are less of a hypocrite.” He smiled — a small, brusque thing, just enough to uncrease the lines in the girl’s forehead. Ruffling her hair, he stood. “Want to know one of the first things she ever told me? Existence is a wound. It is foolish to think otherwise.”

After a blink, Gin dared: “Sort of morbid.”

“Depressing as shit. But then she explained — there are those who will pretend time or hope can heal any and all gashes,” Chuuya tilted his head to the side. “And there are those who understand that if living is being wounded — there will never be any time to scar.”

The girl’s eyes softened.

“Still depressing as shit. But realistic, at least,” he concluded, taking both of their dishes and leaving them in the sink. He would need to wake up earlier tomorrow — fix his mess.

“Despite what Q might think, at the end of the day — isn’t it easier to learn to live with the blood?”

---

...

---

On the second to last night they spent in Kouyou’s villa, Chuuya found Mori leaning on the doorframe of his room’s bathroom.

“Oh,” the man blinked. “Chuuya, what are you doing here?”

A bundle of papers was in his hands, a bit wet by the corners — possibly, the nonsensical messes written in an unknown alphabet he’d been finding around the room the entire week. They had all looked like drafts — but despite the various languages Chuuya and Dazai had developed in the years, he had yet to understand a word of it.

“There we go. Chuuya’s back to pestering me!”

His head snapped up.

Aimlessly kicking water, Dazai sat in the almost overflowing bathtub, attempting to wet the papers with rhythmic, dramatic waves of his hands. His only visible eye was bright and awake — and the obnoxiousness on his features was a familiarly irritating sight. The water was tinged red, and his chest was bruised — he had to have taken care of a mission, at some point, during Chuuya’s absence.

“I told you I wasn’t lying,” he continued, loud and whiny, ink-colored soaked hair hanging over drenched bandages. “He keeps breaking into my room! He probably wants to bite the soles off all my shoes like the undomesticated mutt he is.”

He looked — alive. Chuuya registered what he’d said a moment too late: “What do you mean your —“ Eyes still blinking, Mori met his gaze.

The curtains in the main room were still pulled — shut tight, just how he had left them that morning, stumbling with Hirotsu after pinching the unsleeping boy’s forehead. The room stood unchanged. But — the bedsheets had been tied up; the clothes on the floor had been stepped on; the bandages around Dazai’s eye were lacking a layer.

Chuuya stepped inside the bathroom, and dropped on the shut toilet.

“If I wanted to play a prank on you, I’d wait until you’re not in the room, and put a bomb in those pathetic flip flops you own,” he declared. “I want my console back. Where did you hide it?”

“Always so classy,” Dazai sighed. He blew bubbles of soap, his body mostly hidden from that opaque bundle; stared at him a blink too intensely, only for a breath.

Mori’s sigh was pure exasperation. “You boys have been doing so well this whole trip. If you could refrain from demolishing poor Ozaki’s villa for the next two days, I’d be incredibly grateful.”

“Of course! I’d never inconvenience you in any way, Mori,” Dazai grinned so widely the veins on his neck bulged out. As if he felt it, he started rubbing them viciously with a hot pink sponge.

Chuuya raised his eyebrows, leaning back on the toilet to escape the allegedly accidental splashes. “Boss, did something happen?”

“Nothing at all,” The man stood, leaving the bundle of papers inside the empty faucet. His smile was tight — despite the utter silence he had been welcomed in, Chuuya got the feeling of having interrupted a conversation. “I only came to check on Dazai. God knows he has been working too much, hasn’t he? Not a minute of rest. He and Akutagawa just came back.”

“You can pay me another vacation,” Dazai replied, submerged all the way to his nose — and, consequently, choking on the water. “A funnier one. What makes you think I would choose to spend my rest rooming anywhere close to my dog’s self-sufficient snoring contests?”

The toilet lid was jolted alongside his wince. “You’re a stinky, disgusting, lying son of a bitch —“

“And you’re a tiny fairy in denial —“

“And you’re a diarrhea-birtherd maggot —“

“Alright,” Mori interrupted. “I will take my leave. It’s rather late for my old bones.”

“You’re not old,” they chorused. Chuuya tasted irony somewhere — but couldn’t pinpoint to what voice it belonged.

His smile grew slightly more sincere. He patted Dazai’s head, despite the water; then, patted Chuuya’s too. “And you boys aren’t young enough to get away with jokes anymore.”

Our boys, he recalled. The flash of a camera — a hand on his shoulder. He wondered if they would be asked to take a picture once they turned eighteen, too; if it meant something, or if cracked frames were the least of his problems. My boys.

Mori peeked from behind the room’s door, tilting his head just enough to dig his gaze into the bathroom. He watched Dazai, a second too long. Buried between the candles in the corridor, he could have been one of Chuuya's hallucinations. Minus the blood, perhaps. "Good night, then."

"Good night, Boss."

"Go-oo-od night," Dazai grinned, with the type of sharp teeth that promised a heart attack. It was dead skin on a fake corpse — a good enough rendition of what a person might have been, if dying. His fingers were wrinkled — the water had to be cold; he had to have been there for eons.

The doors closed.

He didn't watch Dazai's face deconstruct itself into hollowness — heard it with the thump! against one side of the tub, and the rough texture of the breath escaping between his teeth.

Is it a Mori thing?, Chuuya had wanted to ask, a few times. He never had. He knew what he would have said.

Wordlessly, he reached forward to switch the mixer faucet on to the hottest water possible. It hit the surface with a pointed hiss; Dazai watched it fall with uninterested eyes, even after it bloomed a pond of warmth around his curved body.

"Don't drown," he warned. "I'll kill you."

"That makes no sense," Dazai informed.

"Make it make sense, then."

Chuuya stepped into the room again — shut the curtain tighter, so only the soft emergency light over the bathroom's window remained; wore the oldest shirt he owned and the pants he'd stolen from Dazai's mission-trip bag, after the boy had set fire to his own — blue and long past his calves.

Mere seconds before the tub could overflow and ruin Kouyou's floors, Chuuya sat on the edge of the tub and shut the faucet off.

"Why can you never leave it be," Dazai asked, flatly. The fact that he was asking at all had him seethe with discomfort.

Bait, he mused. "Every moment I spend in your vicinity is one more chance to kill you."

He squirted the bright lilac shampoo from the window seal over the boy's bowed head, bored by his lack of whining laments. The bottle was thrown to a corner; Chuuya huffed, pushing his sleeves up with his chin, and placed his fingers in the knotted mane, scrubbing vigorously.

Head bowed, uncannily obedient under the too-efficient ministrations, Dazai studied the glint of that stupid silver ring, eyelashes fluttering.

Eyes set on some spot of the wall, fingers tangled between suds and hair, Chuuya asked: “Why am I different?”

There was no dragging Dazai into words or actions unsoaked in planning — no smart enough trick to trudge past machinations he had already shaped and turned over more times than the sun would have demanded.

The trick, Chuuya thought — the trick was letting him believe he had planned it all.

“Mori said you’re working on something,” Dazai offered, ignoring him. “Is Matsuda’s stolen research on us that something?”

Perhaps he should have been surprised to figure out that even in such a mood, he’d somehow managed to snoop around Chuuya’s dossiers. He wasn’t. “No,” he said. “That’s purely recreational.”

Police Station paper was always rough under his fingertips. Non-recyclable, maybe. The ink was blue — which annoyed him, for some reason. The blurry shots the department had managed to get of mafiosi were unflattering. It was clearly the result of months and months of work — dissertations between the little the Mafia allowed to end up in the officers’ hands, and what Matsuda had managed to take from the Special Division — while selling information about Chuuya.

It made for a faded final picture — frayed at the edges, and frustrating to a point he could see it make Matsuda sleepless. But it made for a picture.

“He’s a fucking idiot,” he concluded. There was a stubborn knot behind Dazai’s ear; he pulled as quickly as possible, making his shoulders jump — scratching his scalp not to verbalize apologies he didn’t deserve. He could just fucking brush them once in a while, he accused. It worked instantly; goosebumps appeared on his neck, rendering his head heavy and gooey in his hands. “I’d admire his stubbornness, if it wasn’t so inconvenient.”

Vacant eyes peeked behind wet strands — behind the bandages, loosened from the shampoo, only short of hanging from his face like a peculiar earring. “Don’t pretend you don’t know how this ends.”

Chuuya set his jaw.

Ripples bloomed in the water; the boy only leaned forward enough to lay his chin on the edge of the bathtub. Buds trails chased each other down the sides of his nose. He cleaned them off with his thumb, tracing the dark puffiness of his permanent eye bags — they’ll carve his skin, Kouyou had once tutted, studying him — and refusing to focus on how Dazai’s eyelids doozily fluttered at the contact.

“You must have seen a bug survive being stepped on, at least once,” the Executive yawned. A lulling shush — a perfect fit to the devoid he’d been hiding under his sheets for days. “How it writhes, how it fights — all too close to some food. Eventually, queasy people get hungry — and what happens?”

Chuuya's hands dripped soap between his legs. What are you even doing here?, he questioned. "Speaking from experience?"

"No," Dazai said. "I don't get stepped on."

His nose was too red. He played human like he was sure someone would call him out on it being a pretense. Peeking from the wall of bubbles and water, the edge of his shoulders was pale and sharp; vaguely, Chuuya wondered if he had looked quite so tired all the time — before.

Before what?

Out of nowhere, Dazai stood.

"Dude," Chuuya protested, raising his eyes to the ceiling. Water drops landed on him with an aim that had to have been planned. "Come on."

"Come on," the boy echoed, in another tone. He stepped out of the tub, wet feet squeaking on Kouyou's good floors — he called: "Get the leash. I'm taking you on a walk."

Miraculously, he dodged the wet shampoo bottle Chuuya threw at his head.

The valley surrounding the villa looked somewhat different under the full moon. Not quite menacing, but less friendly — an ajar door hiding a screaming match. The trees at the edge of his vision were invitingly lined in silver moonlight. Cold air whipped against his face — he felt it seep in through every hole of his old shirt, tickling scar tissue and mosquito bites.

"I saw my mom," Chuuya offered, at some undefined point, as they stumbled through the too tall grass — reaching their waists the closer they got to the further edge of the lake.

Sporting new bandages and only his coat over his unbuttoned dress shirt, Dazai's head rose very, very slowly. "Are you high?"

He slapped his nape.

"Ouch," he whined, waving a frantic hand towards the mess on his torso — a ring of bruises as wide as a bottle, with another circular spot of purplish gray in the middle; the result of getting hit from too close while wearing a bulletproof vest. "I'm wounded, in case you didn't notice!"

"And whose fault is that?" he accused. "Why did you even do this? Bullets fucking hurt. That's not rocket science."

"I read about a man who was hit so hard with a bullet, the vest caused immediate death via heart attack," he recounted, dreamily. There was still an uncanny note in his voice; a recorded cry in the background, giving his every word an almost questioning edge. "Immediate death means painless death, right?"

"Who did you even convince to shoot you? When?" Chuuya insisted. "I only helped Hirotsu fix Tanaki's car for two hours at most. And your men are too scared of Boss to dare."

“Akutagawa,” Dazai did a big jump over the stalks, staggering on the landing. “He did a terrible job, unsurprisingly — but someone needs to start actually putting a gun in those anemic fingers of his, don’t you agree? All that potential...”

His voice sounded venomous even to his own ears, when he spoke: “I know what you’re doing with him.”

The boy only turned to curl an eyebrow at him. The stars were cursed to be more visible when one left Yokohama — the reflection of them in his eye was always hard to find, though. Suicidal men fared better off in the city. “Do you?”

“Yes,” Chuuya huffed, as he pulled the too large pants up his hips with one hand. “And like most of your plans, it has other options.”

“Sure,” Dazai agreed, easily. “But you know I want the best one.”

They reached one of the lake banks, just far away enough from the villa to make it seem like the skeleton of an idea. Dazai wasted no time leaving his coat in the grass, walking secure steps through the lower waters — humming along to some song about double suicide Chuuya wished Hirose had never put out, sweaty skin glistening.

Bandages and scars; the first a choice, the second an imposition. Mori believes in the value of perpetual remembrance, he had told him. If he stitches me up, he has a right to make it ineffaceable.

Is that how it works?, he hadn’t asked.

“I’m assuming you mean because of Ueda.”

He blinked — caught as he sat down on the wet ground, crossing his legs. “What?”

“The hallucinations from his Ability,” Dazai clarified, when the water reached the bullet wound halo between his ribs. The sides of his shirt floated around him. If he was cold, he didn’t show it — Chuuya didn’t linger on why that had been the first day he’d been able to get out of the room. “They showed you your parents?”

“No.”

“No?”

“Fumiko Enchi’s Ability,” he explained.

It was quiet.

Nights in Yokohama were never so silent — Chuuya had long assimilated irate car horns, never sleeping transport services, and laughing drunks. Suribachi had been louder at night than during any other hour; a splendid way to keep his nerves alert. Light sleeper, bad dreamer, Adam had written to him, once. He didn’t know which cable of his new systems had given him an understanding of ways of saying; as far as Chuuya knew, he’d just made it up.

He curled grass blades between his fingers, head tilted back. Ueda's tattoo didn't even burn; it was all so peaceful it felt unfair.

"What's that saying?" he questioned, out loud. "There's a gift in a horse's mouth?"

Bent to search for fish under the onyx and silver lake surface, Dazai came to halt. "What did you just say?"

"You know," Chuuya insisted. "The saying. Since we have stables here — I know there's one. Don't look for a horse as a gift?"

The silence lasted a moment longer. "Yes," Dazai nodded, extremely serious. "My dear, dear Chuuya — that is exactly how the saying goes."

He retched. "Don't be disgusting —"

"So, then," the boy questioned, too loudly, "What does Mama Chu look like?"

"What?"

"Your mom," he echoed, lowering himself in the water all in one go. A strange word out of his mouth. "What did she look like?"

Chuuya thought about it. The grass was still grass under his nails — no bloodied sand and no gaping wounds; no unfocused eyes trapping him in an embrace he might manage not to escape. He'd always wondered, privately, if he had been the one to get lost on the cruel road — if he'd fallen in Professor N's arms all on his own.

"Like me," he dared, after a bit — quieter than intended. "She looked like me."

Dazai made a face — floating like a corpse, arms wide. "I hardly believe any woman on earth could be that hideous."

"My mom's not ugly," Chuuya snapped, threateningly raising his arm — it got one of the pebbles to graze the old blackened dot scars on his wrist, leaving a faint burn. "And you look like a toad with its skin inside out."

"If she sports that mop of fried shrimp you call hair, I'm obliged to believe —"

"Maybe your mother looked like a mackerel shit puddle, but mine —"

"False information," the boy cut through, splashing water all the way to him. There was some kind of amusement in his tone; a smile drawn with drying blood on the concrete. "I'm rather sure of it. I look like my father, anyway."

Chuuya's bones creaked.

You're not curious, he reminded himself. It was a lowly, unsatisfactory feeling; it would only let the boy know he sometimes wondered if bandages had been stuck to his skin since he'd first crawled — if his parents were dead; if he'd killed them. If he felt the same aching longing Chuuya sometimes did — not for something, but for the certainty of having lost it.

When he raised his eyes from the pebbles he'd been floating in his hands, spinning them like planets and satellites — ripples shattered the lake, and Dazai was nowhere to be seen.

Kouyou had told him a story about a lake, once, he recalled — or a mountain, maybe. The moon studied herself on the pristine veil of liquid cold, and he squinted. Something about a woman's beloved being taken, he thought. She'd been told to empty out an entire lake, or to move a mountain even two inches — and she'd get her lover back.

How stupid of her to try, the Executive had mused. There was a specific tinge of her pupils that Chuuya had long dubbed after Beatrice. But again — of course. Of course she did.

“Don't get seaweed in your skull,” Chuuya called, distractedly, attempting to plasm one of the pebbles into a convincing Saturn. “Last thing you need is more salt in you.”

There was no answer.

Chuuya frowned at the lake. ““You there?””

Somewhere through the silence, he thought of the way Mori's scarf had looked — brushing the tiles of the bathroom. Somewhere through it, he recalled the shower at the Headquarters — Ueda's well-crafted, gentle painting of Dazai's body, bent over the filled bathtub, eyes lifeless.

He sprung up so fast he got vertigo from it.

“Oi!” Chuuya snapped, hems of his pants catching between his toes as he stumbled over the lake bank. The shock of freezing water soaking the fabric had his spine jolt, as if electrified. “Fuck that — you piece of fucking — Dazai! I'll kill you myself! ” The rush of rustled waters was the loudest sound in the valley — even his voice echoed, startling owls out of the tree branches. He dug through the lake with his hands, eyes frantic. ““You tryna die where I'll be blamed for it? Fuck that! Get the fuck out! Right now!””

He staggered to where the lake was deep enough to go underwater — inhaled and sunk, arms cutting the water as he turned and turned. No specks of Dazai's pale skin; not a glint of white bandages. Ueda's tattoo didn't even burn —

Emerging with his breath short, chattering teeth and drenched bones, he snapped: “Where the fuck are — “

A ghostly thin back floated in his peripheral vision.

Chuuya's heart skipped a beat. Anger; he let himself believe, fighting the heavy waves to get to his target — Tainted never worked in water, and the fucker knew it, and he swore — “You piece of bastard,” he snarled, nonsensically, as he dragged his spluttering, panting body straight. “I ought to drag you by the fucking spine — you spineless, revolting bother, you sanctimonious bastard — “

“Can you let me die?” Dazai snapped, more annoyed than dead.

His voice was rough with the spat water he was slobbering through — he was trembling head to foot, bandages unlooping down his limbs like melting snow. When he pushed himself out of his grip, he fell — breathing whistley, horrifying pants.

“Fuck you, ” Chuuya shouted, pushing him by the shoulders. The water only reached their waist; blinded by ire and the soaked strands stuck to his face, he watched him almost land on his ass. “Do this shit where I’m not — “

“Have you been having fun?” Dazai asked, with a tone so dead it didn’t fit the pure dare in the words. “Being pampered?”

Through the too deafening splashes of their push and pull, he demanded: “What?”

“You know,” He wrangled himself out of his grasp. It was a wonder how they never woke up touching, he mused, through struggles — what with that forced bed stealing. It was a wonder Chuuya had never opened his door to bleeding sheets. “Oh — how they hoped this victory-soirée would mend your bones. Everyone was just so concerned after Ueda got you — “

“What the hell are you talking — “

“You haven’t noticed, have you?”

Why are you trying to drown him, Chuuya thought, distantly, over his yanking and the water blooming around them, didn’t you just save him from — “Noticed what?”

“That they aren’t your Sheep.”

He stared, chest heaving.

Surging, hot flames crawled up his arms — they sharpened his nails, crooking his fingers into talons; he grasped Dazai’s shirt, yanking him close with white knuckles. “Watch your mouth.”

Dazai dangled like a doll, face close and eyes unfocused; hands roaming through the water as if longing to go back underneath. “They don’t need your protection,” he said, like it made sense — like the world could ever exist and not be fragile. Loseable. Protector and destroyer — all of the sake of having something. “And they certainly don’t need you to die for them. To be completely sincere with you — it’s much more probable they will be the ones to die for you.”

“That’s enough,” he swore, shaking water from his hair as he rattled him; feeling the drops land on his clenched jaw.

The cobbles underwater were slick; they slipped. The moon spun in the boy’s pupils, drunk. “I bet it pisses you off.”

“I don’t know what you’re trying to do,” Chuuya snapped. “And I really don’t fucking care. But cut it out. I’ve got no time for your shit.”

“Too busy waiting for your mind to make you crash your head against a wall?” Dazai said, dripping in fake understanding. His chattering teeth didn’t even break his words. “I heard that’s what that actress did. Just crashed and crashed and crashed — until her skull cracked on impact,” His lips curled up; he was covered in goosebumps, and drenched to the soul. “Not even I had considered that method. Sounds just senselessly painful.”

“Maybe that’s your problem, then,” Chuuya scorned. The water was over their waist — his legs were going numb. “Maybe you should give up on that painless quest of yours, and get splattered on the concrete once and for all.”

His whine sounded more dangerous than childish. Hauntingly, he had water drops stuck on his eyelashes. “I don’t think I would like that.”

“I don’t think I care.”

“Liar.”

“Liar?”

“Liar,” Dazai echoed. “The Division knew what would get to you. Brute strength wouldn’t have fazed you. It’s being the only one left that you couldn’t stand,” He tilted his head to the side — stood so still, not even ripples surrounded them. “But Chuuya needs someone he can give his life for at all times, does he not?”

He stared.

Oh, he realized. Utterly calm; so furious he could feel every inch of him shaking. The certainty of watching a scam come into life. The silence of a shut coffin.

“I’m not Akutagawa,” he spelled out. He let go of his shirt; watched him land several steps away, where the water was deeper — tickling his shoulders. “And I’m not going to shoot you on command.”

The boy stared up at him, quiet.

Water settled down slowly, erasing ripples and murmuring rushes. They heaved — only that sharp, exhausted sound of inhaling and exhaling filling the valley. Chuuya turned around and climbed towards the lake bank, fists tight — ears stuffed with the white noises of his heart; of his pants getting more and more drenched.

When he touched the grass, he paused.

“Fuck that,” he heard himself say. Then, a bit louder: “No, fuck that —“

Dazai didn’t look startled when he turned again — he watched Chuuya stumble through the beeline he was making for him; only the chaos of disturbed waters and the curses out of his mouth shattering the quiet. He stayed floating in that deeper current, and when Chuuya slipped and reached him, he asked: “What are you doing?”

“Killing myself,” Chuuya replied, wafting — only his head and his drenched hair out of the water. “This shit is so fucking cold — not so funny when I’m the one doing it, ah, Ueda?” he scolded the valley. “Not so —”

“This isn’t Ueda’s Ability,” Dazai informed him. “You want me dead. Remember? Did water get in your —”

The lake was too material under his hands for it to be; Dazai’s puffs of breath too warm on his face — but Chuuya didn’t know. He had touched his mother; he had sat next to Verlaine.

“I do,” he breathed out. His hands reached out — cupped his cheeks, clammy and cold, held so close he could watch his own frantic expression in his blown out pupils. “You absolute bastard. But you’d never die with me. So if you die now, I’ll have to assume this is Ueda’s work,” A half snort left his lips; relief and desperation. “So it’s fake. All of it is fucking fake, get it?”

Obnoxiously helpful, Dazai informed him: “You already knew that.”

“I did,” he panted. Insisted: “Did I?”

Dazai’s eyes roamed through his face. They landed on the water drops Chuuya could feel stuck to his lips — close as he was, that touch felt heavier than his nose’s one against his own.

“I lost it,” he admitted, very quietly.

If it was a hallucination, it didn’t matter — if it wasn’t, he’d kill Dazai anyway. At some point. Somehow. Looking him in the eyes. “What?”

“Get water out your ears. I lost it. ”

“Lost what, jackass?”

“The ring,” Dazai’s frown didn’t shake his hands off his face — his body reached out like a sunflower, fighting the embrace of water under his neck, pooling like melted flesh between Chuuya’s fingers. “It was so ugly. It deserved to witness many more beauties it could tearfully compare itself to.”

It was almost disbelievingly surreal. He felt drunk with it — aimless ire and goosebumps.

“I’ll steal you another,” Chuuya offered, a bit lost. His voice sounded a thousand miles away. The thing in his veins had to be contempt; it was the same shade of rotten autumn as Dazai’s irises, and it beat along with the pulsing blood in his jaw. “Even your moronic ass can’t lose all of them.”

The boy’s lips parted on an exhale that did not come out. They’d been soft upon the side of his mouth, at the Division’s ball, and his eyes were piercingly indulgent — calling him hopeless in all but words. “But I will.”

“You won’t.”

“Don’t be stubborn.”

“Don’t piss me off.”

“Chuuya,” he whispered, helpless, like a command, thumbs reaching up to rub his arms as if to rattle him, and Chuuya hated him, partner and all — he’d loathe him until he couldn’t, and it would be mercilessly human, at least. “My stupid Chuuya.”

His nails sank in his cheeks. Chuuya left his claws in all he’d hoarded — he forced his hands to unclench, and listened to nothing but the water.

“Don’t drown,” he insisted. He prayed he got to weed out whatever part of him had decided Dazai’s, of all, would be the grave not filled. Of course, Kouyou had said, of course she did. “I’ll kill you.”

---

...

---

Eleven days before he turned eighteen, they returned to the city.

After spending two days planning, he rode his motorcycle to the Headquarters — unable to shake off the feeling that an emergency had to have been waiting for them to come back.

“I believe things will partially slow down,” Mori reassured him, on the sidewalk of Building One. “Although — gaining that Ability Permit will cause us a bother or two.”

Chuuya smiled, tight and at blame. “That’s great to know, Boss.”

“It is, isn’t it?” the man hummed. “Before I forget — I have been reading over that potential project you asked me to consider.”

He perched up. “And?”

Mori had put on his coat and scarf the instant they had crossed the Headquarters doors — most men who had met his gaze had bowed deeper than Chuuya had gotten used to seeing. He wasn’t foolish enough not to believe most of it wasn’t fear — once his speech in the ballroom had been over, accommodations had been made for, hopefully, the last executions of the season.

Some of it — he supposed — had to be helplessness. Their bandaged, demonic flag had bowed. They had no choice but to do the same.

“It’s convincing,” Mori admitted, once he had decided his dramatic pause had lasted enough. “Kouyou certainly taught you to have a way with words. You know just how to make someone feel an absolute fool for not accepting your proposal.”

“I wasn’t trying to —“

“Don’t lie to me,” The Boss smiled. “It’s not an inconvenient quality to have. Strenuous to trust, perhaps — but loyalty can override those details,” He curled an eyebrow. “Founding the restoration of Suribachi City would undoubtedly be a dent on our vaults.”

He nodded. “I offered my money, sir.”

“Ah, but that would mean the astonishing amount of introits that will come from this hopeless quest would all land in your pockets,” Mori blinked. “I’m no Ace, but even I know not to waste a good hand of cards. Suribachi might just be an unlikely goldmine.”

“And the protesters mostly have no other support in the whole region,” he pointed out. “By the time they realize financing the slums might actually be convenient, we’ll already have gained monopolization over the project —“

“Yes, Chuuya,” the man agreed, amused. “I have read your proposal.”

His ears caught fire. He cleared his throat, clenching and unclenching his hands around the clutches of the bike. “Of course, Boss.”

Mori studied him. Elise was nowhere to be seen — he could never shake off the feeling that the man was never as menacing as he was when she wasn’t around. A weird stance to take — Elise was his Ability. A weird stance to take, dude, Shirase would have said. You could crush him like a can.

Chuuya paused.

A weird thought.

“Just tell me this,” Mori offered. “Before I invest a good quarter of our funds into these street protesters — how much of it is sentimentalism?”

He tapped on the leather of the clutches, scratching it. He thought of a shoebox hidden in his wardrobe — an old bracelet; a knife stained in blood.

It’s a smart move, he could have sworn. it was — it was all written in the report he had spent two sleepless nights typing. It will bring us more money and influence than you can imagine. No one is as grateful as the desperate.

Chuuya dropped his shoulders.

“I miss it,” he said. It — because it was all. He raised his head to meet the man’s eyes — found no other way to swear honesty than by challenging Mori to call him a liar. “And I don’t want it back. Not everyone is as lucky. ‘Kinda feels like I have to do something to atone for it.”

The doctor's lips parted.

Chuuya held his gaze.

A smile. "Alright, then."

He thought about those simple words for the entire ride he took to the Cemetery. At some point — using Tainted to skip too high through the cobblestoned road — he felt himself breathe.

A familiar silhouette, carrying a bouquet of yellow flowers, screeched him to a halt.

"Old man," Chuuya exclaimed, stuffing his hands in his pockets. "What are you doing here?"

"Paying a visit to some victims of mine," Hirotsu replied, utterly simply, waving a bouquet. He had a half finished cigarette in his mouth — he didn't even blink when Chuuya stole one from the pack in his pocket. "That's my lighter," he noted, as he watched him fish it out of his pants.

"Is it," Chuuya agreed, around a mouthful of smoke. It didn't really taste all that good — it never had. He couldn't stop anyway. "I've never seen you around. What brought this on?"

Hirotsu shrugged. He had a fresh scar on his temple — the clean raze of a bullet. "There are some who have fallen to my hands that did not quite deserve it," he offered. "Sometimes it feels like we haven't stopped filling Yokohama's graves a day, since the Dragon Head Conflict."

"And filling the ocean," Chuuya pointed out. "Our graves are empty."

The man sketched a smile. "That is true."

"Why do we do that, anyway? Is it really that whole spiel on, join the Mafia, never leave it?"

"It might as well be," Hirotsu replied, after a moment of thought. "It's what everyone believes. Are you here for your friends?"

Chuuya pulled on the loose threads inside his pockets. He nodded.

"You know, I can't remember if I ever told you —" the Commander mused, "But Doc once tried out for the Black Lizards."

He made a face. "Doc? Are you sure?"

"Positive."

"My Doc?"

"He reached the final trials, and decided the group wasn't for him," Hirotsu promised. "He told me he believed becoming a Lizard might just bring him to enough bodies to reach that goal of his,” A pause. “A very peculiar goal.”

“It was, wasn’t it,” Chuuya grinned, on his tiptoes. “He was out of his goddamn mind. Very entertaining. Less so when he had a syringe in his hands. One time, he chased Iceman through all of Yamashita Park, waving this big ass needle around, and —“

“They sound like fun people,” the man said. “I wish I could have known them more.”

“Yeah,” He shrugged. “Same here.”

They watched the crowd pass by, dried tears on their cheeks. The children they were pulling along were a tad too excited — unable to see past pretty statues and blooming flowers on the grass. When one of them tried to hang off the marble bust of a woman, he bit his lip so as not to laugh.

“They mostly kept to themselves, though — the Flags,” Hirotsu started again. “Apart from Pianoman.”

“Executive seats can’t be reached by self isolation,” he confirmed. “He was always a smooth talker. Turned you around like a plaything — I couldn’t even get mad when he told me he’d been playing spy on me for a good half year,” He clicked his tongue. “That, and also been risking the Boss’ ire just to give me some peace.”

Hirotsu huffed, amused. “Sounds like a good friend to have.”

His cheeks ached. “All of them were.”

Talking about them was clumsy on his tongue. Perhaps it was a muscle to train.

“I’m sorry,” the Commander said, just a bit awkwardly. “I didn’t mean to cause any sadness.”

“No, it’s —“ Chuuya cleared his throat. “They’re my friends. They don’t make me sad.”

It took him a moment to realize he meant it.

Hirotsu studied him.

He wondered how he visited graves — if he sat in silence, or told stories, or bought a different bouquet for each of the stones. There is much to be learned from how a man grieves, Verlaine’s diaries had said. I cannot say I know the feeling.

“How do they make you feel, then?”

Chuuya blinked.

Perhaps it was the intersection of thoughts — the unplanned assortment of Verlaine’s elegant handwriting and the innocent question matching the thoughts always lingering in his skull. You can’t just wash the dirt away, Hirotsu had once told him. It will suffocate you. It will blind you to the point of slowing you down.

“Ah,” Chuuya backed away. Determination settled like a rock in his throat — his heart raced. “Gramps, I think you might just be a genius.”

If he had had more time to observe him — he could have sworn he had seen red bloom on Hirotsu’s cheeks. “Am — Am I?”

“A fucking mastermind — “

“Sir, where — Chuuya? Where are you —“

“I’ll see you later, old man!” he shouted, — Tainted sizzling in the air as he jumped to the Cemetery entrance. “I might get executed for this, so do buy another bouquet for me!”

“What?”

---

...

---

Fumiko Enchi had been chained at the end of the deepest hallway of the dungeons.

She eyed his steps without surprise — the endless strands of her hair were one with the blood on her arms, like spider webs some street artist spray paint across to the wall. Her clothes were a mess — her face had lost enough weight to make her unrecognizable.

“Look who it is!” she exclaimed, her voice a frail shard of glass littered in glee. “My hair buddy. Still alive — I’m somewhat surprised.”

Chuuya would have recognized Kouyou’s handiwork anywhere — the slices on the chests; the attention always given to the face; the telltale chasms caused by her sandals. As thus, he waved the guards who had led him down there off.

“Vice-Executive —“ one of them tried.

“Her legs are broken,” he cut her off. “And Executive Kouyou knows better than to leave a caged man held back by chains only.”

Fumiko’s grin grew. She was missing a few teeth; a cut on her lower lip showed off the sliced off tip of her tongue. “She sure does. You won’t find me complaining. I love my women dirty.”

He curled an eyebrow. “You can go. I’ll take care of this.”

With one last bow, the guards disappeared. The chains were rattled only so — Fumiko blew a strand of hair off her forehead.

“So, then,” Despite the clear fractures, she attempted to wiggle her eyebrows — then laughed a bit harder when pain bloomed. “Before I ask you what you’re willing to offer me in the name of your negotiations — how are my Kobo and Mishima?”

“Begging to be granted a visit,” Chuuya crouched down. The ground was slippery with bodily fluids — he did not offer her the satisfaction of using Tainted. “So they can put a spear through your nose for putting their reputation at risk.”

She grinned. “Liar. Kobo goes around as a little rat just to steal food off children’s plates — that man wouldn’t know a good reputation if it fucked him.”

“How would you feel about seeing them again?”

“Very nicely. I miss them.”

“And about joining the Port Mafia?”

Fumiko spat on the ground. The bundle of blood and spit landed right on the edge of his left shoe. He hummed: “Joining an organization will make it easier to escape it than being locked in its dungeons.”

“It’s the Port Mafia,” The animosity in her eyes could have shattered ice; it was the brightest thing alive under the led lights of the dungeons. “Nobody leaves the Port Mafia.”

Chuuya clicked his tongue.

“I am, though, very curious on what might make one of its top dogs suggest it as a reward,” she attempted to lean forward, tauntingly — the chains around her wrists pulled arms until she couldn’t. “A reward for doing what, exactly?”

According to Kouyou, she had been one of the toughest victims up to date. While she had been happily spewing information about the Special Division, she refused to go into detail about their most pressing issue — the moles. She finds it entertaining, the woman had spat. That we would let ourselves get infiltrated. She’d smiled prettily. That fox-faced cunt.

“Most of the high floors believe you could still be a great addition to our lines,” Chuuya said. “My Boss included. He’s not one to express hope over something he doesn’t believe it’s already his.”

“He isn’t,” Fumiko echoed, amused. “And what about our Tanaki?”

He squinted. “What about her?”

“Is she mad about my betrayal?”

“Disappointed.”

She groaned. “That’s so much worse.”

“Fumiko, listen to me.”

Obnoxiously, she attempted to bring her hand to her forehead in a salute.

Chuuya watched, unimpressed. “You will do what I’m about to ask you,” he said. “You will give up on whatever Witness Protection fantasy the Division has deluded you into believing. You will accept my deal — you will be damn glad the Port Mafia is magnanimous enough to welcome back an attempted traitor —“

“Attempted? I think I did pretty great.”

He tapped two fingers on the ground — didn’t blink as the walls around them shook just so, raining Tainted dust over their heads. “Until I shattered your spine, you mean?”

Her smile weakened.

Whatever harsher stone resided behind that cheerfulness blinked between bloody eyelashes. “Why would I do any of that?”

Chuuya shrugged. “You don’t have to.”

“Don’t I?”

“No.”

“And what happens when I don’t?”

“I’ll drag Kobo and Mishima down here by the hole I’ll tear in their throats,” he explained, swiftly. “And once they manage to gather enough scar tissue to beg you to do as I say — I’ll rip their vocal cords out, and let you dangle here,” He tilted his head to show the darkness of the dungeons — haunted and heavy and suffocating, “With only those little memorabilia rotting at your feet, while you wonder what a god might do to two corpses he doesn’t need.”

Fumiko’s upper lip twitched.

The shift in her frame was imperceptible; despite the careless pose she maintained — every inch of it radiated a sourer kind of caution. “Men have been struck by lightning for crimes much less eternal than calling themselves gods.”

“Then said men should have been more careful about what they whispered behind my back,” Chuuya offered.

Her mouth breathed suffocating air in. “You’re overestimating my care for those fools.”

“I don’t have time for estimations,” he replied, blankly. “I have time to break your jaw into pieces and burn you alive, until you use your Ability whether you want it or not. But isn’t my first offer much more courteous? Tempting, even?”

She clenched her teeth.

“Or I could let Kobo and Mishima know what you think of my proposal,” Chuuya added. “Bet they would be relieved to have an excuse not to beg for your release any longer.”

“You and that partner of yours are certainly similar.”

He didn’t move.

She caught the irked shift in his gaze all the same — she huffed a pained chuckle. “He’s been down there too, you know? Whenever that beauty of your Executive starts to slow down. He sure hits like a motherfucker where you’re concerned.”

Chuuya dragged his tongue along his teeth, burying fury where it wouldn’t be used. “Where I’m concerned,” he echoed, his smile a mock. “You people’s continuous efforts to humanize him will never cease to amaze me.”

“And your own won’t?” she wondered.

“No,” He shrugged, settling on the ground. “I don’t search for what’s already there. That’s a thing people like you obsess over.”

Fumiko’s grin was spiteful.

“The Port Mafia will rejoice in having such a stubborn card back in its ranks,” Chuuya said.

“I’m not doing this.”

“You are.”

“Chuuya,” The abrupt, stark desperation in her tone couldn’t keep his gaze from snapping to her. “They haven’t done anything. I can’t do this.”

“You’ve been here a long time,” he said, eyes over her shoulder. “You know better than to ask for fairness. They want you back with us — they will get you back.”

“And you?” Fumiko’s swollen eyes ran up and down his face, intent. “What do you want?”

The words stumbled down his tongue before he could consider their shape — their tone; their rabid need. “I want you to let me talk to him again.”

She fell quiet.

Chuuya pushed: “You said you somewhat feel what’s going on in your visions. You must have — you know who I mean.”

“All of this,” she echoed. “All of this — for a dead man?”

“For the Port Mafia,” he corrected. “Always for the Port Mafia. For me, too.”

Something gathered around the shattered corners of her face. He hated the sight of it before he managed to place it — bitter, echoing pity. “I can’t bring anyone back to life, Chuuya.”

A deaf pounding slithered from his nape — all the way to the lowest corner of his skull. “I only need you to let me bury him.”

“Need,” she scoffed. “Need is the poison of the strong-willed, you child.”

“Sure,” Chuuya agreed. “And you need to keep Kobo and Mishima alive, don’t you? Because they’re your insurance with the Special Division.”

Abruptly, her face emptied out.

“And if something happens to them — if they are harmed, and can no longer prove to the Division that if you were to fail, they would still have two Ability Users to count on,” he continued, easily, “The Division will give up on attempting to get you out of our grasp. And you’ll die here — useless to every faction you had, and hated by the only two people you care for.” Chuuya tilted his head. “Curious how you’re trying to accuse me of cruelty, when you used your friends as bargaining chips for a freedom they won’t receive — and they don’t even know. I’m many things, you piece of shit — but I’m not, and I’ll never be a traitor.”

Fumiko stared at the floor.

Curling one eyebrow, he waited for a round of screams from a nearby corner to begin — then he asked: “What colors should I arrange for your welcome back party? Don’t worry. I don’t have a budget.”

Her torn shoes rubbed dried blood off the ground. Clenched around her chains, her fingers paled to a ghostly white.

He leaned back, and waited.

---

...

---

He looked into her eyes until her pupils spread; further and further and further; darker and wider. Some old thread — knotted and trapped through the crests of his brain — was yanked.

Chuuya fell.

A house in the countryside.

He'd never been there before. There was something familiar about it, though — the echo of rooms he would have found, had he explored the world behind the wooden porch. The sky was crowded by clouds, threatening to drown the field of flowers he was standing knee-deep in.

On the porch, dangling along to the wind on a carved hanging couch, was a child.

He walked up the two steps of the porch, and sat next to him. It rattled the couch — they waited for its rhythm to return gentle, listening to the creaking screws muffle the distant thunder.

“You’re not exactly who I meant,” Chuuya started, turning to observe the storm.

Small bones and freckled skin — the kid couldn’t be older than six. Blue veins peeked from his thin wrists, disappearing under the hems of a Hospital vest that was too big on him — it had to be pulled over his shoulder every few seconds. His eyes — set on the storm with wondrous curiosity — were both as blue as a clearer sky.

The weight in his throat was an immovable lump long before the child spoke. The texture of his voice clenched his fingers around nothing at all.

“I’m you,” the kid huffed. His tone tickled some forgotten corner — a cradle; sand between his toes. He sprawled on his side of the couch like he owned it. “‘S not like I asked to come here.”

“Mind the attitude.”

“Mind your ugly face.”

He snorted.

Chuuya knew him. It was surreal and there, as obvious as the clouds. He could have traced his bones with his eyes closed. “How was it before?”

The kid squinted.

“Before the men in the lab coats.”

“Oh,” the kid said. He kicked his legs as he mused; his feet didn’t even reach the wooden tiles. He was tall for his age, still — Chuuya bet he went around declaring it proudly, too. “Nice.”

He took the answer like a bullet.

“Warm,” the kid added.

Unsurprising, he mused. The dark liquid in the tank had been freezing.

It wasn’t meant to be you, he thought. Or it wasn’t meant to be me. Or it just wasn’t meant to be.

But it was, something whispered. It is. What are you going to do about it?

Chuuya slipped down the cushions until the wooden frame shook — he pressed his nape against the backrest, watching lightning break the sky in two. “I don’t know if you’re me,” he said. It escaped like a secret long kept — a possibility he had refused to voice. “I don’t know if I should apologize to you.”

The kid studied him from head to toe — absurdly judgemental.

“You’re alive,” He shrugged. “That’s good.” A pause; a kick of feet. Then: “Are you happy?”

Chuuya blinked. “Happy?”

“I’m a kid, you know,” he informed him, snotty. Chuuya could see him pick fights on the playground; it filled his chest with uncanny pride. “Are you happy?”

Hands in his pockets, Chuuya inhaled.

“I think I am,” he offered, quietly. That vest seemed like would have too large on him, too. He recalled what it had been like to have it ripped off — Shirase’s hand offering a green jacket; Yuan laughing at his jeans. He huffed. ““Don’t know if it’s in a way your Mom would approve of.”

His laughter was unbridled — a ugly noise, unrestrained and squeaky. “I don’t know. I don’t really remember her either.”

You’re not here, Chuuya mused. Was he even allowed to grieve the closest thing to himself his mind could conjure up? How could you?

“I can approve of it, if you want,” the kid offered. “If it’ll make you less sad.”

It took an infinity for his lips to part.

“That’s surprisingly nice.”

“I am nice,” he spat, offended. “I help the grannies with their groceries all the time.”

He ached. He begged: “I took your life.”

A shrug. “Maybe. Maybe not. You’ll never know who did what, will you?” The kid filled his cheeks; blew a raspberry, bored. He knew nothing of what he talked about; he would drown in a tank the moment his eyes opened again. “If you’re alive, why waste time thinking about it?”

Chuuya didn’t know how to explain.

There’s a house, somewhere, he could have said. There’s a house, somewhere, right by the sea, and I don’t remember a thing of it. There’s a kid with kinder eyes and no scars on his skin. There’s someone with no Singularities in his veins, and no friends bound to die for it. There’s someone who is as cursed as I am, and yet didn’t —

“Because I have to make up for it,” he said.

“It?”

Chuuya burned — cheeks red, like a guilty child. Shame, maybe — inevitability. “For the fact that it might be me and not you.”

The kid blinked again, very slowly. “Just make up for it some other way, idiot.”

He stared.

He tried to memorize the sight — the soft curve of his cheeks; the mole on his temple that was much more faded on his skin. His chipped tooth and defiant eyes; how small he had looked in a vest that was no protection against the cold. The future is warm too, he thought about saying. Who cares if you deserve it or not?

Something itched under his eyelids — wet and unwanted. Chuuya snorted, instead, ruffling the child’s hair. “I bet you were the most kickass kid in the entire town.”

His smile could have lit up Yokohama, and have some to spare. “I am!”

Chuuya tried to smile back. It was a strange feat — he stood straight like Kouyou had taught him, and he burned, he burned, he burned —

“I didn’t think you’d return.”

The Old World had always prided itself in peerlessly clean tables and an always present staff. It turned the layer of dust all over the counter and the silence embracing the walls into an ephemeral sight — an hallucination from the get to go. Bent over one of the pool tables, Verlaine twirled one of the sticks, and scored.

Chuuya did not breathe. He tore that place to shreds in the quiet of his mind.

“Me neither,” he offered.

The man glanced his way. “The floor is a bit wet,” he informed. “Be careful where you step.”

There was an awareness that hadn’t been there, on the porch — a materiality that had his fingers twitch. Verlaine looked heart-wrenchingly real. He had told him to fasten his seatbelt, just in case he ended up biting his tongue — he had kept Lippman’s corpse in that car.

Not one of the balls landed, when he struck — Chuuya made his way to the table, and asked himself how childish it would be to grin. If it made sense to believe in ghosts and haunted bars. If it was Fumiko’s Ability or his own body that kept him from yanking his brother’s spine out.

Verlaine fixed his braid. He leaned on the pool stuck in a painfully familiar way, stolen from the depths of his mind, and asked: “Are you mad at me?”

He stared. Laughter squeezed his lungs in a single, horrible sound — he choked it out once. There had been no senseless drowning and no body bleeding out in the sand, this time. Chuuya felt atrociously tired all the same. “I hate you.”

The man tilted his head.

Chuuya climbed on the table, legs crossed. He studied the backwards sign of the Old World, facing an eerily empty street, and added: “I was so sure I did, at least.”

Scientific curiosity tilted his head further. “Do you not despise me anymore?”

He squinted, helpless. “I don’t know.”

The bell on the door chimed. No one came in.

“I just know,” he continued, “That they’re already dead, and that you’re gone. And it always felt so fucking stupid to hang onto things that —” His naked heels touched the wood of pool table; he watched Corruption scars gleam under the oil light. “That just aren’t there anymore.”

Verlaine hummed.

His voice, he noted, had a rusty note — a golden thread dirtied in mood. Something meant for sweeter words, and wasted on revenge over a missing grudge. “So you despise yourself, instead?”

He scoffed. “The hell I do.”

“Well,” he insisted, reasonably. “You’re the only one left. True loneliness — as I told you your comet would experience without me. Who else are you meant to hate?”

“I’m not stupid —“

“But you blame yourself,” Verlaine was still studying him — his tone more politely confused than arrogant, as it had been. An accented attempt at understanding. “Do you not?”

Chuuya didn’t want to talk. Graves weren’t meant to answer — graves weren’t meant to point fingers. For a sharp, indescribable moment, he looked at the man’s lips, and almost expected him to start humming that tune Chuuya’s veins knew to sleep under.

He didn’t.

“There’s no one else to punish,” he spelled out, slowly — testing the words. “If I’m to blame, at least I know — I can’t make myself pay. But if it’s something else — if it’s you, who should have died more unfairly than you did —“ He shrugged, jaw aching. “What am I meant to do?”

Verlaine didn’t seem impressed.

Restlessness choked his voice. He stared at the floor, hard, like blood would appear — a body to save and a doctor too far gone. Somebody to scream at, that he hadn’t called there himself.

“You,” he said, brusque. “Did you dream?”

“I —“ He seemed perplexed. “I’m afraid I never concerned myself with the question.”

Chuuya chuckled, humorless. “Of course. You’re not even here right now. You’re not real.”

“I’m as real as every thought that haunts you, brother,” Verlaine pointed out. His hands were pale and slender; bloodless in a way that had him trembling with ire. “You know that as well. Or you wouldn’t have asked to talk to me.”

“Don’t make this into the shitty picnic it isn’t. I just wanted —“ He trailed off. Eventually, frowning, he added: “I think you understand.”

Genuine surprise colored his features. It made him look wrong, somehow — less statuary; more a man his age, with clothes so formal it was a bit silly. Chuuya wondered how old he had been when he had died. “I do?”

“It pisses me off endlessly,” he confirmed. “They keep swearing this isn’t on me at all. That I’m just like them. I wish it —“ Shrugging again, bones rattled and unsettled, he tried: “It’s not real. Human or not — it’s still not real. People know nothing of true loneliness. You told me that. It’s — you weren’t right,” he insisted. “But you weren’t all wrong either, I guess.”

Hazel eyes roamed through his face — the same attention Chuuya had offered his mirror in a vest. He couldn’t recall a moment Verlaine hadn’t looked at him with greed. The last he’d seen of him had been pure destruction.

How were you greedy back then, too?, he didn't ask. What could a dead man want?

"So you came here because you wanted to be told you're right?" Verlaine questioned.

He grinned. "Childish, isn't it?"

Sometimes he recalled the man's hand — scarred and welcoming. Chuuya's fingers had still spasmed from the electricity. They had walked side to side for less than seven minutes. Chuuya had felt like a child, even as his mind swarmed with plans of betrayal — hanging on; fearing getting lost.

Oddly vacant, Verlaine swore: "I really did want a better life for you, Chuuya."

"No."

The immediate response stunned him. "No?"

"Nah," Chuuya clicked his tongue, kicking forward. "You're just like me. You wanted someone who understood. That's why you went on and on about comets and I don't know what," His knuckles paled around the edge of the table. He seemed deeply displeased. "You're as childish as I am," he recited. "And look where it got you."

A flash of fury.

He grinned, again. Speaking with the familiarly detested was much easier. "I'm not going to be like you," he let him know.

"So what is it that you are going to be?" Verlaine commented, revolted. "A pathetic bundle of guilt and uncertainties? A fake who doesn't even know how to live his life without the lingering, abrasive terror that someone will point a finger at him and call him —"

Chuuya counted the tiles. "Don't."

"— inhuman?"

He'd read that word all over his diaries — the man had never referred to him as anything but. It was strange to hear it out loud. "That's not what I'm doing."

"It is."

Irritation gritted his teeth. "It isn't —"

"Then," Verlaine dared, uninterested, "Get your hands out your pockets."

Reclaim your life, Chuuya, he recalled him ordering. It belongs to you.

He stared.

He thought he had misheard, for a moment — until the man's eyes fell on his hidden fingers; studying them with the vicious revulsion he had seen him direct at Professor N's analytic smile.

"What?" he managed.

"It would do you good to get angry."

The table shook from his full body flinch. "Don't you use his words," he snapped, pointlessly — he was a piece of his mind, and Doc was too, and how dare he — "Don't you dare."

"I'm not sorry for what I did to them."

"I know you're not sorry," Disbelief had his lips trembling to curl up. "You're a piece of shit."

"I might be a — piece of shit," Verlaine echoed — in another life, a thousand years away, he could see himself snort at the way he said those words. A bloodless fault for a man who was meant to be his brother. "But I'm not a coward."

"I am no coward."

Verlaine stood.

He hated himself for the surge of rage to his fingers — the urge to stand and do something. He was done shooting corpses. He had never wanted to be a hypocrite.

"Despite it all, you are my brother," the man informed him. "That hat of yours is mine. We are one of a kind, and you carry my legacy with all the scars our power inflicts you. Human or not — you will never be like anyone but me."

Chuuya considered shredding him.

A mock was stuck on his tongue. Perhaps it was brotherly; perhaps it was lined in hatred. You don't know shit about me, he wanted to laugh. You don't know shit about what my hands can do.

It fell from his lips so abruptly it could have been a prayer — and Chuuya had never needed anyone's approval; needed no one's reassurance; no one's promise that if he just climbed through the debris a bit longer, his nails would dig him out of a devastation he had caused; and he'd see the sky — and Chuuya needed no one to tell him he was —

"What if I'm nothing but this?"

The man didn't hesitate: "Then you live with it."

Chuuya gasped for air. He wondered if he could touch him, in that form — if he would have dared.

“You are as cursed as I have always been,” Verlaine insisted — almost gentle, dripping blood all over his hands. “But you are much more of a fool. I had the good grace of not caring for anyone — not when deities last longer than existence.”

You’re not a god, Chuuya wanted to tell him. You’re as human as I —

“You cared about him,” he accused.

Verlaine wasn’t real — the earth shattering longing he saw in his eyes was something Chuuya had picked up himself — through lines Rimbaud would never read. “I did not know I did.”

It landed like a death sentence.

He sighed. “What the fuck would you have me do, then?”

“Be clever, Chuuya,” Verlaine snarled. He had never heard that tone from him — it parted his lips. “What are you even doing here?”

You’re not real. The desperation that thought brought choked him. You’re not real; you’d never ask me not to let myself be haunted.

It would do you good, Doc insisted.

“I’m not him,” Verlaine promised, easily — piece of his mind. “I’m not any of them. I’m just the man who killed them.”

When he blinked again, his hands were too tight around his brother’s throat — clenched; all of him trembling; the man’s braid splattered against the wall like pale blood. His eyes — still untouched by all the hunger Chuuya had put in every hit he had landed on him.

“Don’t talk about them,” he hissed, hands merciless. “You don’t get to. You never will.”

“What will you have me do?” he echoed.

Chuuya’s thumbs should have already shattered his windpipe by then. His nails traced his skin. No sweat and no pulse; a corpse he was rattling like a child toy.

“Sometimes I wish you weren’t dead.”

Every inch of Verlaine seemed to quieten down — hushed like a candle by the wind. Staring.

His chest was torn open. Chuuya had never dabbled in the art of overflowing, not without guilt — and yet he bled and he bled, and he could not stop bleeding — could not close the gates, not now that his shame had an excuse to look at him and snarl; not now that he had said it out loud.

Sorry, he thought. Five stolen graves and his hands and a lifetime of blame he would never pay off. Forgive me for it. Forgive me for it.

With a voice quieter than it had been, fresh from the Suribachi ruins — when he'd known, immediately, before any other feeling, how lonely all of it was, he said: "I wish you hadn't deserved to die."

Verlaine didn't move.

"I would sell you to the devil if it got me even just one of them back," he swore. He couldn't feel his hands anymore. "I would kill you again. I would drag you to their graves and make you apologize, even if it won't do shit, and I would force you to say it's your fault they're gone — not mine. I would tear it out of you and of me until I believe it."

"Chuuya."

"I wish you weren't dead," he vomited out, blood and bile. A secret he hadn't told the graves either — because they never answered. "I wish it all the time."

His hands fell to his sides.

He felt himself stumble back — a step, two. Verlaine stayed where he was — brought a hand to his neck, and looked at him; and Chuuya didn't know how real the longing in his eyes was. He was dead, and he would never know.

"I wish we could talk," he heard himself say, "I wish you could tell me if you feel like me. 'Wish I could see that — human or not, it just doesn't matter.'"

Over the door, the bell chimed.

Verlaine asked: "Do you want me to absolve you?"

If Chuuya kept his eyes low, there were corpses on the floor. There were always corpses on the floor.

"I don't want shit from you," he offered. Verlaine was freckled and silent — covered in dirt from a grave he didn't have. "I lost them. I'll lose you too."

---

...

---

Chuuya scrambled to his feet so quickly he bit his tongue to blood.

“Hey,” Fumiko protested, rattling the rusty chains along to every soul in the dungeons, shrieks and sobs and broken bones. “Hey —“

He walked away stumbling, mute.

He couldn't have stopped if begged to — he couldn't have had his eyes focus even if his skin began to fall; crowding at his ankles like a costume in bad taste, bleeding him out up the stone stairs. No one was chasing him — Chuuya couldn't see a thing; nothing past the air in his constricted lungs.

“Chuuya?” Hands on his arms, the familiar concern of another pair of eyes he had hurt.

“Sorry,” he head himself say, distractedly. The Entrance Hall was blinding; Tanaki's hand were everywhere. “Sorry, I —“

“Chuuya?” she called, even when he pushed past her, stumbling to the closest place that would be safe — Tainted hadn't worked against Verlaine, and he couldn't assume — he couldn't —

Only when the glass elevator doors closed in front of his eyes, did he realize where he was.

Chuuya could have laughed.

Fucking ironic, he gasped. You bastard.

It climbed and it climbed, overwhelmed by the too many buttons he had pressed while falling inside. The skyline was a thunder behind the glass walls — no black liquid to drown into, no vest and no matching blue eyes, and no —

His spine ached, and there was a corpse on the floor. It hit him — as inevitable as breathing; forgotten, nonetheless — that Albatross had died smiling.

One last one, Ueda had promised.

His bleeding gashes soaked his hair scarlet; the necklace Chuuya had torn off of him — like a grave robber and a pathetic widow and a mindless crow; all to have something with him at all times, a curse and a reminder — still held a glint.

There were always corpses on the floor.

Chuuya dragged his hands out his pockets.

Better to let it out, Pianoman had winked. And better to entrust it to only one person.

Sunlight hit the glass like a kaleidoscope. It painted squares of golden on Albatross' bloodied shirt — the eyes set to nowhere at all, cheek against the floor.

When he went down on his knees, the glass floor was freezing. He crawled until he could grasp the man's chest, nails getting caught in the wound — cupped his head, forcing his lifeless eyes to look at him, curling around his body like the flames of the Under Port — pressed his forehead against his until it hurt, and Chuuya wanted to cry, to bawl like a child, and he couldn't. His body wouldn't let him — his eyes were dry and his ribs were growing sharper, piercing what was left of his lungs.

He opened his lips. Sorry, he tried — and no sound came out of his lips. Sorry, sorry, I'm sorry, I'm so sorry. He couldn't cry and he couldn't speak — pathetically, utterly small, he curled up at Albatross' side like a wounded animal; cuddled his head on the horridly bleeding tear on his stomach. The disgusting wetness of bodily liquids got stuck to his hair, cradled by his cheek.

Chuuya watched floors chase each other behind the glass — huddled close, into a mere dot of something — and Albatross did not breathe.

It was the last time he saw him.

Chapter End Notes

fumiko: its a shame i got imprisoned and cant torment chuuya with his ghosts of past christmas anymore chuuya, a bit broken in the head: I Have Come.

HAPPY PRIDE MONTH TO ALL PRID-EMO-NTH AND ALL PRI-DEMON-TH et cetera. i hope you guys are having a wonderful time, and i hope you enjoyed this chapter. unfortunately, i do have to run immediately, so i can't do anything more than thank you profusely for all the continued love to this fic (we hit 100 kudos last week!! yay!!!!) and for all the comments <3 i hope you have a wonderful week, day, pride month, and everything!!

stay warm, and see you soon!

TO

Chapter Notes

[peeks from behind the wall] i mean i did say exams would slow down the posting process. very sorry though! i'm afraid my predictions will become true, and the one-chapter-a-week will have to become a reality. might post sporadically twice a week though! we will see. sorry for the issues 😊

see you at the end <33

See the end of the chapter for more notes

interlude.

---

Much to the chagrin of the new waistcoat Kouyou had gifted him for his birthday, Chuuya was captured ten minutes past the Exit Gates of the Heathrow Airport, London.

“Seriously,” he huffed. Bored, he slid down the backseats of some stolen cab — there had been a wall of them waiting by the private exit of the airport’s VIP section; clearly, the authorized drivers dealt with whatever syndicate had seized both him and the dozens of Mafia freight carriages they’d knocked out some innocent stewards for. “I don’t know how to tell you guys, but you won’t be able to sell that stuff. It’s Mori Corps licensed.”

I’d know, he didn’t add. They had me sign that shit paper by paper.

The woman in the passenger seat — some blondie who couldn’t be older than nineteen, in a blouse and several friendship bracelets — snorted. “Tons of people are willing to buy almost anything without asking questions, if you know where to look,” she informed him, with a posh accent.

He wasn’t particularly concerned about the cargo — there were built-in Ability systems that would automatically destroy whatever was inside it, should it end up in hands that the Port Mafia hadn’t planned for. The lost profits wouldn’t even be major — Chuuya had only been sent to verify if the last of thirty seven exchanges had been received by their Black Market contact.

The cadence of that saying tickled a corner of Chuuya's brain, though.

All of it was strangely familiar, to be fair — it was why had let himself be captured. He'd heard the sloppy approach of the criminals from the first step out of the private jet — had noted the too interested glares of the low-eyed steward, when she'd grabbed his suitcase. Most of all — the way they had ran for the cargo carriers, the structure of the attack, the timing —

Sighing — deeper than the bruise his chest had received, by allowing one of the goons to land one on him, approved of — Chuuya knocked his temple against the window, sullen to the bone.

"Fine," he said. "Where are we going?"

"To our Boss."

"Great. They got food, or something? It was a long flight," He stretched, studying grey skies and lingering raindrops frame London roofs and hurried passersby. The afternoon was infinitely colder than it had been in Yokohama; given that it was meant to be night, Chuuya got himself rocked by the gentle tip tap of the rain and the hum of the windscreen wipers. "Though — I'm not very impressed by what I've heard of British cuisine."

His stretching stiffened Blondie's shoulders — without a blink from the driver, she reached for the gun she'd thrown on the dashboard, turning between the front seats to point it to his forehead.

"Enough with the humor," she warned. "In case you haven't noticed — we got you. I don't want to hear you babbling."

Chuuya stared down the barrel of the gun, before lowering his eyes to his evidently restrained hands. "Just trying to pass the time."

"Not here for tea and biscuits."

"Dang!" he called. "First stereotype of the week. Or second, if you count this shit weather."

The woman unclipped the safety.

It was a quiet journey after that.

They probably made for a strange sight — their cab was surrounded by a four-sides barrier of identically dark cars, speeding down the highway to reach the city. Perhaps onlookers assumed him to be some sort of celebrity, or one of those noisy guest politicians Chuuya had watched the Armed Detective Agency escort on television. Blondie was of little use to figuring out their exact goal; when he squinted into the windows of the nearby cabs, he discovered nothing but the surprisingly young age of most of the criminals.

Eventually, bored and tired, he slept.

He was woken up by his door being pulled open, framing the disbelieving, vaguely disgruntled frame of arm-crossed Blondie.

“Are you stupid?” she questioned, though it sounded more like an order.

“Jet-lagged, actually,” Chuuya grunted, as he picked himself off the concrete. “You try it, and then we’ll see how coy you act.”

Blondie’s hands flexed at her side, as if very tempted to strangle him. She wasn’t fast enough — a group of her armed comrades appeared from the other cabs, blindfolding him and dragging him down the rain-slippery street they’d parked next to.

“This is good shit,” a second voice insisted, pawing at his wristwatch, and the silver buckle of his choker. ““You sure we can’t take it?”

“You heard Boss,” another boy replied. “He wants to deal with him himself.”

“God,” the first one shivered — genuine, tight horror across his vowels. “I wouldn’t want to be him. Bloody fool’s off his rocker when he sets his eyes on someone.”

Chuuya curled an eyebrow.

They walked for a long time — up stone steps that soon morphed into the unmistakable metallic clank! of emergency stairs. Chuuya hadn’t caught much of the neighborhood before being blindfolded — north-eastern area, possibly; he had never been to London, but Kouyou had described the more famous Black Market location in length. It was a much poorer area than even the ones she’d talked about, though — the scrap yard-mimicking public housing, the smell, and the road under his feet was too-well reminiscent of the slums.

Before they threw him inside a room that lacked any windows, given the utter quiet, Chuuya heard the unmistakable ring of children’s laughter.

“You wait here, Red,” Blondie warned, as her comrades secured him onto a wooden chair. “You’re in luck — Boss’ already been away for four days, this time around. With some luck, you might even not starve before he comes back.”

Chuuya tested the handcuffs. “Can’t wait,” he offered, unenthusiastic. “God bless the Queen.”

With a scoff — one that echoed enough to let him get an idea of just how wide the room was; as such, he came to the conclusion that they had locked him in the middle of a mostly emptied out warehouse — they shut the door in his face.

Given that his curiosity lingered — and that Chuuya had a knack for being proved right — he had no choice but to keep quiet and wait.

Tainted informed him that there were guards stationed outside the warehouse at all times — in seemingly casual turns, though, at least two of them would come in and guard the doors from the inside. For the first six hours, they left him alone. He amused himself by counting the time along to the rain falling from a hole in the ceiling; at some horrifying point — as he found himself mumbling along to Dazai's Ninety Nine Hangman's Knots — he decided to try to pretend defiance.

“Oi!” One of the boys warned, slamming his rifle against the calf Chuuya had been trying to free from the chair's leg rope. “Don't try anything funny, dickhead. We're not playing.”

“And whatever we do to you,” a girl echoed, leaning close enough for him to feel her breath on his face, “Our Boss will make you wish for it.”

“Sounds like a scary guy,” he offered.

The boy laughed — a helpful parameter to figure out just how tall the roof was; and enough of a bell to tell Chuuya he'd have to break through a particularly weak beam on the left of it to escape, once he blew that place down like a house of cards. “The most terrifying motherfucker in all of the London underground. ‘Think you've met arseholes in your miserable existence? They've got nothing on him.’”

“He once destroyed an entire organization all by himself, in his motherland,” the girl agreed, voice soaked with pride. “Can you imagine that? One fifteen year old against the Mafia?”

Chuuya pushed his tongue against his cheek. “That all?”

“That all?”

“He defeated an assassin not even Europol had managed to catch!”

“A French spy. Do you get that? He defeated a French spy! The bloody Queen should have given him a medal, and yet he squats in the mud with us little wankers — “

“They used to call the dickhead the King of Assassins — “

“He defeated him all on his own! He even saved the life of a secret agent from Europol!”

“You don't say,” Chuuya echoed, vacantly.

“He abandoned his own organization — the biggest in Japan, mind you — just to come to London and teach us how to survive, no matter how his men begged him to stay —“

“I heard he was experimented on, when he was a brat —“

“You don’t say.”

“And he’s got no Ability or anything!”

“— some say he even went up against the infamous Demon Prodigy! You know, the one from Yokohama?” The boy sighed. His spine was almost audible when it straightened. “Streets say to this day, that twit fears the possibility of hearing Boss’ name. He paid him millions just to convince him to stay in London!”

Chuuya could feel a headache coming.

“I think I have heard of your Boss,” he said, eventually.

“See?”

“Of course you did!”

“Did he have a hand in ending the Dragon Head Conflict, perchance?”

The guards gasped. “You do know of him!”

“He was merciful enough to concede the victory to a local organization,” the girl huffed. “A good lad, truly. We’ve got enough money, guys — we shouldn’t take it from those who need it more.”

Their tales were never ending. Only some of them, particularly from the Boss’ backstory, were irrevocably familiar — carved into Chuuya’s skin in scars and creaky joints. But the stories of what the leader had done after arriving in London diverged from anything he’d ever heard about, and they carried more realism on their vowels. Talks of arriving to the city with nothing but a plan and a name; establishing channels of hiring offers for all the abandoned children in the slums of London.

All of the guards he tricked into divulging stories sounded just as starry-eyes as the ones before them. Clearly, their King — as most of them eventually slipped into calling him, once they forgot Chuuya was technically a prisoner — had them wrapped around his finger.

“He’s the only reason why me and my sister are still alive,” one of the younger girls told him, by the second day. “He found us wandering under a bridge, starving and alone — if it hadn’t been for him, we would have just let ourselves flow along to the Thames until we drowned.”

“The adults are all scared of him,” one of the boys declared. Chuuya had tricked him into bringing him some sticky bread — after Chuuya had loudly sighed about how, bad mannered this King of theirs seemed to be. “Nobody fucks with us.”

“We’re family,” the youngest of the ones he’d met swore. “Buchi’s going to make sure we’re family forever.”

Her voice echoed somewhere by his knees — he’d heard the other guard of her pair take the gun off her hands, reassuring that she was helping just as much by sitting on his shoulders.

Chuuya listened to their low convos about dinner time, and muffled a smile they'd take as mocking.

Two and a half days in, the constant void of black and scratchy fabric obscuring his eyes got on his nerves.

“— and a moron,” Chuuya said, calmly, over the sound of the fuming subordinates. “He’s a lazy ass as well. And there’s no way he’s actually done everything you guys swear he did — and I bet he snores really, really loud —“

“Boss doesn’t snores —“

“He’s not a moron!”

Chuuya insisted: “I bet he sleeps with a sheep plush toy.”

The kids gasped — began, very unsubtly, to question possible bugs across their territory.

With some more inciting, he got them to very clumsily attempt to waterboard him. It did nothing but get water in his ears and remind him of Agent Minami’s talent — but, thankfully, it also sucked away the black color from the fabric of his blindfold. Chuuya assumed they’d scarcely tinged it black to give it a more dangerous aura.

Through the thin, ruined layers of the fold, he vaguely caught the outline of the symbol on the back of the guards’ Kevlar jackets: a sharp-lined — much less stylized than Chuuya remembered — sheep skull.

Something seized his veins.

Eventually, three days in captivity — one of the guards let it slip that, their glorious King was back from his business, so enjoy breathing as long as you have the ability to!, and Chuuya could do nothing but stretch the muscles in his neck.

He waited.

---

...

---

In a show of horrible, nightmarish timing — the police broke in that same evening.

Through the absolute chaos of the young criminals running around the warehouse, looking for weapons and gathering whatever belongings they had abandoned near their guarding spots — Chuuya finally allowed Tainted to bend the metal of his handcuffs and explode the ropes around his body, relaxing on the chair with a groan.

“Get the kids!” a Brown kid screamed, as he pointed his rifle to the holes on the ceiling. “Plan Rogue Sheep Gone Rock! Get to the safehouse!”

From those tears on the roof, Chuuya saw hell on earth, blurred by what was left of the blindfold he couldn’t bother to remove — an astonishing number of police cars surrounded the warehouse, shouldered by black vans he had learned to recognize as Secret Services vehicles. The red and blue lights had painted the world so viciously, it was impossible to recognize any color but that. Over the blaring shriek of the sirens, it was utterly clear that there wasn’t a single way out.

When he tilted his head, the sky was filled to the edge of the clouds in helicopters — blinding lights from that army drawing target circles on the floor of the warehouse.

Carved across the side of the closest of the emergency helicopters was: Europole.

“Oh,” Chuuya’s eyes widened, right as one of the running kids almost crashed onto him in his haste to leave. “Oh, there’s no way —”

“Chuuya?” From behind one of the doors of the interior balcony encircling the warehouse, a familiar voice came shrilling — panic lining every letter, turning his tone into something as high pitched as it had been when he was a brat. “The one you captured is Nakahara fucking Chuuya?”

In an unwise survey of his situation — he froze in place, still halfway on his chair.

The well known gasps of the guards joined the chaos across the balcony, as a blurred crowd of Kevlar vests and teenage clothes crouched to hide from the helicopter’s lights. Heavy shoulders hit the enormous doors of the warehouse, attempting to break in from a wider crack than the ones in the walls; one of the girls stuttered: “You — You mean the Gravity Manipulator? That’s who he is?”

“He didn’t even use gravity!”

“He stole my lunch!”

“He said you snore, which is a lie —”

“How did he know about the sheep toy —”

“For bloody sake, guys,” the King insisted, in an accent that didn’t fit him at all, “I told you — I needed a few days to get her from the airport and show her around, and you capture the Mafia’s —”

“You told us to capture any and all mafiosi we ever came across!” a boy accused.

“You said you’d beat them until they bled, no problem!” another encouraged, clearly trusting. “Remind them why their arses had to go back to Yokohama with their tail between their legs!”

“I said that,” the Boss echoed weakly. The tips of his fingers twitched — Chuuya wasn’t sure if he wanted to laugh or cry. “I mean — yes, of course I — but Chuuya, guys, he’s a bit of —“

“You can break him in a half!”

“Make him eat dirt!”

“Crush him into pieces like you crushed the King of Assassins!”

A metallic thud! — as if someone had hit his head on the railing. “You, ah — you didn’t tell him about that. Did you? You didn’t —“

From the sky, an unyielding wave of bullets rumbled louder than thunder, as fire opened from the helicopters. The world seemed to shake; as the air got painted white by the ricochet, the screams, and the inquisitorial lights — a voice, louder than the end of the world, roamed through the sky from the copters’ speakers, commanding: “UNHAND MASTER CHUUYA RIGHT THIS MOMENT, YOU UNDERAGE FELONIOUS FIENDS!”

In an unrestrained resignation, Chuuya let his disbelieving body slump back into the wooden chair, temples between his fingers.

“PROTOCOL 77B81 IS IN PLACE,” the voice continued, startling the young criminals into a hurried escape down the emergency stairs. “THIS IS UNIT 67, UNDER THE COMMAND OF ADAM FRANKNESTAIN, AUTONOMOUS HUMANOID SUPERCOMPUTER FROM THE EUROPEAN DETECTIVE POLICE ORGANIZATION. IF YOU REFUSE TO SURRENDER, WE WILL OPEN FIRE, AND YOU WILL BE MERCIFULLY SLAUGHTERED. IF YOU REFUSE TO HAND NAKAHARA CHUUYA OVER WE WILL OPEN FIRE AND YOU WILL BE MERCILESSLY SLAUGHTERED. IF YOU LITTER ON THE STREETS, WE WILL OPEN FIRE AND YOU WILL BE MERCILESSLY SLAUGHTERED.”

A screeching pause. Chuuya blinked.

“...FORGET ABOUT THE LAST PART. SITUATIONAL PROTOCOL: REBOOTING,” Another screech; a sound not unlike that of a page reloading on screen. Then, in the same exact tone as before: “UNHAND MASTER CHUUYA YOU FELONIOUS —“

“Adam!” Chuuya snapped, as he frantically waved his arms towards the nearest opening on the ceiling. He foregone all his propriety — jumping wildly, he cupped his mouth and shouted: “Hey! You human shaped tin! I’m here! It’s fine! Let the fuckers go!”

“MASTER CHUUYA?”

Frantically, he almost unscrewed his head from his neck to nod.

A pause.

“DO KEEP UNHANDING MASTER CHUUYA,” the android ordered. “IF YOU STOP, WE WILL OPEN FIRE AND YOU WILL BE MERCILESSLY SLAUGHTERED.”

“We aren’t even handing him,” one of the younger kids protested, bawling.

Anchored wires shoot out of some unclear point in the sky — they hooked themselves on part of the balcony railing, landing a silhouette in a blue business suit mere steps from Chuuya’s seat. The scratchy remains of his blindfold — and Chuuya’s bent, exasperated position — muffled most of the man’s face from sight. His shoes were shiny; and all ten of his fingertips were unscrewed, showing off little needles of sedative where the last digit should have been.

“YOU HAVE UNHANDED MASTER CHUUYA,” Adam started, his back offered to him, scolding the remains of the syndicate who hadn’t been fast enough to escape.

Startled by his own volume, the android paused — tapped two fingers on a spot on his neck. Clearing his voice, he added: “That is a wise choice. Which certainly surprises me — human behavior is, after all, rather irrational.”

“You can’t keep saying that whenever you don’t get something,” Chuuya sighed.

“I am a detective, property of Europol,” he continued, undeterred, only barely louder than the roar of sirens, helicopter motors, and nearby cars. “My model number is 98F7819-5. My partner and I were created by Ability User engineer Dr. Wollstonecraft. Code name is Adam Frankenstein. I was alerted by the airport security that Master Chuuya had crossed our borders, and had been detained immediately after. For this crime, and for the other seven thousand and fifty three illegal acts connected to your name — which I discovered with a quick survey of the documents locked in the third drawer of that work desk right there,” Adam pointed a finger towards a destroyed bundle of metal on his right. “You are all under arrest.”

“What?” the children chorused.

“Adam,” Chuuya insisted. He reached to grab the hem of the android’s jacket, pulling. “It’s fine. Seriously,” He blinked. “Wait, you got alerted when I was at the airport? Why the hell didn’t you just come get me there?”

“Master Chuuya will forgive me,” Adam replied, still in mission mode, “He will certainly remember my hatred of airport metal detectors.”

He dropped his head even lower. “Man.”

“You will immediately comply with our orders,” the detective insisted, in a tone that was eerily vacant. “You will be escorted outside by one of our agents, and led to the nearest police station. There, should any of you refuse to collaborate to the search for your comrades, proper measures will be taken to assure —“

“Adam,” he insisted. “It’s Shirase’s group.”

A beat passed. From the bundle of people half hidden by the emergency stairs' railing, one of the taller frames winced so viciously he almost fell.

"Nonetheless," the android insisted. "Any attempt to show favoritism contradicts with the external data gathered for my mission. Given the circumstances, Shirase Buichiro will have to come forward and face responsibility for his crimes."

The absent tone of his voice was deeply unfamiliar — closer to how he had sounded that first day at the Old World, emptily demanding the Flags brought him to his mission target. Chuuya flinched, speechless, beginning to stand.

Over the man's frame, the youngest of the kids stared at them with eyes full of tears. He tried: "Adam, don't you —"

The android turned so quickly Chuuya fell back into his chair by pure startlement.

"I have recently been watching a great deal of ruthless spy movies. Humans truly are masters at being soulless, when they want to obtain what they want," Adam whispered, so low he wouldn't have heard him if his nose hadn't been plastered against his own. If the man cared about the lack of personal space, he didn't show it — with a wink, he questioned: "Let me put it into practice."

Chuuya's jaw fell.

The detective turned once again, rumbling: "Shirase Buichiro, you will go outside, and wait for me to bring you to the station."

A vaguely terrified squeak came from the huddled group — accent coming through from the sun-rained roofs of Suribachi City. "The — the hell I will, you talking tin can! You'll get out of our property, or we'll fuck you up!"

The children cheered.

Chuuya gritted his teeth. "Shirase, go outside."

"I said, the hell I —"

"Shirase!" he snapped, attempting to meet his eyes through the blinding lights and the half shadows. He used his more meaningful tone, and spelled out: "Run outside. Right now."

Another pause.

"Oh," Shirase said, slowly. "Oo-ooh."

"Yeah."

"Uh — we'll go," Hissing, he ushered the kids on their feet, bodily pushing them towards the back exit by the emergency stairs. "Going! We will wait outside. Won't book it to the safehouse or — or anything. Going."

Satisfied, Adam pressed two fingers on his neck and, waiting for the group to disappear from view, he screamed: “THE FELONIOUS FIENDS HAVE SURRENDERED. AS PER PROTOCOL, THEY WILL NOW BE MERCILESSLY SLAUGHTERED,” The kids let out a whine on their way out. “ALL MEMBERS OF THE UNIT ARE FREE TO RETURN TO THE STATION. I WILL TAKE CARE OF THE NEXT STEPS MYSELF.”

In an anticlimactic, shuddering easy way, all the helicopters and all the cars turned around — and left so unbelievably fast, dinner break had to have started sooner.

Abruptly, the neighborhood was quiet.

Adam sighed, scratching the side of his head. Chuuya ripped his blindfold off from where it was hanging over his nose.

“That was certainly an experience,” the android commented, as he turned around — just as emotionless as usual, but with that something in his tone that made Chuuya ache with memories. “A rather loud one, too. I will have to check my system for damages to the internal microphone structure. But, as I have always said — everything is an experience, and experience is — oh!”

Adam’s flesh was synthetic, and his clothes had nothing metallic about them. When Chuuya flung himself off the seat and wrapped his arms around his chest — apart from a humbling sense of shortness — he felt nothing but soft, human warmth.

“Oh,” Adam repeated, politely. “My system is sensing an expulsion of lacrimal fluid from your glands. Mixed with quickened heart rate and the undeniable tension in your lower muscles, should I assume Master Chuuya is cr—”

“Shuddup,” Chuuya muttered, cheeks red from the childish urge to stick as close as possible. His face didn’t even reach the man’s clavicles — shaking more than he would ever admit, he pressed burning eyes onto his tie until he couldn’t inhale, laughing between wet words. “What’s with Master Chuuya, anyway? Didn’t you override your old authority command? Dr. Wollstonecraft —”

Adam shook his head.

“Master Chuuya is Master Chuuya,” the android said, resolutely. “No manmade command can override something like that.”

Despite his clenched grip on the back of his jacket — and how awkward it was, in the middle of that mess of ruins — Chuuya felt the mortifying, relentless urge to sob like a child.

“I get it,” Adam added, suddenly. “This is an example of what happens in those spy movies — when the traitorous antagonist embraces his ally only to stab him in the back while he abandons himself to the faith of friendship.”

He chuckled. “Just like that, man.”

“Alright,” With intense determination, the man wrapped his arms around Chuuya, patting his back as if on a mission. “You know — you are a few years older. Should you not have grown?”

He stiffened. “Don’t push it.”

“I do not quite know what that means,” the android hummed. “I will shut up, though.”

The cadence of his tone scratched an itch he hadn’t even realized he carried. He smelled of something akin to car oil and ink, and whatever had been built in place of a human heart beat with a steady, content hum. Chuuya recalled stumbling through a forest, looking for a disconnected arm he could have sworn was all he had left of a robot who had turned human enough to die for him — and not finding a thing.

Something sharp tickled his back.

Chuuya jumped ten feet. “Don’t stab me in the back!”

“I wasn’t going to!” Adam laughed, waving the finger he had turned into a kitchen knife. “It was an updated android joke.”

Breathless, he laughed again. He felt high with it — he felt years younger and times lighter, closer to a sound the Flags’ had heard than he had been in endless eons. Adam’s face hadn’t changed a bit — he wasn’t subjected to wrinkles or aging, and the programmed friendliness in his eyes was a tad more sincere than it had been at the start.

“You know,” Chuuya replied. “I think it’s more of a human joke. You’re getting better.”

“Am I?” If androids could preen, that was what he did. Turning a tad more serious, though, he nodded towards the emergency exit. “My GPS tells me Shirase and the Stray Sheep are halfway to their safehouse. Should we hurry, we would have an 83% chance of catching up.”

Chuuya munched on his lips. “Will they be tailed?”

The detective tilted his head, eyes blurring with interior research. He shook his head. “They will get to the safehouse safely.”

“Then let them go,” He shrugged, a tad too casual. He still remembered the first words out of Shirase’s mouth — get Yuan from the airport and show her around. Chuuya could hardly believe the coincidence of having landed there during her first visit to the other boy, but he wouldn’t mess it up. “Yuan’s with him, and they have to regroup and figure out what to do about — it’s better not to. ‘Doubt they’ll want me there.’”

He hadn’t even seen Shirase’s face, anyway. He recalled Yuan’s too well.

He recalled his own funerary conclusion — maybe they could never be in the same room again. For the first time, Adam’s placid expression turned into a frown. “The data gathered from my external memory contradict that statement.”

“Well, I’m Master Chuuya here,” he said, crossing his arms — only somewhat dying from the awkwardness of it. “And I say — let them go.”

Indecisiveness battled on the android’s face. He waited with held breath, trying to figure out if he would pick his Follow Your Heart procedure and simply grab him like a suitcase to play catch up — but, eventually, all he did was nod.

“Alright, then. In that case,” Adam offered him a grin that was all human. “Would you like to meet my partner?”

---

...

---

The apartment Europole had assigned to its supercomputers seemed somewhat useless, until the android explained that they were meant to pose as a normal pair of humans to the rest of the upper class apartment complex.

As they walked through the hallways of that sleek, expensive place, Adam pointed at the doors and offered: “These are all individuals who have been questioning Europole’s android project very vehemently. Dr. Wollstonecraft has devised a strategy to have them interact with us as normal neighbors for a few months — and then ask them to point out who, amongst all the tenants, is the secret android she planted in the structure.”

Chuuya whistled. “That’s clever.”

“My creator is cunning beyond her years. In every sense,” Adam agreed. “Oh, here we are.”

The luxury apartment was nondescriptively spotless — a perfect mirror to the penthouse he had yet to furnish with something that hadn’t come from Kouyou’s insistence, Hirotsu’s gifts, or the stuff that was sold with it. The counters and the drawers were a modern shade of black, framed by floor-to-ceiling windows and paintings that felt a tad too prestigious to stand by a coffee machine.

Over a leather couch and a counter filled with food, a Black woman was singing along to some old British band he’d heard Gin hum along to — only, vertiginously enough, the sound coming out of her mouth was the singer’s voice itself; as if her throat were a radio of sorts.

“Eve!” Adam greeted, grasping his wrist to drag him to the kitchen. “Look! Master Chuuya! I told you the French authorities wouldn’t get him!”

“Golly good,” Eve replied, with the tone of someone who’d learned the expression recently, and couldn’t quite figure out the right moment to drop it. “I feared you might risk self detonation in an attempt to save him from the Versailles’ prisons, should that not have been the case. The Irritation & Aggravation program Master Wollstonecraft installed in me might have not sustained the hit.”

“I understand your concern,” Adam said.

“Irritation & Aggravation?” Chuuya asked, as the man forced him on one of the stools behind the counter. “Why is that a program?”

“Master Wollstonecraft believed it rather unsuitable — to build a woman who would not be allowed to experience such emotions towards a man she had to interact with daily,” the android was quick to explain, absolutely deadpan. “Despite the fact that I am, according to all standards — a perfect man.”

“That you are,” Eve agreed. She frowned. “Is that helicopter oil I smell on you?”

Androids shouldn’t have been able to sweat — Adam’s smile turned somewhat contrite, still.

“Did you deploy the helicopters?”

“I needed to make an entrance.”

“Dramatics,” Eve insisted, “Are human.”

“Master Chuuya taught me humanity,” the android insisted, proudly. “Which is why we made you dinner, Master Chuuya. Humanity deserves a good number of mashed potatoes.”

Nodding, his partner set a plate of mashed potatoes in front of him.

The androids stared at him, waiting.

Chuuya dipped his fork in, gulping down a good quantity of mashed potatoes. They watched him munch it with the attention of a predator — when he gulped, exaggeratingly appreciative, they nodded again. After that, side by side, they began to cut more potatoes.

“There’s no need to —“ he attempted.

“Humans like potatoes,” Eve insisted. “And you are my dear, gum-eating Adam’s human. You will get many potatoes.”

She was extraordinarily beautiful — just like Adam’s, her skin bounced off the lights of the kitchen with no wrinkles and no pimpled textures. Her thin, onyx curls framed her head like a halo, only held back by a bright yellow silk band. She wore a tailored tailleur of the same shade; behind thick cat-eyes glasses she had to be wearing purely for style — though Chuuya wasn’t sure of where an android would get a taste for it — her eyes were clever and enhancing.

She spoke in the same vacant, mechanical tone as Adam — but there was a cunningness to it that the male android lacked. It took Chuuya only an hour — watching them go over reports between the potatoes — to figure out that she probably kept Adam on his cables-built toes daily.

“I have heard countless stories about you,” she informed him, once she’d warmed up enough to offer him a smile and a scarily close rendition of Hirose Fumiko’s latest single.

“Only good things, I hope,” Chuuya joked, directing a warning gaze to the other android.

“Adam’s inevitably objective reports about you depict you as a wonderful young man,” Eve replied — so easily it was flustering. “He speaks of you as a boy worth dying for. I cannot say I fully understand, but I do believe his analysis.”

“You have to,” Adam insisted. “You know I cannot lie.”

“You lied to me just fine,” Chuuya replied.

“No, I didn’t.”

He curled an eyebrow. “Sacrificing yourself against Verlaine reminds you of something?”

“That was no lie,” the android rebutted. “I told you all the facts. It is not on me that you did not consider my self destruction as the most viable option to stop Paul Verlaine. Humans are so —“

“Irrational?”

He lit up. “Exactly!”

They exchanged stories until the moon was high behind the curtain of rain. Yokohama caused Adam no nostalgia, but Eve seemed curious about the tribulations of the Dragon Head Conflict — which she had had to write a prediction report on.

“He wanted me to bet on you,” she added, tapping Adam’s shoulders with an awkwardness that told him she had learned it purely for their tenants’ fooling. “He was rather insistent about it. I carried him to Master Wollstonecraft to check on his objectiveness parameters — that is how dire it was.”

“I was right, in the end,” Adam replied. A bit slower: “Not that we would ever rejoice in it. In fact, all my calculations assure me we should arrest you right this moment.”

Eve tilted her head to the side, considering.

Chewing his potatoes, Chuuya questioned: “Do I have to fear waking up in the underground secret quarters at Buckingham Palace, or —?”

“Don’t be silly,” Adam said, calmly. “That is not where the secret quarters are located.”

The androids had slowly begun making a name for themselves, ever since their Creator had officially declared Eve fit to work. Chuuya had half worried about the leak of information they seemed so careless with, but it ended up not mattering — their stories were borderline too hysterical to really appear believable at all.

“You’re telling me the Spanish royal family is training crocodiles to invade Italian shores?”

“No,” Eve corrected him. “We are telling you they have an Ability User who can control the crocodiles. That is who they are training.”

“Unfortunately, he is only seven years old,” the other android added. “That gives us a rather wide window of time to figure out a way to have the Italian Government believe us on the matter.”

“They keep sending our letters back with demands not to shame their honor.”

“I’ve been to Italy,” Chuuya offered. “Can’t say I was expecting any crocodiles on shore.”

“Yes,” Adam agreed, pained. “That is why they will not see the seven year old boy coming.”

Sometimes after midnight, Eve announced she would retire for the night. He didn’t outright question her need to sleep, but nonetheless, she let him know androids could choose to recharge in a room they had disguised as a bedroom — just to be sure their vitals would fit with functions humans needed to display.

“My heart,” she explained, laying Chuuya’s hand over her beating chest. “It is a battery. It will not emit this sound if I do not recharge it. There are far too many risks about working with a broken heart.”

“That’s poetic, kinda,” he offered. “It’s not all that different from what humans do.”

She tilted her head, studying him. At last, she patted his head. “My analysis tells me you are a rather nice human to die for.”

Chuuya’s mouth dried. “I —“

“The folder of your memories always makes Adam very happy,” she added, nodding towards the spot in the hallway where the man had walked off. “I occasionally catch him skimming through it, on the harsher days of our missions. Androids are given a program of decision making that mimics human emotions to the point of not arising most suspicions in those like you — when he thinks about you, though, he seems to hardly need it.”

Pathetically, the lump stuck in his throat stole some time from him, before he managed to answer: “I’ve kept all his Christmas jack-in-box.”

“Ah, those silly things,” Eve’s sigh reminded him a good deal of Kouyou. “What a cellphone he is, at times.”

“Cellphone?” he echoed, grinning. “What — is that like calling him a child?”

“Certainly. It might seem as if their time is long past — but computers are the future, Master Chuuya.”

He curled an eyebrow. “Master Chuuya?”

“My partner believes you utterly worthy of that title,” she responded, simply. “I trust him with every cable and every program that helped create me. It is what I am, and what I will always be.”

Astonishing devotion lined her tone. There was something inevitably certain about the way she offered those words. Chuuya knew it had more to do with programming than anything close to an actual feeling — but when he watched them bump their foreheads together in some fun information exchange he hadn’t asked too much about, he felt the urge to pull the hems of his gloves.

“Master Chuuya understands,” Adam let her know, rubbing his forehead. He offered him a glance that had old scars itching. “He has a partner as well.”

He observed the thin knife lines carved on the counter, running his finger over them. Vaguely, he considered that might have been the first time they used any of the utensils in that kitchen.

It is what I am, and what I will always be.

Chuuya frowned. “I guess.”

Eve attempted to offer him an apple for the night — should you get hungry, as humans under the age of twenty five happen to often experience — and she didn’t quite understand why the reference made him snort. He took the apple all the same, and hung off Adam’s shoulders as the man led him to the guest room.

“Stay the weekend,” the android offered, as he walked him inside the mostly bare space — only a wide bed, some indistinctive paintings, and blank shelves and a desk, all shaded in blue. “I can bring you sightseeing. I will even make it my mission! Dr. Wollstonecraft meant to install me a Tourist Facade program — I will ask her to fasten the process.”

“I’d like that a lot,” Chuuya yawned, face planting into the soft pillows. “Don’t you have to work, though?”

Adam’s smile was mechanically detached — but as sincere as it managed. “I am immortal and the world is unchanging,” he offered.

“And I am eighteen and halfway to a serious potato indigestion,” he huffed. “Amen.”

Given the futon he slept on in Albatross’ apartment and the rare sleep he got on missions out of Yokohama, it was the first time in quite a bit Chuuya laid on a bed. He rolled around, kicking his feet — until his eyes landed on a framed picture on the nightstand. It was the only piece of personalized decoration in the entire house, apart from a collection of gums near the couches.

“Man,” he lamented, grabbing it. “Where did you even get this?”

“My folders,” Adam replied, sitting down next to him. He seemed surprised by the softness of the bed; experimentally, he jumped a bit on it. “I had Master Wollstonecraft print it for me. This is from when I was dragging you —“

“— away from the Old World,” Chuuya concluded, grimacing at the high quality picture of his startled face and too close nostrils. “You could have picked a different picture, if you missed me.”

“I have printed the first alert Europol ever received about Double Black,” the android offered, still staring at the bed. “It is in my suitcase. Are all beds this soft? Is that practical at all?”

“Nah . Just comfortable.”

Adam mouthed: comfortable.

Thirty seconds later, Chuuya was dragging him to his feet on the bed, biting down laughter as he watched him attempt to figure out the art of jumping on a bed. He seemed to like the sound of the creaking headboard — eventually, head almost brushing the ceiling, he started rating the jumps.

“Any picture would have worked,” Adam let him know, voice rattled by the motion. “8.67. I like this one very much, though. 9.45. It reminds me of how stubborn you can be.”

“You kneeled in front of me, introduced yourself as a robot, and told me an assassin who I believed to be dead was my brother,” he huffed. “A rational man would have let the Flags attempt to cut you down until you were crushed like a can.”

“6.59. You didn’t, though.”

“That was at least a 7. And you dragged me like a handbag. I didn’t have much choice.”

“After,” Adam insisted, studying him with unblinking eyes. It should have felt creepy, to have his gaze on him — all Chuuya could think about was the perspective of a few days tagging along to his freakishly long legs, lamenting his folder photos and forcing him to try out ice cream. He hadn’t felt that excited in months. “After, you did.”

Chuuya shrugged. “Revenge, maybe.”

“Maybe?”

He halted his jumping. He abandoned the photograph on the nightstand, and settled on the bed, legs crossed.

“Adam,” he questioned, under the man’s curious — still jumping — gaze. “When you were checking my vitals, did I feel angry — to you?”

In an odd show of non-immediate answer, the android replied: “Did you feel angry?”

“I felt like burning every inch of the world until not even ashes were left,” Chuuya offered. “I felt like finding Verlaine, even if it meant working with a pseudo computer cop — I felt like making him quit calling me his brother, if I had to cut off his tongue for it to work.”

Blinking, Adam questioned: “According to my parameters — is that not anger?”

He studied the loose threads of his gloves, pulling at the longer ones to clean them off. There had been something stuck between his ribs since the sight of Albatross’ bloodied body on the floor; it had begun to crack bones after he’d seen it again, against all odds. There had been something stuck between his ribs since Shirase had put a knife there, and Chuuya had kept it — bloodied and all he had left. Chuuya kept losing, and Chuuya kept tearing the earth apart in an effort not to feel its absence.

“I don’t know,” he admitted. “Maybe it was just grief.”

Eons and eons ago, Doc had taken a look at his blood and said, being angry would do you good. Eons and eons ago, stuck under the rain in front of a Hospital, Dazai had challenged — you don’t have to be angry. Has anyone ever told you?

The bed stopped being rattled. Landing on the floor with a grace that fit his vacant face to the dot, Adam crossed his hands behind his back and offered: “Perhaps there is somewhat of a point — in being angry at the necessity to grieve.”

Chuuya stared.

“For what it is worth, Master Chuuya,” the android added, carelessly fixing up things around the spotless room, “Emotions are parameters us androids have to analyze rather attentively. They will tell us much about a target — they are almost entirely to blame for any and all changes in their vitals, and for the actions that derive from them,” Turning, Adam offered him an endlessly simple nod. “I do not believe something this fundamental is meant to be entirely understood. And I do not believe you will be asked to.”

It sounded offensively easy when he put it like that. Perhaps that was the point of being a tin can, he considered. Things only had to be simple. A system wouldn’t understand them, otherwise.

Chuuya sighed. “You sure you can’t get yourself moved as a — I don’t know, a permanent overseas agent in Yokohama?”

The android beamed. “I rather like it here, Master Chuuya. But I prepared this guest room just for you, analyzing several pieces of data from our past encounters — I hope this visit will assure you that it will always be yours.”

“This is —” He glanced around, stupefied. “Just for me?”

“Who else?” Adam asked, genuinely. “I did my best to decorate it to your tastes. My studies let me know you rarely decorate your living spaces — though, you have mentioned pictures in your past letters,” He nodded towards the nightstand. “I do hope this will be to your taste.”

It certainly reflected every room Chuuya had ever lived in — from the basements the Sheep had to change every week, to the apartment he had been dragged to by Albatross.

It will always be yours. Chuuya had always liked overseas missions, anyway.

“You know what,” he decided. “When we go sightseeing, tomorrow, let’s buy — things.”

Carefully, Adam echoed: “Things?”

“Yeah. Decorations, bedsheets, a gaming console — I don’t know,” he insisted, infervorated. “Whatever makes a room. I’m not entirely sure. We can check on some magazines, or — your files will have something about it. We’ll turn this room into an eyesore, and I’ll be here more often than either of you can withstand.”

“I doubt that will happen,” Adam replied. His eyes were studying him bizarrely; they seemed to come to a conclusion that was entirely based on vitals and past parameters. He smiled. “But alright. As you wish.”

They stuck together for the next hour — both too excited by the perspective of sharing space again to finish the conversation. Chuuya begged him to show him what animals he could imitate apart from pigeons — after some prodding, he convinced him to tell him everything the last digits of his fingers could turn into.

He fell asleep at some undefined point, in the middle of one of the apocalyptic robot movies that got Adam to express human-like glee.

Chest aching from laughing at the creepy look the man got on his face whenever an android committed mass homicide, and heart pounding from how genuinely bright-eyed he got when he began ranting about Dr. Wollstonecraft’s promise to build him enough androids to create his agency — he slept dreamless and peaceful, feeling Adam’s eyes on him.

“I do not understand humanity fully,” he could have sworn he had heard him conclude, at some point. A blanket was laid on him — a gesture so tender, it contrasted his words viciously. “But I do believe your friends would prefer you grieving, rather than angry, Master Chuuya.”

---

...

---

It was 3:03 A.M. of his fourth day at the Frankenstein household, when two bodies of wet clothes and rancid curses dropped on the floor of his room.

“For fuck’s sake, Yuan —“

“Shh, you — you’re the one who —“ “ — sneaky as —“

“ — those ridiculous boots of yours —“

“ — hadn’t dyed your hair like a tomato —“

A crash. The empty flower vase Adam had situated on one of the shelves shattered on impact.

Chuuya waited to see if either one of the androids would break into the room, fingers on their guns and screams of UNHAND MASTER CHUUYA on their tongues. When it didn’t happen, he came to the conclusion that both the owners were well aware of the intrusion — and had decided it posed no danger, outside of his possible reaction.

Or, he considered, briefly pressing his eyes on the pillow to suffocate an upcoming headache, Adam had just decided to play therapist again.

He sat up, turning the abat-jour on.

In a pathetic bundle of wet limbs and bared teeth between the shards on the floor, Shirase and Yuan strode — circled by the warm yellow light as if Murase and Matsuda’s police lights. Thinking about Officer Matsuda had his hands twitching at his sides, though — instead, crossing his arms and raising his eyebrows, he said: “Hello.”

The hair clip keeping Yuan’s dyed hair up fell, raining strands on her blushing cheeks. One leg over her head and his foot trapped between her fingers, Shirase gasped.

“Dude!” he hissed, seemingly excited.

He didn’t even wait for him to stand from the bed to jump him with vigor — Chuuya landed back on the pillows with a oof!, Shirase’s arms like a vice around his shoulders, and his panting breaths rushing through his ear with urgency.

Stunned, he stilled.

“Dude,” the boy insisted, unconcerned, his legs kicking up like a little girl. Vaguely, Chuuya began counting seconds until he lowered his voice and pushed himself away with macho horror — an old habit from when they were children, and Shirase’s screams were always a bit too high pitched.

“Dude. Where the hell were you? I thought you would get to us after you dealt with the Tin Can Police — we waited for you at the safehouse!”

“I don’t know where the safehouse is,” he let him know, deeply uncomfortable — even more speechless.

“Well, duh, mate, Tin Police could tell you — I spent four hours scolding the kids for keeping you chained up for days!” he insisted. “I did tell them to capture any Japanese mafiosi they saw — but I thought it was clear I didn’t mean you. Like — if anyone should get a chance to try to capture you, it should be me, don’t you think? Ha! I kind of did it, didn’t I, though — right? I’m the one who trained the brats, and they got you. How did they even get you? Not that I don’t have absolute faith in my abilities. Was Tainted working badly? Is it a jet-lag thing? Did you grow dumber since I left? That’s no good, mate! You think I’ll lower my guard or anything — I won’t. Good ol’ Chuuya, always challenging my intellect — I won’t, do you hear that?” He slapped his shoulder. “Why the hell didn’t you tell me you were coming to London?”

Chuuya had gotten lost somewhere around the third word out of his mouth. Only years of use allowed him to get out of it, after a minute.

Then: “Mate?”

“When in Rome, do as the Romans do,” Shirase said, undeterred. “When in London, buy a good dozen of backup umbrellas. Chuuya, I miss Japanese transportation so bad.”

“It is rather efficient,” Yuan offered, still on the floor.

Her voice stiffened Shirase like a brick.

Predictably, he catapulted himself off both the bed and Chuuya, landing against the desk — barely hiding the wince the corner of it against his hip caused him.

“Oi!” he screeched, reddening. “I see what you’re doing! You won’t make me emotional and shit! I’m onto you!”

Still starfishing on the bed, Chuuya could hardly do more than stare at him.

Shirase had grown tall. Much, much taller than he had expected when they were kids — at eighteen, his limbs still hung awkwardly off their joints, growing into a padded jacket and a pair of tight jeans he wouldn’t have been caught dead wearing in the Sheep. His hair had grown just long enough to tie up in a bun — the silver strands that escaped it framed his pimpled, wide eyed face.

It was a vertiginous sight — familiar in all lines, and utterly unknown in the colors it had been painted with. There was a scar on his chin he hadn’t had in the Sheep. His thumb rhythmically tapped against each of his fingers, again and again — a habit he hadn’t had before.

Alright, Chuuya forced himself to think. It was too chaotic of a world — he couldn’t afford to carry a vendetta towards time, too. Alright.

The Sheep used to say it too, he thought — after the worst storms were over, and they could finally leave the makeshift houses. Hours used to be spent recovering lost kids from the fragile, fallen roofs; without fail, though, they would hug them all close and promise — it doesn’t matter anymore. We’re all safe. We’re all safe.

“Are you —“ He cleared his throat, eyes on the ceiling. “Both of you. ‘You doing alright?’”

He felt them exchange a glance.

“I’m fine,” Yuan said, clumsy. “Apart from Physics homework.”

“Just fine,” Shirase agreed, high-pitched. “I — gang leader. As you saw. And now I’m here.”

Outside the building, the air conditioning started buzzing — louder than a bomb. None of them seemed willing to take a single step to break the triangle between their bodies — empty space they had filled with nothing at all.

“Are your kids safe?” Chuuya questioned, after the awkward pause, standing up.

“All safe,” Shirase nodded, frantically. “Left them with the older subordinates. The warehouse won’t be a big loss or anything, anyway.”

“He’s got the entire neighborhood,” Yuan intervened, pulling her fingers. She was staring at some spot of Chuuya’s shoulder — seemed deeply uncertain of where to stand. “It’s actually so cool. He’s a household name and all.”

“Ah, it’s nothing,” the boy preened.

“We passed by some other gang’s territory, and they actually ran when they saw him.”

“You’re too kind, Yuan, seriously —“

“The brats seem to like you,” Chuuya cut through — immediately snapping both of their heads to him. “They talked about you tons while I was with them. So. That’s — cool, man. Seems like you’re doing just fine as King.”

A horribly tense — devastatingly graceless — moment of silence followed.

Didn’t we already do this, Chuuya begged, attempting not to direct his eyes to the ceiling in prayer. He’d stood with Shirase on a cliff, and then on the decks of the port — he’d sat with Yuan while she had a bomb strapped on her, and he’d sat with her in front of the debris of a building he had dropped on a man who she’d cared for.

They had shared the settlement and they had shared the ground Chuuya had bled on. He couldn’t believe they couldn’t share a bedroom.

“Oh,” Shirase said. The imperceptible tinge of wetness in his tone horrified Chuuya so bad he almost started screaming for Adam. “‘You think?’”

“Of course he does,” Yuan slithered like a frightened bunny, hanging off the boy’s arm with a nervous twitch to her entire body. “You’re doing just fine, Shirase. None of us ever doubted it. The — the others wouldn’t have, either,” She hesitated; then, she dared, all in one breath: “But Stray Sheep, seriously?”

A beat.

The boy spluttered. “What’s wrong with it? I was honoring my roots!”

“Yes,” she pressed, “But how can a sheep be a stray? Where did you even get that from?”

“It’s ‘cause I’m the sheep, Yuan,” he spat, as if obvious. “I’ve gone rogue. I’m in England. I’m a proper lad now. ”

She sighed, twirling her hair the same she did when she didn’t quite want to go against the Council’s decision. “Yes, but — stray implies more of an undomesticated idea than a emancipated one, is all I’m saying —“

““You ever seen a wild sheep, Yuan? Have you? Of course you haven’t. Listen, that Tin Can called me ‘couple years ago, talking bullshit about a sheep carcass, and let me tell you —“

“That’s not even why we’re here, you god damned fool,” Yuan hissed, “Remember?”

“What am I supposed to remember, while you’re insulting my hard work —“

“The knife thing?”

“The —“ Shirase’s eyes widened. “That — I — you don’t really expect me to just come via a man’s window and apologize for stabbing him —“

“I’d think it good courtesy!”

“You were there too, why don’t you —“

She gaped. “I’m allergic to rat poison, and you know that —“

Chuuya snorted.

It snapped their gazes to him for the second time that night — called them like magnets and like sunflowers, as they wordlessly watched him try not to laugh in their faces. Yuan’s lips trembled. It clearly bothered Shirase, still — but his shoulders relaxed. When a horrid pig-like squeak escaped the girl’s mouth, he chuckled like it had been shot out of him.

It felt intoxicatingly awkward; if he thought about it too long, Chuuya’s cheeks caught fire in a less than mature way. Nonetheless, he laughed, and was left breathless when the earth didn’t crack at the other two joining in.

“That’s not even funny,” Shirase whined, his face so scarlet even the abat-jour couldn’t paint it warmer. “I stabbed you with rat poison, man.”

Yuan’s choked laughter reminded him of a strangled duck. Chuuya’s stomach began hurting from chuckles; he held onto the desk.

“Oh, this is so fucking awkward,” he heard himself pant, cheeks hurting.

“It’s not that —“

“This is so awkward, ” Chuuya insisted, his tone borderline hysterical. “We used to pee in the same spot, remember? And now we’re in a robot’s house. He’s got a partner who makes me potatoes. And you stabbed me with fucking rat poison.”

“Why rat poison, anyway?” Yuan cackled, tears in her eyes. “Why not actual poison?”

“Where was I meant to find actual poison, you —“

“You allied with the GSS, ” he reminded, his spine bent by effort, stomach aching. “You — you pointed rifles at me. War rifles. You couldn’t ask them for normal poison?”

His laughter seemed like it would break his ribs in two. At last, Shirase snorted, falling over the weight of Yuan’s stumbling onto him, giggling.

It seemed eons before they all settled, half sprawled on the floor — breathless and somewhat desperate with it. Chuuya studied the ceiling like it would fall when he least expected it — unable to recall past examples to prove it wouldn’t. London was cold and utterly drenched, and if he reached a bit, he would have touched Shirase’s calf — and, Chuuya reminded himself, chest tight, they weren’t supposed to ever be in the same room again —

They’d come looking for him, he realized, a bit dumbfounded. Starstruck by the idea of having been found under debris and cockroaches and blood — stupefied by the concept of ever deserving to be looked for again. They’d come for him.

Chuuya knew he was a bit of a fool.

“Well,” Shirase concluded, scratching that shoulder he’d broken at ten — like he did before jumping into traffic to steal cargo. “You guys want to rob a convenience store or something?”

---

...

---

Under the cobalt lights of the refrigerator corner, Shirase flopped onto a shopping cart, and demanded to be wheeled around the gloomy, empty hallways of the convenience store.

“Why do you always get the cart, anyway?” Yuan lamented, climbing on the back of it, hands around the bar — only occasionally pushing with one foot on the floor to make it skate forward. “I’m the girl here.”

“And this is the end all your independence speeches make?” Shirase dared, popping a pack of chips open with a gunshot sound, legs dangling over the metallic edge.

“That’s not the point!” she lamented, arms around his throat. “I could be on my period right now, for all you know —” The boy retched. “Are you a child? Are you —”

Chuuya offered her a box of pads from the nearest shelf. A car passed by the glass doors they had broken through — lights barely illuminating the deeply exasperated look on her face.

The gentle hum of absence rendered that place strangely known — though it didn’t look all that much like the konbini back home. He made sure to leave a good hundred bucks behind the old counter, and then he roamed the halls underneath the devastatingly familiar chatter — stealing snacks he recalled being most of his diet in the settlement, and pocketing gums in flavors Adam had said he hadn’t tried yet.

He was a deer on newly healed legs; like in a dream, he chased when Yuan called for a race and he finished Shirase’s beer when the taste inevitably got his nose to scrunch up.

The world didn’t end when they killed you, Kouyou had once mused, tapping the scar on his side. He hadn’t had a fever — but something close enough, from a stray bullet. She had wiped sweat off his forehead and insisted, and you did not die when the world ended.

“Hey,” the boy called, when Yuan vanished in the noodles section. He nodded, nose red with paprika from the chips. “Nice hat, loser.”

Chuuya snorted, hooking one hand to the front of the cart to pull him down the aisle. “Nice hair, dumbass.”

“I think it makes me look more mature,” Shirase insisted, tightening the bun. “And it’s nice to see how it looks, ah? Always had to keep them short in the settlement. Lice and stuff.”

He nodded, absently — recalling the touch of the older kids’ fingers through his dirty strands, attempting to save the salvageable. Lippman had made comments when Chuuya’s hair had begun to grow into a ponytail — but he’d bought him some sort of specific shampoo, and he still used it.

Shirase cleared his throat. “Here. I almost forgot to give you this.”

Elbows crossed over the end of the cart — over the sound of Yuan’s out of tune singing — Chuuya studied the sticky, elastic surface of the blue band. He curled an eyebrow. “I told you at the port. I still have my old one.”

“Yeah, but you’re never gonna wear that again,” Shirase replied, as if obvious. “This is Stray Sheep stuff. It’ll tell the kids not to tie you up to a chair if they see you at the airport. Again. This,” Another nod, nudging his knuckles with his shoe, “This is new. You can wear it.”

Chuuya fidgeted with it.

It seemed utterly simple. Shirase looked at him like he had no idea about the shoebox he’d hid under Albatross bed — no idea about the ruined, barely held together bracelet; the dried blood on the knife he'd kept for no justifiable reason.

He looked at him as if knew, too — as if he could guess. Shirase had always made things a tad easier than what they were meant to.

Naive, Chuuya used to think of him. Fond and stubbornly loyal, Chuuya would always insist — naive. Blind. He will never know; he wouldn't care if he did.

"Fine," He put it on his wrist. "But I want those freight carries back, you fucker."

Casually, the boy rolled the cart wheels over his feet, whistling as he slid down the aisle.

They found Yuan by the refrigerator point, fridge doors open and her head half stuck in it, as she mumbled to herself. "Where the hell is it?"

"What are you looking for?" he asked.

"Minami has a thing for this white people's snack," she offered, distractedly. Melting frost was stuck to her forearms; she'd cut her knuckles with the broken vase from their hopeless entrance. While her eyes kept roaming, Chuuya grasped her wrist, settling some of the ice over the wound — she hissed against the sensation, startled. "Why are you playing nurse?"

"Cause you never do," he huffed. "Agent Minami. 'She treating you good?'"

Her gaze was odd — somewhat indulgent. "Like you don't know?"

He kept his eyes on her cracked knuckles.

"What, is he stalking you too?" Improper as he had always been, Shirase rolled to a stop next to them, mimicking binoculars. "Can you believe the audacity? 'Found out he'd been keeping an eye on me six months into my work at the fabric.'"

"Sometimes he floats by my window and he thinks I don't see him," Yuan commented.

"No, I don't," Chuuya snapped, ears red.

"I'm a Sheep, still, you liar. First thing you taught us was how to figure out if we were being followed. You know, I don't know how things work in the Mafia — but Minami has a doorbell," With an obnoxious gesture, she pretended to ring one. "I might even open the door, if you —"

"I doubt your Special Division agent would like having me at dinner."

"You sent Matsuda," Yuan accused. "That's almost worse. You're lucky I even want you around. I had to share a table with Officer Bald Head."

Shirase gasped, climbing on his knees. "The bowling ball is still around?"

"And kicking! It's actually — Chuuya?"

The ice between his fingers had melted — he watched it land on his shoes, gingerly kicking it away from the good leather. He forced his hands to unclench.

“Matsuda’s like he’s always been,” Chuuya concluded.

Over the buzz of the refrigerators, the two exchanged a glance he recognized too well — the wordless, general agreement that had surrounded him whenever the cracks he opened on the ground were somewhat wider than usual. Yuan cleared her throat. “Want to know who else is still around?”

“Who?” Shirase asked, cautious.

A dramatic hand covered her mouth, as Chuuya bent to pick up the fallen frozen nuggets from the ground — she leaned over the cart to stage-whisper: “That little Mafia grunt from the Arcade who was obsessed with Chuuya.”

Chuuya bumped his head against one of the refrigerator shelves. When he managed to raise a furious glare on the pair — Shirase’s eyes were absolutely vacant.

“Come on,” Yuan insisted, slowly. “He was in a suit — and the bandages? Went on that whole love spiel about how Chuuya’s his own person, blah, blah blah? That Port Mafia runt who was the whole reason why we —“

The boy’s eyes blurred even further.

Speechless, Chuuya climbed to his feet — eyebrows brushing his forehead. “Dude. You met him during the Verlaine stuff.”

“No, I didn’t,” he insisted.

“Dude. The Demon Prodigy —“

Shirase’s jaw dropped to the ground. The light of recognition turned him paler and paler, until he resembled a far too realistic corpse. “That’s who he fucking was?”

He stared. “Seriously?”

“You hadn’t figured it out?” Yuan rattled him like a doll, pulling the holding bar of his cart to drag him down the aisle — away from Chuuya, so she could loudly narrate: “You haven’t heard? They’re all buddy-buddy these days! They’ve got an edgy code name and all —“

“Chuuya and Daichi are Double Black?”

“Dazai,” Chuuya corrected, teeth gritted, as he reached them. “And we are not all buddy-buddy. He’s my enemy and I will take his life.”

“You should hear how the underground talks about them,” the girl insisted, twirling the cart around in unlikely donuts that had Shirase hold on for his life, wide, gossipy eyes on her.

“And you should hear how the little runt talks about our dear ol’ Chuuya — all protective and —“

He attempted to cut her head off with one of the chips cylinders. She yelped, skidding away with the cart. “When, exactly, did you talk about me with Dazai Osamu?”

“Dude,” Shirase cut through, grabbing her by the shoulders. “You don’t know the half of it. They’ve got this weird ass mating ritual —“

“Mating ritual?”

“— that involves Daichi getting tied to a light pole and getting swung around —“

“It’s Dazai, and that’s wildly out of —“

“— he threw up! And he didn’t even tell Chuuya no when he had him do it or anything!”

Yuan’s eyes had turned into twinkling stars. “Chuuya,” she started, trembling knees preparing to escape, hands tight around the cart — watching him menacingly march in their direction, “If you’d gotten seduced by some slimy Port Mafia runt, you could have just let us — hey!”

The cart ended up breaking the glass doors clean and swift; Chuuya made sure to leave a good number of banknotes behind — you’re seriously that rich?, Shirase gaped, man, that has to be unfair, you’re as much of a criminal as I am — before he began chasing the duo down the road, cracking the concrete behind the swift roll of their wheels and their matching screeches.

Given that Chuuya had promised not to disappear on them during his stay in London, he eventually managed to convince them not to drag him to every entertainment spot they could think of — acquiescing to soon be hauled to whatever nightclub and bar they wanted.

Instead, once rain-soaked clouds hovered in the sky, Shirase brought them to the Cemetery.

“I didn’t want to make it too detailed,” he explained, hurriedly sweeping leaves off the small tombstone in the quiet eastern corner. The stone was strangely isolated, surrounded by flowers and a frame of wide trees — Chuuya wondered just how much he’d paid for that spot of land. “Don’t think any of them would want to be buried anywhere but in Suribachi — but until we can do that...”

As if all puppet strings had been cut, Yuan fell to her knees in front of it.

“Hey,” Chuuya warned, very quiet, moving her foot from an abandoned piece of rusty metal. This is Yuan, he thought — rainy grounds and slippery roofs and blood on the walls. Be nice to her. He got his hands off of her sooner than even his mind could scream at him for. “Careful, kid.”

Distantly, she nodded.

She kept nodding until her head had to be hurting — abrupt like thunder in a blue sky, she exploded in snotty, childish, desperate sobs.

They didn’t move.

The sheer quantity of kanjis carved on the stone had Chuuya's joints ache under the rumble of her bawling. He had gathered the weight of loss from Yuan's words — but it felt different to be faced with what the GSS had done to the people he'd left behind, once they had realized they'd been less of a catch than first assumed.

"You know, it wasn't just 'cause you weren't there," Shirase told him, a bit awkwardly.

Chuuya almost smiled, mocking. "London made you a mind reader, now?"

"I've known you since you were less good at that."

"That, what?"

"Deflecting our shit."

He didn't speak.

"The GSS were mad you were not in the deal anymore, yeah — and having feuds with the Mafia wasn't —" He trailed off. With an effort of prideless intent, he insisted: "But they were way madder about how useless we were."

"You weren't useless," Chuuya complained. "I have an Ability — you couldn't compare. It isn't about that. The Sheep existed long before me."

"We were a stubborn orphanage at best," he replied. "You have to know, man. You made us the feared bunch. The kids stopped training, secure and respected — all we did was get drunk under a bridge, and taunt the Mafia with a reputation we'd had no part in building."

He was half convinced to be hallucinating.

But Shirase's traits were calm — mature in a way his gangly limbs had made him miss. There was a placidity to him that told him that grave was to reminiscence, not to be haunted. A fulfillment that told him he'd grown up, and that Chuuya had missed all of it — while bleeding in alleys, and keeping a knife that had long since left his body under his bed.

A grudge, maybe, he considered. The word tasted weirdly on his tongue. He had never blamed them at all. He hadn't even been angry. He'd just grieved being killed and not dying of it.

Chuuya stretched the blue bracelet. It was a familiar weight on a wrist that had never forgotten; it felt less like a collar, and more like a question.

"You built me," he offered. He removed his hat, passing it to Shirase — like Kouyou had taught him, he knelt by Yuan's side. Under their silent study of him — always observed, Chuuya had thought; but there had to be love in it, if it lingered — he bent until his forehead was on the ground, brushing the carved names. "That is more than I could have asked for."

---

“Don’t you dare,” Yuan and Shirase ruled, with eerie, murderous coordination — from under the blankets of Adam’s guest bed — the moment they caught him throwing a pillow on the floor in front of it.

Chuuya curled an eyebrow. “It’s 5:00 A.M. Can you fucking let me breathe?”

“You can breathe and sleep,” Yuan assured him, raising her hand in a mocking slap. “You’ll do it in a goddamn bed, though.”

“We won’t fit.”

“Nonsense,” Shirase scoffed. “We used to share all the time in Suribachi City — and those were futons. Don’t be a pussy.”

“Watch your mouth,” Yuan warned.

“You both snore,” Chuuya informed them. “And you kick. I’m not sleeping with you.”

“Fine,” the boy agreed, throwing blankets to the side. “Then we’ll all sleep on the floor.”

“There’s no point in —“

“Get in the bed.”

“It’s not even that big —“

“Get in the bed,” Yuan agreed.

“What the hell has made you guys nostalgic all of the sudden? If you wanna reminiscence, let’s fucking play Fire Throw —“

“That was a fucked up game,” Shirase said, eyes momentarily shocked. He grabbed his pillow and threw it at Chuuya’s face. “Get in the bed.”

Mumbling, Chuuya got in the bed.

Predictably, he ended up in the middle of the two snoring kick-machines; the king-sized bed was ill fitted to their undeniably wider bodies, and it was just soft enough to drown them in sheets. A symphony of grunts filled the dim moonlight from the window; Yuan’s leg ended up over his hips, and Shirase shuffled until his chin was by his shoulder.

Chuuya laid on his back, wordless and in a haze, staring at the ceiling.

“Guys,” he questioned, eventually. He kept his voice barely audible; soft enough not to tear the quiet. All was warm and all was familiar — he was on the brink of a joyride, and his heart would end up in his throat sooner than he could withstand. “What are you even doing?”

Face down on the bed, Shirase questioned: “What do you mean?”

“All of this. Why are you here?”

Silence creaked like a low signal. Chuuya pulled his new blue bracelet, slapping it his against his wrist — he shut his eyes until they ached, and thought, to himself, why would you fuck it up?

Yuan turned; turned again. Hesitant like a prissy cat, she moved close enough to be plastered against his side — and then planted her cheek on his shoulder, the way she used to do when it rained on the too-delicate roofs. She felt bigger than she had back then — she pressed weirdly against bones he had carved to fit with them.

“When I met Dazai Osamu, I asked him if you had been the reason for Noguchi’s death.”

Chuuya felt it like another stab in the side.

“I wasn’t,” he swore. His guilt found no place in the faults of others — his squad’s bodies had been buried under the debris all the same. “I was just too late.”

“You weren’t,” Her voice was rough — she shook her head, tactibly, against his shirt. He didn’t dare to breathe. “You weren’t. He was dead, and that was all,” She cleared her throat, finger clenching on the hem of Shirase’s sleeve. “It wasn’t on you. It never was. I just needed it to be.”

On his other side, calves touching his own, Shirase was quiet.

“You don’t need to —“ Chuuya tasted the sour, sharp metal in the gums of his mouth — under his tongue and all around his shoulders. “If you want me to come around,” he changed, “I will. You don’t have to do this. I’m no confessional.”

“Of course you aren’t,” Shirase muttered, scoffing. “Saint ol’ Chuuya.”

“Hey,” Yuan warned.

“Gets to save us,” he continued, blankly, in a lithium. “Gets to leave us. Gets to keep the truth to himself. Gets to have us hate him ‘till the grave, and gets to keep his martyrdom until he dies.”

Something ugly gathered under his nails. He still had his gloves on. The Sheep had seen his naked hands — Chuuya wore their bracelet again. He couldn’t take them off, still.

“I kept it, you know,” he said, lips numb.

He wasn’t sure of where Shirase heard the word knife in that death rattle breathing — he did, though. He kept utterly quiet. Said, after an inhale full of regret: “You didn’t have to.”

It was all I had, Chuuya didn't manage to explain. It was all I had left. How could I not?

Get angry, Verlaine had said.

"I did my best," he murmured.

It tumbled out of his mouth with finality — the last ounce of soil thrown over a grave he kept unburying. The Suribachi City project papers in his office; the dirty knife under the bed; the bricks outside Yuan's window — the coffin was constantly open. Chuuya had no choice but to carry the body outside — accept it as a living thing. "With you guys. It didn't work. The Sheep are no more, but I —" He closed his eyes — begged, seven and starved and clawing his way out of the debris: "I swear I did my best."

The heating system came alive with a sanctimonious buzz, outside the window. He'd have to clean up the vase shards.

It came like a heat wave, overwhelming and pounding like a heart — Shirase turned, shuffling until he could plant his bony chin on his bicep, his fingers hooking into his bracelet the way he did as a kid, lost and trusting. A breath was punched out of Yuan's chest — she cradled him closer than flesh should have allowed, strangling his head between her arms, her inhales frantic.

"We know," she swore, voice trembling. She kissed his forehead; then his cheek; then held him so close against her chest Chuuya couldn't breathe — could only focus on her claws digging into his shirt; and the relentless shake of Shirase's body, as close to his as it had only been when it was cold and it was famish and it was easier.

Sorry, he thought — to the Port Mafia; to the gentle touch of Kouyou's hands; to the way the Flags had called him one of his own. Chuuya had never been a child — but he'd been young, once, and it had been so devastatingly easier to —

"Of course we know," Shirase scolded, one hand reaching to ruffle his hair — utterly violent; hanging onto the strands like he feared Chuuya might vanish between his hands.

"We know, Chuuya — of course we know. The others knew it too," Yuan promised, so quiet it was barely an exhale. "We know. We always knew, we always knew, Chuuya —"

Undignified, he considered. His face was pressed against the leathery fabric of her chest, and he was too old for it — he'd always been too old for it, so no one had given it to him. His fingers seized the back of it, arm weak and nails sharp; he blinked against the numbness of his eyelids, and wished, vividly, that he could cry.

"I'm sorry," he offered.

"It doesn't matter," Yuan swore, against his forehead — too low for anyone who wasn't sharing their breath to hear. Shirase clenched his scarred, familiar hand around his wrist, and Chuuya shut his eyes. The saying of passed storms. "It doesn't matter anymore. We're all safe. We're all safe. You did good, Chuuya. No one —"

“No one could have done it better,” Shirase assured, brusque and quiet.

He didn’t move until morning.

Three weeks before.

As far as the precinct knew, the Yokohama Police Station was only empty one hour a day.

It was a disliked move — most insisted the place should have been guarded constantly; either from petty criminals spray-painting its walls or from the never-sleeping underground. Turns exist first a reason, they commented. Where else does our tax money go?

At 3:12 A.M., that night, only one office light was turned on.

Mountains of files littered an old desk; the small lamp near a thread-connected board painted the faces on the blurry photograph with a sinister touch. Bent over the reports, an Officer yawned. A sharp sound — a laptop getting shut in the main room — snapped his head up.

“Miss Momo?” he called. “Is that you?”

The attendant didn’t answer.

A loud bang! dragged the Officer to his feet, leading him out of his office before he could grab the revolver abandoned on his seat. “Miss —”

He paused.

“Oh,” The boy stood under the flickering lights on the ceiling. One of his shoes — clearly the good kind; lined in leather that couldn’t have come from Japan — nudged the woman’s body on the floor. “Matsuda. ‘Thought I’d have to knock.”

The Officer gaped, stunned. Blood trailed from the attendant’s temple; he tried to fly to her side. “Jesus, kid, what did you —”

“Put out that fire up your ass,” he replied, distractedly. “She’s just passed out.”

Matsuda’s nostrils flared. He stayed where he was, though — moved his eyes from the body to the boy standing upon it, hesitant. “I didn’t think you would care to see me anymore.”

Nakahara Chuuya hummed.

He leaned his side against one of the stone columns dividing the main room, eyes were set on him. He looked fairly unimpressed, in a clean dress shirt and that overgrown coat of his he never wore — behind the dangling chain of his hat, there was a stillness that contrasted the relaxed curve of his shoulders.

His arms were crossed. From the tip of his forefinger, a few drops of blood dripped onto the passed out attendant’s forehead.

“You know you don’t need to do all that to talk to me,” Matsuda said, pausing. His heartbeat had slowed down from the franticness of before. Finding an excuse for Momo not to press charges would be a headache, though. “Pulling pranks here is risky — even for you.”

“Pranks,” Chuuya echoed.

Something about him seemed different — he couldn’t pinpoint what. Something about his voice; the way his spine held him.

“This better be one,” the man confirmed. “If I find out your idea of a birthday celebration is breaking into a police station, we’ll have words.”

“You always do have those, don’t you.”

Matsuda shrugged. “You doin’ anything special for it?”

He tsk-ed — the first normal, familiar show of irritation from his lips. “Wish,” he muttered. “I snuck into that fishy bastard’s office, though — he planned a kidnapping for me.”

“Dazai planned — what?”

“For me to get kidnapped by a drug ring,” Chuuya said again, utterly monotonous. “It’s not like he doesn’t do it every year.”

A beat passed. The man sighed, rubbing his forehead. “Whatever,” he concluded, exhausted. “Just — happy birthday, kid. A few minutes early, but, you know.”

The boy looked at him for a long time.

“You know,” he started, eventually. “I had some interesting convos some days ago.” The line of his choker disappeared in the darkness behind him — it looked like a wound, from a distance. “Bout my life. What I’m doing with it.”

He blinked. “That’s — good, Chuuya.”

“Is it?”

“Very good,” he insisted, hesitantly. “We didn’t get to finish our conversation, the other day. Why don’t we — just let me grab my keys, call someone for Momo, and we can —” He moved to step to the coat-hanger near the main entrance; behind his interlocutor’s frame.

Chuuya freed one hand from his crossed arm — in a hypnotizing motion, his fingers rolled something between their pads.

Officer Matsuda stilled.

Somewhere outside the station, a car alarm began blaring.

“Chuuya,” he said, very quiet.

“Boss wanted you framed for possession of child pornography,” he offered, conversationally, eyes on the blood-rusty bullets in his gloved hand. “It would have certainly helped his case against any interaction between the PD and the young pupils at Mori Corps.”

Matsuda’s hand reached for his side, only pausing at the very last second — where an empty gun holster rested. The boy’s mismatched eyes followed the motion, feline unamused.

“Listen to me.”

“That was an interminable, convoluted conversation,” Chuuya continued. “But I won Boss over, so you get to keep your good attendance plaque at the entrance. I don’t like putting lies and children in the same shit. You know that.”

“So that’s what you’re going to do?” he hissed, almost — utterly disbelieving. “You spent all this time talking about Murase, and now you’re going to kill me?”

“Murase never sold me out.”

“Chuuya,” he pressed, “I was trying — “

“To help me?”

His tone halted the breath in his throat.

“I told you to stay away. Risked my fucking neck for it, too,” His eyes were deadly. “Spare me.”

It was unmerciful, the gaze he settled on him. He was a newly sorted enigma — same clues, same victim; new murderer. A life like this can make you forget something very odd, Murase had once told him, back at the Academy. You need a damn strong stomach to kill.

Not to enjoy it, Matsuda had replied.

No, he’d agreed. For that, just to be a bit out of it.

“Are you here because he sent you,” he asked, slowly, “Or because you want to be?”

Chuuya tilted his head to the side. Oddly pensive; seemingly unconcerned. His jaw was shut tight, though — maybe anger; maybe something worse. The bullets rolled across his thumb; he threw them in the air, grabbing them as they fell. “I’m afraid I can’t do you the favor of answering.”

“Chuuya.”

“Even less than that,” he insisted, “I can’t have you dying believing me anything less than loyal.”

The Officer’s lips trembled. Uncertainty pushed a bundle of words out of his mouth — thin lips, wrinkles, and raised hands; kind, at their very core, despite the years. “Chuuya,” he offered, gentle, “Listen to —“

He hurled the bullets towards the ceiling with a flick of the finger — batted them away with a gloved hand, and wordlessly watched them dig several paths through Matsuda’s chest. Squelching and cold, they buried themselves in his flesh and flew out with a wet sound — landed on the floor with a metallic ting!, louder than fireworks.

Matsuda dropped to the ground.

It was quiet.

The boy wiped the gunpowder off his glove on his coat. He stepped over the corpse as its blood joined the attendant's own; turned off the lights on his way out.

"Did you take care of that bother of yours, sir?" asked the driver waiting outside, holding the back door of a black car open.

"I'd say so, yeah," Chuuya concluded, with one last look at the Station's doors. "Do let Boss know on the encrypted line. He was so eager for this matter to be over."

The man's head lowered more. "Some nosy Officer, sir?"

"Something like that," He stepped into the car, abandoning long-day tired muscles on the leather — waited for the driver to shut the door and settled in his own seat to add: "Apart from his long nose, though — one of our contacts found a recorder inside his office," He clicked his tongue. "Irksofely stacked with my confession to a criminal lifestyle, and ready to send with a Special Division stamp. 'Made the mistake of walking him to the Cemetery, a bit ago.'"

The driver started the car. Very tonelessly, as it was demanded of a man of his position, he offered: "Luckily, he's been stopped."

Chuuya traced bars on the condensation of the window; studied the remains of it on the tip of his glove. Very neutrally, very used to it, he murmured: "It sure teaches me about trusting the same idiot twice."

The traffic lights switched. It was a peaceful night; Yokohama's bloodied moon was far enough to look white.

"The Black Lizards Commander wonders if you might be able to reach him at Section 17 of the Port, sir," the driver informed, after fiddling with his in-ear. "Should I let him know your shift has ended?"

"Nah, " the Vice-Executive fixed his hat. A red drop stained his wrist; he licked it off, fingers clenched to the point of a stuttering heartbeat. "Drive faster," he ordered. "I've got a job to do."

Yokohama PD.

Report — 189.898.17

Matsuda Masato.

Reported issue: *unidentified device.

Recorded conversation.

Date: April 3rd. ******

Matsuda M.:

“...a recording device of sorts. Yeah, I’m not — No, sir. It looks sophisticated, yeah. Found it in my pockets — it doesn’t match ours. No, I — I had a conversation with a kid from the neighborhood. No one important. No, sir. No, no one of any relevance. I’m not sure — no critical information. I will take care of it myself, if — yes, sir. Of course, sir.”

[Statics]

“No, sir. I believe — yes. No, of course the kid didn’t know — I only found it the morning after. My coat — of course not he didn’t put it there. I cannot imagine what the Port Mafia would gain from recording my conversations with him. He’s just a kid.”

“I will — Certainly, sir. Nothing you need to listen to. I’ll take care of it myself.”

End of transcription.

Port Mafia Archive.

Device n. 178.

To be returned to locker: AB15777.

Authorization: Mori Ougai.

Intelligence Archivist 061,

Sakaguchi.

Chapter End Notes

adam: master chuuya when the android apocalypse comes i will vouch for you in the robotic council

chuuya, on the verge of tears: cool man

[psa: should it be unclear, the device chuuya's confession was recorded on (the one matsuda had) was put in his pockets by mori] and so we're about to enter the last arc (divided in two, so technically) of this fic! the time flies. i'm speechless about it, but this fic does have to end eventually so like. lol. as always, i hope you enjoyed the chapter and that you'll enjoy what comes next, and thank you so so much for reading!! have a wonderful day <33 keep warm, see you soon!

BE

Chapter Notes

see you at the end:))!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

ACT THREE

---

[...]

that's when i got scared.

how strange we are

before we die.

[...]

[autumn poem, nakahara chuuya, third stanza]

The Port was horrendously crowded.

People made up a rather inconsequential part of the issue, as never ending as their number appeared — tiredly running legs and stubbornly yanking arms; bracketing hands and wheeled stretchers carrying dismembered dead and limbless wounded down the ships anchored at the dock.

The smell of blood was more pressing.

“Out of the way!” A young doctor shouted, leading a group to the tents someone had hurriedly set up all over the port perimeter — an emergency intervention; alerted by the conspicuous bundle of war ships that had returned to Yokohama unannounced.

Temporary, the captains had screamed from the decks. The enemy was clever enough to ask for a break. We were clever enough to use it.

The tents were a mere stretched out limb of the sick chaos of the bay — heightened, in a way; smells and whines and screams echoing off the dirty fabric walls, as bodies fought for the nearest bed and doctors struggled to clean their blades before sinking them in. Rushing wheels stopped near an occupied bed — the doctor dug his fingers in the woman’s neck. Hearing no response, he pushed her to the corpse-filled ground, laying his wounded in the freed space.

“Sir,” an assistant begged. “They need you on the ship.”

“He’s going to die if we don’t find a way to get the shards out,” the doctor replied, distracted, hands down to the wrist inside the shrieking man’s body. It was a cacophony — a sea of damned. “You go help. Where’s Yosano?”

“She stayed on the ship. There’s too many — the authorities will keep us from getting them out soon, what with the risk of an epidemic —“

“Even more reason to hurry — before they force us back into those damn ships —“

“Sir, that is an enemy —“

“This is a dying man,” the doctor snapped, meeting her eyes — his own merciless enough to raise a flinch. “And I am a doctor.”

The woman’s lips parted, wordless. Then: “There are many dying men.”

“Go help my Yosano,” he replied. “I’m sure you will be proved correct.”

He wrapped a tourniquet around the chest of the man under his hands — tightened it until he screamed, and screamed, and passed out. The nurse bowed — she hurried out of the medical tents with trembling hands and a retching mouth, brushing against devastation with each step.

The doctor tied his hair.

He set to work.

Infinite dawns passed, painting the white curtains a crimson shade that only hid the blood so; mountains over mountains of bodies entered the doors, never ending and never leaving. The ones on the ground were dragged out by dejected hands — thrown into the Bay under the horrified eyes of the civilians. The odor was stuck to the air; the cries never ran out of vocal chords to tear.

“They want us to move the tents to the ships,” some doctor whispered, eventually, red all the way to his elbows. “The risk of contagion is too high. And the civilians — months of victorious propaganda are going to waste.”

“We didn’t ask for a temporary truce,” the doctor noted, pushing a young man onto the top of a bundle of corpses. They made for a strange column — fleshy and stuck, barely separated by bundles of army clothing.

“We look like we’re losing,” a crazed-eyed colleague replied, lips numb. “We’re all dead.”

Outside the tents, governmental officials began barking out orders to move. Devastating silence fell amongst the healers and the wounded — the doctor watched protest rise and vanish from every face.

His hand twitched.

He grasped his closest colleague’s coat with a bloodied fist, pulling him closer.

“What —“

“Go outside,” he ordered. “Tell the man we have a special permit.”

“From whom?”

“Fukuchi Ochi,” The doctor let him go. “If that doesn’t work, say this: Maihime Project.”

Hesitancy made his eyes squint. “What does that fanatic have to do with — the Hunting Dogs project has not yet been approved — “

“Doctor,” he interrupted. He met his gaze; smiled, lined in blood. His feet stood on a cut off limb — the mountain of corpses behind him seemed to grow taller at each blink. “Are you going to waste more time?”

A gulp. The man ran out.

The tents were left where they were.

Sunrise was approaching. The screams were beginning to lack enough voice to be shouted — eventually, the doctor removed his soaked gloves, sliding down the nearest rusty column to breathe.

The umpteenth bundle of bodies next to him was the highest of the lot. Some hands and some legs at the base stuck out of the tent — an abandoned knee nudged his calf, lifelessly polite. The doctor studied the rotting flesh.

He waited until his water bottle was empty to ask: “Do you have a taste for decay?”

Apart from the tired moans and pumped blood, not a sound came to his ears.

“I have the feeling that breach of territory and self-removal might be considered crimes even if they come from a child,” the doctor continued, undeterred by the absolute silence. “What might have been so interesting to make you sneak all the way here?”

From the center of the mountain — over a severed arm and under a wretched apart stomach; just around the edge of a crashed skull that only showed the bone — a single eye blinked open.

It stared at him with clear disinterest.

“There you are,” the doctor said. “I feared the day might have left a tool on me, maybe. Good to know I still have an ear for the living, despite the War.”

Something like hilarity coloured that single eye. The doctor got the feeling of being made fun of — pitied, maybe.

What he could see of the kid’s face wasn’t wounded — only stained with old blood and much dirtier substances. When his mostly hidden lips parted, his voice was horrifyingly young: “The War i-isn’t real,” he informed him.

It was the doctor’s turn to blink. His lab coat wasn’t even white anymore; he had scratches all over his face — gifts from a patient unable to deal with the pain of a leg being severed without morphine. “It speaks.”

“It,” His tongue was pulled back. “Does.”

“With a bit of hesitation, it seems.”

“T-Temp — te — momentarily.”

His lips curled, not unkindly. “There are much worse crimes than some thinking before one speaks.”

The boy looked at him.

“The War is certainly real,” the doctor said. “I was there. Still am, occasionally — although there are talks about an entente cordiale,” A pause. “Do you know what that is?”

“The War isn’t real,” the kid insisted, in lieu of an answer. “The c-cat asked her to write it. So it i-isn’t.”

Abruptly, the doctor stilled.

“Oh,” His voice was strangely solid for a man whose life no longer made sense. A hilarity of sorts overcame his features. “Is that it, then?”

The trickster corpse shrugged.

“This place isn’t interesting at all,” he offered. “But, she’s always said — some things should be seen, to be envied.”

The doctor thought about it. “Only some?”

“Yes,” he confirmed. “V-Very few. Before I-I’m dead.”

“I see. Is the stuttering a daily issue?”

“Only when I’m scared,” He gulped; tossed and turned under that mountain, scratching old scars up his arms. The doctor didn’t offer to get him out of there; the boy didn’t ask. “Or when I’m bored.”

“I see,” he echoed. “I must be just tedious then, am I not?”

“Not scary?”

“You aren’t scared of being tossed in the sea along to the dead,” the doctor replied. “Why should you be scared of me?”

“The dead aren’t scary. They’re lucky.”

“What do you know about death?”

“Not much,” he admitted, sadly. “Nobody l-lets me.”

“You think I will?”

“Yes,” the boy confirmed, easily. A group of dejected men made their way to their corner; their clothes smelled of sea salt. “Y— You’re too scared not to.”

The doctor looked at him.

“You should go,” the boy said, eventually, once the men began to pull the bodies. It seemed they had been dragging them away for centuries — seemed like they would never reach his own.

“Should I?” he questioned.

“Yes,” he confirmed.

The screams seemed to rise again — more wounded. More work. More dead. The corners of the man’s eyes glinted in amusement. “May I know your name?”

He told him.

“Thank you,” the doctor bowed.

“Put it on my grave,” the boy requested. The hands pulled and pulled and pulled and never reached him. “I’ll h-haunt you if you forget.”

The doctor offered him a smile. It pulled and pulled — it reached him, and it never left his carcass again. “I shall be witness to that, then.”

scene v.

[had left me riddled with holes]

---

The Armed Detective Agency had, at last, implemented night shifts.

Or so Dazai assumed. The clean windows segmenting the brick walls of the building were lit up by a gentle glow, framing busy silhouettes and hands full of files — Uzumaki Café, underneath the balcony-less floors, was bustling with yawning workers gulping coffee under the moonlight.

His journeys rarely brought him to that part of the city — but he had seen those doors bathed in sunlight on a TV screen often enough. He didn’t know what that new time stamp meant for Yokohama. He could only assume, given the anxious glances the employees kept directing the street — gouged by the ricocheting gunshots from a few alleys away, and the police sirens doing their best to pretend to be intervening against it — that it meant the Port Mafia was prospering just fine.

“Sir,” a piqued voice chirped. “You might want to go home.”

The wristwatch Dazai had been given, resting next to Hirotsu’s cracked own — a distant activator for the rifle he had left on one of the roofs — ticked 03:00 AM right as he offered a curled eyebrow curling at the man standing next to him on the sidewalk.

Man — he couldn’t be older than eighteen. The beginning of a blond rat tail of sorts hovered over a pristine collar, framing acne-lined cheeks that were all angles. His glasses were centuries old; the broom tied to his back might have been even older. Dazai fiddled with the cigarette he didn't quite want to smoke. "Will the Caf  owners be all that glad you're sending away potential clients?"

"If it saves their lives, I believe so," the boy said, undeterred. He had a notebook of sorts in his hands, overflowing with peerless handwriting — he held it the way he had seen Mori hold himself. "The shootouts will last all night. Some gang challenged the Port Mafia for territory."

"How disgraceful."

"I would say!" His eyes almost blew over the rim of his glasses, clearly vindicated. "You are so very right, sir. Kid? I can't quite see you. Why are you hiding in the darkness like that? All the same — if these people worked desk jobs a single day of their life, they might get tired enough to put an end to these — these foolish —"

Dazai tilted his head. "And you Detectives can't do anything about it?"

A pause. "We can't — interfere without a client's request," he mumbled, cheeks reddening. "And if Abilities aren't involved — which the Mafia will never admit —" He paused again; then, he snapped his head in his direction so quickly it hurt to see. "How do you know I work here?"

You smell of honor, he considered telling him. And office ink. Or — I haven't heard someone talk about saving lives in a while.

Instead, he landed on: "You've got a flier stuck to your shoe."

"Oh!" The Detective kicked it away. He cleared his throat, and pretended not to flinch when distant gunshots fired off in quick succession — so many it seemed they would never end. Once it was silent again, he seemed to be struck by an idea — he bowed to Dazai so sharply his spine creaked, offering a hand. "Forgive my manners. Kunikida Doppo. Apprentice at the Agency. You should really go home. The Mafia doesn't target civilians when it isn't necessary, but that doesn't make them an inch less merciless," A judgmental stare. "You look my age. There's school tomorrow, you know."

Dazai shook his hand, amused. He had a firm grip, and the gently scarred palm of someone who kept getting cut by paper. "You look my age. Don't you have school?"

"I graduated early," Kunikida informed him, not an ounce of presumption. "I was tutoring, until a few weeks ago. I'm preparing to go into teaching. Technically," A glance was directed to his watch. "I'll be at school tomorrow. You're not wrong about that. How responsible of you to check," He deflated a bit. "But, you know — I'm considering joining the Agency full time."

"Are you?" Dazai encouraged, obnoxiously wide eyed. He didn't quite care. Not quite, but —

“This city certainly seems to need it,” the boy huffed, directing a distasteful look to an ambulance passing by — no doubt filled with the bodies whose blood Dazai was subtly scratching off his nails. “These things happen almost every day, can you believe it? I used to see them on the news and all, but we get hourly reports from our police contacts — it’s insane!” He mumbled something into the pages of his notebook, like they would remind him to speak up. “What are these people even striving for?”

“Money?” Dazai suggested. “Power?”

“That’s too generic.”

“I think it’s pretty realistic.”

“Would you spend every day of your life doing the exact same annoyingly violent thing — all to get enough money to create yourself a business that people will ask you to do the same annoyingly violent thing for, again and again?” Kunikida Doppo shivered. “Ideals are meant to be realistic. The perfect job, the perfect woman —“

“All women are perfect,” Dazai chimed in. “Do not disappoint me now. You were doing so well.”

A perplexed blink. “Was — was I?”

“Sure!” He offered him a grin. “I like people with an objective. You look spirited. You should consider that full time option.”

Surprise darkened his frown. “You think?”

“Detective Kunikida sounds way better than Professor Kunikida,” he swore, conspiratorial. “And it’s admirable — having people who believe the world can still be helped. Doesn’t matter how improbable it is.”

“There’s nothing improbable about justice,” Kunikida scoffed.

He almost smiled.

He could see it crystal clear — the crack in the glass. It would come, at some point, if the boy was set on changing careers — it would fracture something in his eyes with a single hit, surgically precise and just a bit infected. Make him more —

Dazai asked: “Is that what you want?”

“Somehow,” He squinted at the ground. Ah, he realized, belatedly obvious, the crack would hurt. “Yes. In a way. I’m not sure. I want to do something good.”

“Like being a teacher.”

“I told you, the teacher thing is probably not going to —“ A pause. “Why did I even tell you, anyway?”

“Because I’m so very trustable!”

“That can’t be,” Kunikida replied.

“How cruel,” Dazai whined, offended. “If you ever need a sidekick, don’t look for me.”

“I work alone, thank you very much,” He squinted. “What do you want?”

Dazai sighed, passionate, hooking his hands around the streetlight to dangle his body back. “To die hand in hand with a beautiful, beautiful woman — to listen to our heartbeats slow down in sync, under the gentlest pressure this world can offer. To die painfully,” He thought about it some more. “And — I’m thinking, lately — possibly without bothering anyone.”

Gunshots echoed in the night, framing the silence Kunikida Doppo allowed to lay on them. An expected reaction — most strangers he met and informed stole a few, awkward seconds to decide whether he was kidding or not.

Once they realized the look in his eyes was all but unserious, despite his glee — the silence usually lingered. Kunikida — a delightfully bizarre soul, it seemed — spluttered like a caught virgin. “Are you insane?” he shrilled. “Are those ads about cigarettes real? Are you intoxicated? What? Don’t say stuff like that. What? What did the poor lady — are you insane? You’re a child — do I need to call Social Services on you?”

“Look how late it is,” he sighed, watching the reddish light of his rifle-watch. “Hey, Professor — didn’t you know? Schools are closed tomorrow. They’ve established a festive day.”

Immediately distracted, the boy stared. “They have?”

“A celebration for those who have died in their fight against these disgraceful gangs!” Dazai assured, holding onto the streetlight to lean closer. Wiggling his eyebrows, he added: “Honorable, is it not? You should really write it down in that notebook of yours, so you don’t forget.”

Kunikida’s eyes widened. “You’re — you’re so right. Yes, thank you for telling me, let me — What day is it today?” His voice lowered into a focused mutter, as he balanced on one knee to write down on the paper, “How should I phrase it? No school. Or maybe —“

Dazai let go of the streetlight; crushed the cigarette under his foot and began making his way down the street. “I was kidding.”

The sound of a pen snapping came almost in tandem with the distant crash of a bomb — if his wrist watch was to be trusted, exactly the one he had left near his rifle, where he knew the GSA had been so sure they would capture him.

“Hey!” he heard Kunikida roar. Dazai bit down a grin of something — yanking his muscles like a sore wound, stretching around his bones. A glimpse. An attempt to fill a hole in the sand with the ocean itself. Faith he didn’t have. “I’ll have you know, these notebooks are a collector’s edition —“

“Newby!” A voice called, from one of the open windows — loud enough to awaken the entire neighborhood, and clearly not caring one bit. A man in glasses waved wildly, half his body hanging from the window. “Where’s my chocolate? It’s been twenty minutes! What are you even doing, chit chatting with a mafioso?”

“I told you, the queue is to be respected —” He froze. Dazai was already gone — halfway down the next block with his nails still dirty — when Kunikida Doppo sucked in a squeaking breath. “What do you mean a mafioso —”

He turned, bewildered. Only the streetlight met his gaze, three worlds away from the faraway gunshots, gently warming up the night.

Five streets away, amidst the echoing storm of ricocheting bullets and police radios screaming in nothingness, Dazai stepped over the corpse of a sniper. Her skull had been crushed from the fall — three stores higher, a window was shattered, the seal stained in fresh blood. The soles of his shoes made a squelching sound as they separated from the crimson pool on the ground — he slithered into the next alley, and the starkly quiet silhouettes of the Executives welcomed him.

He stilled.

“ — should be the last of the season,” Mori was saying, rhythmically tapping his fingers on one of the blood-red dossiers Kouyou favored.

“Unless this Catfish was swift enough to lay eggs in our ranks,” Ace reminded them, with a grin that full heartedly believed in the hilarity of that comeback.

“Now, don’t be silly,” Kouyou tutted. The hems of her kimono had been stained in blood — the pool from the body at the center of their circle had yet to stop spreading. She raised the hems of it as if a ball gown, not an inch of care in the motion. “An Ability User who can cause earthquakes is the last of our problems. We’ll just find him before the News can get prissy about it.”

“Wonder how they’ll blame earthquakes on us,” Hirotsu mumbled, around a cigarette, leaning against the wall. His eyes found Dazai; he bowed. “Executive. Here you are.”

His bandages felt more material than usual; pressing against his skin like fabric goosebumps. Devastatingly quiet, Dazai stared at the passed out body on the concrete.

Its limbs were crumpled up like a piece of paper. Bruises of a stubborn resistance reached its neck, reddened; gasping and wheezing. Short hair had lost most of its color from the blood of a head wound — behind closed eyelids, was a frantic, obsessive twitch of eyes.

“This —” Dazai started. He wasn’t exactly sure of how to continue.

His voice came from a thousand miles away — Kouyou was studying her nails without a blink, and the flicker of a neon light on the brickwall shone absolute, utter disinterest on the faces of all Executives.

Once again, he tried: “I thought we had to conduct more investigations.”

“We did,” Ace confirmed. “Not anymore.”

Mori switched dossier pages. “So, then,” he exclaimed, with the carelessness he had dedicated to all of Dazai’s dead grasshoppers. “For the sake of those reports our Intelligence loves so much. We’ll have to interrogate a bit more; get as much as we can from those clever bones. On September 22th, nevertheless, our latest standard traitor procedure —“ His eyes flew to Dazai; he offered him a nod. “Which we have you to thank for, Dazai, of course — will be put in place for —“ He squinted at the paper; his perplexed blink was comical. “How curious. Can you believe I never thought about a first name?”

“Me neither,” Kouyou noted, surprised.

“Is it ugly?” Ace questioned. “Must be.”

It was odd.

Dazai couldn’t take his eyes away from the blood on the concrete — how it bloomed; how it crawled forward. How no one was saying a thing more than they would have said for a particularly displeasing weather — how no one expected him to add a word to that placid nothingness. Why would they?, he considered. Why would you?, and, what did you expect?

Dazai thought he’d seen the world, maybe, at some point — and everything since had been an attempt to chase the memory. Mori’s voice, still, always and forever — why would you care?

He opened his mouth. Felt weird; an itch he couldn’t quite reach. I don’t get it, he thought about saying. Raising his hand in class; pointing at suicide methods from his book that required too many knots. I don’t get it.

Some distant car horn blared.

“All the same — the mole’s execution will take place on the 22th,” Mori shut the dossier, proficiently. He looked up, studying his Executives with welcoming eyes. “You can take care of it, Dazai. Any further questions for the night?”

---

TWO MONTHS BEFORE

---

Case number: 89826788

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [Code Name: Double Black] were rumored to have [...]*

---

Excerpt from Chapter: “Soukoku — The Most Devastating Rivarly.”

Diary XIII.

Natsume Soseki.

Special Division for Unusual Powers — Archive.

Recovered & Analyzed by: Sakaguchi Ango.

[...] even truly knew what they looked like. Whispers spread through the underground with the efficiency of a book club. After all — voices tend to spread somewhat desperately when a great number of people have some interest in the offered wager:

And everyone in the underground had something to say about Double Black.

Most, if threatened for information, would have not sworn they were two mere boys. A pair of children born under the mark of some devil, fated to a crimson path as soon as their teeth had grown — maybe. Nobody could pinpoint what color their hair was, or what their faces looked like. Anyone who had seen them from up close had never been able to pinpoint anything else at all ever again.

How do you ask ghosts to describe their killer?

Their syndicate knew them, certainly — but even there, matters became somewhat intricate. The upper circles were well aware of Nakahara Chuuya and Dazai Osamu's involvement; but the lower one went down the ranks —

[...]

This, though, the underground knew: if one were to catch a glimpse of bandages, if one were to hear the jittery chime of a hat chain — if one were to see the inextricable silhouettes of two bodies, steps heavy and squelching, lined with pieces of decaying flesh —

[...]

Their vanishment came torturously slow — like a children's ghost tale. Their name lingered in the whispers long after the Port Mafia began relying less and less on their [...]

[keep reading] [?]

---

...

---

The first of the letters to come, after Dazai had finally answered — only once, he told himself; and he kept that promise, both to be petty with a street rat and to be wise with a demon — started like this: do you think death has a point, or is God simply too harmonious not to put an end to things?

He kept the papers under an old fridge at the edge of the dumping site, for a while — then, bored, he began leaving them in the open, their symbols and combinations meaningless to all eyes but his.

He never answered.

Somewhat.

Sometimes he answered; he just never sent it — thirteen letters and one answer was his current ratio; he had been drafting a second one, though. In spite of the flair for dramatics of his interlocutor — do you truly believe, Dazai told him, if there's a God, that he cares enough to worry about beginnings and endings? — Dazai's fingers twitched in interest whenever he saw that strange alphabet.

Boredom, he considered. But not quite — he had never been entertained, not in any place. Bar Lupin, maybe — but he was there every week, and the urge to ask that Russian rat just what he thought of existence was horribly tempting.

Dazai had never met someone as hauntedly clever as he was.

You aren't either, Mr. Rat, he let the letters know, the one time he sent his answer. Maybe — if he got bored enough — he would let Mori know angels of decay would be coming to Yokohama soon. I can hardly wait to let you find out.

---

...

---

Akutagawa was bleeding.

The in-ear informed him with a hurried bark — someone from the rows of Secret Unit men he had allowed the boy to carry out. “But are the traitors down?” he questioned, as one of his bullets struck a GSA goon in the knee.

“He’s guarding them near the theater, sir,” the woman confirmed. A strange texture lined the gulp he overheard — she added: “He caught them like flies.”

The streets were empty but haunted — Dazai’s shoes splattered lines of blood puddles on the walls with every step; eye searching through the armed bodies peeking from behind flipped cars, dragging the shootout out longer and longer.

“I’ll go check on that flytrap of mine, then,” he concluded, freeing his foot from the weight of the corpse fallen on it. “Spread out all the way to Yamashita Park. I want the GSA out of the territory by dawn.”

“Yes, Executive,” A pause. “Any news on the disappeared —“

Dazai took off the earpiece.

Making his way through the conflictual streets wasn’t particularly hard — a bit unaesthetic on the eyes, perhaps; what with the corpses rotting all over the road and the bullet-shattered windows. The summer wind should have made the drag of his coat feel lighter; Dazai still walked as if he had stones in his shoes, though — a gun in each hand, distractedly putting down every unfamiliar man he bumped against.

The scenery that awaited him near the Central Theater was tragically predictable.

“You must have a taste for the pathetic stories they’ve been wasting their breaths on, Akutagawa,” he commented, unimpressed, making his way to black void kneeling on the sidewalk. He was framed by picturesque rays of blood, like a clock graffitied on the ground — each hour ticked with dismembered bodies in military uniforms. “Say, do you like it when they call you the Mafia Dog?”

A fairly new title, as far as Dazai’s sources reported. It had started around May, after some senselessly vicious slaughter the boy had put in place against the last of the Division moles attempting to flee the Mafia — a new whisper for the poison-thirsty hallways of the syndicate.

They like those a lot, do they not?, Ango had huffed, some weeks ago.

Chest rattled by frustrating, wet coughs, the subordinate only raised bloodshot eyes on him — raging in silence.

A soaked silence answered.

“Mmh?” Dazai insisted, nudging his side with his shoe. His recovery times were nothing to envy, truly; he nudged him some more. “You must like it, come on. No other reason to treat valuable intel sources like chewing toys.”

“You —” Akutagawa spat, fingers so tight around his handkerchief, his knuckles were white. “You told me to take care of —”

“The fools who freed Q from their cage and caused me a rather boring weekend? Yes, yes, I’m aware,” Dazai gaze roamed over the massacre — a jaw-dropping display, precise in uncharted cruelty. A thorn-lined baseball bat waved around by the blind. “Ten points for listening. Like those English tests, yes? Repeat after me. Still — where, exactly, did I mention killing them?”

“They were worthless, spineless traitors,” the boy snapped, stumbling to his feet with his fists clenched. “The Headquarters have reported more than ten deaths at their hand —”

“And just who’s going to tell us where to find darling Q’s little bloodthirsty fingers,” Dazai sing-sang, undeterred, absently scrolling down his phone, “Now that you’ve conveniently torn out the throats of those who saw them run off?”

Akutagawa set his jaw. “Three of them had Abilities,” he attempted. He could see the faded outline of Rashomon around him — a suggestion; a reminder of what he had been capable of, just a breath before Dazai had come to whine and spew about sense. “They —”

“Just how badly do you long for me to tell you that shadow-chainsaw you carry around like a bad posture is good for skewing fools?” Dazai interrupted, bringing the phone to his ear. “It is, it is. Don't be whiny. Start cleaning those off and regroup the men — we can't let the voice get out that GSA got so close to Yamashita Park."

"Sir —"

"Odasaku!" Dazai exclaimed, skipping away from the boy, looking for an ugly enough car to get his hands on. "Any news on the lead I gave you?"

"I'm cornering him right now," the man answered, calmly, from the phone. The swish of a blade — probably being thrown very close to his face — didn't seem to startle his breathing pattern. "He doesn't seem particularly willing to tell me where he hid Q."

"Yes, that sounds like him," he sighed, half muffled by the effort of sneaking into an old Prius from the window he had shattered. The security alarm rang and rang; he screamed into the phone: "It's mildly entertaining, but Q's been gone for a week — Boss' getting annoying about it."

"So are the dead."

"Yes, sure. I'll come find you. Do be careful — GSA is just sagged in Ability Users. I had to kill a woman who could go through walls — but only backwards, can you believe that? Where are you?"

Another swish!. Some goon landed on a nearby car; another alarm started. "What?"

"Where are you?" Dazai shouted.

"What did you say?"

"Where are — Nevermind."

He made sure to gleefully slam his new Prius into every corner of the war field; by the time the rear view mirrors were barely hanging on, and remnants of a tree were stuck to the windshield — he swerved into a dangerous curve, mere feet from Odasaku's unavoidable silhouette.

Report, the muffled voice from the in-ear hanging around his neck demanded. Fall back.

Saluting, he hung half his body out of the car window. "Beautiful evening we're having, my friend — isn't it?"

Odasaku shrugged. Leftovers of a badly cut beard lingered next to a bright band-aid — most probably, a wound-less gift from his kids. Odasaku didn't get hit. "The rising earthquake risk makes it somewhat less nice."

"Ah, yes. The Catfish, this Ability User calls himself? Any idea why?"

"Old myth," the man offered, immediately. "That's what Ango said. Years ago, people used to believe earthquakes were caused by this — giant catfish that lived underneath the earth."

His eyes widened. Like an alarm bell, the concrete underneath them was slightly rattled — nothing compared to the ten minutes long shakes from the day before, but enough to make the car creak threateningly. “That’s so cool. This User is so great at picking names. I envy him greatly.”

Odasaku huffed. “The night’s excitement made me miss Pops’ curry night.”

“My condolences,” Dazai climbed out of the car, skipping — attempting to remove his shoe. Courteous, Odasaku offered him his arm to hold onto. “Still a perfect night for a suicide, though!”

“I don’t know about that. Why do you carry a brick inside your pockets?”

“I found it at the bottom of the river just this morning,” Dazai beamed, settling the brick inside the now empty shoe. He abandoned it on the pedal of the car; slammed the door shut just in time to watch it race mindlessly down the road, taking down a few GSA passersby. “I’d tell you to visit, but little Akutagawa is just about to rage on those same shores. Even you might have a problem with those sharp talons of his.”

In the distance, the car wheels screeched — spinning the vehicle around into aimless donuts, until it landed against one of the trash-bins of a three-stores shop of sorts.

A young, high pitched scream echoed.

Mere seconds before the car caught fire, a silhouette in black and gray jumped in, pulling Q’s kicking body away from the perimeter.

“See?” Dazai jumped in place. “No gift is to be ever thrown away.”

“Conceded,” Odasaku admitted.

They made their way to the flaming circle, occasionally hiding behind a car or a darkened alley — so that Dazai could aim and get rid of the snipers hiding on the roofs. “Why are you picking up bullets?” the man questioned, at one point.

“Recycling,” he replied.

“I see. Tragic or —“

“Certainly comic. There you are.”

Wiping ash from an hysterically giggling Q with his jacket — holding their wrists so hard they would bruise; holding them closer than most in the Post Mafia dared — Gin Akutagawa watched them approach with frustrated defiance.

“And there’s our little spider, as well,” Dazai exclaimed, smiling — lowering his darkening gaze to the extracted knife in his hands. “Aren’t I just so grateful? Always trust the Black Lizards to bring back a missing knickknack,” He winked. “Hey there, Yu.”

Faster than a blink, Odasaku pushed him a few steps back — just in time for Gin to wrap his arms around Q's snarling body and yank them back, halting their attempt to jump on him.

He whistled, walking the few steps that separated him from the kid's abandoned doll. The delirious shriek that left their mouth as he picked it up had Gin's masked face scrunch up, wincing.

Odasaku only watched. "I thought you'd said the doll was locked up."

"And only its guard knew where," Dazai confirmed. "Considering that that fool was laying at Akutagawa's feet just a few moments ago, I'm assuming my criteria need some betterment," He groaned, hugging the doll — rubbing his cheek on its bandaged head. "Mori will be so annoying about that."

"I'll kill you," Q seethed, foam and snot on their lips, half smiling — trembling so violently he couldn't be sure if it was anger or fear. "I'll get my hands on you, you, and you're never gonna stop suffering —"

"You used to like me more than this," Dazai commented, rolling the stray bullets in his palm. "Your hands are useless when I'm concerned. You know that. Gin, knock them out."

"I'm gonna run again," Q swore, loud and wrecked, "I'm gonna kill you, I'm gonna kill you, I'm gonna —"

Dazai's smile stayed where it was. "Gin."

The boy's hesitation bowed. He turned his knife — knocked the hilt on the kid's convulsing head, shutting them up.

"That's better," he concluded.

Odasaku stiffened. "Look o—"

A wall of bullets rained on them from the highest of the rooftops behind the trash bin; Gin rolled away, Q's body held safely in his embrace — Dazai juggled the spare bullets in his palm, and threw them in the air, saying: "Fetch, Chuuya."

A glimpse of scarlet burned the side of his retina, crashing against the bullets with his leg raised. A muffled call to, retire, it's him!, echoed from the rooftops and the faraway victims in his in-ear ; hiding under the bin, Gin's eyes widened — he signed frantically, too hidden by the lingering smoke to be clear.

The voices cried out — didn't they say Double Black hadn't been spotted —

Hands on the torn car door he'd attempted to shield them with, Odasaku studied the roaming red dot in the sky. "That your partner?"

"You'd think so," Dazai offered, watching the wrecked body of a sniper hang off the fifteenth floor window. "You know, I actually believe our anniversary is approaching! Disgracefully, though, it seems they have spread seventeen different stories on our alleged decess."

Unbothered by the still flaming car and the raining blood, the man blinked. “How long have you guys been partners, anyway?”

“Thirty years!”

“What?”

“I count in dog’s years,” he explained, guns in hands. “Might be thirty seven? Thirty eight? I always get confused. Hey, Hatrack!”

He didn’t wait for the silhouette to turn. He raised both the revolvers and fired mercilessly through his suit-clad body, loud and unabashed in the night — until he landed so mercilessly on the concrete, his spine snapped on impact. A guttural noise came out of Gin’s throat — he stared at him, horrified, eyes fluttering back to the pool of blood spreading under Chuuya’s body.

“That’s taken care of,” Dazai stretched, as silence lingered again. “Wouldn’t have wanted him to get lost in the cracks of the street, small as he is — with all these earthquakes going on.”

He walked to the corpse — nudged it, so that it would be laying on its back while Chuuya’s semblances slowly melted off of him.

“An appearance-alterant Ability,” Odasaku concluded, calm. He directed him an indescribable glance. “And he can steal the owner’s Ability too, I’d say — how did you know?”

“The air tasted weird,” he shrugged. Then, because the man didn’t seem convinced, he added: “As if such a silly dog would ever actually respond to my fetching orders. He’s still resisting training.”

His abandoned in-ear screeched.

Odasaku and Gin put a hand to their ears, flinching — listening to the monotone voice from the Port Mafia encrypted line.

“— mutant Ability User, taking the semblances of our — do remember — Kinoshita, Captain Yamagata, and Vice-Executive Nakahara — still in Europe —”

A spasm went through his hand.

“Europe?” Dazai exclaimed, tongue tasting like rust between grinning teeth. Very abruptly, he felt like killing more of those snipers. “Who sent the Slug to Europe? Had they told me, I would have thrown a party!” He shook his head, feeling his friend’s eyes on him. “And here I thought he’d just been ignoring me. What did I buy a punishing sprinkler for, then?”

Odasaku eyed him curiously. “You didn’t know he’d left?”

“See what I mean about the dog training?” He made his way to Gin, shaking his head. “Ah — doesn’t matter. I’ll use the sprinkler anyway. Does he even have the proper vaccinations for travel? Heavens above. Gin, give me the brat.”

More instinctively than truly disobedient — the Lizard tightened his grip around the child's shoulders.

All three of them paused.

Very subtly, Odasaku straightened.

Dazai smiled.

"Come on now, little spider," he tutted, crouching down. His coat was dragged into a puddle of blood from the fake Chuuya's body — hilarity crawled through the corners of his skull, drowning amidst the entertainment he didn't quite feel. "I'm glad to let the men know you're the one who found them. Would you prefer me to tell them that you're the one who tried to help them run, instead?"

Gin's eyes widened. Weakly, her fingers signed, I didn't —

"We're not going to linger on what exactly went through your mind when you found them and didn't immediately bring them to me," Dazai cut through, patting his head. "There's no need! They're here now, and I, for one — really don't care enough. I know you, sweetheart — you would have brought them forward, eventually." He felt his smile slip off like a crack in a mirror. "Now give me the child, Gin."

Eyes harder than decay under sweaty bangs, he complied.

"And that's done too," With a sigh, Dazai sneezed against the tufts of hair from Q's dangling head on his shoulder. Gin had been devoured by the shadows; only Odasaku remained, studying the die-down of the shootout across the streets — the quietness. "Thank you for your help, Odasaku!"

"I didn't do much," the man replied. He eyed the sleeping kid with a look Dazai knew all too well — both instinctive protectiveness and an assassin's always-high guard. "Any idea on what might have caused their week-long trip?"

"For sure," Dazai nodded, fixing his grip. The blades under their sleeves pressed against his chest, causing a shiver. "Mori has been trying to train their Ability — sharpen its range. I have to be there, of course. I believe they might have decided to put the blame of this training on me."

"Not like one can blame Boss," Odasaku offered, carefully blank.

He smiled. "Precisely. Up for finding Ango and getting a drink?"

Not unkindly, the man curled an eyebrow. "Maybe when you don't have a walking bomb in your arms."

"I guess," he huffed, sadly. "Hirotsu should be coming soon — you can hurry back to your cold curry," An idea lit him up. "Unless — if you wait just a tiny little bit — I can leave Q on Mori's desk and we can go exploring."

“Exploring?”

“Yes!” Dazai vibrated with energy, jumping in place. The possibilities were endless — dragging the man to steal one of Kouyou’s katanas and stick a fake mustache on it; filling Ango’s dear car with honey and leaving it in a beekeeper’s backyard; breaking in Chuuya’s penthouse to catch him in the dog-print pants he swore he never wore —

Except —

“We haven’t gone exploring in a while. Last time, we found Kazuko! We can find your kids a pet. A domesticated rat?” He deflated. “Maybe not a rat. I’m getting so tired of rats. Their Japanese is horrible, especially in writing.”

Odasaku blinked at him. “You’re holding a correspondence with street rats?”

“Somewhat,” he confirmed. “But I’m not responding. They’re irritating.”

The man nodded — accepting it with utter ease. “I’d be glad to go exploring, Dazai.”

“Great! And —“

“I don’t know if the Mafia Boss waiting for you would feel the same, though.”

Ease, Dazai thought, as his smile blurred. Easy-hard, that was what Odasaku felt like. He had invented many, many words for him. Easy-hard. Currycursed. Cookedmeattheoryeyed. Standing next to him always made comparison seem brighter than the sun — all he would never be. Dazai knew it all, and the man knew better than to praise him for it. Easy-hard.

“Yes,” he concluded. Q had clenched a small fist around his tie; there were scratches down their face — the result of hurried running through sharp branches. “Of course. You’re right.”

A hand landed on his shoulder.

It didn’t quite startle him — he knew his eyes did something, though. Odasaku’s gaze was unwavering; aware that Dazai didn’t appreciate gentleness. He only wanted focal points.

His grip tightened — until even a breath inhabited carcass had to feel it. Until it would at least try to. “Bar Lupin tomorrow?”

Dazai grinned.

Hirotsu's scarf was stained in blood, when his car parked by where Dazai was sitting on the concrete. He didn't offer to take Q from his arms — but when the two of them huddled up on the passenger seat, he turned on the heating.

"Summer just started," he let him know.

"I know, sir," Hirotsu replied.

He bit down a shiver, still. Traced the blade bumps over Q's bandages.

That's funny, he had told Mori, during one of the first training sessions. The traitor hanging from the ceiling was staring at Q's laughing, small body, still — despite the settling rigor mortis. They were both soaked in blood. Don't we look similar?

Mori's smile had been a concession. It almost always was — to his madness or his flecks of honesty, he didn't know.

"I hate you," Q murmured, into his ear. It was too quiet for anyone else to hear — lined in a tiredness his fingers curled along to. "It's all your fault if I'm here."

Dazai fixed his grip. "Nowhere else to go."

Hirotsu directed him a glance. He was a starkly white line against the darkened roads. The lower ranks were beginning to gather the corpses. They passed by the Detective Agency; Uzumaki Caf   had been emptied out.

"Sir," the Commander called.

"Ol' Gramps."

"Happy birthday."

He paused.

The man's gloved hand was offering him something — shiny and square-shaped; familiar to his thieving fingers. The Lizards-seal on the silver wristwatch bounced the moonlight off, unassuming.

"I assume it might not be worth half as much, when you and Chuuya aren't slipping it out of my pockets," Hirotsu said, gently throwing it on his occupied lap. "But I wanted you to have it — officially. Eighteen is a significant age."

Dazai picked it up; studied it with nimble fingers — dragging his nails down the well-known scratches and carvings. "Eighteen is too old."

A bit too honest. He felt it like a coat on his shoulders — did his best to stretch his lips into a grin to shrug it off. It stung a bit.

“You can always die at nineteen.”

He met the man’s gaze. Hirotsu curled his eyebrow.

Dazai pocketed the lighter, clearing his throat. “Well! I’m honored, old man. I promise not to set your car on fire for a whole week.”

“Good enough.”

“But you need to tell me — just how did you find out?” he insisted. Ango and Odasaku had spent years struggling to discover it. It always filled with him a certain giddiness — watching them treat him just the same when the day arrived. “You sly old man. Worthy Commander. There are no records on it, I’m absolutely sure.”

“Oh,” Hirotsu parked in front of the HQs. The chain of his monocle dangled hypnotizingly, hit by the car lights. “Chuuya told me.”

A spasm went through his hands. It took him a moment to realize it was more than physical aggravation — when Hirotsu swore, swerving the car along to the rhythmic tremors of the earth, he leaned outside his car window, watching dust fall from the roofs of older buildings.

“Not again,” Q muttered.

The Commander’s arm was slammed on his chest with little fanfare, crashing Dazai against the seat and the kid into his ribs — the man let his car race stubbornly through the opening charms of the street, crashing against shaking warning signs and barely missing clubbing passerby. Screams spread from the open doors of the balconies; the seismic shocks grew and died with viciousness that couldn’t be predicted.

“Should we stop the car?” Hirotsu asked, as he fixed his monocle.

Dazai shrugged. “Just accelerate. Can’t have the earth catch up with us.”

Eventually — after enough rattling for Q to lean over the car window and throw up, no mind to the flying vomit from their accelerating race; and after most of the man’s car had gotten damaged from being spun around by a moving road — The Catfish settled. Through the white noises of both their own radio and of the ones they passed — inside hurriedly abandoned cars — Dazai heard emergency News reports blasting.

“That was fun,” he concluded. “We should do that more often. Except Mori will want reports on this too, which — ah, maybe not. We sure this guy isn’t from GPA, right? A freelance?”

“Quite,” the man’s voice was a thread.

Hirotsu’s knuckles turned white around the steering wheel. The lack of wristwatch turned his mind back to the last words the man had said.

Interesting, Dazai considered, analytically — either his own wince or the surprising adeptness for investigation that dog had shown. Whichever one would be less weird. Less uncharacteristic.

“That brainless dog doesn’t know.”

“It rather seems he does,” the man replied, after a confused pause. “Called me in the middle of a shootout — he said something about how I should be, polite enough to make the bastard choke on a birthday hat while I’m not there. He seemed pretty bummed out to be missing it — looks like he’s been trying to find out for a while.”

“Bummed out enough to not even tell me he’s in another continent!” Dazai felt his lips sharpen cruelly, like an unwilling reflex. “Amazing, the emotional lengths slugs’ brains can nowadays reach. Obedient like a dog — he knew the biggest present would be a few weeks with his unbearable self’s absence, and he complied! The wonders of evolution.”

Meanness made him a tad too honest; he kicked the car door open before the gaze Hirotsu was offering him could grow more knowing.

He was halfway up the stairs, lamenting Q’s weight just to remind himself his lips could move, when he heard the man speak again.

“Boss refused to make it a Double Black mission for a reason, you know.”

“I’ll send him flowers for it!” he called back, not slowing down.

“You’ve both been busy. Some missions less do not signify dismantlement — despite what the underground might be chattering about,” he insisted. And oh, had there been chatter — after all, Yokohama hadn’t lacked Double Black sightings for more than a week in years. “It only means the Port Mafia has been doing well enough not to need its shadows.”

And what if, he didn’t ask, the shadows have no need for existence outside the Port Mafia?

On the encrypted line, the Akutagawas’ names were being whispered insistently. Gently, he rubbed some blood off his nails.

A pause. Hirotsu insisted: “This Ueda mess took a toll on him, even if he’d never admit it — Boss understood that he needed to walk away from those graves of his for a while.”

“As I said — flowers,” he echoed. “And if Boss had some sense, he would execute him for clear insubordination on matters of funerary uses.”

“His friend Hamamoto, the subordinate,” he added. “He was killed this April.”

Dazai’s steps froze only for a moment.

Not a pause that anyone would notice; not relevant enough to lose his phantom race to the entrance Head lolling on his shoulder, strangely shaped eyes open and bright and viciously set on him — Q mouthed a single word.

“Oh,” he commented, offhandedly, walking through the doors. He hoped it sounded balanced; he didn’t care. Q’s lips insisted, though — you, you, you. “Was he, now?”

---

...

---

His phone was ringing.

For unexplainable, blurred reasons, it made Dazai absurdly mad. By the sixth ring, he accepted the call — only to close it in his interlocutor's face, his thumb staining the screen. A trace left behind — a sign of corporeality. The Mafia was all smoke.

In a characteristically well-and-tiredly-used to him fashion, the phone began ringing again less than a quarter of a second later.

Chuuya, he tutted at his careless self, was the excess of it all, and Dazai couldn't even reach the first step of an empty well.

Avoidance means something, he reminded himself, because everything means something. Even a mere means to an end. He let the phone ring and ring — studying the bright display with the same distance that overcame his limbs a bit more every day. The shipping container was buzzing, and the ringing ricocheted against the laminated walls like gunshots. Dazai only had a physical body because his scars said so.

He never answered.

---

...

---

[In a room that wasn't his, at Kouyou's lake villa, he watched Mori sit on the edge of his filled bathtub — evidently unfooled by the too wide grin on Dazai's face.]

"The Mafia's financial assets," the man explained — and no windows cracked, and no thunder struck the earth; because, she'd once said, there were more biblical things than a leash, "As soon as we're back to the city, I will move all of them under your name."

Dazai went through the motions — splashed some water, cheeks stuffed with air; took it all so very not-so-seriously. Not everyday did one receive an inheritance. Not everyday did he gave Mori a futile occasion to believe he had stopped thinking, even just for a moment. The man's eyes traced scars he'd made sure to stitch up with no precision.

What's the point in a wound, he insisted, a bit more gleeful each time. There was less skin with each wound — if the space runs out, Dazai had sometimes mused, he'll simply sew more of it.

"That seems unwise," he let the man know.

"And pretending you believe you can change my mind is a waste of time on both our sides," Mori replied. "It's a good idea, and you know it. It shifts the attention from me — God knows too many are starting to believe that a connection between the namesake of the Corporation and the secret Boss is no conspiracy."

That's not why, he thought.

His amusement had to have shown. Mori flicked a drop of water off his knee. He remembered a year spent in an underground clinic; wondered if it was normal — human — longing for home. He did always long for it. He didn't want to be in that villa; he didn't want to be in those bones. He didn't want to wrap a pen around his fingers with a stolen hair tie, and sign a paper that would make him —

"Moreso," Mori added, like he couldn't read his mind. "The syndicate would be nothing without those assets. I believe they should be shouldered by our most trustworthy hands, shouldn't they?"

The implications were a hiss of summer wind — a weight on his shoulders, always, always, always; a coat never worn correctly. It wasn't hope, he knew — Dazai had none of it. A game, maybe. "Suicidal people are plenty selfish, you know?"

"You wouldn't let us burn," the man tutted, his tongue clicking. "If that was your intention, you would have snapped Q's neck a long time ago," A pause — Dazai studied the line of his nose, slightly crooked from an old accident. "Or Chuuya's, for what's worth."

His fingers curled around the edge of the tub. Body warmth, he considered, was overrated. It was the pulse that was interesting — distracting enough that his lips had no choice but to part.

What ties you?, Odasaku had asked, once. A deck of cards; some forced honesty, even if Dazai had never lost at cards before. The desire to overspill, if it got him more space — if it made it less tight.

Curiosity, he had answered. Then, with all the slyness of a thief — what about you?

"I don't need your permission to die," he said. He imagined it — the Port Mafia in ruins. All the accounts under his name landed in the plastic-fair hands of another organization. And another and another and another — all the same. “And if all these years have given you the sincere belief that I have ever cared for flames, I pity you.”

“Then take a gun and put it in your mouth, Dazai,” Mori’s taunting exasperation was a work of art. A child’s victory. A mixture of poisons on his desk, and the promise that he would show Dazai just how to pour them down his tired throat. “Hasn’t this gotten boring for you too?”)

---

...

---

When the caller tried again, almost three weeks later, Dazai only let the first call go to waste.

That second time, he waited until the fifty eighth second of call — only mildly impressed that the boy hadn’t gotten irritated enough to smash his own phone by the twelfth ring. “You’re calling Dazai Osamu, dog owner extraordinaire,” he mimicked, immediately, with that voice that always annoyed Elise. “We refuse to deal in temporary adoptions — so if that’s why you called, I’m afraid you’ll have no luck. If you’re looking for —“ “Cut that shit out,” Chuuya snapped, from the other side of the phone.

Voices in a language too distant to figure out acted as his background — perhaps in an effort to beat their volume, he had pressed his phone so close to his face, Dazai could hear him breathe.

“Why are you calling me?” he questioned, utterly bored. The boy always sounded weird on the phone — occasional double voices; statics that weren’t meant to be there. Dazai’s limbs stiffened and dozed off all at once. “I told you to delete my number eons ago. Beatrice was still alive and kicking when I told you.”

His mocking sounded a tad too sharp to his own ears. He studied the breathing wound on the dying man at his feet — tilted his head to the side, trying to stretch the sick amusement out.

“You —“ Chuuya let a beat of silence pass; perhaps reevaluating. “Don’t be an asshole.”

Dazai didn’t answer.

“And anyway — I’ve called you since then. And it’s a wonder it didn’t give my phone a virus, you fishy motherfucker.”

“Because you’re obsessed with me.”

“You want to visit the terrestrial orbit?”

Unimpressed, he shut the call.

It took only seven seconds for Chuuya to call again. “You’re calling Dazai Osamu —”

He shut the call again.

Chuuya called again. “Can you stop —”

“You’re calling Dazai —”

“I don’t know if A.I. phone assistant is what you’re going for, but you sound like a dying whale on laxatives.”

Something about the banter was grating on his nerves. “Always so tactful,” he offered, teeth a tad too gritted.

“With you?” Chuuya scoffed.

“I’m a fragile, softhearted maiden.”

“You are a Pharisaical degenerate.”

“Oh,” he cooed, humorless. “Big words.”

There was a steadfast flow of something in his veins; an indescribable urge to smash his phone against the wall and cradle the pieces with the sort of regret only a better being could feel. He hadn’t cared for Chuuya’s lack of announcements — the itch to leave in his fingers had been palpable long before that night in the lake. The itch in his, on the other hand — Dazai couldn’t quite explain it.

Because the dog is pulling the leash, his more rational thoughts let him know. He’d watched one of the new reclutes corner Gin, a few hours before — question the kid on that Double Black he kept hearing so much about.

It’s all true, Gin had said. But nobody’s seen them for a while.

The world is autumn, one of the first people Dazai had ever tortured had told him. And you never notice leaves until the trees are barren.

“Have you finally found your calling all the way through the Alps?” he questioned, leaning down to gather his discarded knife from the body on the floor. The bathroom was a crime scene — he hadn’t been spared from the splashing blood, but the walls and the ceramic furniture were more red than real. “With all the little wood fairies? Will you do us all the favor of just staying there?”

“Fuck you,” Chuuya said, genuinely. “I’m in the middle of a seven hour long train ride. Seven hours long, you get that? I’m so bored I’ve actually started reading my own emails —”

“Why did you call me?”

His breathing caught — clearly irritated.

It was the first Dazai heard of his voice in almost two months; it settled in that space between his ribs that was entirely dedicated to aggravation. “I didn’t.”

“You clearly did.”

“Sat on my phone.”

“Obviously.”

“Do I need an appointment or shit?”

“Yes,” Dazai confirmed, switching to hold the phone between his cheek and shoulder. The man’s corpse — some owner of some front shop of the Mafia who’d been stealing money; and blah, and blah, and blah — was heavier than he seemed; his own grunts, as he dragged him to the closest thing to a curb in that room, were like a ghost’s cries haunting that empty apartment. “I’m devastatingly requested.”

Chuuya’s retch managed to echo even in his bathroom. “I want info on The Catfish.”

“And you called me, because?”

“Nobody was answering on the encrypted line.”

“That’s because the earthquakes broke it.”

“It’s that serious?”

He shrugged, squinting at the destroyed concrete six floors down, behind the only window in the bathroom. You’d know if you were here, he almost said, as natural as an exhale.

Dazai paused.

Ah, he realized, distantly. How silly.

One of the corpse’s rings slipped from his forefinger, as he yanked him out of the bathtub. It made a crystalline, unignorable sound as it landed on the tiles, twirling to a stop — somehow, the creaking, waiting silence from the other side of the phone managed to be louder.

Something like scorn curled up his lips. Not scorn, he mused. Maybe the face Mori made every time Dazai dragged a new pet home.

At last, he landed on: “They’ve finally hired someone to take Matsuda’s place, by the way.”

The silence took a different note.

“You know?” the boy questioned, flat.

“Knew it the second you did it, Hatrack,” Dazai settled the corpse’s mouth on the edge of the bathtub. Squinting, he aimed his foot — crashing it against the skull until he heard teeth fall. “Guess what? I might even know why.”

“I doubt it. Are you killing someone, you sick fuck?”

“I’m Port-Mafia-ing the body, thank you,” He kicked one more time — grabbed his gun from the blood-soaked sink to prepare three bullets. “I do know. Mori’s making me rewrite the standard procedure for traitors. He wants bloodier stuff. All roads lead back to betrayal, do they not?”

It was awkwardly, mercilessly quiet for the entire duration of the shooting process. Dazai studied the bleeding holes in the man’s chest — then, the bleeding gashes from the calluses on his own palms. Shaped like a rifle; like a gun.

Just hang up, he thought, amidst that stilted shared inability to come up with anything to say. It seemed utterly bizarre — the notion that there was any need for that filling at all. The distance and the silence tasted like the too sweet water from the lake — Chuuya’s nails atomising the skin of his cheeks, until Dazai was nothing but aimless particles.

His hands didn’t move.

“What does he look like?” Chuuya asked.

“Who, Matsuda? He was bald.”

His next pause was tactile with irritation. “The poor fucker you’re maiming.”

“Oh,” Dazai tilted his head. “You wanna have phone sex with a corpse? Risky.”

“I ought to eviscerate you.”

“He’s wearing silky underwear.”

“Mackerel.”

“Ugly. But he’s got a nice watch.”

Chuuya hummed. It wasn’t his usual tune, but he pretended it was anyway. “Steal it.”

“Born a Sheep, stay a Sheep,” He hid his gun again. His wristwatch, cracked in the middle, reminded him of Hirotsu’s gift — offhandedly, he added: “You could have just sent me a birthday gift, instead of gloating via Gramps.”

“That would imply any part of your birth is worthy of being celebrated.”

“On that, we can agree.”

“That gives me an itching urge to disagree,” the boy commented, very honestly. There was a tentativeness to him that Dazai couldn’t place. “So? What’s this about an earthshaker?”

Ah, he realized, a bit more stupefied by his slowness. The Slug wants to talk to me.

He weighed his options. There were reports in the dossier he'd abandoned in the car — details on the first of the earthquakes, and on the general population belief that it was no more than an unlucky season. There was Chuuya, too — with that slightly deeper voice he had to have developed somewhere around seventeen, but that Dazai had only noted on his eighteenth birthday; that one time he had whispered on the shell of his ear and Dazai had been goosebumps and empty thoughts only. A familiar off-key breathing, tainted by all the times his ribs had pierced his lungs — the enviable taste of serenity that had stained his whole being since Ueda had been taken out.

Acceptance, Odasaku had once said, is much harder than just letting go.

Dazai could have broken into the boy's old apartment with ease — even the tacky penthouse. He had been sleeping inside the shipping container for more than two months, instead.

I don't know, he'd told his skin, when it had questioned why. Chuuya had grown into him like mold.

"I'm bored," Frustration was fruitless — and thorns were sharper when one didn't know which spot they had prickled. Chuuya had been wind and 100% success rate reports for months — and Dazai had learnt one hundred and twelve new different bank account codes. Here's a story, he would have told him, in another phone call — one that hadn't stained his slug phone charm in blood. Dazai would be Port Mafia until the day that he died, and that was all. "Go bother somebody else."

"You're being childish."

"Say," he offered, casually. "How did killing Matsuda feel?"

Even his sole breathing carried white noises, that time around. "Fuck you," he concluded.

Less touched by the words than he maybe should have felt, Dazai abandoned the shut phone in the bloodied sink.

Chuuya didn't call again.

---

...

---

There was truly not much to do in Hell, once the ground had stopped burning.

“What a dreadful metaphor,” Tanaki let him know, holding up her pink umbrella to cover them both from possible debris. “Do not let the Archivists hear you say there are no more fires to put out, though. Given the amount of paperwork I’ve seen them carry, they might just murder you.”

“Perhaps I should have considered them as a viable way out sooner,” Dazai blinked. “Clever.”

She huffed. “Is it truly convenient to build underground tunnels with an earthquake-maker on the loose?”

“Is it truly convenient to build rooms when the sun’s so warm all day long?” he tutted.

This time, she sighed.

Over the bright yellow safety lines on the floor, men in worker suits stepped into the sewer trails, working on the nearest of the blast doors. The organization had begun building the secret underground escape route at the beginning of the year, under his own orders.

Nobody truly cares about the sewers, he had explained, between yawns, to wide-eyed engineers unwillingly locked in a room with him. We could build a city under there, and the Government wouldn’t find out. Think you can do it in — ah, six, five months? No? Do it anyway. Thanks!

“Considering our current other issues — most of the syndicate believe a quick escape route is the last thing we need,” she insisted, the lower they descended down the uncompleted tunnels.

Led lights and dripping pipes were the only decorations; Dazai dragged his nails over the cracks in the rock. “You mean the moles,” he concluded. “Good thinking — but no spy will be able to roam through these roads, once they’re completed,” He wiggled his eyebrows, handing her the map the engineers had given him. “I’m building a maze.”

Tanaki’s eyes ran over the mess of lines on the paper, fingers tight around the corners. She had lost some weight — Dazai couldn’t pinpoint when. In the dim-lighted shadows, the cross of her facial scars shone brighter than her silver hair.

You’ve been hanging out around me a lot, these days, she’d noted, when he’d dragged her to that worksite. He wasn’t sure if she had been about to call him lonely — or aggravating. Do you have something to confess?

Do you?, Dazai hadn’t asked. Loneliness was a better being’s curse, and he was used to the view behind the glass.

“Or a slippery rat cage,” Tanaki offered, pensively. “Are there any traps?”

“These blast doors can only be opened by authorized people,” he explained, swiftly. “Should someone else attempt to, they would be blown into pieces. Adding traps would be too easy —

a quick fear. Over so soon; barely felt. Isn't it scarier if a lost soul gets to believe it can leave — only to starve in its attempts to escape?

From a three tunnels way on their left, the echoes of a whistling worker ricocheted against the walls — sweating to turn eerie.

Dazai smiled. "I really like this place."

"Because you like mazes," she asked. "Or because you like ways out?"

He tilted his head to the side. "I'm not sure. What do you think?"

"I certainly can't decide it for you," the woman replied, smiling a bit, indulgent. "You're the one who woke up and decided to turn the sewer system into our personal getaway car."

He kicked some pebbles off; watched them scratch the leather of his shoe — three clean lines, white like scars, appearing and vanishing under the flickering neons.

Mori hadn't liked the idea much.

Should have thought about it before you gave me the assets, he had thought, petty. I'm not crazy, Dazai had told the cat outside his container, that night. But isn't it fun that he wonders?

Hell had gotten boring pretty soon. Mori was always holed up in his office, preparing some grand plan to gain the Ability Permit — only, he refused to admit it plainly, so Dazai was left to scratch at his door. Kouyou and Ace didn't even bother hating him out loud. The subordinates had stopped writing his names in blood on the walls.

The letters arrived very scarcely. In each of them, badly spelled and terribly wrong —

"How would you escape?" he asked.

Tanaki blinked, caught off guard. "Oh?"

The whistling workers started another tune. Dazai fixed his coat, and watched something crimson float down the sewer trail. "Never mind."

---

...

---

Mori found him among the remains of the last GPA battalion, their brains wriggling out of their crashed skulls.

“I’m surprised you decided to take care of this yourself,” the man commented, walking slow steps not to drag his scarf into the blood. “Some of the Lizards could have gone. Or Akutagawa.”

“Was bored,” Dazai shrugged. “Explaining to Elise why I can’t braid her hair all day long gets tiring, you know? You just couldn’t have gifted her with the awareness of being an Ability?”

The doctor smiled. “You think she doesn’t know?”

He nudged one of the nearby corpses, trying to figure out if the sound he’d heard came from its mouth or its gaping, wretched abdomen.

The last battalion had shared the same astonishment as the Boss — they’d mumbled about how the underground had sworn that Double Black was not around anymore, and then they’d mumbled about being important enough to be pursued by the Demon Prodigy. And then Dazai and the Secret Force had killed them.

And now he was late for Bar Lupin.

“Still,” Mori insisted, because he was stupid to the root. “You’ve been awfully efficient — since the accounts’ ownership switch.” Dazai snapped his fingers towards the Secret Force members, directing them towards the missing limbs of some corpses. Black vans surrounded the abandoned warehouse where they had found them; moonlight entered from the shattered roof in shards shaped like cell bars. “Unless you want me to believe you’re finding a real vocation for —“ “What age do you think I’ll kill you?” Dazai asked, once he could freely turn to the man.

Mori didn’t even blink.

Neither did the men surrounding them — had they even heard the convo, they wouldn’t have taken it for more than a joke. Dazai had made sure of it the moment he’d landed on his knees in front of the man’s red scarf — munching on nothing with his head as low as it was convenient.

“Twenty three, I’ve theorized,” the doctor said, after thinking about it for a bit. He scratched his chin like a distracted child. “Or eighteen.”

“That second one is rather close.”

“All is,” He shrugged. “It depends on how long you can last without it.”

Dazai gathered some fallen bullets from the ground, pocketing them. “It?” he questioned.

His smile stained his face like a fingerprint drawing. “The belief that you’re doing something with a point to it.”

Existence is more than a question, Odasaku had said once. Ango had found it rather funny. He had been somewhat drunk, though — perhaps the only reason why he'd been honest enough to utter: and thank God for that. Who'd answer?

Faster than either of them could plan for, Dazai raised his gun, and pointed it to the man's chest.

A breath passed.

"Ahh," Dazai lowered the gun, whining just a bit. It sounded poisonous to his own teeth; but all Mori did was blink. "This is just as boring."

The man offered him a hand. "Come with me," he encouraged, almost empathetic. He hadn't looked at the gun; not even for a second. "I know something that might not be."

The Under Port was unusually crowded — a bustle of men in orange lab uniforms hurried in and out of the organs harvesting rooms, oxygen masks fogging up with every drag of their carriers. Open doors leading to the actual morgue framed an eerily silent theater of corpses, hidden by white sheets and wheeled to the furnaces. Behind the glasses of makeshift operation rooms, murmuring doctors were studying the eye-reflexes of Users — enemies who hadn't complied with their joining offers.

"I wonder if they've taken down Q's room, by now," Mori mused, leading him down a staircase Dazai had never glanced at. "Sentimentalism might have left it as it was."

"And who is supposed to be missing them?" Dazai replied. "The corpses?"

"Aren't they allowed?"

"What a bother it would be."

The doctor conceded.

Shizuka Kanei was an old man shaped like a question mark, bearing an oddly long white beard with the ashy tips half burned off. His glasses were round and awfully thick — it took him a moment, when he turned from the work table of the little laboratory carved in a nook of the Under Port, to squint and recognize Mori's silhouette.

"Boss," he exclaimed, in a frail, high voice, bending theatrically at the knee. "Haven't seen you on this haunted floor of mine in a while."

"He has his own Haunted Floors," Dazai let him know, immediately skipping to rusted shelves of what he recognized as urns. The room was barely wide enough to turn, but the walls were entirely sculpted to fit that crowd of ceramic, stone, and wooden decorations. The work table in the middle of that space was a mess of tools and projects, staining the blacksmith's fingers black. "But those are much uglier than these!"

"Thank you," Mori sighed. "Master — I was hoping I could have Dazai take a look at some of your works. He's eighteen now —"

“You made him wait that long?” the man scoffed. “Men have died younger. What would you have had him do? Store his ashes in a plastic bag?”

“I thought our ashes were meant for the Bay,” Dazai questioned, exchanging lids from the nearest boxes. Dreamily, he added: “Like polluted debris and luckier suicidal comrades.”

“Excuse me?”

“Ashes are gathered before they’re thrown in the sea,” the doctor explained, peeking from the other side of an urn Dazai had put to eye level. “It is a rather short lived coffin, but one nonetheless. You should be mindful of your choice.”

He squinted. “Did you pick one?”

Mori’s smile was just a hint of teasing.

“I did!” Elise exclaimed, out of physically nowhere, peeking from behind his legs. “Rintarou lacks the necessary taste for something that fun.”

“Dear,” the Master flinched. He bowed, the piece of ceramic between his hands shattering from the surprise. “Miss Elise — I didn’t hear you come in.”

“She’s sneaky,” Dazai said, conspiratorial. “A little ghost, really.”

She hmpf!-ed, displeased. The glint in Mori’s eyes wasn’t particularly friendly when it set on him. Master Shizuka Kanei cleared his throat in an awkward, understanding bow. “Take your time, Boss. Executive. I’ll go check on today’s ashes.”

“How secretive you can be,” Dazai noted, a good ten seconds before the man had even closed the heavy door behind him. “It’s a box. I doubt it would be useful in any overthrowing scheme.”

“To be absolutely honest with you, Dazai, I had completely forgotten about the urn.”

He curled an eyebrow, jumping on the tool table to rest his bored legs. He watched the doctor make his rounds around the breath-squeezing lines of the room, searching for his own urn — because Dazai had asked, and Mori rarely didn’t comply. In a clear temper tantrum, Elise stepped up to his tool table, arms crossed and head pushed as far as it was possible before they came into contact — Dazai did the same, pouting, allowing her to feel the ghost of his forehead on her own. A challenge that wouldn’t happen, but that tore a giggle out of her sadistic lips all the same, as she squeezed her eyes in fake effort.

They didn’t touch — they would never touch again.

“Tanaki reminded me, actually.”

“One of these days, that poor woman will implode from the sheer amount of information she has to remember in our stead.” Dazai noted. “A cruel fate for such a beautiful face. She’ll regret not having accepted my offer, when —“

“It seemed strangely poetic, at the time,” Mori insisted, picking a box from an undescriptive shelf. He felt his spine straighten with unexplained attention. “She was actually the one to inform me about the tradition. I was — quite unsure of how to proceed, after the old Boss’ demise,” A sigh, “And none of the old Executives wanted to deal with his remains. How sad. Dazai, should I ever end up that violently disliked, do you promise to sneak in and gather me in this pretty thing?”

“Let him rot in that stupid chair of his,” Elise ordered, petty, as Dazai grabbed the urn he was thrown. She glared at the man. “Maybe it will teach him to call my drawings original.”

“It was a compliment, dear!” Mori swore.

“It wasn't! And you suck!”

“Elise,” he sighed. “You break my heart.”

The urn was offensively simple — a box of dark wood, with no silver or golden decorations; only the carved lines of the Mafia symbol on top of the removable lid. It was certainly elegant, but so unpretentious it had to have a point. Dazai ran his fingers on the rough, crooked inside, and felt some faraway corner of his mind whine for attention.

He shut the lid. “All this secrecy for an ugly box?”

Elise pointed at him, vindicated.

“I thought you might want some privacy to pick your own,” Mori replied, easily. Tilting his head, he added: “And to discuss what Fumiko Enchi has to say about our last Division mole.”

He curled an eyebrow, jumping down from the table. All fake distraction, his eyes roamed over the shelves and the urns, unable to stick. Dazai did his very best to imagine ashes where his hands were tapping furniture — did his very best to imagine what the funerary version of a shipping container would look like. The idea of death was a balm; the idea of being spread in those same waters he never managed to drown into was a blessing.

Dazai didn't quite want to be in a box.

Nonetheless, he reminded himself. Steps and necessities and whatever else. It might be boring if it was effortless, Odasaku had once said. He would just ask him what urn he had picked — and choose accordingly.

“Fumiko left the dungeons,” Dazai said. “Is Ane-san still having fun tormenting her for info?”

“It's the whole reason why she let her join her ranks,” Mori replied. “Not to mention, the sole reason why she was even allowed to join ours. She's already uncovered seven moles. Fumiko is all but stupid — she understands the conditions Chuuya put on the table.”

The sound of Chuuya's name out of his mouth made some tauntingly irritated thing in his veins itch. Dazai ignored it in favor of taking a step back when Elise boredly began kicking the foot of the table, twirling her gown from side to side.

“Do you understand them?” he asked.

“His business is his business,” Boss offered, wholly insincere. “After that whole Hamamoto — what matters is that he broke her enough to make her functional. Your friend,” he added, belatedly and entirely out of place. “Has he picked an urn? I remember you telling me he’s older than you.”

Distant pipes and nearby chests creaked. A sizzling, overwhelming rage of sorts made Dazai’s fingers twitch — he bit his cheek to blood, and did not care anymore. “What silly phrasing.”

“Fumiko swears she can’t say the name of the last mole,” the man continued, once he realized he wouldn’t answer. Mori had never been one to let awkwardness linger — his most secret plans, either. “It must be an Ability User.”

“When isn’t it?” he sighed — studying the underside of a cone-shaped urn. Not for you, some voice in his head that sounded like Ango, unless it wanted to be kind, tutted. None of these are. At his very root, Dazai suspected, he was made for some forgotten street in a corner of the world — fleshy remains that would leave more quietly than he had ever been allowed to live.

“She did manage to let us know this mole has been here since the Nine Rings Conflict.”

He paused.

“I remember that conflict,” Elise mused, on the ground. Her red skirt spread on the tiles like fresh, scarlet blood — she was too bright for the gloomy light of the Under Port. It only served to make her look more like an unnatural addiction. “It wasn’t very fun. Nobody had time to play. And the corpses were smelly. And those tattoos — “

“The tattoo maker,” Dazai concluded, once his brain had gathered the missing pieces. “It’s the one Nine Rings member we didn’t manage to find. And the tattoos had unclear abilities, correct? A communicator. A —“ He paused again.

Mori’s smile was gracious. “The half moon tattoos born of Ueda Akinari’s — ah, nightmarish virus. I’m slightly ashamed that neither of us made that connection sooner.”

He frowned. “But why would a Nine Ring member accept to collaborate with the Division?”

Some faraway screeches reached that corner of the Under Port — the melody that never rested and never inhaled. Elise set her ear on the door — curious of details she seemed to forget whenever she wasn’t material in one place for too long. Mori directed him a long, pointed gaze.

“Ah,” Dazai dropped the urn on the shelf, endlessly bored. “Revenge. Et cetera, et cetera.”

“You know, it is a noble purpose.”

“Is it? It just feels awfully redundant.”

“Have you never wished for vindication?”

“Have you?” he questioned.

“What for?” Mori replied. “The Mafia has already killed those who were brave enough not to bow their heads. Fumiko Enchi is the only mole we haven’t burned, and she’s proving herself useful. I carry no grudges for dead men.”

“I did let you get shot.”

“You?” He smiled, amused. “No revenges between us, Dazai. We hardly have time for those. I do hope you will not perceive this visit as a —“

Dazai squinted at the hand drawn projects on the table, noncommittal. “Taunt?”

“I was going to say threat, actually.”

He snorted. Mori cleaned dust from his coat, as if unaware the crimson of his scarf was the same shade as his Ability’s dress — as if there had not been a point to it; to all — and then he hid laughter under a bowed head.

Your friend, Dazai recalled. Has he picked?

They laughed quietly — a secretive shake of shoulders that rattled the room and every particle of ash inside the urns. Laughing, Dazai reached out and tapped the center of Elise’s forehead.

Mori’s smile froze in place.

Blinking, he wiped his hand on his own coat. Elise disappeared so imperceptibly it was a hiss of unmaterialized air — not even the childish echo of her fabricated breath remained.

“Oops,” he offered, a bit sincere. He met the men’s eyes, and wasn’t sure he knew what the swirl of thoughts behind them meant. Not fear, the voice that wasn’t Ango mused. Odasaku, maybe. But maybe it was better to keep the two of them away from each other. Chuuya was already a leash he couldn’t vocalize; one he’d have to distract him from. Not fear, but what else? “Anyway. Can you help me with the urn? I’m lost here.”

A beat.

“Of course,” the doctor concluded. Forced, but not entirely. Dazai knew what to call victories — that wasn’t quite it. The fool who had promised to kill him was, in spite of it all, picking his grave. “We’ll find you something.”

In a daring, equal-odds throw, Dazai asked: “Do you know anything about the death of that one subordinate of Chuuya’s? Hamamoto?”

Not a muscle twitched in Mori's pale face. It was a clear signal — disinterest in the topic, and some perplexion at being questioned on it. "Only that it was a mission loss," he offered. "Why?"

Jumping from behind his legs again, Elise hummed some song he didn't recognize, pawing at the urns on the shelves like a misbehaving cat. If she had noticed she'd been gone, she didn't act like it. Dazai settled against the table — pretended not to notice how the man had just lied to him.

In a twirl of polished shoes and Mori's scarf-tinged gowns, Elise's hums turned familiar. Chuuya's obsessive, calming tune ricocheted on the walls — only relatively louder than the shrieks of torture behind the door.

Mori tilted his head at him, spotless.

"Don't worry about it," Dazai concluded.

---

...

---

There was this dream he had, sometimes.

Every corner of it was hazy — indistinct all the way to the trembling, breathy whispers against his chapped lips; blurry to the tips of his limbs, all flames that itched and called. The mouth never touched his own, but it tried — parted lips, broken on something too quiet to be more than his name.

Dazai could only breathe back. The tip of a nose on his cheek — his own fingers under leather, choking pulse points.

Breathe, the lips mouthed, sometimes.

Never upon his own. On longer nights, they parted underneath his jaw, where the spears from the dungeons would exit when he stabbed them from the top of a prisoner's skull. Breathe, they would say, in his ear. Dazai had claws where his hands were meant to be, and he bled out that dot of warmth upon him until there was nothing left — and the lips murmured his name anyway.

"Shitty."

Barely adjusted to the cold metal between his cheek and shoulder, Dazai kept his eyes on the mess of voiceless cries and wounds in front of him, and questioned: “Have you shortened it? Usually it’s shitty Dazai. Or, shitty bastard. Or —“

There was a pause of surprise, as if Chuuya hadn’t truly expected him to respond.

The lights of the dungeons were low and buzzing — they carved caves and lighter hills on the victim’s skin. He was too tired to do more than struggle weakly against the restraints around his wrists, holding him to the old chair — dirtied in too many people’s blood.

Dazai dragged the tip of his knife down the side of his face. “You wanted to know how it felt to kill Matsuda,” Chuuya said, brusquely. The tone, he recognized, was a bit drunk. “That’s how. Like a load of revolting, smelly, never ending shit.”

The man groaned around blood landing in his mouth. Dazai offered: “Necessary protocol.”

“I know it was necessary protocol, jackass,” the boy replied. Apart from the usual statics, there was a strange texture to his voice — familiar in a way he couldn’t pinpoint. Echoey, as if stuck in a bathroom of ceramic tiles. “I guess — a part of me sort of wanted to believe his whole, bring you to the light, spiel had some truth to it.”

He paused. “You wanted that to be true?”

“Not for me,” Chuuya scoffed — and that made sense. “But someone like Murase would have saved the Sheep some pain, had I been less —“

He trailed off. Dazai took advantage of the pause, well aware of just how long it would last, to momentarily mute the call. He lifted the victim’s chin with the knife — leaned close enough to have him gaze right into his empty, disinterested eyes.

“I don’t care if you die now or later,” he let the man know. “I’ll get what I want out of you all the same. But you care, don’t you?”

“I...” the man stuttered, wetly. “Please, I—“

“Who’s the other mole?”

“Please. Please, I can’t —“

Some button in his brain switched off — he turned the knife and sliced the man’s lips until they parted, allowing him to sever his tongue. The morbid coagulation landed on the ground admits his shrieks; Dazai directed him a gaze that had him falling quiet.

“Now you’ll have to find another way to let me know,” he sighed. “Shh. I’m on a call.”

He unmuted the phone right as Chuuya let out a mumble: “Less — something. I suppose I’d hoped Matsuda could be like him. Plenty brats in need of help,” Humorlessly, he chuckled. “Turns out he sold that possibility just to investigate the Mafia. So I guess not.”

The victim contorted as quietly as possible, tears and snot and blood turning his face into a mess of contemporary art and regret.

Dazai leaned against one of the thin metal columns — quickly added to the decor once The Catfish's Ability had started to make buildings fall. He focused a tad more on the whistley, squelching background of the call, and questioned: “Did you call me from the middle of a couple’s bed?”

“Hilarious,” Chuuya spat — effortless in the ease of their circling orbits. But it recovered the tense lining it had had since Kouyou’s villa far too soon; the boy cleared his throat. “I got stabbed.”

He paused. The drunken tone made sense, at least. “You got stabbed?”

“It can happen. Haven’t slept in three days, what with the fucking Bureau of American Idiots.”

“You got stabbed.”

A beat. “With a piece of streetlight.”

“Oh,” Dazai said. “Oh, that’s karma.”

The squelching hum got easier to visualize with that context — the familiar picture of a blood stained bathroom; Chuuya, curled up by the tub, framed by a mess of alcohol, bandages, and needles that should’ve probably been disinfected more.

The pulsing texture of a wound on his side, oozing blood with every inhale; the indents left on his lower lip with every prickle of the needle. The boy had a tendency to pull his burnt strand of hair when hiding pain. Acutely, Dazai felt the uncanny urge to have him reachable — near his crooked fingers, to study and to mock and to make sure he existed.

Dazai listened to his distant, erratic breath, and opened his mouth.

Chuuya arrived first: “So,” he started, with a cheerfulness that was all vitriol. The gulp from the alcohol he’d just ingested as morphine echoed against his ear. “Did you deal with the GPA?”

He frowned, observing the pee stain on the man’s chair. Hot, liquid metal bubbled in the glass he’d had Tanaki carry him — he watched it spin, as the man’s eyes followed with horror. “Why do you sound annoyed by it?” Dazai asked. “Did they own some dogs that happened to be your cousins?”

“‘Cause your power trips annoy me,” the boy huffed. “You know — you could have let me know you didn’t want help against them yourself. No need to have Boss be your messenger.”

Dazai paused.

He poured the first drops of metal over the man’s turned arm, following the bluest of the veins on the inside. The man screamed loud enough to snap his tense vocal chords — a drenched, rough shriek. Thoughts swirled in his mind faster than he could weave them into something sensible. Mori's grin — bent over reports that carried the Double Black name. The face he had made when Chuuya had entered the bathroom at Kouyou's villa — the way he'd immediately, irrevocably known that the boy was lying just for Dazai.

But you trust him, he'd said. Don't you?

He asked: "Could I have?"

"I could have come back a weekend to help out," Chuuya insisted — trying too hard to sound casual. "Our international deals are a mess, given half of our contacts turned out to be moles — but it's not that bad. But I guess you had it all sorted out or fucking whatever."

The man bawled his heart out. The glass stayed permanently tilted — hiding that vein and rising goosebumps among burned flesh.

"Oh," Dazai said. "That."

Chuuya grumbled some more. There was a metallic click! and a sharp hiss that signaled he had begun digging into his skin for fragments; Dazai's fingers spasmed with the memory of his blood — the breathing franticness of his viscera, no matter how desperate Arahabaki's grip on it was.

Touch me, he'd said. Don't make me beg.

Strangely, he felt like laughing.

It was an absent, pungent need, these days — a phantom limb for a haunted house. He smiled when they brought new prisoners to the chambers and he smiled when Oda toasted a drink. The road was always the same. His bed always creaked in the same spot. If there was a point, Dazai didn't —

He poured the last of the liquid metal over an indefinite spot between the man's spasming clavicles. He asked: "Have you ever thought about killing Mori?"

Only static remained on the phone.

Somewhat resigning himself to be hung up on — subjected to the offense of a boy who knew when he was being played with; suicidal enough to pull the leash on the most loyal dog around — all of Dazai's mind returned to the squirming man in front of him, watching the bubbling blood in his newly empty mouth splatter on his own shirt.

"Nothing to say?" he insisted. "Ah. Sorry. I can have a piece of paper brought to you."

His eyes were rolling in opposite directions from the delirium of pain. He whined wordlessly, choking on tear-stained laments — and he began nodding his head forward, towards the stairs.

"I can't let you go," Dazai informed him.

The man howled, rattling the chair.

“Five times.”

He stilled.

Chuuya’s voice had something different to it. He couldn’t put his fingers on it — Dazai felt, rather absurdly, that he would have gladly cracked his own ribs open for a chance to hear it whispered and understand. Inhales and exhales were deeper — he could see his gloves, abandoned over the sink in that way that always got them soaked and got him whiny about it; could see his calloused fingers, that scar they both had to crook their thumbs, as they fixed the red crater of his chest.

He delivered that answer quietly. Dazai had been shot, last week — Mori had patched him up as a favor, and as a reminder. The wound throbbed with something that was almost envious.

Touch me, he recalled. Don’t make me beg.

“That’s more than I have,” he offered.

A huff, almost amused — too terrified to be so. Fear didn’t fit anywhere on Chuuya’s bones — but those weren’t words to be muttered aloud, and he was saying them anyway.

“I don’t believe that for a second, bastard,” he rebutted. His voice had lowered into the pained, drunken, deep hum it became when he was done bantering mid-stitching up.
“Sometimes you look at him like —”

He didn’t continue.

Dazai watched the dying man in front of him rot, and he recovered his knife from his hand. It took a piece of his fingers with it — grabbing him by the chin, he insisted: “Even when they shot him, last year — I can’t see it.”

“I can.”

“Yeah?”

A distant exhale — a piece of metal landing on tile. “He’s a man. I’ve imagined worse.”

Like what?, he ached to ask.

Over his head, a panel of lights flickered. In the blink it became darker than lighter, he dared: “Tell me how.”

For a long moment, Chuuya didn’t speak. The leash, he thought, mind in a haze that was red and was black. The leash got longer and the leash got shorter, and at the end of it was always —

“Slashing his throat,” he dared, eventually, all in one go. An exhale that matched the first of the stitches he gave himself in that second wound; the sound tickled Dazai’s memory.

“People in the settlement used to tell stories about that scarf. Said you couldn’t kill him if you didn’t cut that, too.”

“That’s stupid,” He didn’t know when his hand had moved — but it had, anyway. Dazai let it trace the Adam’s apple of the man in front of him — a clean line, like the ones Chuuya left whenever Tainted got too boring for the hunt.

“He felt so — untouchable. They had to make their myths.”

“And?”

“Poison.”

“That wouldn’t work.”

“It would,” Chuuya insisted. Strategist and murderer and everything the Mafia had needed him to be — everything Dazai had forced him to call himself, in the esoteric quest of keeping up with a shared lifeline neither of them would admit to. “The tactile kind. You could —“ He gasped, cursing out an accidental wound from the needle. “‘Could put it on Elise.’”

Dazai realized it, belatedly. He hates himself for thinking this.

The man under his hands was screaming. Warmth trickled down Dazai’s back like sweat, gathering by his wrists and some lower part of his guts — clenching. “She’s his Ability, though.”

A distant snort. “Look at what mine does to me.”

“Oh,” he noted. “And?”

“Drop the building on him.”

He paused.

“The Headquarters?”

“Bury him underneath them,” he sounded both self-deprecatative and utterly disgusted by his own words. “I thought about it. In his office. He wouldn’t have been able to stop me. He wouldn’t even have screamed. I —“ A drunken laughter left his lips. “That’s stupid. I’d never do that, that’s —“

He studied the ceiling; spiderwebs and old blood. “I know you wouldn’t.”

“I care about him,” Chuuya noted. It was the tone he’d used when he’d asked, did you read my files? “In spite of it all, I — would he even die?”

I don’t know, Dazai wanted to say. And — would it even be the right thing, if he did?

When he opened his eyes again, the man in the chair was dead in front of him, head crushed in blackened pieces against his backrest. He stumbled, no one there to see him anymore — hurt the small of his back against the edge of the tool table; sunk his nails in his own wrist, analytical.

Real, he thought, corporeal.

“Chuuya,” he tried.

“S okay,” he snapped, lighthouse and flame to the moths. There was a thud! — his head against the bathtub, maybe. Dazai saw a known painting — sunkissed, spasming fingers slipping gloves on. He was drunk. He wouldn’t remember a thing of being a traitor — and Dazai would be stuck there, hands gripping his own flesh, feverish and alone next to a corpse. “It’s just shitty talks.”

Mori’s eyes, he thought. Mori’s eyes over the tunnel of a gun. Mori’s eyes, turning the same red as his scarf — as the blood in his hands. Mori’s eyes over urns Dazai couldn’t pick — what about that friend of yours?

But he won’t, he reminded himself. Chuuya had promised it himself — he was just a man. He had always feared Dazai just a bit more than he had feared himself. He won’t.

“I’d do it with my hands,” he offered.

A sound escaped from Chuuya’s inhale. A tad too entrancing; a tad too connected to the guts Dazai had never managed to scoop out of his own unwilling carcass. He felt himself slump forward as if praying, and concluded: “Just talks.”

“Just talks,” the boy agreed. Because he was better than Dazai — and he never would. A bit of a mock: “Everything for our organization.”

“Until our blood runs black,” he concluded.

Mori would have executed them where they stood — cut their heads in the same blade-hit; impaled them on the same spear; burned them by the same match. Here lies Double Black, he would have joked. He made the ugliest of jokes, and Dazai never laughed. Here lies Double Black, created by their killer.

Anticlimactic as an earthquake — Chuuya let out an exhausted, drunken burp.

“Sorry,” he squeaked.

Dazai felt himself snort, weak and distant.

He wished, horridly and unexplainably, to sleep in that old futon of Chuuya’s — where he wouldn’t have touched him, but the possibility would have been there. Dazai, Mori had sworn, tends to linger. And the lingering did not touch — the lingering just breathed.

“Chuuya,” he echoed — like his flesh could not force him to breathe by sheer stubbornness. Like it needed to be reminded that for a blink — he’d been fifteen and wanting to live.

The boy had forgotten all about the call, it seemed — the sound of his steps around the room was faraway. Drunken stumbling and drunken curses; he didn't speak to him again. Dazai slid on the floor, silent and facing the corpse.

He listened to him hum that tune of his by the speakerphone until the battery died.

---

...

---

"The Sheepdog?" Ango echoed, flatly. "Are you trying to be funny?"

"I'm not trying," Dazai replied, knocking on the yellow security helmets the workers on the club's construction side had given them. The chaos of tools and nearby end-of-summer waves was almost overwhelming — despite his friend's wince, he ended up screaming: "I'm nailing it."

A boringly endless, never trafficked bridge connected Yokohama to the artificial island where the Suribachi City settlement rested; a cablesless road that only freight transports and police officers ever drove through. At the end of the bridge, right on the plain, undescriptive entrance to that island — with a club, because what better place to gather fees and information on what would, inevitably, become a new territory of theirs — the Port Mafia had begun to put Chuuya's renovation project in place.

What, he made this?, he had asked, when presented with Mori's latest approved business. I didn't know he knew how to spell "architectural".

Hirotsu hadn't been impressed.

"I just feel like it would be a nice tribute," Dazai hadn't been that close to Suribachi since he was fifteen. The settlement was too far to see, but the panorama was intensely familiar — the smell of ruins; the taste of rust and oil. The eyes of curious children, bad at spying. "Who in Suribachi doesn't remember the Sheep? It might even make them more amenable to the enterprises crowding their tiny dog houses."

"So you want to show off your partner?"

"No, the point is to irritate him."

"Clearly," Ango muttered.

The Shepdog was set to open sometime by the beginning of October; the skeleton of the club was already evident, following lines Dazai could see Chuuya had partially stolen from the Gentlemen's Club. But that place had been a hit before they had torn it apart, so he could privately appreciate it. The boy's projects were an organized mess — he knew the settlement better than anyone else, and the funds he'd calculated and the reconstruction he had planned showed it almost annoyingly.

The club is for the Mafia, he had written, in the report. It should be placed in an obnoxiously visible spot. The settlement will owe us. It will do them good to be reminded of it.

"Is it truly a good idea to direct this project while The Catfish is roaming around?" Dazai asked — hanging off Ango's elbow as the man checked developments with the few mafiosi guards around. "I mean, one blow of the big bad wolf and this is all ending up underwater."

"Not quite," the man replied, distractedly. "The island has several levels left from the military base. An earthquake would make them visible. It would take a deep crack to reach the Bay," Then, he squinted at him. "The Catfish will be caught soon, anyway. The Division and the Mafia have the same target, for once — he won't last long."

"The Division has been laying incredibly low these past few months," he observed.

Something complicated tightened his traits. "Maybe it has found something more concerning than a familiar — if bloody — neighbor."

"The Rats?" he guessed.

"No," Ango cleared his throat. "Someone who wishes to be dethroned as much as the Division wishes to dethrone them," He rattled his knuckles on the dossier. "Makes you wonder how long this will last, given that premise."

Dazai hummed, rhythmically kicking the side of Ango's shoes. In a fit of inspiration, he sat by the edge of the wooden deck, sticking his legs in the freezing, greyish waters — gathering the man's disgusted protest. He waited until he was done writing down whatever Archivists needed to know about their new front, and asked: "Ango, have you picked an urn?"

A glance. "I have, yes."

"What does it look like? No! Wait. Don't tell me. I bet I can guess."

"Can you?"

"It's probably boring," Dazai huffed. "And monochrome. And cubic."

"What's wrong with cubes?"

"Everything? Is cube tragic or —"

"Comic," Ango tapped his forehead with his pen, two times — he whined. "Obviously. Tell me you didn't pick a — I don't even know. Does the Master fabricate crab-shaped urns?"

Dazai lit up like a Christmas tree.

“What — no. No, Dazai — I was kidding, Dazai, don’t you —“

Once the evening sky had turned into a fit stage for the moon, they left the construction site — though he made sure to push Ango off the deck the moment the workers were faraway enough. He skipped his way to the man’s car over the sound of his cursed complaints, and didn’t wait to hear the squeaking melody of his wet shoes to fit himself in the passenger seat, cradling his console.

Ango had words to offer once he got inside the car — soaked to the bone and drenching every inch of the seat and the steering wheel. Dazai only half zoned out from them — rocked by the mean tilt of his frustrated tone as much as someone else would have been by a lullaby.

Suribachi City got more and more blurred in the rear view mirror the further they ran down the bridge.

The settlement hides potential, as every part of this city, Chuuya’s reports had promised. Dazai burned with it, at times — the sheer number of things most people seemed to be devoted to. His own nonbeliever hands, always reaching. For too long it has been put at disadvantage, on account of a cursed birth it cannot truly be faulted.

Chuuya, he considered, clinking his tongue, was obsessed with finding mirrors.

“The urn,” Ango said, eventually.

He still sounded gruff, but Dazai had used his own tie to dry his glasses — so now he drove right under the speed limit, and occasionally asked strangely expert questions about his video game. I work in hacking too, remember?

“What about it?” Dazai asked.

“Haven’t you picked it yet?”

“Mori brought me,” He shrugged. “I can’t say any of them particularly called me.”

That got his head to tilt — scrutinizing in that way Dazai sometimes felt from the side of the Bar Lupin counter. Both Odaaku and Ango knew the boy in their middle was more than what shown — both knew reputations came from facts, most of the time. They had never seemed scared of him — but they had never not been cautious.

I would break my skull for you, Dazai had once wanted to tell them.

Helpless like a child; on his tiptoes, to reach their heights and show that he deserved that spot because of something more than whatever the Port Mafia saw in him. Perhaps death was no gift from a man who had been waiting for his last heartbeat; but pain could be. I would let it heal.

“I didn’t think you would care that much,” Ango commented, after a bit.

“I don’t,” he replied. There was no better way to vocalize — I picked a shipping container to remember there was nothing worth staying for and I ought to pick an urn like my ashes will even look like everyone else’s. Odasaku had promised Bar Lupin was a place like no other — a room worth living a bit longer to see. Apart from Bays, apart from urns — that was where Dazai wanted to rest.

Dazai didn’t want to rest anywhere — not in windswept ashes, not in a room; not breathing and not dying. His fingers tickled — he had to sit on them to keep from tearing the car door open.

Right as he blinked and reminded himself he didn’t particularly care whether he did it or not, Ango snapped the locks on.

“Boring,” he huffed, too whiny for his dry throat.

“Odasaku needs to start smacking you,” the Archivist mumbled, glaring at him. The lights of the bridge reflected on his thin glasses frame — he was pale and stressed. “You can pick whatever you want, Dazai. No one’s going to grade you on this.”

“But it has to be pretty,” he insisted. “It will host my ashes, once my life mission finally reaches its end! It should be worthy of whatever beauty I persuade to share that end with me. What if my fated love picks a stunning, incomparable urn and I accidentally select something that will offend her gaze? I would have to end my life. Again.”

“Your fated love is dead, in this scenario,” Ango informed him. “She won’t care.”

“Of course she will. It’s the most important journey we will ever venture through,” Dazai let his game character lose the level, allowing himself to hit the man’s shoulder with the console. “Ango, you really don’t get it.”

He sighed. “Not quite, not.”

“I ought to execute you for it,” he warned.

The man didn’t seem convinced. “And then what — it will teach every other mafioso not to doubt the beauty of double suicide?”

“One life lost for the good of the syndicate is a shame, but not a dealbreaker,” he recited. “That’s what Mori always says.”

Ango made a face.

“What? You don’t agree?”

“Did you think I would?”

“You seem very pragmatic,” he offered.

The Archivist squinted at the faraway light of some speeding motorcycle. “One life for many — it’s always been the belief of my previous Boss, too. I never did like it. It feels...”

Conflictual scars passed by his eyes. “Diminishing. A life is a life.”

Dazai thought back to his piles over piles of necrologies. “Ango, why did you join the Mafia?”

Few cars crowded the bridge that late in the night — they could have gone faster, but the Archivist loved to enjoy the drive. Privately, where he couldn’t be heard, Dazai liked to imagine he was trying to make those lifts of theirs last longer. He watched his fingers tap the steering wheel — eyes squinting at something unreachably, past the old concrete and the framing Bay.

Odasaku and Ango never expected honesty from him. Dazai knew. The Executive position, the bandages, the curve of his grins — he had long since destroyed any possibility of having their trust be based on something more than instinct.

And yet he kept asking. Undeservedly, they kept giving.

“Because I have a mission,” Ango offered, toneless. “And I intend to see it to an end.”

He studied the lights. “How beautiful.”

“Remember when Boss sent me to Europe two years ago?” he insisted. “It was a difficult task. I had to make my way through one of the most hostile organizations I ever —” His knuckles grew pale — painted golden by distant fireworks from the mainland. “It really is a headache, you know?”

“What is?”

“Never being able to forget who the enemy is.”

Dazai traced the fireworks’ pattern on his face, following the blue lines — his favorites. “And does it help?” he asked. “Remembering it?”

“No,” Ango said, curtly. “Not at all.”

He took the hit in silence.

The Archivist didn’t allow it to last. “The Mafia is just like any other place, Dazai,” he said — with an intensity that was uncharacteristic; thus, it had to carry the weight of lengthy thinking. Dazai wondered when Ango found the time for it — in the middle of necrologies no one had asked him to write; between sips of a drink while Odasaku spoke of past endeavors. Perhaps in the peace he’d found, somewhere — the heart wrenching acceptance that Dazai had never managed to steal.

“I know it’s tempting — to believe things are worth something more here. That they mean something different. But death is death, and ashes are ashes. Urns are irrelevant — you will die in this place, and you will rot in the ocean. If you yearn for something, you’ve got to do it before they burn you,” He held the wheel tighter. “Before they catch you.”

Dazai didn’t quite understand. “But you picked an urn.”

“The Mafia is just like any other place,” the man insisted, as if reciting orders he had long since memorized. “If there are rules, you follow them.”

“Death doesn’t have rules.”

“It does,” Ango glanced at him. “Or you’d be in an urn already, wouldn’t you?”

The cement is too soft and the river is not deep enough, Dazai could have said. The roofs are too short and the poison is too easy to throw up. Odasaku keeps offering my drinks. You keep driving too slow. Mori said he’d tell me how. Mori said he’d tell me how. Mori said —

Slashing his throat, Chuuya had said. The self-assured words of a god in all but blood — the ease of something he’d never dare. Poisoning Elise. Crashing the building on —

“Beautiful women keep finding excuses not to die,” he sighed, long and deep. “My schedule has been mercilessly maimed.”

Ango didn’t seem to believe him. He never quite did — but where Odasaku never accused, he took glasses of poison out of his hands and rallied against his widest smiles like it mattered. “Why did you join the Mafia, Dazai?”

Dazai thought about lying.

“Can’t you just pick my urn?” he whined.

“You know I can’t.”

“Why not?”

He was still drenched to the bone. In the right light, the water drops could have been tears — an unreasonable regret. Dazai couldn’t imagine him crying — couldn’t imagine him raging either.

“Not me,” Ango concluded, very quietly. Dazai got the feeling ashes and urns were the last of his thoughts. “This is not my place at all.”

He cuddled up on his seat, turning to the side. Once the rough fabric of the headrest pressed against his pulsing cheek, he shrugged. “I’d hoped the Mafia wouldn’t be like any other place,” Dazai answered, eventually. You’ll die here and rot in the ocean. “That’s why I’m here. That’s all.”

I know, he could have said. I know I will. I don’t know how to care.

Hasn’t this gotten boring for you too?, Mori had questioned.

They kept quiet for the rest of the journey.

“Mimic?” Dazai read, through the trailing blood and the tapping rain, easily offering his arm to Kouyou. “That’s a silly name.”

The rose-tinged umbrella she was holding painted the Executive’s frame in gentle shades, like blood disappearing down the drain. The parking lot was empty and devoid of cars — apart from the members of the cleaning squad, busy gathering the mauled corpses they’d been alerted about an hour from midnight. It was pouring — he could barely hear his own voice over the storm, soaking him to the bone with no umbrella.

The blood-graffitied wall was the worst of it, though.

“Demon child, you better not be offering your arm to me,” Kouyou tutted, eyes forward.

“It’s slippery,” he noted, innocently. “And those long robes of your will trip you one day.”

“I don’t trip. You can drop the gentleman act; some of my walls are still stained by the fire you started in my home.”

“Chuuya was there too,” he whined. “You never blame him for this stuff. It’s always, demon, demon, demon child. It’s been years anyway.”

“I heard you order that kid of yours to set fire to my office during his calligraphy lessons,” she accused, sweetly. “Not only have your ways not changed a bit — you intend to get in the way of a poor kid’s honest attempts?”

He scoffed. “Akutagawa’s no poor kid. He’ll be able to have your head in one or two years at most. Well,” Dazai scratched his drenched nape. “If he doesn’t cough his lungs out first.”

“Because you’re teaching him, or because he’ll have no choice?”

“Don’t we have something to do?”

Wordlessly, Kouyou raised her arm. Dazai stared at it for a few seconds only, mollified — he hooked his arm to her elbow, and allowed her to lead him to the wall, her umbrella saving him from the rain.

“It is a curious name,” the woman agreed, once they were close enough to study the drying blood pooling down the bricks. The irate rain had already begun to wipe that sole name off the stone, but the message remained — and the unmistakable wounds on the bodies of faceless workers from the borders of Mafia territory. “Possibly a syndicate from Europe. They like their names fancy, there.”

Dazai squinted, kicking the wall with one foot. “Ango mentioned something like that.”

“This is clearly a message for us,” Kouyou surveyed the disappearing vans of the squad — the vanishing blood stains on the concrete. “No other reason to make the victims bite the curb. And the three bullets to the chest, too — too purposeful.”

“A petty attempt to get our attention?”

“Perhaps. They’re not someone I’ve heard about before — maybe they’re taunting the bigger fish to make a name for themselves,” Her blink was as callous as an execution call. “Shall we get rid of them?”

“No,” he concluded, studying the fading Mimic signature. He’d have to ask Odasaku if he had ever heard of them. “Not yet. It’d be a waste of resources if they’re nothing to worry about. Ango promises the Division is on their tail.”

Kouyou hummed. “Yes, rather — let them work, once in a while.”

She tapped her nails on the handle of her umbrella. Her nails, while perfect, were bitten near the ends of the thumbs — a habit Dazai had never seen her put in place, and that he was surprised she would have let anyone see the remains on. Kouyou was hardly around, those days, though — too busy dealing with the Kyouka family, clinging to their own Demon with a hunger Dazai wasn’t sure she had realized entirely.

“Was it hard?” he asked.

“What was?” Kouyou blinked.

Some raindrops had seeped through the old wood of her umbrella — they stuck to her eyelids, tinted in rainbow shards when hit by the moon. It made her look oddly young. Dazai hadn’t realized he’d grown taller than her.

“Being stuck here,” he clarified. “After you failed to get out.”

Astonishment hit her like a bullet; the step back she took wouldn’t have been evident to a less keen eye — but Dazai had studied her like he had studied every bundle of flesh in the Mafia; trying to understand what of that place had fulfilled them to the point of vitality.

She was quiet in exhaling that surprise out; her arms relaxed under Dazai’s fingers, pulse quick through the fabric he had soaked.

“Mori tells me he brought you to pick your urn,” she started, strangely enough. “I thought you would have been overjoyed.”

“You were ready to stand behind me as the Boss’ understudy.”

“It was Mori’s decision. Of course I was.”

“Is that enough for you?” Dazai insisted, curious and detached. “Standing behind him.”

“I told you once, already,” Kouyou offered, after a pensive hesitation. Her head was tilted back to study the trailing blood; her voice was calm — it was horribly honest. “Where would you have me, if not here? What light would you find for me?” A smile graced her lips; Dazai felt the uncanny desire for it to be more humorless. Her sincerity stuck to his throat, bitter. He knew he couldn’t afford such superiority. “There’s devotion in sacrifice — I wouldn’t waste it.” Aren’t you?, he didn’t ask. Did Kanechi want you here, when he died? “Of course it’s enough, little demon. And it will be enough for you, too. If not Mori — something will be.”

He scrutinized the wet tips of his shoes. “So that Kanechi of yours was your reason to leave and your reason to stay?”

Her bitten thumb tapped her umbrella. He wondered what her urn looked like. Delicate and pretty, probably — refined to the dot. Just priceless enough to make one forget what rotting inside. A good reason to find the whole ordeal unnecessary, he considered. Dazai disliked disguises.

“Yes,” Kouyou mused, a bit taken aback — as if she’d never considered if. He tried to imagine it; cradling a body she had loved enough to risk the Boss’ rage for — counting seconds before the light vanished from his eyes, knowing it was all the time left to decide what the rest of her life would have to be like. “How silly.”

“What is?”

Standing in front of sizzling thunder, Mori was an ink-ghost under a red umbrella. Elise was nowhere to be found, but the plastic bag of sweets hanging from his arm was a giveaway. She had never liked the rain much — in a rare show of kindness, Mori tended not to have her linger when the sky got crowded by clouds.

Not rare, he thought. Mori was plenty kind. He would have nailed himself to that pouring sky for the Port Mafia — just not for its people. In place of that honorable sacrifice, he showed them benevolence.

“All of it,” Dazai sing-sang, bored, turning back to wipe the last of a blood drop from the wall. It tore Kouyou’s arm from his grasp; she didn’t try to reach for him again. “None of it? I can’t recall. Mori, you’ve got flour on your face.”

“Do I?” The doctor scrambled to clean his jaw, almost dropping his umbrella. “Elise got mad at me for a senseless request — anyway. Anything I should know about this gift we received?”

“That it’s tasteless?” Kouyou offered. “Not that I’m surprised. God knows what Chuuya finds so fascinating about Europe.”

“Might be in his blood,” Mori commented.

She hid a smile, not exactly pleased.

Dazai thought of the Ivy Dungeons — the secret Executive who had yet to leave them. There was much to consider about the ease with which they had always kept that secret — he found he didn't quite have the mind to consider it himself.

Still — it sat weirdly across his shoulders.

Chuuya will know, he thought. Chuuya will rage. Rinse and repeat. It sounded incorrect.

"You better not forget your promise," the woman was insisting, behind the screen of Dazai thoughts. He stuck a hand out, tasting the rain. "I cannot keep dropping unsubtle hints. We are both well aware he should have been made Executive long ago —"

"Only one of his many short comings," Dazai noted. "Ha. Get it? Because he's short —"

"And he will be made one," Mori pacified her, ignoring him completely.

"When you stop sending him off, maybe."

"Please, don't do that," Dazai begged. "Let me send him to Antarctica. The bears will teach him all about actual style."

Mori tutted: "He asked for this, Ozaki."

"He asked for an excuse," Kouyou replied. "You should know better than to give it to him, by now. He's been away so long we haven't received public damage complaints in eons. Hirotsu hasn't even been checking the ceiling to verify if he's up there to scare him —"

"I do miss his pricey wine bottles," the man admitted, longingly. "Always such a treat."

"Even Double Black keeps being referred to as some street myth —"

Dazai stepped away from her umbrella.

"You'll get sick," Mori warned — watching him reach out with his shoe to rub some blood left by one of the corpses. "The busy season is about to start. We can't have you coughing on reports."

"I don't write reports," he replied. "And in any case, I've finally convinced Tanaki to try that wig I stole from the Pomegranate —"

"Excuse me?"

" — she can refine her — frankly offensive — imitation of me and take part in the meetings in my stead," he concluded. "She gets more power, I get more naps, you don't have to look at my pretty face. All is well what ends well."

Kouyou snorted. "That would be a sight."

"She would certainly direct this show much better than I'll ever be able to," Mori commented, frowningly glancing at the mostly faded MIMIC graffiti. "I did always wonder why the old Boss left her in that flimsy position."

“Why didn’t you promote her?”

He shrugged. “She’s always refused.”

It wasn’t shocking. Dazai couldn’t see her in any spot that didn’t bear secretary notes and a ringing phone — welcoming recruits in from the rain and unhooking the revolver under her desk at the mere sight of blood behind the glass doors she guarded. There’s no better view, she’s told him, eons ago; and — we are all moved by something.

“I suppose some people want nothing but peace after their tribulations,” Kouyou sighed. “I was always very curious about those scars of hers.”

“Perhaps a wild raccoon,” Dazai offered.

“I’m afraid Madame Tanaki is as mysterious as she is graceful,” Mori intervened. “Not even the archives from the old regime have much on her.”

The Executive scoffed. “I’m not surprised she would try to bury it behind her. What with her family —”

“Her absent children, you mean?”

“Not quite,” she replied. “Her sister.”

Crouched down to continue scrubbing at the blood — nails wet and too short to manage; cursed by the doctor’s insistence on cleanness, in all things — Dazai missed the candid fragment of the lighting striking the ground. The thunder was loud and earth-rattling, though — it did not, still, muffle the notable creak of Mori’s spine as it stood a tad too straight.

“Sister?” he questioned, vaguely.

“She recounted some of it for us at the villa,” Kouyou explained, blind to his tone. “That one summer you couldn’t come, remember? You had that business meeting in Tokyo. You missed out on Virgil’s cooking abilities,” Something a tad sad colored her tone. “I truly do miss that lad.”

Dazai didn’t move. “And what did she tell you about her?” Mori insisted, studying the wall — now spotless; now naked.

“Apparently her sister used to be part of a fallen, disgraceful syndicate — they didn’t trust her one bit. Used to chain her in her workroom, if I remember correctly,” The woman shrugged, her smile filled with the same cruelty she reserved for the victims in her dungeons. “The syndicate was destroyed, and its dying members blamed her for her survival. She was caught by the Division, given her Ability, and...” Kouyou frowned. “I can’t really recall the rest of it. Demon child, did she tell us the rest?”

Tanaki and I go way back, Fumiko Enchi had promised, all smiles. The Nine Rings had given her the punishment of a traitor — but they hadn’t turned her into a Soul, no matter the attack.

“No,” Dazai said. The concrete had no more blood for him to rub off; he kept at it, just to fail to meet Mori’s gaze. “Not really.”

The Executive clicked her tongue. “All the same — I can only imagine how the old Boss felt about the possible conflict of interest. It makes sense that she would hide as much of her history as possible. Executions back then were —” A frown. “Well. Tanaki would have been killed on the mere ground of suspicion. Not even having an Ability would have saved her.”

He sat on the ground. Odasaku would have nudged his side — he was always suspicious of Dazai’s quieter moments. “What is it, by the way?”

Thunder rattled the air some more. From the careless, gossiping thing it had been, Kouyou’s grin sculpted itself into something smaller.

“I,” She blinked. “I’m not sure, actually. Do you know, Boss?”

There was nowhere to look. Mori was still a line of black and a shock of red; his eyes were still on the faded graffiti. He never seemed to feel in any particular way about discoveries — perhaps he was too committed to having all his dancing monkeys believe there wasn’t a piece of the world he hadn’t long since performed an autopsy on.

The unknown is still learnable, he’d sworn, once, over a gaping wound on Dazai’s leg. A mere promise isn’t a lie. Why let anybody know?

How would you escape?, Dazai had asked her.

That prolonged silence managed to tense even Kouyou’s shoulder. “Boss,” she insisted, a tad too insistent. “You do know Tanaki’s Ability, yes?”

“A communicating kind,” he offered, after a prolonged silence that had the woman’s chest rise and fall somewhat hastily. “Dormient, though. As far as I know, she hasn’t used it since she was young — after a traumatic accident.”

“Her sister’s death,” Kouyou insisted. “She didn’t tell us if she died, but — it must have been that. Yes?” She cleared her throat. “Obviously.”

The tattoo maker, Dazai recalled saying, as the doctor talked of moles and years old spies. The urns around them hadn’t whispered a thing — not even the dead were pious enough. The half moon of Ueda Akinari’s Ability — how she’d been the only one on site when Chuuya had defeated him; how she had held onto him, when the User had cursed him to one last vision. How she had said goodbye to every single one of Kajii’s subordinates, before they had been massacred. How she held Kouyou’s hands whenever the Executive sat with her.

How she had let Dazai draw on her shoes, when he huddled underneath his desk. Truly, she had tutted, only once. When will you grow up?

[“It’s alright,” she’d replied, eyes on the screen. Dazai and Chuuya had camped under her desk for days — apologizing for a ruined wedding and what else she hadn’t vocalized. Sealing the coffin shut, maybe. “It will not matter anymore, soon.”]

“As far as I know, Ozaki,” Mori corrected, belatedly, eyes set on him — like a second thought; like underground tunnels and bank accounts, and whatever else would be left on Dazai’s shoulders like a coat and a honor and a reason to breathe some more, “I’m afraid Tanaki never had a sister, either.”

Chapter End Notes

dazai, depressed: angou why did you even join the mafia

angou, on the verge of tears: oh yknow and here is the start of the end! i am more than drowning in work and exams right now, but i will take your guys’ hatred and tomatoes for the first plot twist i ever planned (planned from chapter one, btw, and here we go with the re-reading value only i shall care about) for this story! mrs tanaki, mole extraordinaire!

i am sorry.

anyway! we will talk more about it in the next chapters. i do have to run. thank you so so much for reading, and thank you all for all the love to this fic!! have a wonderful week <333

see you soon!!

I

Chapter Notes

...well hello there!

yes i disappeared. yes i am terribly apologetic. yes we did lose like seven people at my job in two days cause apparently they suddenly got a more convenient offer + three of my uni exams got moved up three weeks sooner than they should have been. all of it is irrelevant. my apologies aren't, on the other end <3 the good news are — this fic will 90% be done by the end of july. the bad news is, i can't give any guarantee about the posting days. this will be a journey we shall discover together etc etc. hope you guys won't mind too much!! hell has fallen upon me.

anyway! see you at the end <333

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xxxii.

---

Case number: 73837372

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [Code Name: Double Black] were separately dealing with [...]*

---

---

There were seven thousand, four hundred and seventy-five files in the Port Mafia database — detailing every single crime associated with every single one of its members.

The lowest of the dogs, the richest of the kings — the smaller piece of trash thrown on the street, abandoned to merciless jobs and pictures the police actually managed to gather; the steadiest bomb tied to a screaming mother in the middle of a train wagon, promising power where most could only swear off their sweat, blood, and tears. All of it, in codes. Dazai knew them all.

He knew his own very well, too.

Make sure the other prisoners don't get too loud, he'd ordered, distractedly, to the guard at the end of the dungeons' stairs. With that small voice she's always had, I might just not hear her.

The woman had nodded, quiet. Most of the syndicate had been silent, in the past two weeks — ever since that meeting in the alley.

Truly, Mori had sighed. And here I'd hoped we would cut back on the meetings, at last.

The phone was slippery from the blood on his hands. “Hey,” he started, sitting on the ground by the furthest wall of the dungeons. Steps away, was the wooden chair where the passed out traitor rested. Dazai insisted: “Since Ango said no, would you mind picking my urn for me?”

If asked, Dazai would have proven that Odasaku had a very specific breathing pattern — a gently whistling, somewhat gaping type of inhale, and an exhale that always took too long to come out. He fiddled with the slug phone charm as he listened to that sound — shrouded by statics and Tanaki's harsh breathing — and waited.

“I think you should do that,” his friend let him know, after a bit.

“I don't think it matters,” Dazai insisted. A strange ache seeped through the muscles of his jaw — a sleeping muscle. He hadn't worn expressions in more than a week. “It's not like I'll be here to see it. It's for you guys' benefit.”

Odasaku hummed, as if conceding.

Suddenly and senselessly, he wished for the man not to tell him if he had picked his own — if he had ever looked far away enough in the future to see his own corpse. Dazai hoped not. He hoped to never see anything close to it.

A hiss of clothes — as if he had stood up. “Are you by the riverbank?”

“Mmh? Oh, no. It’s not the river,” Dazai reached out with one leg, uncurling it from where he had huddled up — he kicked one of the metal boxes connected to the pipes. “Ventilation system. The dungeons smell so awful, sometimes.”

Another hum. “Is your prisoner wilful?”

“Traitors can’t be clever, Odasaku,” he let him know, studying the delicate, hysterical twitch of Tanaki’s bloodied fingers. “Just stubborn.”

“That’s what you’re here for.”

“Is it?” The idea amused him. “Am I?”

Odasaku’s intake of breath was familiar as a wound. Dazai could feel him knocking, at times — scrubbing blood and decay off whatever wall he’d never consciously put up; reaching him, almost. He never dared. Respect or hesitation or any other hypnotizing hymn that got men’s eyes on him.

That’s mean, he let himself think. That’s mean, and he’s my friend.

“What else would you be?” he asked.

Dazai shrugged. The woman’s blood had reached his elbows. He couldn’t remember what corner of the dungeon he had left his coat in. The blood kept making the phone drop from his grasp. “Ashes in an urn?”

“You need an urn for that to happen.”

“With you at Bar Lupin, then.”

He seemed somewhat intrigued by the idea. “‘You think the barkeep will pick one for you?’”

“Someone has to,” he whined. “And I’m his favorite, for sure.”

On the chair, Tanaki let out a whimper.

“I heard about it,” Odasaku said. He hardly ever needed words to make Dazai understand — there was a frequency to his voice that bloomed across the questioning corners of his mind. There was a life, somewhere, he recalled telling him. They would have to talk about it in length, one day. “I’m sorry it was her.”

Dazai blinked, very slow.

There’s always an after, Hirotsu had once told him, in front of rain-wet body bags. He never lingered next to corpses the way Chuuya did; there was always something behind his monocle, nonetheless. Is it not comforting?

No one had said Tanaki’s name out loud in two weeks. Modi had shattered her picture in the Hallway himself.

“I have to go,” Dazai said, apologetic. “You know how Boss is. If he asked for more of my time, I’d live in his coat pocket and eat dust particles.”

“That would be a shame,” Odasaku swore, because he was kind and merciless and good, and Dazai wanted to keep him more than anything else. “I can help you pick an urn, if you want.”

“But you won’t pick it for me?”

“No.”

The finality — unperturbed and unknowable — morphed the quietness into one of the few, few moments, where Dazai truly felt that Odasaku was older than he’d ever be.

“Hey,” he echoed. “I don’t really care — but could you forgive me for this?”

Curiosity tilted his friend’s tone. “What for, if you don’t care?”

A rat’s letters, he could have offered. A last resort. Maybe it’s God’s fault, if not mine. Maybe it’s no one’s fault, and there’s always an after. I cared for her and there’s always an after.

“Just to say I scratched it off the list.”

Gracefully, Odasaku did.

Madame Tanaki was a bundle of flesh.

It was hardly a new sight — Dazai had long since experimented his own prowess at turning the living into something that did not want to live. A weaving of cartilage stood where her satin-shirt had once been, trailing blood across her arms like some tridimensional veins. Her eyes were black, sunk in, with fluttering eyelids — the blood stuck to her hair had been there since Dazai had first seen her captured body in the alley.

She came with us so very trustfully, Kouyou had commented, like nothing more than weather-chat. I do wonder if she made a mistake, too.

In trusting us?, he hadn’t asked.

Dazai flicked her forehead. “You could have spared me this bother, Tanaki,” he sighed. “You of all people know how packed my schedule is.”

Her lower lip was shattered. When she tried to speak, mouth framed by the hot metal burns, it was a mere whisper: “Dazai, please.”

“You know, your files in the Port Mafia’s database are so exceedingly lacking — I’m surprised no one ever pointed it out,” he continued, fiddling with his gun. “You’re lucky Ango’s so busy. You’re even luckier the Nine Rings Conflict had us carry so much pity for you,” Dazai raised the gun, and aimed for the closest of her bound hands. “I’m very surprised, by the way. I’d have thought you would have torn them apart for what they did to your baby.”

He shot. Her scream was more of an animal whine than anything; her vocal chords were far too damaged, and her chest oozed blood at a breath.

“I — wanted to,” Tanaki wheezed. She had been hallucinating for a while; sometimes, when he was too far, she called him dear. “The Division wouldn’t let me. I begged them. You — the Mafia showed me more courtesy than they ever did.”

“You mean they would have killed you.”

“I —“

“Everything for our organization, blah, blah, blah,” Dazai recited, bored. “I do pray you don’t expect me to let you go on that basis. I have not an ounce of the loyalty you pretended to have, and I would have died for much less,” He smiled. “Though I might be a bad example.”

“Dazai,” she whispered. “I tried.”

“You failed. Bang!” He didn’t shoot at all, but the expectation had her so startled, her jump ripped a piece of middle finger hanging from her wounded hand. “Shh, calm down,” Panic threw her features in a whirlwind; he tutted: “Shh. Shh. It’s alright. Promise. I was wondering, though — were you really that mad about the wedding cake ending up on the floor? I’d like to know if I’m missing something.”

Tanaki shut her lips, shaking.

He tickled her chin with the gun — did his best too, attempting to stay still under the rattling muscles. “Come on,” he drawled. “You’ve already told me so much of everything you let the Division know. Let’s get it all out.”

Her eyes were veiled with tears. Dazai had a schedule to follow — huffing, he reached for the metal brand on the tool table.

“It wasn’t —“ she coughed, desperately. “It wasn’t — there was no hidden plan.”

A bit disappointed, he tilted his head. “But you were just so heartbroken.”

Tanaki gulped. It was an ugly sight — a criss cross of bleeding flesh, oozing pus and sweat between trembling shoulders. Her lips, chapped to the point of a yellowish color, barely hung on the words falling from them. “Remember the villa?” she said — less than a whisper, offered with a pair of frightened, bloodshot eyes. “Remember the — syndicates, organizations,” she recited, and he tasted marshmallows and the bonier parts of Chuuya’s shoulder. “Calling them crueler than whatever the Division is makes little sense.”

“Is this that post-mortem phase where your brain starts relieving your entire life?” Dazai asked, obnoxiously interested. “Seven minutes, I believe? I didn’t think I’d killed you already. I’m usually much better at this.”

“You won’t believe me,” Tanaki murmured. The sobs stuck in her throat turned her syllables into something barely understandable; a flutter of nothings and everything. “I’ve been here for decades, Dazai. This is my home — more than the Nine Rings or the Division have ever been. These tattoos —“ She nodded towards the mess of her arms. Dazai had carved out those inked drawings he’d never understood first; he had asked her to tell him what they represented as he did. It had all been very anticlimactic. Just memoirs. “I would have torn them out of myself years ago.”

“And?”

“And then I saw it,” Her heart broke on those words — the cry of a child. “I saw it, the way I’d seen it in both those places. It’s all about blood, and about massacres, and about death,” Tanaki laughed, a bit deliriously. “You think I care about a fucking wedding? I care that I’m trapped — that it’s blood and massacres and death, and that it will be until I die.”

“Which will be soon,” Dazai informed, not very impressed. He tilted his head. “We switched up your invitation list, Tanaki, dear. We didn’t cage you in a lifetime of espionage. We,” He tapped the scorching hot edge of the branding stick on the side of her arm, making her cry out, “Did not take your child. I’d tell you to be more grateful, but you know how I am,” He shrugged. “I don’t much care for the Mafia’s hurt honor.”

“And yet you do this,” she spat. “For it.”

“Yes,” He leaned down, pulling the tips of her blood-soaked hair. “I memorize boring data and I build boring tunnels and I torture boring traitors — and I do in the name of something I do not care for. Who did you do it for?”

She stared at him, bubbling rage choking the shattered veins in her eyes. “Myself,” she said, at last. It seemed she hadn’t realized it either. “You cannot fault me for it.”

Dazai couldn’t. For a moment — boredom or lingering fondness; perhaps the urge to make Mori as mad as a man who had it all, almost, could be — he thought he’d forgive her. But it sounded just as aggravating — it felt just as nothing-like on his bones; ersatz rebellion for a rat in a maze. The bad men in coats wouldn’t care either way. He had no way of caring either way.

Mori would be proud, he mused. It was just enough to have the thing in his chest beat. Tanaki looked at him, and Dazai wanted —

“With Ueda,” he questioned, leaning on the branding stick like a cane. “Why did you pick Chuuya and Kouyou, specifically?”

She licked her lips. “They told me to pick an Executive. The Nine Rings’ Conflict proved to me she had her own inferno to deal with.”

“Don’t we all?”

“Some more than others.”

“And Chuuya?”

“He,” Sincere, poignant ache tightened her ruined traits. She looked at him as if betrayed — as if she couldn’t believe he was making her say it out loud. “He is — Dazai. Who else is like him?”

He thought about it. “Haunted?”

“Unstoppable,” Her exhale was bitter. “So utterly, frustratingly — do you know what they did to me for my inability to get him to them?”

“I don’t care,” Dazai encouraged.

But it didn’t seem like she was listening to him any longer. “Something was bound to put an end to him,” she muttered, somewhat hysterical. A trail of drool and whitish foam had started to make its way from the side of her mouth; Dazai watched her twitch with dismay. “If not weapons, then his own mind. I told them — I swore to them, this will work. This has to work. And then you’ll let me go.”

“To live in the Mafia in peace?” he asked, a bit tauntingly. “To hide what you’d done until we buried you in the ocean?”

“ — and then you’ll let me go,” she insisted. Her eyes were a thousand miles away; crimson fell from her lips in sticky coagulations, landing on her lap and on Dazai’s shoes. “There has to be a way to stop him. Even gods — even experiments —”

Dazai struck her so hard her neck creaked with the motion, shattering the sharper edge of the wooden backrest.

“How boring,” he sing-sang, sizzling to the gums of his teeth. “Boring, boring, boring. Don’t be boring, now. With all those Cemetery visits — with all the guilt he has in his heart for this miserable sack of traitorous bones you’ve turned out to be,” He clicked his tongue, offering her his widest smile. “Don’t be boring.”

“I didn’t ask for his guilt,” she swore.

“No,” he concurred. “You just used it.”

“And you haven’t?”

“Don’t compare us,” he warned, amicably, tapping her lips. The skin cracked under his touch — he kept at it, smiling a mocking smile. “This is no Spider Eyes debate. Do you see popcorn? That desk of yours, maybe? I haven’t blinded you yet. I’m quite sure. All I see is blood, and your own admission to having pulled my dog by a leash that wasn’t yours to even think about,” He lowered his voice, dramatic. “And that’s the least of it. You can call me as cruel as you want, but I am no traitor.”

Her pupils widened. She watched the tip of the branding iron with a distant sort of distaste.

“Dazai,” she whispered, vacantly. “Dazai — what could I have done?”

Nothing, he answered, rationally. It wasn't an answer Mori would have taken — it was just shatteringly endless enough to make Dazai's heart beat. He felt sorry for her. He felt angry. He felt betrayed. There was nothing to feel. There was nothing either of them could have done.

"I don't know," he offered her.

She breathed out.

He put his hands on her backrest; caged her between his arms, and mourned, a bit distantly, the Spider Eyes finale he'd never watch. "But you'll have your wish. You'll rest with the Port Mafia for eternity," Slowly, he nodded towards the darkened entrance to the dungeons. You do not care, Mori had told him, easily, before sending him there. Why would you? "You do know what we do to traitors, do you not?"

Her eyes popped out of her skull.

She screamed until the sun came back.

---

...

---

Odasaku was bleeding.

"Inconvenient," Dazai observed, face deep into his pill cabinet, diligently stealing every muscle relaxant he could find. The lights of the man's bathroom were funerary. The old and well-loved stream of sunrise was hidden behind blinds. It smelled of toothpaste — and Odasaku was bleeding.

Childproof lids were always a bother. They took eons to uncap, and Odasaku was bleeding on his ratty, creaking couch.

"I'd say," the man agreed. He was stitching himself up, the hem of his dress shirt held between his teeth — his voice came out as something that would have made his children laugh. It seemed only human to chuckle. Dazai didn't. "I've emptied out most of the bottles. And no more poison."

Dazai blinked, very slowly, leaning into the doorframe. Their shoes were at the entrance; the leftover curry from Pops on the table; Odasaku's blood, a trail on the floor.

"I wouldn't kill myself in your home, Odasaku," And then, "You're bleeding."

A half-bothered glance was directed to the stained ground. “That I am.”

Dazai sat on the ground. He crossed his legs, chin on his hands to study the layers of burned skin under the man’s third rib — the crisscross of tendons, the yielding lines of sick red and slick black, the flashes of viscera.

“I’ve hardly ever seen you bleed before,” he added, because it felt necessary. Ango was always encouraging him to use his rivers of words for something useful. Dazai had shot a bullet through his hand, almost, months ago — and the blood had been less dirty, because he’d known where it had come from.

“Flawless notified me that I would be shot,” Odasaku said. “I had to pick between a bullet and possibly breaking my whole body with a jump out of the window. Seemed easy,” He stitched another dot. “I already broke my body once.”

“Did you?” He perked up.

“Two times. Well, one was an almost,” He nodded, graceful in that brutish way of his, lowlife wearing pearls. Dazai knew better than to linger on the healed. He knew better than to linger. “Fought with this extraordinary swordsman who had a mean punch. The ricochet almost crashed me against a wall.”

He sighed, exasperated over spilled anecdotes. “Where did you even meet a swordsman?”

“At a Labour Licences office,” Odasaku blinked. “Him and this strange kid were dealing with some shady theatrical business, I believe. I’ve never fought someone so vicious. But he did get me curry during my short time in prison.”

Dazai stared at him. “Tell me more.”

“I have to stitch myself up and tell you a story?”

“I offered to stitch you up,” he huffed.

His eyebrows brushed his hairline. He wasn’t bleeding anymore; the smell of it was stuck in the buzzing lights. “After devouring all the chocolate in my house with your naked hands?”

“I would have washed them.”

He talked, and he stitched. Dazai sat on the floor and said wrong things at all the right times, and rejoiced quietly, so as not to inconvenience. I have scars too, he didn’t say, because the man knew, I have scars too, and however you prod, however you ask, however you stitch, they never feel like flesh.

But good men were often merciful, and Odasaku did not question that carcass he dragged around — and one day he would thank him for it; would explain the weight of the knowledge of being wanted, even without the unavoidable path through a maze of reasons why his presence would be more than convenient.

Strategy — all of him, always.

“What does it feel like, anyway?” he asked, once the needles had been abandoned.

Odasaku blinked at the cards on the floor between them. “What does what feel like?”

He nodded towards his unbuttoned shirt; the third rib he could not see. “Being hit so close to the heart.”

A shrug. “It kind of hurt.”

“Yes,” Dazai insisted, “But how?”

“Does everything have to feel like something else?”

Oh, he thought.

“Anyway,” Dazai said, helplessly, “I think you should attempt not to get bullets in you.”

The man flipped a card. “Better a bullet than a life.”

“Valuing your own life will get you killed. By getting yourself killed, you will not be valuing your life,” He tilted his head to the side. “Isn’t it sort of a contrary?”

He snorted.

Dazai’s lips parted, baffled. “What could you ever be laughing at?”

“It’s just,” Odasaku’s mouth trembled. “It’s just sort of funny. To hear you say that.”

Silence rippled through the room, gentle and quiet. A drawing on the wall; a trail of blood on the floor. There was a moment, the man had said, telling a tale of his swordsman and his detective, where I almost envied the lengths that devil was ready to go to for a foolish child putting himself in trouble.

Did you wish for him to take you, too?

No. Bewilderment, genuine and tranquil. A man who had seen it all. Whatever his book ended up being about, Dazai knew he would read it — and maybe he would understand, at last.

No, Odasaku has said. Why would I have done that?

Laughter wrecked his chest. He shook with it, vibrant as the sun. “That’s funny,” he breathed, rattled to the bone, and the other man’s lips trembled along. “That’s funny, Odasaku, that’s so —“

“Listen here, asshole,” the rough, male voice on the phone spat, at 3:00 A.M. “You tell us what the fuck happened to our goods, and we don’t snap your Boss’ neck. ‘Deal clear?’”

Unimpressed, Dazai moved the device away from his ear, blinking at the blinding bluish light of the screen — reflecting gently on the walls of the shipping container. The bed creaked under his shifting weight, as he laid on his back with a sigh. He hadn’t been sleeping — but the almost slumber had been infinitely softer than that horridly accented Japanese.

“Wrong number,” he offered.

Then he shut the call.

It took the caller a few stunned seconds to call again. “Listen here!” the man snapped. He had to be British, he guessed — but he’d been speaking Dazai’s mother tongue since he was young, most probably. “Don’t ya play any games with me right now. Your Boss spilled all the fucking beans. You’re that — Mackerel, yes? ‘Thought you cunts could fool us with your codenames? We’ve got your leader tied up in a chair like the fucking —”

Dazai stared at the screen a second time. He shut the call again.

The caller called again.

“Seriously?” Chuuya’s unmistakably irate tone almost rattled the phone. It was clearly a good distance from the speaker — his disgust took no hit whatsoever from it, though. “That’s who you guys called? You manage to take an alleged Mafia Boss’ phone and the first person you contact is his one blocked contact? I’ve got a guy called “Money Macker” on there! Did your mothers feed you crack from their tits?”

The sound of a punch ricocheted.

“Chuuya, you need to see a professional,” Dazai chirped, rubbing his forehead. “Obsessing over me like this cannot be healthy.”

“Who’s obsessed, shitface? They called you, not me!”

“But I’m the only number you’ve blocked,” he whined. “That clearly means you think about me all the time, so you had to take measures.”

His gasp was offended, framed by the wood of a chair being rattled. “That means shit! I just wanted you to stop calling me in the middle of your torture sessions, like the freak you are!”

“Oh, is someone squeamish?”

“I’ll squeam you, bitch —“

Dazai’s left eye ticked, aggravated. “That doesn’t mean anything.”

“I don’t care,” he spat, very honestly. “And by the way — I saw that Chuuya’s A Sore Loser newsletter update, and let me tell you —“

He perked up. “Did you like it? It took me so long to find all those —“

“What — no, moron, I didn’t fucking like it? Where the hell did you even find so many pictures of me sneezing, you bandaged weirdo —“

An uncanny, rust-lined sound echoed all the way to the speakerphone — the wet squelch of skin being punched, and wood creaking under the weight of a tied up victim. Background voices in an irritated tone fired British slang too fast for him to catch; the echo told him Chuuya was probably in the basement of some freight ship.

Bored, Dazai shifted on his stomach. “Can I hang up?” he asked, petulantly. “It’s 4:00 A.M. I have so much to do — all of it much better than listening to a Chibi’s tortured screams —“

Some rustle; some curses. “Who the fuck is screaming?” Chuuya snapped.

“That’s what she said.”

“What? What? That doesn’t make any —“

“Chuuya wouldn’t know.”

“And you would? Your last date blew up your car after making you believe she wasn’t a stalker —“

Irked, he muttered: “Not my fault if Mimi lied about being up for a double suicide —“

“She was fucking with you!”

“She looked suicidal to me!”

Another smack! — this time, more similar to the crunch of a skull against a metal wall. “Are you two quite done?” the British criminal snapped, sporting a tone Dazai was awfully familiar to. The mixture of disbelief and headache colored his next words. “We’re not here to fucking chat. We’ve got a gun to your Boss’ head, you wanker. You —“

“Shoot him,” Dazai begged. “Make it hurt. He has this old scar on his left clavicle —“

“Kill yourself!”

“Oh, now, you want Mimi’s bomb to —“

“Button it!” the criminal snarled. “Put a god forsaken sock in it, and shut up!”

They fell quiet.

Autumn winds knocked ghostly against the walls of the shipping container, rattling it with the delicacy of a haunted house. Dazai had the good grace of muffling hilarity in his pillow — the snort out of Chuuya’s mouth, though, was so disrespectfully loud it shook the phone against his ear.

“Button it?” he spelled out. The image of his trembling lips was too clear in front of Dazai’s eyes. “Put a sock in it? ‘You gonna tell me to hush next? Button it? Seriously?’”

He tutted: “Slugs should appreciate foreign cultures more.”

“Yeah, but ‘button it?’ Button what?”

“The sock thing is awfully visual, though.”

“That’s just ‘cause you keep marathoning cartoons with Elise —”

“Hirotsu put a sock in my mouth, once,” Dazai reminisced, turning on his side, ignoring him. “During a nightly shootout. He swears it was a mistake, but he always gets this weirdly sadistic look when we talk about it —”

“My only astonishment lies in how allegedly no one had done this to you before him.”

“You think you’re so clever.”

“And you think that shithole doesn’t deserve a sock to stuff it —”

“A sock to button it, you mean —”

“That’s not how it fucking goes —”

“Fucking hell,” the criminal shouted, over the wrenching shrill of another punch. Distantly, Dazai could have sworn he heard something beep, calm and unhurried. “Can you two just —”

The explosion didn’t tear a scream out of Chuuya’s mouth — it did somewhat end the call, though; turning it into a disorienting symphony of white noises and weird whistling noises.

Miraculously, it didn’t disconnect. It took long, boring seconds Dazai spent rubbing off Tanaki’s blood from under his nails — wondering, with the murmuring ache of a the fever he’d felt since the Mimic’s graffiti, if there existed a childish way of saying, she wanted you as dead as the Sheep and more — until the hiss of a hand picking the phone from the ground filled the shell of his ear.

Uncoordinated, half-muffled voices crossed each other through the speaker — “UNHAND —” and “Do not start that again, I’m warning —” and “— give me back the —”, and, “— only wish to —”, and a choking screech that was unmistakably one of Chuuya’s attempts at escaping a headlock.

“Mister Bastard!” Oddly impossible not to recognize, Adam Frankenstein’s blankest tone was a bell in his sleepless body, enthusiastic in its clearly mechanical tilt. “It is such a pleasure to hear from you again! The vitals and critical data I gathered during our only meeting assured me you would either thrive until the age of eighty-seven, or die by the next July. I am glad to attest you —“

“Eighty-seven?” Dazai cried out. “Sir, Adam, that is far too long! You need to recheck your data immediately. You must have made a mistake.”

“I’m awfully sorry. I’m afraid I would need to be in your physical presence for that to happen,” He didn’t sound sorry at all, but every note of his tone was clearly meant to emulate something akin to it. “Do not worry, though. Master Chuuya talks about you all the time —“

A shriek. “No, I fucking don’t!”

Puzzled, Adam insisted: “But my recordings can testify that —“

“I insult him! That’s not what —“

“I’m well aware, my tin can friend,” Dazai sighed. “It’s a dreadful condition —“

“You’re a dreadful condition —!”“

“— what’s with Mister Bastard, anyway?”

“Master Chuuya had me change some of my communication settings,” Adam offered, appearing untouched by whatever war Chuuya was raging against him — or by the rescuing operation he had put in place, probably afore planned. “Ability User Dazai Osamu has been listed with over thirty seven appellatives. Would you like to pick your own?”

Dazai hummed. “And I can change it?”

“You need to ask, first.”

Feeling skeptical, he dared: “Dazai would be fine.”

Something screeching robotic filled his ear. “Error,” Adam recited. “Only Master Chuuya can access my database. The rank cannot be —“

“Ha!” Chuuya barked. “Take that!”

His unbridled laughter seemed to confuse the android detective quite a bit. Dazai zoned off through whatever inquisitive, stiffen questions he could hear him poke Chuuya with, focusing on the echo of his unconcerned hilarity. There was no need to put the phone on speaker — the dead silence of the shipping container welcomed the statics with open arms, filling a haunted house with something too alive to fit in.

Breeze seeped in. Dazai huddled under his blankets, staring at some indefinite spot of the wall — thirteen panels, he recalled, not sleepy at all — and stole sounds with ungrateful ears. Chuuya had always liked out-of-border missions, anyway.

As if you’re not like me?, he’d scoffed, once.

I'm not, Dazai hadn't put out his tongue and mocked. Sometimes, he wasn't sure if he had grown too talented at pretending not to care — if it had seeped, and stuck to his ribs like innermost Stockholm syndrome. I never leave without saying goodbye.

“Hey,” An indefinite eternity later — limbs still wide awake and Tanaki's blood still where he had left it — Chuuya's breathless voice appeared, much closer than before. He seemed surprised; his gasping inhales filled his mind rhythmically, softer than the low murmur he adapted them to. “You still here? Fell asleep?”

Dazai considered pretending. There was an ache in his fingers that was all from disuse; a tired hum in his bones that wanted him to beg.

For what?, he questioned. His body had never offered him any kindness; like a child, he was still cursed by a longing to attempt. What have you not lost, after wanting it enough to ask for it?

“Chibi ants are crawling all over my roof,” he lamented, eventually, just quiet enough to hold the stillness by the ripped edges. “They're loud and aggravating. As if I could sleep.”

Chuuya huffed. “Hello, there.”

His chest burned so viciously it almost tore a breath out of him. A fluke, he considered. There wasn't any space left between his lungs for warmth. For the Arcade, maybe, his body dared to answer him. For the one thing that could kill you, Mori or not.

“Hello,” he conceded, nonetheless.

It buzzed awkwardly. Dazai could count their actual greetings on the fingers of one hand, three years down the line. There had never been any need to introduce the well-known — hello, he could have said, pointlessly, whenever they collided in some public space they'd have to pour money in to rebuild. Hello. Hello. Haven't I waited for you enough?

“Is everything alright, home?” Eventually, Chuuya took the matter in his own hands.

There was a rumble behind his words that had to be a car; he kept his tone hushed, as if wary of curious listeners — not enemies, but outsiders to their bubble all the same. He knew he had been dragging Shirase around — pretending it was the other way around.

Fool, he thought, blankly. Dazai tended to linger, and Chuuya never let go at all.

“Elise's still annoying,” he offered. “Ane-san is still torturing Fumiko Enchi. My Akutagawa is still waving Rashomon around like a bat. No open conflict, other than The Catfish — and you're not here. It's all wonderfully pleasant.”

“I'm sure.”

“You should be.”

“And Boss?” Chuuya insisted, strangely.

Dazai pulled a loose thread from his pillow, studying the weaving of the cheap fabric. “What about him? As boring as ever. He did tell me to tell you to never return —“

“I just thought,” the boy interrupted, with something in his tone he couldn’t place, “After — that thing you asked, the — you know. That maybe something —“

That thing, Dazai traced. “How shy of you. You seemed ready to discuss poisoning effects —“

His voice hardened. “Don’t start.”

“What do you think will happen if I don’t start?” he mimicked. “Want to sing me a lullaby so I can sleep? Videocall until dawn?”

Chuuya’s teeth gritted audibly. “I told you. It was the morons who called you. Not me.”

But you’re still talking, Dazai wanted to say. Point his finger and whine, kicking his feet like the child he had never been. It always got enemies to lower their guards, and it always got the victims in the dungeons to make a face. They never expected young hands to hurt. They never expected him not to care at all. But you’re still calling. It’s not just me. Haven’t you waited for me too?

“One of them mentioned Double Black,” the boy said, casually — all in one exhale. His scoff was half laughter; only slightly touched underneath. “Can you believe half of them tried to convince him we were out of business?”

Dazai kept his eyes on the wall.

“A blessing in disguise,” he offered.

“Obviously,” Chuuya huffed, a tad too late. “Can only pray for the day they forget that whole ordeal.”

“Just have faith,” he encouraged.

“I don’t,” he mused. “Do you?”

The pillow deflated weirdly under his head — unused to the weight. Dazai never slept much; when he did, he slept in weird positions, trying to convince his body to fool itself into a tiredness that wasn’t forced. If he focused, he could hear Adam’s intrigued conversation with some other, unfamiliar voice — the restless, midday traffic.

Faith in what? he asked his body.

Something has to stop him, Madame Tanaki had sworn.

“They caught the mole,” Dazai said.

A surprised intake of breath. It tickled the shell of his ear, as if present. “That was faster than I feared it would be. Was it you?”

He thought about it. “Ane-san, maybe.”

“Of course,” Pride seeped through a grin he couldn’t see. “When’s the execution? Should I try to be back by then? I can move some business.”

Dazai had rewritten the traitor treatment — as Ace scoffingly called it — all by himself. New security measures; new databases; new methods to get the scope of what they’d let leak out. All of it was carved in some hyperaware corner of his skull, by the projects for the underground tunnels. If I didn’t know better, Tanaki had huffed, during one of their visits, I’d think you were helping someone run away.

Even a god, she had hissed.

Chuuya’s fingers on her tattoos, tracing lines and drawings — too fond to ever ask, but too stubborn to ever drag his nails off something he cared for. Content with what he would be given, even when the world had torn him to pieces just to fill the inside.

Even an experiment.

“No,” Dazai concluded. He dug himself a space in that unsatisfying warmth. He was a prodigy. He’d figure out a way to let Chuuya ramble until he slept. “Keep your dog muzzle out of it.”

---

...

---

“Stand up,” Dazai ordered, vacant, nudging Akutagawa’s cough-rattled body. A coagulation of blood landed on the shiny tip of his shoe, wordless and sick. “Again.”

The boy’s pale, trembling hands settled on his knees, attempting to push himself up. It took some effort — eventually, teeth gritted so tight it turned his young face into a maze of pulsing veins, he climbed to his feet, panting.

Not entirely interested, Dazai wondered if he would be tasked with bringing him to pick his urn — once that body of his failed him.

“Really,” he commented, mid aimless walk around the edges of the warehouse. He scrubbed dust off the edge of an empty freight box, studying the greyed tip of his forefinger. His gun was a dead weight in his other hand — spinning whenever his thumb got too overwhelmed by the stillness, and the unwavering thunder. The coldest Autumn in years, the News had said, as if to spite all the dead Ballerinas. “You receive one appallingly worthless ode after the other, lately. Flimsy mafiosi make it a point to bother me in the hallways to ask whether they could have you as their subordinate.”

“I won’t,” Akutagawa panted, settling in a fighting stance that was leaking from all the pipes. He was drenched in sweat — they’d been at it for more than five hours. “Their praise is worthless to me. It’s not what I want.”

“But you receive it all the same,” He fixed his coat, using the gun to scratch some old scar that always ached when it rained. “I’m aghast by your refusal to give me a clue as to why, though.”

“You won’t let me,” he insisted.

He curled an eyebrow. “I’m letting you.”

“No, you —“ the kid fumed. His fists flexed around nothing; with a sizzling hiss that ricocheted on the rusty pipes and the half-destroyed walls of that hiding place, Rashomon surged from the black fabric of Dazai’s old coat — sharp talons slashing the air with undeniable hunger, reaching for where he had abandoned his shoulder, studying the wall.

They vanished the moment they touched his neck; Akutagawa, who had crawled forward on that poor defense, could only groan around the fist Dazai crashed against his nose.

“An attack from behind?” He tutted. “Not very honorable of you. The Mafia’s all about things like honor, don’t you know? Give back what you’re given. Give your life to those who save it. That dog of mine would be very disappointed.”

A desperate, useless second attack electrified the air around them — there was nothing but rage pushing Akutagawa’s limbs in a standing position; and ire burned fast. When Rashomon pierced a pile of boxes, attempting to shatter it on his crossed arms, Dazai simply moved aside.

When the kid flew forward, fists raised, Dazai clenched his fingers around his flying arm. “Low,” he criticized, rolling his eyes. Akutagawa tried with the other arm. “Too high.” Dazai crossed the wrists he’d grabbed — dragging him close enough for his nose to shake in repressed frustration right against his own. “Focus. I appreciate the new approach, but —“

“So what, ” Akutagawa snapped. “You just want me to best you with no Ability?”

“Not at all,” He let go of him — watching him stumble a few steps back. He could have used Rashomon to slow the landing, he considered, with the same attention Elise dedicated to all her dolls. “I’m merely resigned to your inability to use it in a conscientious way, so we might as well move on.”

Underneath the bloody orange light of the falling sun, his sweat glistened like tears on the skin of a corpse. He clenched his jaw, and spelled out: “I’m not useless. I know how to use Rashomon — my mission results have been —“

“76% success rate,” he recited. He seemed taken aback by the notion that Dazai would know. Dazai circled him like a hawk, skipping steps just to have his knuckles grow candid in tandem. “Yes, yes. A development from last year. Everyone is so relieved. Stil, I have to ask — given you’ve gotten as better as you promise, why are the Black Lizards a few alleys away, fixing your mess?”

A vein in Akutagawa’s cheek throbbed.

“The enemy was defeated,” he said, low.

“And shredded,” Dazai nodded, obnoxious in his encouragement. “And massacred. Turned inside out like a stuffed toy — marvelous. I’m sure you’ll do a great job with strengthening the terror that is attached to our name,” He clicked his tongue. “My problem was there, and my problem remains, though — you left no survivors, and I have nothing to do with that whole Red Hand’s Group base. No one will guide us to its secrets — no one will tell us how to find all they stole from us,” He widened his eyes. “But yes — tell me more about how Rashomon defeated the enemy. I am trembling with curiosity.”

Akutagawa stared at the ground.

“What, no stories? Nothing at all?”

Silence bubbled louder than frustration.

“That’s your problem, Akutagawa,” he let him know, stretching his neck. “You’re so awfully boring. I have to hold back from killing myself whenever I’m forced to be in your presence.”

A mutter came from his lips — a whisper between bloodied coughs. He curved on his knees to try and resettle his spine.

“Oh?” Dazai almost smiled. “Say that again.”

Akutagawa stilled.

Attempted to — the rattling of his chest refused to let him, drool and blood dancing on his chapped lips. “I didn’t say —“

“You thought about it, then,” Dazai cut him off, pushing the small of his back against one of the taller piles of boxes. “You’re hardly the first, I’ll tell you. You’re boring in that, too. But I’ll kill myself right here, if you want,” Endlessly casual, he raised his gun — laid it against his temple. He felt its mouth scratch the bandages right as he heard the ruptured inhale out of Akutagawa’s mouth, horrified — hands twitching in his direction, but not daring to move. “Come on. You’re getting shy on me now?”

At his roots, the Mafia dog was awkward.

It seeped between his clenched teeth and his permanently stiffened shoulders — stored itself between pimples and bruises, occasionally turning him into the sketch of a younger being. He took a step back — then one forward.

Eyes somewhere else — young, yes; but then again, all of the Mafia had never done anything but look away — Akutagawa concluded: “I’ll do it again. Can we go back to training?”

On less bitter lips, it would have been just a tad petulant. Dazai felt himself smile without any real want for the glee. “Coward,” he offered.

Akutagawa tensed up.

“Executive Dazai.”

Drizzled in uncertain rain, Hirotsu was a stark silhouette against the storming sky, breaking the missing doors of the warehouse in two.

“Hey there, Commander!” Dazai twirled the gun around his forefinger, using it to offer a salute. “Did you and your reptiles fix our mess?”

“To the best of our abilities,” he offered, his bow horribly low. Dazai recognized an attempt at moving his attention elsewhere when he saw it — it amused him, so he allowed the older man to not even glance in Akutagawa direction, as he said: “Would you mind accompanying me? New data on The Catfish has been found, and Boss told me to bring it up with you.”

He sighed. “Always me. You’d think him a step away from retirement, from the way he acts,” Dazai fixed his coat again, hiding his gun. “Come on, come on, let’s hurry. Akutagawa, you can catch a ride with your brother.”

Not a word came out of his mouth — the tight line of his shoulders spoke for him. His nose was still bleeding; two red trails stained his chin like cellbars, turning him into a less dirty rendition of the slum kid he had first met.

Humming, Dazai dangled over him like a bad storm.

He leaned so close every motion on his face came to a halt — he studied his fragmented reflection in the pitch black of his pupils, and couldn’t really find what Akutagawa saw in him.

“Sir,” the boy tried.

“You’re allowed to want me dead, if you wish,” Dazai told him, easily. It rattled him like one of The Catfish’s earthquakes. “I might even thank you for it. But be very careful — make sure hatred is fueling you. If you merely think your path in the Mafia would be simpler without me — you’ll be terribly surprised at what will be waiting for you when you’re actually free.”

Wide eyes soaked him, as if taking his word on the matter. Bad omen — Dazai had been called worse.

“No,” Akutagawa said. “Of course not.”

He shrugged. “Your mistake.”

Hirotsu didn’t speak all the way to his car.

As they passed a murmuring group of some of his Lizards makeshift lieutenants, Dazai caught the end of a bitter, exhausted: “— always used to have Double Black do this stuff. I’m guessing the voices must be —“

He did not accelerate. He kept his eyes on nothing at all.

The Camaro — and why was it always a Camaro, anyway? — wasn’t kept quiet either way; Dazai rambled and rambled, voice cheerful by the strength of something that wasn’t quite him, and convinced the man to make a stop at a restaurant to get them some food. When Hirotsu refused to have them eat it in the car, though, he questioned: “Just where are you bringing me, kidnapper?”

A side glance. The Commander drove with one hand only on the wheel, always; it made him look pretentious. Familiar. “My house.”

Dazai paused in his excited motions.

“What, seriously?” He blinked.

“You don’t want to?”

“I just —“ Dazai pouted. “I was so sure you secretly lived in a retirement home.”

Exasperation almost had him driving through a red light.

He hadn’t quite have expectations about the place Hirotsu allegedly called his home — but when the Camaro was parked by a picket fence and a small, square garden, framing a two-stores house in the least bloodied corners of their syndicate, Dazai realized that had not been it. The walls were a soft grey, ruined by time in a way that made them appealing, rather than low value; the garden grew pink flowers and a peach tree, dangling gently around a wooden weaved couch. Peaceful and far too ordinary; something out of one Tanaki’s many —

Hush, he cut himself off. Hush, hush.

“Ah,” he commented, lost. Hirotsu was pushing the front door open — if he minded the way Dazai’s fingers caressed the flowers, he didn’t say. “And you’ve lived here for how long?”

He hummed, pensive. “Thirty, thirty five years? First house I bought after leaving the rooms at the Headquarters. Haven’t left it since.”

“You lived at the Headquarters?”

“Most did, in the old regime,” The door was opened, at last, forcing an unmistakable smell of homemade food and old cigarettes up his nose. “It was better to stay close. Your shoes?”

Dazai kicked them off, surging inside the house with the curiosity of a rabid dog.

There was too much, and his hands weren’t sticky enough, in their attempt to leave their trace on every surface. None of the furniture was white and modern, as most Mafia’s paychecks bought — everything was in warm shades of honey and wood brown, woven and carved and having clearly been cared for for a long time. The rooms weren't wide, but the sliding traditional doors creaked with age; his kitchen, where Hirotsu settled, was an alcove of food, souvenirs, and a two-seats table.

He perked up. "Miranda!" he recalled, only jumping a bit on his feet. "Is she here? Can I meet her? I have to ask her what tragic accident had her consider you a viable happily ever after option."

"You are so very kind," Hirotsu offered, as he threw one of the Mafia projectors on the table.

Insisting, he perched on the free chair. An old fridge broke the counter in two; hung messily on it was a mixture of blurred photographs from Kouyou's camera — Gin's frowning face; some beautiful locations Dazai recognized from his international missions — and doodles Dazai and Chuuya had tended to fill his dossiers with during meetings. The habit had died long ago — he was surprised the man had kept them. "If she's pretty, can I propose a double suicide?"

Hirotsu looked at him funny.

"What?" he whined. "Just if she's pretty."

Machinations passed behind his eyes; with a resigned, uncertain sigh, he turned his head to the hallway and called: "Miranda?"

Dazai's mind braced itself — tall or short, he wondered, bulkier or petite, and, what would Hirotsu even like in a woman that isn't deadly? No sound of steps appeared from the corridor; before he had time to hypothesize a retired spy of sorts — an unmistakable sound reached his ears.

"Meow."

His sardonic grin froze on his face.

The cat was a beautiful shade of gray — fur stained by patches of old age, turning it darker and paler intermittently. She moved with the grace of a well groomed beast, but she lacked a left ear and a left eye — the only one left was a stunning shade of green. It reflected the light from the windows, when she jumped on the table — studying Dazai the same way she would have a particularly fat rat.

She blinked at him, tail curling by the curve of Hirotsu's petting hand. "Meow," she insisted.

Dazai was petrified.

"Miranda, this is Dazai Osamu," Hirotsu introduced, not an inch of amusement in his tone. The cat allowed him to scratch her chin, purring. "I told you all about him."

Cats couldn't nod, but it felt as if she did.

Cataract glossed her eye like a permanent veil — it was clear she was much older than most cats were lucky enough to end up being. Still, there was a cleverness in her gaze that was undeniably young — the wildness of a rescued stray.

“Excuse me,” he managed. “What?”

Hirotsu blinked. “You know Miranda.”

“Your adoratissima, yes.”

“Yes,” he echoed.

“Who you met on a dangerous mission in Europe. More than two decades ago.”

“A wretched job,” the Commander made a face, flicking the cat’s ear. “I barely managed to save her from the incinerator. You truly can’t imagine how glad it makes me that the Port Mafia never dubbed in threats via animal corpses.”

“Wait,” Dazai’s brain was bouncing across his skull, useless. “Wait. So — wait.”

Patiently, Hirotsu and Miranda waited.

“She’s not your wife?”

“My wife?” The Commander didn’t laugh — because that wasn’t quite him — but he came closer to it than he’d seen him in a long time. “No, no.”

Dazai stared.

The frustration of being one-upped had his fingers twitching. “How is she not your wife?”

“I wouldn’t marry a cat.”

“Hirotsu.”

The Commander sighed. He picked up the cat, amidst unexisting protests, and cradled her to his chest — she nuzzled into a blood stain on his shoulder, paws playing with the silver thread of his monocle. “It was common knowledge, in the old regime,” he admitted, easily. His house was filled to the brim with paintings and cat food; Dazai could hardly believe he hadn’t picked up on it. Bested by the handler. Horrified, he realized Chuuya could never know. “No one asked after Mori took over — apart from Executive Kouyou.”

“She knows,” Dazai’s bones creaked. He all but melts with his adoratissima, she’d said. As the man rubbed his cheek on the cat’s head — he was inclined to agree. “Of course she knows.”

“You boys made your assumptions,” With head-spinning ease, the man shrugged. “Given that someone spread the word of Miranda’s existence as soon as they found out about it —“ Dazai stared at the ceiling, ignoring him. “And given our business, I decided to take advantage of it.”

Dazai studied him accusingly. “You made fun of us for three years.”

“I tried to,” Hirotzu corrected. “It’s hardly my fault if you allowed me to.”

The world was rice and lies. Evening had, at last, painted the sky a gentle blue. He watched his hands — felt more shaken than even those letters from the Rat had left him.

“But,” he insisted, again. “But —“

Hirotzu tilted his head. “I would appreciate it if you kept this to yourself. Apart from obvious exceptions I can do nothing about.”

“Obvious exceptions?”

A curled eyebrow. “You know.”

“I don’t.”

“You will,” he conceded.

Dazai felt a bit like crying. “But —“

Three eyes and one blank expression — the man and his cat stared at him, waiting.

“Alright,” He slumped on the chair until the backrest hurt his nape, studying mold stains on the ceiling like God himself would answer. “Point for you, Handler. Just one point.”

The man failed not to show satisfaction.

Projected into a small portion of the table, The Catfish’s unofficial wanted poster — stolen by an Archivist from the more easily hacked database of the lower Division’s ranks — painted a terribly unimpressive picture. He was tall and lanky, with a shock of carrot hair that reached his waist; the coat he wore — so long, and buttoned so tight it made it impossible to guess whether he had any clothes apart from it on — was green like dirty grass.

“He has no aims,” Hirotzu explained, as he read through stolen Division analyses Miranda was holding on her head for him. “No power thirst, no events against any syndicate in Yokohama. In the most elementary way possible — allegedly, he’s just a bit out of it.”

Dazai sighed. “I can’t blame him.”

“His episodes have amounted to damage costs as high as an underground conflict, though. The Special Division wants him out of the city.”

“Then let them do it,” He shrugged. “One less bother for us. Unless he starts knocking on our borders — this is all but the moment to call the Division’s attention. At the very least, they seem to have finally moved their eyes from us.”

Hirotzu frowned. “Boss insists this would be over sooner if we involve ourselves, though.”

“It would,” Dazai conceded, around some cookies the man had stuffed under his nose, right by Miranda’s swaying tail. “But Elise is terrified of earthquakes — so forgive me if I doubt the wisdom of his motivations.”

Miranda purred, almost reproachful.

“I know you hate him,” the man began, his hands raised. “But you need to consider —“

“Hate him? I don’t hate Mori.”

Perhaps his skeptical expression should’ve surprised Dazai more. More than half the syndicate had been ready to start a coup d’etat in his name a little more than six months ago, though — clearly, most had come to their own conclusions about the closed doors Mori usually dragged him behind.

I didn’t doubt you would deal with this as it was needed, the doctor had said, a bit distractedly — but always, always, so focused on him — when he had finally crawled out of the dungeons. He’d dripped blood on his desk just to see Mori grimace, but he’d been untouched. Perhaps, he did hate him — just a bit. On the matter of efficiency, you’re just like me.

“Why would I hate Mori?” Dazai insisted, as genuinely as he knew how.

Hirotsu blinked. Graceful, Miranda slipped from his grasp, curling up between the files on the table — close enough for him to experimentally lean forward, nose to nose, squinting.

“The question remains even if you aren’t a woman,” he informed her. “Why would a pretty thing like you choose to live with Gramps?”

Miranda meowed, unblinking.

“I understand,” he sighed. “Necessity is one hell of a beast. Our world is haunted and ghosts are as bored as a bloodthirsty emperor. I’ve had to play partners with a rabid dog because of it.”

Mindless, canine yipping echoed in his ears from nowhere at all. His phone didn’t ring; the old dog charm stayed where it was, faded and hanging from a thread Dazai refused to change on principle. Chuuya was always the one to call — sometimes, to drunkenly ramble about some European job that was far too easy; others, to ask him unexplainable questions and shut the phone in his face.

Are all birds robots?, he’d asked, eleven days ago. He’d closed the call right as Dazai confirmed it, and he hadn’t heard from him since. When I get home, he had rumbled, once, drunk — when I get home, you’ll fucking hear it.

“Chuuya should be back by the end of the week,” the Commander commented, failing at any kind of subtlety. “He mentioned he wanted to check on the Suribachi project. According to his schedule, though —“ His eyes stayed on the files; his voice unchanging. The Mafia’s column. “He’ll miss Tanaki’s execution.”

“A shame,” Dazai offered. “He’s got a thing for bonfires.”

Uncharacteristically, Hirotsu flinched.

“Oh, don’t be like that,” he hushed. Bravely reaching for Miranda’s fur, he waited to see a hint of approval in her only eye — half smiling at the involuntary match of theirs — and caressed her, head to tail, watching her purr. “She’s a traitor. That’s all there is to it. What did you expect us to do?”

The man studied him. “I’ve learned,” he offered, after some pensiveness, “That despite what one may think, duty and feeling are not necessarily made for contrast. You can understand what must happen to her is impervious — you can mourn a friend, too.”

“Mourn,” Dazai echoed, tasting the letters. “That’s entirely unnecessary.”

“The unnecessary is hardly not needed.”

“Now, don't get poetic on me.”

“Dazai,” His tone forced him to lay his eyes on his wrinkled, time-carved face. Miranda reached for his palm as he got a bit lost in the effortlessness with which the Commander wore his age. He tried to imagine the white of his hair on his own knotted locks — the way bandages would have felt on withered skin. He failed. “We all cared for her.”

The spot Chuuya had a habit to pinch on his forehead twitched with mental exertion. There’s my prodigy, he recalled.

“Yes,” he agreed, slow — unusually unsure. “And you were wrong.”

Hirotsu’s face turned complicated. Dazai got the feeling of having missed the point.

“Boss asked me to tell you to go find him, one of these days,” he concluded, eventually — all the exhaustion from words not said sticking to his traits, barely erased by massaging hands. Removing his monocle and throwing it on the table, he became blind to the squinting way Dazai studied him — unused to that sight. “He’s still waiting for an answer on your urn.”

Miranda turned, offering her belly. It was an oddly undignified move for a cat as old and frail as she was — Dazai rubbed her paws, feeling how easy it would have been to break her in two.

She had the same inviting, trusting look Kazuko had carried in her too clever eyes. With his Ability and his Mafia-black hands, it was a wonder Hirotsu had never killed her by mistake.

Or perhaps it wasn’t. Perhaps it was only Dazai’s pets that never lasted past the summer.

“With how enthusiastic he’s been about this whole ordeal, you’d think he was planning to burn me at the stake along with Tanaki,” Dazai heard himself whine, as childish as he knew how. “Say, old man, can’t you just convince him to get me a shoebox from Elise’s wardrobe and call it a day?”

“Traditions hold the Mafia together,” the Commander replied, not unkindly. “Burning hair strands for a loved one, throwing our ashes —“

“— in the sea,” Dazai completed, huffing. “I find this whole limbo offensively useless. We had enough bad experiences with Limbos, didn’t we?”

“One would think you would love this.”

“You all say that,” His smile stretched his face until it ached. There had to be easier ways to vocalize the infantile pull in his viscera; telling him that a tombstone was worse than a furnished home — but the pull couldn’t tell him why. People don’t linger, it promised, high with the thrill of comparing him to the impossible, people just die. Blood and massacres and death until they die.

“Hirotsu,” he concluded. “Let me sleep on your couch.”

The man — well aware that Dazai wouldn’t sleep where someone else was, and that conceding meant working at the HQs for the night — sighed.

A good two hours later, nonetheless, files signed and one hand on the door, Hirotsu studied his curled up frame under some spare blankets on his flower-patterned couch. Miranda had situated herself between Dazai and the door — just like her owner; an unlikely guard. Dazai burrowed in the cigarette-smelling pillow, and surfed channels on the small television like none of it mattered.

“I’ll pick you up for the execution,” the man said, stalling by the door. His scarf was wrapped wrong, but Dazai didn’t feel like telling him.

“Thank you for the ride,” Dazai yawned — fairly sleepy, and as polite as he’d been taught.

Hesitation didn’t fit the Commander, but it was there all the same. “The Mafia is not an undemanding place,” he offered, too slow. “But you’ve done good until now, Dazai.”

Running bodies chased each other in the cobalt light of the television. He traced their plastic smiles and the pathetically fake wounds — then the outline of Miranda’s protection; unwanted and unneeded. He thought about bombing his car; he thought about whether or not he’d visit the coast and mourn Dazai, sooner than later.

I didn’t doubt, Mori had smiled. You’re just like me.

Hirotsu was still looking at him. Out of virtually nowhere, Dazai hated him, frigid and sour.

“Thank you for the ride,” he concluded.

Tanaki got burned on a Thursday.

As it fit those who went against the Mafia, two faceless subordinates from the Lizards forced her trembling body against the curb of the interior parking lots in Building One, settling her teeth against the concrete block. Only the Executives occupied the circle around her — better not to give spectacle, Mori had ordered, pulling Elise's ribbons, not when someone so well loved is involved.

"The Secret Executive sends his regards," the doctor explained, from behind Dazai, clasping two hands on his shoulders. "He couldn't join."

Further away than the northern pole, Dazai felt it tug his chest — the jealousy.

Tanaki didn't seem to care.

What was left of her after the dungeons was impossibly strange to eyes that had seen her laugh — half of her silver hair had been ripped off; the rest was matted with the same blood that had long since dried on her bruised skin. Dazai did not want to be there. Her calves weren't working — once her jaw was dislocated, between shrieks her wrecked vocal chords couldn't vocalize, the men had to slide her across the floor to get her to the gasoline-soaked podium, and he did not want to —

Dazai switched the safety off his gun — a bit surprised that he had remembered to put it on at all; a bit at loss to when — and looked her right in the eyes as he shot three bullets.

Mori hummed, distracted. "The sound quality in this parking lot is truly something," he whispered, pulling on Kouyou's sleeve like a bored child. "We should start hosting official meetings here."

"What, so Ace can rate cars while we talk business?" she questioned.

The Executive huffed. "I wouldn't."

Three steps from them, Tanaki slowly bled out.

Her hands drew circles in the onyx gasoline, as she wheezed and begged wordlessly, her bleeding chest raising and falling with no rhythm. Hirotsu extracted his new lighter and threw it in the puddle she was melting into.

"Sorry," she mouthed.

His lips didn't move. He dreamed — only for a second — that the flames would be for him.

Dazai hadn't gotten the story of that x scar on her face, in the end — he decided that it'd have to be enough of an answer. Tears of terror wrecked her — uselessly, she tried to slither away from the gasoline, crawling and bawling and howling that soundless screech, slipping like a newborn fawn. "Sorry, I'm sorry —" He wished the fire would hurry — he wished he didn't have to be there. He wished she'd die quieter and quicker; wished he could kneel by her side and let her know death and life weren't different at all, and if he didn't fear, neither should she — wished she didn't have to die before figuring out how Spider Eyes ended. "I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I'm —"

The flames reached her skin. With the voice she didn't have, she screamed.

Burning flesh had a very distinct smell — a mixture of sharpness and sourness that always got stuck in the back of his throat, startling a gag reflex that wasn't all that Demonic of him. Eventually, it only ever tasted like his own drool — gulped down and gulped down again, the motion subtle enough not even Mori's keen eye could catch the bob of his Adam's apple.

Eventually, it tasted like blood. And that was it.

"Wonderful job," Mori congratulated, in his ear. Tanaki's skull had started to melt — she was a blackened, crooked mass, and the laugh-wrinkles she'd worn by her eyes had burned along to the tattoos. "We'll have to think of a grave for her. Her ashes, though —"

He blinked. Snapped his fingers towards the two Lizards — gestured in a way Dazai caught by the corner of his eyes only.

"God," Kouyou's nose scrunched up. She did not care, and Mori did not care, and none of them cared — and Dazai didn't either. I care that it's blood and massacres and death, Tanaki has sworn, and that it will be until I die. "The smell is always intolerable."

---

...

---

And that was it.

---

...

---

[He crossed his legs on the blood-sticky floor, and leaned his chin on his hand to peek at Tanaki's face. Her neck had bent from sheer exhaustion — he had to search, tilting back; watching a thread of red drool dangle from her parted lips.]

Dazai lifted two fingers and wiped it off.

"I'm sorry," she murmured. It wasn't quite present — he would have guessed she wasn't much aware of his presence at all, until she added: "I'm sorry I have to make you do this."

Humming, he suggested: "Concern yourself with your wounds."

Weakly, Tanaki tried to raise her head. She was a doll with no strings — she was burned and she was bruised and she was shattered, and Dazai's hands had never even had the decency to shake as they did it. You're good at this, Hirotsu had sworn. I know, he hadn't told him. I know. I know. What else could I do?

Where else would you have me?, Kouyou had questioned.

"Will you concern yourself with your own?" Tanaki whispered, delirious.

He shrugged, crawling closer — laying his chin on the ruined flesh of her legs, and looking up at the instinctive terror in her pupils. Dazai's hands were Pavlovian and cursed — no matter all he had done, she'd die haunted by nightmares of him.

"No point in a wound," he recited. "Anyway. I get to keep all my scars."

"So do I," Painfully, her lips attempted to tilt into a smile. He had only reopened the edges of the silver lines crossing her face — tiredly, she whispered: "If I tell you how I got them, do you think Chuuya'll forgive me?"

Chuuya's not here, he didn't tell her. He did not want to hear his name in her mouth. He did not want to remember she'd hated him, even just for a blink. Chuuya's scars are not his fault.

"Don't waste your breath," he concluded, eyes closed. "They'll be gone by tomorrow." ]

---

...

---

Nonetheless — according to all scars and to all the hands on his shoulders — that was it.

---

...

---

“— melted like candle wax, I swear! They had to scrape her off the ground with the guns — the ashes wouldn’t move,” Dazai insisted, over the rim of his glass. Bar Lupin was warm and utterly empty, apart from the three of them; he had been grinning for hours. “Remind me to never attempt that for my suicide. I wouldn’t want to bother you guys so horribly with mine and my beauty’s corpse.”

On his left — looking somewhat nauseous — Ango sipped his tomato juice in silence.

“But won’t the Mafia cremate your corpse anyway?” Odasaku mused.

He waved the matter away. “That will be official business. This was a traitor being burned in the middle of a smelly parking lot.”

“Ah,” the man concurred. “I understand.”

“Is smelly tragic or —“

“Tragic,” Ango intervened, finally. Dried raindrops were stuck to his lenses — he seemed far too lost in thought to wipe them with his jacket; the bad habit he never lost. “Given circumstances.”

Dazai tutted. “Surely you don’t mean the removal of a Division mole?”

Low, lulling jazz music poured from the old stereos hanging from the corners of the bar. There was a single glass the barkeep had been cleaning for far too long; the pleasant smile on his face spoke of an attention saved for that music only. Mori would have had opinions about discussing Mafia business where such a man could hear it — but Mori would have had words about the secrets he’s told Odasaku when he’d met him, too. Mori had so many words and so many opinions — Dazai had no choice but to pick and choose.

The blinking, perplexed smile he offered to Ango told the man to pick and choose right.

“No,” The Archivist frowned. “Of course.”

Dazai hummed, content. “This will be good. Believe me! Without the looming threat of moles, Mori might just exhale and forget all about the projects and the executions and that business he’s so obsessed with,” He gasped. “He might even let me join Odasaku in the lower ranks, as promised!”

“He promised you that?” Odasaku asked, eyebrows brushing his hairline.

“Well — not in so many words. And he was a bit drunk when he said it — but I’m sure he will consider my offer,” He downed his drink; raised his glass in a toast. “Barkeep! Give me some detergent to celebrate!”

“No,” the man replied, politely.

“Aw. ”

“Don’t you like being an Executive?” the man on his right questioned, tapping his fingers on the wooden countertop. The sound stole some of Dazai’s fluttering attention, hyper focusing it. “It must come with pros.”

“The pay is great for the Arcade,” Dazai sighed, enamoured. “But I learned to scam kids out of their money long ago, so it’s not that important. Oh! I do like the Secret Force Squad. Having men around means I don’t have to do stuff.”

“The Secret Force Squad, ” Ango echoed, a bit vacantly. “You mean the one that’s secret? As in, no one should know it exists, or that you have it?”

“Precisely!”

“Dazai.”

“But being an Executive is nothing fun,” he insisted, leaning his chin on his crossed arms. “God knows why that ugly dog of mine wants to be one so badly. It’s just paperwork! Mountains and more mountains of it. Report after report after report. Barely any field work at — you’re too busy doing paperwork for it.”

“Really?” Odasaku tilted his head. “Is that why that whole Double Black rumor spread? ‘You guys are too busy to go on missions?’”

“Don’t put it like that,” Dazai tutted, his smile wide. “That will make me more amenable to the rare joys of being an Executive, and I’m here to complain. Paperwork, and meetings, and watching Mori chase Elise around — and executions,” Slow, testing danger that wasn’t there, he reached out to tap two fingers on the scar on Odasaku’s hand — the one he’d given him by shooting through it. “I think the executions are very boring.”

Ango and Odasaku didn’t exchange a look over his head — because they were his friends, and they were kinder than he would ever get to keep.

All their words were clockhands, and Dazai kept waiting for the bomb to drop.

“But she was a traitor,” he concluded, as he studied the blink-and-miss-it contact of their warm skin, cocooned by the Bar’s breath. No one had brought it up but him. Dazai should have known better than to linger. Dazai should have known better than to lift his fingers. “So it doesn’t matter, and it never will.”

Ango’s face, in his peripheral vision, said he understood. Odasaku stared forward — despite his Ability, though, he didn’t take his hand away.

“Does it have to matter?” he questioned.

There was no judgement in his tone — but there never was. Not for his bloodied hands; not for the women Dazai would discard with the one proposal they never accepted; not for his insistence not to understand his desire not to kill.

Odasaku listened and watched and knew — Dazai wasn’t sure of how to explain to him that no one else would ever be fit to judge him.

“Not really,” he hummed. “But I keep expecting something will, one of these days. This,” He nodded towards Bar Lupin — somber and old; wooden and familiar, settled around all of their shoulders like it made any sense for the three of them to find a common ground. “This is the one thing that has come close. You guys need to tell me more stories. Are you sure I can’t get a glass of bleach, Mr. Barkeep?”

“No, sir,” the man reinstated, offering him a gentle smile. “No one dies at the Lupin.”

He traced the crooked edge of Odasaku’s nose — listened, a bit distractedly, to the tip-tap of Ango’s fingers on his work phone. Countdown after countdown — until what?

“No,” Dazai agreed. “I guess not.”

---

...

---

The Catfish was having a night out.

“This is so unnecessary,” Dazai muttered, as his head bumped against the underside of Tanaki’s old desk. Panicked murmurs and gasps filled the hall of Building One, as the midnight crowd went around in a haste to find somewhere to hide from the seismic shocks. “Why earthquakes?”

“Because he has a terrible sense of humor,” Ace let him know, surprisingly crouching with him in that tight space. “Just look at that revolting name.”

Chandeliers dangled wildly over their heads — dust rained from the corners, as the floor shook and shook without any real semblance of a finale. It made the furniture creak over curled up bodies, filling the night in haunted, ghostly hisses.

“How macabre, being under here,” Oddly chatty, the Executive scrunched up his nose. The jewel attached to his cravat jiggled with every rattle of the earth — Dazai leaned as far away from his legs as possible, and followed the motion. “Like an open grave hiding spot.”

“This is a secretary desk,” he said, helpfully.

“You know what I mean.”

“That secretary salaries are a misery?”

“Executive Dazai,” Ace sighed, pompous, as another shock almost bumped his temple against the chair. “You really are a despicable sight.”

He smiled, unfriendly. His calculations had hardly ever been wrong — he’d predicted betrayal from that man since the first time Mori had made them shake hands. He just wasn’t sure of when.

“I know,” he offered. “It’s my pretty face.”

It took roughly ten minutes for The Catfish to get bored of the earthquake; eventually, only the mess of the hall and the distant emergency sirens all around the cities filled the air. Dazai crawled out of the desk, tapping the empty space with lingering fingers — and didn’t watch Ace struggle to do the same, grunting from the position the small space he’d left him had forced him into.

“That will make for a report,” he sighed, in distaste, fixing the ashy blond hair splattered across his cranium like flimsy threads. “But the night is long. Are you coming to the inauguration?”

“For The Sheepdog?” Dazai traced dust on the floor, dirtying the hems of the man’s pants. “I have an important appointment with the river — but I’ll try to make time afterward.”

Ace looked at him with exhaustion.

“Plausible deniability,” he reminded him, his chin touching the ceiling from the superior tilt of it. “Ramble elsewhere. I have data to send out, and no intention of receiving the Boss’ wrath for ignoring your antics while I type.”

“Certainly,” Dazai agreed.

Out of nowhere, then: “Has Vice-Executive Chuuya been informed of Tanaki’s execution?”

He blinked, genuinely skeptical. “Why were you expecting me to do it?”

“Figures,” Ace muttered. “Even the Secret Executive knows, but nobody could bother to send out one more email — do you know how much desk work I’ve been sagged with recently?”

“No,” he said, honestly. “I never do mine.”

The Executive muttered some more.

Dazai saluted, utterly careless — and made sure to lock the Building One's doors and break the lock behind himself after he left.

Underneath the hands of the October sky, the river was a mirror of silver moonlight and too tall buildings, rushing gently across the trash-littered banks. They got cleaned off every week, Dazai knew — but the plastic bags and the tourists' trinkets made up hills again by the end of every Monday. When his knees were soaked in its cold, dirty currents, Dazai felt his lungs widen with the promise of something.

Humming to some melody he didn't think too much about, he extracted the six latest letters bearing the rat's made up alphabet, and watched them decompose into nothing between waves.

"You would be an extremely fun adversary," he let the disintegrating paper know. "Had I any intention of living long enough to meet you."

The ink floated away through the waters, mocking him with no words. Dazai decided that he was bored — and set to swimming to the Bay, so that he could arrive at the Suribachi artificial island without getting bottled up in bridge traffic.

Yes, his mind let him know, sarcastic. It did not sound like Odasaku, but it didn't sound like Ango or Mori either. He made a face. Real clever.

The Sheepdog had been built on three floors and a triad system, connecting squares of buildings with neon-illuminated bridges that reminded him of Christmas decorated emergency stairs. The slick black and the new bricks fit like a bruise against the settlement only mere alleys behind it; Dazai could only imagine what the reflected lights of the club would look like from the depths of the crater.

The bar is an indenture, Mori'd explained, as he shoved Chuuya's project on his desk to look through. My assurance that we will get something out of this, whatever happens. His smile had been wide and proud. But a splendid idea, is it not?

It wasn't hard to see his touch. He doubted Chuuya would have asked to build an unreachable diamond right by the settlement — at the very least, not before anything else was given to the starving ones underneath.

"Executive Dazai," The two bouncers in front of the glass doors straightened.

"Good evening," he greeted, soaked shoes squeaking against the ground. "Is there any chance either of you knows if neon paint would kill a person, if ingested?"

The men exchanged a perplexed gaze.

Dazai sighed, and got inside.

The Sheepdog tried too hard to be a club — but it had clearly been built with the same aims the hole-in-the-wall bars across their territories carried. The furniture was a tad too antique, wooden and illuminated strangely by the colorful LED lights; the chandeliers shimmered like mirror balls over what should have been a dancing floor, but looked more like an aristocratic charity event. The bar counter wouldn't have been out of place at Bar Lupin — but all the stools were occupied.

The room was dark, interrupted only by the moonlight bathing the floor from the glass roof — and by the green, orange, blue, and pink neon body paint open barrels at the entrance allowed guests to splatter all over their bodies.

“I'm surprised you showed up,” Mori said, appearing from the shadows at his right. “You're not one to check on your finished projects.”

Curling his hand in the freezing blue liquid in the nearest barrel, Dazai replied — barely louder than the strangely tasteful music some too elegant mafiosi were discussing deals over: “If this is about the underground tunnels, I already told you — I've decided they make claustrophobic.”

The doctor sighed. Someone — Elise, most probably; or Kouyou, because no one else was half as brave — had drawn neon pink cat whiskers on his cheeks. “Sometimes I feel like your excuses have had less and less effort put in them, lately.”

“I'm bored,” Dazai offered, easily. “And you usually believe me, anyway.”

Mori conceded.

The crowd was a bundle of familiarity and distant threats — Kouyou's kimono, dragging slow and inconveniently across the new tiles; Hirotsu, discussing meeting spots and payments with the Suribachi owners they'd partnered with for the place; mafiosi Dazai didn't recognize and had no wish to evaluate outside of their bloated, bloodied sense of self-importance. People who joined the Mafia were always either desperate or too glad.

Chuuya was sitting on the bar counter.

Something, in the paper-thin space between his bones, melted with the creaks of hot metal.

“How nice,” Mori commented, following his line of sight — which was enough of a mistake. He had a drink in his hand; Dazai couldn't recall if it had been there when he had approached him, and couldn't believe he'd dare to drink it. “Chuuya was afraid he'd end up missing the inauguration. I'm glad to see that wasn't the case.”

There was something he was missing. He couldn't put his finger on it, so he rubbed his neon paint dirty hands together — until they shone the same blue as No Longer Human. “Can't believe we'll have to check for fleas on opening night.”

Mori laughed, like it was funny.

There was nothing but approval in the way he looked at Chuuya — all slim, short, vibrant black lines on the counter; because the stools were all occupied by the Guerrilla, surrounding him like domesticated sharks. But Chuuya couldn't die for them on a casual Saturday night, so camaraderie was probably the best next thing.

It was always kind of strange — seeing how people perceived Chuuya, material storm as he was. Dangerous, their drooling gazes said. He couldn't deny. And then they always got close enough to bite all the same. Dazai didn't get it. Dazai understood in the way of viscera figuring out blood.

"I'll make him Executive by the end of the year," Mori said, very casually.

"And the sky is blue," Dazai offered. He felt the urge to check his phone for missed texts — but he knew he wouldn't find them, so he didn't.

Instead, he sneaked a look to a nearby small table, temporarily abandoned to an impressive amount of half empty glasses — and set to filling them with the more neutral shades of the paint.

"Of course," Mori agreed. "You wouldn't have promised the Guerrilla to Akutagawa otherwise."

He spread part of the paint across his knuckles. Chuuya was nothing but one of Mori's pawns — a pawn he cared for, certainly; to the same extent he dedicated to all who fell in line with his plans. He added: "You know, I found them."

"Found who?" Dazai asked.

"His parents."

His fingers twitched — only a moment.

"I'm thinking of letting him know when he gets promoted," the doctor continued, as if a less monumental convo wouldn't have fit under those neon lights and neon skins. "He could pay them a visit. It would be a nice way to celebrate, don't you think?"

Momentarily abandoning his glass-filling quest, he stole one of the drinks for himself. "I'm surprised you'd let him go."

The man's smile was mocking. "Don't tell me you think he would stay."

"I didn't say that. I thought you'd keep that leash a while longer, that's all."

"Chuuya is —" Mori thought about it. "A stable point. He's certainly proven himself to be. I like to believe I know him enough. In fact —" He flicked a speck of green neon paint off his scarf; threading fingers through the fabric with a bone-sculpted tranquillity that would have dragged the syndicate to safer shores — until the end of times. "Here, let us have fun with it. I bet you our Chuuya will talk to them, and come back to us before the sun falls."

Dazai studied the blue dripping from his fingers. "I'll bet you he won't even talk to them."

Startled, Mori turned to look at him.

Unfortunate timing — it was exactly then that Chuuya's wine slid too crookedly against his mouth, trailing across his chin and startling him. His head snapped up, and he found Dazai.

“Hey!” he screamed, immediately, a step from jumping on the counter. He wasn’t drunk — not yet — but his frame was blurred by the lights and something awfully well-settled in its bones. “You! Get out of my fucking bar!”

Irritation spiked so quick it almost felt like a heatwave. “I named it!” Dazai screamed back, almost breaking the last of the glasses he’d ruined. “I surveyed the works. Get in line!”

Chuuya spluttered, speechless. The crowd between them had its skin lined in neon colors and unsubtle shut jaws, eyes settled on them with the horror of someone who’d been assigned to damage compensation jobs too often. “This is my project, you toilet paper puppet! I fucking sent out keep up the good work worker helmets!”

He gritted his teeth. “Not my fault I know not to waste money on little yellow hats.”

“Work endangerment fees, shithead!”

The sound of Mori’s sigh disappeared some time around the starkly inflated thing in his veins began to throb; Dazai stalked forward, smiling in that taunting way that got Chuuya’s veins to explode. He only had a speck of a second to notice the orange neon paint someone had stained the side of his neck with — rhythmically drooling into a smaller barrel situated by the counter, like a vampire bite.

He stopped by the start of the swarming sharks, cradling Chuuya like a fortress. Either not caring or not noticing, the boy squinted, distracted by his next long sip of wine — curling one finger in the air to call him closer.

Something in Dazai’s guts burned. Just to annoy him, he stayed where he was. The effort to pretend he wasn’t aggravated by it twisted Chuuya’s entire face.

“Europe always gives you the complexion of a street criminal,” he offered, obnoxious. “Either that, or whatever that stray sheep of yours puts on his knife before he stabs you with it. Assuming that’s the way you two pass the time?”

Chuuya’s head tilted as if he’d crushed it. He seemed to wonder about possible innuendos, only for a moment — only to land on the certainty that Dazai would mock him about betrayal faster than he would about childhood romance. “And whatever nasty fumes you’ve been inhaling in those sewer tunnels of yours are making you look more and more like your rat relatives.”

“Says the dog.”

A smudge of green neon paint has stained the underside of his jaw; Dazai kept his eyes there as he threw his head back to laugh. “Says the guy named the place after me.”

“It’s an insult,” he noted, very, very, slowly — in the tone he knew would make him feel like the idiot he was. “And calling yourself a dog won’t do well for your reputation.”

“Ah,” The boy raised his glass. Some guy in the stool by his thigh was lighting a cigarette — he bet it was for him. Chuuya dug two fingers in the pink fluorescent paint and — flicked it off, so that it landed, cold and merciless, on Dazai's cheek. His grin was brighter than the sun, and Dazai hadn't looked at his face in more than six months. "Still better than a prodigy's partner, yeah?"

Abrupt enough to make his head spin, he was starving.

Sharks and cigarettes and whatsoever — he stepped right through their painted, armed bodies, and saw Chuuya's hand twitch on the counter, as if keeping from clawing towards him. Jittery and electrified; sudden and impossibly light, like a swarming head that had bled too long and too alone. He wanted to drag his nails down his arms until Corruption scars reopened. Dazai hated him with viciousness. Chuuya's fingers flexed again, gloves against wood, and his mouth dried up.

The crowd swarmed around the counter, along to the music and the non-mafiosi who were there for the numbers — he felt the fast arrival of a body slamming against his back.

Before it could touch him, a leg was hooked around the back curve of his knees, plastering him in the space between Chuuya's thighs.

"The word you're looking for is hi," he told him — leaving his leg where it was for virtually no reason, and finishing his glass of wine. "Unless the dog food I found in all of my office drawers was meant to fill in. It didn't. It was shitty."

"Did you try it?" Dazai asked.

"It was in the paperwork."

"Of course the first place you'd go to would be your work office," Dazai supplied, leaning both his elbows on the counter, by each of Chuuya's thighs. It sounded slightly better than, the food's been there for months or I didn't know when you'd come back or I hoped you wouldn't or you did. "You'll be happy to know I fired all your favorite goons."

Chuuya had the gall to snort — as if Dazai hadn't pulled crueler, sicker pranks in the past. "I doubt you care enough to ever learn to document firing procedures."

"I just wouldn't document it."

"That would get you fired, hypothetically."

"Chuuya," he whispered, conspiratorial, smearing a dot of blue paint between his eyebrows — to watch him go instinctually strabismic. The hand he rubbed it with sported a blue Sheep bracelet; Dazai gulped down violence and something far too young, still stuck underneath Arcade lights. His teeth tasted of iron. "Haven't you heard? You can't fire the next in line."

He was unimpressed. "The only line you're part of is the one at the end of hangman game."

A distinctive, unmistakable scent filled the air, uncurling from the mixture of alcohol, smoke and body sweat — something like earth and blood, and that shampoo Kouyou had bought Chuuya once, that he'd never changed. Someone had slid a knife by the seam of his mouth, during a mission — that corner was reddened and still healing, wrinkling his skin when he talked. Dazai's coat was warmer than fire, and Chuuya's leg was a line of prickly needles, reminding him every few instants that he was a physical thing — when it dropped, he mourned it with a shiver.

“Hello,” he offered, eventually — with the grand tone of a merciful concession.

Somebody toasted. For the first time since they were fifteen, Chuuya's eyes were the same, unclear color under the kaleidoscopic lights — he roamed them across his face with something both breathless and conflicted. Dazai's elbows had him curved, looking up at him — and adding that to the counter, there was a rare height imbalance that had Chuuya finally able to study him from above.

“Hello,” he responded, very quietly. Frowning.

The toast got a second shout out; Chuuya refused the cigarette his goon was offering, which made Dazai pettily satisfied — then, with all the repressed rage of a feral dog, he strangled Dazai in a merciless headlock, rubbing his knuckles across his hair to make some sort of point.

“Hey!” Dazai whined, attempting to escape the sweaty fabric of his dress shirt and the bicep vein beating right against his ear.

From some nearby corner, a familiar voice called out: “Back already, Exec?”

“Just to kick your ass, Kajii!” the boy yelled back, something purely enraged in his tone — as if looking at Dazai had snapped something in his evening charm. “I told you to have that lemon tree out of my office by the time I was back, didn't I —”

Dazai punched him between the legs.

All it got out of Chuuya was a humiliating huff. Dazai pushed himself off — filled with glee and released frustration, the boy snorted, gloved hands coming to cup his scalp and almost bump their foreheads together. He rattled Dazai's head, instead — as if too breathless to figure out if his grip should have been delicate or not — studying him with the charged attention of someone who had stumbled on a chameleon.

They were entirely too close for murmurs not to swarm across them like flies. Drunk on the smell of the fluorescent paint — on the childish need to make sure someone would have something to say about Double Black, next morning — Dazai leaned close enough to smear the shell of Chuuya's ear with the paint on his own cheek, and bit the space between his choker and his jaw.

Chuuya didn't even slap him for it. His hands ran through his hair like electric shocks, the Sheep bracelet getting caught in the strands — out of any real control, Dazai felt his eyelids drop.

“It's a gift!” Kajii was complaining, still.

“It's a tree made of bombs. ”

“Not anymore!” The texture of his gloves was harsh against his knotted hair — Dazai inhaled a whiff of gunpowder from his jacket, and felt so pathetic for it he deflated. “It’s just lemons, now.”

“Oh,” Chuuya paused. A bit awkward, he cleared his throat. “Oh — thank you, then.”

Exasperated, Dazai groaned.

Pulling his hair harshly, the boy dragged his head back to meet his eyes. “Die somewhere else.”

“Tell me about London,” he insisted. Tell me why you’re not mourning anymore. The spot he had bitten was turning red, glinting with spit. He felt utterly confused. “Anywhere must be more entertaining than this place. Better yet — it smells here. I’m annoyed. Tell me in the backrooms.”

Chuuya curled an eyebrow. “The what?”

Stepping back, he chased some whim and pulled on both his gloved hands with his own — a mere suggestion. “You ran so far you missed all the work on your little pet project. I’ll show you.”

His eyes hardened. “I didn’t run.”

“You did,” he replied, final and blank. That, or they made you. “I’m figuring out what made you return, though.”

It wasn’t much of a question at all. The Yokohama skyline — the way the buildings of the Headquarters looked when the sun fell, reflecting blood orange on rusted, rotten walls. Coming back is a matter of wanting it more than something else, Odasaku had once said — and Dazai had never gotten to ask him, what was ever home enough for you to want it back?

The low accusation had stiffened Chuuya’s shoulders. He pulled on his hands. “Come on,” Dazai insisted, in a specific tone. “Look around and trust your bored instincts.”

Gloved fingers curled around his hands — unsharpened talons. Dazai wondered if he could have torn that Sheep bracelet apart without him noticing, petty and childish and because; wondered if Chuuya would have raged about it.

He felt, sudden and strange, that he could have asked him to raze that place to the ground, and that the boy would have simply done it.

If Chuuya was played just right, he would have done almost anything Dazai asked of him. The thought was both revolting and lonely — a disappointment Mori wouldn’t have understood, because he wasn’t stupid enough to despise his best cards for being loyal. But Dazai disliked that dog whistle with superiority and childish contempt. Chuuya would never learn a thing. Dazai wouldn’t either — allegedly, it would only hurt one of them.

The boy jumped from the counter. “If I miss Free Shots Hour I’m killing you.”

The moment they reached the double back doors decorated with a DO NOT ENTER sign, squeezing between the dancing crowd and the too clever banter of scrounger deal makers, a booming voice thundered, masking even the music: “What the fuck did you do to our drinks?”

Dazai hooked his hand on the upper part of Chuuya’s harness, over the waistcoat. “We need to run.”

“What — oh, you fucker —“

Unluckily, they weren’t allowed to make a wild run for it — Mori appeared from seemingly nowhere, grasping the back of his coat as if he was a misbehaving kitten, loudly proclaiming apologies in his stead.

The unfriendly guy — whose mouth was stained by the blue neon paint Dazai had put in his group’s drinks — softened the moment he got a good look at Mori’s scarf and Dazai’s bandages. By the time Dazai managed to turn to Chuuya again, though, he was gleefully being dragged away by Kajii and some chanting men from the Guerrilla, calling for a welcome home drinking round.

Dazai’s fingers were being pulled along, still tied around his harness. Chuuya — frantic like the dog he was, attempting to find his eyes over the back of some tall Guerrilla woman; but regretful, almost, he thought, like a fool — grabbed his hand and squeezed, just once, mouthing: later.

“Now don’t be impatient,” he said, even if it was too low to be heard. Chuuya frowned as if he had. Dazai hated him some more.

He watched him disappear between the dancing crowd and his own startled laughter, as the men attempted to throw him in the air.

Prettier than a ruby and ten times harder to break, Dazai had once described him as, ranting to the cat that slept by his shipping container when it rained. Despite those ugly expressions he makes all the time. The entire syndicate seemed to bloom around him the more men realized he’d come back. Chuuya belonged to them before he belonged to even himself. Ten times harder not to miss.

“You know better than to anger drunk mafiosi, Dazai,” Mori tutted, as if hadn’t noticed a thing, cleaning invisible dust off his coat. “Come on. We managed to send an invite to Le Directeur’s representative. Play him for me, would you?”

Eyes on the glimmer of a buckle choker — Dazai could do nothing but nod.

The high society Mori had somehow tied to the Port Mafia — between Dazai’s plans and his own endlessly convincing alleged awkwardness — seemed to be entirely mystified by The Sheepdog. A good number of them had started playing cards in the widest of the VIP section — at the head of the table, a newly arrived Ace was scamming them with the joy of an elementary schooler. Looking at him brought, has anyone told the Vice-Executive? questions back to mind — burrowed in a couch with his console plastered to his face, Dazai looked for Chuuya, and found him being handed a lit cigarette by a man from Kouyou's.

“ — Hunting Dogs, despite the success,” a man on Mori's other side was saying. Dazai won the next level of Smash Smash! and listened, quiet and unassuming. “The project has some virtue to it, but I wouldn't bet on its vitality.”

“It has worked enviably for almost ten years now,” Mori replied, with that tone he used with all outsiders — interested like a friend, and just vacant enough under that layer to make his interlocutor relax. The lack of expectation from a man who expected everything on a silver platter. “Any surgical procedure of that might comes with the side effect of a short life for its first subjects, but as long as the method is perfected —“

“And who says they won't cultivate an immortal life as well?” another woman intervened. “God knows Captain Fukuchi has invested far too much in this project not to subvert expectations.”

Mori laughed in a strange way. Dazai let it linger between a jump his character didn't take and the shiny golden coin on the other side.

“The Captain is a man of principle,” His fingers tapped the glass in a rhythm he recognized from Elise's hums — war times songs. “I've never met him personally, but an acquaintance of mine happened to hold him very close to his heart. A man like no other,” Something mocking pulled his lips. “And an infallible ally to our Government.”

The man snorted. “Which is surprising in its own right. Everyone knows how they feel about Abilities.”

“Why?” Dazai jumped in, widening his eye to its most childish extent. “Don't they like them?”

Miraculously, he didn't recognize him — his laughter echoed even over the music. “It took them the Great War to tolerate us, and even then — if it hadn't been for the Maihime Project, they would have simply dealt with us like the unstable freak show they think of us as.”

“The Project wasn't even supposed to even be popularized,” the woman next to him cut in, rubbing a neon orange smudge from her forehead. “Too dangerous; too high of a failure risk.”

Mori smiled in his glass. “You think so?”

“Someone spread a rumor — some poor man who was undoubtedly killed for it. Our only saving grace was that the Project didn't get revealed until after the War was over,” She shivered, a tad too dramatic. “Can you imagine if the public had been informed of the beginning of thousands of Ability-focused experiments in the middle of such a situation? Protests for the misplaced funds on one side, protests for the borderline inhuman trials Users would be put through on the other — it would have been a mess.”

Several tables away, a Guerrilla man tipped Chuuya's hat off his head — offering him a beer in exchange. Chuuya watched him try it on with a tight smile and no protests — he took it back with no fanfare, spinning it from the chain.

He'd have to show him the tunnels, Dazai found himself planning. There was an itch under his skin he couldn't scratch. And pray he got lost there until he starved.

"Not like there weren't protests anyway," the man corrected her. "But people saw what all those Abilities had been able to do for the War, and it made them more amenable."

"The attention was suffocating, still."

"An entire side of the journalism force has only been focused on figuring out the extent of the alleged Ability experimentation, ever since," With a scoff, the man finished his glass. Mori studied his profile as he would have the Yokohama view from his office — swearing he could see the big picture from a few rooftops. "My theory is that they get fed some truth between fake information, so they have something to fill the papers with —"

"— without revealing any real business we aren't meant to know," The woman nodded. "The Port Mafia police system."

Mori grinned, raising his glass — gracefully untouched, thanks to Dazai's petty warning — and toasted right in his direction. "You flatter me. One of the Executives came up with it. We cannot claim such an old strategy for ourselves, though — the big fish have always known how to hide."

He wondered what Odasaku was doing.

"Still, with all these rumors you hear —" A lingering frown matted the woman's forehead. "I don't entirely know if the Maihime Project should have had the life it had. Has."

"Why not?" Dazai questioned, in the right moment. When Mori brought him along, if not to fool some unfooled people, it was usually to ask his questions — so that Mori wouldn't appear too curious.

She shrugged. "My spies have ears in all relevant corners of the Government — they have torn that paper apart just to make sure their every whim would be approved on its basis."

"They technically based the entire treaty against the Ballerinas on it, all those years ago," the man agreed. Several tables away, Chuuya had laid his eyes on him. Dazai clicked his console. "The Project detailed a correct study of Abilities that would allow the community to benefit from it — it was basically authorization to act against any force attempting to self regulate Abilities."

"And it gives them ground to hide skeletons in their closet," The woman sighed, stretching her neck back to study the colorful lights. "God knows the international mess we would have had if the Arahabaki Project hadn't been —"

Dazai didn't even twitch.

He knew he didn't; would have sworn it in front of a curb and three set bullets — he was nauseatingly, utterly aware of the thin layer of frost petrifying his muscles in a cold field, immobilizing him like a cornered prey. It made him feel his skin all too much — gave him corporeality that should have been terror, perhaps, but was all too sharp to be so. Thoughts swarmed across his head faster than he could convince them it wasn't worth it — he'd thrived on knowing more than the person beside him. He'd heard it — he'd never forget it.

It didn't seem to matter. Pressed against his right arm, Mori turned to look at him.

Before he could smile — a warning and an order and a question all in one; because Dazai hadn't even twitched, and if Mori had known to turn, all the same, there was something he had to be doing wrong — the ground began to shake.

---

...

---

Golden Demon crashed against the falling metal beam upon their VIP section mere seconds before it could squish them like bugs.

“Get out of the building!” Hirotsu shouted, as every wall and every ceiling began to shatter by the corners, raining dust and thundering like the end of the world. The ground vibrated as if the earth itself had started spinning; the sound of the agitated sea from behind the coverage of screams was head-spinning. “Gather by the bridge —”

“Don't get on the bridge!”

Chuuya floated over the mass of panic and swarming bodies; his eyes were bloodshot. “Don't get on the bridge,” he insisted, using that barking voice of it to make every mafioso wince. “Not until the shocks are over. Gather by the settlement!”

““You wanna bury them in the crater?” the startled hiss out of Ace's mouth — close; helping two Lizards drag Dazai and Mori away from the ruins of the destroyed beam — was disbelieving.

“That might be fun,” Dazai offered. “Just the way to make the clubbing experience more —”

““You wanna let them drown, jackass?” the boy insisted. He stuck to the ceiling; roamed until he found the red shock of Mori's shoulder. “Get the Boss out! Now!”

Dazai crawled out of the Lizards' hands — he found a small group of Secret Force by the doors, which had been locked by the fallen The Sheepdog sign; brain resettling itself, with a deep sigh, he began ordering: “Get Chuuya and that User from the Lizards to open the doors. Move Mori to the closest car and get in the middle levels of the settlement — not the deeper one, and not outer ones. Middle. Signal the Headquarters and have them call firefighters for the other end of the bridge, so they can send boats —“

“Boats?” one of the women questioned, as another shake — stronger and more vicious than any of the ones from the last weeks — tore a hole in the ceiling. “Isn’t the bridge better for —“

Cracking the already shattered ground, the unmistakable glow of Chuuya’s presence appeared by his side. “The bridge is gonna fall,” he told her, immediately understanding. “The Catfish is taking advantage of the higher floors being all in one place — a separate island, nonetheless. God damn —“

Before he could finish, darkness engulfed them.

It took him half a second to figure it out, eyes roaming over the sole light of the neon paint still stuck to the escaping crowd — The Sheepdog had been built with a higher tower on the side of its three-stories cube, planned for later VIP sections and more private businesses. The glass roof of the main room showed its fall in a devastatingly slow motion — groaning with a metallic screech.

Dazai moved before his mind could think — he pushed Chuuya with all the adrenaline left in his body, watching his Tainted-glowing body crash against the nearest wall.

Predictably quick with getting the plan, he tore the entire wall down — opening a chasm just wide enough for an elephant to pass through.

“Go!” Dazai ordered.

When most the crowd was gathered outside the club, the tower still didn’t fall — in the middle of the panicking shoulders bumping against his to run to the settlement, and the rain of debris from the destroyed two highest floors, the unmistakable glow of Chuuya’s flying silhouette peeked through the ruins. He jumped faster than the eye could follow, touching the tower and brushing his fingers on every falling piece of concrete, holding it all still in a floating, crimson haze.

But the earth kept shaking, so vicious Dazai fell to his feet at a mere attempt to breathe — even as the pieces didn’t fall, the ground cracked open.

Dazai crawled across the rumbling concrete, stumbling to avoid cars slowly slipping into the Bay. Standing on the nearest, taller piece of fallen wall, he cupped his hands around his mouth. “You need to follow the car with the Boss,” he screamed, over the deafening rumble.

Chuuya — hair floating around his face like luminescent tentacles, and flying far too high to pretend he’d read his lips — frowned.

“There’s still men inside,” he screamed back, probably guessing what he’d said. “Get them all on the road to the settlements and I —“

A hellish, horrid groan filled the air.

The Catfish was a blur of carrot orange and green, vibrating in the same yellowish light that had painted the Bay floor in reflected golden waves. He floated aimlessly, a thousand feet from where the bridge had already begun to crack, sending the few cars crossing it skidding into the water — even from a distance, the somewhat unstable expression stuck to his traits was unmistakable.

“Great,” Dazai huffed, nails bleeding from the effort to hold on onto the trembling piece of concrete he’d found. “Seismic Jesus is here.”

With unchanging focus, all the pieces held together by the glow of Tainted shoot for the sky with vertiginous intensity — with a battle cry of sorts, Chuuya crashed more than half of what had once been The Sheepdog into that flying dot.

One of the skyscraper-tall waves from the storm soaked Dazai head to food, slamming one of his temples on his makeshift lifesaver. “Great,” he whined, again. “We’ll have to rebuild. Where are your stupid yellow hats now, Hatrack?”

“Can you shut the fuck up?” Chuuya roared.

Both news and rescuing helicopters began to populate the sky, right as the bridge was finally snapped in two clean halves. Mori wouldn’t like that, Dazai barely had time to think, watching the helicopter’s lights shine a white circle on the waves — golden threads, thick like cables, erupted from the tips of The Catfish’s fingers, hooking around the half of the bridge not connected to the city. In a single move — it was raised like a baseball bat.

“Oh,” Dazai offered, helpful.

The Catfish slapped Chuuya away with the bridge like a misbehaving fly.

The rumble it caused in the air sent a wave of pressure that almost had Dazai land into the sea — the roar was like thunder. On the other side of The Sheepdog’s skeleton, mafiosi sped across ruins of buildings that had fallen when the settlement had been created, attempting to flee the maze to land in the crater. The golden threads had hooked themselves on the edges of the artificial island, as if to pull it closer — all they did was rattle it.

“Boring,” The Catfish said, hysterical. He wasn’t laughing, but it was a near thing — he had the crazed eyes Dazai had seen in every man he had tortured. “Boring! All of you! All of—”

His baseball-bat bridge half landed on him with cartoonish, horrifying swiftness — glowing a merciless, Tainted red, and weighing at least twice as much as usual.

“Do I look like a baseball ball, you fucking carrot?” Chuuya questioned, standing on top of the guilty structure. He didn’t seem hurt — he had to have modified the gravity of the makeshift bat the instant it had hit him. Momentarily childish, Dazai let out a, woah. “Do you know how much this is gonna cost to repair?”

Golden threads appeared around the piece of bridge, circling it like spiderwebs.

Before Dazai could see the smile fall from Chuuya’s face, his in-ear began whistling.

“—Boss,” Kouyou was calling. “You guys need to stop this earthquake right now!”

Dazai huffed. “It’s kind of hard to nullify a flying man, Ane-san,” he informed. “Poor Chuuya got crushed like the minuscule ant he is, and he didn’t even die! I’m really trying here —“

“Demon child!” she snapped, tone lined in something that had him straighten. “A building fell — we need Chuuya here, now. Boss is —“

Underneath.

He exhaled.

“Got it,” he concluded. Then he took his in-ear off, and threw it in the Bay.

Crawling upwards, bloodied nails sinking in the destroyed parking lot around him, Dazai set his eyes on the swinging-bridge match still going on between Chuuya and The Catfish. For a blink, he couldn’t understand how Chuuya hadn’t yet crushed him — then, he noted the golden threads hooked around the night streets of the mainland, and knew Chuuya wasn’t willing to risk startling the User into a last breath catastrophone.

Whining and huffing, Dazai stumbled all the way to the edge of the coast. When the strange bat slashed the air near his face — close enough to startle someone less aggravated — he hooked his elbows on the shattered pieces of road and metal, and landed on top of the bridge.

“What the fuck are you doing?” Chuuya screamed, jumping from spot to spot of the bridge — attempting to find an opening to knock The Catfish out where the bridge wouldn’t crash the city. “Get off!”

“You need to go to Mori!” Dazai screamed, helpfully — hands tight around two cracks in the concrete, body being swung around. Vomit was gathering behind his teeth. “He’s stuck under a building! Ane-san’s moaning about it!”

Horrified, Chuuya turned to look at the settlement.

“It’s useless,” The Catfish insisted. His voice reached Dazai’s ears with the intermittency of a washing machine, depending on how close he was to the baseballing source. “It’s useless —“

“Shut up for a second!” Chuuya snapped. “What do you mean under a building —“

“I told you to chaperon him on his way to the settlement —“

“Well, sorry, if I’m a little busy here —“

“Doing what!” Dazai screeched. “I’m about to fall in the Bay!” He paused, skull bumping on the stone. “Actually, that might not be too —“

“Shut up!”

“It’s useless,” The Catfish insisted. Both the floating and the earthshaking seemed too much of a concession; Dazai imagined the fun Ango would have writing down their full Ability — then, he imagined Odasaku shaking his seat, blank faced, to recreate the experience as he described. Dazai began to realize he might have gotten himself a concussion. “All the corners of this earth touched by my threads will do just as I say. Not even your gravity can stop them. Not even —” He giggled. “Not even —”

The bridge was agitated higher — before he or Chuuya could do anything about it, it hit both the emergency helicopters with one swipe.

They crashed in the ocean between alarms and screams, effectively cutting any recording and any possible help on the way to the settlement. His ear rang, as if Kouyou’s voice was still screaming at him, Golden Demon uselessly digging the earth.

Across that vertiginously shaking reality, he saw Chuuya straighten.

He understood his idea the instant that he saw it bloom behind his mismatched eyes — partly because it began swarming across the worst ideas possible in Dazai’s own mind. He followed his line of vision all the way to the settlement — too deep and too far away for the golden threads to reach, and seemingly unshaken.

“Chuuya,” he called.

Their eyes met. It seemed — annoyingly but trustingly constant — to be enough.

He reached for the gun under his coat right as the other boy jumped away from the bat-bridge, landing on the other half — still connected to the mainland. Head ringing and spinning from the unstopping movements of his only anchor, Dazai squinted, and shot The Catfish in the shoulder.

It wasn’t nearly enough to kill him — still, he began screeching; an ear-defending sound that shook the Bay harder than the golden threads.

In the corner of his eye, Dazai saw Chuuya rip apart the other half of the bridge off the city’s coast — and fling it, with a frustrated shout, onto the Suribachi City island.

Chuuya passed by like scarlet lighting — he barely saw him sink his fist through The Catfish’s chest, stilling all the motions in his face. The plan unveiled across Dazai’s eyes in the blink of a second The Catfish took to rage, and to throw him away with the whole bridge like a boring, useless ragdoll.

Use the other half of the bridge, he recalled, as he fell. Separate the artificial island in two, so the golden threads can’t reach the settlement, and they can escape with no earthquakes. Then Chuuya just had to fling himself at maximum velocity — land among the ruins before the bridge could, and take Mori out before the landing once-road could trap him permanently under there. The bridge would cut the island in two — even if he calculated it as precisely as possible, there was the possibility that Mori wouldn’t be on the right half.

Dazai understood the plan.

He knew it immediately when it changed.

Distant waves rushed by his ears the further and faster he fell — Dazai widened his arms and his legs, eyes closing, focusing on nothing but the air whipping his face. This might work, he thought, in a haze as grazing as his bandages. Suicide always seemed to flash by his mind, in near death situations. It was funny. Dazai had to be concussed. This might just —

Gloved hands grasped his sides, pulling him flat against a scorching hot body.

“God fucking damn you,” Chuuya snarled in his ear, with something like funerary acceptance.

Every bone in Dazai’s body screeched. He opened his eyes to red hair and his mind traveling too fast to follow — the absence of Tainted around Chuuya’s goosebump-covered skin; the fact that he was supposed to be miles away, dragging Mori out of the end; the sinking, catastrophic weight of the bridge plunging onto their tiny, Ability-less bodies at devastating velocity. How they were both falling, and Chuuya didn’t fall, as a rule. He was the excess of it all. Gravity didn’t fall. A heart beat against his chest, enraged and everywhere and known.

Not with you, he thought about snapping, with a terror he realized he’d never felt before. Not with —

They hit ground with a blast that shattered his entire skeleton to pieces. Dazai had hands that weren’t his printed around him, and then a sharp something piercing him, and a sharper howl of pain ringing in his ear, and the sky itself burying him — and then they were falling again, and they were falling, and they fell.

The world turned back, and that was it.

Chapter End Notes

random businesswoman: oh yeah the man who came up with the mahime project really is a genius random businesswoman: the arahabaki project being connected to it really is — mori: :0

mori: :D

dazai: :|

dazai: :0

WELL HELLO THERE i hope you guys missed me! as i already said at the start of this chapter, it has been some very long days. hoping this chapter being posted will translate to more stability in my life, and hoping to get the next chapter out soon!! for now, miranda will have to be enough of an apology. be honest, did anyone theorize Cat. just Cat? did you. it's what hirotzu deserves.

and cliffhanger ending! i would like to tell you it's the last one, given we're basically at the end, but... i'm actually not sure i can say that. hope you'll like what comes next ;)

as always, thank you so much for all the comments and the love you show this fic, and i hope to live up to your expectations <33 i'll see you soon, have a wonderful week!

MAY

Chapter Notes

see you at the end ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xxxiii.

---

Case number: 37837387

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [Code Name: Double Black] were rescued from [...]*

---

Excerpt from Archive Number 738766: “Testimony of Sakaguchi Ango.”

Special Division for Unusual Powers .

Written & Analyzed by: Sakaguchi Ango.

[...] I would often be asked what infiltrating had been like, in the following months.

To be absolutely honest, my last year in the Port Mafia was the beginning of the end for any semblance of legal control over Yokohama — the peak of a position that they have maintained since. And yet, from up close, I did witness some cracks in the marble. They carry them still — with their losses and their weaker spots. They have merely learned how to jump and skip them.

A great part of it, I theorize, can be faulted to Mori Ougai's slow, inevitable realization — that the greater the power, the greater the risk to lose it. I have never referred to ~~the Boss~~ Mori Ougai as a power hungry man, and I still refuse to do it. It would not be quite accurate. But there is hunger in him, and it has pushed him to gather a number of extraordinary people to surround himself with. He has encouraged their power thirst — he has also, I suppose, failed to realize that he held power as well. That starving people will eat even those who have taught them that hunger.

I do not know when Mori Ougai began to fear Double Black. I do not think he would have limited their agency in any of the Mafia affairs — he is far too clever to keep his best card out of the battlefield. But I do know this: the moment a clever man realizes his chess pieces might be starting to slip down the board, he just pretends to knock them to the ground — and then he starts another game.

I do not think either Nakahara Chuuya nor Dazai Osamu ever realized their [...]

[Continue reading] [?]

---

...

---

“...ear me?” A mechanical screech, somewhere over him — around; nowhere. “Tell me you can —“

---

...

---

Dazai woke up to Chuuya's corpse staring at him.

Chuuya, some lost corner of his thoughts supplied — non-anesthetized by the ache throbbing so vividly across the entirety of his body, it sort of felt like nothing at all, always woke up first.

It was rare for them to be together at dawn — or at night; or in the evening; all depending on the Mafia's less than set schedule — despite Dazai's insistence to invite himself over and roll Chuuya out of the futon, happily taking his place. He slept when his body allowed, and Chuuya — even if it meant being left with offensive drawings all over his face — slept when work permitted.

But there were exceptions — and Chuuya always woke up first.

“How unideal —” he attempted to say. A croaking, ugly thing came out instead, scratching his throat to blood he had nowhere to spit.

The darkness was material — pressing and suffocating, embracing and burying his every sense somewhere too far away to reach. Portion of the weight was material, pressing against every inch of his body in a sweaty, blood-warm mass that had his skin prickle and scream in frustration.

His head was pillowed on something sturdy — laying his cheek on that same spot, nose brushing his cheek, Chuuya's eyes were glazed and lifeless.

Staring right at him.

“Don't,” he tried to say. Nothing came out but the regurgitating taste of old blood — and for an instant, Dazai was sure he was going to die like that, choking on his own vomit. “Don't — what a boring matter,” He tried to move, and the weight didn't move, and the darkness didn't move, and his heart beat out of his chest with something — Dazai wanted his bandages. And if he had them already, he wanted more of them. “I've told you, I'm not — dying with —”

He tried to sit up, lungs stuffed and ears ringing, elbows digging into a rough, hard floor.

Reality trembled and rumbled and shook — something sharp and unbearably heavy hit his head, falling with dust and the blood starting to trail from his forehead. Chuuya stayed dead.

He closed his eyes as the floor dropped.

---

Part of the ceiling had cracked, allowing a line of moonlight to strike the darkness in a line.

There was something more to the ache — a burning throbbing a little under his ribs, pulsing along to his blood. Dazai didn't know why he had not noticed it before, but it was unignorable — it pierced a bit more with every breath he took, and it sizzled as if electrified. Chuuya's nose was stuck on his cheek, still — his eyes had been closed, though. Dazai tried to feel his breath on his skin, and felt nothing but his own puffy exhales.

"Ane-san will kill me," he croaked out, very displeased.

Chuuya — the bother — didn't respond.

The moonlight allowed him a better look at his cage — something that turned out to be harder than predicted, given his pounding head and his vision, so blurry it was nauseating. The sky was a void of cracked concrete, crumbling imperceptibly under the pressure of — something. Dazai couldn't quite recall what he was doing there.

Over their bodies was a slab of concrete, stretching out over them; a makeshift pocket of space, free from the rocks and the rubble, smaller than the space one would have found between bunk beds. It was scattered in horribly unstable points — metallic, days-new rebars poking out.

He inhaled, squeezing to gather thoughts. It was a supremely bad choice — the pounding of his head turned into hammering, and something far too warm and liquid pooled across his nape.

He tried to focus on Chuuya's dead face, because, ugly things tended to wake people up, he thought, sensibly — but there was nothing to see, not behind the makeshift a rain-wet glass of his eyes; breathing musty air that was a bit more disgusting with every lungful of it.

"Hey," he tried. It sounded awfully quiet to his own ears. Dazai wished he could have at least seen him, ugly as he was, if he truly had to die that humiliating death. Staring at his ceiling had never been anything but lonely. His eyes were rolling to the back of his head. "Hey —"

---

...

---

Madame Tanaki's tattoos were immaterial under his fingertips.

He traced them with little attention, most of his gaze directed to the liquid blue light of the laptop in front of them. Swirling lines and crooked curves — sharp angles and circling ink, spreading into tree roots Dazai didn't know how to read. He had once been told how to count plants' years, but he could never remember.

"I got most of them when I was younger than you," she told him. Dazai wasn't supposed to know, but he knew that meant she'd given them to herself. "Granted me good sight, good hearing — they made me stronger."

What can your tattoos do?, he'd asked, with his fingers deep in her blood. What can't they?, she had whispered, between terrified wheezes.

But that was — somewhere in time. Not at that moment. He was tracing her tattoos and she was breathing and unbloodied, and Dazai had no place to mourn the living. Hypocrite, she mouthed. He was tracing her tattoos, and his fingers were crimson and familiar and far too caring.

You're just like me, Mori had warned.

"Dying isn't painful, is it?" he asked her.

He knew — he'd always known — but he wanted to ask anyway. She opened her mouth, and the word were suffocated by the Spider Eyes' music or by some distant wind — concrete cracking over his head, and a corpse sleeping on his —

"Somewhat," she concluded, pensive. "Not when it ends."

---

...

---

"Oi," A pained groan, right in his ear. He knew how punches felt — the hit on the side of his arm was too weak to be it. A lightning strike under his ribs; an inhale. "Don't you fucking dare be —"

---

He woke — he stayed awake — under the sound of shifting rubble and settling dust, and a dead Chuuya's half-hearted curses.

Instinctive panic, claustrophobia, and some lingering ache amalgamated into an uncanny sort of calm. Dazai's head was hammering still, but he felt slightly more inside it — enough to taste the dried blood splattered on his chin, possibly from biting his tongue during the fall; and the familiar burn of a broken leg.

It wasn't the worst pain he'd ever felt, he mused, probably. But there was something —

“— fucking great,” the voice by his ear was saying. It was awfully quiet; it tickled his cheek. “Just what I —”

“Can you stop —” Dazai muttered, trying to land the words between his teeth, and not somewhere in the pasty nothingness in his mouth, “ — touching me? You're slimier than a slug.”

Chuuya halted breathing all together.

“Ah,” he said. Then, much squallier: “You goddamn moron —”

Coughs wrecked his chest, rattling Dazai along with no mercy. A vague idea crawled up his nostrils and under his eyelids — putting his hands on the boy's chest and pushing, just to get that alarming, dreadful feeling out of the unbandaged corners of his flesh. But his arms were jelly, and it seemed like every lungful was taking air it'd never give back.

Blood and drool landed by his ear, both coagulated and fatigued. Chuuya laid his forehead on that spot of the concrete-pillow for a moment, inhaling and exhaling in that whistle-like tone he knew signaled broken ribs.

He dropped his cheek down, staring at him; barely visible, on his blind side. Dazai didn't dare complain — but with aggravating understanding, Chuuya grasped the edge of his eye bandages with two bloodied, shaking fingers, scratching him in the effort to messily pull them down.

Dazai thought about getting mad about it.

The boy's tone was blank, when he asked: ““You gonna stay awake this time around?””

The moonlight wasn't of much use, but he saw Chuuya clearer than the crumbling pieces of stone. Blood refused to dry on his freckled face, aided by the sweat of that airless space — where it didn't clot, it flanked and rained down, turning Chuuya's face into a puzzle of decay; all pale cheeks and lips scrapped to white, raw skin.

Dazai mouthed something. When he noticed it had made no sound, he insisted: “Why haven’t you...”

Chuuya stared at some nothings over the bridge of his — broken, he noted — nose. “Look around and think carefully about what you’re about to ask me.”

Wobbly and uncomfortable, Dazai tried to focus on something other than the stickiness of the blood and the asphyxiating breathing space. He was bound to not stop thinking, not if Mori was around — and Mori wasn’t, but wasn’t he always? They’d fallen with the building and Mori had to be somewhere. From the slit the moonlight had used to pass, vertiginous distance was shown separating their landing ground from the road itself — but still, it was nothing Chuuya couldn’t have crushed, if he’d just gotten up and stopped touching him —

Very purposeful, Chuuya lifted his hips.

Pain erupted under his ribs.

“Ah,” Dazai said, helpfully.

There was a metallic, too-new pole sticking out from Chuuya’s back — a bar of sorts, Dazai thought; the railing of a balcony? — which was weird, and nonsensical, and Dazai barely had three blinks to wonder where exactly it had come from, considering all that was under Chuuya was Dazai himself — and then he understood, a bit crooked and a tad too calm, that the bar had impaled Dazai first, and Chuuya had followed.

“Ah,” he whined, again. The ache in his lower sternum had been noted, and now it would not fall back. Delirium was on the verge of tipping him off a cliff. “Ah, this is so unfortunate.”

“Got my arm stuck under — something,” Chuuya added, looking as if he’d been thoroughly done with that whole matter hours ago. “So I can’t even try to —“ He went a bit strabig; pressed his lips together the way he did when swallowing his own vomit. “— lift me up. We’re stuck.”

Dazai was horrified. “This can’t be.”

“Listen — don’t fucking waste our air —“

“With Chuuya?” he snapped. His tone hurt his wounds and made dust fall. “Get yourself off. Right now.”

“How, jackass?”

“Bend your minuscule body! Do you think I’m willing to live my last instants stuck in a lovers’ embrace with you, of all —“

Chuuya spluttered. “What fucking lovers’ embrace, we’re piled up like a meat skewer —“

Meat skewer double suicide, he thought, all corners of his body screaming in tandem — when he heard of it, Mori would laugh until he dropped and died. Mori would know — dead was dead, and all the beasts always knew. Dead was dead, and —

Over a strike of pain across his skull — concussion, he thought; along with having wriggled wildly enough to bump the side of his head against their makeshift pillow — he blinked too hard.

When he opened his eyes again, time had passed.

He knew it sporadically — there was some pressure around his head, a familiar fabric that he only recognized when he felt the lack of tie around his neck.

Dazai was still terribly confused. “I —“

There was pressure around his head; the familiar fabric of his tie, tightening around a head wound he didn’t quite feel. Nails gripped his wrist — the same side of his usually bandaged eye. The added ache was not much of an ache at all — it took him a moment to understand the words being traced. Don’t talk, Chuuya said. Roof. Fragile.

It was less verbose than usual — it lacked snark too. Either they couldn’t afford to move, or Chuuya’s own concussion was paying off.

He darted a glance to the grim, sharp point of the balcony bar sticking from his lower back — the curling metal was sculpted like a leaves-covered branch, which explained the painful dig Dazai felt across every organ he’d never counted. Blood and grime were splattered across the pole, turning it into a dirty conglomeration that Mori would have cringed about — the edge was stuck on their roof, holding it a single foot from Chuuya’s back, like a too thin column.

“How long?” Dazai whispered, just to test the resistance of that precarious hiding spot.

Chuuya’s voice was a whiff across his cheek, drying the blood on his face — so quiet he had to close his eyes to focus on hearing it. “Few hours, I think. They didn’t see where we landed.”

“You —“ He blinked, forcing himself to order the little he remembered into neat boxes. Permanent head damage would have given Ango an ulcer. “You broke the island in two.”

A huff tickled the shell of his ear. “‘S not even the worst thing I’ve done to Suribachi City.”

Dazai barely had time to tell himself he wouldn’t laugh at it, and he was already snorting. The chuckles hurt his chest a bit more with every motion; he wanted to open his eyes and watch the self-deprecation on Chuuya’s face, and ask him — how did you not make it hurt, and, how did you manage to make it hurt?

“Who am I in this context?” he asked. That wouldn’t have been a bad death, had it worked on impact — but the pain was blinding and hot and distracting, and Chuuya had been a corpse and he wasn’t and he would be. “The Sheep? Arahabaki?”

“Oi,” Chuuya warned. “Don’t go crazy.”

“I’m going to die with you. Something like that would send most men in a padded room.”

His scoff was disbelieving, curled around a voice that sounded somewhat wasted. “We’re not dying. Idiot. We just have to wait for them to —“

He trailed off. His breathing pattern was far too accelerated; Dazai felt it smudge blood from his wound across his chest — rattled by tremors that were less voluntary than even the spasms both his hands went nowhere without. He darted a look at his sole free arm — his glove had gotten ripped apart, leaving most fingers naked.

“Ah,” he concluded, again, trying to exhale the tension insistent on making his muscles bleed out faster. “This is even worse than a phone call. I can’t even block your number.”

Chuuya’s snort was dazed. The stuttering ache of his still limbs couldn’t possibly be worse than what Corruption usually put him through — but something in his tone was acutely speechless. Dazai wondered how long he had spent trying to wake him up.

“Want me to tell you about London, now?” he asked, crudely. He didn’t sound like talking was something his body particularly wanted him to do. “I convinced Adam to break into a royal wedding.”

He cleared his throat, trying to get blood coagulations away from his vocal chords. “Did you jump out of the cake?”

“No,” he admitted. “But I did have to dress up as one of those big-ass-hat-having guards.”

“Tell me there are pictures.”

“For you? Never,” Chuuya scurried a bit closer, to ease the painful curve of the pole. All it did was land him far too close in his peripheral vision for Dazai not to open his eyes. Ephemeral, the curve of his nose — splattered in fresh and old blood — brushed his cheek almost shyly. The materiality of it startled him. His ears buzzed. Abruptly, he could feel every inch of Chuuya’s body on him — the needles and the pins and the life of it; dead was dead and the beasts always knew. Dazai had never been buried under a corpse at all. “I did think about attempting to murder the Queen, just to annoy him.”

His brother’s unnamed presence was a rock on a still lake. Chuuya’s tone lacked sincere humor.

A faraway memory peeked between Dazai’s blurred thoughts — they had been taken prisoners by a group in Spain, once, handcuffed just close enough for Tainted to be useless. They had taunted the cocky capturers until one of them had stepped close enough for Chuuya to bite his nose off — the knife he had stolen from the man’s waist had been buried into the second capturer’s chest with his teeth.

I like out of border missions, he’d told him, then. Dazai had vaguely thought that maybe it was all effortlessly sensible — that Chuuya could only be truly vicious when Yokohama and its people weren’t on the line.

A shoulder nudged his. “What about you?”

He studied the cracks on the ceiling. “Me?”

“What have you been doing these past few months?” Chuuya insisted — nauseatingly, casual; drowning in the ease of someone who could have been gone six years, and not have blinked all the same. Chuuya existed everywhere and in all times, as careless as the wind — too powerful to be stopped. Collaring him had been a badge of honor, and the conversation was maddening — the roof seemed to drop with every goosebump inducing whisper between them. “Seems like everyone is shitting their pants about you just the same. Tanaki said they’re working you to the bone.”

Her name fell by his ear like a pebble.

Dazai vaguely thought about kicking it — except his leg was broken, and too far away, and it had taken ten minutes and fifty seven seconds for Tanaki to burn to the bone.

Perhaps, he considered, it would have felt better if she’d died after finishing Spider Eyes. In a way. All of Spider Eyes is over, she would have told Dazai, in his dreams. What can I do next?

What do I owe you, he questioned. All of it was transactional; Mori had sworn so. Truth?

Instead of mentioning the underground tunnels — of mentioning the bank accounts, or the way Mori’s smile looked as it rotted with pride and no fear and the certainty of a gun to his back, he offered: “I’ve implemented new punishments for boring high rank goons.”

“Pot, kettle,” Chuuya gulped down blood — then, he settled his cheek more firmly against the concrete, tickling Dazai’s dislocated shoulder. His gaze was strangely focused on him, when he turned his face just so; in the darkness, his eyes were almost the same color. “An example?”

There were flares in the darkness — either that, or his vision was growing spots. They painted a Ferris Wheel reflection in the boy’s pupils. A bit distracted, a bit concussed, Dazai said: “Pudding.”

A frown. “What about pudding?”

“That’s the torture.”

“As in —” Chuuya squinted. The Ferris Wheel spun and spun. “As in, eating it or as in —”

Dazai shrugged. It jolted the breathing, scattered edges of the wound around the metal bar, startling something like a whistle out of his lungs. It was sort of maddening — waiting to die. Or waiting to live. Both. Neither. “I buried a man alive behind a wall.”

Somewhat interested, he asked: “Why?”

“I was tired of how much he was screaming,” he recalled, vacantly. “At first it was insubordination, but then it became traitorous. I tortured him. He screamed and screamed. I built the wall right as he screamed in my face, and then he stopped screaming.”

Chuuya moved a bit against his shoulder. He couldn't see him, in the darkness — he could taste the wondering swelling his face along to the ruins-made bruises. Chuuya wouldn't have done something like that. But Chuuya would have stood and watched him do it, had he been there.

No, Dazai thought. Mori would have tutted at that stupidity. No, he would have put the bricks down too.

“And?”

“I forced Gramps to go on a date with one of Ane-san's girls, after he messed up the cargo count,” he added, recalling the humiliating sight the man had made over the candlelit table Dazai had hidden and sneered underneath of. “So he could get a taste of the unemployed life.”

With only one arm free — one bent in a less than optimistic angle — Chuuya still managed to punch his side.

He coughed. “Not on my deathbed.”

“You ass,” the boy hissed. “He's married.”

Clearer than any real memory Dazai held of The Sheepdog's wreckage, realization sizzled down his spine like a reinvigorated life force. “Chuuya,” he breathed. I do hope you will keep it to yourself, Hirotsu had said. “Listen.”

“No, that is so fucked up — why would you cause him marital problems? Last thing we need is for him to become grumpier —“

He wanted to reach up and shake him. “Chuuya. She's a cat.”

A moment of silence — constellated by the wheezing, shattered breaths out of their tortured lungs — had him feel Chuuya's hesitant heartbeat in full force. Eventually, a bit serious, the boy dared: “That's just no way to refer to a lady —“

“No,” Dazai insisted. It felt utterly urgent, all of the sudden — words he hadn't spoken on a phone call he hadn't received and hadn't cared to make. What are some good last words?, Odasaku had asked him, once. “You aren't listening to me. Miranda is a cat.”

Another pause.

The boy raised his head as far as he could, looking him right into his closest eye. He breathed over the bulb, startling tears in the corners. “When you say cat —“

Mournful, he confirmed: “Feline. Meow.”

The last breath of quiet turned deathly near the end. “That —“ Chuuya gaped at nothing, his face utterly speechless. “That motherfucker.”

“I know.”

“For three years?”

“I knew it from the start, obviously.”

He squinted — winced, when it made the cut across his temple bleed. “No, you didn’t.”

“Of course I did,” Dazai hid his face from him, studying the makeshift ceiling with all the superiority of the strategist he was meant to be. Hirotsu wouldn’t snitch — not when he held his secret in his hands. “I was waiting for you to figure it out. A hopeless crusade that lasted years — predictably. A supposed wife who even Mori had never met? Who he only talked about whenever his clothes got destroyed by impatient fits?”

Dread painted Chuuya’s cheeks redder than even the blood. “Women can be violent.”

“You are so stupid it’s a wonder the weight of your empty head managed to crash through the concrete,” Dazai noted, pitifully, knocking on the stone underneath them.

Purposefully masochist, Chuuya shifted his weight on the metal bar, pressing. The gasp out of his mouth was too dry to be pitched any higher than a groan — light-headed, Dazai squeezed his eyes against the faded moonlight, and gritted his teeth over the sound of blood bubbling between Chuuya’s lips, as he choked.

“Bad idea,” he wheezed, a thread of voice. “Bad fucking idea.”

“And the sky is blue,” Dazai panted.

No answer came.

Chuuya’s mismatched eyes were shut, that time around — he looked strangely peaceful; the way he never did when he slept. His chin dug his shoulder uncomfortably. When fresh blood began to pool from his ear, he watched it trail across his freckles in a crooked road — noted, for the first time, that the stains of neon paint on him offered a dim light across the darkness.

“Are you going to stay awake?” he taunted. It lacked the necessary bite; stuttering, imprecise flames were weaving patterns on his frontal lobe — all in an effort to have his eyes feel too heavy for the space they’d been buried in.

Make-a-doll, Elise had nodded, once, dragging him to some pink shop by the hand. I’ll make one of you. Dazai hadn’t realized just how much she touched him, until she hadn’t been allowed to anymore. Sunken in the earth, he found himself missing the world outside — pointlessly. He had studied it as a child and memorized it too well — everything he had seen from then on had been blind in one eye and blurred. Memory.

He ached, for a moment. Then it passed; as everything did.

Behind the glass of Hirotsu’s wristwatch, the clock hand ticked.

“Didn’t even get to pick my urn,” Dazai let himself mutter, a little more than an hour worth of ticks later. Mori would whine about that too — you should have done it when I said it, he could see him tut over his corpse, right before the flames got to keep him forever. How haven’t you learned to listen to me yet, Dazai?

The blood loss swarmed across his body like a particularly persistent corpse bug, devouring most of his rational sense.

It took him a moment to figure out the groggy, sluggish syllables against his shoulder were words: “Urn?”

It was hard to say how long they had been there for. There were no echoing sounds from the world outside those floors upon floors of a cave — not even the rush of waves. Dazai couldn’t recall if there were time limits that weren’t meant to be crossed — when impaled and concussed and bone crushed. There had to be. Dazai didn’t want to die in pain. There must be a point, Mori had sworn.

Chuuya sounded pasty and confused — a moment before he could bet on him not recalling their current situation, he croaked: “Where —“ “Impaled,” he offered, lowering his tone to a whisper that had him visibly shiver — letting him know not to scream. “Concussed. Bones crushed.”

“Oh.”

Wet squelches crawled across the silence — a hint of Chuuya moving around the wound; a hiss of pain suffocated against Dazai’s coat.

“I picked mine years ago.”

Suddenly, he felt tired. “Professor N almost toasted you crispy and electricity-flavored,” he let him know. Dead is dead and Dazai hoped he died before Chuuya, if he had to. Less time listening to his voice. But they’d come get them, at some point — he knew. It ached almost more than the wounds. “That’s not a badge of honor. Only mere rationality.”

“You’re such —“ Something that was too wet and bloody to be a burp left Chuuya’s mouth; he planted one hand by the ruins next to them — realized he couldn’t stand, a second after. “An ass. ”

“No, I’m not,” Dazai lied.

“You are, ” It almost sounded like a whine — but Nakahara Chuuya didn’t whine. “What the fuck did they put in your baby formula that you’re that fucking allergic to being a good person?”

Dazai had dug himself a grave near one of the few people who had his dirt under their nails. He stared at the ceiling, ignoring the call of fluorescent paint in the groaning, settling body over him. The blood loss, he thought. The idea of dying alone was the only part of it that was terrifying.

Not enough to fear it, he always concluded. Not enough to —

“Do we deserve a grave?” he questioned. He hadn’t meant to — he pretended the opposite.

Frustratingly straightforward, Chuuya did nothing but shrug. He was sickly warm against all parts of him — he smelled like ruins and dust and blood. Dazai had wanted to touch him since he had seen him under Arcade lights, and that was the closest he’d ever get — forced and skewered and bloodied. Dazai tends to linger. “Do you want it?”

How stupid, he thought. Wanting it would just make it worse. Quietly, Dazai tried to make his peace with the understanding that he could never tell anything to anyone ever again.

Odasaku, he remembered. Belatedly guilty. Odasaku would get it. If Dazai had to die next to anyone, then —

“They’re all ugly,” he lamented. How many hours had it been? How many more left? How many bandages should he have worn as to not feel nauseated? “Far too small. I’m not you. And far too big, too — my ashes can’t spread themselves around. What if a piece of me lingers?” The words were slipping dangerously, down a drain not even the building could crush into inscrutability. “What if I don’t die at all?”

Sticky silence pressed against him.

He half convinced himself that the boy had passed out again. Then, in a tone that was inches less woozy than Dazai’s own, Chuuya said: “That’s stupid.”

It carried all the feather light flippancy of a fool who’d shaken his ghosts’ hands. Dazai hated his sincere tranquillity almost more than he had despised his rage. “I wouldn’t expect someone of your intellect to —“

“Just get in my urn.”

Abruptly, Dazai knew nothing at all.

Silence creaked louder than the screeches of metal — than the squelch of their connected, wet sound. “What?” he managed to ask, flatly.

“They —“ Chuuya squeezed his eyes very hard, trying to find his train of thoughts across his own sick delirium. “They put— people together, sometimes. Battle comrades or — if they’re close and they haven’t picked one yet.”

He made it sound horrifyingly easy. Dazai wondered what a day in his bones would have felt like. “We aren’t close,” he reminded him — spelling it out, uncertain if his concussion had worsened.

“No, but when I kill you — I could carry them with me as war spoils”

“You want my ashes as war spoils?”

“Bastard,” A disorientated, exhausted yawn stretched Chuuya’s mouth until he could see the tooth he’d cracked on the landing. “You’re making this too big of a fucking deal. Put your stupid ashes in my urn or don’t. I don’t care.”

Dazai knew, unexplainably, that he truly didn’t.

It escaped like a prayer — a begging to get a peek at how a more human mind breathed. There was no reason why he should have offered anything of that scope — no reason why Dazai should have accepted. And get dog ashes all over mine?, tickled the tip of his tongue — and a thousand sharper, emptier answers. Dazai was haunting his own body — every effort to die was a petty ghost’s proof of existence. Stupid, hopeless Chuuya couldn’t even see phantoms anymore.

We found his parents, Mori had said.

Does he look like someone who lingers?, he hadn’t taunted him, in response. Does he look like me?

It escaped before he could exhale — pensive in that way that belonged to reports, and to clinic rooms, and to the less alive: “Is your slug brain truly stupid enough not to actually want me dead, or are you just tired of mourning?”

There’s devotion in sacrifice, Kouyou had told him — not quite an answer; not a question of, do you wish to die, or are you still happy here? But Dazai hadn’t expected more. Grief had never truly known him, but the woman was always somewhat soaked in it. It made studying her a boring, unchanging, awfully tempting affair.

I wouldn’t know, he hadn’t told her.

What was devotion? The gleam of Ango’s glasses, when he carefully, tiredly abandoned them on the Bar Lupin’s counter. The valleys of the crooked scar he had marred Odasaku’s hand with, when he attempted a card trick Dazai was trying to teach him. Perhaps the water closing over him, grayish and polluted and a possibility; the way Mori never offered his back to Dazai, when they stepped in the room where he’d murdered the old Boss. Dazai didn’t know if begging for water and having faith it would rain was the same thing.

I wouldn’t know, he hadn’t told her. The only thing I’ve ever been devoted to is —

It took him a full, still minute of silence to figure out Chuuya had stiffened.

His lips moved around nothing, hesitant. Maybe because waiting to die was a torture — because waiting to live was a little worse; because Chuuya had been unreachable for six months, and he clearly didn't care if he left for six years more — Dazai said, helplessly quiet: "Sorry."

---

...

---

"It's not going to work," Dazai informed the struggling weight upon him. "We should just give up and die."

"Fuck that shit," Chuuya replied, between gritted teeth. "You think I'm letting my last breath come from your regurgitated bullshit?"

By the time of what they estimated to be their twelfth hour down there, air had become a flimsy thread that not even tired lungs could take much from. Suffocatingly, they began passing out in strange synchronization — each gulping down the oxygen left behind by whoever got light headed enough first. Efforts to stop talking in favor of skin tapping or kanji tracing got abandoned as soon as an argument started; they grew used to waiting for the other to wake up again and continue.

"S just —" the boy grunted, attempting to pull his trapped arm out of the piece of concrete. "Just a small crack, and air will get in —"

Dazai nodded. "Or the whole building will collapse on us both. A quick, painless death — you're onto something, maybe."

"You said you wouldn't die with me —"

"They're going to get us, at some point or another," he agreed. There were flares floating in front of his eyes, framed by a taste of rust stuck permanently on the roof of his mouth. "I do have words about the efficiency of my own systems, though," he slobbered. "But until then, I'm free to fantasize as much as I —"

Chuuya stuck his flat palms on the ground, took a big breath, and surged upwards.

The bitter scream out of his mouth had his ears bleed more profusely; Dazai winced against the subtle movement of the pole digging around his wound, as the boy elevated himself enough to — for the blink of an instant — be separated from him. Red oozed down the imperceptible space of the bar between their bodies, as Chuuya's wound tore itself apart higher across his chest — when his eyes began to roll to the back of his head, Dazai's hands flew up instinctively.

“Don’t,” he hissed, quicker than he could touch him. “Don’t — just —”

His broken, glove-ripped fingers ran over the heaviest of the concrete pieces around them — in a desperate push, a crack was opened, raining in a single line of moonlight; blinding him wretchedly enough for his head to be swarmed in buzzing, immaterial flies.

Chuuya fell like a puppet, landing heavily enough to squeeze a yelp out of Dazai’s mouth.

It shook the space around them in a rumble that was only barely louder than the desperate exhales out of his mouth, choking against Dazai’s ringing ear.

“You know,” he grunted, half stuttering, chest rising and falling so fast it was a wonder he wasn’t shrieking with every slither against the pole bar. “I can’t remember which one of all those fake IDs we got crafted is my real one.”

Me neither, Dazai didn’t admit, superior. “Are you delirious?”

“Trying to —” He retched, once. “— stay awake. Shut up.”

“By talking about your tiny brain’s inability to remember your own social security number?”

Chuuya groaned. “Fuck you. I’m betting you don’t remember yours.”

“Details are unimportant,” he insisted. “It’s a bothersome tool. People should know me at one glance. Women certainly do.”

“With how many you’ve stood up?” His next groan was more disgust than rage. “Whatever ugly picture of you they do rituals on so that you’ll blow to pieces on the spot must be one hell of a memorization technique.”

He scoffed. “You’re just jealous.”

The concept repulsed him enough to raise his head from Dazai’s shoulder — just enough to look him in both eyes with all his contempt. The neon on his cheek had started to melt and mix with the sweat, creating swirling spirals of pink and blue that turned him into a child’s finger-paint. There was a bleeding hole in Dazai’s guts and there was a dangling curl on Chuuya’s forehead. “What do women see in you, seriously.”

It wasn’t a question, given the tone. But Dazai liked women, and women liked him blindly and adoringly. It was mutually convenient and exclusively impersonal, and Chuuya’d never gotten it. “My impeccable personality? My pretty face? My inestimable intellect? My massive —”

“God,” He muttered, plastering his face on his shoulder again, biting back a scream. “Dante should take notes. This is a Limbo.”

Dust fell in a soft hiss. After Dazai tried to reach for either of their phones — squeezing more blood out of their wound as a result, and obtaining nothing but the understanding that Chuuya’s phone was lost, and his own had regrettably lost its Chuu the Slug’s charm and gotten destroyed under his broken thigh — Chuuya entertaining himself with pinching both of their arms, to make sure the added effort wouldn't knock them out.

"We'll need to tell them where we are when they reach this area," he explained, sensibly. As he watched Dazai open his mouth, he warned, far too certain: "Hirotsu's Babysitting Union would gain shit from losing its first pet projects. Believe that, if you want to be a bitch about Mori."

Time passed without mercy. Eventually, as something that could have been languor — had it not been a burning kind of torpor — started to dim the lights of their concussed skulls, they talked nonsense over the echoing silence.

"— so their golden idea was to hang me upside down for two days," Chuuya muttered, his mouth squashed so heavily against Dazai's coat it was hard to hear all of it. Occasionally, he signed a few of the words on his wrist, refusing to waste his vocal chords. "Which was fucking stupid."

Dazai hummed. "Surprisingly, I agree. It's not even in my torture methods list — and there's such enviable variety in those files."

"Pudding?"

"Pudding," he agreed. "You used Tainted?"

"Obviously."

He paused. Belatedly, he noted the way the boy had stiffened against him — cursedly catching up, faster than most were meant to with Dazai.

But the frustration was familiar, and the pole stuck through the both of them was too heavy to pretend a less flesh-bound connection wasn't somewhat useful. "We could get crushed," Dazai warned, very slowly — tentative.

"Not if I'm quick enough," Chuuya said, frowning. A thought process — one too connected to his threads of ersatz gravity to understand — flew past his mismatched eyes, twirling around the pupils like a ring from Saturn. "We'd have to rattle this enough to get the roof to fall on me, though. It'll fuck the wound up. It's probably already infected."

"Not too much of an issue if we get out."

"The Ability Users doctors can heal me," the boy reminded him, roughly. "If your ass gets torn dick to jugular, you're done for."

"Finally," he sighed, dreamily.

A vein in Chuuya's temple throbbed.

"Alright," he concluded, settling his hand by Dazai's ear. The other was still stuck — still, he did his best to drag his elbow on a less cracked corner of the ruins underneath them. He breathed in from his nose, rushed and wetly, and morphed his traits into that determination he would have never let Dazai call self-destructive.

If I do it to live, isn't it life?, a book he'd stolen from Odasaku had insisted.

“Try to — flatten yourself, I don't know.”

Coagulations of blood and drool gathered on his lips, hovering over Dazai's face. His vision was steadfastly blurred — if he squinted, it was no more than another crimson stain in the silver-lines darkness. Chuuya planted his feet, biting back a breathy whimper from whatever bone he'd broken — and lifted himself off Dazai's body, doing his best to crawl on all fours over him.

“Shit,” he cursed, utterly calm, somewhere over the blinding shock of pain Dazai's guts were forced to take. “Shit. Fuck this shit — go.”

Thinking of nothing at all — thinking of the frigid metal of Mori's clinic table — he curled his fingers around the imperceptible space between their bodies, attempting to keep the sides of his blood-soaked hands off Chuuya's pulsing wound — and pushed up.

Sounds followed in quick motion — metal and crumbling stone and skin-wet squelches and the sound, either out of Chuuya's mouth or his. The plan — the plan, his mind supplied, not very helpful — swarmed across his buzzing skull like flies. If the floors over floors of debris touched Chuuya in the split instant Dazai removed his hands from the pole — he could activate Tainted. He clenched his hands tighter than his body could stand, forcing their makeshift roof to fall from its precarious spot and land on —

Lighting struck his forearms.

“Hey,” Muffled — echoing, as if under the sea — a voice reached his ears. “Hey — “

The pain snapped his eyes open from a half slumber he hadn't noted — all he saw was red and black and red, oozing off Chuuya like a mass of webs and shattered glass. Dust rained from ruins as the metal screeched — cracks widened and spread from a spot Dazai only saw because of blinding, unreal moonlight, wriggling across the concrete in a steady, rumbling growl.

Faster than a blink, the piece of stone broke away from the ceiling — bigger than a motorcycle and digging through the air with murderous focus — and Dazai knew where it would land.

“Hurry,” he managed to say, between tight teeth.

His hands flew off the pole. Chuuya's teeth were gritted so hard he saw an invisible chasm across one of his incisors — and then he saw those Saturn rings in his pupils disappear, devoured by his blown out pupils, as he abruptly realized keeping their wounds separated was impossible.

Does your blood do it too, I wonder?, Mori had asked, months ago, after Dazai had touched Elise's head and watched her vanish.

Would you let me test it?, he hadn't replied. Mori hated waste.

He forced his hands to cup Chuuya's nape — all at once, no matter his cursing, breathless complaints, he pulled him down and away — mere seconds before the piece of concrete could shatter into his skull.

It landed somewhere over the rocks on Dazai's half-trapped arm, trailing dust all over both of their frames. Everything was shaking, as if the single paper they'd taken from the house of cards had started another earthquake. A scream left Chuuya's mouth at a vertiginous frequency — as the sky fell around them, he realized it came from the glinting metal of one of the other metal bars from the makeshift ceiling. Under his blurred eyes, its carved leaves buried themselves onto Chuuya's shoulder like an arrow.

The floor dropped underneath them. He closed his eyes to a speck of moonlight.

---

...

---

The moment his waking tongue ran across the blood of his dehydrated, hellishly chapped lips, Dazai knew almost a day had passed.

A new, vacant bubble of cracked stone had welcomed their impaled embrace — it didn't look much different from the first, but the chasms in the concrete were too thin to let any moonlight in. There was nothing to see — all Dazai could focus on was the asthmatic quality of Chuuya's breath against a new wound across his neck.

He thought of Akutagawa. He'd probably be dragged to play rescuer, too. Perhaps, he mused, the idea of dragging Dazai out of his grave would motivate him, at last.

"If I was that brat, I would have killed you eons ago," Chuuya's wobbly, barely whispering voice informed him.

More than surprise at the sudden noise, it was the quality of those words that startled him. It wasn't like the local god to let pain seep into his tone — no matter the wound he'd be dragging across the Headquarters' floor; no matter the body bags waiting at his feet. The aching, breathing ache in his syllables was impossible to ignore, though — it turned his words in barely understable hushes.

There was a hand under Dazai's skull.

Chuuya winced when he pushed against it; broken knuckles, he guessed. He tried to imagine the sound his head would have made as it smashed against the concrete — tried to imagine dying as he was passed out. Missing it.

“He’s Mafia,” he said. He only realized that same note of exhausted soreness had spread across his voice when his throat burned with it. “So am I. There’s no one to kill.”

It didn’t entirely make sense. Mori would have put it like that, though — Tanaki, too. They had always shared a purpose. She hadn’t lost her position when the doctor had killed the old Boss — Dazai wondered, all of the sudden, if Mori had always known who she was.

And if I did?, the doctor questioned.

Chuuya attempted to turn. The new piece of metal had struck through his shoulders cleanly, though — the edge brushed Dazai’s chest only so, making the boy’s every movement a flinch.

He gave up with a curse. Lips as chapped as his own brushed against Dazai’s Adam’s apple; in a tone that didn’t even echo, given just how close every ruin around them was, he offered: “Boss once told me my loyalty should be to the syndicate. Not to its people.”

Dazai could see his lips shape it — a bit less kind than the brush against his own throat. He had always had a tendency to put dangerous things near his jugular.

Mori cared, he thought — but he cared for reasons that were the same red tinge as the scarf constantly holding his head up.

“I don’t think I know how to do that,” the boy concluded, like a secret. He sounded high and he sounded absolutely frustrated — buried as they were, air would end soon. Still — “But that’s how I know they’re coming to get us.”

He searched the darkness until the lines of rusty metal became visible. “Good investments?”

An intake of air — whistle-y and wet. “Don’t flatter yourself,” Chuuya warned. Too, too careful, he tried to fit himself more comfortably in that bloodied space — as if to share something less dirty than the warm fluids oozing from their linked wound. Dazai wasn’t scared of the darkness at all — but it was hauntingly suffocating. Chuuya’s heartbeat filled the silence of his most prodigious thoughts — unsure of how to proceed, for once. “Hey. Tell me one of your stupid stories.”

His pounding head slid into a comforting twinge. He had the vague idea of asking Chuuya just where he’d learned that melody he always hummed. “I thought you hated them.”

“I do,” he confirmed. “We’re stuck here, though. It’s already boring as —” His breath died down; the next inhale he took was shaky, littered in the haze only Corruption left him in. “As it is.”

That unfathomable conclusion landed like a pebble on water.

Double Black died crushed like a shooting star, Dazai imagined them saying. And they would answer — wasn't Double Black over?

“Here’s a story,” he offered. “There are two boys under the ruins of a tacky club —“

A wet cough. “Come on.”

“— and they both die.”

“The end?”

“They hold the highest top scores ever registered by the Arcade,” Dazai conceded, helpful. There was no firmament to study — his voice stayed soft, as if they were stargazing all the same. “And they both die.”

Something petulant filled Chuuya’s cheeks, spreading the blood and the dirt over his collar. “This story sucks ass.”

“It’s the only one I got.”

“I was away for six months. ”

“Yes,” he agreed, blankly. Wasn't Double Black — “It was very peaceful.”

“They kept talking like we died or shit.”

Dazai wanted to shrug. But it all — all, in everything — meant something, and Chuuya was too capable where it mattered. “We will.”

“They’ll come get us.”

“We’ll die anyway.” Tanaki had had a point — after a bit, it didn’t really hurt. He thought of his shipping container. “A reputation is too much to leave behind.”

A scoff pulled the dried pieces of blood on Chuuya’s lips off. “It’s no reputation if it’s true.”

The chasm-webs on the fake ceiling were like tree roots. Dazai had a feeling he had already thought that — he still couldn’t remember how to learn a tree’s age. Odasaku would know. He had to ask him, as soon as they got out.

“Hey,” Chuuya questioned, both quiet and horribly, horribly awkward. “Is there no air in here or is it just me?”

It was very funny, Dazai thought. Wasting more oxygen laughing was stupid, though. Instead, his hand wriggled aimlessly up, unsure of what it was searching — until a familiar scar on the length of a thumb scratched his fingertips. His fingers were shaking out of any real control — all nerves he couldn’t feel being affected, and the low pulse of a wound in his very being. He hooked his little finger around Chuuya’s own, and that was it.

“If it breathes,” the boy muttered, clearly just for himself. Chuuya’d never really felt feverish, before — but his forehead was burning against the edge of his face. “If it beats.”

“What?” Dazai asked, like an exhale before he slept.

The tip of his nose was strangely freezing. It brushed the skin underneath his jaw, aimless. He never did that when they rested in the same bed — he just kicked and stole blankets and didn’t dream. They never touched at all. Are you going to sleep, now that he’s here?, his mind asked.

It wasn’t about him, Dazai replied, just to make sure he was going crazy.

His mind didn’t care. Merciless, it traced constellations on the ruins that would kill them — that would morph their skeletons into a mushy, sharp bundle of bad intentions and Mafia orders; and they would share a urn, because Chuuya was stupid and careless and his partner — his partner; he’d told Odasaku, younger and bloodied on his front porch; his partner; he had insisted, as if the astonishment of what he had managed to take for himself would make him more worthy in the man’s eyes — and he paid no mind to the dangers of the inhuman.

They would land at the bottom of the Bay, bickering, and Mori would intertwine his hands less calmly over the loss of the diamonds he had rolled and rolled in his palms — all mourning and no grief.

“I don’t wanna die with you,” he whined — a useless conclusion; low and childish and begging.

“Well, I don’t want to die with you either,” Chuuya snapped, shivering. The effort had the warmth of their shared wound get warmer. “If you weren’t a — an overestimated off button —“

Dust poured from the roof. Dazai blew it off, trying to keep himself from sneezing.

Their pinkies were still linked.

“Hey,” Chuuya cleared his throat. “Listen.”

Dazai kept his eyes closed.

“They’re going to send me away again, by the end of the week,” It was barely a whisper, tentative like fingers on a bubble. Brusque, the way Chuuya was when he had to be sincere with him in particular. Dazai wasn’t used to being touched — Dazai knew better, and he fell for it every time. He would burst, and Chuuya would still be talking. “There’s still some European business Boss wants fixed, and —“ He cleared his throat, again. Dazai ached with something too irritated to be fondness. “If you come with me, I might even keep myself from throwing you off the plane.”

I wouldn’t know, he’d sworn to Kouyou — only in his mind, where she wouldn’t know what it meant. She had killed a man she loved with her own hands; he knew she would look at Dazai and find him just as guilty. The only thing I ever let myself be devoted to was him.

Just get in my urn, Chuuya had huffed.

“How boring,” Dazai said, very quiet.

A subtle, almost inaudible buzz circled over their heads. Unluckily used to it, he recognized it as the roof giving up under the weight of the floors upon it. They had to be worlds under the world. It was a bit sad. Odasaku surely had some nice stories about getting impaled.

“As long as it isn’t those fucking lab coats,” Chuuya murmured, nonsensically.

Dazai held his pinky tighter. Wished, like he always did, to be afraid.

The world ended a breath after.

---

...

---

Someone was shooting with Dazai’s gun.

Of course I know the sound, he’d told a red cheeked Akutagawa — or as red as he could get, walking corpse he was — when he had caught him training with it behind his back. He had been mildly impressed that he had managed to take it at all. Don’t you think I hear it enough?

“—zai,” the buzzing in his ears was saying, urgent in its professionalism. Hands were grasping his body, shaking and pulling and — settling him on something too high not to make his head spin. It was a nauseating experience; Dazai had the vague knowledge that it shouldn’t have been as windy as it was — but the cold air whipped him. “Dazai, can you open your eyes?”

He whined. Awful request.

“I know, just —” Sirens blared somewhere in the distance. Voices screaming and bullets being shot and familiar orders — an attack? “Open your eyes for a moment, and then I’ll leave you alone.”

It couldn’t be helped, he supposed.

Hirotsu’s face was covered in concrete dust.

Focusing on him was an effort Dazai had no intention of going through — when a silhouette in white pointed a light right into his eye, he whined louder. Realized, belatedly, that someone had hid his bandaged eye again.

“My —“ He tried. His hands dangled from a too high spot — he clenched them around metal and recognized an ambulance stretcher. Then his fingers started aching, and he whined more. “My gun, is —“

“The earthshaker User survived too,” the man explained, far too quickly for his brain to keep up with. Sirens and voices and bullets. “He climbed out as we were getting you — they’re taking him down. Can you nullify him?”

Dazai laughed until it hurt. “Oh, can I?”

In the background, behind the blurry car lights and the blurry ambulances and the blurry all, men in black were screaming. The earth wasn’t trembling, though — perhaps the User had found a new passion for guns. Good for the environment, he thought. Then the open space underneath his ribs ached and breathed, and the woman who had pointed a light at him pressed her hands on what had to be bandages, and Dazai thought —

“—zai, ” Hirotsu was calling, more frantic than he’d ever seen him. “Where was Chuuya? We can’t find him. Did you see —“

His mind blinked.

Right here, he insisted, as the wound was bandaged. He was right —

The cursing doctor stuck an oxygen mask on his mouth, fogging up his thoughts. His leg was broken all the way to the thigh, he thought — no other reason for it to burn that viciously.

“Where is he?” the voices screamed, in the background. “He’s got a gun!”

“Protect the Boss!”

“Find him!”

“Mori?” Dazai questioned, curious, over the hum and the buzz of the mask. Mori couldn’t know, he thought, nonsensically gleeful. He turned his head on the pillow of the stretcher, no matter the doctor’s hands. “Is Mori —“

His eyes landed on Chuuya.

Something about the sight — the speck of red that he made, half buried in the ruins of what had once been a bridge; the way one of his hands was abandoned over a ruin, glove destroyed — had his mind spin over the incorrectness of it. There was a hole in his guts, and there was a spam to his little finger, and he knew —

“Dazai!” Hirotsu snapped, hand over his nose, where Dazai had headbutted him in his haste to stand. “Dazai, you’re bleeding —“

He fell from the stretcher, landing on his knees — as he ripped the oxygen mask off roughly enough to scratch his own face. The night world — constellations, his brain supplied, helpfully — spun almost faster than the hands reaching for him, attempting to drag him in place again. Dazai registered it as a silly thing, so he smiled a bit — he forced the vomit in his mouth back inside his body, ignoring the strikes of lightning crawling across his leg, and made his way to the body in the rubble.

“Be right back,” Dazai screamed, over his shoulder, stumbling throughout the ruins.

Really, he thought, exasperated. There was an urgency in him that he didn’t understand. The concussion and something else. He’d offered him his urn — and so Dazai owed him to at least — really, how do you get lost from a shared pole —

A shock of carrot orange appeared from a corner. Holding Dazai’s own gun in a trembling hand, he let out a sound that was almost laughter, and started shooting Chuuya’s unconscious body.

Dazai paused.

Once, twice, thrice more — the speck of red jolted with it, hand unmoving and eyes open; a wet, squelching, nauseating sound mixing with dying laughter, as coagulated blood was spat from his wounded body like humorless fireworks. No point in shooting dead bodies, Chuuya had scoffed.

Dazai didn’t quite remember the rest.

Hands and skin — broken knuckles and a man laughing, no matter the broken teeth. He’d never had a mean punch — Chuuya complained about it on the daily; and Odasaku had offered to help him, if it stays unbloodied — as if anything in his near vicinity ever had. Concrete under his knees, which was familiar — his gun in his hand, which was even more so. Pain, all over.

Truly, Dazai and his mind debated, over the sound of gunshots. The ricochet shook his arm, rattling his dislocated shoulder, and it was oddly familiar, too — the GSS and a green leather jacket. No use in shooting dead bodies.

“I’ll kill you,” he promised, vivacious.

The taste was like rust scratching against teeth. Would you quit that?, Ango always snapped, when he munched too loudly. He kept shooting, and he sank his heel in a skull, and stepped on it, and stepped on it, and stepped on — “I’ll kill you. I’ll kill you, I’ll kill you, I’ll kill you, I’ll kill you —”

Truly, he added, Chuuya dying wouldn’t have been much of an issue. But who would he have told? Who would he have bragged with, mighty and scornful; swearing it was plenty deserved and not enough gruesome — Chuuya would hate to be told, he considered, so he should tell him; but how to tell him, if he was —

“—op, ” a voice called. The gunshots seemed to be the only crickets around. The voice got closer and closer. “Dazai, stop!”

That final order got his attention right as golden flew past him — a silhouette in flowy layers of kimono, sinking an immaterial katana in Dazai’s carrot-shaded target practice. He tried to protest — a childish whine of jealousy, and something else. Nails sunk in his shoulders — just where was his coat, Dazai wondered, because Mori would notice, and how annoying he’d be about it — and he was spun around quicker than his leg could take. His face was pressed against scratchy fabric that smelled of known, and Dazai saw nothing and heard —

Heard something.

Kouyou’s heart was racing against his eyes. She’d always had callused hands, despite the well manicured nails — they sunk in his hair only to keep his skull immobilized, pressing so firmly they had to be cutting their own circulation.

Dazai’s broken leg gave out. He breathed in her scent and wanted to laugh in her face.

“Stop,” she insisted, without an inch of the softness of her clothes. “We found you,” she swore, as if only her ears were listening. Her handprint was carved on the back of his head, and she never, ever touched him, truly — “We found you. We got you out.” She was covered in dirt — had they all been digging? And still you’re so damn late?, Dazai mocked, so utterly still he wasn’t breathing. “We’re getting Chuuya.”

Just once, his aching spine was jolted with humorless hilarity. He pushed her off.

“Careful with your hands, Ane-san,” he let himself chuckle, holding onto his pained leg with a half grimace. There was nowhere to lean on. Her hands were still outstretched, sharp like talons. The unmistakable silhouette Hirotsu always was in his peripheral vision was approaching Chuuya. “I hear insubordination gets them cut off of you.”

There was something in her gaze that he didn’t want to look at. “Dazai.”

“First time you call me that,” he insisted, in the same tone, as if continuing where he’d left off.

She flinched.

He reached Hirotsu right as the man bent to pick Chuuya up. Standing on nothing but pure, hysterical ecstasy, Dazai tilted his head to study the bleeding breaches all over his body — the crimson edge of it all; the viscera pulsing wildly underneath scarred flesh, and the Corruption scars that were nowhere to be found, and the twitch of his little finger, and the urn he’d offered, and his red soaked hair — and blinked.

“You need to lay down,” Hirotsu ordered, turning to look at him. His eyes ranked over his guts. Dazai didn’t know how he was standing. “Dazai.”

“Ah, it’s fine,” He waved the matter away. What was everyone so worried about? The haze of it all was sickening. He hadn’t died, and he hadn’t feared, and there was nothing more.

Chuuya's finger twitched. Dazai blinked.

Oh, he thought. Awfully stupid of him — awfully blind. Mori would have been disappointed in so many ways. Oh, he thought, that's what it is.

A sound nested itself in the back of his throat, burrowed and jealously kept — it escaped. Dazai got overwhelmingly lost between the sluggish motions — the cataclysmic, pathetic realization that they would never be closer than they had been in that dawdling darkness, and that Mori couldn't know, and that he wouldn't get to keep any part of this — not when he wanted it.

Hello, he thought, curious. Chuuya would live, and he would be damned all the same. The world had made him flawed on purpose. Hello. How have I lost you already?

"I can carry him," Hirotsu said, behind all of Dazai's repetitious stupidity — good willed old man; understanding and a killer. Dazai hadn't even noticed his hands were slipping under Chuuya's body. Perhaps touching him was somewhat uncourteous — Dazai was covered in blood. "You'll tire yourself out. You're injured."

He stared at him, mind slowed down from blood loss — slowed down because.

He had watched every warm thing roll in Mori's palm like Yokohama didn't weigh more than the sky — and truly, truly, there were few things in existence that weren't heavy. Chuuya's head in his lap — his own hand on his blood-matted forehead, tracing stupid drawings and waiting for an attack or for death or for something. He held him still and held him close and held him alive, and there was no way to make Hirotsu understand, what with the concussion he'd gone and given himself, what with all of it, Mori and the constellations and —

"It's not tiring," he swore, confused. "I'm not tired," His eyes were aching from how widened they were; the man's gaze on him was far too knowing for any of his syllables to be wise. Mori would burn him alive, he thought — but he wasn't sure why. "He's not — he said he'd keep me a spot in his urn. Stupid."

"That's nice," Hirotsu said, calmly.

He was too high again — the ruined fabric of the medical stretcher was curling underneath him like a buzzing, crawling, ants infestation. All very uncomfortable. The sound of wheels on the concrete was scratching his ears like a shriek — he looked for Chuuya, and couldn't find him, and then he saw him — being hosted onto another stretcher, his gloveless hand dangling from the edge.

Nullify him, his brain reminded him. But there had been no Corruption, Dazai was sure of it.

"It's not too much," he insisted, a bit frantic. Hirotsu had to understand — they all had to. No one could know. Dazai wanted it and Dazai would lose it — just because of it. He reached so far forward the paramedics had to hold him back before he fell — no Corruption, but no risk worth taking. Dazai grasped Chuuya's dangling fingers, and squeezed once, twice, thrice — fighting against the hands pushing him back. Chuuya stayed a being made to bleed, and Dazai stayed wanting.

At least it isn't lab coats, Chuuya had told him — Dazai set his eyes on the white sleeves touching his bleeding skin, and felt every inch of himself reach.

Their stretchers were rolled in different directions. Chuuya's hand fell from his own, and a needle was buried in his neck — Hirotsu blocked his view. "It's not tiring —"

"I know," the Commander promised.

"— how could it be tiring, it's Chuuya —"

Hirotsu's eyes darted over him.

Another needle. Dazai felt it flame and felt it burn — he sunk into darkness again, unwilling and hating, kicking his feet like a stubborn child. He closed his cursed eye as it laid, selfishly, on Chuuya's twitching little finger.

---

...

---

Akutagawa sat straight and guarding on the guest chair of Dazai's Hospital room — only, he had turned it to entirely face the door, offering his bed nothing but his shoulders.

His throat was drier than the humorless sigh he let out, attempting to sit up against the sheer number of pillows behind his back. "Could you spare me the I'm grounded act?"

The boy jumped, startled. "Sir!"

The room wasn't much to see — the usual white walls, the usual pointless furniture, the usual smell of antiseptics and old people. There weren't flowers on his nightstand; someone, though, had left the golden pin of his tie next to a silver remote. Straining against the aching stillness of his limbs, and the casts around his shoulder and leg, Dazai reached for the remote, amusing himself with straightening and dropping the bed.

It made a metallic, buzzing sound — from the corner of his unbothered gaze, he watched it curl Akutagawa's nonexistent eyebrows, irritated.

"Sir," Akutagawa tried again.

"Shh," Dazai ordered. He pressed on a blue button, letting out an, aaah! — when the backrest was lowered flat to the ground. "How ingenious. We should get these for the chairs in the meeting room. Talk about uncomfortable furniture."

“Sir,” he insisted. He’d stood up from the chair, but he was holding it between them — an incredibly controlled reaction, given the swarm of something in his dark eyes. “You’ve been comatose for three days. How are you feeling?”

“Three days?” He huffed. “Did you pump me with opium?”

“I — no. You were gravely hurt.”

“Yes, yes,” Distracted, he squinted at the old remote. “I’m assuming you were busy digging through the rubble for a bit, mmh?”

Akutagawa straightened.

Thank you, Dazai imagined saying. I’m very grateful. Mori had said it to him a few times — it had mostly been sarcastic, even if not dishonest. Educating Akutagawa was a matter of figuring out which twists and pulls would both keep him out of Mori’s visual field and inside his bigger plans. But that old method was clearly unreliable, given he’d managed to get himself trapped against a —

A twitch had the remote almost fall from his fingers.

“I did beat that slimy slug at the waking up race, though,” Dazai questioned, vacantly. Had it been Kouyou — or, God forbid, Hirotsu — they would have probably seen through the disinterest. He didn’t think Akutagawa expected any humanity from him, though. “Didn’t I?”

He nodded, once. “Vice-Executive Chuuya hasn’t woken up yet.”

Dazai swung his legs out of the blankets, grunting. How he hated pain. Had they softened his morphine? Mori was annoying enough to do something like that. He’d have to steal some. “You can start dropping the Vice-Executive,” he ordered, with a flick of his fingers. His head was pounding; he laid it back on the pillow, wincing. “Mori will make the worst choice possible for the syndicate in no time. We should throw the Hatrack a party, don’t you think? Last one I threw him didn’t end up well, but, well —“

“Sir,” Akutagawa interrupted — which was a brave choice in itself, if extremely stupid.

He massaged his temples. “Yes?”

“Are you —“ His entire face scrunched up. “Are you okay?”

Dazai’s eyebrows brushed his hairline. He had his bandages on again — probably courtesy of Mori. An itch crawled across his guts, where he knew the pole had breached through — the urge to check the scar left from that misfortune almost choked him, for a moment. “The awkwardness is killing you. Why would you kill both of us?”

“You were under there for more than a day —“

“That slug of my partner and I played tic tac toe on the concrete,” Dazai assured. “I won, of course. News on Suribachi City? You better have a report on that, yes? Or have you just been playing guard dog for the past three days?”

“There are guards in front of both your rooms,” Akutagawa replied, nostrils flaring.

“Probably so Chuuya won’t sneak out and I won’t overdose on morphine,” he mused. The boy’s shoulders stayed set. “Well? The reports?”

Suribachi City had, easily enough, been — broken in two. The paper reported that description in a blank, exhausted way that smelled of Ango’s favorite ink. Dazai caressed the kanjis with his good finger, longing and fond, wondering if they would come visit. Chuuya’s last effort not to have the bridge-piece fall onto Yokohama itself had hit the edge of settlement — no one had been hurt in the crater itself, and the escaping mafiosi had been recovered across the course of the day. The fact still remained that they’d have to remove the bridge before the artificial island started sinking.

Chuuya could do it, he scoffed, annoyed. And the money it would take — rebuilding the bridge, figuring out if Mori wanted The Sheepdog to be put up again, silencing the News —

He whined, landing on his pillows to cover his face with the reports.

“Akutagawa,” he called. “Would you mind getting better quicker? I’m aiming for you to figure out a way to have Rashomon kill me.”

Very boringly, the boy didn’t respond.

“The next financial meeting will be Hell,” Dazai huffed, closing the dossier. He tapped the cast on his leg, cleaning his dirty nails against it — despite being washed, he still felt remains of rubble dust all the way to his skull. Trying to focus on any specific moment from his time underground felt like trying to recall a dream — something that had happened to someone else. And then ambulances, lights, and gunshots — Chuuya’s hand, dangling from a stretcher.

He studied his palm. No neon paint — no blood. But he knew he’d touched him.

“The theory of interchangeability,” Dazai recited.

Akutagawa had managed to step away from the chair, at last. Unsure of where to put his hands, he gingerly laid them at the end of his bed. “Sorry, sir?”

“The theory of interchangeability. Edmond Locard,” he insisted, snapping his fingers. “He was a criminologist. According to his studies, every criminal that enters a room takes something from it and leaves something in it. Interchangeability. The principle behind it is that of, no gain without automatic self-incrimination,” He shrugged. “Mori once told me it’s easily applicable to people as well. People are unanalyzed crime scenes.”

Clearly, the kid wasn’t sure of where he was going with this. Or perhaps he was surprised by Dazai’s willingness to converse with him without prompting. Hesitantly, he offered: “But the Mafia never leaves traces behind.”

He sighed. “Of course we do.”

“But —“

“Convincing the police to permanently blind one of their eyes hardly means we’re good enough to clean up our own messes,” Dazai tapped his own bandages. “Ha. Funny. The point stands — nothing erases itself. It’s always someone else who picks up the knife and scrubs blood off the ground,” He curled an eyebrow. “With how many times I’ve sent you on cleaning duties you should definitely know this.”

Akutagawa munched on his cheek, blank. “I’m not good with metaphors.”

“Who said this was a metaphor?”

He frowned.

“What,” Dazai taunted, leaning forward on bruised elbows. “Is talking with dear old me hard?”

“No, sir.”

“Liar. Anyway,” He threw the dossier in his hands, half surprised when he actually managed to grasp it. It was a bit hard to believe Akutagawa was even aware of possessing hands, given how often he used Rashomon where they were needed. “You have a question, clearly. Ask it, so I can go back to sleep. I was six feet under for more than a day, and you’re still bothering me?” He clicked his tongue.

“I don’t —” He blinked. He was sixteen, he was pretty sure. Dazai had been made Executive at his age. He probably looked older, he considered — imagining someone as frail as Akutagawa in one of the meeting rooms was strangely uncomfortable. “I don’t have a question.”

“You’ve had it for a bit,” he insisted, bored. “You keep aborting at the last minute. Just ask.”

Understanding lit Akutagawa’s thin eyes. It subjected him to another wave of hesitation, as he laid back down and covered his eyes with the back of his hand; the nervous tics he’d somehow learned — as familiar as the twist of his neck handkerchief between pale fingers.

“Madame Tanaki,” Akutagawa asked, very slowly, eventually. Dazai hid startlement in a body that didn’t flinch at all. Unexpected. “Nobody has been very forthcoming about what happened.”

“She was a traitor,” Dazai offered, vacantly. “We set her on fire for it. Do you need pictures?”

“What happens to traitors?”

“We set them on fire.”

“No,” Akutagawa insisted, stubborn. “It’s — they’re whispering about. Something else.”

Ah, he understood.

Sighing deeply, Dazai sat up again. The sole motion almost sent the boy a step back — but he stood his ground, because he wanted all Dazai had to offer more than he feared it. The blind leading the blind, he thought. Leaning on his crossed legs, he neared his face to the boy's, mockingly putting one hand to the side of his mouth.

Like a stage-whisper, he offered: “Here’s a secret for you. If you tell anyone, I’ll kill you.”

Akutagawa eyes’ twitched, unsure.

“Betraying the Mafia is a serious deal,” he explained, as dramatic as his aching limbs allowed, eyes wide. “Very serious. Serious enough to deserve something more than a flimsy death, followed by that pathetic ritual mafiosi call a funeral. The Bay is already polluted as it is. Nobody expects us to throw the ashes of those who sold us out along to the ashes of the Mafia’s good, loyal, little soldiers,” Dazai’s lips trembled. He wasn’t sure if he was still smiling, or if he’d ever started at all. Betrayal, as a concept, seemed rather easy. He couldn’t figure out how everyone always got it wrong.

How would you escape?, he’d asked Tanaki.

“The corpses of our traitors don’t go to the Under Port,” Dazai concluded, leaning back. “Or, well — they get burned there, yes. Then we take their ashes, and we mix them with wet cement and unfinished marble and some poison — just to be spiteful — and we demand they sacrifice to help us renovate the stairs to the dungeons.”

Every motion in Akutagawa’s body stilled.

He stretched numb joints, groaning a bit. “A nasty affair. The poetry of it all is a bit tacky, but Mori tells me the old Boss was a strange man. He saw value in damning men to a life of being stepped upon,” Dazai smiled a bit. “And you can hear it too, you know? When you know. Your steps seem to creak. When I’m bored, I imagine them to be screaming. It really does fill that infinite bother of a journey.”

“Oh,” the boy offered. “So, Tanaki —“

“Up and down the stairs, yes.”

“Because she was a traitor.”

“Since long before your ugly bangs saw the world,” Dazai confirmed. He flopped back onto the pillows. “Would you leave me alone, now? I’m still far too in pain to enhance your masochism. You can go study, or something. That Mimic thing might become a bother soon. You might just get a bit of training, isn’t that exciting?”

Akutagawa didn’t say anything.

Eventually, he offered: “May you get up and be able to fight again soon.”

Fight and fight and fight, Dazai echoed, bored. He held back a retch. “Did you read that in one of Kouyou’s poems? I’ll talk to her about your curriculum. We don’t want you to terrify our enemies with perfect diction.”

The door closed behind him before Dazai could find out.

---

...

---

Odasaku came with a bouquet and a deck of cards.

“Ango sends his regards,” he informed him, once Dazai had shuffled back into his pillow — motioning for him to hop on at the end of the bed. Without a inch of hesitation, the man climbed on, crossing his legs through the messy blankets and abandoning the flowers on the nightstand. Then, he spread the cards between them. “He wanted to come, but the accident has had him holed up in his office since yesterday.”

Dazai sighed, leaning his cheek on his hand. “It’s the only positive outcome of this dull deal,” he admitted, fond. “Some irritation to wrinkle up his forehead.”

“I wouldn’t have known about any of this if he hadn’t told me,” Odasaku admitted. He had a curious way of delivering cards — facing upwards. A man who could see in the future didn’t much care for anything less than transparency. Or maybe he knew Dazai wouldn’t cheat. “They kept it all under wraps. The few people who knew about The Sheepdog’s inauguration muttered about a possible annihilation.”

“Of course, the news didn’t get out — with how incompetently they acted to get us out. It took them a whole day!” he huffed, scratching his leg cast. “Had you been there —“

The former assassin tilted his head. “I do have some experience in similar accidents.”

He felt himself smile. “I was sure you did.”

“Did you have time to think about it?”

“Oh, plenty, my friend. Say, do you know how to calculate a tree’s age?”

Owlishly, Odasaku blinked. “You have to — cut it open and count the circles carved inside, right?”

Cheeks aching, he grabbed a pen from one of doctors’ forgotten dossiers on the nightstand — and ordered the man to sign his cast.

I have cared for you mercilessly for half of my life in this place, Dazai dreamed of telling him, at times. Is that enough to grant me a lifetime of this?

Bar Lupin was only open at night — but they could do something else during the day. There would have been no worries about urns or bank accounts or underground tunnels — Dazai would have killed himself, one day of that nicer life, and he would have died in the arms of someone who'd dared to call him a friend.

“Are you okay?” Odasaku questioned.

“I’m so tired I can’t sleep,” he offered, with his gentlest gaze. “But I’m fine, now.”

He knew better than to dare. Touch was more than physicality — and both Odasaku and Ango were covered in his handprints. What you’re holding on, the former assassin had once told him, is less important than holding on at all.

“Odasaku, do you think death by crushing would have been a good pick?”

The man squinted at his cards, absently blowing on the cartoonish crab he had drawn on his cast, on Dazai’s request. “I think it would have been a bit painful, to be honest.”

“Oh, yes, the shattered bones,” He pressed his cards against his chin, pensive. “I really am running out of ideas here, though. Maybe I should re read my Suicide Guide. I might have just missed something.”

Odasaku looked at him.

He looked at him weird — something in his gaze wasn’t quite tentative, but almost. Perhaps, the determination of someone who already knew they wouldn’t commit to their own propositions. Sometimes, Dazai thought, he looked at him as if he saw a wall. As if he wanted to knock. He never did — but the twitch of his knuckles always made him feel a bit hopeful. Maybe he would understand.

“Have you talked to Boss, yet?”

“Not yet,” He clicked his tongue. “I’m sure he’s busy directing our police informants on what they’re allowed to let the public know. It shouldn’t be too hard. Nobody cares about Suribachi City.”

The man conceded. “He must have been worried about you.”

“Mori doesn’t get worried,” Dazai whined. “He just gets annoying. Words over words about how I should be more mindful with my suicide attempts, and be more mindful in general, and blah, blah. He wants to play scary Boss so badly, and then he always ruins it with all that blabbering.”

“Talking usually distracts people,” Odasaku considered. “It can be a good tactic.”

He was skeptical. “Have you ever used it?”

He blinked, very slow. “No?”

Dazai sighed. “That’s what I thought.”

“Do you not think Boss is tactical?”

“He’s more tactical than anything else,” he corrected him, almost amused. “It’s not about fixing the broken, not for him — it’s about finding the cracks and deciding the house cannot stand on all of them. And people — people are the easiest to find cracks on. That’s why he talks. Wind widens the chasms,” He grinned. “I was way deep under the rubble until a bit ago. I know all about cracks. Is cracks tragic or —“

“Tragic, I think,” He gathered his victory with one hand, accidentally cutting himself with the edge of one of the cards. Startled, Odasaku studied the single drop of blood blooming on his finger tip, with unexplainable wonder — as if he’d forgotten, just a bit, that he could bleed. Odasaku never really seemed interested in blood matters. “Where did you even get the idea for this game from, anyway?”

“Life is either comic or tragic,” Tilting his head, Dazai watched him suck his finger in his mouth; a strangely childish reaction. “So everything must fit.”

“That makes sense.”

“Does it?”

“More than some things you say,” Odasaku admitted. It probably wasn’t meant to be funny, but Dazai laughed anyway.

“You know,” he started, inspired for no real reason, “I’ve been building underground tunnels.”

The man curled an eyebrow — behind his cards, behind the scar on his hand; behind stories he had never told Dazai, and the idea of what it meant to be listened to. “What for?”

How would you escape?, he’s asked Tanaki.

“It was funny,” Dazai offered, putting his own finger between his lips. There was no blood to clean. There was always blood to clean. “Or tragic. I’m not sure yet.”

---

...

---

After the three days it took him to sneak out of the Mafia Hospital room, Dazai stumbled on one leg, ripping his IV off, and did rounds to steal morphine from the other rooms.

There was quite the number of floors to visit — to be generous and fair, he only attached his arm to the strangers' IVs for thirteen seconds each, before moving on to someone else. Dazai saw wounded fools from The Sheepdog's opening night, and saw mafiosi whose names he didn't remember, and saw people who had nothing to do with the Port Mafia at all.

A hospital is a hospital, Mori had once said.

The Boss was waiting for him in front of Chuuya's room.

Dazai knew it was his — receptionists were awfully easy to fool, especially on a tired night; and Dazai had let the pretty black-haired nurse kiss him right on the lips with glee, for information. She'd wanted to be given head too, but Dazai was in a bit of a hurry — he'd promised to come back later. She had smiled. Dazai's wound was still aching.

He dropped on the blue plastic chairs in front of the door, goosebumps rising from the cold the flimsy Hospital vest couldn't hide. He waited — throwing an uninterested glance at the dossier the man had abandoned on the other seat.

Then, he changed his mind: "No scar?"

Mori hummed. "I never did like it much when other doctors could get a look at you."

He hated the sound of those words — they made him smile, all the same.

Mori knew how to make things sound horrible. As if he'd ever been brave enough to brush him with two fingers. In the liquid cobalt light of the corridors — some curious LEDs that had rejected yellow as a concept — the man was the same as he'd always been. If he'd been injured in any way, when he had been buried underneath the earth, it didn't show. His scarf was brushing the ground.

Behind him — his leaning spot — the door to Chuuya's room was shut.

"I know you performed the surgery," Dazai insisted, blinking. He tapped two fingers on the spot under his ribs that had been nothing but ache and flames until a few days ago — now, with the mixture of morphines, tylenol and healing, it was an itchy spot of normal flesh. "But you did it so it wouldn't scar. That's not your usual procedure."

Dazai had to keep all his scars. That had always been the man's condition — if you hurt yourself, you keep the lesson. He'd woken up and touched his skin, and learned he'd have no reminder.

The doctor shrugged. It would have looked more casual on a less guilty mastermind. "There's nothing you need to learn from this."

It landed like another gunshot. But Dazai wouldn't be sure — his ears had been replaying the sound since he'd woken up. His arm and leg had been in a cast — he'd shrugged them out, bored, just to have something to whine about. He'd have to kneel for the nurse, anyway.

Nothing I want you to learn from this.

He recalled, suddenly, reaching out to hold Chuuya's hand. Recalled, in a corner he'd had no time to look at — Mori, watching.

Mori couldn't know, he reminded himself.

I asked Mori if you needed me, Chuuya had told him, on phone call. He said no.

"The Sheepdog will need so much work," he whined, leaning his head against the wall. The man had been nice enough to put his bandages back in place; he scratched his covered eye, and insisted: "I saw the News in my room — how long will the reconstruction of the Island even take? Eons. That brute you all call an asset couldn't even spare his old home a second time. I told you we should have used our money for the settlement only, but no — you wanted a bar. Look how much money this will cost us! Poor Ango will have to renew all of his —"

"He didn't even come look for me."

Dazai cracked one eye open.

"It surprised me, I must admit," the doctor continued, rattling three gloved knuckles on the Hospital door. "Oh, they got me out rather fast — I was closer to the surface. But Ozaki told me he had been informed about my state," Mori tilted his head to the side, fakely, innocently confused. "And yet he threw himself at the one person who wouldn't allow him to use his Ability, and saved him."

He paused. "Saved you," Mori corrected, with the tone of his more philosophical questions. How would you kill them, Dazai?

There had been no time to think when he had felt Chuuya's arms pierce the air — they had sank and they had sank and they had been buried. He did say we could share an urn, he thought, with all the mock of a smarter being — a smart being who should have been smarter. Dazai was more than the devoted, blinded fools offering lighters to Chuuya's hands. Dazai knew that, if he had it his way — he wouldn't leave ashes behind at all.

Truly, Chuuya, he mused, studying Mori's hands. Dazai had met the boy's mismatched eyes as grasped him and held on. He could have sworn he hadn't thought about letting him fall for a moment. You'll get yourself killed.

Crossing and uncrossing his ankles, he offered: "It's because I blew my dog whistle."

The man seemed amused. He knew better than to believe it. "Rather loudly, I'm assuming."

"He almost took bullets for you last year," Dazai widened his sole eye, obnoxious. "What is enough for you, Mori? Do you want him to actually die? Would that be devoted enough? I'm all for that plan. Have been since I was fifteen. You never let me."

Mori tilted his head to the side. "You know I dislike it when you play dense, Dazai."

For some reason, he couldn't answer.

The man sometimes made for a picture of sorts — like his tense shoulders should have been in a stained-windows room, holding a bloodied scalpel over a dead man. Watching Dazai with a smile that was half man and half death and entirely too warm for that freezing room. The blood had splattered on the wall like a child's finger paint, and Dazai had been fourteen years old and damned.

If Mori had wanted him dead, he realized, a bit more everyday, he would have killed him then.

Then what was it for?, he begged.

“What’s the issue?” he questioned, with a sigh. His fingers tapped his thigh rhythmically, as he went through the options with urgency. There was something he had been missing for too long — an understanding Mori had reached about his precious, priceless Double Black that Dazai hadn’t seen. He’d always been scared of Dazai. He’d never feared Chuuya for a moment. “Do you think we’re passing notes, detailing plans to kill you? We can’t. The Hatrack could tell you. I eat all the notes he passes me during the meetings.”

There was something Dazai was missing. It wasn’t on him — Mori had been talking circles around the way Dazai had settled a clear boundary around Chuuya for years. My dog, he always made sure to say. He’d given him a collar when Mori had given him his brother’s hat; he hadn’t touched the files Mori hadn’t let Chuuya call his own.

It wasn’t him. So Chuuya had to have done something.

He looked up at him. “Not even I can teach an old dog new tricks.”

Mori hummed. “Maybe not,” He stepped away from the door, hands crossed at the small of his back. Regal and untouchable, and the offer of death Dazai hadn’t been able to refuse. All of the sudden, he longed to see Odasaku. “Maybe he can teach them to himself, though.”

“He’s not that stupid.”

“Neither are you,” the man conceded.

Some whispering nurses passed by them, hurrying towards one of the rooms with a bundle of saline bags in their arms. Mori walked the last steps between them, stood in front of his curved, seated body — then he put a hand on his nape, and he hugged his head against his ribs.

Dazai was too exhausted to even stiffen.

“How was it, under the dirt?” Mori asked.

Gloved fingers traced the Port Mafia tattoo over the bandages around his neck — a memorized pattern. He didn’t think he’d ever let Mori touch him there. The nurses returned — even staring at the floor, he heard their cooing murmurs. Fatherly, Dazai thought. That was probably all they saw.

They’re going to make me leave again, he vaguely recalled Chuuya saying. If you come —

“Nothing much,” he admitted.

Stupid, stupid, stupid Chuuya, who bared his teeth at the sole mention of dogs and devotion and partnership, and who had given him keys he could never forget the shape of. Stupid, stupid, stupid Chuuya, who would have done it all for him.

Dazai waited for the usual disgust at that realization. All he felt was the closest he had ever come to numb, irrelevant grief.

“I didn’t even get to die.”

“You wouldn’t die with him,” For some reason, it sounded like an order. Mori let out a half chuckle; it rumbled against Dazai’s forehead. His coat was rough on bruised skin, and his hand was almost not on his skull — was everywhere, and was a half dream. Dazai kept his eyes on the floor, and didn’t fool himself. “You knew we’d find you.”

“As if you’d ever let me die,” Dazai said.

“I really was scared for you.”

“For me?”

Mori finished tracing the tattoo. He tapped once on its ending dot, as if to highlight it. Elise would have made a game out of it — who between them was quicker. Except she couldn’t touch him at all anymore. “The Mafia comes first, Dazai.”

He studied his naked feet. Wiggled his toes, and munched on the distant sensation of pain in his broken leg. “And you are the Mafia?”

“So are you. We all are,” He shrugged. “It is the beauty and the curse of belonging. It’s not about the individual. It’s about the survival of all we represent,” Mori patted his head. “Some things are worth losing, if it’s in its name. Some things are of no use. And some things are assets, and should stay as such.”

Dazai’s lips itched. He felt them curl before he felt himself hold back laughter; traced the spot where he wouldn’t get a scar with numb nails.

“Mori,” he teased, suicidal but clever; at the very least. He settled his eyes on the Hospital room door — through the slot of the curve of the fake embrace. “You were always such a coward.”

The man had made the mistake of pressing him against his chest. Dazai heard his hesitation in the flow of blood vases, and he pulled his own little finger with the humming, assured tranquility that always got on the man’s nerves. Beeps and coughs filled the silence, framing the buzz of the lights. He felt a vague longing for vending machine snacks — but he had no will to munch, and to swallow, and to feel things inside his body. Almost dying always helped the rush. Always made it worse.

You truly think you will be my tomb, don’t you?, Dazai didn’t ask.

“The files on Chuuya’s past,” He didn’t see Mori nod towards the dossier; he knew he did it all the same. “Read them and give them back to me by tomorrow.”

I don’t want to. He knew it was an order.

“I’m bored,” Dazai concluded, extracting himself from his grip. Mori let him, because he always did. He stretched his pained arms as high as possible, feeling the pull of all his stitches and his recently relocated shoulder — offered the man his most lopsided smile. “Do you want a snack?”

“Do you want it?” Mori replied, because he knew him too well.

“Ah, not really,” He stumbled to his feet, and didn’t offer Chuuya’s room a single gaze, as he made his way to the closest of the other doors. His knuckles turned white around the file. Some more stolen morphine would help with the headaches. Some distance would soothe the need to tear Mori’s jugular out with his nails. “But I can buy you some Crunchy Cookies. I owe you one for your extremely slow rescuing service.”

Mori half smiled. “You know things work better around here when you’re directing them.”

“I do,” Dazai agreed. He played Hopscotch on one foot only, the slap of his naked sole against the floor annoying and deadly. “Do you?”

---

...

---

The floor of Chuuya’s room was colder.

It made logically no sense. Nonetheless, Dazai felt it from the first, startling jump echoing across the bundle of nerves on his feet. He closed the door with no real mind to be quiet, because irritation was still at the base of it all — ranked his eyes over guest seats and too luxurious furniture, as if Hospitals deserved suites. Kouyou’s favorite flowers adorned the nightstand, bathed only in moonlight.

Chuuya slept.

“How are you always passed out,” Dazai complained, skipping on his good leg. “You truly are an exceptional example of a thick skull. That thing should have split in two by now, with all the empty space.”

He almost slipped as he reached the bed — he held onto the metal railing, rattling it as he did.

It only shook Chuuya so, making his breath fog up his oxygen mask all at once. The blankets reached the middle of his chest, where somebody had had the idea to cross his hands like a corpse's. The sheer number of cables connected to his body reminded him of Thread Mazes at those playtime locations Elise adored. His hair, splattered on the pillow — like a blood halo, after a gunshot to the forehead — had grown longer than he'd noticed.

Dazai lowered the railing and climbed on.

His elbow held him up — his legs were cement on glass, doing their best not to touch the boy's own. His skin was just another weapon, and Chuuya always woke up when it got quiet.

When he settled on his side, nose almost brushing his surgery-pale cheek, he fixed the railing back in place.

"Mori's being aggravating," Dazai informed him, pulling most of the blankets for himself. It was easier than saying, I read your life start to finish, and he told me to. He hated the texture of the Hospital vests — they felt like a scratch that never quite soothed the itch. The curve of the oxygen mask should have made Chuuya a bit unrecognizable, but it somewhat fit him — with his bandaged shoulder and bandaged middle and permanently scarred skin. The wound under his ribs pulsed. Nothing for you to learn. "My only question is what you could have messed up in such secrecy that I wouldn't be aware of it."

The heart monitor beeped louder than he dared to breathe, rhythmic and stable — under the sole moonlight, Chuuya was silver and snow even where he had only been blood crimson.

Truly, he taunted himself. Don't you know he won't die, by now? A shame, certainly — but a truth nonetheless.

He huddled up against the pillow, stealing body warmth. Could half-comatose people snore? He expected Chuuya to start at any moment, if so. His wrist felt naked — he'd lost Hirotsu's watch and he'd lost his phone and he'd lost most of his enthusiasm for the winter season. Dazai threw a look at the bubbling morphine in Chuuya's IV, and reached over his body to grasp it.

Stopped.

"Ah," he considered. "You'll get mad about that, won't you," It didn't really matter. Dazai had stolen plenty from him. Him getting mad was just more reason to take. I read your file start to finish.

But moving was a crime, and his bones were too tired for cell floors. He exhaled quietly, keeping his crooked fingers for himself — you either save it or you touch it, she'd promised — and tried to convince his deeper urges not to dangle like a hangman from his sanity.

He fell back onto his pillow. Left his hand where it was — tapping two fingers where Chuuya's heart did the same. When he got bored of that too, Dazai curled up onto himself, as tight as possible, and squeezed his eyes shut.

“I really am tired,” he offered. “You know I hate pain. This hasn’t been fun in the least.”

Chuuya didn’t answer.

Over bandages and gunpowder, Dazai was a nonbeliever — was a killer and was eighteen years old. He held that burning silence between them with the care of grasshoppers and occasional scars he didn’t mind quite as much. Alive, he thought. Alive. He hated the taste with passion. He didn’t care. Good or bad made no difference; Dazai had no space for guilt and no care for consequences.

Chuuya was asleep. He wasn’t blaming him either; he never had. Only Mori, maybe — but Mori was terrified and a coward, and that was never a good combination.

“You’re the one who up and left, anyway,” Dazai muttered.

Moving was a crime, and his chest didn’t dare to rise over a scar he had not been granted. Nothing for you to learn from this. From what? Sacrifice, maybe. What Chuuya had said — Mori told me I should be loyal to the Mafia, and not to its people.

I don’t know how.

Greedier than a thief, Dazai longed to take apart his scar — draw it in his mind and torture some painter until they remade it acceptably. He had never cared about marks on his skin, but the idea of being deprived of one seemed petty. He saved me, he thought about whining. Mori would have been left speechless. Mori had looked at them — at him, as he reached for Chuuya and held on with more vitality than he’d ever offered the Mafia, and Dazai knew he was missing something. He saved me and not you and he’s my dog. Not yours.

“I’m going to kill you, one of these days,” he said, conversationally. “I’ll pretend a foolish plan could work, or — or I’ll tell you to jump out of an airplane without your Ability. You’ll do it. You’ll bark about it — but you’ll do it.”

He curled two fingers on the spare fabric of the vest, near Chuuya’s elbow. It was too large on him. Dazai didn’t know what to do with his hands that would not bleed the two of them out. Dazai didn’t know what to do with his eyes that wouldn’t carve the sight of his body convulsing on the concrete under his eyelids. Bullet after bullet and bullet after bullet —

“No, you won’t.” Dazai sighed, annoyed. “Mori’s just stupid. But I’m not sure if I want him to know that yet.”

Chuuya’s breathing made a strange noise underneath the oxygen mask — raspy and metallic, enclosed by that cheap plastic. He thought about finding a pen and scribbling on him, but the idea bored him.

The Mafia, he thought, had been somewhat funnier, once. Entertaining, at the very least. All the blood had been less boring, and all the pranks had been less boring, and waking up had been a chore — but he’d been convinced he’d find something. What the fuck did they put in your baby formula, Chuuya has scoffed, delirious, that you're that fucking allergic to being a good person?

"That was stupid, by the way," Dazai let him know. Chuuya probably couldn't follow his train of thought — being comatose and all — but he was Dazai's partner. He was obliged to try. "I'm sure you would hate me if I was good."

I already hate you, he imagined him saying, promptly.

"Of course," he conceded, fakely. "But you would," He pressed his spine against the railing, feeling the cold metal across his spine. Dazai hadn't realized just how suffocating being underground had been, until he had breathed cleaner air. "You," He yawned, "You need someone to crash against. This is all this is. Something ruined. Someone who will look worse in comparison. That's why you're — attached," He nodded to himself. "You'd hate me if I found that humanity you go on and on about. In what wild universe is your minuscule self worse than me?"

Still, Chuuya didn't answer. Dazai thought it better, perhaps — he didn't think the boy would have liked that thesis. He didn't even know if he believed it himself — if the morphine was getting to his brain. Dazai only knew he despised him.

He feared losing that hatred, at times — that bitter, scarred vitriol that connected them like hooks to gaping fish. He wasn't sure they would have had anything left, were it to disappear. He feared waking up without an ounce of that contempt — for every freckle and every sacrifice and every word out of Chuuya's mouth. What had they ever had before, beyond, that violence?

"Adrenaline junkie," he insisted. "As long as you can save someone, you'll be fine."

Dazai flicked his oxygen mask. It dropped Chuuya's cheek on the pillow, landing him nose to nose with him. He let his finger trace the plastic until it found warm, beating skin — he traced the tender skin underneath his chin, where his heart hammered the loudest, and thought vaguely about sticking a knife up there.

He didn't quite want to do it. He could have, though. Chuuya was never careful enough.

"You can't save me, though," he informed him. Something like bone deep curiosity was stuck in his throat. It burned a bit; blocked his airways. "Truly, Chuuya — don't you know better?"

Boring, boring Chuuya didn't reply. Mori would never kill him, Dazai considered, vaguely. For the first time, he began to consider his own possible hysteria. He wants to make him an Executive.

He couldn't even recall how they'd been separated from the metal pole — if the floor had fallen again and they'd fallen with it; if Chuuya had managed to get himself out. Dazai didn't know. Dazai hated pain. He missed that blood-sticky, rusty point of connection — just a bit.

Just for the chance to annoy him where he couldn't run, he reminded himself. Give life a taste of something.

We breathe, he remembered saying. He picked up Chuuya's lifeless wrist, and raised it to eye level — studied a black dot in the middle of it, cutting the path of a bluish vein in two. He rubbed his thumb over that old scar, and thought of a little boy described in a stolen dossier — someone who had started a fight over his mother. There was no point in lingering on the obvious. It was a waste of time. It had all been a waste of a life. We eat.

"I'm not in love with you," Dazai offered, matter-of-factly, with no real intention. He pressed his lips to the ink-stained skin, and kissed it until it tasted like truth. "The Mafia has no place for it."

Boring, stupid Chuuya didn't hear a thing.

He curled his hands close to his chest, and didn't push closer. Some auburn hair ended up in his eye as he closed them, trying to carve his heart to the rhythm of the monitor; a gentle, swirling hum. We die.

---

...

---

He woke to sun rays hammering his closed eyelids, enhancing a whine out of his dry throat.

Hospital rooms had another charm during the day — something less gloomy, and more still in time. The flowers Kouyou had left seemed a bit warmer, even if they were her favorites — one of the nurses had given them water, and drops of it stuck to the pink petals. Dazai watched one of them trail all the way to the edge of that fake floor, and didn't blink when it landed on the nightstand.

Doctors and patients were a low hum from behind the walls. The silence inside the room was overwhelming. Dazai rubbed his eyes with one hand, wincing against the skin-marks all the bandages had left, pressed against the pillow.

He stretched. Patted the warm sheets next to him, searching blankets that had been tossed aside carelessly. Empty.

He opened his eyes.

"What are you doing up?" Dazai muttered, studying the back of Chuuya's Hospital vest — still and somewhat rigid by the door. His hair was a scarlet bird nest, half tucked in the back of those makeshift clothes of theirs; his naked feet were on the ground without a care for the cold. "I'm not catching you when you pass out. The nurses will start chiding about treat your injured friend nicely, and I'll have to jump out of the window —"

“What happened to Tanaki?”

Dazai shut up.

The point, Mori had once said, of it all, is to always have an answer. That's how you hold it all up. It doesn't even have to be a good answer. All that most people want — all that most people come here to search for — is words to fill the distance.

He had been uninterested, as he always was. But his fingers had stolen all the same. And what's a good answer?

Mori had thought about it. Ironically, Dazai had a half certainty that he'd never answered.

“No, I'll do you one better,” Turning on unstable feet, Chuuya directed him a glance, blank to the point of resembling a void. In his hand was a handwritten letter — he'd torn out a corner from how hard his hands were clenched around it. “Why has Paul Verlaine written me a letter about it from our Ivy Dungeons?”

Chapter End Notes

mori: these homosexuals they're trying to kill me

dazai, a bit stupid but also intuitive: omfg what did chuuya do

...apologies for the cliffhanger? is all i can say? i'm sorry. this is also something i've been waiting for since chapter one, so you'll forgive me the excitement. and omg! fellas is it gay to be impaled with your partner. i'm sure not but whatever they did after that kinda is.

mori and dazai's convo is also something that goes a looong way back — part of this fic did start from a question of how mori would have felt about chuuya's unwavering loyalty to dazai, and if he would have feared it in some capacity. in the fic, something happened that heightened that fear — you'll find out soon enough. excited for it ;))

AND. L WORD DROPPED. AT LAST. HE DROPPED THE L(ove) WORD. some of you have been waiting for 600k words and this is the most romanticism i can allow in my blood bend camellias server. i mean we'll get some... things. but. well. you heard the guy. the mafia's no place to be in love.

anyway!! i hope you enjoyed the chapter, and thank you so so much for all the love you've shown until now. i'll see you soon, and i hope you'll like the rest just as much <3333333 stay warm!!

BE

Chapter Notes

see you at the end ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

interlude.

---

“Are you sure you don’t want us to wait?”

Leaning against the hood of his car, Ango was a gold-framed silhouette. The warm glint in his glasses blinded Dazai whenever it hit the new wristwatch he had stolen from Hirotsu — as the Commander’s old one had cracked beyond repair in the rubble. It’s my birthday present, he’d told him. I’m just getting it back.

The man had worn his blankest expression — but it hadn’t been unkind. Of course, Executive.

“I told you, I want to hitchhike my way back!” he insisted, as he jogged in place — far too frantic for his two friends’ eyes to follow. “I haven’t done that in so long, what with Mori’s paranoia. It’ll be fun! A great opportunity to meet beautiful women with a penchant for suicide.”

Odasaku’s skeptical glance to the lonely road they’d come from didn’t look particularly different from his every other look. “Do you think many cars will pass by?”

White steam framed plains of green and flowered juniper trees, with wooden roofs poking out of the earth as if they’d been born along with it. Bridges connected the buildings, crossing over the natural pools of the onsen village, turning the seaside location in something straight out of some postcard he might have bought for Odasaku and his kids, during his international missions. There was a quietness to the valley that weighed less than a feather; the air was fresher than Yokohama had ever allowed for.

He studied the sky. It was going to rain.

Dazai inhaled. He wondered — for the uptempth time — what mourning felt like.

“I’m sure someone will be around,” Dazai concluded, halting his jogging. “I don’t know how long this will take, but I don’t want you to have to wait for me.”

“What kind of business do you even have here?” Ango frowned, batting a bee away. Clearly, the little town wasn’t quite for him. “This is way outside Mafia borders.”

“A little order from Mori’s own whispers,” he lied, easily. It was easier than admitting that the man would find a thousand reasons for that trip of his — when Dazai himself had found none — and smile at every single one of them. Dazai, he would insist, beating the final verdict, tends to linger. “You don’t worry about it! I’ll get you some onsen water in a pretty ceramic container. I hear it’s blessed.”

“Used water?”

“It’s a natural system,” Odasaku reminded him. “Technically, it’s always new.”

Ango spluttered at him. “He’s gonna fill a container with shower water and tell us it grants miracles, Odasaku, don’t be fooled —“

“Come on, come on, don’t fight,” Dazai called them to order, clapping his hands. Rolling his gun between two fingers, he dangled it between the two men like a prize, sighing. “Who wants to do the honors for the last part?”

Silent, but impossible to misunderstand, it took a mere quirk of Odasaku’s eyebrow to clarify he wouldn’t touch the revolver. Ango’s eyes ran from him to Dazai’s too wide, untrustable grin — he let out something like a squeak, and snapped: “Why me?”

“Because our dear Odasaku has somehow maintained a moral code in the Port Mafia.”

“Because you need to train your aim,” the man added, belatedly.

“My aim is — I’m an Archivist, not a —“

Dazai threw the gun at him. Instinctively, he caught it.

“I’ll wait in the car,” Odasaku concluded, a little bit louder than Ango’s continued protests, as he stared at the weapon with distinctively offended eyes. The man looked at Dazai in a way that meant something — he basked in the understanding that there was no hurry to figure out what. November was just at its cold start, and Dazai would die in the Port Mafia, and Odasaku still owed him something better than Bar Lupin.

Look at me, he yearned to say. Look at me. You almost see me. Try just a bit more.

“Just like how we met?” he asked, simply.

Dazai didn't think there was much to beam about, given his distaste for the upcoming pain — but the shared memory warmed him up anyway.

“Perhaps something similar. But no,” he promised. “Only you, Odasaku.”

If he was pleased by the notion, nothing about him showed it. He nodded at him, equal and with no fear, and went to sit on the passenger seat.

“Come on,” Dazai grabbed Ango's elbow, leading him to a juniper just a few steps from his car. The man continued to splutter his protests. “No, no, you won't get fired. No, I promise. I'll even do you the favor of not dirtying your car, aren't you happy? Come on, come on .”

Only once they arrived and Ango's fingers stopped nervously twitching — pushing his glasses up his fuming face every few seconds — did the man dare to clear his throat.

He said: “I do know why you're here, Dazai.”

“The wonders of onsen baths,” he sighed, as he lowered himself onto a makeshift seat, made out of particularly sturdy roots. He set to moving his coat to the side, freeing his leg. He didn't trust his friend's aim completely, but he supposed it worked in his favor — pity was born from ugly things more often than from precise ones. “I'm hoping it will help with the sun rashes I've got left from the summer. And with, ah — what do they call it in those old novels? Womanly hysteria?”

“You aren't a woman,” Ango reminded him, sighing. “You aren't hysterical. And womanly hysteria isn't a thing.”

Dazai played dumb just for the fun of it. “You never know.”

“Would Boss approve of you being here?”

“I sure hope not.”

“Would Vice-Executive —”

“Ango,” he sing-sang. He knew his smile wasn't cruel. Despite it all, not even his traitorous body would have dared that betrayal. There was no place for that kind of treacherousness between the three of them. “Knowing too much is never a good thing. That, at the very least, I've learned.”

The man shut his mouth. He studied him for a few seconds more; cocked his gun.

“I know,” Ango concluded, devastatingly honest. Behind his merciless frame, gray clouds turned the sky plump, promising an upcoming storm. “I've learned it too.”

Then he closed his eyes, and buried two bullets in Dazai's thigh.

---

...

---

Eyes blurred and nails sunk in the raw skin in his wound, Dazai stumbled down the paved road until the patio of a Western-style one-story wooden building appeared in front of him.

One particularly wide juniper decorated the garden in front of it, drawing squares of shades on the traces of blood Dazai was leaving behind. He had to lean on a decrepit sign, catching his breath as his recently healed, fractured leg throbbed. He tried to reach for the closest wooden bench, but he received no further collaboration. The red kanjis under his nails swarmed across his hazed vision, until he managed to settle on: CLINIC.

A physician, the file had recited, with the casual ink strokes of someone who would write and would forget. Another name in a list of names — another missing kid in a list of sins. His wife helps him out, but she isn't a doctor. The man has a post on the town council. The woman directs the guards of the town.

Dazai dragged himself forward by the blood between his teeth, and collapsed in front of the doors right as it started to rain.

It seemed hours before the wood creaked — months before the rush of blood steadfastly trailing down his skin was no longer the loudest thing around, scratching his ears to rawness; eons before a foot almost stepped on his thigh.

Traditional sandals knocked back against the porch, as a female voice sucked in a breath — he set his blinking eyes on the rope around her feet, woven to resemble braids.

“Kansuke,” the woman shouted, turning back inside the clinic. “Kansuke!”

He passed out to callused, elegant hands touching his face, and the electrifying blink of red hair brushing raindrops off his forehead.

---

...

---

The smell of a clinic was utterly familiar. Just enough— Dazai noted, displeased — to immediately exhale some distant, stuck breath from his lungs, settling him more comfortably against the pillows.

Mori had never been a synonym to a word that vaguely resembled comfort, but the devil one knew was always the better choice. It would have been somewhat funny, though, he considered — in a rather humorless way — if the man had managed to condition him to the point of reassurance from his smelly antiseptics and hygienic procedures.

“ — waking up, I think,” a male voice was saying, somewhere over the wall of his haze.

“ — would do something like — a boy?” a female voice replayed, close enough for Dazai to confidently assume she owned the hand pressing a wet cloth on his cheeks. “So far away from the city — think he’s — any cell phone or anything —“

For a terrible, delirious moment, Dazai was hit by a wave of mourning for his lost old phone — the dog phone charm hanging from it.

Deep down, he was a man of cruel humor — he knew, with uninspiring confidence, that he would have put it in that woman’s warm hands, and watched her dangle over her own ignorance.

What for?, he wondered.

Of all the letters he had never responded to, one of them had questioned — but do you view stupidity as any other lack we admire in others? I do not. I keep my admiration for rarer things.

He forced his eyelids apart with a whine — reshaped his vocal chords and his very soul, so that they would mimic something worthy of being pitied and being recognized as similar; bathing in a purposeful childishness that got on the Mafia’s nerves and fearing instincts, and that Dazai knew most people only thought normal.

A middle-aged man’s face slowly faded into shape, carving smiles and tribulation wrinkles on freckled traits. His lab coat was a few shades dirtier than Mori’s had ever been.

“Hey, there,” His voice was kind hearted to the bone. Dazai assumed so — it sounded awfully unfamiliar. “You should stay put. We didn’t take the bandages off, but we had no clothes your size — you really don’t want to walk around the room in this cold.”

“And your leg has a hole in it,” the woman on his other side added, directing a squinting look to her husband. “How’s that not more relevant?”

“I wanted to break the news slowly, dear.”

She set her eyes on him.

Dazai only held back his flinch thanks to sheer curiosity — his spine requested he didn’t scare her away. The red camellias sewn in her kimono were the same shade of the hair curled up on her shoulder, pinned with a butterfly hairpin that was far too luxurious for a small town doctor's family. Her eyes were a shade of blue he would have recognized blind.

All the curves of her cheeks traced paths he had wrecked himself against, sleepless night after sleepless night.

She would recognize him at a first look, he decided, uncertain of whether it was a good thing or not. Perhaps, though — he mused — she hadn't looked in a mirror since losing him.

"You've been shot," the woman said, rather slowly. Then, even slower: "In your leg. Petal."

Her husband sighed.

"I'm sorry," Dazai offered, snapping both their gazes back on him. His throat was sore from the fever that rain stunt would surely grant him — he didn't have to put much effort into sounding timid. "I didn't mean to bother you."

"What bother, for God's sake? Getting shot, who knows how?" the doctor half-laughed.

His wife — clearly the more skeptical of the duo — insisted: "How did that even happen, by the way?"

He had crafted his story between the fight Ango and Odasaku had gotten in about the music and the family of squirrels they'd almost ran over — lowering his eyes to the azure blankets over his mostly naked, bandaged body, he murmured: "My father was hunting, and I — I moved too slowly while setting the trap."

The woman stilled.

"And he just left you there?" she hissed.

"It's not his fault," he hurried to say, lower lip wobbling. The two exchanged a glance over his frame, as the man's hands clenched around the stitching set he'd used on him. "He had to chase after the fox before it could escape, and I passed out — I lost him in the rain. I walked until I saw the smoke from the onsen town. I thought —"

He trailed off. Alarmed, the doctor hurried to say: "You're more than welcome. We wanted to wait for you to wake up to alert the guards, but —"

"His father shot him," the woman said. The mistrust she had directed his way was now entirely pointed to some invisible target; she disentangled a knot from the hair on his forehead, insisting: "And he ran off? We need to alert the guards."

"No!" Dazai shook his head. "Seriously, he — he didn't do it on purpose. He must be out of his mind with worry, by now — I should have tried to let him know I couldn't follow."

"After being shot?"

"I've got a whistle for that," he said, weakly.

The woman fumed. Her husband directed her a look; after a few more seconds, she stood.

“I’ll go refill the basin,” she offered. After a beat of hesitation, she forcibly softened her traits — bathing Dazai with the gentlest eyes he had ever been offered. Even leaving Yokohama had never granted him such unrecognizable-ness; for a blink, he was taken aback. “We need to keep you here for the night, petal. You were lucky the bullet didn’t go through — but unless your father stops by the City Hall and my husband’s colleagues inform us, he’ll have to wait.”

“I wouldn’t want to impose,” Dazai swore.

“I have a tendency to make enough food to satiate an army,” The man waved the matter away. “It’s an old habit from military turnations. And this guest room is already prepared for you. Don’t offend my craft by getting your wound infected.”

It was then that he noted his mistake — the room did smell like a clinic, but it wasn’t one. The back of the building had to function as a house; the walls surrounding the bed were a warm yellow, undecorated but rendered more cozy by the wide windows on three out of four of them. There were flowers on the frames, and a collection of planet shaped glass souvenirs on a desk. Dazai had the fleeting thought to steal one — to watch Chuuya seethe at the envy of not owning it — and then almost choked on the irony of it.

“Alright,” he conceded. “But I’ll be out by the morning. My father must be worried.”

“The least he could do,” the woman let him know, clearly still unsatisfied. Now that she was standing, there was a regality to her that couldn’t go unnoticed. The file had named her as the child of a long line of warriors; every inch of her proved it. “Kansuke, don’t stress him out. We can talk at dinner. He needs to rest.”

“I won’t, I won’t,” He raised his hands. A wink in Dazai direction was followed with: “That marvelous flower you see is called Fuku. You are more than welcome to feel at home.”

“Tsushima,” Dazai offered. “Shuuji.”

“Kashimura,” the woman bowed her head. Nakahara Chuuya, Mori’s file recited, as its very first lines, formerly Kashimura Chuuya — “Please, excuse me. Do make yourself comfortable.”

---

...

---

Chuuya hadn't said a word to him since the Hospital fiasco. When Kashimura Kensuke helped him to his feet — conceding to show him his office and explain his latest medical cases, after Dazai had shown unbridled interest — he thought, with a sort of resigned vacancy, that he would never speak a word to him again.

"Apologies for the mess," the doctor told him, bending to pick up some fallen dossiers from the floor. "It's sickness season."

He nodded, absently, still walking a slow march through the hallway. He didn't know what made a house haunted. There were pictures on the walls and dust in the corners; the smell of cooking from some unclear direction. He imagined a child tripping on the wood, studied the tranquility on the doctor's face, and still didn't know.

Perhaps it was the awareness of it — a room with something missing was a room that still held something of that thing. He tried to imagine the sight Chuuya would have made against the yellow walls, and blinked when his mind pictured blood shattered behind his stiffened back.

Why are you here, he wondered — merely curious. He recalled Chuuya leaving the Hospital room; being transferred somewhere Dazai hadn't asked for. What kind of spite burns?

The town didn't have many injuries to talk about, but Kashimura spoke about them with the glee of someone who'd get excited about a fever.

"Old man Katsuki has yet to spend a single Autumn without having an allergic reaction," he narrated to him, sitting crookedly on his chair. He had situated Dazai on the medical bed, and he kept throwing amazed glances at his dangling feet over the edge. "He cannot resist the cuisine of this time of the year. You have amazing pain tolerance!"

"Built it over time," Dazai offered. Then, realizing how it could be taken, he added: "I was a rowdy child. Always got in fights."

"Oh, we have that type here," he chuckled. He tapped on another file, scratching a shadow of beard — with thin, elegant fingers that Dazai knew the shape of. "Here, see — Matsuo Kiyoshi. He's about your age, I think. He's calmed down since he was a brat, but the troubles he used to get in were astonishing. I think he got suspended from school for fighting at least fifty times."

The name tickled. "Fights over what?"

"You name it," Kashimura huffed. "One time, my wife made the mistake of greeting him on a bad day, and he spent the rest of the week bad mouthing her to anyone who would listen."

Dazai watched him dig through an old cardboard box under the desk — something that contained more pictures than it did medical files. "That's not nice."

"Kids are kids. My son, though — he didn't take it well at all. Roughoused for twenty minutes straight, until the brat bowed in front of her."

Words are sounds, Tanaki had once said. He imagined her holding those two melodies — my son; my son; my, my, my son — in two wrinkled hands. She would have known the way they turned into whispers at the start and at the end like a brand. She would have asked Dazai to be less mean about it. And sounds are choices. Unconsciously or not, we only ever say what we mean.

But Tanaki was a traitor, so it didn't matter much at all.

Dazai kept his eyes on the nearest window — the rain-wet juniper in the garden, swaying with the water like misplaced seaweed. “Oh,” he replied, very polite. “You have a son?”

The man's smile turned tight. It made him look a bit older. “Not anymore, no.”

Odasaku would drop it, he considered. No one had ever told him to emulate the man — with that no-killing spiel, Mori would have abhorred the idea. But still, Odasaku would have dropped it — so, Dazai dropped it too.

---

...

---

Kashimura was interested in what life in the big city was like for a teenager, so he sat him by the bench outside to watch the faded rain wet the street — and asked for tales, as he pretended not to check for old scars on Dazai's skin.

On a whim, Dazai turned thieving.

“I'm doing an apprenticeship in this one Detective Agency in Yokohama,” he explained, as sincere as he knew how, watching a few kids chase each other by the cobblestoned road behind the picket fence. “It's mostly Ability Users. They're a bit of a secondary police force, specifically for the criminals with Abilities.”

“That's clever,” the man commented. “Not a whole lot that normal men can do against those kinds of soldiers.”

When he offered him a curious eyebrow, the man cleared his throat.

“Regiment 134th,” Kashimura offered. “I was a military doctor for most of my youth. I only settled down after meeting Fuku — she was part of a special squadron the Government was about to deploy, mere weeks before the Great War ended. I saw,” His eyes blurred, for a moment. “I saw a lot of Abilities. I saw what they can do.”

Mori never talked about the War. With a bit of sincere interest, Dazai questioned: “Was it that nobody knew how to use the Ability Users, or that they were all too scared to?”

The man thought about it.

“Neither,” he concluded. He’d gotten one of the peaches from the ceramic container Dazai had spied in the kitchen. He peeled it with meticulous motions — awfully familiar. Dazai didn’t care all that much. Did he? There was fascination in theft. There was fascination in knowing something more than his interlocuer did. He didn’t know when it became an inhuman thing to feel.

“Neither?” Dazai echoed.

“Neither,” Kashimura gulped down a slice. “I hate to blame — hate to make it about factions — but it was mostly the Users’ fault. They’d been either freaks, legally regulated fools, or secrets for far too long — they didn’t know how to deal with orders to make themselves useful. The war wasn’t the best context to start with,” He shrugged. “But it would have happened anyway. You can’t put a thirsty man in the desert and expect him not to build a well. Even if he dies in the process.”

Dazai blinked. “At least the next person to pass by will have a well.”

The doctor’s expression turned a bit grim. There was nothing but politeness in the glance he offered him, though — an affection vague enough that he knew the man had enough to satiate all the playing children beyond the picket fence.

“Spoken like a true war leader,” Kashimura complimented. It didn’t sound particularly like a compliment. “But that mentality gets hard to keep up with when the means to an end are bleeding out in your hands. At that moment, they become nothing but men.”

“Weren’t they always?”

“Not when the cause demanded something else,” he corrected. “It’s all about the well, until you realize you might never see any water at all. But you endure,” He ripped the peel off his peach, nails blunt and as clean as Mori’s always were under the gloves. Dazai didn’t think he would have approved of the doctor’s ideas. Perhaps that was why he never talked about the Great War — Dazai had a stubborn tendency to go against his thoughts.

“Although,” Kashimura commented, after a bit. Some people passed by the house in a hurry — they all halted to bow to the doctor first, though. “Sometimes the water isn’t worth it.”

“No?”

“No,” He tilted his head. His eyes were lost somewhere unclear — past the playing kids, or just a tad before their jumping steps. “Not when you have no one to build a well for.”

Dazai hummed.

The man slipped something out of his lab coat’s pocket — it was the butterfly pin that had held his wife’s hair. Kashimura turned it between peach-stained fingers, smiling a bit, as if picturing the fit she would throw over the dirt. He caressed the gemstones engraved in the wings with a touch so intimate Dazai felt the awkward, inevitable pull of unbelonging divide.

Intimacy is in the smaller acts, one of the framed inspirational quotes in the man's office had said.

He had never managed to make it a casual thing. He'd been purposeful with it — knowing the number of turns Ango's key needed in that old engine of his; knowing how it felt to scratch the hair at the back of Chuuya's skull; the exact smell of Odasaku's skin after he spent the night at the kids'; the exact shape of Hirotsu's indent on Dazai's office couch, when Mori demanded he kept an eye on him.

Dazai had whined and stolen. Kashimura caressed his wife's memory like he knew she would have built that well just for him, and survived just not to see him grieve as he drank.

"Maybe men should just stop venturing in the desert," he concluded.

---

...

---

The Kashimura household's kitchen was the messiest room of the house, and the only one with bleeding kanjis spelling out impostor on its walls.

There had been pictures in the hallways — there were entire photo albums hung around in that room, though, both framed and held by cute fridge magnets from their frayed edges. Some of them were from Kashimura's time in the army; some of them from when his wife had been young, training with samurai from her family; most of them pictured the panorama outside the window, and people Dazai could only assume had lived in that town their entire life.

"We've been here for so long it feels like we have roots sturdier than the trees'," Fuku joked — after she refilled Dazai's plate for the second time, deaf to his protests. She seemed to have relented from her initial frustration — she'd made Dazai kneel next to her, touching his bandaged leg every few minutes, as if to check. "We were both born here, you know? We left when the War started, and we came back as soon as it was over. It's the same for most people in town."

"That sounds idyllic," he offered.

"When you get used to Old Man Tanaka singing the national anthem at four A.M. sharp every day," her husband huffed.

She smiled around her chopsticks. “What about you? City boy born and raised?”

When, exactly, do you practice honesty, you bastard?, Chuuya had once rebutted, after Dazai had declared himself a sincere man.

When it's funny, Dazai had offered.

He abandoned his chopsticks in his rice, and played with the hardened hems of his shirt. His clothes had dried in the sun; his guests had been weirded out by his insistence that hunting in suit and tie wasn't all that rare — but after a while, they'd given up.

“I'm not actually,” he admitted.

Kashimura Fuku curled an eyebrow. “You won't convince me a tidy thing like you was raised in a small town, petal.”

“My parents are the wealthy kind,” Dazai admitted, with the quiet shame he thought people tended to wear when that was the case. “All their business is in Yokohama, but they both agreed that the city wasn't — distinguished enough for their tastes. They built a mansion somewhere in the woods, and now they play townsmen.”

“Well, that's one type of rich,” her husband commented, amused. “What do they do?”

He squeezed a spoonful of rice between two fingers — studied, a bit absently, the circle the woman was tracing over a wound he wasn't quite feeling anymore. “They have a Corporation,” he offered, with a half smile. “But they were butchers, originally. Decades ago.”

“Oh, we have two families of butchers in town,” she told him, biting down a grin. “I must say, neither of them are specimens of stability. At least it explains your father's despicable aim.”

Kashimura's demeanor turned sour at the sole reminder — Dazai placated her by pouring her some more tea, wearing his best smile. It wouldn't matter much if they decided to call their guards or the actual police — his name would grant them nothing but a boy long dead, and crimes that had never been registered.

They used to let me wander in the freezer room, he thought about telling her. They'd ask me to guess which ones were animals and which one were people.

“We all have lacks,” Dazai concluded.

The woman tucked his hair behind his ear, offering him a tight smile. “We do, don't we?”

One after the other, the couple filled the silence effortlessly — enamored with the sound of each other's chuckles in between words, and with never ending tales about monotone days in a town that sounded frozen in time. Dazai munched on his food with his most innocent eyes, and let all the information fly out of one ear. There was no space anywhere for lost possibilities.

He was studying the pictures on the nearest wall — some of the oldest ones; yellow across the colors and slightly ripped by constant touch — when the food in his mouth turned to sand.

The kid was tall for his age.

It was clear even as he was crouched down, hands splashing inside a little pond Dazai recognized from the park behind the clinic. He wore a strange assortment of clothes — a dark school uniform, covered by a yukata of a green shade that made his cobalt eyes seem wider, partly hanging off his shoulder. A familiar hand was reaching to fix it in place, wiping mud from his cheek. He smiled at the camera with a cheerfulness that would have lit Yokohama for days. His auburn hair was held back with a sheep patterned headband, and the humorless, poignant irony of it had him choke on blood from a tongue he didn't feel enough to bite.

Dazai, he considered, didn't know what made a house haunted.

“Chuuya.”

For a moment, Dazai thought he'd slipped and opened his mouth.

Kashimura Fuku's lips didn't bleed into her plate — the sharpness of each letter left a mark on the skin, though, rolling down with a desperately knowing carefulness that had Dazai feel unfit for each time he'd said that name. She didn't follow his life of vision — she seemed to know exactly what his eye had found; to be keeping it there only with the sheer intensity of her gaze on the side of Dazai's face.

“His name was Chuuya,” she offered, with a strange determination. “I spent months picking it. Chuuya. Like the kanji for loyalty, yes?”

It was the only photo of him in the house.

“That's a good name,” Dazai offered. Then, he asked: “What happened to him?”

She didn't even flinch. “It's a long story.”

“Fuku.”

Her husband had stiffened, on the other side of the table — he kept eating, eyes on his bowls and nowhere else; but the finality in his tone was difficult to misunderstand.

“Oh, don't you start,” Kashimura replied, chin high. There was untouchability to her that reminded him of Kouyou; when she settled hard eyes on him, Dazai almost expected to meet a mismatched pair — a burned iris that did not need thief scientists to be explained.

“I'm not,” the man said. “Are you?”

She clenched her jaw. It was an unbearably kind gesture — there was no blame in the gaze she laid over the doctor. Only a grief so fragile it was a ripple in the water.

“His name is Chuuya,” Kashimura offered, as she turned a tight smile to Dazai, again.
“That’s the whole story.”

---

...

---

“What’s with the bandages, anyway?” the woman asked him, when eleven P.M. hit the clock, and the forget-me-nots she was watering started oozing off a pleasant smell. “We didn’t check under them — don’t worry. But are you hurt?”

“I get hurt quite often,” Dazai admitted, as he kicked his sock-clad feet from the height of the wooden bench. “I decided it was more convenient to just be prepared.”

Kashimura Fuku sent him a funny look from over her shoulder.

It had stopped raining only two hours ago; the bench was still wet, and occasional rain drops trailed from the longer branches of the juniper framing that little garden. She’d asked if he wanted to join her for her gardening hours, as if the moon wasn’t high in the sky — I prefer to tend to them under the stars, she’d explained, kindly.

Who knows, maybe I’ll get a falling one to wish on.

“I wanted to apologize for Kansuke’s...” She wiped the dirt on her hands on her kimono, kneeling a bit more comfortably among the bluish flowers. She’d tied up her hair with the butterfly pin — Dazai kept his eyes on the swirling knot of red strands, and thought of a boy turning to look at him, asking — what did you do? “Behavior. He gets terribly closed off when the topic arises.”

“No offense taken,” Dazai promised.

“I love him more than the stars,” she added, frowning. “But he’s the kind of man who locks up pictures and never stops moving. He’s always been like that.”

So is your son, he wanted to say. It wasn’t quite right, he thought — Chuuya mourned loud and destructively, but it stayed where his body alone would wound up with the scars. Dazai still recalled the mess at the parking lot, back when he’d returned to France — recalled how he’d personally paid for the reconstruction, and sunk his nails in his palms to never dare again.

“That must be hard to grieve next to,” he said, eventually.

“My Chuuya’s not dead,” Kashimura said, with an ease that managed to look regal on her — where it would have felt slightly unstable on a set of less straight shoulders. “He’s just lost,” Turning again, she studied the bruise he knew had turned a gentle purple on his chin. “He would have been your age, if I had managed to find him. Perhaps that’s why it seems easy to talk to you.”

“Perhaps I’m just good at sweet talking beautiful women,” Dazai told her, preening.

“Don’t be coy.”

“I’m not!”

Her smile was amused; she gathered some fallen petals from a flower the rain had destroyed, and faded along to their disappearing fragrance. “We never had any other children,” Kashimura said, like a secret. “It was always too soon. It felt wrong — filling his vacancy.”

Dazai tilted his head. The stars were more and brighter there than they ever were in the city. He offered: “I don’t think it would have been that.”

“Me neither,” she admitted. “Not always. I just —“ The flower was thrown in an old basket for weeds. She leaned back on her hands, studying the sky with something like resignation. “I used to come here every night, and imagine he’d come back — out of nowhere. Show up at our door. And I’d know him on sight. I’d know,” Dazai thought of the way Chuuya smiled, these days — that it didn’t look much like the toothless grin from that picture at all. Perhaps a mother, he mused. Except Chuuya wouldn’t have known at all. “He’d lower his eye to this bundle in arms, and he’d be so happy — of course he would be. He was so kind. He was never jealous. But his eyes — even for a blink, they’d be —“ Kashimura cleared her throat. “He’s been lost for so long. I couldn’t let him think he hadn’t been looked for.”

He kept his eyes on the constellations.

“My husband mourns by holding on to the little we have,” the woman said, quietly. “I mourn by letting myself imagine what he could have been. Maybe he likes cooking. Maybe green is his favorite color. Maybe he ties his shoes with two fingers only. Maybe he’s happy, and that’s all.”

He sleeps on his stomach, Dazai imagined saying. She would look at him and — do what? He drinks milk every morning, even if I’m pretty sure he’s intolerant. He has bled so profusely his skin is a shade redder. He does not know your face.

“Maybe,” Dazai conceded.

Kashimura smiled, as if it was truly enough. She turned back to her forget-me-nots, and set to work without a care for the murderer behind her. When the moon reached the middle of the sky, she began humming a melody so familiar, his fingers twitched in his lap.

Ah, he imagined telling. He does not know you, but he sings that too.

---

...

---

The moment he — stupidly and a bit late — realized that the bed he slept on could have been Chuuya's old one, Dazai was out of the room.

His sock-clad feet made no sound against the floors. The Kashimura's bedroom was closed — he stole a glass of water and a peach from the dark kitchen, despite being allergic, and vaguely thought about dying right in that room. They'd have to come for me, Dazai noted. He'd have to come. He'd never forgive me at all.

Dazai really didn't care much. He only put the peach down to let Doctor Kashimura have a work-free weekend.

Favors are to be repaid, the Mafia swore.

Instead of dying, he went to snoop around the man's office.

There were boxes upon boxes of medical files hidden underneath his overly long desk — the cardboard had started coming apart at the corners, and the dossiers had lost their original color to be nothing but a sick yellow. Documents from the Town Hall were the most recent papers around; a few trinkets, and a pair of boxes signed as GREAT WAR were the oldest.

Immediately, as silent as he'd learn how to be, Dazai sat cross legged underneath the desk, and set to studying the files from the War.

Mori never talked about the War; it had to be for a good number of reasons, but he'd never cared for a coward's justifications. The pictures showed a panorama he couldn't imagine the man wanting to linger on, though — their sepia shade turned the ships into sandcastles, and the carved-in eyes of soldiers and nurses alike into mummified bodies. Most of the pictures Kashimura had saved tried to be more cheerful — men with their arms around each other's shoulders; healed patients with their thumbs up; children from visited cities with a smile that spoke of being forced to endure.

Mori never talked about the War. But he had that picture, the one with a grown up Elise and a little girl with a butterfly pin — he had the way he sometimes looked at Yokohama, and told Dazai — how could this not be worth it? Mori —

He stilled.

The picture was more official — an end of the year shot of the medical force across some of the regiments, with more detailed information scribbled in an elegant handwriting at the base of the thick paper. The doctors stood in three lines, lab coats on and exhausted, serious expression on their young faces — the wooden chairs the first row sat on were stained with what Dazai knew was dried blood. Kashimura rested on the left of that same line, younger and more freckled.

Two seats from him, on the middle row, was Mori.

“That’s a stupid ponytail,” he said, quietly.

It really was stupid — it kept being stupid the more pictures Dazai’s found, at least one for every year the Great War had lasted. At first only official photographs; then, after some albums, the sight of Kashimura and Mori operating on the same patient had a cruel pull wrinkle Dazai’s lips. He put his hand over them to hide them; sunk his nails into his skin with the same distant curiosity he traced Mori’s younger traits with.

Mori never talked about the War, Dazai thought. Mori never talked about any of it. Not the War — not the Maihime Project, and why it had hooked the Government to his sharp, serene fingers.

The Maihime Project, Chuuya had asked. Does it have something to with —

Abruptly, Dazai couldn’t be there.

He put the pictures back in the boxes with childish indulgence, as tidy as he’d been taught and as quiet as he’d learned — he kept his eyes on the real world, and his mind on the picture that had Mori’s hand on Kashimura’s shoulder. Sometimes, the man had said, water isn’t worth it — and Dazai needed to leave that room, and to put those photos down, and to never find out, and to never forget, and to forget, to never even consider that —

“Nakahara Chuuya,” His new cell phone, pressed against his ear, spoke. “Who is it?”

Dazai was on the too large root of a tree.

It still carried dried blood from how Ango had shot him — always a bit messy, always enough of a stuck-up to not disobey orders. Dazai had left the house in his socks. It would be awkward for the hitchhike — but he imagined going back inside that house, and knew he’d never be able to do it again.

The phone was cold and metallic against his cheek. Dazai didn’t quite remember typing the boy’s number. He didn’t remember leaving at all.

“Oi,” Chuuya insisted. “I’ve got no time for pranks, seriously. What do you want?”

Dazai didn’t dare breathe. He knew the boy would recognize it. He thought about saying — she looks like you, and, I knew Verlaine was there and I thought it was funny, and, Tanaki wanted you dead, and he tried his hardest to figure out a human reason not to. He couldn’t. He just knew it wouldn’t be taken well — knew it from learned mistakes and unwanted lessons; knew it because he had seen the actual beating hearts around him feel it. She looks like you and I thought it was funny and I need you to know it was never on you.

What do you want?

What did he want? He wanted to argue about the Arcade, or to talk about the weather, or to rate the episodes from all the shows Tanaki had ever liked. But they couldn't talk about Madame Tanaki, and they couldn't talk at all, and he wanted Chuuya to look him in the eyes and say, I know you're dying.

It will hurt, he thought. Odasaku had gotten inside Ango's car because Dazai had told him so; uncomfortably, he now wished he hadn't listened. It'll hurt. But he'll grow ice over the cracks, and it won't.

He closed the call before Chuuya could get to it.

"Took you long enough."

It wasn't raining anymore. The umbrella Odasaku was holding didn't make much sense — but it cut a fascinating silhouette, against the car lights framing him from a few bushes away. Ango didn't dare honk, but Dazai thought he saw him tap an impatient rhythm on the wheel anyway.

Odasaku had leftover curry on the side of his mouth. He was offering Dazai his hand like it didn't matter at all.

"Oh," Dazai said. "You waited?"

"We guessed it wouldn't take you more than a day," the man corrected him. "We arrived just in time. Bar Lupin is having a poetry reading night. We couldn't let you miss the excitement," He sounded awfully serious about it, too.

He stared.

"Oh," he echoed. His face ached. He didn't think he was smiling; but I would, if I could, Dazai begged him to understand. He took Odasaku's hand and let himself be pulled up — he begged, I know I'm dying. "Alright. Let's go home, then."

Against the starry sky, smoke rose from the roofs of the onsen town. Dazai didn't know what made a house haunted — when it disappeared from the fogged up window of his passenger seat, he thought it didn't quite matter. Ghosts, maybe. Dead wishes for something unknowingly alive.

The Port Mafia, in any case, did not allow for tombstones. Only traitors got graves.

Somewhere in November.

Ango came through the window, because Dazai had put hot glue in the door lock.

“You need to leave,” he said, only, dropping a brown package on the empty floor. Food, his nose told him, through the numbness of a fever. There were no windows in that safehouse — there was only him, sat on the floor, and the traitor climbing through the window; because there was glue in the door, and Dazai knew, spines benefit from standing straight. “They were about to find you, last night. We need to relocate you. The data erasure will take years, and I doubt Boss —” A beat. Ango cleared his throat. “I doubt Mori will be that patient.”

Mori, he mouthed. Mori. A death rattle breathing. His fingers clenched around nothing. Mori. Mori. His hand clenched around a gun.

Odasaku’s blood filled his mouth.

Sorry. He unclenched his fingers. Ango was checking the files in his hands. His suit was soaked with rain. Sorry. Sorry. Sorry, sorry, sorry, I can’t. I will but I can’t. I will because you said it but I can’t. Sorry, look at what I did.

“I will kill you,” Dazai let him know, numb.

The friend he had lost but not buried did not spare him a glance. Sorry, Dazai thought, to the blood in his mouth — as he imagined Ango’s viscera on that empty floor and Mori’s eyes blown into a squelching bundle. He had buried Odasaku near his kids, and when he’d tried to fit himself in one of the graves, it had all been too tight — the mud and the earth and his rib cage and his jacket around his shoulders. The Mafia didn’t bury its dead — and Dazai was no Mafia and no friend and no anything at all anymore.

If you yearn for something, Ango had said, you’ve got to do it before they burn you.

I'll burn you, Dazai thought, dazed. He was a torturer at heart; Mori had sworn so. Hirotsu had said he was good at it. Dazai could have burned him alive, skinned and screaming, and left no traces but a Demon's handiwork — he could have left so many of them that nobody would have ever dared exhaling in Dazai's haunted vicinity again. He was a child when it came to killing — a fast learner and a whiny brat, never ready to leave the roundabout.

But Odasaku had asked, still — so Dazai had to gut that useless child from the inside out.

"I know," Ango said.

Dazai stared at him.

His fingers clenched. Unclenched. Cry, he thought. He wanted to see the face Ango would make. The thought made his lips tremble — he bit them to blood, clawing the expression out with his nails, and Ango still didn't look at him.

Cry, he thought, but Dazai was nothing at all anymore, and absence had no tears. He wanted to know what Ango's last words to Odasaku had been. He wanted to kill him for them.

Look at what you've done, Dazai wanted to say. His hands were crimson, bloodied the way the sky was cursed to barren permanence. His hands were clean. He hadn't washed Odasaku's blood off, because how could he have torn him off of himself too, after tearing the rigor mortis of his hand from his face — perhaps it had been all Ango, between one delirious fever and the other; climbing through the windows like Dazai wouldn't kill him for it, as soon as he was done being better.

But Dazai knew no self atonement for himself, and he'd promised Odasaku a lifetime of better.

He'd sworn it to his corpse, because Dazai was always late, and he hadn't been fast enough to say it to his last breath. Be better. In some way; in all ways; in all attempts that would grant him a ghost's haunting — even if Odasaku was too kind, too kind, far too kind and dead. The prayer had been stuck in his lungs, but Dazai had begged anyway — I can still be better. I can be better. You only need to stay here and see it.

Look at what I've done.

There were seven thousand, four hundred and seventy-five files in the Port Mafia database — detailing every single crime associated with every single one of its members.

Dazai knew all of them.

He knew his were never ending — knew no amount of promised time would make him someone Odasaku would have called good. But he was out, at last — you will die in this place and rot in the ocean, Ango had sworn, but Dazai was out. What was he standing under the sun for?

"What do I do?" Dazai asked, then.

A shape shifting, malleable prayer. But his friend — dead but not buried; alive, but only out of Odasaku's oath-stained blood — had a new pair of glasses and still believed in self-atonement. He looked at Dazai with the eyes of a mere planner — you loved me, he wanted to rattle him to say, you loved us both.

“You hide,” Ango concluded. He didn't look like Mori at all, but Dazai was betrayed and alone all the same — inside an office or a secret hideout. Betrayed and alone, alone, alone again. “After that —“

He waited. Ango looked at him, at last.

Dazai thought about ripping his eyes out. Sorry, he thought, blessedly torpid. He hadn't felt a thing since Odasaku's hand on his cheek. If Ango had tried to touch him, he would have killed him. Sorry. Sorry, he thought. He hadn't felt a thing since the floor of the Mimic base. He hoped he never did again. He hoped the counterfeit cells in his brains forced that bereft bundle of sensations to linger, and he hoped to die in a river the texture of which he wouldn't feel, still stuck on old tiles and the scars on Odasaku's palm — and Dazai hoped to die soon, Dazai hoped to be better, for a lifetime and two and three, and however would be enough to reach an inhale that would not have him doomed to Odasaku's demise and disappointment alike, sorry, he thought, sorry, sorry, I still want to kill him.

The man who had been his friend cleared his throat. He looked away from Dazai, and never looked him in the eyes again.

“We'll see about the after,” Ango offered, cursed to know them all like ink on paper, and nothing more. “The rest will come on its own.”

The floor was still empty.

Odasaku's hand settled on his cheek — his nails dug in his scalp, and he died, again and again, once for every word out of Ango's mouth, two for every breath out of Dazai's. Sorry, he begged, throat hoarse. Come back. I'll be better this time. He breathed out, and Odasaku was dead, and the floor was still empty.

“Get me a grave when I die,” Dazai ordered.

Ango didn't speak.

This is not my place at all, he'd told him. He wondered if he should have taken it as a prayer — understand. Wondered if he should have burned him alive in that car — get Odasaku to live the life he had left to his suicidal friend.

At last, Ango nodded.

Chapter End Notes

kashimuras: i miss my son chuuya so much dazai: quit telling people your son is dead kashimuras: sometimes we can still hear his voice

hi again!! i'm kinda moved. this is the last interlude we'll get before the story is over. can't believe this... that's why i'm leaving you off with a) chuuya's family feels b) a little look in dazai's future after oda's death (don't worry, next chapter will start back from where we left off). dazai meeting chuuya's parents has always been something i wanted to explore (more so after we found out chuuya refused to even speak with them), mostly because it fits in both the "childish cruelty" and genuine curiosity i associate with him as a character. i hope you liked it!!

as always, thank you so so much for reading, and thank you for all the love on the last few chapters. i'll see you soon, keep warm <33333

see you!!

MORE

Chapter Notes

see you at the end ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

act six

[well / the day you were born / i wasn't]

---

Before the fall of The Sheepdog.

The Ability User had no name, but he wore Dazai's face.

"I stole it from the database of that cute android's of yours," his voice echoed, somewhere in the upper levels of the warehouse. London was a minefield of abandoned buildings; statistically, it should solve the homelessness issue to a success rate of 250%, Adam had once explained, stoic. He hadn't been lying — most of the deals Chuuya had been invited to had taken place in rusty depositories. It just so happened the last of them had been a trap. "I could do much more than this scrawny body, if you want me to."

"I do," Chuuya agreed, floating a few feet off the ground. "I'm currently taking a work break from that mackerel bastard's face."

The User laughed loudly and breathily. It didn't quite sound like Dazai — it grated on his Pavlovian nerves with too little aggressiveness. He followed the sound to a corner of the interior balcony, and hauled the car he was holding in his hands right into that half ceiling.

A scream filled the silence.

Just some easy business, he'd promised Adam and Eve, abandoning them in the middle of some unofficial goodbye dinner the woman had insisted to throw — before he and Adam set off for a few weeks of Mafia missions in Europe. Chuuya would then continue on his own, and leave the android to the bliss of android-detective life. I'll be back soon. Keep me a seat.

I will keep you a plate, too, Adam had nodded.

Technically, the Mafia's European missions were solely Chuuya's business. Adam was as legal as a tin can of a man could be, given his Creator's association with the Order of The Clock Tower — but he'd found some strange loophole Chuuya had decided not to linger on, and insisted that his, wise Master Chuuya would certainly not lead him down a path of dishonesty and crime. Chuuya had spent an entire week trying to figure out whether the new body had erased his memories of what the Port Mafia was — but to no avail.

The perspective of that collaboration was almost excessively exciting. He had been looking forward to it since Adam's mail-sent android joke on, should Master Chuuya want a "fan", I do have a function that will turn my fingers into vents.

Then he'd been driven to the warehouse, and the doors had opened to Dazai's face tutting: "Missed me, partner?"

"And you didn't even let me flesh out my potential!" the User whined, somewhere through the rubbles that hadn't, somehow, killed him. He wasn't a real danger — but he was awfully quick, and Chuuya couldn't allow someone who had any access to Mafia's faces to live freely. "I'm great at imitations. It's my whole job. Have some respect! How much can you even hate this guy that you kicked my nose the moment you saw me?"

"More than your worst enemy," Chuuya let him know, promenading in the lit corners. There was only so long a rat could hide in the shadows — and clearly, the User wanted something. "And your imitations suck ass. I knew it wasn't him."

"What, so quickly?"

"You smelled weird."

"Why would you know how he —"

He sunk his heel in the ground, opening a chasm all the way to the direction of the voice. A familiar crack! echoed only a blink after the shriek out of the User's mouth, as his knees landed on the concrete and shattered on impact.

"I'm annoyed," Chuuya said, strolling his way to where the User was spitting blood and half panicked screams. "Couldn't you have picked — I don't know, Ane-san? I miss Ane-san."

"Who the fuck —" Dazai's mouth spat — as he looked up at him with a sincere, tactile ache the real deal had never shown. Dazai was a whiny, sore loser — but he had the pain tolerance of a piece of plastic. "Is Ane-san —"

He kicked him right in the side of the skull, landing his kneeled body onto the ground.

"Have some respect," he parroted.

The User threw up.

Chuuya crouched down, gripping the thick hair of that living imitation. He didn't really look like Dazai at all, but he had some issue figuring out why — the work itself was masterful. Bandages of the same texture Dazai would periodically lament being out of stock of — that scar he'd gotten near his good eye the one time a knife had flown too close. But there was nothing familiar in his gaze; there was no recognizable carving in the space in front of Chuuya, instinctively adjusting his shoulders to the knowledge of a covered front. Dazai wasn't good — but he was trustable.

The thing in front of him was a puppet.

“Your mistakes in logic are repugnant,” he informed him, rattling his head. The blood trailing down his chin was the same color as the rust of the support beams; Chuuya hadn't seen Dazai in more than a month, and that unfaithful imitation set his irritation off. “Why would he even be in London?”

“To —” The User attempted to smile. It was a wet, bruised sight. He'd forgotten to give Dazai eyebags. “— surprise you?”

Chuuya buried his fist in his ribs.

The User choked around it. It was never a particularly pleasant sensation, but he liked the finality of it — the abrupt fade of the light in the eyes set on him, and the twitch of fingers of a body resisting the breach. Chuuya pulled his hand out and stretched his fingers, studying the bundle of limbs Dazai's body turned into as it landed on the old concrete.

He wiped his hands on his pants. He made for a strange sight — and a bit stranger as Chuuya stood, towering over a lifeless eye in autumn shades and cheeks that had never quite lost the roundness of childness.

“You look like shit as a corpse,” he let the ghost in the air know. “Maybe that's why no chick wants to die with you.”

Dazai — who was in Yokohama — didn't answer.

He heard the buzz before he felt the brush — a bullet flew right by the side of his shoulders, almost grazing it. Tainted reacted quicker than he could ask it to, trapping the projectile in a crimson gravitational field. It caused a familiar voice to curse — somewhere in the other direction of the warehouse.

“You really are phenomenal, Nakahara!” Dazai's tone exclaimed, with a sincere admiration that set goosebumps free on Chuuya's skin — the sheer horror of it. “But you hold the same defects as most Japanese criminals. Us Europeans never assume the power we see is all the power there is.”

Chuuya spun faster than the rumble of a quick succession of projectiles, digging a road of bullet holes in the concrete.

He stuck to the nearest beam, squinting his eyes at the darkness. “You talk too much,” he let the User know, aiming the halo of bullets around his body. He let go with a scoff, drinking in the pained gasps out of the User’s body — then turned around just in time to stop another copy of him from grasping him by the neck.

“How much time do you have?” the User asked him — tilting his head in a way that almost resembled Dazai’s habits, at last. Chuuya tore a support beam out of the concrete, attempting to bat at him — the User jumped away. His grin had no blood between the teeth, and no confidence that Dazai would have worn. He preferred being underestimated until the last second. “I can do this all day. Surely until you get tired of trying to find the real me.”

Chuuya decapitated him with a swing. He turned again, and Dazai was laughing on one of the interior balconies — tie fluttering with wind coming from one of the holes in the roof.

“This is shittier than a horror movie,” he muttered, pushing his sleeves up.

“Aren’t you a bit curious about what I want?” The User climbed onto the railing with a child’s glee, putting his hands on his hips with clear self-satisfaction. It wasn’t a particularly new stance for that body — even less so, when Dazai’s grin widened, as he leaned dangerously forward. “I must have a reason to go through all of this.”

“You’re a low level grunt from The Pigeons who somebody convinced he could go against me,” Chuuya recited, unimpressed. “And now you’re letting me kill you. I don’t care that much about cargo information.”

The User’s smile turned playful. “Oh, I can do much more than let myself be killed.”

He let go of the railing with the quickness of a blink. Chuuya didn’t move — Chuuya didn’t find a good explanation for the strange sound that left his mouth when the body crashed against the concrete, brains splattering out of a shattered skull and bandaged arms turning sideways.

Whatever it was, he wasn’t fast enough to exhale it with the rest of his carelessness.

“Oh, I see.”

His forearm sunk like a blade across the next body, plastering Dazai’s taunting smile against one of the columns.

It was the most realistic expression it had worn since donning that clothed flesh. “And here I was starting to think I’d picked a body that had no effect on you,” the User commented, wide eyed. Up close, he could even see that small scar Dazai’s lower lip had been stained with in his braces days — a mark not from battle, that had had Chuuya laughing for days. “You know, the reaction is half of the fun. The clones are pretty fun themselves, but — it’s that look in your eyes that makes me win.”

“The look of loathing?” Chuuya wondered, very blankly.

The User reached forward — bumped their noses like a mischievous kid. “The look that tells me you don’t want this body dead.”

He dug Tainted-glowing nails on one side of his bandaged throat, and ripped his jugular out.

“You should have gathered more information on Double Black, given your Ability,” Chuuya let him know, stepping away from the fallen corpse. He kept his voice too loud, looking around for a glint of the User’s newest body — gritted his teeth against the squelching squeak of his shoes on the bloodied ground. He could feel specks of it across his face, too — not even the blood tasted like Dazai’s. “Not like gossip on us is lacking.”

He took another step — tripped.

Starfishing on the ground in front of him — seemingly untouched by the boot Chuuya had immediately pressed against his throat — Dazai’s mouth wheezed out: “What’s Double Black?”

Something like stupor had him pause.

He pressed his shoes deeper; leaned down, and offered a curled eyebrow. “Me.”

When he crashed his windpipe, the User’s eyeballs exploded out of their socket.

Chuuya didn’t remember much after.

Abilities tend to have a limit, Pianoman had once explained, watching him twirl glasses on the nonexistent tip of bracketed hands. Some of it is a game of duress. Whoever convinces their Ability to last a tad longer than the other. Chuuya — who had never not felt able to fly — hadn’t been all that convinced. But the User’s copies fell one after the other, torn apart by his hands or crushed skull first against a wall or imploded under the pressure of gravity or, or, or.

Eventually, surrounded by enough identical corpses to turn the world into nothing but black coats and bandages — Chuuya made his way to the kneeling, breathless Dazai at the end of the room.

“You really do work like a death machine,” the User panted. Dazai’s face was covered in sweat beads; Chuuya’s hands aborted the strange motion to wipe it off his cheek. “I’m not surprised this guy of yours isn’t here. I’d fear for my life.”

“You’re so not him,” Chuuya concluded.

He smiled. Dazai’s skin seemed to vibrate around a translucent skeleton — the User gritted his teeth in an effort to hold on, scrunching up the boy’s nose into an expression he’d only make in front of a lost Arcade game.

I’ll be back, he’d almost typed into the text bar of the MACKEREL’s contact, before leaving. The act had felt weird in itself, though. They had never accounted for each other’s come-and-gos — Chuuya had never cared to, and Dazai never cared about anything at all. Yokohama was good and was warm and was his, and the putrid scent of blood had only been inside his mind — and Chuuya just needed to go far away enough to remember it.

He grabbed the User's chin. "Well?"

Defiance lasted only long enough to have Chuuya tighten gravity-soaked fingers around his bone jaw.

After some mostly unimportant info on a deal or two that Chuuya had already guessed to be a trap — leverage for you to come reveal some secret of yours to my Boss, the User admitted — and after the man had uselessly attempted to sweet talk his way with words not even Dazai would have been corny enough to say, Chuuya tapped two fingers on each side of the man's jugular, and contorted the bones of his neck inside out.

His landing thud! was the loudest sound around.

"What a bother," Chuuya concluded.

Gathering all the Dazais was harder than any of the killing had been; once they'd all been put in a makeshift pile, Chuuya texted a picture to Adam, demanding whether he could bring some gasoline along when he came to pick him up.

I did not know Dazai Osamu had mastered the art of cloning, Adam texted back.

It landed a bit sourly.

Chuuya sat by the pile — using it to shield his eyes from the May sun — crossed his legs, and tapped the lifeless palm of the closest of the bodies. That one specific corpse he'd ripped the heart out of — it was lying somewhere among that bundle of limbs, and all that Dazai had left was a crater a few flies were already feasting on. His eye bandage had fallen; with a hum, Chuuya fixed it into place, tapping two fingers on the missing eye bag.

"I did tell you," he informed the pile. He knew better than to linger on mere plastic. It left his fists clenching for a vendetta that wasn't there, still. "I'll kill you myself."

His thumb hovered over the fish charm on his phone. He considered sending the pic to Dazai, too.

Then, Adam's unmistakable car horn filled the silence, and he didn't think about it anymore.

---

FOUR MONTHS LATER

---

Case number: 56670971

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, after Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [Code Name: Double Black] had been rescued from [...]*

---

Dear brother,

You'll forgive the succinctness of this letter. I wish to offer you my most sincere condolences for the tragic end of that secretary of yours. Gin tells me you held her close to your heart. It is a shame you did not manage to save her from her fate.

But I do think this will be good for you, in the long run, Chuuya. The truth is easier to accept when we are uninterruptedly faced with it.

There is a divide we cannot overthrow.

---

...

---

One of Kouyou's girls opened the door to her room after a single knock.

“Vice-Executive,” She bowed, immediately, eyes trailing down Chuuya's new Ballet-fit suit
— as Kouyou had described it, in the ripped piece of paper she'd left in the gift box abandoned in front of his penthouse — with unmistakable intention. Her smile was a tad too bright. “I’ll leave you two to it, then.”

Chuuya removed his hat to offer his own nod; he closed the door behind himself, not before receiving a meaningful squeeze to the hand.

“There you are,” Kouyou tutted, in a blue dress, Western style — half facing the mirror of her vanity desk, eyes lost between the reports balanced on her crossed legs. The slit of thigh shown by the dress had a new scar Chuuya had missed; despite it not being the first time they saw each other since he’d returned, he felt momentarily blindsided. “Don’t you look stunning — I knew blue would suit you. Can I bother you with some help?”

He almost thought she meant the reports, until her rose-tinged lips curved, hands offering him a gold-carved hairbrush.

“Of course, Ane-san,” he concluded.

The rhythm of it became lulling — stable motions that never got even a wince out of her reflection; momentary breaks for knots even worse than Chuuya’s own. Their hair wasn’t quite the same shade; while the Executive chatted mindlessly about the ballet they’d see that night — a rather boring plot, she admitted, but I know the Prima Ballerina, and she’s a sight for sore eyes — and the latest whines out of Mori’s mouth in his absence — he’s convinced the Ability Permit will either come by the end of the year or never — Chuuya focused on nothing but the feeling of it over his gloves.

“I left it in your penthouse,” Kouyou said, at one point — gently pulling his sleeve. “Can I assume you’ll be spending more time there, from now on?”

Chuuya paused. He’d never told her about furtively still sleeping at Albatross’ — wasn’t sure of why she’d never brought it up, except some odd understanding she would never willingly vocalize. “Yes,” he confirmed, at last. “It’s a waste to have it there, empty and dusty. Or maybe I’ll sell it,” he added, tentatively. It had been on his mind for a while — finding a middle ground. Something flashy, but small enough not to set his bones on alert. “Get something a bit less — less. But bigger than the old place. To start with. At some point, I’ll get used to walking miles to pee at night.”

She smiled. There was pride in it. “I’ll buy it for you again when that time comes.”

“I’ll be Executive by then,” he replied, with a shrug. “I’ll do it myself.”

A knot got stuck in the brush.

The scar under his ribs itched. He scratched at it, and dared: “You knew too, didn’t you?”

In the reflection, Kouyou’s smile stayed as it was. Her eyes grew a bit hesitant, though.

“About Tanaki?”

He kept quiet. Then: “That too, I guess.”

“It happened during your undercover week with the Red Serpents. We had to act fast — we couldn’t risk the syndicate forming the thought we were stalling, haunted by the thought of executing someone we had been close with,” Professionality was at the edge of her every letter. The facts and the explanation and the good of the organization. It made sense. There had been nothing else to do. Chuuya — still; foolish and betrayed until the end — had sat on Tanaki’s chair at the entrance, and just spun until it had gotten dark enough to walk to Kouyou’s home. “I preferred waiting for you to come back.”

He trailed two fingers between the hair on her scalp. “Did she get a grave?”

“Of course.”

“Where?”

She met his eyes in the mirror. “Chuuya.”

“Ane-san,” he echoed, unimpressed. “I know you’ve been aware of much more than an execution. Can’t you at least owe me this?”

With a sharp wince, she fell quiet.

“You knew too,” he insisted. “Didn’t you?”

“You know I did,” She studied an irrelevant line in the files in her lap, frowning around some concept she didn’t know how to express. Chuuya kept untangling her hair. He had only been out of the Hospital for a day. He could wait. “It took a few weeks to get Verlaine to — passable breathing conditions. Most of January. After that, he was a stable presence in the Ivy Dungeons. I was the first person Mori informed.”

Hearing Verlaine’s name next to a present tense almost had him crack the brush.

“And now he’s fine?” Chuuya inquired.

“Healthier than I have ever been,” Kouyou tilted her head. “I suppose you and him have that swift healing process in common.”

Dear brother, the letter had started. Chuuya hadn’t thought it a prank for a single — miserable, merciful blink. He had memorized the swirls and twirls of Paul Verlaine’s handwriting without any wish to do so — a perfect copy to Rimbaud’s own, whether the man had ever realized it or not. The French of the letter had pissed him off to no end — either the assumption that Chuuya would have learned the language even when he believed him dead, or the possibility of his brother having kept tabs on him while he rotted in a basement.

“I’m nothing like him,” Chuuya said.

Kouyou hesitated.

She straightened in a way that told him to let go of the brush — turned around in her stool, just tall enough for the top of her head to brush his chest. Her satin gloves didn’t tickle when she held his hands; Chuuya’s own gloves didn’t let them.

“Chuuya,” she started. It should have felt comforting, he thought — but she wore the eyes of orders. “You understand why I didn’t tell you.”

There wasn’t a question there.

Three years, he thought. Betrayal and then betrayal and then betrayal — it sounded too tiring to even think about. Strategy, he corrected, consequently.

“You know I do,” he offered, with a shrug. His spine kept waiting for an order to stiffen — the certainty of doom. He’d felt it since Dazai’s slept lined eyes had laid on him, asking why he was out of bed. Chuuya kept waiting to feel angry — kept waiting to feel grief, and revenge, and something as bitter as Ueda Akinari’s hands had sworn. Chuuya kept realizing he didn’t really care at all. “The Mafia doesn’t have that many rules.”

Never disobey the Boss. Kouyou smiled, just a bit; tightened her grip. “Nonetheless, I’m —“ A pause — perhaps, the realization that apologizing would have contradicted their duties. “Chuuya,” she insisted, instead.

He smiled, squeezing her fingers back. It was no betrayal, he thought. There was no blood.

He still didn’t know where Tanaki’s grave was.

“I don’t blame you,” he promised.

“Don’t blame Mori, either,” she said. “He would have told you, once the Executive seat — it was a secret card for a reason, Chuuya.”

It makes too much sense to blame him, he could have told her. He’d compartmentalized on his wheeled-chair way out of the Hospital; had felt nothing but the weight of a slightly irritating order by the time Mori had passed by his office, Elise in tow and a relieved smile on his lips.

“The most famous Assassin from the European forces?” Chuuya scoffed. “I’m shocked Boss doesn’t have a bell around his neck.”

“Paul prefers foulards, from what the lists of his commissions let me know.”

He stared. “Paul?”

Kouyou smiled a secretive smile. “He gets awfully irritated whenever I refer to him as that.”

Oddly, it made him laugh.

Rarely enough, the woman was the one to hang off his elbow all the way to the theater — she smiled with a relief that had Chuuya feel better than any empty, desperate apology would have. The Mafia was the Mafia, and the love was as black as the blood. Turning eighteen had left him more tired than anything — quiet but determinate, he had decided he was simply fed up with the ache of it all. He was an exceptional patient, anyway.

He wondered, though —

“He doesn’t accept visitors, except for the recruits he trains,” Kouyou whispered, once they had sat in their guests of honors seats, surrounded by some high society Chuuya didn’t really care for. The crowd applauded; a thin woman in blue tulle entered the stage. “But I’m sure he hates all of us. He’d probably make an exception for you.”

Chuuya didn’t know how to feel about it. “Do I have to talk to him?”

She munched on her lower lip, eyes on the raised legs of the quartet tapping the wooden floor. “I’m not sure what Mori would prefer.”

“What would you prefer?”

“That you never had to step a foot in that man’s presence,” Kouyou offered, immediately.

“I can do that,” he said.

“Chuuya,” She traced a word on the hand he had abandoned on their shared armrest; only his name. One word only. “This was never about you — no matter what it should have been. I would like you to try and make it about you, where you can.”

He studied her profile over the clarinets.

Home, the ground always echoed, once he stepped back in Yokohama. Petty like an offended child; a bit disbelieving that he’d come back — like he could have ever stayed away. He offered the woman his index, and she twinned her own with it — a secretive, short hold. What other place has ever been as kind?

Kouyou didn’t speak until the intermission was over, and the second part had long started.

Unexplainably unreserved, eyes fixed on the ballet, she swore: “The demon child had no choice either.”

The scar on his ribs itched. He scratched it with uninterested fingers. He remembered waking up, cocooned in morphine and fingers encircling his wrist — Dazai’s thumb running unaware paths up and down that old back scar the inside of it. He had felt horribly warm, for a moment — had held that closeness to his ribs, remembering how it had felt to share blood and finishing-air.

What’s Double Black?, that User had asked. Chuuya had grown petty because of it. He’d invited Dazai along. He’d grown used to the weight of tales. He’d grown too used to the urge to shove Dazai off himself, before realizing he’d been the one to reach out.

“He’s mine first,” Chuuya concluded. “You are Mori’s. He had all the choices he wanted.”

Her flinch was full-body.

It was too dark to see the thing on her face — he got the odd feeling of having said something not quite smart enough for survival. But it’s true, he thought. In spite of it all — in spite of Dazai’s walls and secrets and meetings with Mori. He had fought nail and tooth for it, and he hadn’t even wanted to. It was his, all the same.

I know you, he'd said.

The feeling of a skull between his hands was a weight on his mind. Chuuya recalled a dark street and his tired steps — Hamamoto's face. How can you not see?, the man had asked.

"Alright," Kouyou concluded, after a while. She seemed to be remembering something; she lowered her eyes to where Chuuya's newest scar was, and frowned. The ballerina on stage fell to her knees — expression a tad too precisely beautiful to communicate pain. "As you wish."

---

...

---

Fumiko Enchi was doing her very best to climb the stone cross that marked Tanaki's grave.

"I'm not visiting you if I can't sit, you hag," Chuuya heard her mutter, with that upward tilt that was constantly woven around her voice. The weeks of torture and the months under Kouyou's rancorous tutelage had turned her into a skeleton of herself — she was thinner, but with gun calluses and with bruises that were hidden by the colorful military get up she'd picked as a uniform. "So you better haunt whoever built you a fucking pyramid as a goddamn grave —"

"You could just sit on the grass, you know," Chuuya informed her, floating up to the nearest branch of the juniper dangling over the stone.

The woman paused, startled.

"Oh," she said. They had cut her hair, and it already showed signs of having regrown from the mess it'd been — the scarlet strands barely reached her chin. "It's you."

Tanaki's grave was nothing much — a sad, white-stone match to Rimbaud's cliff tombstone, with only her name carved. It was the concept of the grave itself that was spiteful; Tanaki had been in the Mafia longer than most people, and she'd get her eternal rest in a tainted memory.

But she's a traitor, Mori had told him, easily. So that's all there is, I'm afraid.

He curled one eyebrow, kicking one foot in the air in Fumiko's direction. "I'm assuming that's how you actually knew her."

“The Special Division? In a way, yes,” She shrugged. “I did kill her husband. Great fun. But she only knew to ask me because my cell was near her office.”

Something ugly crawled in Chuuya’s guts. “She had an office?”

“She was one of their longest investments,” Fumiko opened her arms and bowed to the stone cross, obnoxious. “The little Nine Rings’ fool, who still dreamed of rebuilding a syndicate that ended up rebuilding itself without her — and taking her unborn kid, while they were at it. Not many jerks at the Division who didn’t know her.”

He tried to imagine it. It was hard to sit by and sit with — Tanaki’s warm, welcoming smiles, and the hands that had tickled his skull.

“She wasn’t very happy when Ueda turned up,” she added, offering him a look that was entirely indecipherable. “If it helps.”

“It doesn’t,” Chuuya assured.

“Sucks to be you.”

“Sucks to be you, too.”

Fumiko pretended to toast to that.

His fingers itched. He felt the urge to jump down that tree branch; touch the tombstone with his own hands, to believe it was real. Mafiosi didn’t get graves — even what he’d built for the Flags was a wish they probably wouldn’t have appreciated. But it feels wrong, Chuuya always insisted, where he couldn’t be heard. To become nothing like that.

That’s stupid, he’d told Dazai. Just get in my urn.

He clenched his jaw.

“How did they do it?” Fumiko asked.

Chuuya shrugged. “Fire, they tell me.”

“Tell you?” She blinked up at him, drooling a look that had his shoulders stiffen. “How come you weren’t there?”

He disliked the implication of her tone. The assured shrug of someone who had been in his head, and who hadn’t seen enough to act as if she knew him — but who had seen enough, anyway. He had crawled all the way to her dungeons and demanded to be cursed — Chuuya wasn’t stupid. He had to assume it had opened him to her worst analyses.

“I was in Europe,” he told her, clipped.

“They could have called you back.”

“I was undercover.”

“Yes,” Fumiko’s eyebrows raised. “And they could have called you back.”

“The Mafia has more important business than witnessing a traitor burn,” Chuuya informed her, a tad annoyed. “I sent a fish representative.”

“Your partner,” Understanding colored her with something — finally abandoning her quest to climb the cross, she landed on the ground, wiping grass off her vibrantly pink pants. “I sneaked in the dungeons while Executive Kouyou tortured the poor woman — she told me your partner gave her most of her wounds. It lasted weeks. He had no time to invite you along for a tickling session?”

Chuuya sunk his nails in the bark, and kept his eyes on the carved kanjis of Tanaki’s name. He had never known she even had a first one.

Fumiko hummed, tapping her fingers on her chin with far too much glee. “I suppose that’s for the best. Maybe he didn’t want you to hear all she had to say about you in particular.”

“I doubt it,” he replied, unimpressed. She’d been a victim of the Division — in spite of it all, he couldn’t fault her survival. “Why did she do it?”

“How should I know?”

“Who knows,” Chuuya crossed his legs. “But you’re a traitor, who’s only alive because we decided you were more useful begging for your life than otherwise. I don’t think you have a choice but to tell me anyway.”

The woman’s careless expression froze on her traits.

“How are Kobo and Mishima?”

“Don’t you start,” she said, with a thread of voice. “We were having such a great time.”

Chuuya waited, patient.

“What do you want me to say?” Fumiko snapped, eventually, brusquely. “That she woke up every morning and detested her eyelids for parting? That she sat at that desk of yours and mourned a betrayal she had no choice but to keep up — for decades? I doubt she did. I doubt she would have lived half as much and with half as many wrinkles, if that had been the case,” There was a bitterness to her voice that was foreboding; a prediction for her own hands, curled on her lap. I think the Mafia will kill you, eventually — Chuuya thought about telling her. “She wanted her freedom. The Division gave her a price for it. She died paying it, and it was no use at all.”

He studied the eroded stone of her grave. It had been there for months, and he hadn’t. She had been burned alive, and Chuuya hadn’t even seen her ashes.

“She died for nothing,” Fumiko concluded. “That’s all. Given all the stories I’ve heard about you — you should be familiar with it.”

Chuuya stiffened. “My friends died for me. Don’t you dare compare it.”

A bit surprised, she blinked at him.

“What?”

“You’ve changed,” she noted. She didn’t make it sound like a bad thing. “Just a bit.”

He was taken aback enough to fall quiet.

Upcoming winter brushed against Tanaki’s grave. They sat there in silence until it was dark, and Chuuya never came back again.

---

...

---

““You’re being dramatic,” Yuan declared.

“Gimme a sec,” he whispered, his voice a frozen thread — bent in two with his hands between his legs. The punch had rendered his vision blurred — the familiar sandy roads of Suribachi City twirled and spun behind his eyelids, trying to get him to focus on anything but the hit his nuts had received. “Just a second.”

“Sure.”

“I’m alright.”

“Of course you are.”

“I’m going to obliterate a kid.”

“No,” Yuan patted his back. “You won’t.”

From behind the destroyed wall of one of the near makeshift buildings, a few kids snickered, possibly convinced they couldn’t be seen.

Had Chuuya and Yuan been someone else, perhaps they would have even been right. What most tourists and researchers didn’t know, was that every inch of Suribachi was accessible — it made for an overwhelming maze of hiding places, based around the inhabitants’ penchant for learning what would keep them secluded from outsiders’ gazes. Whether they liked the notion or not, people in Suribachi spent every day of their life buried deeper than most eyes could find — it usually adapted into a self-reflected lifestyle.

He breathed in. “Brats don’t know street etiquette anymore,” he muttered, straightening up, painfully. “We never kicked outsiders in the nuts. We pointed guns at them like civilized people.”

“Now, that’s a lie,” The girl cleaned some dust off his shoulders, huddling inside Chuuya’s green jacket. With how cold November was that year, Agent Minami had forced her in a fluffy coat she had stubbornly worn underneath that leather. It made her look like a colorful snowman. “Did your mind remove your earlier years?”

Chuuya stared.

She snorted. “Right. Sorry.”

Squinting at the eyes between the cracks in the wall, he let out a sigh. The work bag Hirotsu had handed him — with his blankest face — was overflowing in so many dossiers of reports on the Suribachi Project, it had toppled over from the old wooden box Chuuya had abandoned it on. All the numbers and architectural papers didn’t fit with the grayish sun batting against the plastic roofs — but they’d needed some scouts for the settlement, and Chuuya still knew the crater better than most people of the Mafia.

Just ask some questions on the worst areas to start working on, Mori had tutted, all pleasing smiles. While I do trust your memories, Chuuya, you haven’t lived there in so long. Things might have changed. I want to know what we’re dealing with.

“Things have definitely changed,” Chuuya grunted, glaring at the giggling kids. “People used to shit themselves at the sight of me.”

“Yes, yes, the big bad King of the Sheep,” Yuan reassured him. “Maybe my hair dye trick finally got the stories to die down.”

“They didn’t punch you in the nuts.”

“Chuuya,” she insisted. Her fingers closed around his forearm, petulantly pulling — a rattling his bones were awfully used to — until he accepted to look at her. “Come on. It hasn’t been that long. You know what they’re feeling. As far as they know, we’re no more than two well-off kids in nice clothes treating them like a zoo of survival. You’re not one of them. I mean — look at you.”

He blinked. “I dressed down,” he replied, a bit embarrassed.

Going around Suribachi in shoes and a shirt that had cost more money than what the inhabitants had ever seen had seemed a bit tasteless — Chuuya had rummaged through his closet of official Mafia clothing and come out with pants he was pretty sure were Dazai’s, and a hoodie that was too tight around the shoulders.

“Yeah, but —” Yuan made a face, waving her hands all around him. “It’s — something. The way you stand? Your expression? You look posh.”

He scoffed, offended. “I don’t look posh. ”

“I probably look poshier too,” she insisted, leaning over his frame to study the kids. “Momo says it’s the regular eating and the vaccines.”

Vaccines aren’t real, Dazai had once lied to his face, matter-of-factly. Irritated by the thought of him, he stuck his hands in his pockets and made his way to the wall, stubborn.

“Posh,” he muttered, making a beeline for the widening eyes and scurrying legs, as the little group figured out they’d been found. “I’m not posh. Hedonism isn’t —“

“Stay back!”

The kid who had punched him in the nuts was back. He was trembling like a leaf, but sinking his teeth so deep in his lower lip the effort not to was evident. On a starvation-carved face that couldn’t be older than nine, the fear was swallowed by clear determination, as he spread his arms to push the kids behind him further down the street.

“I — I’ll punch you again!” he insisted, his blue eyes wider than bowling balls. “I will, asshole! I’m a great puncher!”

“Tell him, Makoto,” one of the other brats encouraged.

Chuuya curled an eyebrow, unimpressed. “You the leader or something?”

“You got a problem with that?” he dared. He had a bit of a lisp; possibly the work of the two front teeth he was missing.

“Not at all,” He shrugged. “Just wanted to check who I had to challenge to a Fire Throw.”

The kids — Yuan included — sucked in a speechless breath.

We’re not one of them, she’d explained — it made sense, when Chuuya swallowed his pride. It wasn’t a matter of convincing those kids they were not the enemy, though; it was a matter of meeting on a field they knew too well to fear being taken advantage of. And the Fire Throw had been one of the only — and the most well known — ways for gangs to settle conflicts with more entertainment than waste of resources they didn’t have.

It had been a bit of a shot in the dark, but it seemed that the Fire Throw tradition still held its weight. The little Boss’ nostrils flared. “How does a city boy know about the Fire Throw?”

“Kid,” Chuuya crouched down. He left a step of distance between them — the little Boss and the entire group held back by his arms still bent back, like a cartoonish wave. “There’s no nice way of saying this, but I was eating the rat shit that comes with the food here before you were peanut sized and brain-having.”

“There’s always been rat shit in the food?” one of the girls gasped. “We’ll never be free.”

“You’re not from here,” The little Boss was skeptical. Despite not having relaxed a bit, the curve of his shoulders had lowered enough to show the bonier corners of his chest. The kids were dirty and clearly fatigued; Chuuya wondered how they’d learned to survive, since the Sheep weren’t around to gather the smaller ones. “Look at you.”

“Posh, isn’t he,” Yuan intervened.

“I’ve been luckier than most,” Chuuya let himself admit, flashing her a warning glance. There was a sharp something in the boy’s eyes he couldn’t not recognize — as such, knowing softening his tone wouldn’t be perceived as anything but bitter patronizing, he raised his eyebrows, daring: “And I’m the guy who’s gonna get you brats something better than rat shit, if you accept my challenge and let me get some information when I beat your ass.”

“You won’t beat my ass,” Makoto spat.

“He’s the best Fire Throw player since the Sheep’s days,” another boy informed him, proud.

Yuan snorted. Chuuya stood, grinning like a child, offering his hand to shake. “Then he won’t have any trouble accepting my bet, will he?”

The kid squinted.

He sighed, unlocking the wristwatch one of Kouyou’s subordinates had gifted him for his last birthday. “I’ll throw gold in the deal, if you’re too much of a coward to accept.”

The group gasped. Makoto’s eyes glinted.

“Who’s a coward?” he challenged.

Fire Throw was a rather easy game — to a bunch of kids who had grown up picking up trash and burying corpses in the almost constant fire at the dead center of the settlement. The challenge of it was picking up the bigger number of abandoned stuff one could find, and then throwing it in the fire. The first item to raise a trail of smoke tall enough to be viewed — by an impartial judge — on the higher level of the settlement, would grant victory to whoever had thrown it.

“Don’t you think you’re being a bit mean?” Yuan insisted, as Chuuya hopped on one leg to remove his shoes. “They don’t have an Ability.”

“I could win without Tainted,” he scoffed, tying up his hair — throwing his hat to her. “I was the undefeated champion, remember?”

She caught the hat, unimpressed. “So you’ll play fair and square?”

He snorted. “I didn’t say that.”

Yuan glared.

“It’s a Fire Throw game!” Chuuya insisted, as he tasted the grip of his socks on the dirty roads. On the other side of the street, Makoto was being hyped up by his friends, as some of the smaller kids flew around the settlement to announce the game to whoever would care to watch. “I can’t just lose — and the rules say you can do whatever you want, as long as you throw trash in the fire.”

“Do you think whoever came up with it had an anti-littering spirit?”

“The game is starting!” Makoto called, a bit impatient. He had put on a comic pair of broken, round glasses — Chuuya mentally wrote a tab to get him a new pair for the next time he came down there. “Unless you want to give up?”

“And take away the pleasure of showing you fetuses what a real game of Fire Throw is like?” Chuuya grinned. “Not a chance.”

Yuan massaged her temples.

“Contestants!” A little girl, not older than five, stumbled her way to the empty space between the two of them. Yuan squeaked, endeared — with a blush that said she’d heard it, the girl raised both her arms and ordered: “Bow to each other.”

Chuuya offered his deepest bow. Makoto, hands in his pockets and a permanent frown on, only bent his head so.

“When I crush you, you won’t be allowed to bother us anymore,” he warned him.

“I’m not trying to bother you,” Chuuya let him know. “In fact, once you tell me what I need to know about the crater, you’ll get the most help this lazy city has ever given you.”

The little Boss didn’t sound convinced. “If you’re from Suribachi, shouldn’t you know all the stuff you want to ask me already?”

Still bent, he offered him a helpless shrug. “I haven’t been here in a long time.”

“Coward,” Makoto accused, straightening. With a conviction and a vocabulary that a kid from another place probably wouldn’t have cared for, he swore: “I’d never leave. I never will. I’ll die for my friends, and I’ll be buried right here in my home.”

Chuuya felt his smile fade out.

“One,” the little girl counted. “Two. Go!”

Faster than the naked eye could catch, the little Boss dashed right past him, flinging himself at a mountain of ruined cardboard boxes so fast, he accidentally toppled Yuan over. They’d climbed down to the lower levels — Chuuya watched him curl by the edge of those makeshift roads and haul the boxes in the gentle, car-wide flames, framed by a circular iron cage. He stretched under the excited screams and yells of his admirers.

“Show off,” Yuan booed, dangling her legs from one of the shorter roofs.

“You sure you know how to play, Carrot?” Makoto shouted, as he passed him by on the roofs he was jumping across, gathering more useless junk and unbridled support from the on watchers. “If you just heard the name from some poor jerk, you could have told —“

Chuuya activated Tainted with a flick of his wrist, and shot to the sky.

The unrepentant bundle of choked gasps from the young voices underneath him, familiarly smelling air arising from the factory remnants all around the crater, and wobbling pieces of building for his foot to use as propulsors got to his head — an exhilarating storm of memories from Chuuya's first days, and things he'd thought he'd never get to inhale again. He didn't bother with picking up the pieces of trash he bumped against — tapping his tiptoes on the surface they laid on, Chuuya had them all float in a crimson, netted pile, hovering over the stunned crowd.

Midway-throw, Makoto stopped to stare at the resounding boom! the clump of junk made as it landed on the fire — starting a column of smoke so sudden and high it cut the sky in two.

Chuuya landed on the roof by Yuan's side. Eyebrows raised in a way that spoke of not being particularly awestruck — eyes smiling in a way that made her look years younger — she offered him the timer on her phone, reading: 00:16.

"Ah, shit," he groaned. "I didn't beat it."

"Your record is 15 seconds. Don't whine."

"I'm not whining, just —"

"Sheep."

They both turned.

Makoto's makeshift gang gathered under the roof, gazing up at Chuuya with something like wonder — something like disbelieving mistrust. A girl in pigtails and a painful-looking, face wide scar over her right eye insisted: "You're the King of the Sheep, aren't you?"

"The one who left?" Makoto snapped, as he stalked away from the small bundle of trash he had been preparing to throw. "You're in the Mafia!"

The settlement itself seemed to stiffen. In his peripheral vision, Yuan's shoulders did.

Chuuya leaned back on his hands, kicking his legs to get rid of some lingering dirt stuck to his socks. "And?" he questioned. "Don't try to fill me up with some story about the Old Boss — were you even alive when he was seminating bullshit?"

The kid became red with rage. "I'm ten!"

"Are you? You need to eat more," Chuuya jumped down, landing in front of the gaping kids. They all took a step back — all but the little Boss. He kept his small fists tight, staring up at him with the same rage he'd heard in most voices telling the King of the Sheep's tales.

"Luckily, the Port Mafia is mobilizing to do that. Which is why I need your tiny brats' help —" He spread an arm towards the group, casually waving at the unsubtle onlookers that had gathered as soon as the voice had spread. "— to figure out where to start, to give this place the help nobody ever gave enough of a floating fuck to save. If you could."

Makoto and the kids stared.

"You're lying," the boy said, hesitant. For some aggravating, itching reason, he thought of the face both Murase and Matsuda used to make when he kept stubbornly quiet, all the way to the police station. “The city doesn’t help Suribachi.”

“I didn’t say the city,” Chuuya insisted. “I said the Port Mafia. ‘Cause we aren’t assholes, we don’t get state-mandated payments to take care of the settlement — payments that always end up who knows where — and we have more money than we know how to waste.”

“It was entirely Chuuya’s idea, actually,” Yuan intervened. “You have him to thank.”

“Boss approved it.”

She muttered: “Employer of the month.”

One of the younger boys pulled on the little Boss’ sleeves, shyly admitting: “All those trucks we saw — the ones for construction —“

“Those were for the freak accident with the bridge,” Makoto insisted. “The one they had to set up a boating system for.”

Chuuya winced, scratching his nape. “That — ah, that might have been my fault.”

The kids stared harder.

Landing next to him, Yuan added: “He got buried under that club they’re trying to rebuild.”

“It wasn’t very fun,” he concluded. “But an Ability User started an earthquake, and the area they had based the club on was unstable — which I didn’t know it had become. But you,” Chuuya knelt, looking straight into Makoto’s wary, thin eyes. “You’ve been around. And with how good you are at Fire Throw, I know you have leverage with the other groups in the settlement. You can get information on all the places the settlement needs more urgent work on — if there are kids that have no one to help, or people in danger.”

Clearly taken aback, the kid’s lips parted.

“I —“ Makoto glanced back at the other children — the wide eyes they’d set on him. “I do know what places to skip but — we don’t want any police in here.”

He snorted. “What part of mafioso makes you think I would want it?”

The little Boss still seemed unconvinced. When he looked over his shoulder again, Chuuya felt a distant pang on his chest — something that fit around his wrist as tightly as the new bracelet that Shirase had given him, cutting his circulation off to leave nothing but longing.

I miss it, he let himself think. I don’t want it back.

“Oi,” Lowering his voice to something the mumbling crowd of kids and onlookers around them wouldn’t catch, Chuuya tapped two fingers on the ruined shoe on Makoto’s left foot — the only one he had. “‘S fine. I’m not letting you guys be separated. This isn’t about bringing you out of here — it’s about making it less shitty. Too many of my friends died here,” The way his breath caught him told him he understood. “Wouldn’t it be cool if we could keep that from happening?”

See?, he tutted. Murase was nowhere to be found — he was in a grave, and he was dead at Chuuya's feet, and he was stubborn like a mule. It isn't about the light. It's about living where you are.

Makoto munched on his cheek. "Food?"

"I'll get a shit ton of trucks in here by next week," he promised. "We were slowed down by the accident with that goddamn club — I had to remove the boulder to let them pass —"

"That was you?" His shrill lit his eyes up in a more childish shade. "I knew an Ability User had — the others told me I was imagining it, 'cause it happened at night, but I told them that —"

"No imagination," Chuuya assured. With a furtive move, he tapped the kid's foot again — and let out an ugly laughter when Makoto floated a few steps over the ground, yelping in terror. A weight leaned against his back — when he tilted his head back, Yuan had sunk her knees on his back, eyes offering him a look that had his throat close.

She turned her eyes to the settlement, and only grew sourer. "Home sweet home, ah?"

Chuuya couldn't speak.

"Sorry," Yuan whispered, furiously wiping one finger under her eyes. "Sorry. I'm sorry."

"It's fine."

"Sorry," she insisted, inhaling. She straightened like her bones had forced her; offered him a smile that tried to be sincere. Still — Chuuya had never expected blank states from anyone he had bled on. "I know it's not your fault."

His chest ached. Batting at the flame with a piece of fabric so old, it pulverized between his fingers, Chuuya swore: "I know."

"Makoto's flying!" the girl who had started their race gasped.

"Makoto's flying!" the others echoed.

"This feels weird," the little Boss lamented, as he unwillingly somersaulted a bit higher — a bit and a bit more, as Chuuya climbed to his feet. "It's unfair, anyway, and any Suribachi leader would agree — challenge me to Fire Throw with no Ability, and I bet your carrot ass that —"

Curling one eyebrow, Chuuya made him fly as high as the taller roof stood.

"You won!" Makoto shrieked, flapping like a fish. Cheering like chirping birds, his friends set off to follow his floating way — climbing up the old windows and belly-laughing, under the slightly stupefied, slightly hopeful glances of onlookers. "I was kidding! Mr. King of the Sheep, I was kidding! I'll tell you all the stupid information you want! Mr. King! Get me down!"

---

...

---

“You’re still here,” Akutagawa concluded, as the Tainted-red pen Chuuya had thrown to his office door opened the door for him. He didn’t sound particularly enthusiastic — but there was a breathlessness to him, and to his deadly grip around the doorframe, that had him pausing.

“I leave in three days,” he replied, pushing his chair back with his heels. “I need to sort out some bullshit with the Guerrilla — Europe can wait.”

The boy gritted his teeth. “Executive Dazai is in Tokyo with that friend of his for a commission,” he recited, as if he’d been offered the same answer by enough people — in the same tone — to have it printed on his lips. His knuckles were still turning white. “And Commander Hirotsu is at a meeting with Boss.”

“Great to know I’m your last option. What, kid?”

In a single breath, Akutagawa begged: “Gin is bleeding out.”

Chuuya rose from his chair so fast he sent it flying to the wall.

Hallways passed them by in a blur, as they shouldered their way past midday guards and some night-shift returning mafiosi. He barely managed to focus on anything but the wheezing intakes of air out of Akutagawa’s damaged lungs, trying to understand the mixture of awkward panic and not pronounced enough terror. It can’t be that bad, he rationalized. Gin is bleeding out, he’d said.

“Weren’t you guys in Suribachi to take care of that gang who blew up our trucks?” Chuuya hissed, as they slipped up the stairs that led to the Akutagawas’ room.

“I brought her back as soon as we noticed,” the boy explained, shoulders stiffening when their door appeared in sight. “We don’t understand — you have to be discreet —”

He stared at him. “Discreet?”

Rashomon clawed the door open.

There were no traces of dust on the dark-wooden desk and wardrobe of the small dormitory; he knew cleaners could not be thanked, as Chuuya had often been notified about the latest guest of Building Two — and his refusal to allow anyone but his sister in his room. His futon, gray and rolled up, was pushed all the way to the corner — treated with the jealousy of a prized possession.

Not the most prized. That honor went to the strange collection of sugar packets on his desk, and the pile of blank notebooks hiding them from sight.

Gin laid on her futon — pale and vacantly horrified — her lower body hidden by blankets.

“Kid,” Chuuya said, kneeling by her side. Her brother mirrored him on her other side, hands hovering uncertainty over the mess of sheets he’d piled up on her. “Hey. ‘You okay?’”

She nodded, tight — then turned a slightly murderous look to her brother. “I told you to get a girl —“

“You said someone we can trust,” the boy hissed back. “What woman —“

“Madame Tanaki, I don’t —“ Gin froze in the middle of a breath. Chuuya felt the texture of the futon under his fingers in high definition; then he felt nothing at all. “Just — Ryu, I don’t think I’m dying.”

“You were bleeding —“

“Oi,” Chuuya called their attention. “Can we speak clearly? Who attacked her?”

“No one,” Akutagawa snapped. “And she’s bleeding anyway, so it might be like me —“

“You have dysfunctional lung issues,” he cut him off. “Has she been bleeding as she talks?”

The siblings exchanged a glance. The ball of tension in his chest had him grit his teeth — in a fit of inspiration, he tried to study the blankets over her, attempting to figure out where the blood was.

He paused.

Utterly slow, he raised his eyes to Gin’s face.

“Gin,” Chuuya started. “For fuck’s sake.”

“I really don’t know,” she insisted, just a bit embarrassed. Her thin, bruised fingers tightened around her sheets, and he vaguely recalled reading the Akutagawas’ report — she’d been the only girl in their group, and she’d been left in Hirotsu’s care since the Mafia had taken her in. “But I don’t feel like I’m dying. It just — hurts.”

“She never says that anything hurts,” her brother pressed on, frantic in a dead-eyed way that never stopped being slightly concerning

Chuuya pinched his nose, closing his eyes. “I would think this hurts quite a bit, if Ane-san’s stories mean anything.”

“You know what this is?”

Something between the clefts of his brain let out a whistle, dying jingle — an Arcade's game over symphony. He sat back from his heels, and let the remaining bundle of his mind say, as blankly as he was capable of, desperately thinking about how the Sheep girls had approached this: alright.

"She's not dying," Chuuya concluded. "Got it? Hey. Look at me. It's fine. 'Makes sense you didn't know,'" The siblings released a breath at the same time. "I think it's kinda weird that she got it this old, but maybe the starvation has something to do with it. Go to the infirmary for a few checks as soon as possible."

"But what is it?" Gin begged, squeamish.

"Your period."

"Period of what?" Akutagawa snapped.

"Of bleeding, I guess?" He scratched his head, privately wishing the ground would open and crunch him up with retracting teeth. Do not make it awkward. "I'm — really not equipped to explain this as accurately as she needs to hear it. If you guys don't trust Ane-san — we can just get her to the Infirmary."

They exchanged a look. "Explain it non accurately, first?" the girl begged.

Chuuya stared at them.

"It's perfectly natural," he dared. "Nothing to be ashamed of whatsoever."

"Then how do we close the wound?"

"There's no wound."

Eyes squinted, Akutagawa looked at him like he didn't believe him.

He stole a few beats of merciful silence. "Alright," he concluded, snapping his finger towards the desk. "Get me one of those notebooks. If either of you laughs, I'll kill you."

The pictures he scribbled didn't help much — apart from widening Gin's eyes in horror and making Akutagawa's face blanker than usual — but he managed to make his way through a correct enough explanation of what the girl would have to do for the next few days, and how the situation would reaccour. Neither of the siblings happened to be particularly squeamish, given their line of work — by the end of it, Gin had sat up, gathering her blankets with something like resignation.

"I guess," she offered, unenthusiastic.

"It's a cool thing, I think," Chuuya dared, as Akutagawa spun around to gather new clothes — something to bring her to the Infirmary, where someone could give them better supplies. "My old friends threw Yuan a happy womanhood party the day it happened, or something."

“I’m already a woman,” Gin grumbled. She ran her eyes over the collection of blades she had abandoned by the door, wincing at the thought of training. “This is just inconvenient.”

“The wonders of biology,” he tried.

“Vice-Executive.”

He shut up. ““You want sweets or stuff?” he dared.

Gin lit up.

By the time he had gathered the secret stash from Dazai’s office — with some pettiness that had no place among the bone deep, sincere nothing he’d felt since Dazai had blinked at him behind the edge of Verlaine’s lily-smelling letter — Akutagawa had already helped Gin move to one of the beds of the Infirmary. Chuuya was welcomed by a circle of nurses patting her shoulders and explaining some discomforting realities with encouraging tones.

Looking a bit mystified — and like she was severely regretting causing a fuss — Gin accepted the cookies he handed her with a sheepish smile.

“Sorry,” she offered, head low.

Chuuya perched on the railing at the end of her bed, floating Dazai’s favorite sweets next to his hand. He threw some figs-flavored gummies in Akutagawa’s face — ignoring the nasty glance the boy directed at him from behind the pack, which Rashomon had stopped inches from his nose.

“Don’t start,” he warned her, munching. “You guys had no idea. I’m glad you called.”

“Still,” Soaked in the sheer embarrassment of someone like her realizing they were speaking to a superior, her voice turned into a thread. With new-found vitality — cheeks finally reddening the paleness of sickness — she sat up, offering him a curious glance: “I didn’t know Executive Verlaine knew you.”

Chuuya bit down on a sweet too hard, and perforated the skin of his cheek.

“Executive who?” Akutagawa asked.

The nurses had already left; she made sure to look around anyway, before whispering: “He’s the Secret Executive. The one who’s training me.”

“He has a name?” Her brother didn’t seem particularly interested in the notion. He went back to his figs a moment later, curling up on the guest chair in a black bundle that made him look a bit younger. Sixteen, Chuuya thought. He was sixteen. What had he been doing at sixteen?

Dear brother, the letter had said.

Are you mad at me?, Fumiko’s puppet of the man had questioned.

“He talked about me?” Chuuya asked — a bit tickled by the notion; a bit uncaring.

“He never did, before,” Gin admitted. “But he never talks about anyone. I assumed maybe he didn’t know many people in the syndicate, given the reclusion. But he mentioned you after what happened at The Sheepdog — he wanted to know if I had news about your condition.”

Something ugly twisted his lips in a snarl. He wouldn’t have called it care — Verlaine’s care was a gun pointed to the man he loved, and the face he’d made the first time Chuuya had laid eyes on his driver disguise.

Verlaine’s care was a promised grave, and Chuuya had no will to dig the earth any longer.

I wish you hadn’t deserved to die, he’s said. If it’s you, who should have died more unfairly than you did — what am I supposed to do with it?

“He’s my brother,” Chuuya clarified.

In the middle of braiding her hair, Gin glitched like a videogame screen. Akutagawa gave his bravest attempt at disguising the way he choked on his figs as one of his usual coughing fits. He looked at him like he feared he was being made fun of.

“The white man in our basement is your brother?” the boy accused.

“That’s what I said,” Chuuya exclaimed, a tad too intensely, vindicated. “It’s a long story. You — if he asks about me, do me the favor of telling him I don’t appreciate cryptic letters.”

Gin blinked. “He does seem like the type to send those, yes.”

He was hit, belatedly, with the realization that the kid had spent more time with the man than Chuuya ever had. Their shared air had either tasted of gasoline or of laboratory-made electricity — of the woods at the edge of the city. Fumiko’s hallucinations smelled like nothing at all. Verlaine has no desire to leave, Mori had said, in a careless tone that would have convinced even him that Chuuya had always known. There was nothing left of your brother to bury, he’d told him, once.

Perhaps there really isn’t, he considered.

“What’s he like?” Chuuya asked.

Gin had leaned over to her brother, letting him whisper something in the shell of her hair. In a distracted blink, she questioned: “Sorry, Vice Executive?”

He studied sugar remnants on his gloves — the left sleeve of Pianoman’s coat, falling from his shoulder, brushing the floor. “Nevermind.”

Officer Matsuda's office stood mostly untouched.

He had wondered about it for the first five minutes of his sneaking in; the old Recruiting & Hiring paper hung outside the door had quelled his doubts. The Yokohama PD had hardly ever lacked fresh meat; Chuuya assumed no one wanted to wear the shoes of the unofficial Suribachi City handler — especially not now that it had officially been declared Port Mafia business.

The red-thread board on the wall was still where Chuuya had left it; except the thread had grown thinner, and most of the pictures had curled at the corners.

Matsuda's chair was out of the desk — if he squinted, he could pretend he had just left for an unauthorized coffee break.

"Maybe we all grieve the same way," Chuuya commented, thinking back to the impeccable state Officer Murase's office had been left in by Matsuda's himself. "Ah, you fool?"

The Officer, of course, didn't answer.

Chuuya got to work.

He'd guessed Matsuda would have kept the majority of his exchanges with the Division where his colleagues would have mistaken them for nerds paperwork — rather than risking putting it all in a pendrive, where the Division's hackers could have intervened as they preferred — and he wasn't at all wrong. Chuuya dug through files in the S section — skipping past Sheep documentation he had long since pettily scribbled over or fed to the paper cutter under the desk — and searched for anything and everything carrying his name on it.

By the time he'd gathered most of it — he landed on Verlaine's face.

"Still don't get where they got this from," Chuuya murmured, tapping his nails over the translucent material. It was with uneasy, itching displeasure, that he realized Tanaki had to have had a hand in it. Secretaries could get anywhere in the HQs, most probably — and Verlaine had known her.

I don't get traitors, he'd once thought, as the Kure twins mourned an ex GSS comrade of theirs. He had cared for them, and he hadn't understood all the same.

It wasn't them we wanted to leave, Rin had said. Just a place that was rotting us from the inside.

The picture couldn't have been taken long after their fight; despite being somewhat sunken, his traits were utterly familiar. Pale blond strands tickled age wrinkles and eyes that reminded him of dying fireflies. Chuuya had attempted, sometimes — but he had no memory of his hand on the glass of his tank. He had no memory of what he could have done to make Verlaine decide Chuuya was worth the effort to destroy it all — all but him.

Human or not, that fake him had tutted, in Fumiko's hallucination, you'll never be like anyone but me.

"Excuse me, this is —" The oddly familiar female voice trailed off. "Chuuya? Is that you?"

Matsuda's ex-wife hadn't changed much in the years since he'd last seen her.

She was still a tiny, small thing in severe makeup and hair, carrying a bright yellow briefcase wherever she went. If he hadn't been slightly used to her impeccable way of presenting herself — even as she secretly passed him a snack through the bars, winking behind her then husband's shoulders — Chuuya would have probably not noticed how thinner she'd gotten, and how unsettled her wandering gaze appeared.

"Mrs. Matsuda," Chuuya blinked. Then he winced, "Ah — I mean, not anymore."

Her smile was weak. "It's alright. You never knew me by any other name. It's Akamine."

"Mrs. Akamine," His fingers were numb around the picture — he shut the dossier, and with all the hypocrisy he'd learned, he offered: "I'm very sorry for your loss."

The words lowered her shoulders.

She closed the door behind her, leaving the briefcase on one of the guest chairs. Her braid was perfectly symmetrical, cutting her back in two; she dragged her eyes across the red thread board with a tiredness that was physical — did her best to give him an encouraging expression. "I didn't know the Station had called you in, too. It's been months of visitors coming by."

Carefully vague, Chuuya asked: "Has it?"

"Oh, yes," Akamine cleared her throat. "He left a list to the Station — all the people who had clearance to come by and gather stuff of theirs they might have left here. But now they've finally found his replacement," A complicated expression pulled her mouth. "And now we've got to hurry and clean this all up."

Chuuya had checked the list the moment he'd broken in. His name hadn't been on there.

"Yeah," he confirmed.

"Of course," She smiled. "He and Murase did always hold you in high regard. You seem to be doing better, since your Suribachi days," Not very subtly, she studied the good quality of his clothes, and the motorcycle keys Chuuya had hooked to his belt. "I'm glad. I hoped you'd be taking it easy. You always seemed far too grown for your age."

"I don't think that's bad," Chuuya said.

"No," Akamine conceded. "But there are better things than a stolen childhood."

He gathered the dossiers, keeping quiet. He recalled, a bit distantly, the sound Matsuda's throat had made as it wheezed, gasping for air as blood left the wounds on his chest. Don't make me do this, Chuuya had asked, for years, in all but words.

But he did, something like Mori's voice let him know. And that's all that there is to it.

"Kids doing alright?" he asked.

Akamine grimaced. "It's been months," she attempted, fiddling with the handle of some box of belongings she'd probably been asked to deal with. As far as Chuuya remembered, Matsuda had no family of his own — an orphan. He wondered if the woman felt rancorous about having to deal with a man she'd left behind — wondered if it was a cruel way of thinking. "They're dealing. They're strong boys. And Dad died doing what he loved."

We'll just mask it as a kill on field, Mori had ordered, accepting Chuuya's idea. Revenge plots always get so much attention.

"That doesn't make it any less unfair," he assured her.

A veil of belated tears glossed over her eyes; she cleared her throat again, scratching the skin of her upper lip. "I guess not."

Chuuya tapped his foot for a second. "Do you need help packing this place up?"

The woman looked up at him, hopeful.

They worked side by side, in silence. There wasn't much to be said at all, and Chuuya begged that Akamine wouldn't break and start offering teary anecdotes about her husband to the man who had killed him. He gathered the documents he couldn't let the Station hoard any longer, and fed them to the paper cutter under the distracted motions of Akamine's box filling. Intermittently smiling at him, she didn't question him for a second.

He wondered if he would have cared more, had he been a few years younger. He picked up the framed picture of Murase and Matsuda, from their Academy days, and offered a small: sorry.

By the time they were done, the sky had grown a soft peach color, and Chuuya had carried all the boxes to Akamine's car.

She insisted on hugging him, pressing him close enough for it not to feel like much at all. In a fit of curiosity, she asked: "What did he leave you, anyway?"

The buzzing, insistent sound of the paper cutter raced from one side of his skull to the other — end and start. Chuuya had the uncanny, vivid vision of the first time he had seen Matsuda in the settlement; how big his hand had looked, reaching out to pull him out of a hole Chuuya had fallen in just to trap him. You okay, kid?

But he was a traitor, Mori had said. Maybe about Tanaki; he couldn't recall. So that's all there is to it.

“Just stuff that wasn’t his to keep,” Chuuya answered, eventually.

---

...

---

He put the documents he hadn’t destroyed in The Alley — only because he couldn’t think of any other place. The wet stone stairs almost made him slip; the little chalk dog Dazai had scribbled on a corner of the secret safe blinked at him until Chuuya was done. He considered using the leaking pipe to erase it — changed his mind, too lazy to — and ended up doing it anyway.

The self satisfaction was frustratingly small.

He contacted Marie — the new second in command for the Guerrilla, since Hamamoto had been left in the Bay to dissolve in silence — in order to deal with the Hounds by dawn, and made his way to Rimbaud’s grave.

“Told you I’d come back,” Chuuya started, patting the top of the uncarved stone, before he sat on it. “Just took me a little while.”

The view hadn’t changed at all.

The piece of earth he’d crushed to hide from the Sheep had fixed its corners a bit, but the tomb stood still too close to the edge. When he leaned forward, he saw the crystalline surface of the Bay, washed in the soft golden and orange of sunfall — the rocks where his life had ended.

But be born again, one of Kouyou’s favorite poems read. He wondered, absently, if his blood had dried. If the waves had washed it away. If you must die, do it to breathe again.

“I know it’s a long shot,” he started, heels kicking the grave. “But did you have something to do with how the bastard survived?”

Rimbaud, of course, didn’t answer.

“I just can’t see how else he’d manage,” He crossed his legs, feeling the pull of Pianoman’s coat where it was trapped under his thighs. The idea of that fabric — of any piece of the Flags — brushing that stone was complicated in itself; Chuuya had silently accepted to have the two spies share a grave. He didn’t want the Flags to see him linger over the man who had killed them. But the blame was his and the killing blow had been his brother’s — with some acceptance, Chuuya would just learn to sit with both facts.

“I’m sure he loved you, if it’s any help,” he added, feeling a bit silly.

The house in France had been soaked with intertwined lives. Imagining Verlaine preparing coffee had almost sent him spiraling — imagining him dying with no understanding of his own heart had felt discomfiting. Chuuya had wanted to rattle his brother’s ghost and insist — how can someone so loved not feel human?

It had been the only thing to keep him upright, all those years; he didn’t get how Verlaine hadn’t taken advantage of it.

“Don’t mind the fact that he shot you too much,” Chuuya scratched his head. “I think he’s convinced he loves me too, and look at how he went at it.”

Again, no answer. He tried to imagine it; tried to create a personality from the old diaries and knickknacks he’d found in Charleville-Mézières. He had only known Rimbaud — Randou — for a few hours at best; had admired his resolve purely out of its cause. Then, said cause had come, and Chuuya hadn’t felt like visiting his grave anymore.

“Sorry about that,” he offered. “I can tell him where your grave is, though. If I ever end up talking to him without breaking his nose.”

Just saying it out loud made it sound like a matter of other worlds. Fantasy and delusion — an existence next to the man who had dragged him into a nightmare Chuuya had never quite left.

He imagined sitting by him. Looking at him.

“Still,” Chuuya concluded, petty and a bit angry. “I don’t think he’ll come.”

If the notion offended Rimbaud, he didn’t say.

Chuuya turned around, studying the spot where the Sheep and the GSS had surrounded him. If he squinted, he could see the indent Shirase’s old shoes had left on the cobblestones; the way he had been so dramatic with every motion and pointed finger, and how he’d been terrified — and how he blew up Chuuya’s phone every week, these days; with stories of quests there was a 50% chance he’d actually put in place himself.

You’ve changed, Fumiko had noted. For the first time since he’d turned eighteen, Chuuya felt that it wasn’t so bad. Just a bit.

“I’m mad he didn’t tell me,” he admitted.

It felt even sillier — lamenting partners with the man who had been killed by his own. But Chuuya had no place in his ribs for disappointment for a boy he hated. The dead could take the waste. He’d take what was left.

“I know why nobody told me. I get that it wasn’t about me,” Chuuya shrugged. “But he’s different. It pisses me off, but he is.”

Truly, you fool, one of Rimbaud's letters — memorabilia from some mission he'd had, away from Verlaine's blank stubbornness — had read. What would I not do for you?

He thought, horribly, about Hamamoto's most vicious expression.

Chuuya cleared his throat. "Anyway," he concluded, jumping to his feet. "I'll let you know if I decide to kick your man's face in. If you tell me where he shot you, I can even make it even. Maybe a ouija board? We'll figure something out."

The spy didn't answer.

Chuuya still didn't understand traitors, but he thought perhaps that wasn't about him at all. He patted the man's grave, kicked a pebble where Shirase had grinned the widest, and made his home with a gentle hum on his lips.

---

...

---

Elise was covered in blood.

"It's actually from this one bucket Dazai left in the dungeons," she whispered to him, all conspirational, right when Chuuya had decided it had to be some sort of artificial paint. "It helps me get into character. Now, from the top!"

Promptly, the girl dropped like a doll with cut strings, assuming the position of a corpse — half resting against the edge of one of the couches by the entrance of the Hall of Light and Darkness, half sprawling across the cold floors. Snow had yet to fall behind the windows — the light was gray as if it had, though, bathing her surprisingly realistic rendition of a mauled victim.

Chuuya obediently fell to his knees by her body, wincing at the notion of the sticky crimson on her being real and coming from whoever it was — and declared, a bit flatly: "How could this ever happen to you, oh, my beautiful Elise —"

"Eloise!" the girl hissed, opening only one eye. "I told you, it's my stage name —"

"It's basically your name, though."

"Say it right," Elise ordered, stealing his hat to throw it far away enough to drag an hey! out of him. "You keep ditching us for European jobs. At least learn how to pronounce your French."

He spluttered, offended.

Undeterred by his protests, the girl died — again. Chuuya had the vague thought that he would have preferred it if she had been less professional about it — if she had stuck her tongue out like a fish, and picked an improbably theatrical position. But she was concerningly convincing — she had splattered blood across herself just the way a pierced chest would have caused, and she'd molded her own breaths into the weak, dying wheeze they were supposed to be. Even her limbs were abandoned with the stiff, awkward carelessness of lifeless flesh — her fingers were hard like petrified claws.

Humming, more curious about her ability than about the conclusion to the tragedy she had confusedly summarized for him, Chuuya leaned against the leg of the couch and asked: “Where did you learn this?”

He had never actually seen Mori fight with her — few had. Kouyou had told him Elise turned into something a bit different when it happened; a speck closer to Golden Demon than to a cute child, hanging off the hem of Chuuya's coats whenever he left her alone to wander the halls of that castle of hers.

Elise huffed, annoyed at the interruption. But she liked him as much as someone like her could like anything — so she sat up, still trailing blood on the floor, and laid his chin on his raised knee. “In the ships,” she answered.

“Ships?” Chuuya echoed.

“The war ships,” the child insisted, as if he was being purposefully obtuse. “Of course. There were so many corpses all day long. Once the room got flooded, and we had to sleep next to them.”

Thinking about a proper response to that was headache-inducing. “The Great War,” he realized. “You were there?”

She directed him a nasty glance.

“Right. Stupid question.”

“I did look quite different,” Elise admitted, superiorly, blowing a strand of blood-sticky hair off her raised chin. “If you saw me in pictures, I'm sure you wouldn't even recognize me.”

“Mmh?” Only hesitating for a moment — since Elise was untouchable under most aspects, and she attached herself to all of them with the glee of the kid she wasn't; and since there were rules, Chuuya was sure, for what Mori allowed of the Ability he'd made into a companion — Chuuya used his own fingers to separate a blond lock from the horror show on her soft face. She turned into the touch like a cat chasing the sun. “Why? What did you look like?”

She hummed, pensively. “Older.”

“Older?”

“Taller than you.”

He booped her nose. She scrunched it up.

“I had my hair all tied up,” Elise continued, frowning with unfocused eyes — as if reaching for a memory of herself was only fairly easier than grasping river water with a holed basket. “There were too many wounded soldiers. Master feared I would get hair in their wounds. That wouldn’t have been good at all.”

Master, Chuuya mouthed. It didn’t fit her lips if not in echos, shaping her mouth in hills and rivers that made her look less like a child.

“Why were you older?” he questioned.

Her chin slipped a bit down his knee — he picked it up with a finger. She yawned, suddenly sounding bored again, and hid her face on the side of his thigh: “He always kept me older, before. Since he was a child.”

Thinking about Mori as a kid was enough of an uncanny mental image that Chuuya felt the urge to shiver. He attempted to imagine a boy in a vest other than a lab coat, with eyes filled by the same maniacal glint Mori sometimes hid — and failed. Then he failed to imagine a woman — her eyes plastic, and her power infinite — laying her hands on his shoulders. Perhaps she’d installed the tendency in him, paradoxically.

Elise’s usual attitude was irritation. Had she been different, as an older being who referred to the man as Master?

Did you hate him at all?, he wondered.

“But then he met her, and little girls who don’t like him at all became his comfort,” Elise squinted, peeved. “And then he met Dazai.”

His fingers itched. He decided — abruptly, that he didn’t really want her to continue talking.

“There you are.”

Mori arrived, rarely enough, like a blessing. He peeked down at them from the ajar doors that led to Hall of Light and Darkness, scarf wrapped in a hurried manner that let Chuuya know he’d just come back from an execution. There was an ease to his smile that crawled across their intertwined limbs like a land rover; something gentle and amused. Elise stood, skipping her way to his side with a cheerfulness that could have passed for natural — had it not looked like the pull of a thread that could not be seen.

“Boss,” Chuuya greeted, climbing to his feet to pull the door further open with his foot. “You wanted to see me?”

“Disgracefully,” the man admitted. “You’ll be leaving us tomorrow. I was hoping to have a bit of time with you before it.”

Elise grumbled like a broken toy. “Maybe don’t send him away, then, Rintarou.”

The doctor's smile was only a bit kinder than the hand he patted her head with. It crooked her ribbon to the side; Chuuya blinked, and it had fixed itself on its own. Elise always looked pristine; she just smelled of rotten underneath.

Little girls who don't like him at all, he recalled. And then he met Dazai.

"Don't be silly," Mori tutted.

The Hall of Light and Darkness was the one place in the Headquarters that had never truly changed since Chuuya had joined — even the rust in the metal frames of the stained glass windows had never been cleaned, intermittently fracturing the kaleidoscopic squares the two of them leisurely stepped on. He had a vague memory of playing a personal sort of Hopscotch, using only the colors as a warning line — Chuuya smiled, privately, and dangled his hat in circles by its chain.

"So, then," Mori started, after some convo about the latest wine Chuuya had promised to bring back from Europe faded into silence. "Are you absolutely sure leaving again so soon won't be an issue? If you wish to stay, I could arrange it."

Chuuya shook his head. "There's business to finish. I don't mind finishing it."

"And you're sure you won't take no one but those few Guerrilla men of yours?"

I'd like that, Dazai had said. "Positive," he assured, pulling at his choker to scratch an itch he couldn't find. Irritation was like a hammer against his skull; his voice drummed louder. "It'll be quick. I'll be home soon. I don't need anyone."

A hum. If Mori approved, he didn't show it. "And did you go visit Tanaki's grave?"

It took willpower not to pause.

"I did," he admitted.

"How was she?"

"Mostly dead."

"Well, thank God," The man blinked. "Our execution force would crumble if we had to make sure to kill traitors more than once."

That's funny, he thought about saying. Or some similar camaraderie. Something acceptable. Instead — because it was insistent, the need to be told Chuuya hadn't been a little bit of a fool, again and again — he asked: "Did you always know?"

Mori crossed his arms behind his back. He smiled mockingly at some ghost Chuuya couldn't see, and looked at him with the warm distance of a benevolent tyranny. "Would it matter if I did?"

"You tend to do what's best for the Mafia," he replied. "I would just like to understand."

His head bowed, as if conceding. “I have never considered anyone from the prior Boss’ regime particularly trustable,” he offered, after a contemplative pause. “Apart from close exceptions who have long since proved their distaste for him. Ozaki would gut me if I dared to accuse her of any lingering devotion to that man.”

Chuuya silently convened.

“Those who act as they are demanded to in the name of survival are certainly strong willed,” the man continued. “I said so during my speech last year, as well. But are they reliable? Mafiosi are made for loyalty. There are too many voices about me for their original fidelity not to be tested.”

Chuuya seldom tried to imagine it — the former doctor, standing over the old Boss’ rioting skeleton. Had he killed him quietly? Had he told him it was for the best? Had he done it at all?

Yes, he concluded. Mori had admitted it to him as a sign of trust mere seconds after meeting him; he had held onto that stupidity for years. On longer nights, it reminded him of Agent Minami storming out of the man’s office — of the lack of hesitation Mori had declared him invaluable with.

An Ability Permit isn’t much, in the face of power, Kouyou had rationalized it, days later. But do your best to make sure he has both, yes?

A sigh left the Boss’ mouth. “But Tanaki really did take me by surprise, I fear.”

Startled, Chuuya looked up at him.

Mori seemed a bit sheepish. “Betrayal is one of the oldest forms of wounding humanity has ever carried in its arsenal. It crawls where you cannot see it,” He straightened. “Where you don’t want to see it, either. And Tanaki — she truly harbored some horrible, horrible feelings towards you. What a shame.”

He focused on his steps. Counted them; let something like tired disappointment wash over himself, and vowed not to think about it again.

“She had it coming,” he offered.

The doctor glanced at him. “Given some other recent — revelations, I wouldn’t blame you if you felt any bruising feeling of sorts towards me.”

It took him a moment to understand. The Ivy Dungeons flashed on his mind, rusty and sticky with dried blood. The fake silhouette Fumiko had showed him — the blankness of Verlaine’s eyes as he told him some part of him longed for that kind of companionship as well.

I just didn’t want it to have a price, Chuuya hadn’t told him. For once. Just once. Is that so wrong?

Reclaim your life, his brother had ordered. It belongs to you.

“I don’t,” Chuuya said.

“I truly wouldn’t blame you at all.”

“I don’t,” he insisted. Be mad at the unfair hand you were dealt with, his brother had begged. He slowed his hat to a halt, pressing it against his chest. “I don’t think I was ready to hear it, anyway. I might have done something — rash.”

The man studied him. “No, I don’t think so. You believe yourself less rational than you are.”

“And you believe me less grateful to what has been sacrificed for me than I am, Boss,” he replied, curling an eyebrow. “I’ve known since the fight against Verlaine — the number of Ability Users we lost, the problems I’ve caused you —“

“You were worth them.”

“Once, I wasn’t,” He shrugged, sliding his hands in his pockets. He tilted his head, looking at the ceiling like blood might rain from the safety sprinklers. “And I’m not going to forget it.”

Something in Mori’s expression settled. He hummed, studying him with an interest Chuuya had long since gotten used to — something that never stopped being dangerous, but always curled around his nerves with the familiarity of a type of weapon he at least knew how to be hurt by. There was no being safe in a room with Mori Ougai — there was knowing he needed you, though.

How would you kill him?, Dazai whispered, through the static waves of a phone.

Chuuya knuckles grew white.

“You won’t,” Mori echoed. “That’s why you killed that subordinate of yours, right?”

With a merciful hiss, the light fragmenting the stained glass windows seemed to dim, all at once.

[“Don’t let Mori know,” Dazai said, once, deliriously. It was one of his autumn fevers — they were stuck in the middle of a storm, locked inside a safehouse in the rural side of the hinterland. He had laughed with a bit of self-deprecation. “That’s silly,” he’d corrected himself. “Mori always knows.”]

“Hamamoto was not a traitor,” Chuuya said, very slowly.

He had made sure of it, traitorous and far too stubborn — had made sure that his ashes were abandoned in the Bay, and that his good name wasn’t tainted by a lapse of judgment.

The Port Mafia did not allow for second occasions — that had all been Chuuya.

“But he almost was one,” Mori agreed, with a blink that was anything but innocent. “And you are loyal and grateful to your very marrow, so you blew up his brains for it.”

He said it very analytically. Nothing wrong, nothing bad — merely a recent development in a war field that was their playground. Chuuya had cupped Hamamoto's head so fast the man hadn't had the time to even meet his eyes. He couldn't quite remember if he'd snapped his neck before or after squashing his skull with gravity.

Does it matter?, he questioned. It had to. It had to mean something; a higher reasoning and a badge of honor — or else it was just some botched, aimless confirmation that Chuuya had been just stupid enough to fall for it. Fall for —

"Tell me," Mori questioned. "How was he going to kill Dazai?"

Hamamoto, he'd said, utterly still. It was the second time. Chuuya had never liked repeating himself. Don't be a fucking idiot.

The memory wasn't hazy at all. In spite of it all — among a sea of manslaughter and ruins and blood spilled in the name of a greater, loved cause — Chuuya never did forget the people he killed for a reason. He had stood and he had watched spit fly out of Hamamoto's mouth from rage, and he had known from the moment he'd caught him — wrist soaked in the gasoline he had bathed Dazai's office with, and fingers trembling around an automatic lighter he'd leave on the coat the boy had left on his seat — that there was a reason, and nothing else.

Enough of a reason?, he'd asked himself, in a split second.

His shoes had squelched against the wet ground — what a stupid, inefficient way to kill a man — and Hamamoto had sworn something about the not bloodied enough skin under Dazai's bandages, and then Chuuya hadn't asked himself a thing.

"Fire," Chuuya offered, not pausing their unhurried march forward. How had the Hall not ended yet? How had he visualized it so effortlessly — the soundless, nauseating way Dazai's skin would have burned, and the careless face he would have made? He'd hated the concept. He'd hated the perspective. He'd hated Hamamoto for making him face that Chuuya was as stupid as Dazai had sworn he was. "He was going to lock him in his office. He'd organized it so that the floor would have been emptied out by a fake bomb alarm."

"That's a lot of effort," Mori noted. "Did he hold that strong of a sense of allegiance for me?"

"He would have died for the Mafia," he said, clipped. He met his gaze — remembered, for a blink so short it was head-spinning, the deathly calm he'd felt. The stars have died and I will kill you, one of Virgil's manuscripts had read. The truth is all there is. "And he did."

Something writhed in his eyes.

Chuuya turned away. "If he was any clever at all, he realized it as he died."

"Why not denounce him as a traitor?"

"Because that Mackerel bastard would have been insufferable about it," Chuuya lied, easily.

Mori tilted his head to the side. "About you killing for him?"

“It wasn’t for him,” He set his jaw. “If it had been merely that, I’d have let him. Hell knows I would have had one less bother,” The kaleidoscope on the ground seemed to switch with every passing cloud behind the windows; he thought about the nothing he’d felt about Hamamoto’s blood on his gloves. “Hamamoto was unstable. We have enough troubles as it is. A man willing to take the matter of the people who lead us in his own hands is a loose cannon. I warned him. Ane-san had me warn him. He chose not to listen. I’d have done it in the name of whatever Executive he carried a pathetic vendetta against.”

A look. “But you did it for him.”

“He’s my partner.”

“I didn’t think you cared about that.”

I don’t, Chuuya thought. A hospital bed — Dazai, rough from sleep and a rusty piece of metal they had been impaled on. He was so used to hate him he only ever realized he hadn’t — even if only for a short breath — when it was over.

“Did I get this wrong?” he asked.

Mori contemplated. “You didn’t,” he said, “But I worry.”

He munched that word in his mouth. “You worry?”

“About the two of you, sometimes.”

And then met Dazai, Chuuya thought. Elise had always looked like him, just a bit.

“It wasn’t about him,” he swore.

“It wouldn’t be a problem if it was,” Mori assured, his smile amused. Nothing about him was threatening — he felt his shoulders straighten all the same. “I’m the one who pushed the two of you to rely on each other. You are a wonder on any battlefield. But our Dazai is — well. I do think you need something less... temporary, to lay your faith in, Chuuya.”

He wanted to snarl — deny it. That description left a sour taste between his teeth.

He thought of blood fading and decaying down the drain of a shower, as Dazai ordered, touch them, and touch me — a concession in the form of an humanity Chuuya knew he didn’t believe in. A five claws hold on the back of his shirt; a dead eyed voice in his ear, a thousand miles away, insisting — how would you kill Mori? The certainty in his tone, when Chuuya had sworn him being alive was a proof of reality — my stupid Chuuya.

He thought of Tanaki’s ashes, and whatever grief kept Verlaine in the basement. You don’t get to keep secrets, Chuuya had ordered, upon that first childish promise they’d ever made.

Maybe they hadn’t been kids in a while.

“I know,” he concluded.

“But you’d do it again?” Mori guessed.

Something like ire soaked the thin space between his teeth. It felt wrong calling it anger. It felt wrong feeling betrayed. Chuuya hated that he had fallen for it, again and again, and again and again. That Arahabaki never felt any danger at all, in Dazai’s vicinity. Not anymore.

“No,” Chuuya lied. “He can deal with this shit himself.”

Some hilarity pulled Mori’s wrinkles. It made him look a tad older, strangely. The man had always seemed perpetually stuck at the age of his first year of reign since Chuuya had met him. When he was a kid, Elise had said — he tried to picture it again, and came up with nothing but a too smart smile and bloodied milk teeth.

“If you say so,” he concluded, patting his shoulder with a hand. Then, belatedly: “I thought you might want to be informed — though your mercifulness is more than admirable, I’m afraid I had to intervene personally, in this specific case.”

Chuuya didn’t understand. “Sir?”

“I’m sure Hamamoto had an exceptional record, before this little — defiance play of his,” he insisted. “But traitors are traitors all the same. I had his ashes brought to the stairs, as it fits them. His grave was built near the border.”

Somewhere behind the windows, one last cloud passed by — dimming the colorful squares on the floor until only blood-soaked wood was left. He couldn’t speak. Couldn’t protest at all.

Eventually, he managed: “The stairs?”

Mori blinked, a bit surprised. “Chuuya,” he said, genuinely taken aback — as if he’d forgotten to let him know what time his own funeral would take place. Apologetic. Mori always knows. “You do know where the ashes of our traitors go, don’t you?”

---

...

---

“It’s actually a fascinating process,” Kajii explained, walking backwards down the stairs of Building One, widely gesturing the secrets of the Mafia’s funerary rituals in Chuuya’s face. “I’m not sure how they manage to find enough empty hours to do it, but no one ever catches them. And the stairs seem to never undergo any work — God knows there is quite the traffic to the dungeons on a daily basis.”

“So they fuse them,” Chuuya echoed, for what felt like the fifth time since he’d torn the door to the man’s office open. “And they just add them to the stairs?”

“So we may step on those who used us as their stepping stones,” the scientist recited. “At least — that’s how Executive Dazai’s report put it. The old Boss was particularly obsessed with the tradition; the Executive put it back in place after the months of busy business from the reign change.”

“Of course,” Chuuya considered starting a list of relevant information Dazai Osamu had kept for himself for virtually no reason — apart from a general desire to be the worst person ever. Chuuya hated feeling stupid. Chuuya — “So, Tanaki is —“

Behind the goggles, Kajii made a face.

It was a strange face. The man had never been particularly affected by death — all of his bone deep fascination usually overrode the rest. It wouldn’t have been correct to call it grief; mostly, a miscalculation on a lemon bomb he’d been sure to have down to the dot.

“Sure,” he answered, at last. “It’s sort of — I mean. She’s back where she’s always been, in a way. Isn’t she? It’s sort of — funny.”

It fell flat. Kajii scrubbed his gobble with the hems of his scarf.

Chuuya paused by the entrance to the Hall of Building One, eyeing the door to the dungeons — only mere steps to the empty desk that had once been Tanaki’s. Mori had said something about the need for fast hiring — least anybody believes we are creating graves where they aren’t needed.

“Don’t you think the whole, no grave for mafiosi business is sort of dumb?” he asked.

The man blinked. “Dumb?”

He munched on his cheek; scratched the skin under his choker again, still searching for the itch. “Doesn’t matter. Hey,” Chuuya clasped one hand around Kajii’s shoulder. “I’m sorry, man. I know you liked her.”

“Oh,” The scientist made another, worse face. “That’s not — no. Thank you, though.”

Chuuya stared. “No?”

He nodded, a tad obsessively. “No.”

Some more thinking made him decide it wasn’t all that worth it. He patted the man’s back once more — flicked the lemon shaped gadget Chuuya had brought him from Switzerland, that Kajii had hooked to the pocket of his lab coat — and shut the door of the dungeons behind himself.

It was dark.

Suffocatingly so; the yellowish LEDs always worked worse in the autumn and in winter — they left the tight road to be bathed by flickering specks of dirty gold. Chuuya allowed Tainted to raise him a few inches off the ground, and used that reddish light to study the uneven texture of the stairs.

He walked. He tried to understand exactly what he thought about that revelation, and came up mostly empty.

“Fuckin’ Port Mafia,” he concluded, bent to squint at the rough surface under his nose — with the mixture of awe, horror, and repulsion the Sheep and most of the ungrounds had carried in that greeting of theirs. The old Boss’ reign had been nothing but a living nightmare; but the new Mafia, the one Chuuya loved and lived for, was the squelching, bloodied machine the older Sheep had promised him as an enemy.

He thought of the indents Tanaki’s fingers left on the petals she would fiddle with, on their way to her dead child’s grave. His shoe made a wet, crouching sound against a jagged step.

Chuuya felt a bit sick.

He gulped it down with an ease that should have been nauseating, and scoffed — and heard the sound of steps and voices from the depths of the stairs.

You’re not doing anything wrong, he barely had the time to remind himself. His limbs acted faster than he could stop them, as if possessed by the childish urge to hide he’d carried throughout his Sheep-days infiltrations — he catapulted himself down the next ten steps. He sunk a Tainted-bright finger in the locked door knob of that rusty door, midway stairs; the one he’d never paid much attention to.

“— this Mimic thing, if it isn’t —“ one of the voices insisted, from behind the door. The room around him felt wide; Chuuya kept his ear on the door, furtive for no reason he could explain.

“— can’t be all that much,” another voice, a woman, insisted. “We’re not even sure if they will bother us. It’ll be over by the end of the month.”

The mafiosi’s voices grew more and more distant. Somewhere, thousands and thousands of steps down, Arahbaki’s keen ear caught the low, exhausted cries of chained up prisoners. Chuuya let go of the destroyed doorknob, and took a step back on a floor that was less ruined than any part of the dungeons should have been.

As he exhaled, the warm, golden light of the room flickered for a moment. Chuuya frowned at the splintered wood of the door — turned, right as a voice scratched from disuse imperceptibly concluded: “You did come.”

Every stream in Chuuya’s body scratched to a halt.

It was an indescribable shiver, littered by missing pieces and unexplainable agony — a malfunction deeper than any corner of his brain he’d ever explored. Chuuya was years younger; Chuuya was standing in a field, his hands crimson and Corruption still lacking a name; Chuuya’s shoes were creaking against the tiles of the Old World, and Albatross was still breathing, so he could be saved. A hand less scared than his own was pressed on the other side of the tank — a man in unknown traits was touching his foreheads and telling him, won't you see?

Paul Verlaine tilted his head, and there was no blood on him at all. Chuuya was years younger, and he couldn't move, and it had all been for nothing at all.

“Hello, Chuuya,” his brother said.

Chapter End Notes

chuuya, literally vibrating on the equivalent of emotional numbing morphine for seventeen horses: i feel entirely normal about the fact that everyone in my life has lied to me. in fact, i'll blame only the one person who believes i ought to be mad about this anyone from the pm apart from dazai: oh that's a relief

CHUUYA MY DEAR! and we are back, for the last arc of this fic! verlaine finally makes his appearance, if only to grace us with dramatic one liners. he's kinda silly apart from the mass murdering and the chuuya's life-ruining and the being french but oh well. what can you do.

i've got many feelings about the idea of chuuya not being told about verlaine (as the usual mini skit might have told you) and about how he'd try his hardest to rationalize it into something Necessary. to put it plainly, chuuya can't take another betrayal. so he just decides not to interpret it as such. in this interpretation i have of him, dazai is the only one chuuya can rationalize being vindictive towards — the one person who he expects honesty from, and the one person genuinely doesn't expect betrayal from, despite how unaware he might be of it. in the words of my bff — “it's fine for chuuya to be mad at dazai, because he's the only one who will allow it”

(so if you need to be mean be mean to me? anybody?? anyway)

as always, i hope you liked the chapter! and thank you so much for all the love on the last chapters, as always <3 i hope to see you very soon, keep warm <3 see you!!

WRETCHED

Chapter Notes

see you at the end ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xxxv.

---

Case number: 37837387

*Date: **/**/***

Report drawn up by: Sakaguchi A.

Confidential information acquired by: Dazai O., Nakahara C.

Signature: Mori Ougai.

*On **/**/ of the current year, Dazai O. and Nakahara C. [Code Name: Double Black] were no [...]*

---

“You’d laugh your ass off about this.”

The Flags' stolen graves had been painted in candid, morbid light by the autumn sun — a peek from winter, approaching a bit faster along to the middle of November. Chuuya wondered, at times, if he'd truly had the gruesome luck of finding graves no one cared for — or if he just had good enough timing to manage to avoid whatever mourning fool he was leeching off of.

I'm watering the grass, he imagined himself snapping, jealous like a kid, over a toy he had no claim over but his spit and pride. But he probably wouldn't. Mind your business.

"Iceman's eye might start ticking, though," he added, heels bumping against his grave. Sitting on them always made it all a bit cozier. Chuuya tried to imagine the Old World's chairs, and some drinks in scratched glasses — but they'd changed the cushions in the rebuilt building, and the glasses were too new to be scratched. "He killed me and he gets away with it? Chuuya," His imitation got a bit too flat, "What the hell are you doing?"

Except the dead didn't give a shit.

"Would you give a shit if I punched him?" he questioned. "It wouldn't be permanent. 'Could even make it so I don't break his nose.'"

The graves didn't answer. Albatross' own returned its original gray, as the wind blew the little topsoil off its corners.

Mostly unsure of where the idea had even bloomed from — perhaps those meetings he never quite paid attention during, because all the stupid proposals he imagined demanding to Mori's funds sounded a bit too selfish to his ears — Chuuya asked: "Would you like some graves of your own?"

We wouldn't like anything, he imagined Lippman informing him — with that helpful tilt of his head he reserved for fans asking autographs in the middle of a secret shootout. Chuuya missed his little quirks like an aching, open wound — he missed all of them like a lulling melody he couldn't remember the notes of. Verlaine was locked only a few feet underneath the Headquarters' ground, and Chuuya couldn't kill him, and he didn't want to either. How haven't you learned yet?

"You were supposed to teach me, maybe," Chuuya concluded. "Slackin' off here, buddy."

Chuuya, Pianoman would have said. Chuuya, go home.

He curled his arms around his knees — laid his chin on it. "I miss you," Chuuya let himself say. He couldn't remember if he ever had. Slacking off here, buddy, Doc bit back at him. And then — even if the dead didn't give a shit; even if there wasn't more he could say, with his shoes stained in their blood and Verlaine's older, living traits sewn on his eyes — he swore: "I'm sorry."

The graves didn't answer. Maybe they'd like to have graves, his mind insisted. Maybe it wasn't all about Mafia traditions.

Chuuya walked out of the Cemetery with a lighter heart and guilt he'd learned to gulp down. He jumped roofs and surveyed his city with hands in his pockets and thoughts under his nails — until he landed in front of the Arcade's rusty sign, being sloppily removed from the glass doors.

He landed hard enough to crack the street.

“Oi,” Chuuya frowned, walking to the gray haired man he recalled watching reprimand some of the Arcade employees. “What’s going on?”

The man raised one hand to signal him to wait, finishing some lazy conversation with one of the workers from the truck parked by the sidewalk. The bucket list in his hands was signed off with curling ink; Chuuya only read the word OWNER before the papers were covered, and the worker went back to directing his colleagues on the ladder.

“Haven’t seen the notice, kid?” the owner questioned. His knuckles tapped the glass doors — on it, a windswept piece of paper hid the missing lights and players inside the Arcade. “We’re closing down the barracks.”

Chuuya stared. “What?”

“Funds,” He shrugged. “Arcades are an old business these days. It’s all about the Internet,” He scoffed, leaning against the old bench. He gazed up at the shop with something like bitterness. “And the area isn’t what it once was — most don’t dare venture so close to Port Mafia borders.”

At his side, his numb fingers twitched. He watched the workers drag the sign down with old joints and fatigue-pulled expressions. Stared at the metal frame left behind.

“But,” he attempted.

The man pitied him. He put his hand on his shoulder — Chuuya was startled enough he didn’t even shrug him off. “Old childhood spot?”

“Somewhat,” he replied, automatically.

“Take it as an incentive, then,” The owner studied him with a critical eye, eyebrows raising at the good quality of Chuuya’s clothes. “Ain’t you a bit old for games, anyway? Now, for the sake of that poor Mom of yours, you can spend more time studying. Aren’t University tests approaching and all?”

Chuuya tried to find a slightly more polite way to tell him to choke and fuck off. He didn’t feel much up for rudeness either, though.

He imagined — only for a mere, amusing blink — going up to Mori and coming up with some business-oriented reasons to invest into an Arcade in their territory. Now, don’t be silly, the man would have tutted. What even for?

“When is it closing?” Chuuya asked.

The owner curled an eyebrow. “It’s been closed for weeks, kid,” he let him know. “We’re just cleaning up for the next owners. You missed the Goodbye Party, I’m afraid.”

“Oh,” he agreed, distantly. “Alright.”

He squeezed his shoulder again. Went off to talk with the workers again; Chuuya stared at the metal frame some more.

His in-ear creaked, tickling the shell of his ear. “Sir?” Akutagawa called, in that vacant tone of his. A strange echo followed; he only understood it once the kid added: “Approaching to your left.”

“I already told you, you don’t need to warn me,” Chuuya said, distractedly, eyes stuck to the shop front. Akutagawa’s quiet steps reached him from one of the alleys — the hems of his coat were stained in familiar, fresh crimson; no mind for the sunlight or the eyes that knew better than to linger on anyone walking that territory. “Tainted makes me not easily startled.”

He was, of course, swiftly ignored. “The paid-off guard at the Port has been dealt with,” the kid offered.

“Did the Guerrilla play nice?”

If Akutagawa held any particular feelings about being temporarily allowed command of the squad — just the time it had taken Chuuya to go visit the Flags, since he’d miss their usual weekend meetup — he didn’t show it. He did stand a bit straighter — but Chuuya knew he couldn’t have cared less about praise from lips other than Dazai’s.

“They did,” he said. Finally following the line of Chuuya’s gaze, he frowned at the shop, and questioned: “Is this another mission?”

He munched on nothing — to say; to feel. “Was supposed to be an after mission, actually,” he corrected, at last. His forehead was wrinkled and permanently uncertain. “Always has been.”

Akutagawa kept quiet. It felt distinctively awkward, but for no other reason than Akutagawa never feeling up for expanding the conversation when it wasn’t strictly needed. Chuuya wanted to rattle him like a toy box, sometimes — except he seemed rather content in his intimidating, awfully intense quiet staring, so he always ended up letting him be. “You ever been to an Arcade?” he asked, sighing.

His eyes grew distant. “Not quite, sir.”

“Just call me Chuuya.”

“Oh, so now you want —” Akutagawa shut his mouth, growing blank again. Chuuya snorted.

“You can go home,” he told him. “We’re done for the morning. I just —” The owner exited the glass doors again, dangling an endless ring of old keys around his middle finger. Chuuya tried to look away from the packaged slot machines and Arcade systems, and couldn’t figure out the hoarse wheeze in his lungs — not even when he exhaled it, holding onto his choker to free his airways. “I’m just going to keep an eye here for a bit.”

Akutagawa studied him. “Are you sure?”

It was oddly — interested of him. Chuuya blinked, taken aback. “Yes,” He ruffled his hair, no mind to the way Akutagawa grew murderous; and then, even if it wouldn’t matter to him, he added, “You did great with the Guerrilla. Go rest.”

He turned blank again. Half-bowed; went on his way down the alleys, until Chuuya couldn’t see traces of his razor-sharp black anymore.

He’s doing wonderfully, I must say, Mori had once observed, during one of his occasional tea — wine, since Chuuya had started to pop up — times with Kouyou that he wasn’t quite supposed to be present at. But Kouyou always kept a chair for him, and Mori never sent him away; Chuuya could never help but wonder whether they would have said more if he hadn’t been there. No matter how harsh, Dazai’s methods seem to be working. I do wonder if he’s aware, though.

He is, Kouyou had sighed. But I hardly think he’ll care, as long as the demon child doesn’t tell him all that harshness was for a reason.

He doesn’t want a reason, Chuuya hadn’t told them, too busy with the bottle he’d brought them from Berlin. He wouldn’t care if Dazai didn’t have one. He just wants him to look.

[“What did he promise you?” he’d asked him, once, over the worst of a broken, bleeding nose — and his coughing lungs.

Akutagawa hadn’t even looked at him. “A life,” he’d said, with a finality that cared so much — that cared so little — it was staggering. Chuuya had wanted to say something to it. He had felt it would have been hypocritical — he had been reborn underneath the crushed alcove of a cliff, and Dazai’s had been the first heartbeat he’d heard. “A reason for it,” he’d added. Chuuya had never considered Dazai’s methods wrong, per se, if they kept him alive in the Mafia. Can’t you look at him once, he’d only wanted to say, so he knows it’s alright to look away from you? “So it’s worth it.”]

“Be careful with that!” The owner called, as two workers dragged the marble counter outside. “This stuff has a net value, you know?”

Chuuya sat on the bench. He didn’t leave until the trucks drove away too, coveted by the owner’s sighing gaze. He inhaled with the engine; didn’t exhale until his eyes tore away from the removed Arcade sign, peeking from the old trunk — flickering, occasionally, from overheated, half broken light bulbs.

---

“Why is Mori celebrating a Permit we don’t have yet?” Chuuya asked, low, over a polite smile and the rim of a Champagne glass.

Hirotsu glanced at him from the corner of his eye, distractedly entertaining some financially useful fools in gowns in front of them. The sky was a gentle gray behind the golden windows of the ballroom, haunted by frantic rain; Chuuya had read the name of the establishment when they’d entered it, but he’d forgotten it. Laughing the night away in the rows of dancing high society, Kouyou — with his jacket on her shoulders — seemed to meet his eyes at the perfect time, and mouthed, The Blue Flower.

Almost wincing from forced remembrance, Chuuya’s fingers tightened around his glass.

“What makes you think he is?” the man asked him, subtly swaying along to the violins.

“Please,” he muttered, with a glare. “We’re not even close to the Christmas banquet, and he has invited every last one of the names he wishes to preen to from our ally lists. If I’d gotten invited, I would expect horribly good news. Subtly or not.”

Hirotsu hummed. “He’s all but stupid. No way he will make a claim on something we don’t have yet.”

“But something must have happened.”

“Why do you think so?”

He found the shock of his red scarf in the dancing lines, entertaining some woman in a green dress that Chuuya recalled sitting in a Senator’s chair and questioning Mori Corps’ influence. His smile was serene. His eyes were as clouded as they’d been when Chuuya had kneeled in front of him, with a fresh scar under his ribs.

“He looks like he’s won,” he concluded.

The Commander munched on his lips. He was keeping his eyes on Gin, sporting a beautifully flowy white dress and attempting to convince her brother not to step on her feet to dance. Chuuya had heard something about a promotion in her new future — he had the strange feeling the man was hesitating to make it official, though.

She’s young, he had admitted. Chuuya sometimes wondered if that had ever been an issue, before him and Dazai.

“Well, I haven’t heard anything,” Hirotsu offered. “They’re still keeping an eye on Mimic — but that feels like a long lasting business. I did hear someone from the Intelligence might be missing.”

That hit his interest. “Someone relevant?”

“If it’s worth whispering about...”

“Traitor or taken?”

He shook his head. “I don’t know. Boss is keeping it under wraps. I only know because some of my Lizards tend to be gossipy.”

Chuuya curled an eyebrow, nudging him. The sound of rain almost overturned the violins, for a moment; it thundered. “You should be careful about that.”

“You can’t denounce me yet,” Hirotzu said, with a humorous tilt only the Champagne could have given him. “Your Executive promotion is clearly waiting for the Christmas bells.”

Chuuya snorted. “You don’t know that.”

He was a bit satisfied, though, and the man could clearly feel it. They leaned against their shared column, and watched long gowns and white shirts twist underneath the chandeliers. If any of those faces was somewhat suspicious about the free — seemingly aimless — invitation, the majority of them didn’t show it. Chuuya could have counted their clever allies on one hand. “Have you got any idea what you’ll be put in charge of?”

He sighed. “I don’t speculate. Pianoman used to hate that stuff. Whatever Boss needs me for — wherever he needs me, I’ll go.”

“Spoken like a true right hand man.”

“Ane-san will have me by the balls.”

“A left hand, then,” Hirotzu suggested.

He tapped two fingers on the glass. “That seat’s taken too.”

Hirotzu mimicked sewing his lips shut.

The music changed to something slightly more upbeat. Hirotzu hummed along; Chuuya let his eyes roam until they landed on the dead center of the dancing parade — a boy in black.

“I’m sorry about Tanaki.”

He studied the popping bubbles inside his glass, golden and pointless. “I know.”

The Commanded paused. “He’s sorry too.”

“Don’t start,” he warned. “Remind me why we can’t bother him about figuring out Boss’s late celebratory extravaganza?”

Something like discomfort shrugged the man’s shoulders, slipping one side of his scarf off his arm. “He hasn’t been around much. I think he and that Oda friend of his are dealing with a secret assignment of sorts — something directly from the Boss' mouth. No idea of what, given his low rank," Hirotsu studied the ballroom — hesitating on the coy way Dazai dipped the girl dancing with him, a wide smile and distracted eyes. "Which you would know, if you weren't avoiding him."

Chuuya didn't turn, unimpressed. "What the hell do you know?"

"I haven't had to replace my car, lately."

"That's unfair. We haven't blown up one of your cars in months —"

"Yes," An odd longing fogged Hirotsu's monocle up. "I occasionally miss it."

He stared. "Man, you're weird."

"You're weirder," the Commander insisted, tilting his glass to him. He held the same fondness Verlaine treated as an unknown thing, but both his hands were less unfamiliar with it. "Sir."

Chuuya squinted at him. "Is Miranda really a cat?"

The Commander froze.

"You nasty fucking traitor."

Deflating, the man muttered: "I knew he would tell you."

With a sigh, Chuuya clicked their glasses.

The melody reached its peak, twisting the spinning couples into a complicated set of steps only Kouyou's lessons allowed him to follow. Mori was dancing with Elise, now — Ace was keeping an eye on a particularly drunk Senator; Kouyou was locked in a mostly amused dance with some pearl-wearing woman. Obnoxiously, he toasted her when she happened to meet his gaze — a blush of sorts covered her cheeks, and she hid a rude gesture the small of her companion's back.

He didn't look for Tanaki, because he knew she wouldn't be there. He didn't look for Verlaine; he didn't look for the Flags, or his squad. Chuuya flexed his fingers — and vaguely remembered how the soggiest of Hamamoto's liquified brains had felt between his fingers.

"Chuuya," Hirotsu said, after a while. "We need to appear united, now more than ever."

He didn't answer.

"You need to see it strategically, too," he insisted, keeping his eyes on the room. Perhaps he had learned Chuuya's unwillingness to discuss himself where his eyes could be met; perhaps he was just old. "Double Black's absence this year has already started enough rumors — you boys need to be an united front, if things are about to change as favorably as Boss hopes."

The thought scritchd his brain with sharp nails. The dissonance of Dazai's face on a stranger's body, taunting him from the roof of a warehouse — his blood-soaked mouth, asking, what the hell is Double Black?

"We've just been busy," he said, in his blankest tone. "No one's informed the tabloids about any fucking break up. 'S not like we haven't worked together while hating each other before," He downed his glass, agitating it vehemently as he talked, "In fact — it's all we've ever done."

"Boss has been wondering about you two," Hirotsu insisted. "He seems concerned."

"There will be someone else, one day. You have to know that," Chuuya didn't quite taste the words before they fell out of his mouth; he didn't know how to stop them either. Reasonings he had never reasoned about — there, though, with all the obvious things in his life. It all ends and you watch it burn and then the sun is in the sky again. "Maybe we were what the Mafia needed, once. Maybe now it needs something else."

Akutagawa huffed as Gin convinced him to step closer to the center of the circle. He didn't let her go, though — he curled his fingers around her waist as if unsure of how not to claw.

"Too soon, though," Chuuya heard himself murmur. "But it'll happen anyway."

Too old and too knowing, Hirotsu studied him. "You two are more similar than you think. I always thought it worthy of some — caution."

Deep down inside — you and I are the same. "Caution?" he echoed, vacantly.

The man seemed to think over his next words. "Power and trust aren't a disadvantage," he offered, "But only when those who share them are on your side."

He frowned. "We are Mafia first."

"I know," Hirotsu's eyes studied the crystal chandelier over their heads. He got the feeling that wasn't the first time he mused over the topic. "But what if you weren't?"

Chuuya didn't answer.

"I'm not saying you have to forgive him —"

"There's nothing to forgive," he snapped, at last, abandoning his glass on a tray. "Because I don't fucking care to be part of his schemes. Dazai is an asshole and the sky is baby blue. If he thought he'd get me — he's got one thing coming."

The man's expression turned complicated. You always liked him better anyway, he thought about spatting, like a child. "I don't think that was it."

One of the girls from the Guerrilla — Yasuda, he recalled; sharpshooter and former soul from the Pomegranate — came to ask him for a dance with low eyes and a bright grin. Chuuya accepted just for the sake of getting away from the man's well-deep gaze — and because she'd always been exceptionally accepting of his leading skills. Chuuya liked the men Mori had given him, despite the distance he sometimes found himself putting between him and them — so he danced with Yasuda until his cheeks ached from something other than the teeth he'd gritted with Verlaine, and accepted her kiss on the side of his mouth when she twirled away with Marie, from the Guerrilla.

Mere seconds before he could close his now empty fingers around Kouyou's ones, she winked with something like resignation, and spun him into a different pair of arms.

"Oh, look at that," Dazai said, barely louder than the soliloquizing violins, softening into a sadder bundle of notes. His eye was iridescent with a humorless sort of amusement. "I didn't know they held dancing classes for shrimps, too."

Chuuya's head emptied itself out. All that was left was statics, sharper than talons.

But Kouyou had taught him manners and Lippman had taught him eyes were cameras — he set his gaze somewhere over his shoulder, tightened his grip around Dazai's waist and hand, and didn't allow the dancing rows to come to a halt.

But you did it for him, Mori had sworn.

He tightened his grip until it ached.

[Chuuya remembered every second of it. He didn't remember how he had burned, though — he only recalled breathing, and inhaling smoke that was as familiar as everything he hadn't managed to stop in time. You're mine to keep, he had thought, only once, studying Dazai's sleepless eyelashes. And I will fail.]

So — and how utterly easy it had seemed, among fire alarms — he hadn't.]

The whispers started the moment their feet began dancing.

"I hear Chuuya will get some time at home after this French weekend of yours," Dazai said, at some point — for once, not protesting not being assigned the lead. Chuuya saw his lips move in his peripheral vision, and counted scabs of dry skin. "Of course, assuming you don't end up on a plate of escargots and do us all a favor."

"Is Sakaguchi Ango a traitor?"

The Demon Prodigy didn't stumble — as far as the voices went. Not even wounds could force him to; Chuuya knew all they did was cause him a slightly different breathing pattern. Dazai Osamu didn't stumble either — something about his silence, over the pounding rain, managed to get Chuuya to look at him, though. Perhaps they were both tripping fools.

"Sneak attacks don't suit you," Dazai let him know, carefully vacant. He was a terribly good dancer — Chuuya knew stepping on his feet was a choice. "You're more of a bomb."

"Bombs can be sneaky."

"You can't."

Chuuya slipped the hand around the boy's waist under his coat and jacket, to brush skin that was cold ever through the shirt. He has to have a scar, too, he considered. The skin around his own was still pink and tender; he remembered the rust of the pole that had impaled them tickling the sides of his wound.

"Someone from the Intelligence is missing," he listed. "You and Oda Sakunosuke are dealing with some secret business at the Boss' orders. Is Sakaguchi a traitor, or is he dead?"

"Are you aware," Dazai replied, in the same tone, "That the reason for this silly celebration is that the Division has implemented a more severe investigation procedure for Permit-less organizations?" He leaned his face close; blinked, obnoxious. "And not all members from our Intelligence are missing. They swear that if we don't manage to gain a Permit by the end of the year, we will be found and dismantled."

Chuuya hadn't been smiling. It faded off his face all the same, melting like candle wax.

"You going to blame me for it?"

"Are you going to keep questioning an Executive's secret mission for the sake of childish pettiness?" Dazai insisted.

He sunk his nails in the small of his back. It had been dark, under the building. Chuuya had heard his heart beat in his throat. "You know I wouldn't gloat over betrayal." Not me, he thought. Not a hypocrite.

"No," he confirmed. The violins slipped in a nostalgic, bitter twist of chords; Dazai pressed his forehead against Chuuya's, hard, and said: "You'd just think it fair, in the back of your mind."

Tanaki's name wasn't even uttered. Close enough to count the ripping skin on the boy's lips, he felt it mouthed all the same — lost between the insistent whispers of the dancing bodies around them, swearing they hadn't laid eye on the both of them since the last time they had left a street scarlet and haunted. They're alive, he heard them swear. Chuuya wanted to rattle them. My heartbeat is mine, he'd say, and his doesn't care.

She betrayed you too, Chuuya could have said.

And when haven't you been betrayed?, he could hear Dazai tut.

"Why won't he leave that room?"

Dazai glanced at him.

"He's your brother," he said, eventually. He wasn't sure if he was trying to be mean anymore. Assume he is, Kouyou had told him, once. "Don't you know all about how you gods grieve?"

"I'm no god."

The boy's fingers tightened around his own. Chuuya hated him. Chuuya had been buried for him — with him; through him — and he had woken up to what shouldn't have been betrayal, but felt like it anyway. Dazai's thumb traced that old scar on the inside of his wrist, the same black as his gloves.

Something like regret pulled his face. But there was nothing there at all — there hadn't been since Chuuya had said Sakaguchi's name out loud.

"I know," Dazai swore.

He waited for an explanation. It never came.

The music ran towards a peak of soft, low hums. Dazai spun him around, and Chuuya's chin landed somewhere on his shoulder — the fabric of his coat scratchy and familiar, unclenching his fingers and then tensing his nerves — and he met Mori's eyes.

He wasn't dancing anymore. Elise pulled his scarf as she whined about something. Mori's eyes traced the back of Dazai's head as if looking for a bullet wound — then in a stranger way; a closed off realization that didn't seem to make him much happy at all. It was gone with the next flutter of violin chords — he raised his hand and smiled, waving at Chuuya.

How would you kill him?

Chuuya settled his chin on his shoulder, feeling strangely tired, and ordered his feet to move until the music came to an end.

"To Mori Corporations!" a voice toasted.

Reflected between the shards of the chandeliers, a ghost's eyes and his ash blond hair looked at him with unblemished nothingness, dripping blood from the sharpest crystals.

---

...

---

The room smelled of ink and dust.

"Your commitment to this silence game is as childish as it is ineffective. You are aware, yes?" Verlaine questioned, failing at an entirely toneless remark, severing the twenty seven minutes of quiet Chuuya had been counting. He picked up a bullet box from one of the shelves, rattling just to hear a whisper other than the man's voice. He hadn't even realized he hadn't forgotten what it sounded like. "One would question how you haven't managed to shrug that pettiness out of you yet. How disheartening."

He didn't offer a response.

"First you come in and leave the moment I breathe a word," Verlaine summed up. "Then you come back — apparently for a house tour —"

"This isn't a house," he offered. "This is a stingy, self-inflicted prison cell."

"Are you going to run from me again?"

Chuuya thought back to his fingers on the door — the voice behind his back, and the lighting in his veins, and then being outside, again. The stairs and Tanaki's ashes. Go in, something in his flesh had murmured, soothing like a mother. It was stained in blood and starvation. Go in again. "That wasn't running."

"You have nothing to say to me?"

Chuuya tilted his head.

That gym wide room midway the Ivy Dungeons could have been set a few decades ago, and it wouldn't have been a wrong fit. Oil lights dangled from the walls, manually changeable — he imagined Verlaine wasting time lighting them up everyday, just to focus on something other than the ruined-pages book in his lap. All furniture was pricey, warm wood, including the chair the man sat on — and the endless maze of shelves scattered to create an obstacle course Chuuya recognized from assassin training reports.

The Secret Executive takes care of them, was one of the few available voices about the man. Something about the ruthlessness of his disciples — something about his distaste for Port Mafia procedures.

Something, Chuuya considered, crossing his arms to lean on the wall opposite to him, about a room reeking of ghosts.

"No," he offered.

In spite of the vacant loftiness of his traits — the skin of a corpse, still stretching elegantly on a face that had never looked like Chuuya's at all, if not for a shared stubbornness of sorts in their eyes; the tamed strands of ash-blond hair, braided all the way to the silk hems of his waistcoat — Verlaine wasn't fast enough to hide the way Chuuya's voice snapped his ravenous attention to him.

"Nothing," the French man repeated, a bit flat.

He shrugged. "I already told you all of it. You just don't get to hear it."

Something like hunger sealed his nails on the armrests of his chair. It disappeared a second later, and Verlaine was nothing but an idea — six steps from him and draped in black clothes and a few years older, somehow. Somehow. Chuuya felt Tainted swirl under his veins like delirium — he set his eyes on the too-human wrinkles on Verlaine's forehead, and felt saner.

Just a man, he reminded himself. The Flags had deserved better than to be killed by a mere man — and yet that was all it was.

Verlaine turned the pages of his book. He licked his forefinger to do so. The sound of paper turned Chuuya's mind into webbed glass.

It was quiet for a long time.

"You know," Chuuya started, eyes on an old calligraphy set that looked just like that house in France. He has peculiar requests, at times, Mori had once mused, perplexed, studying some report Chuuya wasn't allowed to glance at. "There's this ring I fight at, sometimes."

Verlaine's eyebrow curled.

He'd been a tad too refined not to be made of porcelain, when they had first met — he still was, but his face was far too carved in not to be flesh. "Not the kind of childish roughhousing I'd expect from Ozaki's pearl."

The uncanny familiarity in the appellative had something dormant rattle his bones. They all knew, his ribs kept reminding him, caging his lungs in an embrace of not-quite-rage. He understood — he wished he didn't have to. He wished he'd found out when he was still devastated enough to crawl to that basement and skin him alive. He wished Verlaine had died long before any of them could learn any of the things that bothered him.

That's where humanity is, Tanaki had said, once. Thinking about her made his jaw ache.

Chuuya didn't want Verlaine to be human at all. Chuuya knew he was. Chuuya wanted his friends back, and he would want them until the day he died — and it changed nothing at all.

"Don't let Ane-san hear you call her that."

The Ane-san made his face twitch. "Perhaps if she quit it with her penchant for Paul."

"One would think you'd miss it," he said, just to be mean.

"One would think you'd call your actual brother with such familiarity."

"My brother was dead until roughly three weeks ago," Chuuya informed him, helpfully. His teeth gritted against each other whenever he made the mistake of shutting his mouth for so long — he was so giddy with repressed rage he felt drunk. It all canceled itself out in an odd sort of calm. "But thank you for the Get Better Soon basket. As I was saying — the fighting ring is fun. Usually. When they don't bring out the boring assholes with more muscle than encephalon," He rolled his head back to work a nerve in his nape. "You could come with, one of these nights."

Verlaine's eyes thinned.

Searching for a trick he didn't find, he let a vein in his jaw throb. His fingers were sharp; they caressed the pages of his book with something like distant awareness. He didn't entirely feel there. He didn't feel much alive either.

Perhaps I didn't get it wrong, he thought.

"I have no interest in watching dogs fight for the sake of nothing," Verlaine concluded, with his nose raised. His crossed feet were stuck to the old wooden tiles — Chuuya thought about asking him to stand and twirl, just to watch him grow a spine made of pure irritation.

He didn't believe his act one bit. The gnawing ache of starvation carved Verlaine's face like a wound. What do you miss?, he wanted to ask. What do you get to miss, if you've killed it yourself?

Somewhere in a corner of that basement — hidden amongst the obstacles like the assassin he was too bored to be — Dazai mouthed: hypocrite.

"You sure?"

"Perhaps I shouldn't be surprised you find scrimmages an amusing hobby," the man mused, with the same tone he'd use to discuss the weather, "You were, after all, abandoned in the hands of — less than respectable company, for most of your childhood. It has influenced you negatively. Must be why you're so thin. All the stress and all the hunger. Us beasts tend to look for an outlet."

"I'm no beast," Chuuya assured him, with a smile that had him grow carefully irate.

Rage like the beast you are, he'd told him. You'll remember who you are. He'd told him so much, and Chuuya remembered all of it. On the worst days, he couldn't even recall Doc's voice.

"But suit yourself. 'Guess you ain't looking forward to some brotherly bonding. I mean," Pointedly, he ranked his eyes across the quiet room. "Clearly you prefer rotting away in a casket."

"This is no casket."

"You're right. No red pillows and stuff."

"Chuuya," the man said — and that word alone had him sink his nails in his gloved palms not to tear a crater into Verlaine's chest. It'd be easy, the whispers in his skull said — except Chuuya was Chuuya, and his body was his own, and there was no point in blaming Arahabaki for his own thirst. It'd be easy, and you want it too. "I see you're still a world-class shit talker."

If he squinted, there was fondness in it. If he squinted a bit more, it was as fake as the layer of untouched perfection keeping his hands still on the armrests — the bubbling apathy underneath. A dead man who still remembered breathing

He shrugged again, unimpressed. "You know, for some reason, hearing you curse is weird," he commented. "Maybe the French accent."

"You learned it, though. I'm touched."

“You’ve been here for what, three years? No time to pick up a Japanese class?”

“Chuuya.”

“Where were you?”

Silence pressed Verlaine’s lips tight.

He waited him out, fingers tapping his arm. Chuuya hadn’t planned the delicate, bloodied rage stuck in his voice — Chuuya tasted its poison long after it had left his throat, crawling on its knees and elbows to disguise his begging as an accusation. Or perhaps it was the opposite.

“People know nothing of true loneliness,” he recited, before he could convince himself that the man deserved no remembrance. “And something about comets, some shit about isolation — and then, but what if that comet had another comet at his side?”

Verlaine’s gaze turned dangerously full. I wish you weren’t dead, Chuuya had breathed. “And you swore you weren’t lonely,” he mocked.

“I got possessed,” Chuuya dropped, with a carelessness that had his eyebrows twitching. “Mmh? With that Nine Rings business. You don’t need me to explain it to you — I drafted some reports for the godforsaken Secret Executive myself. Beatrice got me, and I spent a few months being a pseudo spy on the very brink of death. And then, before the Dragon Head Conflict — I trained Corruption with Dazai for a whole summer, and it fucked up my body, and I had fucking rotten arms —”

“I don’t know if I approve of you and that devilish boy being partners.”

“— and then Ueda Akinari, and before that the Wound Reaper, and so much more bullshit I have no time to list off,” he continued, undeterred. “But you — you hypocrite — decided I was worthy of being acknowledged only once I got betrayed. So you could send me a little note and gloat?”

If Verlaine cared about his words, he didn’t show it. “It isn’t gloating. I find no pleasure in any I told you so.”

“Stop pretending you care.”

“I do care. You simply detest it.”

“It was always about proving me wrong,” Chuuya snapped. “That’s all. Tell me it wasn’t.”

The man didn’t answer.

Then, studying the golden shadows of the candles on the ceiling, he said: “Have you ever felt the world was a cruel place?”

You’ve already asked me this, he thought. “I love it in spite of it.”

“That’s where you’re wrong,” Verlaine’s taunt was almost pitiful. Still abysmally distant — a twirling thought he wouldn’t have minded saying to an empty room, rather than to him. He had the Flags’ blood stuck all over his clothes; the black hid it masterfully. Chuuya felt lightheaded with the urge to do something. He’d been starving so long, the sight of a feast was sure to make his stomach hurt no matter what the first bite was. “You keep settling for the next best thing.”

He scoffed. “You told me making Professor N pay would balance it all out.”

“I would never lie to you.”

“N’s dead,” Chuuya’s limbs were twitching with electric shocks. He hated talking about the man. He hated being there. He couldn’t leave — he owned the Flags senseless cruelty, or he owed it to himself. The dead don’t give a shit. “And you’re wearing black in a coffin.”

Verlaine lowered his eyes to him.

It was a chilling stare. The specks of gold and crystallized grass in his eyes had never made Chuuya truly fear — he had burned with rage and had been plagued with a purpose that was crimson like blood; and he’d stared at the tip of Verlaine’s finger as it touched his forehead and unlocked the whispers in his veins. The danger had been sizzling like upcoming thunder, and Chuuya hadn’t feared, still — in some forsaken, unexplained corner of his bones, the certainty not to be a target had always put any animalistic ferocity at rest.

And yet he believed — just for a moment — that his brother would stand and crush his skull between his hands.

“I’m glad to finally see you again, Chuuya,” Verlaine said, very quietly — deathly still. “And I have missed you, whether you’ll believe me or not. But you will mind your words.”

“Will I?”

“You will not accuse me of mourning that man,” He spat the word like the blood he hadn’t choked on — brought back to life by something he couldn’t explain. Chuuya watched him grow less pale and hunched with rage, and felt a twinge of interest — a gasp of guilt for it. “There is only one person in this world who deserves my atonement, and it isn’t you either.”

My friends, he bit his tongue not to say. My friends. What were they good for?

“N’s dead,” He didn’t want to taunt him — he wanted to believe his urges to be less petty. His friends were dead whether or not he kicked sand in Verlaine’s eyes. “Aren’t you content?”

Verlaine stared at the ground.

“Existence happens in rooms you and I have no invitation to, Chuuya.”

He scoffed. “Then you steal one.”

“No,” he insisted. The conviction in his tone raised goosebumps on Chuuya’s skin — he felt his gloves creak from his fists being clenched. It was an uncanny, vertiginous feeling — how real it felt against the venom of pages Chuuya had read and re-read in between his missions in France; all of it mixed with the memory of the faithless belief Verlaine had attempted to bury within Chuuya’s brain over the Flags’ corpses. He’d sounded a tad less resigned, back then. “You don’t.”

There’s nothing you need to do, Verlaine had sworn. It had been desperate; less composed than his spotless clothes or merciless aim. Chuuya had imagined him in a tank more than he’d recalled the sound of his voice; kicking his fists against the glass where Chuuya had just slept and lost himself.

There was only one thing we needed not to do, he had begged, and that was not being born.

Chuuya munched on his cheek, trying to breathe in through his nose. “God,” he hissed, as he walked away to the wall — just to step over his own tension. “God, you piss me off.”

Flatly, the man said; “How self-centered.”

“See!” he snarled, brusque enough to have his blond eyebrow curl up. “That pisses me off. You depressing, sanctimonious cretin — have you been crying over yourself for three years?”

Something like an uncertain offense almost had Verlaine move around in his chair. Eventually, his pride kept him still. Chuuya wanted to laugh, delirium or hysteria — he looked so proper and so dead, and he was alive — and Chuuya was talking to him like betrayal was a thing of the living. The dead don’t give a shit, he recalled, but I do.

“You forget,” Verlaine said. His eyes laid on something a tad too high to be his eyes; Chuuya realized, belatedly, that it was their shared hat. “I know all you have been through since we fought.”

“From your monk seclusion, yes. At least I’ve been outside.”

“The Mafia kept me alive against my will,” Verlaine bit, awfully close to a snap. “I was kept in this world without any consultation. I should get to choose what to do with my own imprisonment, should I not?”

Chuuya stared. “You’re an Executive of the Port Mafia. No one is imprisoning you.”

“Would you have me out?” he challenged.

The thought had his heel press against the ground with a strength that would have cracked it open — had he not worked on keeping Tainted less responsive. It didn’t quite fool Verlaine, whose touch cursed materiality just as much as his own — he huffed what could have been laughter, in a less detrimental cage, and turned another page in his book. Ignoring him — with his bloodied hands and his longing gaze and his guiltless spine.

Ignoring him.

Something in his veins roared. “You’re such a coward.”

“And you’re as hopeless of a believer as you have always been,” Verlaine assured, distractedly. “Have I ever told you this story —“

“I think you were too busy playing widow in the basement.”

“— the French authorities had me undergo a training of sorts, before they allowed me out in the field,” the man continued, tracing the lines of ink with his finger, as if reading out loud. “I’d been isolated since my creation,” Birth, Chuuya could hear Rimbaud’s voice tut, your birth. “The lessons didn’t make much sense to me. At first, I justified them as a way to teach me how to go unnoticed. Eventually, I understood they were trying to teach me how to be human.”

Shirase’s hands, Chuuya recalled. Bruised and small and devastatingly familiar; handing him a piece of bread and fluffing up his stolen pillow because, it’s more comfortable like this.

You were born between shit and ruins, you idiot, Albatross had blinked, once. Of course you needed some socialization. I’m surprised you don’t have chronic fleas, at this rate.

“You are human,” he let him know.

“I didn’t need Arthur’s pity,” Verlaine said, very easily. “And I don’t need yours.”

“It isn’t. Your stupidity just annoys me.”

“If you believed yourself human —“

“I believe myself rather lucky,” he replied, a stubborn note in his tone. “Loved, too. This might be surprising to you — given you’ve spent them growing spider webs in a basement — but I used these years to come to the conclusion that I don’t really want more than that. You were loved too. It’s not my fault you didn’t care.”

Verlaine didn’t seem to be listening. “They had me to describe humanity to them,” he said, his eyes distant, but set on the pages. Chuuya wanted to rip the book off his hands and throw it to the wall. “Why is it human?, they asked me.”

He studied the nearest burning candle, the gums of his un-gritted teeth aching. He didn’t want to listen to him. He didn’t want Verlaine to bite his poison in any other muscle of his — where it would linger and it would spread and it would mark, as if Chuuya hadn’t already been giving a voice to the mere power in his skeleton.

Do you need more ghosts?, Dazai had once wondered. He didn’t even remember when.

“I said — because it’s not me,” Verlaine concluded. “I got full marks.”

“You know what your Arthur’s last words were?”

It hit the man like a gunshot.

A strange sight; enough to have Chuuya fall quiet. A less trained eye wouldn't have found it, perhaps — the devastation cracking his bones until his fingers turned into claws; draining his eyes until the pupil was a lonely moon on a sky no one had any care to count stars on.

Pollution kills, Kenta had sworn. Verlaine had spent three years in grief-black and he hadn't mourned one day.

"Don't," he warned, tight.

"Live," Chuuya recited. He recalled the dirt of the empty warehouse on his old pants — the way watching people die had never felt like much, but watching Rimbaud choke on his shattered sternum had had him take his hand. "There is no longer any way of knowing who you are or where you came from. But even if you are a pattern etched on the surface of raw power —"

"Chuuya."

"You," he spelled out, "Are you."

The assassin didn't flinch. Chuuya knew, without an inch of reasonable doubt, that the man had told Verlaine those exact same words before.

"You betrayed him, and he still wasted his death pretending I was you," he informed him. "Caring for me. Promising me my own humanity — long before you killed anyone for the sake of proving me wrong, and of feeling a little less lonely in your self hatred. You have done nothing but spit on it, again and again, fueled by the stubbornness that wanted you to believe he was delusional. I'd hope you finally realized it, after so long — but he was just a good friend."

Untrembling, his fingers curled against the yellowish pages of his book.

"Your shortcomings are going to kill them all," Chuuya remembered, unable to bite down his words, unsure if he wanted to, "And yet here I stand, and the only one who's killed my friends is you. Your shortcomings killed him, and I was never you at all."

The hush of the candles seemed to quieten. Verlaine looked at him.

"And?"

"I would have killed you, if I had stayed in this room, the other day," he swore. It weighed on his tongue like an oath he'd never keep. Chuuya was aimless rage at his most uncontrolled. Chuuya didn't want to lose control. "I heard your voice and I knew it. You talked, and I saw my hand ripping your heart out before you could say another word. I would have done it," He let his hands fall; dangle at his sides until the tips were numb and blue from the basement's cold. "That wasn't running. That was mercy."

Something in the man's eyes dimmed. "And you think you would have managed to kill me?"

"I know I would have."

The lack of hesitation had Verlaine pause.

Chuuya sighed, rubbing his forehead. “Get out of this goddamn basement.”

“No.”

“What do you mean —“

“No,” he said. “There is a storm not even I will escape — one that will devour us all, human or not. Until then —” He lowered his eyes to the unwrinkled black of his sleeves. Something like indecisiveness battled through the signs of age on his pale face. Chuuya had the very strange thought that he’d probably watch him grow old, one way or another. “I think I would like to be left alone.”

So did I, Chuuya didn’t say. His knuckles were itching. He refused to spill any more blood for him. You brought the storm anyway.

“What is this storm?” he clipped, brusque. “I thought you cared about nothing but me.”

“I don’t.”

The sincerity in it was disarming. “I have been in danger, you know.”

“No,” Verlaine mused. He tilted his head to study him. “I never doubted your strength. You are my brother. We cannot be overtaken by flimsy trials. But I wished —“ He frowned at the pages. Chuuya realized there were drawings on them, too — blooming green fields and warm wooden walls. He thought of Fumiko’s vision; the house whose rooms he knew, and would never enter. Chuuya never knew how honest the sincerity in Verlaine’s words was. “I really did wish you could live a life that needed no strength to be lived.”

It hit him, abruptly, how little he wanted to hear it.

“Too late,” he said, tightly. “And there is no such thing anyway.”

“I know,” Verlaine tapped his own wrist — forced his fingers to loosen, keeping them from trying to reach out. Chuuya didn’t think it was to him. The blood was for nothing, he thought, and we’re both here anyway. “I’m sorry,” he added, and Chuuya knew it would never be to him. “I know.”

---

...

---

Chuuya failed to figure out what, exactly, had brought him to The Alley until the liquid cobalt of the neon sign outside buzzed, partly obscuring the sound of breaking glass at the end of the stone stairs.

The way down was dark, barely bathed in that fluorescent blue — enough to underline the cracks and rifts of the old stone. It rained, still, and the coat he'd left around Kouyou's shoulders was a half mourned lack; he watched raindrops shatter in crystal shades, mixing with the steady influx of water from the evermore-leaking pipe by the wall. It took him a moment to realize he hadn't been there in months.

Sometimes you leave and you don't realize it until you return, Noguchi had said, once. The nice thing is that you hardly feel it.

"You won't drown," Chuuya ordered, and it felt useless even as it dripped from his wet lips. "Get out."

He sat down on the fourth to last step — he counted, just as an excuse not to think about the throbbing something rattling his ribs — and opened a crack with all his hastiness. He hated that Dazai hadn't even flinched, probably — too used to his patterns. He didn't feel the anger that had been stuck in his veins since the Hospital bed until it choked the breath out of him, his shoes stepping on fragments of a water glass by the second to last step.

The Alley seemed to laugh at him.

Sprawled like a suicide-survivor against the stone wall of the alcove, Dazai studied him with a dazedly low-lidded eye, between his abandoned, half curled legs — bored and so rain-wet it was a wonder he wasn't shaking head to toe. He didn't say a thing.

"I need to pack my stuff," Chuuya insisted, nonsensically. His apartment was on the other side of the city.

He thought of the place underneath Albatross' own, abandoned to the old paint job and DO NOT ENTER sign. Paper was probably still stuck to the ceiling — old pages from an astronomy book Kouyou had gifted him, because Chuuya liked stars and couldn't find it in himself to decorate; and then the journaling from their first official mission, with all the neon green thread and the information. Mission Blue Flower. Three lifetimes ago, two times shorter and three times meaner. Their carved heights on the side of the door resembled both humidity stains and a joke.

Chuuya studied the bundle of Dazai's coat on the ground, soaked in the pipe water and the tapping rain, feet jittery from that higher point of view — and he exhaled.

His eyes were stuck to the fragment — locked between his lithe, pale fingers; dangling over his knee along to the hypnotic fall of blood drops and dried Champagne — from the glass he had to have thrown against the wall, stolen from the ballroom's refreshments. It was the only reason he missed the face Dazai made, when he breathed out: "Did you t-talk to him?"

He stilled.

Searching for something in his vacant gaze — something, Chuuya knew, but he couldn't recall — he felt that gaze piercing back, unchanged. Chuuya tried to make sense of the sounds swimming in his ears with leftover rain, because the Demon Prodigy didn't talk like anything but a trickster, and Dazai Osamu didn't either, and yet —

“Why?” Chuuya heard himself ask. “Is there some relevant information you needed the King of Assassins' favorite person to get for you?”

The neon sign flickered. Breaking against the veil of water from the pipe, it grew gentler.

“You're not his favorite,” Dazai informed him. He sounded drunk, somewhat — sickly and nasal, and not quite there. The familiarity had him straighten for no sure cause. “Rimbaud was. And I wouldn't have told you anyway.”

Perhaps I made it up, Chuuya thought, a bit numb — thinking of the way Koda's syllables had used to chase each other.

He squinted through the darkness and the sea between them, at the broken veins of his eye — of his eyes, almost, because his bandages were loose and his unworking eye took a peek between those cell bars with a daze that was nauseated. Dazai was all loose — drenched clothes and unkempt hair and something in his traits, determined and lazy. Coming undone in that shared hideout, like it was fair — like Chuuya had ever allowed him anywhere he hadn't lock-picked his way through anyway.

It took him a bit too long to recognize it as the Ferris Wheels of shoes too close to the edge — drowning in a river.

He studied him. “What did you do?”

Blinking, a thousand miles away, Dazai did nothing but stare.

Knots curled themselves in his chest with the exceptional ability of wrinkled hands. Chuuya studied the twitches of his fingers, and then the graffitied stone walls — the rusty fence behind him. Head tilted back against it, Dazai said: “Did you know Madame Tanaki was the reason Ueda Akinari got his hands on you?”

Chuuya almost flew to his feet, tense like an arrow. “What did you do?” he insisted. “Tell me.”

“None of them cared about informing you of her execution,” he continued. He parted from that alcove of his like a root being ripped from the ground, sloppy and resistant — crawled forward, very slowly. Not drowning, Chuuya's mental list let him know. Not overdose — thin pupils. But he was drenched and studying him like he wasn't sure he was there. “I'd find some amusement in telling you they wanted to keep you in the dark, but to be honest — they didn't even think about it. It was the same with Verlaine, I think,” Dazai squinted at nothing, arms trembling from effort. “In the grand scheme of the Mafia's mighty existence, your grief didn't amount to much. Isn't that maddening?”

Chuuya stared at the fragment of glass he'd abandoned by his feet. Dead bird at the door; the shine of old Champagne.

"Mori's poisons," Chuuya said. Distant; a shout underwater. "Did you take Mori's poisons?"

The rain had turned Dazai's palms freezing and too slippery. It took them a moment — when he threw himself forward, knees on the first step — to still enough to cup Chuuya's cheeks, forcing his eyes on all his dazzlingly unstable focus.

He was so close his breath turned into a cloud over Chuuya's nose, spurred by the cold and the rush of water from the sky and the pipe, barely shielded by the descent — and for a moment there was nothing but that lone strand of hair trapped between Dazai's eyelashes, and the way he held his head like webbed glass he was set on shattering.

"Silly, stubborn Chuuya," Dazai insisted, like an epiphany — it was barely a breath. His lips were chapped and littered in raindrops. "We just keep breaking your heart, don't we?"

Don't be stupid, he mouthed. His lips didn't even move. Chuuya was petrified.

Something like nothing at all turned his mind into an empty cave of buzzing. He didn't even feel the rage of that patronization — of Dazai's tendency to pull and to force and to breathe in Chuuya's own breathing space, until the air was pettily stolen and scented in all of Dazai's familiar intensity — until he had the boy in a locked hold under his merciless arm, ripping a choked gasp out of his lips.

He dragged him to the alcove again, teeth gritted too violently to care about how viciously Dazai kicked and fought and protested and bit — no matter the bruises blooming across his bones as Chuuya's grip relentlessly slammed him against the sharp corners of that alley, slamming back.

Hamamoto's brains between his fingers, he thought, and, it can't have been for nothing, and, who are you lying to but yourself?

"Throw it up," Chuuya ordered, pushing him to his knees near the sewer grate, viciously enough to hear it crack — "Fucking throw it up —" And when Dazai tried to rip himself off, he sunk his nails in his nape and just slammed him forward. "Throw it up right now!"

Dazai trashed around. His fist hit Chuuya's knee where an old scar was, and Chuuya landed on the ground, forcing the sewer grate off with a rush of heartbeat in his ears — heard his mouth shape insults into reality and spit sharp words through the seams of it, deaf to the protests and the whines out of Dazai's own spit sticky lips — and he forced him down again, and again and again, and he stuck two fingers down his throat, and hooked his hand into his hair until entire strands were ripped off, dragging his head down the hole.

A pitiful, disgusting sound wrecked Dazai's throat, rattling him so wretchedly his hands lost their grip on the marks he'd clawed, bumping his forehead against the ceramic of the toilet.

"You think I'm allowing Mori to fucking execute me over your corpse?" he snapped, unsure of anything coming out of his mouth, frantic and angry. "You think I'm —"

“Don’t let Mori know,” Dazai slugged, amidst delirium and vomit. It was barely a string of letters — barely understandable, apart from that odd amusement he always seemed to drool when it was about the Boss. “Mori can’t know — don’t let him —” His knees gave up on their quest, landing him on stone. “ — can’t know I —”

He threw up.

Chuuya’s heels hurt under the weight of his thighs. He dropped like a puppet, panting and painstakingly squeezing himself — where the neon cobalt light was nowhere to be seen and the rain was a tad louder. The sound of his breathing was aggravating, and he’d held onto the back of Dazai’s shirt so callously he’d torn holes in it.

It was eons before it was quiet.

Dazai leaned back, falling against the metal fence, his next inhale vertiginously shaky. Chuuya waited for him to whine, and felt like punching something when he didn’t. Dazai swayed as if he was going to crack his skull open against the wall, and Chuuya’s fists clenched in preparation.

When nothing happened, he only felt stupid.

At least we’re not bleeding, he considered, in a fit of uncomfortable familiarity. The two of them — a messy bundle of harsh breathing on an alley’s concrete. Chuuya detested the settling calm in his veins; his bones’ adjustment to what shouldn’t have been normal. He detested the sight of Dazai’s face — the bandages hanging from his chin, and the horridly lost look in his pupils. How the User who had worn his face hadn’t looked like him as he died — and how Chuuya had known it.

He climbed to his feet, joints creaking and eyes pulsing. They’d stored water bottles inside the wall-safe stash — Chuuya threw one at him, and ordered: “Clean up.”

Get one the anthodites from the Infirmary, he thought about adding. But it would have been a waste of breath. Dazai knew; Dazai would. Dazai didn’t even want to die.

Chuuya attempted to find something to get his hands busy. When he didn’t, fingers clenching and unclenching, he dropped on the wet third to last step again — right back to the start.

It didn’t help much. In his peripheral, Dazai’s torturously slow cleaning motions were a puppeteer’s fault. Sometimes, Chuuya did not want to think, and thought anyway, Dazai felt so very young. Felt so very drenched in blood, alone and surrounded and coveted and feared and alone. Sometimes, Chuuya stitched him up and the words refused to leave his throat — they nested there and made a swell that was fated happenstance, because he knew better than to deny that whatever tethered them to each other’s ripples was suppositious, by then. Sometimes — at fifteen years old and when that building had buried them without a tombstone — he wanted to sit next to him and ask, can we be friends?

No, he imagined him saying, a bit stupefied. Chuuya would have answered the same — that was how he knew. Of course we can’t.

“You know,” Chuuya said. “They’re closing the Arcade.”

A bandaged hand wiped chapped lips, tired. Dazai looked at him through his wet fringe, devastatingly blank — torrid and glistening right behind the dark glass of his pupils, as if choking on his desire to do something.

“My Arcade?” he echoed.

It made him angry for no real reason. “It’s not just fucking yours.”

“If that was your Arcade,” Dazai muttered, very reasonably, framed by a subtle frustration that felt a bit unreal on his tongue — ours, he mused, ours, who else’s? “Then you should have been here when they shut it down.”

Chuuya stared. Opened his mouth; heard nothing come out. “That’s not fair.”

His glance up at him was pitiful. We just keep breaking your heart, he’d said. Don’t we?

His fingers twitched.

It kept raining. Cars passed by underneath the bridge, right outside The Alley; Chuuya picked up a glass fragment from the first step — he let it fall after a breath, electrified and barely distracted by the echoing sound of the pipes. He could feel Dazai’s eyes on him. He picked up the glass again. Put it down. Figure it out, he heard Tsuchiya snap, a bit irritated. Are you going to run again?, Verlaine had questioned.

“Get out,” Chuuya said.

“Do you have it?”

He raised his head, fingers stuck around the laces of his shoes.

“The scar,” Dazai asked. His eyes fell on the rain-soaked fabric of his waistcoat, the shirt under it — settled by his ribs, where Chuuya sometimes felt his heart throb, still. “Do you have it?”

Despite the haze of the horrid blue light and the buzz of the piping system, Chuuya knew his confusion wasn’t on him. The question made no sense whatsoever. “We got skewered like a meat combo, jackass,” he reminded him. “Of course I’ve got a scar.”

“I don’t.”

“Don’t be stupid.”

“I don’t,” he insisted. Chuuya didn’t really want to be in his same room. Chuuya only had to be away for a week, at most, and he’d asked him to come anyway. But you did it for him, Mori had sworn. “It didn’t matter, so I don’t.”

Chuuya couldn’t think of an answer. “Get out.”

“Can I see it?”

He set his jaw, teeth shattering against each other. He tapped his fingers on the stairs — once, twice. But you did it for him, he’d sworn. Chuuya understood, belatedly, that it had been a warning to stubbornly blind ears. What won’t you do?

“Are you going to leave, after?” he asked.

Dazai tilted his head. “What else can I do?”

The spot he’d punched on his knee pulsed. Chuuya raised his fingers — uncertain of when he had removed his gloves — and unbuttoned his waistcoat with a few flicks of wrists. He gave up by the time the spasms of his fingers got to his nerves; settled for dragging his shirt out of his pants and crumbling it along with the waistcoat, freeing only his lower stomach. Whipping rain-scented cold tickled him; he exhaled against the goosebumps.

With no courtesy, Dazai’s eyes zeroed on the ugly patch of skin.

He hadn’t observed it much, but he knew its ridges with the absent traced-memory of nimble fingers on boring assignments. The Sheep had had a tradition of trying to match wider scars with one of the countries from an old book they’d stolen — Chuuya didn’t think that one would match any. It was too wide and too strangely precise; sharper where the sculpted leaves of the railing had been. The shade of dead skin — a crisp, burned brown, surrounded by blushing bruises and staggeringly white outlines — was so well known, he sometimes ended up staring at his unmarred flesh instead.

“That’s ugly,” was Dazai’s verdict. Oddly, he sounded a bit jealous.

“You’re ugly,” Chuuya tried to snap. He half managed — obnoxiously shushed by Dazai’s unsubtle scurrying forward, uncaring of just how dirty his soaked pants were getting. He landed on the first step, half kneeling, half dropped — leaned his chin on one of Chuuya’s knees, mollified and empty, and didn’t move.

I knew you’d come get us, he had told Kajii, a few days after waking up in the Hospital.

The man — always one for research — had asked again, nonetheless. I knew you’d come get us, he hadn’t promised. He hadn’t wanted to talk. Dazai would have stitched himself up with debris and moonlight before allowing their hearts to stop beating in tandem. And Chuuya —

We belong to the Mafia first, he had told Hirotsu. He had squeezed Hamamoto’s brain out of his eye sockets like it didn’t matter at all.

The stairs were steep. Chuuya tilted back until the back of his head could throb against wet stone, and saw nothing but blue neon shattering a water curtain.

Something sweaty and feverishly hot touched the tender skin of the scar.

His muscles jumped with it, startled by the shock of contrasting temperatures and of a tickling exhale on ruined skin — but it didn’t jolt Dazai’s forehead in the least. The tip of his nose was the only freezing part of him, raising goosebumps in the middle of Chuuya’s stomach — his bandaged hands were loose and hooked to his belt loops, pulling his legs apart just enough to reach him.

Chuuya felt very tired, all of the sudden.

You could have told me, he wanted to say. Verlaine and Tanaki and all of it. The sky was devoid of stars, over the limit of the alcove roof — filled with rain. Isn't it lonely, being prodigious and demonic all at once? Fuck you. Fuck you. It wouldn't matter at all. I'm sorry about Sakaguchi.

A bit gentler, and unfit just for it: I know.

His hand curled on Dazai's scalp, scritch through hair he had been too close to ripping off. Dazai's whole self seemed to slump forward with a stuttering intake of breath, as if surprised by his own materiality — by the permission to be so. It didn't matter, he'd told him, so I don't have it. In a frustrating twist of guts, Chuuya wanted to rattle him — of course you can be touched.

Something too scratchy to be flesh touched the scar tissue. Chuuya only understood they were lips when they clicked dryly against his fluttering muscles — a small, pointless kiss.

Warmth choked his viscera like solidified blood, clogging his airways and his veins. “Hey,” he exhaled, like a warning, eyes on the sky.

The steps dug against his back — his nape; his shoulder blades; his elbows. Dazai's fingers slipped from his belt loops, butterfly-touching the back of his thighs right where they ended — they crawled underneath the clingy wetness left behind by Chuuya's raised shirt, scarred palms branding the rain-sticky skin of his hips as that grasp tugged him a bit closer, digging in his flesh. Another kiss, in that same spot, like it made any sense at all. “Hey,” he heard himself insist, hoarse. Dazai's nails were always cut too clean — he felt them sink in nonetheless, tightening right as his mouth parted on the jagged corner of the scar. The inside of his mouth was wet and warm and too long lasting. “Hey,” he echoed, lost.

Neck aching, he studied the head pressed on his lap. He dragged his thumbs to tuck Dazai's fringe away, leaving only his eyes — looking up at him, never one to be caught by surprise; vacant and horribly bright, underneath fragile eyelashes.

Warmth choked him. Chuuya's jaw went achingly slack at the mere murmur of it.

The ghost of his lips' brush was there all the same, far too close — melted honey on concrete. A suggestion of an inhale on wet skin; the blown up pupils in the gaze Dazai refused to quit clawing his face with.

This is just another poison to him, he knew, abruptly.

All at once, the hands tightened around his waist with the same obsessive grasp Dazai reserved for murder, and hauled — and Chuuya, balance personified and gravity's son, stumbled enough to drop from the third to last step into the second, a tad closer, arms around Dazai's most innocent expression — the starvation in his eyes when they ended up pressed almost closer than they had been underneath that building. He felt Dazai's mind curl around the frustrating thought of, still not enough.

Chuuya felt a bit like he was losing it. He took his hands off his nape — knew it was freezing, when he cradled Dazai's cheek again. He didn't even flinch.

Ask me not to go, he thought, nonsensically. Chuuya would go anyway. He wouldn't. Ask me so I can figure it out.

He met his gaze — bruised with a sadness Chuuya knew nothing about, and plans he didn't get to know, and the blooming realization that they had never been half as equal as he'd stupidly thought — and knew Dazai never would.

If we're doing this partner thing, he'd told him, a thousand years ago, underneath the fake rain of broken pipes. Dazai had broken them himself.

The blues and purples under Dazai's eyes didn't vanish when he ran his thumbs over them; Chuuya felt starved, all of the sudden — glued to the ground in spite of it. He tapped that smooth, sensitive skin until Dazai's eyes closed — let his hands fall like the drying spit from his lips wasn't rising goosebumps on his ribs, still.

But for him, Mori had warned. But for him.

He stepped away. Dazai's nails let go.

"I never left," he informed him, hard. He was on his feet faster than he could realize having decided to; he felt as if he was moving through jelly. "The Arcade's closing anyway."

The boy didn't say a thing.

His gaze was all for the scar. His mouth was parted. Deliriously, he recalled the wet sound of its click against his skin. Chuuya tapped two fingers on his lower lip, fugitive and unblamed, watching him stay curled on those stairs — what if, he thought; and, maybe when I come back; and, never — and turned to climb the stairs like it'd save him from crucifixion.

It'll be normal when I come back, he swore. He'd pretend Verlaine didn't exist. Double Black would play Mori's bidding until they were ash. He would tape Dazai's furniture to the ceiling, and get called dog in a less meaningful way in return. It would all go back to normal, once he came back.

It's all I have, Chuuya thought, distantly. It didn't sound like begging until he burned from it.

"It'll just reopen somewhere else," Dazai spoke up, like an idealistic afterthought.

He set his jaw until it throbbed — looked at his curled up frame over his shoulder. It was still raining. Kouyou still had his coat. "Maybe."

The boy lowered his head, inscrutable. But for a moment, he thought, a bit desperate, tickled by lips that weren't there and the assuredness that it had been easier, at some point, he had been right there. Tanaki had been alive and Verlaine had been dead, and they'd been stuck together by the blood in their insides, and Chuuya hadn't known how to tell him, I'll make them bury you with me so I'll know I won't have to do it myself.

Too soon, he'd told Hirotsu. But — “Maybe not,” Dazai mused.

---

...

---

The first of Verlaine's letters came when he was at the airport, about to board.

“Seriously, what woke his ass up?” he asked Kouyou, huffing, as she fumbled with the scarf she had forced on him. The paper was getting more and more wrinkled in his white-knuckled grasp, as he attempted to focus on the swirling way Verlaine wrote French fs and not feel the pounding flush of rage hammering his ribs. Better reasons to be angry, he reminded himself. Somehow, the letter smelled of lilies. “He's been fine with ignoring my existence for more than three years, and now he wants to play pen-pals?”

Kouyou shrugged, a bit helpless. She didn't quite fit among the crowd of the airport — her kimono attracted the gazes of white tourists, and her general Kouyou-ness had hurried travelers part like the Red Sea to avoid her breathing space.

“I can't say,” she admitted. “He's never — he never outrightly asked to see you. His interest was unmistakable — and just awful, I would like to add — but he never demanded you to be brought to him. Perhaps he always knew it would happen, eventually.”

He rattled his knuckles against the duffel bag on his shoulders, squinting at the arrival times board.

“It's better that you didn't.”

The woman studied him. “Didn't what?”

“Take me to him sooner,” Chuuya forced himself to admit. The scarf she'd used was a bright green, and warm enough to let his hands tremble only from leftover torture spasms. “Boss, I think he knew I would have — if I'd seen him —”

He trailed off. But Kouyou was no stranger to bloodthirst — she tapped two fingers on each of his temples, attempting to smooth over wrinkles. She lowered her head to search his eyes underneath his bent head, eyebrows raised. She smiled — not unkindly, but not patronizingly.

“I’d ask you one word,” she said. “But I feel like we might alert the airport guards.”

He snorted. “What did we buy them off for, then?”

“Because it’s always better to have more than less,” Kouyou reprimanded, easily, tapping his shoe with the tip of her umbrella. Her gaze went a bit distant, as she studied the swarming people around them. “God knows we never seem to escape messes, lately.”

Lately was a broad term — given the most calm and peace Chuuya had had since joining had been the two weeks he’d recently spent in a coma. Still, he frowned. “Am I going to miss something?”

“Nothing too relevant,” she replied. “If it even happens. Mori still has his eyes on Mimic.”

He frowned. “I thought that’d been ruled out as a Special Division’s issue.”

“It had,” Kouyou confirmed, gelid. “Until we found out they’d sent us a spy.”

Chuuya stilled.

“You’re telling me Sakaguchi was —“

Her eyes snapped up to his, startled. “How do you know it was him?”

“I just —“ His head was swimming in ideas he couldn’t focus on. Dazai’s arm around the man’s own, as he dragged him to his office — the glint of his glasses’ as he bowed to Chuuya. Dazai’s hand in his own, as they danced to a music he had already forgotten. But you would think it fair, in the back of your mind. The way he’d stared at the ground of their abandoned, makeshift safe house — a frog in a well, too bored to jump halfway.

If it was your Arcade, he’s said. Then you should have been here.

“Ane-san,” he attempted, feeling jittery all over, “Should I just stay around until —“

“No,” the woman cut him off. “No, don’t be stupid. You’ve promised the men in Rouen your help, you can’t just take it back. It’s nothing we can’t deal with. As cocky as he can be — Mori wouldn’t have sent you away, otherwise.”

He was unconvinced. “But it’s a syndicate we know almost nothing about.”

“That man always knows more than he lets on,” Her smile was a bit tight around the edges. “A trait of devils. I trust him. Don’t you?”

It didn’t feel like an accusation. Kouyou wouldn’t have dared, he knew. Chuuya thought of Hamamoto’s blood on his hands, and Mori’s eyes looking at him.

I’m just a bit worried, he’d admitted.

“Of course,” he offered, at last, frowning. “I — of course. But can you call me if something of actual relevance happens?”

“He’ll call you himself,” she promised. “It might even end up being nothing — a meeting to decide how to proceed, maybe. If Mori is acting as calmly as he is about this, I’m assuming it will all be over by the end of the week. And you’ll be back by then. It will be alright.”

Chuuya nodded, hesitantly. “As long as I don’t come home to another earthquake, I guess.”

For a moment, her knuckles grew white in a clenched grip. She chuckled, though.

Her laughter was a balm on bruises Chuuya knew would have disappeared by then, had he not held a tendency to press them — the curiosity of a child on a webbed glass floor, in love with the creak it made when he jumped on it. Chuuya had never fallen in his life.

He studied the letter — no blood stains, and none of Doc’s notes at the end of a medical prescription. He tried to remember if he’d ever even bothered to learn landing.

Mourning never depended on acquaintance, the letter read. Chuuya had the tickling feeling it had to be a poem, but the concept of Verlaine asking for poetry to be brought to his basement was far too insufferably reasonable. Since they all swore it hurt more than the first sunset, I believed it.

“ — think they might attempt to get more information, before they accept to join,” Kouyou was continuing, as she led him to the Gates. “Well — if they even dare take that step. I’m not sure of just how far that spying job will take them. I’m not sure they’ll want to risk a Mafia execution — not with their daughter in the picture.”

Do not talk to me of grief, the letter insisted. “You mean the Kyoukas?” Chuuya asked.

“Who else,” Her smile turned tight. “Only so much I can concede to them, before they start questioning if the Mafia really is that blind. Had any other potential member stalled like they’ve been doing for the past year, Mori would have locked them in the Under Port.”

“And you won’t?” Chuuya insisted.

“I don’t want them,” Kouyou tutted. Her eyes glinted a tad too starvedly. “I want that little flower of theirs. You’ll like her. She’ll need a new family soon enough. We could train her together — it could be fun.”

He killed Verlaine’s letter in a clenched fist, hiding it in his pocket. He stepped over the line, where Kouyou wasn’t allowed to follow, and let his gloved hand linger on her own — intertwined over her sash, peaceful and unconcerned and weightless. How do you do it, he wanted to ask, like he was just fifteen again — and she was bright and wanted him; whatever that meant — how are you twenty two and alive?

Do not talk to me of grief, the letter insisted. For all I have touched died before I could take my hand back.

Chuuya pulled back.

“Ane-san,” he said, “I’ll be back soon.”

The promise seemed to startle her. Hadn’t he known what to look for, he probably wouldn’t have noticed it — still, her eyelashes fluttered on a breath a tad too shaky to be planned. Her smile turned enigmatic — Kouyou studied his face like a treasure hunt, and she looked twenty two, all of the sudden. It seemed awfully young.

Her hands twitched. She cupped his cheeks for half a blink, fingers slipping down like melted wax, leaving his skin pulsing. “I know,” she swore. He recalled, oddly, the sight of her hands braiding Tanaki’s hair over the marble of her desk. Chuuya wondered, for the first time, whether all the blood ever got to her head too.

“At times,” Kouyou admitted, absently, “It does feel like one of the few things I’m certain of.”

The guards over the metal detectors called for the crowd to move. Announcements echoed through the airport, awakening sleeping travelers and lighting up the yellow lines at his feet. Chuuya dropped his duffel bag to the ground, and threw his arms around Kouyou’s middle, almost pushing her off her feet.

She inhaled on a choked gasp, heart beating only a tad faster against Chuuya’s chest. He closed his eyes, pressing them against her shoulder — felt her hands linger around his scalp, sinking in like they did in corpses to verify their post-mortem.

“Dear,” she said. She only failed at a reprimanding tut by an inch, and he let her get away with it. “Do try to — ah. I can hardly rescue you from a fallen building from all these countries away.”

“You would,” he insisted, muffled by fabric she hated to wear when all wrinkled.

“Obviously. But it would be a bother.”

Chuuya bit down a grin — unexplainably elated.

He rubbed his cheek against her, the way Hikari did when he was hungry and childish — he thought about the way she called him her brother, whenever useful allies wanted to play conversation.

Her never chapped lips mouthed something against the shell of his ear. It took him eons to hear it, surrounded as they were by announcements and voices and metallic squeaks. Eventually, Chuuya watched the chain of his hat dangle in front of his lidded eyes — eventually, he focused on nothing but the death grip of Kouyou’s nails around him, and her oddly wet murmur of, I’m sorry, I’m sorry, I’m so sorry, against his ear.

---

Hirai Kurou directed the movements of all the goods from the Port Mafia's French deals — as such, he lived in the dusty attic of one of ten warehouses in some industrial area of Rouen, and he smelled like car oil and gunpowder.

I apologize for the mess, Executive, he'd said, upon their first meeting, two days ago, covered in a mixture of blood and petrol. It's been — a very busy season.

I'm not — Chuuya had started.

I know, Hirai had interrupted, smiling. But we get all voices, up here. You might as well be.

"The new trafficking laws in Belgium mean sending the trucks from their airports rather than the French ones would save us months of fees," the man explained, as he led Chuuya and Adam to one of the warehouses. Snow cracked underneath their feet; Adam amused himself by munching on gum and loudly announcing the change of temperature on every single step they took. Chuuya had asked him not to listen — it's, uhm, he'd said, for your own moral code; which the android had stuck two fingers in his ears for. "Which means we have to get them there, and fly to Japan from there."

"That sounds reasonable," Chuuya said, as he nodded to the stationed Mafia guards bowing in a half the moment they caught sight of him. "Why did you request support from Yokohama?"

"Colder," Adam said, in the meantime, a few steps back. He still wore his usual suit, no coat or anything of the sorts — he'd still let Chuuya wrap Kouyou's scarf around his neck, politely not mentioning the way he'd turned beetle red when he'd remembered androids couldn't exactly get cold. "Colder. Colder again. Warmer."

Hikai threw Adam another perplexed look. Eventually, as he pulled the doors to one of the warehouses open, he continued: "Our closest base is in Lille — which is convenient, since it's only thirty minutes from the Belgium border."

"And you need help bringing the trucks to Lille?"

"Les Fleurs du Mal have their eyes on us," A shiver rattled the man's back. "We've lost more than three hundred men to their attacks in the last three weeks — they must have camps on the way to Lille. We managed to keep the goods from them, but the latest shipment is going to have them like sharks on fresh blood. Too many Ability Users, and too many men in general — sending you, sir, is probably the wisest decision Boss could take."

The doors opened to an infinite space of warm stone and rusty metal, with wooden support beams that let the almost-winter sun filter in in shattered curtains. Dozens of trucks were parked in rows mere steps from the entrance, filling up the place in a gasoline scent.

Chuuya squinted, hands in his pockets. “What’s this latest shipment?”

“Warmer,” Adam insisted, walking circles near the entrance. His shoulders and head were covered in snow; the fingers stuck in his ears had some soft material wrapped around them — one of the thousand tricks he could get by unscrewing his own hands. “Colder. Warmer. Warmer again.”

Motioning him towards one of the trucks, Hikai led him to the other end of the warehouse.

“You used to run the gemstone trade once, correct?” he told him, as he reached up to open the back doors of the truck.

Blinding, overwhelmingly sizzling blue hit his eyes the moment the doors parted. Chuuya had a hard time seeing anything else, for a moment — the storages the gemstones were kept in, or the old spiderwebs in the corner; the paper listing off the type of stones, plastered on each box, signed off with nothing but lines of ???

“Indicolite,” Chuuya whistled, as even Adam paused to blink at the dazzling show, leaning forward. ““You checked the cut?”

“We’ve been breaking our minds over it for more than a month,” Hikai confirmed. “It’s pure. And worth a lot. We don’t usually deal with blue tourmaline at all — the Mafia has no dealers in Kenya, or Sri Lanka, or in any of the more known territories of origin. We found it in America.”

He raised an eyebrow. “That’s not rare.”

The man rubbed his nape, awkward. “We had some — misconceptions.”

“As in, you never thought about looking for it in America despite the high demand?” Chuuya stared. “I remember sending out orders for it when I still directed the trade. It has been attested that it could be found in some specific locations there. ”

Hikai cleared his throat.

“Master Chuuya,” Adam called, where he was obediently facing the wall, pretending not to be there. “Hirai Kurou’s heartbeat just grew faster. He will lie to you in approximately seven seconds.”

“Is he broken in the head?” the man asked, spluttering.

“He’s just got peculiar hobbies,” Chuuya climbed inside the truck, crouching down to dip a hand in a box of already-shaped tourmaline — an abundance of rotund, sharp-cornered cobalt gems swam between his fingers, catching the light from the sun filtering in. The color reminded him of the Yokohama Bay — of how his own eyes had looked before Arahabaki had burned one of them and covered the other in ash. “I’m gonna take a wild guess — nobody listened to my advice, because I was still the new kid straight from the enemy organization.”

Hikai cleared his throat again. “If it helps, I was the one to recover your document requests to start the research this year.”

Turning his head — Adam directed him a glance. Chuuya raised an eyebrow. He mouthed: stable heartbeat.

He raised one of the gemstones, squinting through the blue to study the mafioso. “So, you want me to guard the travel to Lille?”

“A definitive defeat of Les Fleurs wouldn’t be awful,” Hikai added, bashedly. “But I’ll keep my requests humble. That syndicate sniffs through the gems market like they were born for it. We are honored by your presence alone, sir.”

Chuuya grunted, a bit awkward, throwing the gem back into the storage. He didn’t manage — Hikai jumped on the truck as well, and picked it up before it could land. Hovering it between their palms, he grinned a smile that was the same gray as his aging hair, and said: “Here. You can keep one, as payment.”

He blinked. “I haven’t done anything yet.”

“You will. And let me say — this is one hell of a gift, if you don’t want it for yourself,” The man leaned into his space, wiggling his eyebrows. “Got any prissy superior amenable to charms, who has recently lost a ring?”

Chuuya scoffed, observing the lines of rusty trucks with a critical eye. The transfert wouldn’t take that long — especially not with Adam to help out. He got lost in images of returning home with a newly annihilated organization up his sleeves — he almost forgot to answer.

Scratching the scar in the middle of his chest, he conceded: “Got a partner who did.”

Hikai’s eyebrows touched his hairline. He followed, as Chuuya hopped down from the truck, offering: “That’s some big commitment at your age.”

The scar seemed to itch. For no reasonable explanation, Chuuya recounted the exact number of seconds it had taken for Dazai’s onyx pupils to swallow his eyes. His fingers twitched — he felt belatedly glad not to be holding the stone. “Not that kind of partner.”

Hey, he recalled. Hey.

With a shrug, the man decided to throw it in his hands nonetheless. “Well, you could make a hell of a ring from this. Or something else, if it’s not that kind of partner — I’ve been hearing bolo ties are incredibly in in the East, lately.”

Cyan and emerald flares chased each other through the glassy maze of the gemstone. It was a stunning shade, against the black of his glove — the sort of thing that looked better under the light.

I hate him, he thought about saying. I have done far too much for his sake. What was a gem in the face of blood? What was blood, in the face of the expression Mori had made when he’d said, be careful — what was any of it in the face of Chuuya’s stupidity?

“The asshole’s more of an all black guy,” he concluded.

It took Hikai disappearing, called over by one of his men near another truck, for Adam to finally make his way to him, ears still stuffed. With a wince, he signaled he could lower his fingers — the android did so without skipping a beat, as he leaned down to study the gemstone.

“That is rather valuable,” Adam offered, as the reflected blue flares twirled around the datas in his pupils. “And this color is particularly so.”

“You do odd jobs, you get odd payments,” Chuuya stuck the gem in his pocket, leaning back against the truck doors to study the detective. “You know, you didn’t have to come with.”

For a moment, Adam seemed genuinely offended. It melted from him with the same ease of the various expressions he could do, but rarely let himself make around Chuuya himself. They exist to make sure I fool the humans into trusting me with their lives, he had explained, once. My database is mostly in agreement that you would already let me do that, despite my — eerie vacancy, you called it?

“I don’t think you’re eerie, by the way,” he added, horribly out of context.

Adam didn’t seem to care. “I do not think you’re eerie either, Master Chuuya. And I have fun doing missions with you, when my duties allow it.”

He curled an eyebrow. “You have fun with Master Chuuya’s illegal job?”

“It can’t be illegal if it’s Master’s orders,” the android insisted, with that logic that never left any place for discussion. It made him a terrible, fearsome adversary whenever they played Debate The Cards. “I was programmed to help the world, and you are my Master.”

Suddenly, he felt a bit guilty. “You really shouldn’t override your system for me, you tin can.”

“It’s alright,” Adam gulped down another one of his gums, standing straight. “I liked you. I like you now. Both me and Eve. Actually — she’s learning how to install pipes, as far as I know. She wants to make sure Master Chuuya doesn’t have to keep showering at the neighbors’ whenever you’re staying with us.”

His ears burned so viciously Chuuya felt the need to check if they’d caught fire. Kicking the ground, he muttered: “You guys do know you’re not my parents, right?”

“Of course not,” Adam seemed appalled. “I am your servant.”

He made a face. “Fuck that, you’re not.”

“Well, what are we?”

He thought about it. “Do you want to be best friends?” Chuuya asked — mostly as a joke; echoing what he’d heard Elise say to every doll that Mori had ever conceded to buy her.

Astonishingly, Adam lit up.

“I have checked the definition of best friend in over three hundred and seventy dictionaries,” he informed him, after a few seconds of buzzing. “It is a great show of trust, and it denounces a type of relationship that would certainly be useful, during a mission. It would be my honor to be regarded as such by Master Chuuya.”

He stared. “Alright, wait up —“

The man grabbed him by the waist — it could have been a hug, if he hadn’t decided to pick him up like a sack of flour a second later. Making his way to the entrance, Adam’s more robotic tone informed: “Master Chuuya’s relevant information on the current database has been updated.”

“For fuck’s — Adam, wait —“

---

...

---

“My best friend and I thank you for the journey you are allowing us to share with you,” Adam said, straight as an arrow, bowing to the few rifle-armed guards in front of the last of the trucks. “We will make sure to conduct appropriately, and to help your mission to the best of our abilities.”

The guard exchanged a glance, eyes on the British flag pin on Adam’s chest.

Chuuya sighed.

“Yeah,” he concluded. “What he said.”

As he dragged him inside the truck, the android leaned down, whispering: “You know, my international research motor mentioned friendship bracelets are usually —“

He sighed again.

There usually had to be some justification offered to the passage of more than a dozen trucks down a public highway, in the middle of the night. During his travels to France, Chuuya had learned the to-go method in the country tended to be rather elementary — a few French flags over the front lights of the truck and some shortcuts tended to do the trick.

As they settled between cargo boxes, the heavy doors of their truck were shut. It took the vehicle a moment to roar to life; Chuuya knocked the side of his shoe on the ground, lighting up in a soft shade of crimson that helped Adam sit in the lotus position, gazing up at him with an openness that signaled he would be ready for both horror stories and war debriefs.

Chuuya failed to hold in a snort.

“This is actually sort of thrilling,” Adam let him know, once he sat next to him. “I have both read and watched countless stories about organized crime, but I must say — the Port Mafia never fails to amaze me with their craftiness.”

He winced — Hirotsu’s monologues about letting a metal-made policeman so deep into their affairs ringing in his ears. “Maybe don’t let Wollstonecraft know about all these analyses of yours?”

“She knows I work with you, oftentimes,” Adam offered. “She’s never complained. In fact — she was the one to encourage our collaboration against Verlaine.”

He studied the laces of his shoes. Pulled one of them, frowning at the ground.

“What is it?” the android asked.

The reddish, gentle gleam turned Adam’s face more human — jumping with the occasional bumps of the truck; morphed from squares into lines, until it became nothing but the shadow of blood the detective had never bled. Chuuya had spent so long digging the ground for his remains — only an arm, and the gentle smile people seemed to have a tendency to curse him with before dying, to be accounted for — that most of his nails had fallen off.

Can he even be told?, he wondered. Verlaine had a bounty the Special Division had only been the last to put on his head. Do you owe him loyalty?

“Can you keep a secret?” he asked, because he owed it to the Mafia, nonetheless.

Adam tilted his head, genuinely intrigued by the question. “I am not entirely sure.”

He huffed. “Because your Creator is higher on the list?”

“I owe her every answer she asks of me.”

“Fair,” Chuuya sighed. “Let’s — alright. I’ll make it a hypothetical.”

“My database can work with possibilities. I have a seventy-three percent guessing rate.”

He vaguely felt he should have been more impressed by the notion than he was. The android certainly seemed satisfied. He tapped his pocket — right where the blue tourmaline Hikai had gifted him rested. Something like home sickness had him extract it, tapping two nails on a surface that was almost the same shade of the sky in Yokohama. In the darkness, it reflected Tainted’s light in a purple circle across the walls of the truck.

Focusing on the sound of the engine under his chronically sore thighs, Chuuya dared: “What would happen if Verlaine hadn’t died?”

Adam blinked at him, very slowly.

His suit was never wrinkled. His eyes were never warm. He was comforting, though, in an odd way Chuuya had never managed to explain — he was littered in memories from some of the worst days in his lifetime, and Chuuya wanted to grin a bit whenever his eyes laid on him. He recalled asking him why the Flags had died — only engrossed enough in him to know the inhuman couldn’t lie.

That same machine-like rationality seemed to fail him, that time around. “I imagine,” Adam offered, hesitantly, “That Master Chuuya would feel rather sad.”

Chuuya stared.

“That’s not what I —“

His in-ear creaked to life. “Executive?”

It took him a moment to focus enough to pull his eyes from the detective’s earnest honesty. Clearing his throat, he tapped the in-ear, asking: “Hikai. It’s all clear, for now.”

“That’s — unusual,” Through the statics and the closer sound of the engine, from whatever passenger seat Hikai was playing guard from, his tone seemed unconvinced. “I don’t know if I like it. We’ve had issues with leaks of information, lately — if someone’s let Les Fleurs know about your presence, they might have geared up accordingly.”

He tapped the gemstone again, rolling his neck back to crack it. “That’s alright,” he assured. “They never gear up enough, when I’m involved.”

Hikai huffed a half laugh.

By the time the in-ear had died down again, Chuuya had no time to turn a stunned expression on Adam again — he was blocked by the fingers the android used to pinch the burnt strand of his hair, curiously eyeing the freshly ashy edges. “Did you get in an accident?”

“No,” Chuuya replied, after a moment. It didn’t seem like Adam had anything to add to their previous conversation. “I never told you about the Mafia’s funerary customs?”

The man laid his chin on his hands, shaking his head. “Eve finds funerary customs particularly intriguing,” he offered, instead. “In her free time, she likes to attend funerals.”

“How charming.”

“Androids aren’t born. Not exactly. They don’t die, either. I believe she’s more interested in grief, though — the same way I’m interested in humans,” Adam shrugged. It was a staggeringly casual gesture — one that reminded Chuuya more of himself than any of the detective’s habits. He felt his lips curl up. “Why does the Mafia burn your hair when somebody dies?”

He snorted, throwing the tourmaline in the air — watching it float inches from his face, blue and beautiful. “It’s not the Mafia,” he corrected, discounting his hat with a motion. “Or, well — you do it yourself, when someone you care about passes away. It’s a way to... I don’t know. Show that they had an impact on you. Humans are fussy about their appearances, you know?”

Adam nodded, fascinated. “Did you do it for your friends?”

“Sure.”

“And now?”

The truck jerked forward, pushed by some hole in the concrete. Chuuya kept his eyes on the gemstone. “This friend of mine,” he offered, a tad curt. “And — my subordinate. You know, Kouyou once told me that the burnt hair is meant to be more of a reminder for yourself than an offering.”

“A reminder?” he echoed.

“I am alive,” Chuuya quoted. Vaguely, he could remember her stark frame behind his own — examining his work on the Flags’ burnt strand. “I can be turned into ash, still.”

“Memento mori,” Adam recited, solemnly.

He raised his eyebrow. “Alright, professor.”

“Is that your only tradition?”

“We don’t bury our dead, if it counts.”

That seemed to take him aback. “That is — unlike most traditions Eve has researched. Why is that?”

Chuuya came up short. “Well,” he tried, as he let the tourmaline drop in his hands again. His mind wandered — the sick cobalt under Dazai’s sleepless eyes; the nail shaped bruises he’d found on the small of his back. I lost it, he’d told him. In the grand scheme of things, your grief —

“When you live in the Mafia, you die in the Mafia. Something like that. It started long before Boss was Boss. It’s — you know, I’m actually thinking I could —“

The truck jerked forward again.

It was distinctly more vicious. If not for the tears of Tainted stuck to his skin, Chuuya would have fallen onto Adam’s lap. Sticking the gem in his pocket, he hissed: “What the hell —“

Feet — hefty enough to bend the metal in two knee-deep alcoves — landed on the roof.

“Oh,” Adam blinked, as the vehicle almost screeched to a halt, immediately restarting a run in the wrong direction. “Master Chuuya, I think Les Fleurs Du Mal have arrived.”

He grinned, climbing to his feet. “Up for some more thrilling experiences, Adam?”

“Quite,” The android barely had time to say, before the doors were blown off the hinges — whipping them with the merciless wind from the ink-painted highway. His smile reminded him of himself. “And should Master Wollstonecraft ask, I have done nothing but faithfully assist the man she assigned me to years ago.”

Chuuya laughed, right as he stuck one of the gemstones from the cargo boxes through one of the criminals’ chest — calling it back into the box with a hiss.

Les Fleurs Du Mal wore blood red clothes, entangled with climbing ropes and tolls that made their affiliation to the gemstone market clear. Their balaclavas covered everything but stunningly mean spirited eyes — pairs that dimmed just a bit once Chuuya climbed to the top of his moving truck, turning every reachable surface into a shining mine field of scarlet intention.

He lost sight of Adam somewhere by the third man whose rope he’d severed — ripping the screaming enemy off the trees framing the highway. Vaguely, he heard the buzz of his secret weapons detach from his body, followed by some sort of interesting information on the gemstone market — offered in that content, calm tone of his.

“This isn’t —“ A coughing woman under his fists wheezed, as he held her skull mere inches from the edge of the truck he’d slammed it on. “It — you weren’t supposed to —“ “Surprise,” Chuuya offered, before kicking her off the roof.

The vehicles hadn’t stopped moving — no matter the projectiles Les Fleurs were steadfastly shooting through the drivers’ windows — which meant, Chuuya hoped, that he was hopping just fast enough between trucks to take them out. He hooked his feet over the edge of one of the first vans in the scattering, accelerating rows, and tilted backwards to sink his hand in the concrete.

“—xecutive!” Hikai screamed, over the roar of the wind, just loudly enough that Chuuya could hear him through his car window. “We’ll crash — ten of our guards have been wounded —“

“I’m sacrificing one truck,” Chuuya let him know, squinting at the jumping crimson silhouette he could only see through Tainted’s light. “You and your driver need to jump when I say so.”

“What?”

The three trucks rushed closer and closer — just enough for their front lights to blind him. Chuuya breathed in, once, counting. “Jump.”

“Executive —“

His hand let go. “Jump now!”

The explosion seemed to echo across the entirety of the valley the highway was sunken in — a masterpiece of orange and golden, wrecking all across the scorching air with the might of a sunset. Chuuya flew so high he felt clouds between his fingertips, watching bubbles of debris and fire spread across the concrete — and then turning to follow the horrified screeches surrounding him, from the floating trucks Tainted was hovering by his side.

“What the fuck!” One of the drivers let out, scrambling to stay in his seat when the door was torn open. Chuuya hid a grin — instead, he ripped a piece of road that had gotten stuck to his shoe, and sent it flying like a bullet to the Fleur hanging by the tip of his fingers from the edge of one of the trucks.

He fell into the sea of flames with a scream, joining the companions Chuuya had made sure not to let Tainted touch.

“We didn’t even discover their Abilities,” Adam shouted, mostly untouched, from where he was perched over the roof of one of the trucks. “It is a bit of a disappointment.”

Like a jinx — the flames underneath them seemed to tremble, circling like a vortex.

Before Chuuya could curse, or focus on rendering the trucks even lighter to make sure the snake-like column of flames wouldn’t touch the wheels — the unmistakable sound of statics ripped a hole in the shell of his ear, much louder than any of Hikai’s calls had been.

“ — not sure if this is quite — “ The voice from the in-ear questioned, familiar enough to almost drop the vehicles from his gravity-grip. “Ah — Chuuya, can you hear me?”

“Boss?” Chuuya snapped, speechless.

“Oh, how ingenious,” the doctor said, not a worry in the world. “Unsurprising. Dazai was right about the leaked encrypted line. Chuuya, I hope your mission has been going well? We all miss you a lot.”

The column of fire was hauled forward like a whip, all of the sudden — it wrapped around one of the trucks, startling screams out of the men in the boot. Chuuya hopped onto the roof quicker than even his brain could catch up with, sinking his palms in the minimal space underneath that living flame — he cursed at the burns, digging the metal until the grasp of the column became far too wide, allowing him to throw the now-free truck a field away through the night sky.

“I’m a bit busy, Boss!” Chuuya called, eyes on the metallic ropes Adam was cleverly roping the vehicles together with — dragging them over in far enough directions for the Ability’s fire whip to hesitate, confused. “Can I contact you later —“

“Oh, this will be very quick, I assure you,” Mori insisted. There was a low, indistinct murmur behind his voice — a mixture of voices Chuuya only belatedly recognized as a meeting. “Kouyou let you know I would only contact you if it was an emergency, correct?”

Chuuya froze.

“Is Mimic — “

“Not yet,” the man reassured him. “But we are at a point where a decision has to be taken. You see — I do have a plan to deal with them before they can cause us more issues. Lord knows it is past the time for us to intervene. Poor Akutagawa was almost —“

“What?” Flames brushed his side, leaving him with shivering goosebumps — and enough anger to rip an useless structure off one of the trucks, and fling it into the blurred silhouette on the road. “Is he alright?”

Mori chuckled. “Don’t worry, he is. But the Executives are at a bit of a stalemate — your vote would be more than helpful.”

He landed on one of the trucks, panting. “I’m not an Executive.”

“Chuuya,” the man insisted, as if nothing could have bothered him less. “Do you trust me to deal with this?”

The world was a blurred bundle of things — the incessant, horrified screams from the men in the vehicles, as some of them shakingly attempted to direct their rifles to the invisible threat among the fires; Adam’s silhouette, too fast to follow, as he recovered falling mafiosi; the pulsing heart of it all, because that was how Tainted worked, stuck inside Chuuya’s fingertips and bones like another being. Mori’s voice. Mori’s trust. He had to ask for more information — he wasn’t even sure what they were talking about.

“Deal with what?” he managed, on his way to the ground, landing among smoke thick enough to tickle his throat. He turned, looking for a man or a woman in red, directing the flames — over his head, thousands of skyscrapers away, the trucks trembled like constellations.

Mori’s amusement filtered through the white noises — as stable as his smile had been in that ballroom, celebrating the nonexistent. Mori always knows, Dazai had sworn.

“With Mimic, of course,” he said. “And, if everything goes as it should — with that boring matter of the Ability Permit too, soon.”

That, at last, got Chuuya to pause.

War raged around him. It had never quite escaped him that the Permit was a responsibility on all of Mori’s inner circles’s shoulders — but a tad more on his own, ever since spying through the slot of the man’s office door had revealed a barter Chuuya had never really explained to himself.

You are valuable, Kouyou had only offered, when he’d confessed. Some things can be regained. At the very least, you’re sure to help gain them.

“Master Chuuya!” Adam called, from one of the trucks. His distraction had allowed the fire whip to wrap around two of the vehicles — as they got pulled down, Chuuya barely had time to think before he slammed his foot on the road, cracking the air with gravity-lined electricity.

The night sky glowed crimson. He jumped up, eyes frantically searching the explosion — his eyes found a running pair of legs.

“—uuya?” Mori was insisting. “I really am sorry to bother you, but if we want to move on —”

“Yes,” Chuuya cut him off, squinting at the vanishing black silhouette. “Boss — if you have a plan — if you think it’s our best shot, I —”

A hiss passed through the flames.

He pounced.

The wet, squelching sound of the User’s viscera between his fingers was far too loud among the dying fire whip — falling from the sky like a dying cobra, disappearing in gorgeous flares against the firmament — for him to hear what Mori said in response. He only caught the end of it, blood drooling from his gloves as he carefully began to direct the floating trucks to a still-intact area of the highway.

“— grateful,” the Boss offered, in between statics. Helicopters would arrive soon, Chuuya knew. They had to hurry out of there. “I will talk to you more when you return next week. It really is a shame your departure got prolonged. I will leave you to it, then.”

Chuuya was a bit out of breath. He met Adam’s waving arm; tiredly offered a nod. “Yes, Boss. Good luck.”

“We shall certainly need it. See, Dazai,” the man continued, over the white noises of the encrypted line he was turning off. From one of the trucks, Hikai leaned so far out of his car window — his victory whoop! almost flung him out into the sky. “See, I told you this could be —”

---

...

---

The mafiosi stationed in Lille had a hotel room prepared for him and Adam — a suite of old furniture, reminiscent of Rimbaud’s house, and bathed in the golden light of the first sunset.

Hikai — welcomed in after a single knock, and sporting a limp — found him sitting on the wooden table at the dead center of it, studying the cracked screen of his phone.

“Shame,” he said, nodding towards the device. “We can get you a new one, sir.”

Chuuya shrugged. “You should have seen the last one.”

The sound of Adam’s turned on shower from the bathroom filled the silence — heavy, but not exactly awkward. Hikai studied him with the same uncannily starstruck expression he’d worn since he’d first stepped into the warehouse — if he cared about the insistent sound of water, far too intense to be a realistic shower, he didn’t show it.

I do have to keep up appearances, Master Chuuya, he had told him, more than an hour ago. Chuuya regretted never having a talk about certain human behaviors with him.

Water drops from his own shower dribbled from the tips of his drenched hair, landing on the cracked skin. His inbox was mostly empty, apart from unresponded invitations from the Guerrilla members he usually went to drink with — and a very peculiar text from Kajii, reading only, sorry about the lemon tree.

Dazai’s messages box stared back at him.

“I wanted to thank you, sir,” Hikai started — only a bit sheepishly. “On behalf of the squad. And we ask your forgiveness, if we didn’t, ah — keep calm, exactly, during your intervention.”

He snorted. “S fine. Probably weren’t quite expecting the floating shitshow.”

“It was clever.”

“It worked,” He shrugged. “That’s all.”

The man’s smile turned tight — but not unkindly. It was hard to figure out how old he might have been; between wrinkles and something ancient in his eyes, he could have been Hirotsu’s age or Kajii’s, and yet passed as neither. “You truly are just as the stories describe you.”

Chuuya raised his eyebrows. “And how do the stories describe me?”

Shaking his head, Hikai offered a gentler expression. “No matter. ‘You kept the gemstone?’”

Instinctively, he pressed on the bulge in his borrowed pants’ pocket — old Sheep lessons, that never failed to remind him just how easy it was to have something stolen from his pockets. Vaguely, he wondered how the work in Suribachi was proceeding. He’d have to visit soon. “I’m not about to refuse an offer of gratitude,” Chuuya said. “It was unnecessary, but I’m not stupid.”

“No, not at all,” the man agreed.

He squinted. From behind the bathroom door, Adam offered his best impression of some very out of tune singing under the shower. “But I’m still not entirely sure the mission is the only reason why you gave it to me.”

Hikai sighed. “I just — I wanted to thank you personally, too. It’s just one gem among many. The accounting books won’t be maimed in any way.”

Tilting his head, he waited.

“Hamamoto was my cousin.”

Untouched for too long, the message inbox faded into a black screen. It was only the spasm of Chuuya’s thumb — horribly startled and cursed to a permanent shake — that lit it up again.

Dazai’s name stared at him from the top of the screen. It felt mocking. It felt like nothing at all.

“Oh,” Chuuya said.

“Voices travel fast,” Hikai hurried to say, as he cleared his voice, perhaps taking his silence as an accusation. Chuuya found no words to tell him he was only half wrong. “It’s — it was confusing. At first it was news about a death during a mission, and then it turned into accusations of betrayal and attempted coup d’etat — and then we received news that someone had insisted for Hamamoto not to be buried, according to our costumes. For him to die as — not as a traitor,” Something wet stuck to the last sounds out of Hikai’s mouth; he cleared his throat again, standing straighter. Bowed. “I just wanted to thank you, sir. For doing that for him.”

He looked at him in silence.

“You shouldn’t,” Chuuya said. His lips felt anesthetized. He was numb and so, so used to it all. “I’m the one who executed him.”

If Hikai flinched, he didn’t see it.

“Then I thank you even more,” he swore, still bowing. He wanted to walk over to him and rattle him — wanted to wipe the awe out of his tone and his eyes. That User’s flares were beautiful too, he imagined himself insisting, and they hurt some of your men anyway, didn’t they? “You killed him, and yet you cared enough to go against the rules for him anyway. Hamamoto has always been a good kid. I’m — I’m glad someone saw it, despite his mistakes. A gemstone is nothing, compared to that. Only something a good man deserves.”

Dazai’s message inbox blinked. Only for a moment, he thought he saw him type.

It was gone in a beat. Chuuya flexed his hands, studying the wrinkled fabric of the gloves — recalled the unmistakable, sticky sensation of blood. Recalled Hamamoto’s eyes — the smell of gasoline. ‘You really going to make me do this?’, he had asked, feeling so angry it had turned into the hunched spine of exhaustion.

I’m not going to make you do anything, his subordinate had sworn. You’re always the only one who does it.

“Thank you, then,” Chuuya concluded. It mixed with the vomit in his throat. He gulped it down, like blood and best intentions, and that was it. “I’ll make sure one of those gets it.”

Hikai laughed, like it was a joke.

He didn't notice him leaving the room. He hardly paid attention to Adam's review of the — as he called it — human showering experience, and all about it he had every intention of letting Eve know for her studies. Chuuya offered him a grin when the man ruffled his hair, very surgically, like all the instructions he'd received had fallen flat; watched him sit on his bed and fall in that strange state of absence he usually entered upon rebooting.

Don't call it that, Adam had once replied, as offended as an android could possibly be. That's not accurate at all.

"You should sleep," the android called — in that echoey tone he got during the process. "We have to be back in Paris by tomorrow, if you want to take the rest of Les Fleurs out."

Dazai's contact stared back at him. Chuuya let his thumb hover over the calling option. Let it fall, watching the screen turn off on its own — the same funerary finality of a lost race.

It'd go back to normal, Chuuya recalled. All he had to do was return home.

"Yeah," He jumped off the table — pressed his feet on the ground, reminding himself of what gravity he hadn't stolen felt like. "Good night."

---

...

---

No other news about Yokohama reached him, for the rest of the week he spent in France — no letters from Verlaine; no hacked encrypted lines and no secret messages through those sycaries that Hirotsu seemed to have hidden in every corner of the globe. The sole mention of the name Mimic caused most French criminals to wince — Chuuya thought about asking Adam, and then thought better of it. Despite it all, it was better to keep the Mafia's aims as hidden as possible.

"It's fine," He waved Adam off, when the man attempted to ask after his jittery pensiveness. "They can handle this. I'll know soon enough."

The android did nothing but nod. Both his forefingers twitched, though. Chuuya — cursed with observancy and the same spasms, whether manmade or not — pretended not to know they existed to point Chuuya out as a liar.

---

...

---

“Take care,” Hikai told him, on his last day. He tapped his pocket, pressing oddly into his space — only to make sure the gem was still there. “And throw a flower or two in the Bay for me, would you?”

---

...

---

Chuuya came home to an empty airport.

It didn’t bother him as much as it might have in any other season. He made his way through the bustling midnight crowd with lidded eyelids and a renowned interest for its people — one that always seemed to return after even a single day outside of Yokohama. The city never changed at all — not when Chuuya’s eyes got burned and not when his skin got torn open; not when Shirase called him a traitor and not when the last of the Flags’ ashes touched the Bay.

“Welcome,” one of the guards near the entrance greeted, opening the glass doors for him. Chuuya was half confused by it, until the man handed him a flier. “Enjoy your stay, sir.”

Celebrate a brand new December, this year!, the tourist trap brochure informed him, in bold golden letters. He snorted, studying the cartoonish rendition of Yokohama’s tourist attractions, as he stepped over the rows of parked cars. It was far too early for the holidays — but Chuuya could already imagine snow-lined streets and lights, and the funnily confused face Hirotsu would make upon receiving a gift. Come to Yokohama!

His phone rang.

“Yes, yes,” Chuuya huffed, crumpling up the flier to throw it in the nearest garbage can. His car was at the edge of the nearest parking line; he scrolled down the missed calls from his flight, and pressed ANSWER.

“I told you I’d call you as soon as I landed,” he insisted, before Kouyou could utter a word. “In case you forgot, that usually means waiting for me to land. And what’s with all the emails, anyway? ‘S been a while since they hounded me like that. I can’t have missed another financial fraud case —“

“Chuuya,” the woman said. “Listen.”

Her tone was unfathomable. He frowned, skipping over the last of a row of motorcycles, kicking one foot on the nearest wheel of his car — an old ritual Albatross had taught him, to check on possible malfunctions from lack of use.

Really, the man had insisted, most things tend to act up unexpectedly, when they’re left alone for too long.

“Oi,” Chuuya pulled the driver door open. “Is everything —“

The world turned golden.

It was sudden enough not to make a sound — nothing but the screeching, never ending shriek of mechanical white noises, trailing down his ears along to the warm blood of a head wound. The concrete of the airport’s parking lot pressed against his skull, blurring his vision a tad more with every blink he dared to take — unable to move his lips enough to curse, he squinted at the glass of the real world, attempting to focus on the pillar of flames arising from his car.

A bomb, his slowed-down brain realized, belatedly. Distant steps and faraway screams — airport guards and concerned travelers, all of it just as muffled as the goosebumps on his skin.

“—uuya?” Kouyou’s voice called, from the shattered phone a stone-throw from him. There was a palpable, hysterical concern in her voice that Chuuya couldn’t understand. What’s she so scared about?

Something too close to his face was too hot; Chuuya batted it away from his cheek, until he realized it was a piece of his own hair — he clasped it between two hands, inhaling the leftover smoke.

He crawled on all fours, blinking — eyes stuck on the dangling chain of his hat.

“Chuuya — are you —“

Attempting to stand did nothing. Chuuya fell back on his ass, barely held by his palms — he stared at his burning car, its flares curling like claws and its metal parts circling him like dying sharks.

Through the burning skeleton of the vehicle, a piece of black fabric fluttered along to the November wind; turning into ash as quickly as the screaming guards attempted to get to him. Concussed or not — targeted or almost; attempting to fuse Kouyou’s voice and her intentions into something sensible — he realized that he could have never failed to recognize it.

Chuuya tried to stand. He fell, again. He stayed down.

A few steps from him, warped by flames and melting metal, his car got reduced to ashes, and Dazai Osamu's coat burned with it.

Chapter End Notes

chuuya: verlaine i dislike you vividly but you need to leave this basement before the cockroaches mistake you for food verlaine: arthur used to call me verlaine chuuya: cause that's your fucking name

hello there!! the homoeroticism was heavy in this one huh? difficult scene to write, but again, one of the first ones i ever planned for this fic. i hope you guys liked the chapter as a whole — there was definitely a lot to juggle, and that final scene... you guys don't know how much blood sweat and tears i wasted on that. god. i hope it was good enough!!!

and verlaine!! oh my god verlaine!! this isn't the last we see of him, but i hope what we got was good enough for (what i feel was) a long wait for his appearance!!

and one of my favorite fun facts from canon — how come the fact that the executives had a meeting to decide what to do about mimic, before oda died, isn't discussed more in fandom/fanfics? i really like the idea (and what it could mean when we consider chuuya canonically wasn't around during dark era, whether or not dazai would view his missing vote/agreeing vote as a "betrayal" of sorts). hope you guys liked my twist on it!

next chapter will be the last chapter, which is kinda the most insane sentence i've ever typed down here. i'm saving up my soliloquies for the last comment, but let me say this now — if you're still reading this 700k words in, and if you still like it, i owe you my life and more. this has genuinely been such a big part of my life for years, i'm happy for whatever bit of love you've been showing to it <33 as always, thank you for reading <3 i hope you have a wonderful day, week, night, and everything, and i'll see you soon!!

<333

than a dog.

Chapter Notes

and for the last time... see you at the end ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---

chapter xxxvi.

---

one day you will look at me, laughing because my face is too pale,
blown by the november wind,
like fig leaves or something, like an abandoned dog.

truly that's how it seems to be:
i may be more wretched than a dog, perhaps;
i myself occasionally thought that way,
i myself might have sorrowed.
in spite of all that you will again remember,
in the time when I am not, on the day when i am no longer on this earth, that man, that time, at that point on that road, pale-faced, like fig leaves, blown by the wind
— it was a cold afternoon —

disconsolate, abandoned like a dog.

[cloudy autumn, 1. nakahara chuuya]

---

Port Mafia Encrypted Line.

Recording — 10.355.78.9

To: All.

*[...] as far as it must concern, Dazai Osamu has been declared a traitor. Nonoverridable orders are to capture him upon sight. He may be maimed in the effort, but not killed. He is to be brought to the Boss' presence as soon as possible — once found, his death will be executed under the solemn traditions of our honorable syndicate.
Should any members of the syndicate fail to capture him after a direct encounter, they will be punished. Any and all members suspected of collaborating or aiding his escape will be executed in his stead. We [...]*

Recording [...] [...?]

---

...

---

“Dazai’s always been good at cutting loose.”

At some point during its way to Chuuya’s penthouse, a bird had perched on top of Hirotsu’s Camaro, and left a stain on the passenger window. It cut the Yokohama roads behind it, unmistakably fake — abruptly pulling him out of any illusion to be looking at the world as it was. There is no point in comparing, one of Verlaine’s letters had read. He had a tendency to write like he held no doubts that Chuuya would not be reading. Proving him right felt both aggravating and necessary. He never did. It isn’t real and it isn’t fake. It is merely a mistake.

Chuuya browsed through the dossier in his lap. He didn’t offer a rebuttal — not until Hirotsu’s lips parted again: “We both know no one in the Mafia can find him.”

“You want to be the one to tell Boss that?” he asked, distractedly, eyes on the ink. He glanced up at the swarm of Tainted-glowing papers, floating all around him. “What the fuck,” he added, teeth gritted, “Is a Surveillance Task C77OK?”

Hirotsu winced. “Top secret.”

“What fucking secret,” he muttered. “Who the fuck made him the only secret keeper.”

The man couldn’t argue.

Paperwork had been miserably endless for the past year, since the Mafia had taken over most of the city’s affairs — he would have marveled at how much worse it had managed to get in a mere two days, had his own irritation hammered his temples less whenever he focused on it.

“Do you think he used the tunnels?”

No, Chuuya almost answered, instinctively. There was no easy way to call the Demon Prodigy a coward — but he knew. And he knew what the man wouldn’t say out loud — do you think he built them for this?

No, he insisted. He was either going to leave on a sudden thought or never at all.

All the careful talks had gotten to his nerves far too soon. “Maybe,” he offered, absently.

Some cars honked, uselessly. The lack of any muttering radio was awfully evident — but neither of them made any move to turn it on. The afternoon had painted the sky in soft gray tinges, mixing with unreflecting skyscrapers and colorless umbrellas. A comforting scent in its own way — acid and metallic, perfectly bundled through the tip tap of raindrops on every available surface; insistent enough to assure a long lasting storm.

Tip tap, it insisted. Tip tap. He watched a raindrop fall from the top of his window.

The weather had been the only reason why Chuuya had accepted Hirotsu’s car lift — Tainted worked just fine under the rain, but the hustle was hardly worth it.

In any case, he had to get a new car.

Like clockwork, Hirotsu glanced at the rear view mirror. “Is the wheel —“ “Fine,” Chuuya interrupted.

“It got perforated. Multiple times.”

“Perhaps, if you hadn’t driven us through a shootout —“ He set his jaw. He couldn’t see the man through the storm of papers; he could feel the chastization in the silence, though. “Sorry. I just don’t get how they managed to track us.”

The quiet lasted some movements of the window wipers more — creaking and old; rubber against undeterred raindrops. “The anti-tracking systems are attached to our cars’ GPS,” the man let him know, eventually. “But Dazai was the one to code them. The Intelligence is still figuring out how to access them again. Until then —“

He clenched the dossier so tight, it ripped at the corners.

Typical, the back of his skull tutted. When Chuuya got distracted by the sea of paperwork, it almost sounded like Verlaine. It pulsed like a head wound. Typical, still — it was all inevitable and it was all Dazai’s fault.

Hirotsu glanced his way, searching through two particularly crowded pages of information. In the slot, he looked painfully blank; he watched him rub his temples. “Hangover?” he asked, slowly.

Chuuya grunted.

“I picked you up at the Arcade.”

It wasn’t a question, but the confusion was more than clear. “The Arcade was shut down,” Chuuya informed him, pulling his legs closer, before the dossier in his lap could fall. “I was at Beatrice’s old place.”

The Commander’s eyebrows brushed his receding hairline.

“Nine Rings’ Beatrice?” he echoed.

“That one.”

A beat. “Why?”

He stretched in the minimal space, trying to figure out if the lines of numbers in front of him were meant to be more than an attempt to look clever. I plant tricks so I don’t lull myself from boredom, he remembered Dazai saying — and then he stopped remembering, promptly. “She’s got a literal wall of unopened Petrus bottles. Let me tell you — that stuff’s worth the eye of the head. Had myself a nice old celebration, since the entire organization has decided to pointlessly mourn our freedom.”

Hirotsu was silent for a long time.

“If you wanted to join you could have just answered my calls,” Chuuya huffed, distantly, eyes still on the ink. “Kajii was going to come, but then his car got tracked halfway to —“

“Chuuya,” the man said, very gently.

He paused.

The windshield wipers fell mechanically. It was an awful screech — rendered a bit screechier by the play-doh that had been stuck to the sticks months ago. He vaguely had the time to think, and the old man didn't take them off, yet?, before stony refusal settled on his shoulders.

“Don’t be a fucking idiot,” he ordered, very casually.

Hirotsu shut his mouth.

“This will be more than convenient for us,” Chuuya insisted, even as his brain demanded him to halt. “Can you imagine the stress-free work environment we’re about to experience? Can you imagine the peace? No more dead fish in the vents and no more fake coordinates to missions. If we’re lucky, the abnormal amount of viruses that motherfucker’s left in our systems will be wiped out by the end of the year. I am nauseous with glee — and you fools are wasting time being all moody and shit. Seriously —“

Abruptly, he got the feeling that Kouyou would have been rather disapproving of that outburst.

“Seriously,” he concluded.

You say more with what you don't say, she would have crooned, and if you don't say anything at all, you've said everything. And Chuuya would have scoffed — so she’d have tapped his chin and said, Chuuya.

The Commander was still quiet.

With a static-lined hum, the in-ear the man had abandoned on the dashboard came to life. It rumbled a bit, muttering intelligible words over the buzz of the heating system; then, the familiarly vacant tone of the syndicate-spread announcement recited, for the hundredth time: “— a traitor. Non-overridable orders are to capture him upon sight. He may be maimed in the effort, but not —“

Chuuya studied the rain-lined windshield, munching on disintegrating teeth. All is inevitable and all, he reminded himself, is his fault. Kouyou tutted, nails piercing his under-skin — quiet, dear.

He shut the dossier, louder than a gunshot and only somewhat less bloodied. Abandoned it on the dashboard. “Good riddance.”

---

...

---

Surprisingly, Hirotsu left him by the doors of the meeting room, and didn't step in.

"Top secret," he echoed, with a small smile that had nothing humorous in it. Funerary silence slipped underneath the doors, curling around the puffs of cold air from their mouths. Every inch of the Headquarters was quiet. Tanaki's desk was still unoccupied. "Enough voices are being spread around. Last thing Boss needs is to worry about too many bodies in the room that's supposed to fix this mess."

Chuuya pulsed with something. It wasn't quite aggravation — it was too sharp to be anger. "This isn't a mess," he said — and if he focused very, very hard, it didn't even sound like begging. "This is a long term prank, and you all need to stop treating it as a mastermind's coup d'etat."

A beat. "You think he's coming back?"

"I think he has no interest in bringing us down with him," he scoffed. The apocalypse — if the whispers from non-existent bunkers and shaky foundations were to be trusted, and that was the end of the world — had been nothing but terribly slow. "Not now, at least."

The Commander didn't speak for a bit. "How do we know he's down?"

I believe he and I understood each other more than you ever wished to attempt to understand me, Verlaine's latest letter had mused. It had been the only announcement Chuuya had received that even the Secret Executive knew of the Mafia's latest scandal. You and I are innately the same. I think that partner of yours might just be built wrong.

The doors parted with creaking woods and a familiar hiss — Chuuya gripped the doorknob. "No other place he can go from here."

---

...

---

Chuuya was made Executive on a Thursday morning, with Dazai's river-soaked corpse on the table — like the first order of business of the day.

"Ah, Chuuya," Mori called, from the head of the table — polite smile and eyes so distracted it was a wonder they were still in his skull. He raised a hand right as he bowed, and paused him before he could pull Dazai's empty chair from his right. Chuuya's newly carved tattoo burned with sweat and something like disappointed expectations. "Not that one, if you could."

A strange tension seeped through.

"For when he comes back," the man added, belatedly. "Of course."

Strident like a broken chord, the sudden thought of that possibility almost had him fracture the seat between his fingers. "I'm not sure that will happen, Boss."

"Not now, no," Eerie to the bone, his lips stayed curled. Mori was far too meticulous to be insane. But he's a doctor, Shirase had protested, once, during one of their now weekly calls. "Certainly not."

"Of course," Ace concurred.

"Obviously," Kouyou echoed.

He waited. The man didn't even falter.

Kouyou's eyes were stuck to the body at the center of the wooden table. Her fingers twitched — like the idea of poking it couldn't settle between funny and useless. Next to her, Ace studied the red lights on the ceiling, stiffened and clawed. Mori did nothing but smile.

His grip on the backrest loosened. "Boss," he conceded, settling in the chair next to it — the one that technically belonged to his brother.

"Well," Intertwining his hands under his chin, Mori offered, pleasurably, in the aftermath of that relentless silence: "While congratulations are in order, I hope you will allow me to move them to a more suitable time. We should get started."

The crimson neons whirred and hummed. Chuuya studied the dossiers in front of him until his eyes grew tired of that throbbing nothingness — he raised them, and met Dazai's dead face.

"A fake," Mori said, after a bit. There was a jitteriness to him that reminded him of Elise, oddly — the heartbrokenness of a beloved broken toy and a stained dress. "Obviously."

It was an awfully well done rendition — it wasn't clear if the doctor was impressed or just a bit offended by it. Somebody had ripped out most of the body's clothes; leaving him in a drenched dress shirt and pants curling across bluish, swollen knees. Chuuya studied the crumbling fabric like it might allow him to stall — then remembered there was nothing to escape from, and poked the fake Dazai's cheek with one gloved finger. The motion settled his head a bit straighter. Mori flinched as if shot.

The wet skin was smooth and bloated, like most drowned bodies Chuuya had ever dealt with; the undone curtain of hair stuck to his forehead was braided with dried blood from a slimy cut by his temple. All of him was turning sickly white — disintegrating near the limbs.

“I do hope you aren’t suggesting trying to sell a corpse off to our men,” Kouyou said, at last.

“That wouldn’t be wise,” Mori replied. “It brings us no honor — shows no repercussions for betrayal. No, they found this near the port.”

Dazai’s corpse didn’t speak.

Foot tapping the ground impatiently, Chuuya let out, brusque: “So the underground knows.”

“And they’re trying to claim his death,” Ace scoffed, eyeing the flaccid hand by his dossiers with unbridled distaste. “Moles, again? I thought we’d be done with that after Tanaki’s fire show.”

Over the bridge of the wrinkled, decaying skin of that fake Dazai’s face, Kouyou met his eyes. She shook her head, jaw clenched.

“I hardly think it’s a matter of spies,” Mori sighed, pulling out a dossier from under the body’s back. It squelched so loudly the room seemed to hush with it — water stains on the red cover of the file didn’t seem to bother the man, who opened it just to situate it where Dazai’s vitreous eyes would not look at him. Whoever had worked on him had removed most of the bandages; Chuuya’s nails fell by the unwinded loops on his wrist, and ached. “It is too precise of a work, given the suddenness. No syndicate we’ve quarreled with could manage it. Luckily, I think we know of someone who could.”

A chest wide picture was thrown onto the corpse’s chest, where all the Executives could lean forward to study it. It was unnecessary — the first glance had Chuuya dig hands into his chair to keep Tainted where it was.

“Sakaguchi,” he concluded, staring down at the absent look behind the man’s glasses.

“Think the Special Division is trying to get us?”

“Either that, or Dazai asked them to.”

Chuuya stared.

“It’s not improbable,” Kouyou reminded him — lips curling up in what would have been a smile, if less antagonistic. “A Mafioso who runs is no Mafioso — it wouldn’t surprise me, if he had no loyalty to keep him from hiding between our enemies’ gowns. And Lord knows he could give them all the information they want.”

At that, the silence took a menacing tilt.

It wasn’t as if Chuuya hadn’t known — it had been among the first thoughts hammering his skull, as he crawled his way out of the gasoline and the metal parts. All was inevitable and Dazai knew all; there wasn’t a corner of the Port Mafia his sole eye hadn’t scrutinized and memorized.

“We’re dead, if he wants us buried,” Mori said, very factually. He didn’t appear concerned.

“Mafiosi don’t get graves,” Chuuya replied, distractedly. “If he wanted us dead, we’d be dead.”

The man studied him.

“Chuuya, I hate to ask,” he dared, after that quiet examination. Twirling her umbrella between two lithe fingers, Kouyou stilled, only tapping two unsatisfied nails on the wooden handle. Ace wasn’t subtle enough to hide his interest — he uncrossed his arms and pulled the shoelaces of the fake body. One of the moles on its left hand wasn’t quite high enough for where it should have been. Chuuya felt it made no sense to remember. “You wouldn’t have an idea of where he might have gone, would you?”

It took him a moment to understand.

Astonishment almost shot him out of his chair. “Why the fuck would I know —“

“I’m not accusing you,” Boss cut him off immediately. “I wouldn’t dare.”

Unclenching his tense shoulders took a tad too long — Chuuya felt every tendon and every vein unfurl like a ripped piece of paper, defensive and unsuitably prepared for a reaction none of the Executives would be particularly charmed by.

You are at the top already, that seething thing inside him reminded him. You got the seat. You’ll get all of it. What need was there for respect?

On the wooden handle, Kouyou’s nails left half-moons of deep-thought.

“I don’t,” Chuuya clipped out, unlocking his jaw. It throbbed with a phantom pain — he hated the childishness of it. Say you’re sorry or I won’t talk to you again. “I could give you a list of the hideouts we used, but I doubt he’ll be enough of a moron to use any of them. I’m assuming he’ll lay low for a bit, if he has no intention of exposing us. He might get help with that from the Division, in exchange with information on how to play around our lack of a Permit —“

“Oh,” Mori interrupted, again. “Oh, that is not a problem anymore.”

Chuuya’s lips parted. The ringing bleeding down the shell of only one of his ears sounded like an alarm. “What?”

“We managed to reach a deal. It’s a recent matter, but definitely trustable. Leaving Sakaguchi unpunished — against our laws — is our act of good faith,” None of the easy-fallen words out of his mouth reeked of the stupefied speechlessness petrifying Chuuya’s limbs; even Kouyou didn’t appear touched. It all felt horribly anticlimactic — a nuclear-peaceful ending for a wordless war that had existed since he had joined the organization. A deal. “I don’t mean to press, but — you have to understand that any information could be relevant. Are you sure Dazai didn’t tell you anything?”

A headache rubbed his forehead — scratches on a blackboard. “That bastard doesn’t tell me things,” Chuuya reminded the table, scoffing. “He doesn’t tell me things when they’re relevant — you think he’d tell me this?”

Mori’s eyes ranked over him.

“I think Dazai must have been in a rather — precarious state,” he spelled out, eventually — as if every word might mean something slightly different, if he wasted a too long lasting breath on it. “To do something so foolish.” Something about that description sat a tad weirdly. It rolled down the table, all the way to the corpse that wasn’t Dazai but was — curled in a shivering purpose near the scar on his temple, as if to show how bloodied it looked next to dead flesh. “I think something might have slipped out. I wouldn’t be surprised if you had been the one to catch it.”

Under his breath, carelessly stupid, Ace muttered: “Wouldn’t be surprised if he’d told you he’d leave, too.”

He didn’t feel his stiffened limbs until they started to scratch the ground with the seat legs. He turned to look at Kouyou, expecting her lightning struck eyes to be turned on him — all he found was her low gaze, nauseatingly guilty, settled on one of the corpse’s tumid hands.

Things do not change until they’ve changed, Tanaki had said, once. Eyes distant. Try as he might, Chuuya couldn’t recall their last conversation.

“I don’t know,” he managed to bit out. “He didn’t tell me shit.”

Harder than steel, Mori ordered: “Are you sure?”

“I don’t know,” Chuuya insisted, final. He didn’t realize how loud it was until it drowned out the buzz of the lights. “He didn’t tell me.”

It landed flatly.

The soundless haze that followed only had Kouyou sink deeper in her chair, guilt forced out of her traits with a cleared throat. Ace’s eyes stayed on the corpse, as frustrated as the rhythmic taps of his fingers. Astonishingly — stunningly enough to let the ire trail down his skin, abandoning it in one cold shower of something — Mori’s face was struck with a grief so deep it was material.

“Well, then,” the man said, again, a bit lost. “We should get started, then.”

Sakaguchi’s picture stayed put on the chest of that flesh puppet — the water drowned it in less clear colors, sticking it to the scarred skin. Chuuya felt the Archivist’s eyes on him through the mind numbing procedures — the hows and the nevers; and the plans to make sure the voice wouldn’t be spread where the mafiosi could gather their own conclusions; and the devastating realization of the web-like hold of Dazai’s absent fingers over every Mafia matter.

“The financial assets will need to be taken back soon,” Mori commented, with a sigh. “Dazai is certainly not stupid enough to use that money, but we can’t risk him holding the data.”

“Certainly,” Ace said.

“Can’t risk it,” Kouyou chirped.

He should have never received them in the first place, Chuuya thought, privately. It seemed an unexplainable act of faith from one of the smartest men he knew — a blindness he couldn’t explain, if not from the eyes Mori had set on that fake corpse, and refused to lay on any less morbid sight.

“Can’t risk it at all,” he concluded.

Awkward pauses filled the bundle of oddly placed soliloquies — glances thrown to the empty seat, waiting for a phantom correction. Chuuya scratched the skin of his arms to blood.

His nails started throbbing. Mori declared the meeting adjourned.

“Be mindful,” the doctor added, distracted. He had yet to take his eyes off the corpse. “Now more than ever.”

Something conflicted raced between the scarlet specks in Kouyou’s eyes, keeping her from leaving her chair and escaping as fast as a muttering Ace was doing. Chuuya had a half feeling some of the voices had been spread by the man himself — before he could dare murmur accusations, though, his gaze got caught on the tense outline of Mori’s shoulders, tapping his fingers mere inches from where that plastic Dazai’s shoulders rested.

A mute request colored Kouyou’s face, as she morphed her traits into venomous latitude — a welcoming porch to a wandering fool. Chuuya pictured hers and Mori’s frames — two familiar shocks of color and the absence of it, as old as any sight in the Mafia.

He shook his head.

Just a tad too slow to hide her surprise, she mouthed, good luck — a tad too slow to hide her approval — and left the room with a bow.

“Ah, Chuuya,” Mori greeted, blinking up at him, a good eternity later. He made for a strange sight — for a selfish, shivering moment, Chuuya wished Elise was there, to take the impact of that immaterial, ricocheting hum. The vibration of a loose bullet. Mori was never unstable. “I beg your forgiveness. This old man was taken aback, at last.”

“You’re not old,” he protested. “Sir.”

“I’m sure you were hoping for a better first day as Executive. Unfortunately, the circumstances demand some rapidness in decisions,” Gloved fingers knocked the wood. “Do rest peacefully — that seat had your name on it long before shortage of numbers came up.”

“I know, sir,” he assured. It took only some ounces of might not to look at the empty chair — haunted far more than the lifeless eyes on the decaying corpse between them.

Chuuya wasn't taking up an empty seat, he considered. But it didn't quite remove the fact that Dazai's own would never be filled again — that it had taken Mori two days to hang an unavailable sign on the velvet cushions, unavoidable and harsh, when Chuuya had stolen years to be worth even just the golden carvings.

The thought had his nails sink in his palms.

"I did have a surprise planned for you," the man continued, sighing, genuinely distraught. "A congratulations party of sorts."

He winced. "That won't be necessary."

"No? I found your parents."

Chuuya's mouth fell shut.

That, at last, managed to forcibly haul an amusement of sorts over Mori's lips. "It wasn't all that easy, mind you," he continued, either unaware of the hammering heart in his chest or far too high on it — like Dazai's corpse wasn't between them, and like it didn't make sense that it was. "We have files on them, on the son they lost. Be it you, be it who you were — inspired by let's say. We even have their location," The doctor stood — stunned as he was, it was easy enough to ignore the way Mori's legs twitched, keeping him from stepping too far from the corpse. "A beautiful village, if I may."

He felt, rather suddenly, that throwing up in the meeting room wouldn't have been ideal.

"Your father's an army doctor," Mori's grin turned humorous — almost sincere with it. "Isn't that quite the coincidence? I must say, though — Chuuya, you look a lot like your mother."

Oddly physical, oddly squelching; and then cracked like a rock against another, a sound so loud it reverberated across his ribcage. Chuuya felt, in a stupidly non-euphemistic way — deeper than the deeper roads of Suribachi City, and bloodier than the skin under his nails as he crawled out; and only an inch, only moments more painful than waking up alone and never quite stopping being so — his heart shatter right in the middle.

Something too unreal to be grief struck him like lighting. Losing the never owned, maybe — watching it dance behind a glass, hands far too bloodied to try to punch his way through.

Mori's eyes zeroed on his fists, heavy and always, always there. Chuuya felt more of a corpse than the putrid thing on the table.

There was a twirling maze of words under the roof of his mouth — something bitter and too sweet and horrifying; something that had him feel like the seat was too wide for his bones, and he far too small for them. "They —" Chuuya cleared his throat. "You didn't tell them, did you?"

Mori studied him. "No," he admitted. "No one apart from me and the researchers knows, and we didn't believe it would be wise, without your approval. And Dazai," Like a belated thought, the man poked the body's arm. "He knew. Obviously."

Obviously, Chuuya echoed.

The shock was a pillow landing to ire that couldn't go anywhere at all. He climbed out of his chair just to let his jittery legs feel like a fight might arrive — clenched his jaw around the sight of the expressionless puppet soaking the wooden table.

An Ability, he considered, just to breathe in, it had to be. Dazai wasn't there to nullify it. The corpse rotted away.

For a moment, watching Mori trail it with unavoidable eyes, he thought he saw something akin to anger. He was quick to wipe it away — then he offered Chuuya the closest thing to a smile he could muster up. “You're free to go pay them a visit, of course. I'm truly glad I managed to give you this, Chuuya,” He dimmed. “At least.”

The apology in his tone made no sense. He couldn't quite focus on it, either — everything was echoing off walls Chuuya couldn't see; you could pay them a visit and he knew, too and a beautiful, beautiful village.

“At least?” he repeated.

Mori's pupils thinned into a suggestion of something — either kindness or warning. The way he lingered by the table resembled a ghost; when he laid his forefinger in the middle of that fake Dazai's open palm, though, he only looked sad.

“I'm sorry,” the doctor offered. The words buzzed as if incorrect — stubbornly there. “You have lost something too.”

His eyebrows brushed his hairline. “I feel like this is more of a gain.”

The doctor's insistent gaze said he wasn't quite convinced. He tapped the corpse's palm with only the tip of his finger — watched Chuuya trace that movement, and concluded: “Actually, I meant Arahabaki.”

The world wasn't made of interpretations — only of absolutes. Scratches and whispers; and all the things Chuuya was sane enough to know he had made up, in fits of loneliness from the rubbles of Suribachi City. Arahabaki held no care and Arahabaki held nothing at all — except all of him, in a fist Chuuya still fought his way through with the stubbornness of a Sisyphus scared of heights. His blood had no sound; his blood made no sound when faced with a locked room, the key's marred copy festering in front of itself.

The stomach dropping emptiness, Chuuya thought, the starvation — that was all him.

“Oh,” he heard himself say. “Right.”

“It's truly a shame,” Mori continued, as if blind to the way Chuuya had quietened. Perhaps he didn't believe it to be all that uncharacteristic. Perhaps he was the only one. “More than anything, I ask you to be cautious. The enemy has already been alerted of enough of our failings — we don't need them to know one of our strongest weapons has been secluded from our inventory.”

Chuuya didn't know if he expected him to complain. Perhaps, if it had been a few years ago — that summer he'd spent scratching his arms to raw skin in an effort to let out what only Dazai could put back in — he would have.

"I'm sorry," he offered, instead.

"Corruption is a weapon," Mori replied. "As it all is. You included. We'll make do. You certainly aren't something I'd ever call settling for, Chuuya."

It shouldn't have been as comforting as it felt, perhaps — not from a man obsessively tracing the life path of a fake corpse. It felt better than the scritch-shrieks in the back of his skull — claws on cell bars; an enclosed storm rattling a cage, like the haunted house of some forgotten remorse.

More, Arahaki swore. Nevermore.

"Thank you," Chuuya cleared his throat, a tad awkwardly, looking anywhere but where Mori was directing his amusement. "Thank you, sir — I'll do my best."

"You always do. You seldom seem to ask for anything back, though."

The idea was uncannily aimless. "Can I kill the bastard when we catch him?" Chuuya asked, in what he hoped was a lighter tone. The crude edge of it turned it a bit empty.

When, he thought. When?

"Oh," Mori said. "Sure."

He searched for hilarity in the wrinkles by his eyes. He found the end of an endless hallway, painted in shadows the same way one would assign water a color — he found nothing but vacancy.

Are you mad?, Chuuya almost asked, like a child.

Eventually, he landed on, again: "I'm sorry."

A curious gaze laid on him, blinking. The words were stuck between his teeth, half annoyed and half uncertain — it took staring at the rigor mortis of the corpse's fingers. "I'm sorry," he echoed. To you, he thought, tongue stuck. I know to you he was — "I know he —"

Inevitably, Chuuya trailed off.

Something sizzled inside Mori's pupils. Hit by the neon lights on the ceiling, they looked more crimson than black — familiarly stuck and strangely affected by it all. Inevitable, all of it; all of it, Dazai's fault. I know what?, Chuuya wondered. That the two of them were a locked door none of them could spy through the slot of — that Dazai sat the same way Mori did. That Mori was hungry; that Dazai had flesh to spare. That none of them had ever been allowed to question satiation.

“Oh,” Once again, the doctor looked more than inscrutable. But there was a glint in his eyes that set Chuuya’s alarms off — a gaze softened to the point of gauging the advantages of having let himself be touched. “Thank you, Chuuya.”

Perhaps, he thought, only once — only for a moment, before it was lost in the genuine light in the Boss’ eyes — perhaps, he should have let Kouyou be his comfort. Perhaps, he considered, Chuuya had damned himself on a Thursday morning.

But it was gone fast, and he was bowing his head faster.

“I suppose —“ A beat. Mori seemed lost; he cleared his throat, at last, a bit more scientifically confused than heartbroken. Pain in the way of a lost game. Grief in the way of high burying ground taxes. “Well,” Something else. Something visceral. “I suppose — I did mistakenly think he’d have to be here to kill me.”

It was such an odd conclusion to reach in the middle of that chaos, that Chuuya could only keep quiet.

Then: “He said he didn’t have a scar.”

Oddly reluctant, Mori looked up. “What?”

“He said he didn’t have a scar,” Chuuya insisted, brushing the spot under his ribs where he’d been impaled. The wound had itched for days, after the Hospital. After The Alley, all it did was pulse in tandem with his heartbeat. “Not like mine.”

“Don’t be silly,” the man replied, distractedly. “Of course he had a scar.”

Chuuya paused. “He said —“

“But it didn’t matter,” Mori recited. He got the feeling to be missing something. “So he didn’t.”

Sakaguchi Ango’s picture slipped from the body, at last, in spite of the wet stains fading the brown of his suit into the eye bags underneath his glasses. Chuuya watched it float to the ground — crumbling between carved seat legs, with widening holes and fading outlines. There was a corpse and there was a traitor — Chuuya didn’t feel as much locked in a crime scene as he felt trapped between the dust particles of a stranger’s chalk outline.

A pair of distant, glass-lined eyes flashed in the pale, reflective surface of Dazai’s sternum.

“Sir,” he asked, before he could juggle the pros of it, “Has Oda Sakunosuke been notified?”

Mori’s face did something terrifying.

It startled him badly enough to land his hands by the corpse’s arm, knuckles brushing the wet, sweat-matted skin — a retch getting stuck in his throat at the texture of it, immediately hauling him away from its reach. The mixture of things in the doctor’s face was a kaleidoscope of fragments too wide for his body — anger and confusion and bone-curling fear and loneliness, at the end of it.

You were supposed to understand, Verlaine had written, in one of his letters. Hysterically, he wondered if Mori had ever written Dazai a single line of ink, or if they'd never been far away enough for it. You were meant to be like me. You weren't meant to care about anyone at all.

And then curious — irately: why do you?

It was gone faster than his knuckles could stop tingling. Chuuya knew, utter and breathlessly, that he wasn't allowed to say that name ever again.

"I'm afraid it won't be necessary," Mori concluded, tonelessly. He removed his finger from the corpse's lifeline, at last, scratching its palm with haste and too long nails. Chuuya tried his very best to remember if he had ever seen them longer than a surgeon should have worn. Chuuya tried to recall if he'd ever seen him with no gloves. "Carrying our syndicate's endless thankfulness, of course — I'm afraid he's rather dead."

---

...

---

Chuuya found his parents on a Sunday.

He died seventeen cobblestoned steps from their porch. That time around, if they ever had — he knew he would not be buried. He pretended to be watching them grieve over it, for a moment — sharing lunch and honey sweet smiles, with the wrinkles on their faces and the unreachability of a lifetime Chuuya had missed like an early train.

Do you want it?, he thought, with a hand on the phone Mori was questioning from. Do you even know how to want it anymore?

"The Mafia is my family," he told the Boss, memorizing the way his mother blew on hot food before putting it in her mouth. Once, twice, thrice — some elegant laugh as she got burned. Perhaps, he mused, he would not have cried in that lifetime either. Perhaps his parents would live until ninety and stay under that porch until then — and Chuuya would never bump into them in the streets of his city and have to say, I don't know if I'm your son or your grave robber.

Perhaps — cowardly relieved — he'd never have to apologize for either.

Chuuya died on a Sunday, one hand on a scar on his wrist that called him human — both belated and world changing — and let all his bones be reborn as soon as he entered the Highway.

---

...

---

The burned strand of hair was right by his left ear, and it kept falling on his eye.

“— dealing with it, sir,” a sniper from the Guerrilla was saying, bent in a half as he bowed, his face impossible to be seen. His shadow turned wider the brighter the lightning behind the doors rumbled; when the next thunder echoed, it turned the subordinate into a line of darkness towering over Chuuya like a monster. “We’re not sure of — some of the equipment is malfunctioning. And it seems like the other syndicates might be staging attacks all in one go. It’s —” A pause. “It’s like they’re all trying to take advantage.”

Chuuya blew on the piece of hair.

It allowed him peace for a mere breath — it was back on his skin, tickling and weirdly cut, the moment his eyelids were done brushing.

“The cargoes are stuck at the port, still,” the subordinate continued. “We can’t access the data for the commercializing permit. Until then, even the guards on our side won’t let us pass. I’m afraid it might take — at least two weeks, sir. I’m sorry.”

When Chuuya didn’t speak, fingers tipping his crossed arms, the subordinate dared to uncurl his stiffened back — straightening from his bow.

“Sir,” he said, obediently. Too habitual — too used; one of the few support snipers Mori had ever forced on his prized, fine Double Black — his eyes darted to the empty space on Chuuya’s left.

Rain dripped from the canopy over the doors of Building Two. Occasionally, it got caught by the flash of lightning — when it did, it turned a blinding white, falling like pearls from a sky that was only mildly less unruly than the murmurs the syndicate was drowning in. The voices live in the walls, Lippman had used to say, spy-blooded as he was. If you can hear them, it’s on you.

“Eyes on me,” Chuuya ordered, before his teeth could munch the bile. The hair strand fell on his eye — again and again. Perks of car-explosions’ flares. They lingered.

The man flinched.

---

...

---

The Mimic Headquarters stood haunted and abandoned inside a Western building, and the floor of the ballroom was stained in dried blood.

Crimson curtains with gold embroideries hid fogged up, shattered windows, but not well enough — rays of sunset painted blinding squares on the ground and the sheet-covered furniture, giving the quiet an eerie buzz of nothingness. His shoes stepped on glass shards, apologizing for the resounding crack! with gentler steps.

Chuuya called out: “Anyone?”

No answer came.

The blood stains were shaped just familiarly enough to unmistakably belong to fallen corpses — the furthest of them spread strangely, though; as the body had been held close enough by a pair of arms to bleed on them, rather than on the floor.

He walked until the tips of his shoes were brushing the outlines of that dried puddle. The sunrays kept breaking in. The blood stayed where it was. Dazai stayed gone, and that friend of his — his favorite, and the exceptional glint in his eye’s intransigence to a more human self-perception — stayed blood on the ground.

Hands in his pockets, Chuuya left.

---

...

---

Over the next few nights, it began to appear more and more inevitable that the Port Mafia would meet its shameful, ghastly end.

Despite the exaggeration Chuuya had been sure to be subjecting Dazai’s role in the Mafia to — despite the hours spent shrugging Akutagawa, still thankfully in Tokyo for a mission, until the words Dazai and Port Mafia did not sound the same as they rolled down his tongue — the days passed in barely composed, entirely too fragile hazes, framed by sporadic attacks and internal malfunctions.

“Oh, dear,” was Mori’s only comment. “How come everybody is so tense? You would think we’d lost a limb.”

Wisely, his Executives did not speak. It was somewhat amusing. Chuuya thought he had to tell Dazai about it.

Then he kept quiet for the rest of the meeting.

Executive Dazai invented it, the Archivists sighed, when the Buildings’ alerting systems broke — and, Executive Dazai has the passwords, they insisted, when entire columns of their archives became inaccessible; and, Executive Dazai was the only one with the full project, they stuttered, once a squadron got lost in the underground tunnels he had had several different groups of workers build.

Bastard’s not an Executive anymore, was the most Chuuya could offer. Frustration would have brought them nowhere. Don’t let Boss hear you refer to him as such.

(In Chuuya’s head, it was a fuck you of offensively premeditated taste. The mocking victory song of a boy falling from the tallest roof, laughing as he cracked his skull open against the concrete. Perhaps Dazai hadn’t planned to leave — he hardly thought it meant he’d never planned in case he ended up doing it.

“You think he didn’t know having his hands full would leave this shithole empty as soon as he cut them off?” he scoffed, pacing across Kajii’s office like he was to blame for in-syndicate inflation.

The man seemed conflicted. “I don’t know if he was gathering power. He always seemed a bit too lazy for it.”

He didn’t have to gather shit, Chuuya didn’t tell him. The skin under his collar had been itching since the embers from his car’s fire had brushed his eyelashes. He stuck his fingers under it and pressed. Everybody was all too glad to let it in his hands.)

Life became a webbed, cracked glass — he couldn’t exhale. Late night emergencies, and then disorganized troops, and then the taunts — the low laughs of prisoners in the dungeons, haunting the building at every hour of the day. They were afraid of Kouyou — they were drunk with pain and hysteria about the prospect of Dazai not being there to join in on the fun anymore.

How did they even find out?, Chuuya only dared to mutter once, washing bloodied hands.

Everybody knows, the delirious prisoner had chuckled, kicking. Mori had framed the Ability Permit — a golden frame on his desk, overseeing the city along with his petrified smile. Everybody knows you lost.

“What the fuck are you wearing?”

Kouyou barely spared him a look, crouched in front of the mauled prisoner tied up under the flower-framed roof of her house gazebo. The pair of frayed, faded gym pants she was wearing bent with her, showing off not-kimono-straight outlines Chuuya had never even considered she might have. “Not now, Chuuya.”

He stared. “No, seriously.”

“Chuuya,” she almost snapped. There was no pleasurable expression on her traits — only the few strands of hair fallen from her ponytail. Like she had ever worn a ponytail, he thought, stunned. “If you could? I have enough paperwork to deal with, without having to add punishments to it.”

“I’m an Executive,” Chuuya grumbled, as he leaned against one of the columns. The man on the chair whined low and soft, wheezing around the throat Golden Demon had torn open. “You can’t ground me anymore.”

The katana in her fingers twirled between a thumb and a forefinger — she sliced lines across the man’s chest like a personal vendetta. He shrieked.

Blood splattered on her — the unbuttoned dress shirt Chuuya hadn’t even known she owned, and the cartoon-kittens patterned bra she was wearing underneath, which he respectfully only glanced at once, gulping down an hysterical snort. She smudged the traces on her chin with the back of her hand — hauled the man’s forward by his mostly ripped-off hair, and spelled out: “Will he target us, or not?”

Chuuya straightened as if electrified into it. “He’s seen Bandages?” he pressed, failing at disinterest.

The man’s shattered lips opened on a tongue-less scream, dripping coagulations on blood right onto her naked feet. Kouyou studied his eyes, quietly. “Someone has to.”

He didn’t say anything.

“Someone has to,” she repeated, more to herself than him, allowing the man to fall back on the dried fluids on the chair. There was still a composure of sorts to her jittery bones — she stood awfully tall and posed, even as she wiped sweat from her forehead, blinking as intermittently as she did when she hadn’t slept in a week. “Someone will. The underground isn’t that wide, and the Archivists swear his bank accounts haven’t been touched. I refuse to live with a sword of Damocles on my head. Mori wants to know if we will be uncovered by the end of the year,” Kouyou raised her katana again. “I’ll tell him.”

How humiliating, Chuuya thought. Dazai’s frame, no coat and a pretense of clean hands — towering upon them with the sword of justice. He wouldn’t even care about fairness. He would only do it to hear bars slam on Mori’s grin.

She sliced the man’s head off faster than he could shout.

It rolled on the ground off the gazebo with a wet, squelching thud. Snow had started to gather at the corners of the street — it wasn't there to soften the landing, though. Wondering when Hikari would come out to lick the blood off, Chuuya kept his eyes on the mutilated head's one, and dared: "So the Permit is useless, now?"

"Not useless," Kouyou replied. She looked for a place to clean her katana on, and ended up swiping across her dress shirt. "Not at all. Just — not enough. Not as long as the demon child is alive. Not as long as he knows all he does."

Chuuya studied the scurrying of an ant, crawling inside the head's eye socket.

That had been the other part of it — the paranoia. The Headquarters dealt with petty, smaller gangs' attacks — more of a taunt than any actual intention to challenge them — and they dealt with missing data and they dealt with mocking prisoners. But no one seemed able to deal with the eerily plump silence — the whispers in the walls. The unyielding certainty of dangling over the edge, held by the mercy of lithe, bandaged — traitorous — fingers.

The words were out of his throat before his mind could strangle them. "Then let's make sure he doesn't know anything."

Kouyou looked up. The strident sight almost had Chuuya looking away. She had never looked her age more — she was a tad shorter without the sandals, and eons, eons, smaller without the layers of the kimono. It seemed improper to even meet her eyes.

"What?" she asked, eyebrows high.

"Let's make sure he doesn't know," Chuuya insisted, as the idea seeped across his swarming thoughts. "The issue is he has every fucking protocol in this syndicate memorised, yes? Our deals and our ports and all of it," He shrugged. "Let's change them."

The woman stared at him. "All of them?"

"All of them."

"We have built our connections over years of trial. Do you even understand the costs — the sheer amount of time — it would take to revolutionize decades old procedures?"

Chuuya curled an eyebrow, nudging the head with the tip of his shoe. Pianoman's voice echoed in his skull. "You'd rather deal with a few years of paperwork," he quoted, "Or with whatever shit the Government will pull to execute a mafia syndicate?"

All at once, the fire of exhaustion in Kouyou's eyes dimmed.

She dragged the tip of her katana across the blood on the marble, pensive in that way a less used subordinate would have mistaken for bubbling anger. But Chuuya had watched her reshape the world under her eyelashes too many times — he knew, when she looked at him, that her valuing was only facade. She'd decided already.

"Write that down and get it to Mori," she concluded. Her skin was littered in goosebumps. It had been since he'd seen her again. "If we haven't descended into chaos by the start of next week, you can have your hand at convincing him.”

The syndicate was still a bundle of nerves and malfunctioning elevators, by the start of the next week. Nails under his choker, Chuuya sat in front of Ace’s bitten nails, and convinced Mori anyway.

---

...

---

“I don’t know how you do it,” Mori told him, privately, tapping gloved nails on wood. An hypocrite until the end — as if anyone in the Mafia would have guessed a single thought he might hold about that mutiny. A bit jokingly, he added: “You might want to be careful. That reactory attitude might make me doubt you didn’t know Dazai was leaving.”

For a moment, Chuuya was taken aback by how sincere the mock was.

It didn’t last long. When he’d asked the man if he still suspected him, Mori had studied him for a while — the scratches down his arms and whatever it was that kept making Hirotsu observe his eyes, longer and longer each time, like his burned eye might grow blue again now that he was stuck — and concluded, oddly: you can always see when someone was left behind.

It wasn’t just me, he’d told him.

Mori had smiled. Just as sincerely, he had sworn: I rather think it was me alone.

“I didn’t,” Chuuya assured him, anyway. He had never been the smartest around, not when surrounded by devils — but knowing Dazai could not be reached had taken no intelligence. Only eyes and longing fingers; the brush of bandages before he disappeared behind the corner, always dramatic and always three steps forward. He’d never chased him once.

I’m not like you, he didn’t dare tell any of them. I never thought he’d stay.

---

...

---

[The hold was imaginary and divinely — irritatedly — inspired. Chuuya knew.

Had Dazai ever managed to get his hands around his throat, Chuuya would have killed him out of the sheer unreality of it — the terror of being faced with a copy of what he knew to be real, but just wrong enough to be uncanny. If Chuuya couldn't breathe, it was on his lungs and on the silence.

A ghost lingered by the chandeliers. It looked down on him out of physical necessity and a more childish need.

It played hangman's knot. Chuuya's older scars itched like a layer of skin bound for removal. Arahabaki didn't say a thing — because Arahabaki never did; because he was too rage and too storm and too nothing to figure out something as petty as leaving. It was only Chuuya who felt the chain on his feet. It was Arahabaki who couldn't walk — and by the time he knew, he could only drag his claws across the walls, shrieking.

Don't be stupid, Chuuya told him.

It was fruitless to act as if Dazai was truly gone — it was pointless to pretend his absence wasn't louder than a presence. Every room Chuuya entered that lacked him was still about him — still only ever about him. It was all inevitable, and all was his fault.

The hand tightened around his neck. When he turned to throw his gloves away, a chant on his lips, it took him three shots of some faraway rifle to remember to stop.]

---

...

---

On a Thursday, Chuuya put all the glasses in his cupboard in the bathroom cabinet.

A ghost might have done it in its petty haunting, just to scare the tenants off some inherited home. Chuuya soon realized the attempts to evoke even pettier phantoms, who did not care enough to open all the water sources in his apartment, was meaningless. He stared at their glint under the bathroom lights, and dared.

Then he put the glasses back, stubborn and quiet, and stuck all his forks in a pile in the middle of his bedroom — and tried again.

---

...

---

The corpses kept turning up.

“Do these assholes really think we’ll fall for it at the thirteenth puppet?” Chuuya questioned, crouching on the stone railing towering over the Port section, squinting at the corpse being pulled from the water. A mark had been carved on its chest — the Hounds’ sigil. “Or that we’ll believe a lowlife grunt fucker would manage to kill him?”

Kajii scratched his nape. “Maybe they’re trying to give the gangs some confidence.”

“This is ridiculous,” He waved, whistling to call the Guerrilla’s attention. They almost dropped the body; Chuuya watched its head lull back and forth, eyes carved out by the Bay’s floor. “Why are they trying so hard to convince us he’s dead?”

“Are we sure it’s not him who’s doing it?”

“It isn’t,” Chuuya said — with finality.

He waited for an explanation. When it didn’t come, Kajii tried to guess: “Maybe they’re doing it so we’ll leave him be?”

“He’s a fucking deserter. The Mafia doesn’t leave deserters alone.”

A hum formed a fog in front of the man’s mouth, fogging up even his goggles. He looked at him, head tilted. “Not a traitor?”

The Guerrilla threw the corpse inside one of the vans. A hand hung off the edge of it until it was kicked inside, and the doors of the trunk shut; Chuuya studied the blue stains on the skin, bruises and decay, curling around the fingers like an omen.

Hey, he recalled. The ceramic floor of an old tub, and Dante sleeping two rooms away. The wrecked bone of a thumb; the smell of dirty water and vomit. We match.

He stood up. “Let’s go.”

It took a week for Kouyou to dare voice a lingering idea — something he had seen float back and forth in the Under Port’s stairs, between low murmurs of men in safety suits and darting glances and the body bags they kept having Chuuya find, somehow. She stood next to him at the top of the stairs of Building One, and dared: “What if one of these days, we mistake the real deal for a fake?”

The idea was so nauseatingly unrealistic it almost had him turn an impolite expression to her.

He scowled his traits into something less childish. “That’s the master plan you think the Special Division will put in place to kill two birds with one stone?” he scoffed. “We ain’t even sure the beanstalk is with them.”

“I doubt he is,” Kouyou replied, eyes on the stone steps. The back of Chuuya’s skull pulsed, for a moment — rain on The Alley’s stairs, and fingers digging between his ribs, and nothing else. “To be honest, I doubt this is even something he’s aware is happening. Perhaps the Division heard the voices and decided to torment us,” She scoffed, chin high. “Everybody wants their piece of cake from what’s left of Yokohama’s underground’s demon.”

The corpses kept turning up.

Chuuya wasn’t sure if they kept calling him to deal with them out of some awkward sense of respect or something else — perhaps the swiftness with which Chuuya sent a glance to the bodies and declared them fakes.

It’s better to be sure, Hirotsu had muttered, offhandedly, just once.

He had refused to explain further. Chuuya had kicked the side of the hanging corpse, and that had been it.

Eventually, the lifeless eyes and the swollen skin began to bundle into an unrecognizable mass — putrid smell and dirty bandages, and whatever stark electricity the mysterious Ability left on the modified corpses. It made Chuuya’s hands spasm a bit more whenever he touched them. Mori looked at the bodies and never spoke a word.

“Stay close,” he heard a newbie from the Guerrilla hiss, pulling his companion out of the doors to the dungeons. “Haven’t you heard?”

Corpses bearing the same exact face could only haunt the halls and the whispers for so long — at some point Chuuya mostly missed, roaming through paperwork and initiating new channels, the curve of Dazai’s lifeless eye began to haunt the spines of most mafiosi as well.

“It’s the prisoners,” he huffed, watching as Kouyou’s kimono dragged across the dried blood of the dungeons’ floor. “They’re spreading voices about this place being haunted — trying to scare us out of here.”

Her eyebrows tickled the dangling pearls of her headpiece. “The ghost of the Demon Prodigy?”

“As if he ever needed to be dead to fuck up everything,” Chuuya muttered.

Perhaps it should have been more eerie — just how quickly the narrative spread. He’d grown up in a settlement of myths, though, and kept his own secrets about that faithless endeavor all to himself — when Dazai Osamu began to be less of a name to spit on, and more of an assortment of letters no one truly wanted to whisper too loudly, Chuuya stared at the wind-shaken chandeliers over the umptenth corpse, and dared: haunt me, then.

The penthouse remained quiet. The blue tourmaline he'd been gifted remained on top of his window seal — mostly forgotten and never not thought about.

“He'd need to be dead to be a spirit,” he let some unsettled new recruits know. “And none of us is lucky enough for that to be true. Start paying rent if I'm wrong, you nasty fucker!” he added, with an abrupt shout to the ceiling that got the recruits to jump ten feet in air, knocking his fist against the metal doors.

He got the feeling they only trusted him out of a simple conjecture, carved upon most eyes that had laid on the Mafia's Double Black in those years — if ghosts could kill, and if Dazai Osamu had been one, Chuuya would have probably been torn apart in that car explosion.

Still — it was him they called to deal with the corpses.

“It's good, actually,” he informed the Flags, during one of his visits. “For me, I mean. The more I see the bastard dead, the less murderous I feel. 'S kind of hard to fantasize about how much those things stink.”

Did that work against that User in London?, he could hear Albatross tut.

Chuuya studied his hands — like the blood might have stuck to the gloves. “This isn't about me, for your information,” he replied. “I'm the last person this concerns.”

Liar, the graves mocked. Liar, liar.

“Are you doing alright?”

The question landed flatly.

Morgues in the Under Port never smelled of blood; perhaps the cold kept it from lingering. The plastic-white tiles were always a bit sticky with dried something, though — and the walls loomed like melting candles, turning even that small room into a wardrobe space. The creaking cabinets were all shut, either filled with corpses or purposefully kept hidden from the unclosing eyes of the body on the metal table, at the center of the room.

Pettily, Chuuya stuck two fingers in that fake's Dazai's corpse, pulling his eyelids down. Like a bad joke, they stayed shut, that time.

Waiting for the echo of Kouyou's words to fade, he offered, flatly: “This is the best time I've had since I joined, actually.”

She didn't seem amused. “Chuuya.”

“What?” The morgue turned his voice a tad deeper; framed by faraway, exhausted screams from all around the Under Port, he was a background noise to a rotten symphony. Chuuya leaned on the wall of metal cabinets, crossing his arms to nod to the uncovered corpse — cut up on the chest, and nothing more than dried slashes and shirtless skin. “It’s a dream job. I get to see the bandaged asshole rotting as many times as I’ve wished for him to drop dead. Even more, if we keep going like this,” He clicked his tongue. “Most people get the honor of the six feet deep treatment once in their life, you know?”

“Now you sound like him,” Kouyou said. “You know better. Dying is no honor.”

“It is, when you compare it to what I’d do to him if we caught him,” Chuuya replied.

At that, she kept quiet.

Under Port mafiosi in bright orange safety suits hurried behind the glass window on one of the walls, hauling carriers and reading files. Their murmurs disappeared underneath the screams — the unbearable lack of silence would start tracing a fire path under Chuuya’s eyelids soon enough; a headache he couldn’t quite afford.

“It’s weird, though,” Kouyou started again, at some point. Her fingers were abandoned by the corpse’s calves, ten shades darker than its ghostly skin. “Seeing him like this.”

“It’s not him,” he said.

“It could be. We don’t know where he is.”

“Cockroaches don’t leave to go die in the sewers,” Chuuya scoffed. “If he’d wanted to die, he would have died here. Probably taken Boss out too while he was at it.”

A strange look crawled between her eyelids.

“I really did think he —” Kouyou threw a look to the glass panel; the shut door. She cleared her throat, and didn’t look anywhere in particular when she admitted: “I really did think — from the first moment Mori brought him to us. I think he knew it too. This was all bound to end with him in that red scarf.”

The concept would have been weirder to sit with years ago, Chuuya thought — a kill and then a throne. Mori’s peaceful, all-knowing smile.

“He wouldn’t have cared, if it had been for the good of the Mafia,” he concluded.

The Executive sighed. “I suppose this is proof that he wouldn’t have been.”

And yet Mori bled from every pore — it was evident to anyone with eyes. His fingers were both sharpened claws and frail roots — they hung off him like starved things, sticking to the ground and searching for something to latch onto. Chuuya didn’t think Mori wanted to die. Chuuya didn’t think he had ever imagined dying from any blade other than Dazai’s.

Perhaps there was lack in that too — fear that could go nowhere. The knowledge Dazai had more reason to strike than before, or maybe less — all depending on whether he’d seen death as mercy or punishment.

“Do you think —” Kouyou paused. With clarity that smelled of repressed thoughts, her nails wrapped around that dead calf, leaving no trace. “I know we believe the Division is to blame. But this — doesn’t it feel like his kind of pettiness?”

Chuuya thought about it, for a moment — the incessant calls to his phone; the ruined limbs and the hangman furrows and the gunshot wounds on bodies that bore his face; the way Mori always stared at the corpses a tad too long.

His eyes fell on the corpse.

“No,” he promised. “No, this isn’t him.”

“He was already a dangerous man to walk next to,” she murmured. “There are few things more haunting than a dangerous man walking in the sunlight, though.”

Chuuya scoffed. Don’t be rude, he could hear her tut — her voice blending with some forgotten echo of past times. Politeness hadn’t been a thing in Suribachi, though. Chuuya had said his final goodbyes and his first hellos to his mother weeks ago. “Dangerous,” he mocked.

“You know that he is.”

“You cannot categorize him,” he snapped. Dazai, he thought. Dazai. He couldn’t say it. He didn’t want to. A child throwing a tantrum — he didn’t want to. Chuuya had taken it all in stride without a word, the lost car and the dead brother and Tanaki, and this, this, he didn’t want to. The name tasted like every rotten meal he’d ever forcibly swallowed — as disgusting as it always did after a particularly irritating prank. This isn’t a prank, though, he reminded himself. Immaterial nails dragged down the wetter parts of his viscera, Arahabaki and not, and Chuuya swore, this isn’t a fucking prank. “You can’t — mythify him. immortalize him like all those idiots — he’s going to change everything just to spite you. Just to make you believe you never understood a thing at all — fucking laugh and say, you didn’t think about that, did you?”

He exhaled in a curse. Her lips parted.

She suffocated the question with posed callousness; let go of the calf like there wasn’t a point to everything she did. He watched her walk the short way past the table to him, and didn’t do anything but offer her his eyes, when she settled two hands on the side of Chuuya’s throat — both a cradle and a suggestion.

The skin underneath his choker itched.

“Listen to me,” Kouyou said, very quietly. “Maybe you should step out of this.”

Something that might have been snow was stuck to the collar of her kimono. Chuuya studied it until his tongue felt less mean. “I don’t know what you mean.”

“Chuuya —”

“I don’t,” he insisted, clipped. “You all — I need you to stop looking at me like that.”

“I’m merely —“

“Why the fuck would he have told me?”

Kouyou didn’t speak.

“You all swear that he should’ve —“ He set his jaw, inhaling through his nose. Still cut too short and still nauseatingly, horridly coincidental, the burnt strand of his hair from the car explosion tickled his temple. “It’s good riddance, Ane-san. If you can’t see it, that’s on you.”

She stole a few more instants; nodded, and let go of him.

“I’m only saying —” she offered, after a pause, hand too light on the doorknob, “That he’s gone anyway, Chuuya. You truly don’t need to look at his corpse all day to be certain.”

Chuuya stared at the ground.

Despite the shrieks and the rolling wheels, it was very quiet when she left the room. Some of the workers passed by the window; a woman in a metal vest was dragged forward on her knees, some muted scream out of her voiceless lips. The buzz of a mosquito flew over his head, and then it was only Chuuya and the corpse.

If it breathes, Mori had tutted. If it beats.

He detached himself from the wall.

The metal stretcher the corpse had been left on — thrown with a bitter, blank-faced ease that said some men in the organization still hoped to accidentally stumble on Dazai’s true end — was staggeringly cold, seeping through clothes in prickly needles and frozen veins. Chuuya rested his elbows on the sides of that puppet’s head, caging it underneath his unimpressed gaze.

Albatross’s chain dangled between the old ridges of Dazai’s nose. The black of the gloved tip of his finger — when he flicked the eyelashes of his sole uncovered eye, stupidly waiting for a flutter — was a shock against his graying skin.

No, he’d told her. This isn’t him.

He glanced at the unmarred skin of his crooked thumb. No, Chuuya hadn’t insisted. He wouldn’t make them wrong. He would have known I’d know.

The thought was strangely enraging.

“When the delusional morons start telling bonfire horror tales about you,” he informed the corpse, “Don’t expect me to tell them you didn’t actually have claws sharper than a bear’s and eyes as dead as the winter season. ”

Dazai, of course, didn’t answer.

The dead did not give a shit, he considered.

He swallowed the thought a second later.

Tapping the stone-hard sides of that neck, low enough for his hair to brush that nauseating, offensive rendition, he concluded: “Fuck you.”

Enraging, and something else, too — there was no word for it. Had there been, he would have said it already. You only think about words when something’s no longer there to be named, Lippman had mused, once, browsing through a script he hadn’t liked but picked himself anyway. Humans are always cursed with being late.

The corpse had nothing to say.

---

...

---

[The head bandages had always been the most complicated of the bunch.

“Will you stay fucking still?” Chuuya heard himself snap, somewhere over the undone roads of bandages — that un-scratchy, three-layers-thin type Dazai had long since chosen as his only favorite — and the monotone kicks he could vaguely perceive Dazai directing to his knees with his toes. Albatross’ old bed was thankfully short; standing in front of his sitting silhouette, reaching for his tallest point, wasn’t as humiliating as it could have been. “Do you want me to tie a knot around your mouth?”

“It’s not my fault if you can’t deal with the easiest tasks,” Dazai muttered, bored lips brushing the vein of his left wrist. “I told you I could deal with it.”

Chuuya paused his wrapping process — only to direct him his most offended glance. “You literally broke in — are you fucking stupid?” He tightened the choke of the bandages until Dazai yelped, teeth aching with frustration. “You started stomping and whining until I took care of it —“

Waving the small casts on his hands, Dazai lamented: “That’s because you broke my fingers!”

“I didn’t break your stupid fingers —“

“You used your usual Slug pace to break in, and the Widows started being annoying, and I had to break out of the handcuffs —“

He tightened the bandages some more. The boy wheezed as if they’d been around his neck.

But the head bandages truly were odd — the only way Dazai would accept them was with certain loops and only some parts of the skin under his eye doubly wrapped; clenched suffocatingly by the nape and with no flattening of his curlier hair. Chuuya had no real memory of when he had memorized that useless chant — no real reason to play along with it either. Nonetheless, he'd stumbled to his door with sleep-grungy movements, and woken up quicker than his nervous system had appreciated at the sight of a two-eyed Dazai in his kitchen.

Dazai had the grace to keep quiet. The sound of bandages rubbing against curls and skin was soon an added sun ray, joining the warm cascade of the first sunset behind the covered windows. Chuuya blinked against the slumber of repetitive motions — focused on the mindless bucket list of missions Dazai was tapping on his thigh.

What's with the bandages, anyway?, he mused, occasionally, about asking. He never did.

Instead, he grunted: "If you ever ditch this clown costume of yours, you'll end up falling flat on your face whenever you try to take a step."

Dazai glanced up at him, curious. "Ane-san dragged you into her depth perception concerns, at last?"

"Who the fuck is concerned," Chuuya muttered. "I'm just saying — half-blind from that eye or not, the little you see must be nauseating."

Strangely quiet, he replied: "Not as much as what the other one sees."

For a moment, he sounded serious.

His grin appeared like a sudden faux step in some royal dance. "I can still see Chuuya even when he's on my blind side, after all."]

---

...

---

[Perhaps he was, Chuuya thought. Serious.

Perhaps it had all been a pantomime, only mute and filled with suicidal jokes, and perhaps it had all been doomed from the start. Perhaps Dazai — who had dropped casts at every bored fifth day of having one and who had slaughtered a man for catching him as he scratched the skin under his bandages — had never needed any help at all. Perhaps he'd sat on his bed for the amusement of it, and installed routine on the tiles with feet carved in the word temporary, and he'd thought it worthy of his providence.

Perhaps Chuuya had been too serious about all of it — his blind side and his unwrapped eye and his depth perception and the sight of his crooked fingers on his table, braiding bandages like Elise did with her dolls' hair — and how something, he thought, not enraging but not nothing; how something it was, that he was bound to live without it for the rest of his life.]

---

...

---

Akutagawa returned from a stealth mission roughly twenty two days after Dazai had vanished — and he returned to Chuuya's office, to Dazai's corpse on the table.

"It's not him," Chuuya couldn't get out of his mouth fast enough, watching as the boy landed against the wall from some invisible rifle's ricochet, somehow paler and wide eyed enough to appear centuries younger — when a wheezing, rasp thing that wasn't quite a breath left his throat and left him scrambling on his feet, Chuuya couldn't move fast enough, hands on him to keep him up. "Hey. Hey. Listen to me. That's not him."

"He — Executive Dazai —"

"Not him," he insisted, in the tone most subordinates automatically responded to. "Fucker would probably evaporate like a malicious spirit, anyway."

His stunned gaze remained over Chuuya's shoulder, set on the white sheet somebody had put over the latest river-recovered artifact. It took some strength he hadn't used in a bit to push him out of the room, closing the door — no matter the protesting nails Akutagawa clenched around his upper arms.

"They're saying —" Akutagawa cleared his throat, attempting to gulp through the grip he had on him, pushed against the hallway wall. "They are disgracing Executive Dazai's name, his loyalty —"

He kept his eyes on the wall.

"Those bitter fools are lying," Something like hysteria stuck to his tone. "Vice-Executive —"

"It's Executive, now, actually," he said.

It was very quiet, for a moment.

Breathless, Akutagawa begged: “Chuuya.”

It took him a bit to let go of him. Once he did, taking a step back — another and another; just close enough to grab the kid if his cough-wretched chest started acting up again, and far enough to get a full vision of the way the black coat stuck to his curved bones — Chuuya sighed. “It’s all true.”

Something like a lack of understanding had Akutagawa’s eyes widen like marbles — innocent enough to be genuine, and almost offended.

“No,” he snarled. “It isn’t.”

“Kid, you’ve been away and unavailable for contact for weeks, while I have a manufactured copycat corpse of the bastard in my office,” he snapped, more nervous than anything else. “Who do you think has a clue of what’s going on?”

Akutagawa flinched as if shot.

“But he’s not —” He struggled for words — held the hems of his gifted coat like they might disintegrate along with his settling understanding. “The Port Mafia is his entire life.”

“He was suicidal,” he reminded him.

“Is this a joke to you?” he snarled, outlines shining a bloodied crimson. Void-bright, he’d once heard Dazai refer to Rashomon’s aura as. He had a tendency to talk too much about Akutagawa when he wasn’t around. “He’s your partner —”

“He was my partner,” Chuuya corrected, as calmly as he could. Glancing to the empty sides of the hallway, he added: “And you might want to be more careful about how you talk of your syndicate’s latest deserter.”

Akutagawa exhaled like a dying rattle. “He is no deserter. He’s —”

“A spineless coward,” he listed off, raising a hand to stop him. “A downright bastard wrapped in toilet paper, and the reason why I’ve been stuck in my office working on fucking passage of property deals for almost a month — and don’t even get me fucking started on whatever is going on in our god forsaken dungeons —”

Unused how he was to the feeling, it took him a moment to feel the sting of the bleeding cut on his cheekbone.

Rashomon was a spectacle of electrified tentacles, crowding Akutagawa’s silhouette like some holy crown in one of those churches Virgil had loved to describe in his novels. It bathed the hallway in a dim, looming darkness — but not quite enough to drown Akutagawa’s startlement in shadows.

Chuuya stared. He cleaned the blood from his cheek with the back of his glove.

“Good one,” he offered. “Thought you were still struggling with precision hits.”

The kid breathed like it had been ripped from his chest with barbed wire and not much care for his skin — he backed in the hallway as quickly as Rashomon's vanishing shadows allowed him to, and stumbled with a form that Dazai would have deeply, deeply disapproved of.

“You should apologize,” Chuuya let him know, staying right where he was. “Not because I care all that much — though, that was an asshole move. Not like I kicked the jerk out myself. But I’m assuming you’ll be nearing execution often enough, what with this Dazai's defender attitude — and you don’t want to add Executive-maiming to the list of your insubordinations.”

It was Akutagawa’s turn to stare at him like he had grown a second head.

He started coughing a blink after.

At first, it was nothing out of the ordinary — he bent in two and shook like death might be closer than his own contempt for it, curled into a child’s outline. Chuuya stayed where he was.

He didn’t move until he saw a coagulation of dirty, sick blood land on the carpets.

“Kid,” he called, materializing in front of him. Akutagawa didn’t stop coughing, choking on the sound with wrecked insistence. “Kid, do you — were you shot? Are you hurt? What’s the —“ Blood splattered on both their hands — wet and invisible on the old fabric of his coat.

Chuuya didn’t quite blink again until they had breached through one of the stalls’ doors on that floor’s bathroom, Akutagawa more dragged than walking, landing on the ground in front of the toilet so heavily his knees made a weird sound. Chuuya slid down against the wall of the stall right as the door bounced back, closing with a rumble louder than thunder — he sat down, huffing with accelerated heartbeat, right as Akutagawa finally managed to spit blood inside the toilet.

“Seriously,” he panted, stretching out his bent legs until they bumped against the other wall. It’s a shame, Mori had said about the kid. It really is a shame. “I was annoyed too, but I didn’t spit blood or anything.”

The joke didn’t seem to amuse Akutagawa. Perhaps he was just too busy.

“He’s not —“ he managed to insist, amidst soul-rattling coughs — knuckles white around the toilet. “He can’t be,” he begged, starving. “Not yet, I haven’t —“

Blood trailed from his mouth until he had no choice but to retch with it. Chuuya watched his head disappear in the toilet again, his sick sounds the only buzz in that abandoned bathroom, and relaxed against the wall. Everything was inevitable, he reminded himself. Everything was his fault.

It took eons for Akutagawa to be done. He only understood it was over because his exhausted frame dropped on his heels — leaving him bowed over the toilet edge.

His knuckles were still white. Keeping his eyes on the opposite wall, Chuuya promised: “I’m doing this for you.”

No answer came.

“I don’t know what you want from him,” he continued, though, because he had experience with unresponsive graves and haunted houses all the same. “Whatever it is, you won’t get it.”

His abandoned fists spasmed. Akutagawa fell back against the other wall, jaw clenched tight enough to make a vein throb.

“You can’t,” Chuuya wasn’t sure of the words out of his mouth. The fresh blood from the cut on his cheek had dried. “If you could have, then he wouldn’t have left. Since he did, it means you have to find it somewhere else,” At his stubborn silence, he nudged his thigh with the tip of his toe — he hardened his voice. “Listen to me. You pulled that shit with me. Don’t you dare pull it with someone else. You cannot support him. Not now.”

Blindly, he swore: “He saved me.”

He damned me, Chuuya thought. And I called him partner anyway, didn’t I?

“Do you know what he could do to us?” he insisted. He motioned towards the bathroom — that building, and Mori’s nervous, stiffened steps, somewhere over their heads. “Do you get the scope of it? He knows every corner of this syndicate to the very bone. He hates every single one of us with more hatred than you’ve ever fantasized about nesting in your soul. Do you know what he could do? What he could tell the authorities?”

“He wouldn’t,” Akutagawa didn’t sound entirely convinced. “We can find him. He —”

“How do you know that?” Chuuya scoffed. “He’s not one of us. Not anymore.”

His lips pressed together. He had the odd, unsuitable thought — that most kids would have looked on the verge of tears, wearing that kind of expression. Akutagawa only looked angry.

“This is my home. I know it’s yours, too. I know you’re smart enough to understand the kind of threat he’s become. You can go chase him, if you want,” He shrugged, bumping his skull against the wall. “But when you find yourself in front of some stranger who wants you dead, won’t that kill you?”

Harshly hesitant — Akutagawa laid his eyes on him.

With the spelled out tone of a lost child, he snapped, helpless: “Why don’t you care?”

Chuuya felt his ribcage twitch.

“I told you,” he said. “This is my home.”

“He’s your partner.”

“Not anymore.”

“It’s the Port Mafia, ” Akutagawa seemed a bit more disoriented with every echoing word. He was stained with drying blood on the side of his mouth. Chuuya thought he might bite him if he attempted to clean it off. “And he’s — he just left. He won’t destroy the Port Mafia.”

He clicked his tongue. “That he even could is enough to rage against, don’t you think?”

Akutagawa’s jitteriness had his limbs stone hard and yet shaky. Chuuya wasn’t surprised when he stood — he wasn’t surprised when he staggered either, hands looking for invisible anchors on the too-clean walls of that stall.

“He’ll come back,” he concluded, more to himself than to his companion. The resoluteness of it was a house of cards. “It’s — of course he’ll come back.”

He studied him.

“I just need to prepare myself for it, and he won’t be able to say no,” Akutagawa insisted, as he opened the stall door. The creak of it screeched against Chuuya’s ears — he moved his eyes to the wall, and kept quiet. “With enough time — he’ll have no choice but to approve of me. And he will come back. Of course he —“

The bathroom was still echoing when he left it, less than furtive steps and nothing more than a black stain.

Chuuya reached up and flushed the toilet.

---

...

---

Blood dripped from the glass-made holes in his gloves, landing on the floor with intermittent tip taps.

“That was an ugly picture,” Q noted, their side plastered against Chuuya’s leg. They’d grown taller, taunting that old school uniform they never went anywhere without. Their hair was wild and too long — cut badly enough he would have believed they’d done it themselves, if he doubted Mori would have given them blades not for their arms. “I said it when Boss took it.”

The end of the Dragon Head Conflict was a blurred bundle of assignments and preparations for months of travels — but Chuuya remembered that ballroom, and the rising chant of Double Black underneath the complicated glint in Mori's eyes.

Champagne in their hands and short, a bit awkward silhouettes pressed together — you don't mind keeping him company on the wall, until you get your own seat, yes, Chuuya?, Mori had asked, with his best smile. The framed pictures of all the Executives loomed from the wall — only Rimbaud and Dazai's faces unmovable behind broken glass.

"His face ruined it," he concluded.

"You look like you're about to sneeze," Q insisted. They poked his aching knuckles. "I think Boss does it with a hammer, usually."

"You're very judgemental for someone who isn't meant to be here," Chuuya considered. He let his glove fall, clenching and unclenching his fingers to verify everything was still working. There was a small trace of his blood over Dazai's face; he wiped it with a thumb. "The bastard's not even here to stop whatever evil plan you've got in mind. Does Boss even know you're wandering around?"

Q made a face, gently kicking the ground. "He locked the doll away."

That's still not entirely comforting, he didn't say. The kid had always had something unbridled about them — a sort of assuredness that they would make sure those blades in their arms were worth it.

"Are you angry?" the kid questioned.

Chuuya thought about it, flexing his head a bit more. "Not really."

They blinked. "That's an angry reaction."

"No," he insisted. He didn't exactly recall how he'd ended up stopping there, after that convo on new transportation deals with Mori — try as he might, even the act of raising his arm to punch was mostly lost in the blur. "Someone had to break it, anyway. It's tradition. I'm annoyed."

"Why?"

"Paperwork," Chuuya's mouth shaped, just as automatic as a breath.

Q hummed. "I don't do that."

"I know. You're a kid."

They directed him an odd look, at that.

After a long pause, still studying the broken zigzag of lines inside the frame, they dared: "Does this mean I can never use my doll again?"

Hushful and intolerable, the persisting itch in Chuuya's arms grew burning.

More, Arahabaki begged. There was a tilt to his voice — to the thing that wasn't a voice, but that he had learned to translate all the same; to the spike in his heartbeat and the heat in his veins and the crack in his bones, curling around meanings that meant something in the way bleeding did — that had lost its snarling, caged edge. Only when it was dark under the sheets, Chuuya dared to think — it really did sound rather lost.

But the idea was intolerable, and it itched far more than any locked Corruption. Chuuya let his hand ruffle Q's hair, absently, and offered: "I'm afraid so."

On the roof of Building One, once Q had been enclosed by hesitating mafiosi and the glare they refused to remove from him — accusation and kinship all the same; the childish notion of having been both deprived of something, and the childish question of why he wasn't raging about it — Chuuya pressed his lips and blew a bird whistle.

He waited. The city kept moving.

["Hummingbird," He tapped on the screen. "Are you there?"]

No whistling answered.

---

...

---

He hindered his ineluctable visit to Verlaine for as long as Hirotsu's damned, curled eyebrow allowed him to — and then, he made sure to get shitfaced drunk the night before.

"He's been notified for a month, now," the Commander reminded him, over the buzz of the Old World's busiest night. Some of the Lizards and the Guerrilla were mingling on the stools next to their own — Hirotsu seemed too busy making sure Chuuya didn't start throwing glasses on the ground to pay them any mind. "It's not like you're bringing him any sort of new information —"

"He'll be so fucking annoying about it," he interrupted him, sluggish and grunting, slamming his head on the counter. "You don't — hic! — you don't understand how fucking annoying he is —"

"He's a man with experience, in spite —"

“Our death was a mistake, Chuuya,” he mocked, high pitched, rolling in his space like a particularly unbalanced invertebrate. “Don’t you see that there’s no point, Chuuya? Don’t you just want to kill everyone in this building and go live in the god forsaken countryside with your big broth—”

Hirotsu’s hand was slammed on his mouth. The Guerrilla directed him concerned glances.

“Stop it, you —” Chuuya pushed the man off, agitating his finger towards the members of the squad. “You listen to me. You — I’m not going to be your Boss much longer. You guys need to learn about trickster fucking brothers from me, before Boss gives you to my boy Akutagawa —”

“Executive,” one of the Guerrilla — he had no confidence in his blurred vision to guess who — reassured him, “Boss already informed us that the transfer won’t happen before next year.”

“I know that, I’m an Executive —”

“The last thing the syndicate needs right now is more changes,” someone from the Lizards sighed, downing a glass.

“On that matter, actually,” Hirotsu spoke up, dragging Chuuya’s stool a bit closer. He tried to focus his eyes on him, but that Lizard’s remark had agitated something in the back of his mind — a response his tongue wasn’t shaping up. Kajii was juggling lemon bombs three tables away.

[“You have done nothing but work for weeks,” the scientist had complained, right before dragging him to the Old Word. “As your demonic other half would have said —”

Chuuya had glared at him. “I told you not to call him that.”

“What? Demonic or other half?” His punch had had him yelling. “God — you’re so sensitive!”

“Who the fuck is sensitive —”

“It’s fine, though,” Kajii had rationalized, one arm around his shoulder, unwisely. “It makes sense. Somebody’s been dumped.”

The rest of it had been rather violent.]

Vaguely, as he reached for his glass, he heard the old man explain: “If you have time, Gin and I would like your opinion on a recruit. Tachihara is rather —”

Chuuya sat up, all at once. “You’re right!” He pointed his shaky finger to the Lizard who had spoken — a woman, startled by the call out. “You are so — right. Changes are the last thing we need. This organization is in shambles already —”

“I wouldn’t say it’s shambles —”

“And you know whose fault it is?”

A collective sigh passed through the men.

“That bastard Mackerel!” He slammed his glass down — accidentally spraying Hirotsu’s rusty monocle with his wine. “That’s whose fault it is!”

The commander rubbed his temples, and pulled him to sit down again. “Yes, Executive.”

“— taking all the passwords, and all the god damned data, and my fucking calculator too, which makes virtually no fucking sense —“

“Elise was the one who took the calculator, actually,” Hirotsu reminded him, gently. “She has it in her room. I told you this.”

Chuuya squinted. “Well — well, still! It’s been a shitshow!”

“Certainly.”

“And he’s once again escaped every fucking report that’s on him, slacking off —“

The man made a face, tapping his glass. “I’m assuming he might be dealing with something slightly more complicated than documentation.”

It screeched against his brain like a record scratch. Chuuya squinted harder; spat, more than accusingly: “What, ‘you worried about him?’”

Hirotsu’s face turned cautious.

“Of course I’m not, Executive,” he answered, blankly. There was a stiffness to him that mostly spoke of that old respect for authority he’d always carried, no matter the age of his superiors; but a note in it was mere faith — the genuine, unhesitatingly certainly of a matter already dealt with. Hirotsu had always been rather skeptical of Dazai’s worst suicide attempts.

“Good,” Chuuya warned. He spun a finger around. “You don’t want them thinking it.”

“I really am not, sir.”

“Good,” he insisted, downing the last of his wine — slamming the glass on the counter again, just loud enough to make every Guerrilla and every Lizard in the row jump. “Good, ‘cause — ‘cause if he isn’t breaking into a shitty five stars Hotel, then he’s breaking into the disgusting sewers he belongs to — and if he’s not doing that, he’s couch surfing at the suburban apartment of whatever poor girl he’s managed to charm into a fuck — because God fucking knows girls always end up deciding his pretty face is a worthy price for that fuckass ego he calls a personality, so —“ It had gotten strangely silent. “So —“ Chuuya had forgotten his point. “So fuck him, that’s what!”

He grabbed another glass. Hirotsu tapped his fingers on the counter.

Angry, Chuuya thought. Of course he was angry. It was all bureaucracy and it was all business and it was all inevitable and it was all his fault. He had Corruption under a bandaged lock and key, and it had been weeks, and Chuuya still couldn't say his name out loud.

Angry, he thought, what else?

“Of course, Chuuya,” Hirotsu repeated, only a tad kinder. Chuuya wouldn't quite remember it in the morning — but the unusual sound of his name from the man's lips was a shivering warmth, for a few heartbeats.

Sir, he didn't correct. He had sweated for it, hadn't he? Why do you want to be called Chuuya?, Dazai had questioned. He had sweated his ass off for it. He'd taken Albatross' motorcycle and drove all the way to his parents' house, and he'd scratched the black scar on his wrist from an itch that was very distinctively not-Arahabaki, and he hadn't even talked to them. But he'd sweated just for a change to know they existed — it just didn't matter half as much as he'd thought it would. Executive.

The next morning, hungover and with his toes curled in his shoes, he entered Verlaine's self-reclusion without knocking.

“You know, I have always had a thing for stars.”

He'd tied his hair differently — an intricate braid that involved both paler sides of his hairline, removing any strands from his face. Naked and paler than a corpse, Verlaine's gaze was wider than the world itself — more focused on him than anything else had ever been. Chuuya had yet to understand why being looked at like that never set off his alarms.

“Did you?” Chuuya asked, unimpressed.

“The laboratory I was created in had a glass roof,” his brother recalled, curled up on that horrible chair of his — with the creaking wood. “They were the first thing I saw.”

Chuuya almost flinched.

It didn't escape Verlaine's gaze — because it couldn't have. He still wore black, most times he was down there to see him; it fit him better than his hat ever had. Chuuya disliked the thought. A man made for mourning, buried underneath the Port Mafia Headquarters — only one of the horror stories the Sheep used to whisper about the Mafia.

With bone-deep exhaustion, Chuuya sighed. He slipped down the rusty metal door until he was sitting on the floor, and waved his arm. “Come on. I know you've got things to say.”

Verlaine curled an eyebrow. “Now, don't be callous.”

“I'll be whatever the fuck I want.”

“I can hardly believe Ozaki allows you such behavior and language.”

“I can hardly believe she hasn't yet cut your dick off for calling her Ozaki,” Chuuya replied, as he crossed his ankles. “Hurry up. I know you have things to spit at me. Are you vindicated?”

Very neutrally, the man reminded him: “I killed Rimbaud long before you or that partner of yours could even attempt to.”

“Yes, but this is your gotcha moment. ”

Something like a malfunction had both his little fingers twitch on some piece of paper he was scribbling on. Perhaps it was the language barrier. Chuuya watched him come up with his own interpretation — then huffed. “You’re really not going to start some spiel on, the nature of beings such as us is loneliness, and, it was merely a matter of time before your inhumanity left you with no choice but me as companion, and blah blah —“

“I don’t talk like that.”

“You do,” Chuuya glared. “All the time. It’s even in your stupid letters.”

I unlocked your power, Chuuya, the latest of them had insisted. How can you blame me for unveiling you?

I didn’t want to be unveiled, he had thought about answering, before reminding himself of just who he would have entertained. I wanted to be me.

This is you, he could hear him say.

With a snotty superiority that hardly fit a man who had buried himself, Verlaine waved the matter away. “I have nothing to say that you don’t already know,” he scoffed. “And look at you. It is more than clear there’s no need for me to add onto your self-inflicted burden.”

He stared. “What, the burden of the thirty seven Goodbye, You Asshole parties I’m organizing as soon as the Mafia stops falling apart in the jerk’s absence?”

Verlaine studied him.

The silence scratched him like a cat — his eyes were a tad sharper. Chuuya refused to feel any sort of discomfort. He tapped the ground with his heels — causing that metallic sound with the buttons he had noticed Verlaine was irritated by. The man kept absolutely quiet.

“Fuck do you all want me to say?” Chuuya snapped, jittery to his very spine. Mori’s glances and Kouyou’s furrowed eyebrows and Hirotsu’s gentler tone and all of it, constantly — “That I hate him? That is news to absolutely no one. That I’ll hate the thought of him until I die? That we won’t even be in the same room ever again? That’s news to no one. That’s —“ Chuuya inhaled so fast it burned. “That’s such bullshit. The fuck do you all want from me?”

Verlaine said nothing.

Eventually, very carefully — very vacantly — he offered: “It took me a while.”

“To do what,” Chuuya clipped.

“To figure out being without him.”

Chuuya's mouth fell shut on pure survival instinct. He didn't know what he would have said — he only knew he couldn't afford an honest breath in front of that man.

"I don't —" he managed, once the ricochet of just how loud he'd snapped his jaw shut vanished from his aching head. "That's stupid."

The man hummed.

"Double Black was a temporary thing," he insisted, stuck between the anger that was never very quiet in Verlaine's presence and the irritation of feeling like he was missing pieces. Chuuya had never liked being surrounded by people who knew more than he did — he hated the merciless aware glint in Verlaine's eye with a child's pettiness, left out of a meeting room again. "It was never going to last."

"Would you have ended it yourself?" his brother asked, like a mock.

Chuuya gritted his teeth until the sound became concerning. "Stop projecting."

"You stop projecting," Verlaine replied, still bearing that fucking raised eyebrow. "You're the one who came here. You're the one who decided I was going to blame you for this. Were you looking for my accusation?"

He wanted to laugh in his face. The sound wouldn't quite come out. "You don't know what the fuck you're talking about."

The man shrugged. "Do you?"

Being without Dazai, Chuuya thought. A ridiculous idea to linger on. Being without Dazai. The strand of burned hair fell over his eye again. Chuuya stood up. "I'm leaving."

"Alright," Verlaine said, like it really didn't matter. The urge to punch his teeth in remained where it was — in his chest and unfathomable in its unrealistic pursuit. Then, tapping on those papers of his, he added: "I cannot tell you Dazai's disappearance doesn't satisfy me."

Somehow, it irritated him. "Then we finally have something in common."

"But I am sorry," he continued.

He stared — hard. "Did you hear a word of what I just said?"

"Chuuya," the man said, and how horrible it was to hear his name from his lips, every time — how nauseating and unfair, stolen from mouths that had loved him more than Verlaine's fear of loneliness would ever manage to. The Flags would have understood, he thought. The Flags would have never asked. The Flags would have looked at him, whole and jittery and caged again, unbalanced and doomed, and they would have never asked a thing.

Verlaine's words seemed stuck on his lips. He erased them, at last. "He's your partner," he morphed them into, utterly, horribly simple.

It sounded so easy.

Being without Dazai, Chuuya imagined telling him, ludicrously — three lifetimes away, in a less cage-like room and with less blood between them — was what an amputee had to feel when they stood up, forgetful and doomed. He could see the ground getting closer with every breath. He couldn't stop it. He was unbalanced and lungless and it itched — itched all the time, like a wound he'd burned again for iniquitous self loathing.

It didn't matter.

"He'd be here if he was," he concluded. He didn't meet Verlaine's eyes — in spite of what the man believed, he felt no need to be blamed. Unfair, his mind told him. The dried blood at the Mimic base — Mori's eyes as he swore, Oda Sakunosuke is dead. Unsure if he was lying, he added: "That's all there is to it."

---

...

---

Kouyou — unsettlingly, unavoidably nouveau riche in the very marrow of her bones, Noguchi would have said — had called them Opera gloves, when he had dug them out of a present box from a few years ago. With his jaw set tightly enough to sting, Chuuya studied the jarringly scarlet scratches across his forearms and called them might as well.

Snow stained the streets like seeping blood. His shoes sunk awkwardly down that candid hill; Chuuya considered floating, for a moment, and didn't.

He dropped, instead — crossed his legs on that soft, freezing ground, overlooking the sea with his back on Rimbaud's grave. The cold stabbed his clothed flesh like a thousand needles, momentarily numbing even the shivers. You know when something's so cold you feel like it burns?, Shirase had once muttered, lamenting all the loose snow to have ended up inside their makeshift beds.

Chuuya slid down. The tender, interior skin of his newly glove-covered forearms was plastered against the snow. Somewhere away from the cliff, where the city restarted, he could vaguely hear Christmas carols.

Oddly gentle, ever so parental — his first, first companion — Arahabaki murmured: burn it all down.

His fingers spasmed against the snow.

"You're not a god," Chuuya informed him — his own brain, maybe. He kept telling it to people. He had to start smaller, perhaps — closer. "You're not even a thing. I'm all you're ever going to be.” No answer. “And we’re not fucking, burning it down,” he added, after a bit. Talk to the wall and talk to the soul, Tanaki had said, once. Thinking about her was another stab of ice. He scoffed. “Get a grip. Wait for —”

He trailed off.

Once, Chuuya had activated Corruption inside an underground parking lot. Remembering flashes and shattered glass had never been particularly hard; but the whole picture was never there. Nakahara Chuuya did not dream; still, in the nights after, as his skin stitched itself back together, his bruised eyelids had pressed on his pounding eyes, and Chuuya had felt — felt all of it, for a moment; his flesh tearing and his bones knocking and his ears whistling from the gravity-less bubble he had destroyed the stone with.

A sort of enlargement, he had described it to Mori as. As if I had spread until I was touching every inch of that place. Chuuya left his blood in every place he destroyed and every carcass he made. In that voice Chuuya had made up at seven — just to imagine a sound that was not his own starvation — Arahabaki had sworn that was what all deities did: gave and took. Ate and got devoured. Got caged and — “I’m sorry,” Chuuya heard himself say.

For once, Arahabaki didn’t seem to know what to say.

Perhaps it was on him, like all that concerned the singularity — perhaps Chuuya had no more words left to give. Perhaps self-directed pity was a strange, unusual thing, and Chuuya hadn’t cried over himself since the first time he had tasted bread and it hadn’t smelled of blood.

I am all you’re ever going to be, he thought. His first friend had been himself, and had been a killer, so he had given him another name — because children were cowards, and he was no child. I am all you’re ever going to be. Chuuya hadn’t minded wrecking himself in two — not when he could pass it off as something he was doing for someone else. He had adored it because Arahabaki did, and he was all Chuuya was ever going to be.

His left arm burned. He didn’t lower his eyes.

He felt his nails scratch — dig and twist and pull. “I’m sorry,” he insisted. Claustrophobic. Deep breaths, Doc would have tutted. Empty-bones; lighter than air. Like a bird, Virgil would have said. Crawling out of the debris in Suribachi had taken three lifetimes, and stole his own from him. You never called Arahabaki ‘him’, before, Dazai had noted, two nights after the first time Arahabaki had cracked his skull against a wall. “I’m sorry,” he insisted, scratching through Kouyou’s gloves — because once he’d been seven and screeching, begging for someone to hear. If not pity, he could afford an ear. Chuuya was always stuck, in the end.

Sorry, Arahabaki echoed. A child learning new words; guessing by the shape of dancing lips. Chuuya had never done anything but scrape his skin to blood. How could he blame him for doing the same?

Sorry, he repeated, with strange diction. His oldest friend.

That was the last time he heard from him.

---

...

---

Makoto and his Suribachi City gang had allegedly attempted to steal all of Agent Minami's possessions, before Yuan had pulled their ears two times each.

"You'd think they'd know better, with all the eyes on the settlement," she mumbled, as she made sure to fix the mess in her guardian's car — parked in a wider road from the upper levels, and so awfully pricey when compared to the houses being rebuilt it was startling — before the woman could return from her conversation with some Port Mafia-bought work guards. "I get that most of the adults around are Mafia, but it's not like anyone likes Suribachi kids much."

"Oi, I think we were pretty liked," Chuuya said, a bit offended. "The Police Department had our pictures framed and all."

Picking up one of the kids from the gang — a five years old named Komako, he thought — Yuan directed him a glare over her curly head of hair. "That's 'cause they got bored of printing our picture every time they got their hands on us."

"Which was often," Makoto mumbled.

Chuuya ranked a curled eyebrow over his small frame — knees to his chest on the makeshift sidewalk, sporting the disappointed bruises of failed thievery. Intermittently, he directed nasty looks to Agent Minami's impeccable silhouette. "And what would you — born yesterday, I'd like to add — know about that, pipsqueak?"

The kid got offended. "I've heard stories! I know every story about the settlement —"

"Oh, yeah?" He bent, arms crossed. With a wink in Yuan's unamused expression, he asked: "Do you know about Arahabaki?"

Makoto squinted at him. "That's a myth."

His lips trembled. "Is it?"

"I'm not stupid," he muttered. "'s like those stories about the Mafia's Demon Prodigy. Everyone knows they made them up to scare us."

Despite the throbbing muscles in his face, he felt his smile slip from his face like a buzz. Only an inkling told him Yuan had paused her rocking of the giggling girl in her arms — Chuuya didn't quite have the guts to look away from Makoto sniffing, genuine grumpiness.

It had taken them a few months to decide Double Black had retired, he considered. Perhaps it wasn't all surprising that the underground would choose to pretend its worst fear had been nothing at all in less than sixty days.

Chuuya straightened, huffing. "Fine, then. Stellar marks. Congrats."

Despite hiding it between his knees, it was clear Makoto was pleased. He watched Yuan skip past them to reach her guardian — her bony hip bumping hers only for a second, surprisingly gentle — and eyed Komako, in her arms, with something eerily close to childish envy.

He blinked at him. "What, do you want to be picked up?"

The kid looked at him with pure, unfiltered hatred. "I'm too old to be picked up, dumbass."

"Well, do you want to or not?" he scoffed.

Makoto muttered some more. Kicking the ground until his shoes — a pair from the truck of clothing he and Yuan had sent to the settlement months ago, signed off with Shirase's GO LITTLE PESTS note — were yellow with sandy ground, he raised both his arms, making grabby hands; all while pointedly not looking at Chuuya.

Promptly, Chuuya kept his snorting all to himself, pretending not to preen at the kid's slight surprise at his effortless carry. "What, were you trying to make me fall on my face?" he huffed, tapping on a bandaid underneath his thighs.

His small face settled on his shoulder, just scorching hot enough to denounce his blushing. "It has to happen, at some point."

The renovation of Suribachi City made for an unrealistic sight — something fifteen years old Chuuya would have either assumed to be a scam or a Port Mafia-sent propaganda campaign. The sheer number of scaffolds and trucks had turned the settlement in a less impoverished sight — less of a disaster-recovery center and more of a location with a promising future. The Sheepdog would be rebuilt last, that time around, per Chuuya's own orders — change the name, also, he'd ordered.

It was — different. Familiar and odd, and just enough of a stranger to feel blasphemous. But the kids trusted them enough not to pierce holes in the trucks' wheels, and most of them were growing skin over their bones, at last — and Chuuya had all the necessary experience with heresy.

"And I want an Arcade," Makoto insisted, in his ear. "And a konbini. And one of those cool restaurants from the American movies, with the red couches and the milkshakes —"

"We'll make sure to get you some of them, if the blood money budget allows it," a new voice concluded.

They both stiffened.

Agent Minami sported a pair of sunglasses lined in blue carvings. They hid her eyes, but not the scrutinizing expression she never let go of — not of it, nor of her tailored tailleur. Attempting to offer Makoto a friendly smile was fruitless — in a show he wouldn't have dared to call adorable, lest the child kicked him hard enough in the nuts to leave him blind, Makoto hid his face in Chuuya's shoulder, pettily blowing air.

"Agent," Chuuya greeted, instead, since he was meant to be an adult. "Perhaps you'd like to remember just who caused the bloodied creation of Suribachi City at all, before accusing?"

The woman's eyes thinned.

She searched for Yuan's silhouette, her gaze softening imperceptibly. Delivering a less kind gaze to the rest of the settlement, she offered: "This is no place for a moral debate."

"No place is a place for a moral debate, if a cop is involved," Chuuya informed her.

"I'm no cop."

"You're worse," Over the sound of Makoto amusement, he raised his hat in goodbye, and set off to walk past her. "See you next time."

Her hand closed around his elbow. Not the wisest of moves — mostly entertained by the pure offense in the glare Makoto raised his head from his shoulder to direct her at that move, Chuuya halted and curled an eyebrow. "Yes?"

The woman tapped her fingers on his arm. She was still intermittently glancing at Yuan — a silent check that she wouldn't come and intervene. "We hear the Port Mafia has been going through some changes," she said, careful. "It seems most of the deals and alliances you've maintained for years are suddenly gone. Anything to say to that?"

Chuuya was unimpressed. "You can tell the press to come back in six months."

"Kid," Minami insisted. "If you're planning something that will throw this city in dismay once again, you —"

He ripped himself off her grip. Jolted by the motion, Makoto hung off of him tighter, wide eyes settled on the sudden darkened expression on his face. Mindful, Chuuya made sure to relax his grip on him — directing all his bone-deep dislike to the white-pressed lips on Agent Minami's face.

"I don't know what you think Yuan means you're allowed to do," Chuuya warned — just low enough to erase most dare from her eyes, turning her expression uncertain. "But be careful."

"There's a treaty in place," Minami hissed. "Your Ability Permit — it shouldn't allow you to sow chaos all over our city."

Makoto turned, all of the sudden. "Chuuya is helping us, you fucking loser!" he snapped, both fists raised in wild motions that almost threw him out of his arms. "You don't know anything! You just want to decide what's wrong and what's right, in a place you don't know anything about, like all of you stupid cops —“

He stared. “Kid —“

“How about you go to Yuan?” Minami cut through, directing a tight gaze to him. “She begged me to get you guys some more blankets — you can go help your friends distribute them.”

Makoto glared.

Biting his cheek, he put him down, pulling his earlobe. “Hey,” Chuuya tutted. “‘S fine. Thank you. You should go. A good leader takes care of the boring business, you know?”

His crossed arms weren't as threatening as he hoped them to be, small as they were — but Chuuya kept his smile on. “We do things together,” Makoto mumbled, still peeved. But he let Chuuya flick his earlobe again, and didn't leave before he'd thrown another glare at Agent Minami — brushing against Chuuya's side on his way off.

“Now you get little kids to guard you?” the woman questioned. He didn't look at her — only dug through his back pockets, searching for what he had gathered during the last shoot out. Still, she insisted: “I suppose you really are Port Mafia head to foot. This whole project — this was never meant to belong to a syndicate whose only aim is to make money off of it. Do you think a Permit allows you to do whatever you —“

Chuuya twirled Tainted-lit bullets upon his hands, and turned them in Minami's direction.

Her lips fell shut.

The cheerful clump of laughter and voices mixed with the metallic rattles of the work hauling the settlement out of its destruction. Yuan was a shrill of familiarity, her eyes away from the two of them — Chuuya leaned against the fragile wall of some plastic-covered refuge, arms crossed, feeding on the absolute stillness that overtook Minami's frame. Her fingers were stuck by her waist — near the gun in her holster.

“I wouldn't,” Chuuya suggested. “Gravity has the advantage of being faster than most.”

“You can't —“ Minami started. The Ability Permit flashed by her eyes, legal and theirs, and he saw it freeze her words in her throat.

Leisurely, he spun the bullets around, vibrating.

“I want you to think about this, and to give me your most honest, Division-fuckery answer,” he encouraged. “If I killed you right here, in the open air, with my Ability — who would stop me?”

They both knew he wouldn't, perhaps — but the message of it was unavoidable. The Port Mafia had chairs in the City Hall, and it had places in the national market; it had an Ability Permit and it had Yokohama in the tip of two fingers, held tight and selfishly — unreachable no matter all the blood dripping from their hands. Chuuya could hold a gun and shoot, and the most citizens would offer would be a glance. Who will stop us, Mori had mused, once, when they put us here?

Slowly, Minami let her hand fall from the holster.

“I hear congratulations are in order, if our sources are accurate,” she said, after a bit. Bowing her head, mocking but mostly resigned, she added: “Executive Nakahara.”

Wordlessly, Chuuya threw the bullets in the air, and pocketed them as they landed.

“Chuuya!” Yuan called. She was waving — with effort; quite literally covered in children from Makoto’s gang, hanging off her like monkeys. Her smile was wider than the sky. “Come help me!”

Agent Minami didn’t speak until Chuuya had turned, making his way to her. “I hear condolences are in order, too.”

Fake corpses littered in drowning bruises and hangman knots fluttered between his eyelids — the smell of rotten; the feeling of hair between his fingers. They’d sent all the corpses without the bandages. Chuuya had covered most of them up, no matter the collective fire they were destined for.

You could ask, he considered.

Arahabaki’s voice, perhaps — traitorous even in his inhuman devotion; perhaps unknowing of anything else at all. There was no fixation it could have that wouldn’t turn into obsession — no heartbeat it could love, if not by the honor of being killed first. Yuan could have asked, too, in his stead — he knew her inner workings far too well. Convincing her wouldn’t have been hard. Minami had to know.

If she’d chosen to taunt him — Minami had to know.

The encrypted line’s message was heard around less, lately — but it was still a static, buzzing background mafiosi knew. To to be brought to the Boss’ presence as soon as possible.

“No,” Chuuya replied, without turning. “I don’t think so.”

---

...

---

That Oda Sakunosuke had a grave didn’t matter — except it did, and it was maddening.

“It was an attempt to mock us, I assume,” Kouyou considered, browsing through dossiers like the one she’d just abandoned on her desk had not stilled Chuuya’s limbs. “Burying his closest friend against our traditions — making him reject our name just as he did,” A smile curled her lips — a distinctively mean sight. “Two traitors and a dead man leave the Mafia. Almost a pun, isn’t it?”

Chuuya’s eyes studied the picture one of the goons had taken — a single tombstone, white and new, standing solemn underneath a tree.

How dare you, he thought, almost delirious with head spinning something, too head wrenching to be mere rage; and he could have killed him, he thought, for a moment — he’d have killed him, if he’d seen him in front of him. The Flags’ graves, stolen and never anything but an offense to their name — the grass on his knees, permanent and forever there, because Chuuya was a selfish, terrible friend, and he would be until the end. How dare you.

What came out, odd and unrealized until he heard it — you and I are the same, Dazai had sworn, hallucinated and all too accurate, because Chuuya had known him from the first second — was: “He must have loved him.”

Kouyou raised her eyes on him, hesitant.

“It’s a smack, Chuuya,” she told him, after a beat. Something complicated twisted her face — for a moment, she looked at him the way she had when he was fifteen; momentarily, but deeply sure that he would be a difficult tassel to fit. “A dig at Mori, and just another instance of his use of those around him. Nothing more.”

His lips dried. Chuuya tapped his pen on his file — signed the document again. “Of course.”

---

...

---

The shipping container smelled of what all abandoned places smelled of — with the scent of trash from the mountains enclosing it.

A Calico cat was perched by the makeshift doors, watching Chuuya approach with all the unimpressed sentience of a more human being. It didn’t even make a sound when he climbed on to tear the doors open; but it refused to play with the trash, and it followed his every move inside like it wanted to call him a burglar.

“Fuck you too,” Chuuya grunted, before he could feel stupid for it. “This is free land now.”

The cat only judged him more quietly.

The bed inside still wasn't a bed — only a dangerous-looking metal structure with something like a bundle of sheets over it. Paperwork filled the desk and the freezer over the small fridge, all of it untouched, apart from scribbled smiley faces. The old paint still lingered in some corners of the walls, dried and somewhat ancient, useless to the eye — the broken lightbulb dangled gently, creaking.

Chuuya stood in the middle of it, the roof only one ball-throw from his head; the entire place shrieking and trembling at his every motion. There wasn't a sound to be heard for miles.

"I'll never get you," he concluded, stunned.

The container creaked some more. Behind him, a deep voice considered: "And yet homes are a wonderful indicator of our being, are they not?"

He was a tall man, probably around fifty, barely framed by the door. His shoes were deep in the layer of trash that had accumulated in front of the shipping container, with Dazai's late absence — the most he did about it was move it around with the T-shaped cane in his hands. His bowler hat hid a half fringe of chestnut hair — his suit was Western-looking, and his gloves creaked with use.

"Who the hell are you?" Chuuya ordered, tensing up along the preparing lines of Tainted.

When he offered Chuuya a smile, there was something in his eyes that made them golden. "Just a stray," he answered, vaguely. "You could call me Sensei, if you wanted."

He curled an eyebrow. "I don't remember you teaching me anything, old man."

"Not directly, no," Sensei assured. "But I'm definitely to blame for some things. Now," With a thud! of his cane against the container, echoing and startlingly violent, the old man offered him his most earnest look. "Tell me. What happens?"

Chuuya blinked, very slowly.

"What happens when?" he asked.

It was his turn to blink. "Now, obviously. I mean — the story has to go somewhere, yes? This city has finally reached the balance I had hoped for, at last, but I'm not so foolish as to think this could be the end of it. Truly," Sensei scrutinized the small space of the shipping container, scratching each side of his eccentric mustache, "Truly, I'm not sure this story could be over without him."

It all felt very cold, all of the sudden. "You want me to believe you know where he is?" was all he managed to ask — torn between caution and absolute speechlessness. "Who are you?"

"I don't," Sensei assured him. "I have an inkling of where he will end up, but that's all. In the name of all I have taken so much time to create, I have to ask you — would you mind being with him, when the time comes?"

His lips moved around nothing.

Chuuya vaguely wondered if the fumes from the dumping site could get into someone's brain. He wasn't sure if he would have called that old man or himself the victim, though.

"What the fuck are you talking about?" he spat.

"The end of the Book," Sensei said, with a half irritated shrug that reminded him terribly of something — it didn't land until he tapped on his cane, fingers untrembling like only Mori's own had ever been. Abruptly, the air around that old man turned sharper — littered with intention. Chuuya had never not known when danger was walking in his territory.

"Obviously."

Chuuya tried to say something rational — a better request than what the fuck or who the fuck. It sounded wrong in his head no matter the order of the words.

Eventually, because nothing else really mattered, he landed on: "Do you know where he is?"

Something like amusement broke through the severe lines of the man's traits — all thin lines and squinting eyes, unimpressively feline.

"If I knew," he said, "I wouldn't tell you."

That had his jaw clenching. "He might not even be alive," he reminded him.

"You know he is," Sensei corrected. "Please, do not waste my time."

Chuuya did know. It was the first time in a while he was believed so swiftly about it, though. "Are you — some weirdo who took him to heart and doesn't want the Mafia to execute him?"

"The Mafia wouldn't," Sensei waved it all away as if entirely unreasonable. "That vermin of mine wouldn't be so stupid. And you'd hardly let it happen. I know," He interrupted him, before he could open his mouth and protest. "I know you'd never. I have watched all of it. Do not attempt to lecture me on my own creations."

Chuuya's fists flexed. "You're no creator of mine."

"And you're no creature," the man agreed. "But I am Yokohama, and you're certainly hers."

It seemed hard to argue against that.

"So what," he snapped, instead.

"So what?" the man echoed, peacefully.

"What are you telling me? I don't get it."

"You will," Sensei assured. "With him or without him. You have a talent for rebuilding from the ashes, don't you? I have faith in you. This is merely another instance of being left behind."

As with all things — there is something to learn.”

Cursedly, it struck a chord.

“Since you know so much,” he hauled out of his throat, between gritted teeth, “I could take you back to the Headquarters and have them take it out of your carcass.”

“Certainly,” Sensei confirmed — except he seemed rather tranquil about it. “Your Boss would be more than happy to see me. But you won’t.”

At an impasse, they kept quiet.

Uncaring of the tedious affair, the shipping container creaked along to the wind. Chuuya felt his eyes be called by the normalcy of it all — of the pair of socks Dazai had left on the brink of the one stool around; of a hair tie that was Chuuya’s, on the right side of his pillow. Bloodied clothes under the bed — the lingering ghost of an ersatz idea.

It hasn’t even been two months, he reminded himself. No pranks and no stitches and none of it. Quiet, too — a different kind than the silent notes carved in Dazai’s skin.

Brusque, and as rude as Kouyou had tried to wrench out of his starved frame, he cut: “Is he, like — alright?”

Sensei’s gaze didn’t soften. Something like curiosity nested inside his pupils, though — just deep enough to tell Chuuya that he was taken aback.

“Oh,” he mused, studying him. “I assumed you two would be just like — I guess I was wrong.”

There were few things Chuuya hated more than blabbering without context. “Well?”

“He is,” Sensei replied. “He isn’t.”

“Are you making fun of me?”

“Why do you care?”

“I don’t,” Chuuya answered, automatically. He didn’t. Then: “Because —“ His hands were at loss with what to do with themselves. Because. Because all was inevitable and all was his fault. Because soukoku, he recalled, enemies of the bad guys. Because Oda Sakunosuke was dead and Sakaguchi Ango was a traitor, and at the very least — if he’d never understood Dazai at all — he did understand that. He’d forgiven Rimbaud on his death bed after making it himself. He had carried that blue tourmaline home and he had believed, stubbornly, it’d go back to normal.

“He’s mine to kill,” he concluded. That was all that there had ever been — from when his shoe had first landed on Dazai’s chest. “That’s why.”

Sensei said nothing. When Chuuya turned to look at him — maybe to nudge him some more; maybe to give up his rationality and just die in an attempt to drag him to the Headquarters — the man had disappeared.

The Calico cat from before meow-ed at him with unbridled taunt. It climbed the mountains of trash with swift paws, and vanished faster than Chuuya could wonder about his own insanity.

His phone was in his hand before Chuuya could wonder about the texture of it underneath his fingertips — he left it on the desk, and then he watched the Mackerel's nominative be rattled by the inquisitive beep of an attempted call, his arms crossed tight enough to bruise.

He waited.

He waited. Soukoku, he recalled, like an itch and a hiccup. Enemies of the bad guys.

Chuuya picked up the phone and hauled it against the wall.

He exhaled only when the pieces landed on the ground in a clattering shrill, fragments flying in different directions and white noises ringing over the nauseating pumping of blood in his eyes — only the ghost of his arm motion left, stiffening his muscles into a marble reproduction of what his own foolishness would look like on Dazai's tongue, as he laughed with the sanctimonious satisfaction of someone who had played them all.

“How dare you?” he heard himself say.

How dare you, he thought. Chuuya had lost it all and he'd stayed — Chuuya was Kouyou's best student and the Mafia's sole shadow left; and Dazai was a coward and he was alive, which had to mean something in the anesthetized mess Boss had complimented and in the way he'd known Chuuya knew nothing — and how nauseatingly, pathetically abandoned he had to have looked for Mori to have simply known. Chuuya wasn't like them. Chuuya had always known he was going to leave — in a casket or in a passing wind, dragging Chuuya's stupid, unavoidable whisper of hope by raw skin — because he'd thought, maybe even just once — since gods did not pray and Nakahara Chuuya did not beg, not ever, not for him — he'd implored, quietly, to his own starved hands, betrayed and alone — at least him. At least him.

He was so angry he couldn't see. He was so angry he couldn't think. It didn't matter and he'd always known; because Chuuya wasn't like them, not about him, and he'd known Dazai would not die there; because now he had a seat that wasn't a replacement but almost — because all of it was always stained and cursed and haunted by his presence and by second place and by the quietness of No Longer Human, never to be felt again; all of it was nothing but Arahbaki, rattling his cage, and Chuuya, alone, and why did that bastard get to pull him by strings he had ripped out with his own bare hands — and it didn't matter, and he'd never reached him at all, and Chuuya understood, he understood, because it was about a friend and because Chuuya always fucking understood, and he was so angry he couldn't breathe —

The shipping container creaked with the wind. He exhaled as if it was punched out of him.

Teeth gritted, he dropped on the bed.

Frame rattled and metal squeaking — there was nothing more to do. The firmament gleamed through the square of the makeshift door. There was a silence that turned that living location into something a bit more sensible — but he knew it had never been about the hush of the wind at all.

Would you mind being with him, when the time comes?, the man had asked.

“I am here,” Chuuya informed the empty space. His phone was destroyed on the ground. An ache of absence. The knowledge of not wanting it back. “I have fucking been here.”

Haunted houses had no mouths. Dazai was no foundations and no welcome mat; but he’d been something. He’d been something enough to leave an empty space behind, and he had been something enough to have Chuuya search for remains. Please, he imagined himself saying. In another lifetime. In another body; one less scarred and more trusting. Chuuya didn’t beg. It had never amounted to a thing at all. Forget something where I exist. Come back for it.

To do what?, he heard him ask, amused. To be killed by the tiniest of slugs?

His fingers tightened around the rust of the bed frame. Chuuya slid to his side with the languid tentativeness of a thief. His hat landed somewhere on the ground — the chain made a gunshot sound against the metal floor. He hadn’t been tired in a month. He hadn’t thought about the curve of Dazai’s face much either.

He slept until the morning. Mori sent out an official order to demolish the container the next day.

The penthouse was silent.

The lights were turned off, replaced by the gentle rays flooding the room from the floor to ceiling windows — the furniture was nothing but golden outlines; the suggestion of materiality. Chuuya let his hat fall to the ground, fixing his shoes by the door. He had learned to be quiet years ago — his motions were a hush of wind, and the thud! of his socks against the pavement.

Chuuya didn't feel the absence of it until his hands dragged across the absent dust on the cabinet.

“What the —“ he muttered, squinting at the naked counter.

He turned his eyes to the gray curtains, still shut — ranked them over the ancient carved lines on the doorframe, where his height had always been marked lower than it was. By the golden doorknob of the elevator-doors, the thin scratches of a lockpick pin glistened.

He stilled.

Abandoned by his fingers, the empty space where his stolen blue tourmaline stone had rested seemed to buzz, haunted by leftover quietness.

On a night a car exploded.

Despite their worst Mafia-black intentions, Beatrice's office had been mostly left as it was — a more respectful crypt for a long-dead enemy.

Chuuya kept his wine there.

It isn't yours, Dazai would tut, occasionally, when they passed by the alleged safe-house and did not stop. The space was wide and the curtains were heavy enough to hide a murder — plus, it had the added advantage of an Arcade stop. Except the Arcade was a dusty, abandoned ghost, and there was no murder bloodied enough Chuuya could put in place that would overshadow the crime scene the boy had left him to deal with. You're just worse than a thief.

"You don't get to fucking talk," Chuuya let the ghosts know, uncorking the Petrus he'd left on Beatrice's old desk while he looked for a glass. In the end, he ditched it — going for the neck of the bottle. "Better a thief than a deserter."

Unsurprisingly, the walls stayed silent.

He threw the cork somewhere. With a well done stretch, his hat followed.

He downed a sip that lasted longer than his beating heart could last in his throat — he tried to land on the Victorian couch in the corner, and he landed on the ground, instead. Chuuya sprawled like a star, sighing in satisfaction, and focused on nothing but the sizzling wine spreading through his viscera like more effective blood.

"Fucking finally," he managed, around the mouth of the Petrus.

He still carried leftover ashes from the car's explosion on his coat. Kouyou would be mad he hadn't immediately ran to the Headquarters — he tried to focus on the urge that thought caused. But it was muffled by the wine, and by the electrifying something that had traveled from her whispers on the phone — afraid for a rumor Chuuya knew had to have reached every corner of Yokohama — and stuck to the raw skin under his nails.

Dazai had left one of his lockpick pins on the coffee table, near his heel — Chuuya kicked its leg, grunting, until the needle rolled to the ground.

"Good riddance," he added, pleased.

Over the hiss in his bones, Hirose Fumiko played through Beatrice's old turntable, melodic and gentle. Somewhere through his forty seventh sip of wine and the end of the song, the pleasure faded into a number kind of nothingness.

"Want me to fucking blame you?" Chuuya questioned, drowsy. Dazai had been all bones and all blood — eyebags and a hatred that had nowhere to go, and he was meant to live and die for the Port Mafia, like all of them. And he'd left. Somehow. "You piece of shit? You fucking coward?"

No one left, but he'd left. He had built his underground tunnels, and he hadn't even used them. He was petty even in death, and he was still alive, because Chuuya would have known.

No one ever left, but Chuuya always went back to the barren starting point. "Good for you," he heard himself say, distantly.

Chuuya waited for the itch of his arms. Chuuya waited for the irritation — for the forecast of paperwork and a shaken syndicate he called home. For the warmest thing in his veins, be it rage or be it determination. Be it the face Dazai made when he won a game at the Arcade — no matter if cheating was a tool; no matter if in a land where the taste of betrayal had lived longer than even Mori's best smiles, 'partners' meant something. But the Arcade had been shut down, and he had no partner, and Chuuya felt nothing at all.

Spurred by a wind that was nowhere to be found, his hat rolled down from the couch, landing by his fingers.

Chuuya put it on, and that was it.

Double Black

File Number: 510003

---

[?] [...]

[Continue?] [...]

[Continue?] [...]

ERROR

[You've reached the end of this file]

---

the end.

---

Chapter End Notes

me, last chapter: suspend your belief for dazai's miraculous scar-healing techniques mori: is this thing fucking stupid

Mikko Harvey, from "For M," Foundry. "Please forget your scarf in my life, and come back later for it."

Well. Here we are. I'm not even sure where to begin, I'm not going to lie (which you can probably notice from me dedicating my first end-of-chapter silly omake to myself) but. Well.

I started writing this fic five years ago (almost five and a half, now). At the time, it was completely different — nothing more than a few scenes and the (very) hopeful plan of a 20k words short Mafia Soukoku introspection work. The first chapter you guys see now is the result of FIVE DIFFERENT (!!!) rewrites, all of them incredibly different one from the other. Actually, the entire first act was entirely rewritten when I finished the second, because I'd finally understood where I wanted this fic to go, and I wanted to make sure the beginning of it lived up to that self-expectation. I'm hardly ever proud of the things I do, but this fic has been with me for such a long time that I'd feel bad about bad-mouthing it now. So — maybe not entirely satisfied (not ever) but glad that I managed to end it.

I can never thank any of you guys enough for all the love you showed this fic. Don't mean to isolate anyone who might read this after it's done (welcome in that case!! and thank you so much!!) but I hope all of you who've been commenting/leaving kudos/even just reading since the very first chapters know that I wouldn't have finished this fic without your support. Genuinely. Like this is a monster of a fic. I needed all the support I could get, and re-reading you guys' comments gave it to me. I can never thank you enough, but I do hope you could feel all my love and appreciation whenever I answered your comments. I hope you can feel it now, too.

The fic is done. I don't plan on writing more for this universe (thought catch me making references in other canon-compliant fics because what am I if not self-indulgent). This fic will forever be my silly little things — you guys might get my playlist for it, though, eventually!! Maybe I'll post it as a chapter, who knows. It's not like I can stay away from soukoku for long. Not even sure what I'm meant to do with my life without blood-bound camellias...

Well. I've already talked enough. If you've read up until here — thank you. If you're reading this as it's already finished — thank you. If you're re-reading — damn, you're brave, but thank you so much. That's all I can say. Thank you for liking it and even for not liking it, and thank you for withstanding my 800k words of repressed homoeroticism, and thank you for being so kind about my first work, and my non-first-language English, and all of it. I hope you have a wonderful day, week, month, and everything.

Stay warm, and I hope to see you soon!

— sapphirestormout.

Please drop by the Archive and comment to let the creator know if you enjoyed their work!